Hugh, the son of Conor, son of O'Conor Roe, and Roderick, the son of Donogh the Dark-Eyed, two worthy tanists, were treacherously slain by the young tribe of Felim Fionn O'Conor.

Felim, the son of Mulroona Mac Rannall, a worthy heir to the chieftaincy of his country, and Donogh Baisiler Mac Maoltuille (Mac Tully), died.

Mac Carthy More, i. e. Teige, the son of Donal Oge, died; and that Teige was a defender of his patrimony, a subduer of his enemies, and an exalter of his friends.

Cormac, the son of Donogh, son of Donal Rivach (Mac Carthy), died, a man who retained the lordship and tanistship of Hy Carbery (Carbery, in Cork), in despite of his father's brother, Dermot-an-Dunaidh.

The Knight of Glin (Fitzgerald, in Limerick), namely, Edmond, the son of Thomas, son of Philip, son of John, son of the Knight, died.

Teige Boirneach (of Burren), Murrough, and Mahon, the sons of Mahon O'Brien; Conor, the son of Bryan, son of Murrough, son of Bryan Roe (O'Brien); the son of O'Loughlin, namely, Conor, the son of Roderick, son of Ana; and Murrough, the son of Torlogh, son of Murrough, son of Teige, marched with their forces at the request of Owen, the son of O'Flaherty, who accompanied them with great numbers to attack his kinsmen, Roderick Oge, and Donal of the Boat; the sons of O'Flaherty, who were there encamped to oppose them, at Caol-Saile-Roe (now the bay of Killery, between Galway and Mayo); the O'Briens and Owen (O'Flaherty), attacked the camp, seized and carried off some prey and property; the O'Flahertys and the people of the country pursued them, and an engagement ensued, in which the sons of Mahon O'Brien, and Owen O'Flaherty, were slain by the O'Flahertys.

A. D. 1504.

Gillpatrick O'Conolly, abbot of Clones, after having obtained the bishopric of Clogher, died.

Philip O'Reilly, abbot of Ceanannsa (Kells, in Meath), and his brother Owen, who was a canon in the same place, died.

Manus, the son of Bryan Mac Donogh, abbot of the monastery of the Trinity on Lough Kea (in Roscommon), the constructor and protecting repository of science and literature of Connaught, died in Cill-Duibh-Duin (Killadoon, in the county of Sligo), and was interred on the Island of the Trinity, at Lough Kea.

Torlogh Maguire, a canon of the chapter of Clogher, parson of Derryvullen, and prior of Lough Dearg, fell down the stone stairs in the town of Athboy, about the festival of St Patrick, from the effects of which fall he died, and was buried in the monastery of Cavan.

Roderick Mac Mahon, vicar of Clones, died.

Conor, the son of Roderick Mac Dermott, tanist of Siol Mulroona (in Roscommon), the most powerful lord's son of his country for a long period, was killed by Mac Dermott, at Beallach-na-nur-brointeadh (or the pass of the new mill-stones).

Art, the son of Carbry, son of Hugh O'Neill, with his son and brother, were killed by the tribe of Redmond Mac Mahon.

Bryan, the son of Maguire, i. e. John, the son of Philip, and Mac Gauran, namely, Edmond, died.

Mac Dermott of Moylurg, i. e. Conor, the son of Roderick Mac Dermott, son of Dermot, was killed by Mulroona, the son of Tomaltach Mac Dermott.

Flaherty, the son of Failge, son of Bryan Mac Cabe, was killed by Bryan, the son of Alexander Oge Mac Cabe.

O'Keenan, i. e. Gillpatrick, son of Teige; and Malachy, the son of Aithirne O'Hosey (both in Fermanagh), died.

O'Cassidy of Coole (in Fermanagh), namely, Pierce, the son of Thomas, chief physician to Maguire, a man profoundly versed in literature and medicine, and who kept a house of general hospitality; and Andrew Magrath, the son of the coarb of Termon Dabeog (at Lough Dearg), a general Biatach, died.

The battle of Bel-atha-na-ngarbhan (in Galway), was fought by John Burke, the son of Ulick, grandson of Ulick, son of Rickard, tanist of Clanrickard, against O'Kelly, in which Walter, the son of John, son of Thomas Burke, heir to the lordship of Conmaicne (in Galway), and a great number of the Clan Donnell, and of the Clan Dubhghaill (the Mac Donnells and Mac Dougalls of Antrim, who were celebrated clans of galloglasses), were slain.

A. D. 1504.

1. The Battle of Knocktow was fought A. D. 1504, on the 19th of August, at a place called Cnoc-Tuagh, which, according to Mae Geoghegan and others, signifies the hill of the battle-axes, and is now known as Knoekdoe, about seven or eight miles north-east of Galway. The circumstance above stated, of the demolition of three of the castles of Malachy O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, in Galway, is stated as the chief cause which led to this celebrated battle; but according to other accounts, various private quarrels and public jealousies, between Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, then lord deputy of Ireland, and Ulick Mae William Burke, lord of Clanrickard, in Galway, contributed to excite this engagement, of which the following additional particulars have been collected from Ware, Campion, Cox, Leland, Lodge, Sir John Davies, Mae Geoghegan, Moore, and others. Clanrickard formed a powerful confederacy, and was joined by many of the Irish chiefs, namely, Torlogh O'Brien, prince of Thomond; Mulroona O'Carroll, lord of Ely, in King's county and Tipperary; the Mac Namaras of Clare, mentioned in the text as Siol Aodha; the chiefs of Ormond, mentioned in the text, namely, the O'Kennedys; and the chiefs of Ara, mentioned in the text, namely the Mac-I-Briens, of Ara, in Tipperary. The combined forces of Ulick Burke, lord of Clanrickard, thus consisted chiefly of Connaught troops and clans, who were his adherents, together with the above-mentioned allies of the men of Munster. The earl of Kildare, on the other hand, collected all the English forces of the Pale, and his Anglo-Irish troops, with their Irish allies, amounted to an immense army; a great number of the Irish chiefs of Ulster and Leinster, as mentioned in the text, with their kerns and galloglasses, joined his standard, and amongst others, Hugh Roe O'Donnell, prince of Tirconnell; some of the O'Neills of Tyrone; John O'Reilly, prince of East Brefney, or Cavan; William O'Ferrall, who was lord of Anally, or Longford, and bishop of Ardagh; some chiefs of the Magennis of Iveagh, in the county of Down, of the Mae Mahons of Monaghan, and of the O'Hanlons of Armagh; O'Conor Faile, lord of Offaley, in the King's county, also joined Fitzgerald, together with O'Conor Roe of Rosecommon; also, Mae Dermott, lord of Moylurg, in Rosecommon; the O'Kellys, chiefs of Hy Maine, in Galway, and some of the Clan William Burkes of Mayo. The Anglo-Irish noblemen of the Pale who commanded in the army of the earl of Kildare, with their forces, were William Preston, vis-

Three castles belonging to O'Kelly were demolished by Mac William, i. e. the third Ulick, namely, those of Garbh-Dhoire, Muine-an-Mheadha, and Gallach (now the castles of Garbally, Monivea, and Gallach, in the county of Galway). In consequence of this, O'Kelly, i. e. Malachy, went to the lord justice and complained of the injuries done to him, on account of which was fought the battle of Cnoc Tuagh.¹ An immense force was mustered by the lord justice, Gerald, son of Thomas, earl of Kildare; and in the first place he was joined by the chiefs of Leth-Cuin (the northern half of Ireland), namely, O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, and his son, with the chiefs of Tirconnell; and several of the chiefs of Connaught, namely, O'Conor Roc, i. e. Hugh, the son of Felim Finn, and Mac Dermott, lord of Moylurg; there came also the chiefs of Ulster, except O'Neill, in this force, namely, Art, the son of Hugh O'Neill, tanist of Tyrone; Donal, the son of count of Gormanstown; Nicholas St. Lawrence, baron of Howth; Christopher Fleming, baron of Slane; Christopher Nugent, baron of Delvin; Edmond Plunkett, baron of Killeen; Edward Plunkett, baron of Dunsany, and Christopher Barnwall, baron of Trimblestown; together with John Blake, lord Mayor of Dublin, and a body of archers and men-at-arms, and also the mayor of Drogheda and his forces. The battle was fought with great fury for several hours, and equal loss on both sides, but Clanrickard's forces at length gave way, and were routed with great slaughter, Ulick himself escaping by flight; but his two sons and his daughter were taken prisoners. The earl of Kildare, after the victory, distributed thirty barrels of wine amongst his men; he made himself master of the towns of Galway and Athenry, plundered and laid waste a great part of Connaught, and carried off immense booty. In the account of this battle, quoted by Taaffe from the Book of Howth, it is stated, that after the victory lord Gormanstown expressed himself as follows respecting the Irish allies who had assisted them, saying, "We have slaughtered our enemies, but, to complete the good deed, we must proceed further, and cut the throats of those Irish of our own party;" the earl of Kildare replied, "'Tis too soon yet." There are numerous contradictory statements as to the numbers slain in this fierce battle. Ware says that, according to the Book of Howth, nine thousand of Clanrickard's forces fell, and very few of the English, but Ware and others reject these statements as incredible; and Sir John Davies says, that "4000 of the Irish and degenerate English were slain; and Cox states, that "this bloody battle was for some hours very dubious, but the victory was at length gained by the lord deputy, with the slaughter of 4000 of his enemies." Leland and others say that the forces under Clanrickard were undisciplined, and very imperfectly armed, and unable to cope with the regular and disciplined troops of the lord deputy, particularly the archers of the pale; it does not appear that firearms were used at this battle, though they had been introduced into Ireland some years before that time. Mae Geoghegan says, the Irish lost only two thousand men in this battle, which appears to be nearer the truth than the other statements, and from the account of the Four Masters, that the conflict was long continued with equal valour on both sides, it is probable that about three thousand of Clanrickard's troops, and two thousand of Kildare's forces fell, making in all about five thousand men slain in this sanguinary battle.

Magennis; Mac Mahon and O'Hanlon; also O'Reilly; O'Ferrall, i. e. the bishop; O'Conor Faile; the O'Kellys, and the Clan William Burke, and almost all the forces of Leath Cuin. These great combined forces marched direct into Clanrickard. Mac William of Clanrickard, on the other hand, mustered numerous and immense great forces to oppose them, namely, those of Torlogh O'Brien, son of Teige, lord of Thomond, with his kinsmen and their forces; also the Siol Aodha; Mulroona O'Carroll, lord of Ely, with his chiefs and clans, and the chiefs of Ormond and of Ara. Mac William and O'Brien, with their forces, came to the brave determination not to yield submission or hostages to their opponents, but give them battle at Knock Tuagh. A fierce battle ensued between them, such as had not been fought in latter times, so that, at a great distance from the armies, might be heard the rushing attacks of the martial chiefs, the onsets of the champions, the fierce charge of the princely heroes, the loud commands of the nobles, the clamour of the troops in close conflict, the shouts and exultations of the victorious youths, the sound of the warriors prostrated to the ground, and the discomfiture of the common soldiers by the superior power of the chieftains. Mac William, O'Brien, and the forces of Leath Mogha (the southern part of Ireland), were finally defeated in the battle, with great slaughter, and among the slain was Murrough Mac I-Brien, of Arra, with many other chiefs; and of the nine brave battalions of galloglasses who marched in close order of battle, only one broken troop survived. Immense numbers of the lord justice's forces were cut down and slain, although they were the victors. It was impossible to enumerate or relate the numbers of both horse and foot forces that fell in that battle, for the field on which they lay was impassable from the immense and multitudinous heaps of unrecognisable dead bodies, completely mangled; spears shivered in pieces, shields cloven into parts, and battle-swords broken into fragments; lifeless bodies hacked and mangled, and youthful, beardless jaws breathing their last existence. After the battle was gained by the lord justice, he conferred with O'Donnell about marching immediately to Galway; but O'Donnell replied and said, "Many of our people have been slain and destroyed, and there are many others of them scattered from us; it is therefore more advisable to remain on the field this night as a proof of our victory, and to encamp here, and our officers and soldiers will join us on perceiving our standards and banners." This plan was adopted, and on the following day the lord justice and O'Donnell marched for Galway, the lord justice taking with him the two sons of Mac William, and his daughter, as prisoners; and they remained together for a night in the town, in cheerfulness and harmony, after gaining the battle. From thence they proceeded to Athenry, and took possession of the town; and after this, O'Donnell, and the other chiefs, took their leave of the lord justice, and all returned to their respective homes.

A treacherous attack was made on O'Neill, i. e. Donal, by Teige O'Hagan and his sons, at O'Neill's castle of Dungannon, and the castle was taken by them; but God avenged this deed on them, for the town was immediately taken from them, and Teige and two of his sons were hanged, and the third was maimed.

Fingin, i. e. Mac Carthy Riavaeh, the son of Dermot-an-Dunaidh Mac Carthy, lord of Hy Carbery (Carbery, in the county of Cork), died, and his brother Dermot, the son of Dermot-an-Dunaidh, succeeded him.

William Mac David, the son of Edmond, died, and was succeeded by his brother Thomas.

A. D. 1505.

Donogh O'Kane, abbot of the monastery of Moy Cosgrain,¹ was hanged by Dermot, the son of Roderick, son of Manus O'Kane, on account of which deed Dermot himself was maimed.

A. D. 1505.

1. Moy Cosgrain, now Mocosquin, anciently called Cambos and Camus, situated three miles south of Coleraine, in Derry, near the river Bann, where a monastery was founded by St. Congal, in the sixth century, and a Cistercian abbey dedicated in honour of the Virgin Mary, and called de Clarofonte, or St. Mary de Fontana, was established and endowed A.D. 1172, by the O'Kanes, lords of that territory. The abbey and its lands were granted by king James I., to the Society of Londoners, who got grants of almost the whole of that county, hence called London-derry. The ancient abbey church still remains, and there were in former times interesting ruins there of St. Congal's monastery, with some splendid stone crosses sculptured, and containing images of saints, also baptismal fonts, &c., and it was for many centuries a celebrated place of pilgrimage.

Edmond Dorcha, of the family of the knight Simunach (Fitzsimon), prior of Fore,² died.

Laurence O'Flanagan, prior of Devenish,³ died.

Donal, the son of Art, son of Owen O'Neill, was killed by Bryan, the son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv, son of Torlogh of the Wine, lord of Tirconnell, Inisowen, Kinel Moain, and North Connaught, [died], a man to whom submission was given by the people of Fermanagh, of Oriel, of Claneboy (in Down), of the Routes (in Antrim), and the O'Kanes (of Derry), and to whom also submitted the English and Irish of Connaught, except Mac William of Clanrickard, and as to him, O'Donnell revenged his disobedience, for he frequently made incursions into his territory, and there was not a quarter of land from the river Suck northward, and from Slieve O'Naedha in the west, but were under tribute to O'Donnell; this O'Donnell was the full moon of hospitality and nobility of the north, and the most eminent for agreeable manners and feats of arms, the best man for either peace or war, and the most distinguished of the Irish in Ireland in his time for government, laws, and regulations, for throughout Tirconnell, during his time, no watching was kept, and the people only closed the doors to keep out the wind; he was the best patron of ecclesiastics and of men of learning, and a man who gave immense alms in honour of the God of the universe; a man by whom was first erected a castle at Donegal, that it might serve as a defending fortress for his descendants; and he also founded a monastery for friars de observantia (Franciscans), in Tirconnell, viz.: the monastery of Donegal; he was a man who often led his forces on expeditions to levy tributes throughout Ireland, and a man to whom was applicable the title of Augustus of the north-west of Europe; he died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil, and after extreme unction and an approved repentance, in his own fortress at Donegal, on a Friday, precisely, being the fifth of July, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and the forty-fourth of his government, and was buried in the monastery of Donegal.

Mac Carthy, of Carbery (in Cork), i. e. Fingin, son of Dermot-an-Dunaidh, the son of Donal Riavach, died, and was succeeded by his brother Dermot.

Felim, the son of Niall, son of Art, son of Owen O'Neill, was killed by the sons of Torlogh O'Muldoon.

Mac Donnell, i. e. Colla, the son of Colla (of Antrim), O'Neill's constable of galloglasses, was killed at Armagh, by Gillespie, the son of Sorley Roe Mac Donnell.

The sons of Gillpatrick, son of Edmond Maguire, plundered the young sons of the same Edmond, namely Bryan and Owen, and the sons of Gillpatrick slew Owen while in pursuit of the prey; and Fergus More Mac Cabe was slain on the side of the sons of Gillpatrick, on that occasion.

Torlogh, the son of Maguire, i. e. John, the son of Philip; the two sons of Teige Mac Caffrey; and Teige Oge, the son of Edmond Mac Gaill-Gille, along with eighteen other men, were drowned in a boat on Lough Erne.

The son of O'Flanagan (of Fermanagh), i. e. Cormac, the son of Cormac, died.

2. The Abbey of Fore, in Irish Fobhar, sometimes called Fowre of St. Feighan, situated in the parish of the same name in the barony of Demifore, county of Westmeath; and the name Fobhar is probably derived from Fobraidh, which signifies fine land. A monastery was founded here in the seventh century by St. Feichin, a native of Luighne, now the barony of Lieney, in the county of Sligo, a celebrated saint, who also founded Termon Feichin, near Drogheda, and many other monasteries, of which accounts will be found in Lanigan and Archdall, and he died A.D. 665, on the 20th of January, on which day his festival has been always observed, and his memory held in great veneration. The monastery of Fore became famous as a seat of learning and religion for many ages, and according to Ussher it was called Baile-na-Leabhar, signifying the Town of the Books, or of learning, from the great seminary established there. A large town grew around it, and it became a bishop's see, the first abbot raised to the episcopal rank being St. Suarlech, or Suarle, who died on the 27th of March, A.D. 746. The succeeding abbots were also styled bishops, and Fore continued an episcopal see to the twelfth century, when it was united to the diocese of Meath, and the bishops of Fore were sometimes styled bishops of Westmeath, and the see designated the diocese of Westmeath, as mentioned in these Annals at A.D. 1174, where it is stated that it was annexed to Clonmacnois, by a general decree of the clergy of Ireland. In the year 1209, Walter de Lacy, lord of Meath, refounded the Abbey of Fore for Benedictine monks, brought over by him from the Abbey of St. Taurin, at Evreux, in Normandy, and Fore was dedicated under the invocation of SS. Taurin and Feichin. William Nugent was the last prior of Fore, the lands and priory being seized by king Henry VIII.; and in the year 1588, the priory and its extensive possessions were granted by queen Elizabeth to Christopher Nugent, baron of Delvin. The abbey and town of Fore were frequently plundered and devastated during the Danish and English wars, but some interesting ruins of the ancient abbey and its churches, and of castles or towers, still remain beautifully situated near the fine lake called Lough Lene, and the high hill named the Ben of Fore.

3. The Abbey of Devenish, situated on Devenish Island, in

The son of O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, marched with a force into Tyrone; he burned Dungannon, the town of O'Neill, i. e. Donal, and also the town of Hugh, the son of Donal O'Neill; he overran the country from Abhain More (i. e. the great river or Blackwater), inwards, without opposition, and on his return he laid siege to Castlederg (in Tyrone), against the sons of Niall, the son of Art (O'Neill), took the castle, and left his guards in it; from thence he proceeded to Cill-Mie Nenain (Kilmaerenan, in Donegal), where he was nominated lord of Tirconnell, on the 2nd day of August, by the will of God and men.

Carbry, the son of Bryan O'Higgin, a professor of poetry, died in Westmeath; and Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan, son of Donal Cam O'Higgin, died.

John, the son of Rickard Burke, one of the most worthy young men of the English of Ireland, was treacherously killed in the monastery of Tubberpatrick (in Mayo), by the sons of Ulick Burke.

The castle of Ballintober (in Rosecommon), was taken by O'Connor Don, and by Mae Dermott, from the tribe of Graine (or Grace), the daughter of O'Kelly; they however made peace, and restored the descendants of Graine to their estate.

A. D. 1506.

Thomas Buighe Mae Cosgraidh (or Cosgrave), crenaeh of Clones, and John O'Fiaich (O'Fay), crenaeh of Trian-Airidh-Brosgaidh (Derrybrusk, in Fermanagh), died.

The son of Maguire, i. e. Hugh, the son of Edmond, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, was slain, while pursuing a prey which was taken by the sons of Con, the son of Henry O'Neill, on Cuil-na Noirthear (in Fermanagh, on the eastern side of Lough Erne), and the person who slew him was Philip, the son of Edmond, son of Gillpatrick.

James, the son of Philip, son of the Giolla Duv Maguire, a man of prudence and piety, died, and was buried at Donegal.

Manus, the son of Geoffrey Roe Maguire, and the son of Bryan of Tullaghaw, died.

Thomas, the son of Oliver Plunket, was killed by the tribe of Mahon O'Reilly, (the O'Reillys of Clanmahon, in Cavan), namely, the Calvaeh, son of Felim, and his sons, on account of which a war broke out between the English and Irish.

The son of O'Kane, i. e. Bryan Fionn, the son of John, was killed by Donal, the son of Niall, son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill, and a son of that Bryan was killed by Donogh O'Kane.

Mae Quillan (of Antrim), i. e. Walter, the son of Cormac, son of Seinieim, was killed by O'Kane, i. e. Thomas, the son of Aibhne; there were also slain along with him the two sons of Tuathal O'Donnell, the two sons of O'Ilara (of Antrim), the three sons of O'Boylan, the two sons of O'Quinn, and also seventeen of the chiefs of his forces, in the Routes.

Hugh Roe, the son of Glaisne Mae Mahon, was killed by O'Reilly, i. e. John, the son of Cathal, and his sons.

Donal O'Craidhen (O'Crean), a pious, conscientious merchant, died, while hearing mass, at Donegal.

Patriek O'Maoleonry, one of the most eminent historians and poets in Ireland, in his time, died.

Ath Truim was burned by an extraordinary fire. (Trim, in Meath, which, according to other accounts, was burned by lightning), Mae Carthy of Carbery, i. e. Dermot, the son of Dermot-an-Dunaidh, the son of Donal Riavach, died.

O'Kane, i. e. Thomas, the son of Aibhne, and the sons of John, the son of Aibhne, namely, Donogh and Donal Cleireaeh, went across the Bann eastward, and carried away with them much prey and valuable property, and returned with joy and gladness.

Catherine, the daughter of the earl of Desmond, i. e. Thomas, the son of James, the Bann Tighearna (Lady, or Baroness), of Hy Carbery (in Cork), a charitable and hospitable woman, died, and by her were founded Benn Dubh and Dun-na-mBenn.

The bridge of Port Croisi, on the Shannon (i. e. O'Brien's bridge, in Clare), was built by O'Brien, namely, Torlogh, the son of Teige, son of Torlogh, aided by Donal his brother, by the bishop of Killaloe, and by the bishop of Kilfenora.

Lough Erne, near Enniskillen, in the county of Fermanagh, and called in Irish Daimhinis, which signifies the Island of the Ox, or, as expressed by Colgan, "quod Latine sonat Bovis Insula." A monastery was founded here in the sixth century by St. Molaise, a native of Breifney, a celebrated saint, who also founded many other monasteries, as mentioned by Lanigan, and his death, according to

A.D. 1507.

EON PAUNT (John Payne), bishop of Meath, a friar preacher (or Dominican) and Pierce O'Maoluidhir, abbot of Clogher, died.

Grace, the daughter of Maguire, the wife of Philip, son of Torlogh, a charitable and hospitable woman; and Catherine, the daughter of Cuchonacht, the son of Manus Mac Mahon, died.

O'Flanagan of Tura (in Fermanagh), namely, Murtogh, the son of Murtogh, died.

A nocturnal attack was made by Niall Roe, the son of Donal, son of Niall Garv (O'Donnell).

Henry, the son of Hugh O'Neill, a distinguished military leader, and a most learned man in the arts, died.

Fclim Mac Uinnseannain, official of Tirconnell (vicar-general of Raphoe), a select Brehon, an ecclesiastic eminent for piety and benevolent deeds, died on the twelfth of July.

Siubhan (Judith), the daughter of Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh Roe, died.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, marched with a force into Tyrone, and he encamped before the castle of O'Neill, at Dungannon, and slew many of the people of the town, among whom was Mac Gillroy, i. e. Bryan; and O'Neill then made peace with O'Donnell, after which O'Donnell proceeded to the lord justice (the earl of Kildare), and after his departure O'Neill plundered Kinel Moain (in Donegal), and slew Bryan, the son of O'Gormley.

Niall, the son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe, son of Bryan Ballach O'Neill, was taken prisoner by the people of Carrickfergus; he remained imprisoned for a considerable time, and was at length liberated, by giving sixteen hostages in his stead.

A contest arose between O'Neill and the sons of Con O'Neill; the sons of Art (O'Neill), joined the sons of Con, and both parties three times plundered Kinel Feradaidh (in Tyrone); but O'Neill afterwards committed great depredations on the sons of Art.

Hugh, the son of Torlogh, the son of Philip Maguire, was killed by the son of O'Rourke, namely, Tiarnan Oge, the son of Owen.

The son of Maguire, i. e. Teige, son of Conor, son of Thomas Oge, was killed by the sons of Donogh Maguire, aided by Redmond Oge Mac Mahon.

The great castle of Carrickfergus was taken, and the mayor of the town made prisoner, by Niall, the son of Con (O'Neill); and he released his own hostages who were in the castle, which had been formerly taken by them (the English).

The church of Achaidh Beithe (Aghavea, in Fermanagh), was burned, and the greater portion of the valuable property of the country was consumed in it.

Edmond, the son of Thomas Oge (Maguire), son of Thomas Oge, died of one night's sickness.

O'Dunain of Domhnach Moighe-da-Chlaoine (Donaghmoyne, in Monaghan), was killed with the thrust of a dagger by his own kinsman, Gillpatrick, the son of Philip.

Bryan, the son of Mac Gauran, i. e. Donal Bearnach, was killed by Torlogh, the son of Hugh, son of Owen Mac Gauran.

Mac Conmidhe (Mac Conway), i. e. Solamh (Solomon), the son of John, son of Solomh, chief professor to O'Neill, a man learned in poetry, in literature, and philosophy, and who kept a house of general hospitality, died on the 30th of October.

Magrath, i. e. Thomas, the son of Philip, son of Thomas, son of Maolmurry Oge, son of Maolmurry the Four Masters and Colgan, took place A.D. 563, on the twelfth of September, on which day his festival was kept, and his memory long revered, and was buried in Devenish. The name Molaise, in the Irish, is also written Molaisre, and Laisre, and latinised Molassius and Lasserianus, and hence he is mentioned by several writers as St. Lasserian; but it is to be observed that he should not be confounded, as done by mistake by several writers, with another celebrated saint of the same name, that is Molaise, or Lasserian, the first bishop of Leighlin in the seventh century, who died A.D. 638. Devenish was an Augustinian priory, dedicated in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, according to Ware; and there was also a priory of the Culdees on the island. Some of the abbots of Devenish were also styled bishops, until it was annexed to the see of Clogher, in the twelfth century. It was for many centuries celebrated as a seat of learning and religion, but was frequently devastated, like other abbeys, during the Danish wars, yet there are still remaining some extensive ruins of the abbey and churches, together with one of the ancient round towers of beautiful structure, and in perfect preservation.

More; O'Cuill, i. e. Cendfaoladh; O'Daly Fionn, i. e. Geoffrey, the son of Donogh; O'Daly of Carbury, i. e. Aongus, the son of Aongus Caoch, and O'Geran, i. e. John, the son of Conor, died.

Mac Ward of Oriel (in Monaghan), i. e. Gillpatrick, the son of Hugh, and Tuathal Buighe, the son of Adam Garv Mac Ward, were killed together by Cu-uladh O'Connolly, aided by his kinsmen.

The castle of Drom-da-Eithiar, and Caislen-na-Deirge, (Dromahaire in Leitrim, and Castlederg in Tyrone), fell.

The Barry Roe (of Cork), i. e. James, the son of James, accompanied by the chiefs of his people, proceeded on a pilgrimage, to Spain, and after having performed the pilgrimage, they got aboard of a ship to return, and no tidings of their being living or dead were ever received. Donal, the son of Teige, son of Gillmichael O'Fay, a professor sufficiently qualified for Ireland or Scotland, in history, in knowledge of the Latin language, and in poetry, was drowned along with the Barry on the same pilgrimage.

John Burke, the son of Ulick, son of Ulick, son of Rickard Oge, tanist of Clanrickard, the most noble of the English race in Ireland, a vessel full of hospitality and of truth, and a preserving link of steel, died.

A. D. 1508.

Maighe (or Matthew), Magrath, bishop of Clonfert, a prosperous, religious, prudent and pious man, died; and David, the son of Thomas Burke, after having been appointed his successor in the bishoprick, died on his way to Rome.

Thomas O'Connellan, bishop of Elphin, (who was also bishop of Ardagh, according to Ware), and Walter Blake, bishop of Clonmacnois, died.

William Oge, the son of Art Mac Caghwel, dean of Clogher, brother to Owen (Eugene Mac Caghwel), bishop of Clogher, died.

O'Mulloy (of the King's county), i. e. Hugh Oge, was killed in his own castle by his own kinsmen.

Donal O'Brien, the son of Teige, son of Torlogh, tanist of Thomond; and Gerald, the son of Hugh, son of Cathal O'Reilly (of Cavan), died.

The son of Mac Mahon, i. e. Redmond Oge, the son of Redmond, was killed at Domhnaeh-Maighe-da-Chlaoine (Donaghmoyne, county of Monaghan), on St. Patrick's Day, by the son of Maguire, namely Philip, the son of Edmond, and this affair happened after the following manner: Philip having gone to the town, to hear mass there in honor of St. Patrick, and while they were at mass in the church, Redmond Oge (Mae Mahon), with a large party, arrived at the church, and set fire to it at the four quarters; the son of Maguire, hearing of this, said he would not suffer St. Patrick's church to be burned, and having encouraged his people, he and his friends sallied forth in the name of God and St. Patrick; the two parties having encountered, Redmond was thrown from his horse, and he and his foster-brother, namely, the son of Bryan Roe Mac Gillbride, were afterwards slain; several were taken prisoners, and the name of God and of St. Patrick were magnified through that deed.

Cormac O'Keenan (in Fermanagh), a learned historian and a true poet; and Donogh, the son of Bryan, son of Philip Maguire, died.

Murtogh, the son of Hugh, son of Fergal Oge, son of Fergal Roe Mac Geoghegan, was killed by his own kinsmen.

Philip, the son of Bryan, son of Felim O'Reilly (of Cavan), a military leader, and a man who kept a house of hospitality, a man full of knowledge in all the arts, died, after the victory of extreme unction and repentance.

Tiarnan Oge, the son of Owen O'Rourke, i. e. the O'Rourke, was killed by John, the son of Tiarnan Finn O'Rourke.

Niall, the son of Alexander Mac Cabe, and Henry, the son of Bryan Mac Cabe, died.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, having proceeded (with his forces), in boats, on Lough Erne, took the castle of Enniskillen from Roderick Maguire, and gave it to Philip, the son of Torlogh Maguire; and O'Donnell also took the hostages of the country. O'Neill, i. e. Donal, and Maguire, namely, Conor, came to O'Donnell at Enniskillen, paid him his tribute, and made peace with him; Philip, the son of Bryan Maguire, demolished his own castle through fear of O'Donnell, and the sons of Bryan left the country, namely, Roderick went to O'Rourke, and Philip went to Art Oge, the son of Con O'Neill.

The son of O'Kane, i. e. Geoffrey, the son of Thomas, was killed by the tribe of Manus O'Kane.

John Mac Donnell Gurm (in Antrim), was killed by Mac Quillan.

O'Donnell having marched with his forces into North Connaught, brought hostages with him from thence to his own place.

Bryan, the son of Philip, son of Donogh Maguire, was taken prisoner by Maguire, in the church of Aghalurcher.

Philip Oge, the son of Awlave, son of Philip Riavach, son of Bryan, son of Awlave, son of Philip, son of Awlave, son of Dunn Carrach Maguire, died; he was the chief of his own tribe (Clanawley, in Fermanagh), and a man who kept a house of hospitality.

Cormac, the son of Niall, son of Giolla Duv, son of Hugh (Maguire), was killed by the people of Tullaghaw, and the sons of Philip, son of Bryan Maguire, in a nocturnal attack.

Edmond, the son of Manus O'Gormley, was killed by Con, the son of Niall Bearnach, son of Henry, son of Owen; and Con himself was slain by Bryan, the son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, in the same month.

The sons of Donogh Maguire, namely, Thomas, Philip, and Felim; and the sons of John Buighe Mac Mahon, made an attack on Maguire, i. e. Conor; Maguire opposed and defeated them, and slew Felim, the son of Donogh; he smote Bryan, the son of John Buighe Mac Mahon, and took him, and Owen, the son of Thomas, the son of Art Roe Mac Mahon, prisoners.

Art, the son of Con O'Neill, committed great depredations on the people of Kinel Fearadhídh (in Tyrone); Owen, the son of O'Neill, and the sons of Mac Caghwell, overtook him, and Aongus, the son of Sorley Bacach, was slain on the side of Art, who made his escape with difficulty, and carried off the prey.

Aibhilin (or Eveleen), the daughter of O'Kane, i. e. Thomas, the wife of Owen Roe, the son of O'Neill, died.

Donal Mac I-Brien, of Ara (in Tipperary), the son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Murrogh-na-Raithnighe, a distinguished military leader, who was mild to his friends, but fierce to his foes, died after a life of nearly a hundred years spent with honour and noble deeds.

O'Driscoll More, i. e. Conor, the son of Fingin, son of Mac Con, died; he was a valiant man in defence, the friend of the orders (friars), and of learned men; and his son Fingin was appointed his successor after he had been liberated, for he was imprisoned in Cork for more than a year.

Mac Carthy More, i. e. Donal, the son of Teige, son of Donal Oge, a man of prosperity and affability, and learned in the arts, died.

A contest arose between Teige, the son of Donal, the forementioned Mac Carthy, and the brother of Mac Carthy, i. e. Cormac Badhrach, the son of Teige, son of Donal Oge, from which resulted the loss of upwards of eighteen score (three hundred and sixty), persons who fell between them.

The son of Mac Pierce died, i. e. James, the son of Edmond, son of James, son of William, son of Mac Pierce Butler, (of Ormond); he was a knight by the force of arm, and a hero in bravery.

The monastery of the town of O'Rourke, which is called Carrickpatrick,¹ in Connaught, in the diocese of Ardagh, was founded by O'Rourke, i. e. Owen, and by his wife Margaret, the daughter of Conor O'Brien.

A. D. 1509.

Bryan, the son of Teige Mac Uinsain, the official (vicar-general) of Clogher, died.

Donogh Mac Rory, erenach of Machaire-na-Croise (Magheracross, in Fermanagh), an humble and lowly man in the love of God, and a man who kept a house of hospitality, died.

The son of O'Neill, i. e. Art, the son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, was treacherously 1508.

1. Carrick Patrick, signifying St. Patrick's Rock, as St. Patrick is said to have founded a church there, at the place afterwards called Creevelea, near Dromahaire, in the parish of Killenuremy, diocese of Ardagh, and county of Leitrim. The monastery above mentioned, was founded for Franciscans of the Observantine order, by Owen O'Rourke, prince of West Brefsney or Leitrim, and his wife Margaret O'Brien, daughter of Conor O'Brien, prince of Thomond. A great part of the extensive walls and the altar of this abbey still remain, and likewise the monument of O'Rourke, with his effigy in full length sculptured on his tomb, and there are also monuments of the O'Murroghs, O'Curryns, and other families.

taken prisoner by Art of the Castle, the son of Niall, son of Art, son of Owen O'Neill, although being his gossip, and having been invited by him to his own castle; his son Niall, son of Art, and Felim O'Melaghlin, were taken prisoners along with him, and he was delivered into the hands of O'Donnell, from which circumstance great troubles resulted.

The earl of Kildare, lord justice, marched with an army into Tyrone, at the invitation of the sons of Con O'Neill, who obtained the castle of O'Neill, i. e. Dungannon, before the lord justice arrived at it. The lord justice proceeded from thence to the castle of Omagh, which he took, and in it he made prisoners Torlogh, the son of Niall, son of Art O'Neill; and Owen Roe Mac Sweeney, and the lord justice demolished the castle, and then returned home.

O'Neill, i. e. Donal, the son of Henry, son of Owen, lord of Tyrone, a man who destroyed most, and on whom most was destroyed, and who made most war, and committed most depredations in defence of his lordship, until he finally gained it, died on the sixth day of the month of August; and Art, the son of Hugh, son of Owen O'Neill, was appointed his successor.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, marched with a force against Mac Dermott, and destroyed a great deal in Moylurg; Thomas, the son of Redmond, the son of Philip Maguire, was slain in that force, and O'Donnell returned from that expedition.

O'Boyle, i. e. Edmond Buighe, the son of Niall, was killed at night by the east of a javelin, by Connor Oge O'Boyle, at Luaeh Ross (in Donegal).

Art O'Neill was liberated from his imprisonment by giving other hostages in his stead, namely, his own son and his brother Bryan.

Philip, the son of Bryan, son of Philip Maguire; Maolmora, the son of Failge, son of Donal Baun O'Reilly; and Owen, the son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe O'Neill, died.

Bryan, the son of Con O'Neill, attacked the tribe of the daughter of Mae Murrough, on the borders of Lough Leary (part of Lough Erne, on the borders of Tyrone); and he slew Henry Oge, the son of Henry Oge; Owen, the son of Niall Bearnaeh O'Neill; Bryan, the son of Niall Bearnaeh; and the son of Hugh Balbh O'Neill, and took from them sixty-four horses.

Cormae, the grandson of John, the son of Connor Oge Maguire; Dermot, the son of Flann Mae Ward; and Teige O'Keenan, died.

Mae William, of Clanrickard, i. e. Ulick, the son of Ulick, son of Riekard Oge, a man who was submissive to friends, but the reverse to foes, died.

Mae Anfhileadh (the son of the poet), i. e. Gillcreest, the son of Awlave, a learned poet, died.

Henry VIII.¹ was proclaimed king of England, on the twenty-second of April.

A. D. 1509.

1. Henry VIII. King Henry VII., the first sovereign of the House of Tudor, died on the 21st of April, 1509, in the 53rd year of his age, and 24th of his reign, and was succeeded by his son, Henry VIII. then in the 18th year of his age, who died on Friday, the 28th of January, 1547, in the 56th year of his age, and 38th of his reign. In 1537, in a parliament held in Dublin, by the lord deputy, Leonard Gray, was passed the Act of Supremacy, by which king Henry VIII. was declared supreme head of the church in Ireland, and all appeals to the Pope, or communications with the court of Rome were prohibited under the penalty of Perjury, and any person who refused to take the oath of supremacy was deemed guilty of high treason. The title borne by the kings of England until this time was only that of Lords of Ireland, but the title of King of Ireland was conferred on Henry VIII. and his successors in a great parliament held at Dublin A.D. 1541, by the lord deputy, Anthony St. Leger.

Lords Lieutenant.—The following account of the lords lieutenant and deputies of Ireland, in the reign of Henry VIII. has been collected from Ware, Borlase's Reduction of Ireland, Lodge's Peerage, and various other historical works. In 1509, Gerald Fitzgerald, the eighth earl of Kildare, was continued as lord justice and lord deputy of Ireland, and remained so until his death, in 1513, having held the office of lord deputy and chief governor of Ireland about twenty-five years, during a period of thirty-three years, under kings Edward IV. and V., Richard III., Henry VII.

and Henry VIII.; this celebrated earl founded a college at Maynooth. In 1513, Gerald, ninth earl of Kildare, son of the late earl, succeeded as lord justice and lord deputy; and in 1515, William Preston, Viscount Gormanstown, was appointed lord justice, but soon after dismissed, and Gerald, earl of Kildare, was again appointed lord deputy, and going to England in 1519, left sir Thomas Fitzgerald, his relative, lord justice. In 1520, Thomas Howard, earl of Surrey, high admiral of England and Ireland, son of the duke of Norfolk, was appointed lord lieutenant, and landed at Dublin with 1000 soldiers, horse and foot, and a body-guard of 100 men; he had many engagements with the Irish princes and chiefs, as the O'Neills of Ulster, the O'Byrnes of Wicklow, the O'Conors and O'Moores, of Offaley and Leix, and others; and, in passing through a narrow defile in Leix, he was nearly killed by a musket-shot, the ball having struck his helmet. The earl of Surrey soon after, in the year 1521, returned to England, and left Pierce Butler, earl of Ormond and Ossory, as his lord deputy. In 1524, Gerald, earl of Kildare, was again appointed lord deputy, but being sent for to England in 1526, he was by the intrigues of his enemy, Cardinal Wolsey, under various charges confined to the Tower, and, according to Borlase, he was ordered by Wolsey to be beheaded, but was pardoned by the king, and sent back to Ireland. In 1526, Thomas Fitzgerald of Leixlip was appointed lord deputy for a short time, and in the same year Richard Nugent, baron of Delvin, succeeded as lord deputy. In 1528, Pierce Butler, earl of Ormond and Ossory, was appointed lord deputy, instead of the

A. D. 1510.

Murtogh (O'Brien), the son of Murtogh, son of Torlogh, bishop of Kilfenora, died, O'Reilly, i. e. John, the son of Cathal, died ; he was the first to establish the order of friars de observantia (Franciscans), at Cavan, by the authority of the Pope.

Bryan Roe, the son of Donal, son of Hugh O' Neill, died.

Bryan, the son of Philip O'Reilly, was slain by the sons of Redmond, son of Glaisne Mac Mahon, while in pursuit of a prey.

Mac Cabe of Brefney, i. e. Felim, and Mac Loghlin, i. e. Anthony, died.

O'Felan, i. e. Fergal, a learned professor in poetry, and Owen, the son of Bryan O'Higgin, chief professor of Ireland, died.

Mac Ward of Tirconnell, i. e. Owen Roe, died at Inis Mac-an-Duirn (in the barony of Kilmacrenan, county of Donegal, he was chief poet of Tirconnell).

Gerald, earl of Kildare, with the nobles of the English and Irish of Leinster, marched with an army into the province of Munster, and fortified a castle at Carrick Cital, in despite of the Irish of Munster. O'Donnell, with a small force, followed him through Meath into Munster, westward, until he joined him at that place ; from thence they proceeded to Ealla (Duhallow, in Cork), took the castle of Cean Tuirc (Kanturk), and plundered the country ; after that they marched into Great Desmond (in Kerry), took the castle of Pailis, and another castle on the banks of Maing (the river Mang, in Kerry), and returned back safe into the county of Limerick. After that they mustered fresh forces, and were joined by the Geraldines of Munster, commanded by James, the son of the earl of Desmond, with all the English of Munster ; also by Mac Carthy Riavach, i. e. Donal, the son of Dermot, son of Fingin ; by Cormac Oge, the son of Cormac, son of Teige, and by the English and Irish of Meath and Leinster ; and they then marched to Limerick. Torlogh, the son of Teige O'Brien, lord of Thomond, collected all his forces, and was joined by Mac Namara, and the Siol Aodha, and the Clan Rickard, who mustered another great army to oppose them (the earl and his forces). The earl marched with his forces through Bealach-na-Fad-baighe, and through Bealach-na-nGamhna, until he arrived at Droichead Croise, namely, Droichead-Puirt-Croisi (the bridge of Port Cross, called O'Brien's Bridge, in the county of Clare), which had been constructed by O'Brien, across the Shannon, destroyed the bridge, and encamped for a night in that country. O'Brien encamped so near them that they could hear each others' voice and conversation during the night. On the following day the lord justice arranged his forces, placed the English and Irish of Munster in the van, and the English of Meath and of Dublin in the reere of the army ; O'Donnell marshalled his small force, and remained in the reere, along with the English of Dublin and Meath ; they then crossed through Moin-na-mBrathar (the Bog baron of Delvin. In 1530, Henry Fitzroy, duke of Richmond and Somerset, natural son of king Henry VIII., was appointed lord lieutenant, but did not come to Ireland, being a mere boy, about 10 years of age, and sir William Skeffington was made lord deputy under him, and arrived in Dublin with 200 horsemen. In 1532, Gerald, earl of Kildare, was again appointed lord deputy under Henry Fitzroy, duke of Richmond, lord lieutenant, but being sent for to England in 1534, he left his son Thomas, then a young man in the 21st year of his age, in his stead as lord deputy. The earl was imprisoned in the Tower of London, and his son Thomas, having heard a false report that his father had been beheaded, he organised a formidable insurrection in Ireland, called the rebellion of Silken Thomas, as the young lord was commonly called by the Irish Tomas-an-tSioda, from the splendid robes of silk he wore ; or, according to others, from the silken banners borne by his soldiers, and an account of this rebellion is given at the year 1535 in these Annals. The earl, his father, died in the Tower in 1534, and the forces of Silken Thomas having been subdued, and himself brought prisoner to England and confined in the Tower, he was, together with his five uncles, brothers of the deceased earl, namely, sir James and sir John Fitzgerald, knights of Rhodes, and of St. John of Jerusalem, and Oliver, Richard, and Walter Fitzgerald, conveyed prisoners to the tower, and tried on a charge of high treason, and on the 2nd of February, 1535, they were all hanged and beheaded at Tyburn. In 1532, according to Borlase, it was enacted, that none should be appointed to the office of lord justice of Ireland, but an Englishman, born within the realm of England. In 1533 sir William Skeffington was again sent from England as lord deputy, and arrived in Dublin in October, but died in the December following at Kilmainham. In 1535 lord Leonard Gray, viscount of Graney in Ireland, son of Thomas Gray, marquess of Dorset, was appointed lord deputy to Henry, duke of Richmond, the king's son, who died this year, in the 16th year of his age ; in 1540 lord Gray was recalled, and in the year 1541, was on various charges tried and beheaded on Tower Hill. In 1540 sir William Brereton, afterwards marshal of Ireland, and baron of Leighlin, was appointed lord justice, but died the same year at Kilkenny. In 1540, sir Anthony St. Leger succeeded as lord deputy, and going to England in 1543, left as lord justice sir William Brabazon, who was ancestor of the earls of Meath. In 1544, sir Anthony St. Leger again arrived in Dublin as lord deputy, but going to England in 1546, he a second time appointed sir William Brabazon as lord justice, and in 1547 sir Anthony St. Leger again came to Ireland as lord deputy.

of the Friars), which was the shortest way to Limerick. O'Brien's forces made an attack on the English army, killed the baron of Citon, and Barnwall of Circustoun, (Barnwall of Crickstown, in Meath), and many other noblemen that are not recorded. The English army continued their retreat, and the forces of the O'Briens returned triumphantly with great spoils, and there was not a man of the English or Irish in those two armies, on that day, who gained greater fame for valour and generalship than O'Donnell, in covering the retreat of the English forces.

Mac Maurice of Kerry, i. e. Edmond, the son of Thomas, son of Patrick, a vessel full of wisdom and hospitality; and Dermod, son of Donal, son of Donal Mac Carthy Cluasach, died.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Hugh Roe, went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and while abroad, his people and friends were in grief, sadness, and sorrow after him, and he left his son, Manus O'Donnell, to defend the country while he should be absent.

A. D. 1511.

Art, the son of Con O'Neill, whom O'Donnell had imprisoned at his departure for Rome, was liberated from his imprisonment by Manus, the son of O'Donnell, without O'Donnell's permission; and his son Niall Oge became a security for the maintenance of the terms of peace agreed upon between them.

Thomas, the son of Andrew Mac Brady, bishop and archdeacon of the two Brefneys (diocese of Kilmore), for the space of thirty years, a prelate whom the English and Irish supported, a man distinguished for wisdom and piety, a brilliant lamp which enlightened the laity and clergy by instruction and preaching, an affectionate shepherd of the church, after having ordained priests and ecclesiastics of all degrees, and having consecrated many churches and cemeteries, after having bestowed precious presents and food on the rich and poor, his spirit departed to heaven, on the fourth of the kalends of March (or August), precisely on a Tuesday, at Dromahaire (in Leitrim), having come to consecrate a church in Brefney, in the sixty-seventh year of his age; and he was buried on a Friday, in the monastery of Cavan.

Cormac Mac Gauran, who was called bishop of Brefney (Kilmore), died before Christmas.

The greater portion of the ancient works of the church of Armagh were burned.

O'Connor Faily, i. e. Cahir, the son of Con, son of Calvach, a general entertainer of learned men, a distinguished military leader among the English and Irish, was slain by a party of his own people, namely, by the sons of Teige O'Connor, and the sons of John Ballach O'Connor, beside Mainister Feorais.¹

O'Kelly, i. e. Malachy, the son of Teige, son of Donogh, son of Malachy, son of William, son of Donogh Muinach, died; he was a supporter of his territory, friends, and people, a general patron of learned men and strangers, a man by whom the castles of Gallach, of Garbally, and Monivea (all in Galway), were erected.

Mac Murrough (lord of Leinster), i. e. Murrough Ballach, son of Donogh, son of Art, died.

Thomas, son of Glaisne, son of Conor O'Reilly (of Cavan), and Edmond, the son of Glaisne, died.

Glaisne, the son of Conor, son of John O'Reilly, was killed by the people of the house of Mac Mahon.

Owen, the son of Bryan Roe, son of Cathal O'Reilly, died.

O'Dogherty, i. e. John, the son of Donal, son of Conor, died; and Conor Carrach was nominated the O'Dogherty.

Mac Donogh of Tirerrill, i. e. John, died; and his brother Fergal, tanist of Tirerrill, was slain by Mac Dermott.

Art, the son of Con, son of Henry O'Neill, went into the pay of Hugh, the son of Donal, son of Henry; John, the son of Edmond, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, died.

The Dillon, i. e. James of Machaire Cuircne, (lord of Kilkenny West, in Westmeath), died.

Hugh, the son of Felim Mac Manus, was killed

A. D. 1511.

1. Mainistir Feorais, now Monasteroris, a parish also called Castropetre, in the barony of Coolestown, King's county, which got its name from sir John de Bermingham, earl of Louth, who was in Irish called Mac Feorais; and hence the monastery was designated that of Mac Feorais, he having founded, A.D. 1325, an abbey here for Conventual Franciscans, of which some interesting ruins still remain, near Edenderry; this abbey, with its lands, was granted to Nicholas Herbert, who died in 1581.

by James, the son of John Mac-an-Easpuic Maiguire.

Dubhthach (Duffagh), son of Duffagh O'Duigenan (of Kilronan, in Roscommon), a learned historian, and a man of great wealth and prosperity, died.

O'Neill, i. e. Art, the son of Hugh, marched with a force into Tirconnell, and burned Glenfine

II. The Kingdom of Ulster.—In this article is continued from p. 345, the ancient history of Ulster, and of the colonies that peopled Ireland in the early ages; an account of the Partholians, Nemedians, Fomorians, and Firbolg, has been given in the preceding part, and in this is given an account of the Tuath De Danan, Milesians, Celts, and Scythians.

The Tuath De Danan, as well as the Firbolg, were, according to our old annalists, a branch of the Nemedians, for a tribe of the Nemedians, when conquered and enslaved by the Fomorians, left Ireland under the command of Iarbanel, one of the sons of Nemedius, and arrived in Greece, and having settled a long time in Achaia or Attica, they are stated to have become deeply skilled in magic, and to have acquired the power of working great wonders. The derivation of their name, according to some, was from Danan, one of their queens in Ireland, and the word Tuath, which means a tribe, hence Tuath de Danan signified the tribe or people of Danan, as their chiefs were descended from her three sons, Brian, Iuchar, and Iucharba; or, according to others, they were designated De Danan, from De, which signified gods, hence called De Danan, or gods of Danan, from their great power and magic skill; others derive their name from Tuath, a lord, hence Tuath de Danan, which would signify lords of Danan. The name has been latinised Dananne and Dananni, and anglicised Danans. At the time the Danans were in Greece they are said to have assisted the Athenians in their wars with the Assyrians or Syrians who had invaded Greece, but the Assyrians having proved victorious, the Danans, for fear of falling into their power, left Greece under the command of their chief leader called Nuadh, and emigrated to Lochlin or Scandinavia, now parts of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, and having remained there many years, they next proceeded to Albain, or that part of North Britain now called Scotland, where they remained seven years, and sailing from thence they arrived at Inis Ealga, or the Noble Isle, then the name of Ireland, and landed in the northern part now Ulster; from thence they proceeded to Sliabh-an-Iarain, or the iron mountain in Breeney, near the lake now called Lough Allen in Leitrim. The Firbolg colony, who were then the possessors of Ireland, having collected their forces, advanced to oppose the Danans, and a great battle was fought between them at Magh Tuireadh, or the Plain of the Tower, a place situated near Lough Mask in Mayo, in which the Firbolg forces were totally vanquished, and ten thousand of them, together with Eochy their king, were slain; and the cairn or sepulchral monument of great stones, raised over king Eochy still remains on the strand near Ballysadare in Sligo. This was called the battle of South Moy Turey, and in thirty years afterwards another great battle was fought at North Moy Turey, near Lough Arrow in Sligo, in which the Firbolg forces, combined with the Fomorians, were again overthrown by the Danans, who thus became masters of Ireland. The arrival of the Danans is placed by our old chronologists about twelve centuries before the Christian era, and they ruled over Ireland about two centuries, or one hundred and ninety-seven years, according to the Psalter of Cashel, under nine successive sovereigns, who resided chiefly at Temor or Tara, and Tailtean in Meath, and sometimes at Cruachan in Connaught, and at Aileach in Ulster. Their most celebrated kings were Nuadh, their first king, who was surnamed Airgid Lamb, signifying of the Silver Hand, for, having lost his hand at the battle of South Moy Turey, one of his artificers formed for him a silver hand, and this circumstance has been adduced as a proof of the superior skill of the Danans in the arts, and as they were represented by the other inhabitants of Ireland as necromancers and magicians, it is probable these opinions arose from the great knowledge of the Danans in arts and sciences, and hence they are considered to have been far more civilised than the other colonies which had settled in Ireland. Nuadh reigned over the Danans for thirty years, and fell in the battle of North Moy Turey. Lugh-aith Lamlfada, or Lughaidh the Long-handed, another of their kings, reigned forty years, and he instituted the great assemblies at Tailtean in Meath, of which an account has been given at p. 298, in a note on Bregia; he ordained these assemblies in honour of Tailte, daughter of a king of Iberia or Spain, and wife of Eochy, the last Firbolg king. Daghdha, surnamed More, or the Great, ruled over the Danans seventy years, and was one of the most celebrated of their kings. From Eire, Fodhla, and Banba, three of the Danan queens, Ireland got the names of Eire, Fodhla and Banba, by which it was designated for many centuries by the old bards and historians; and from the Danans Ireland also got the name Inis-Fail, signifying the Island of Destiny, from the circumstance of their having brought with them a remarkable stone called Lia-Fail, or the Stone of Destiny, on which the ancient kings of Ireland were for many centuries inaugurated at Tara, and of which a full account has been given at p. 297, in the note on Bregia. The Danans had celebrated bards, and Brighid or Bride, daughter of king Daghdha, was their chief poetess, and honoured amongst them as the goddess of poetry, and Morigu or Morigan, one of their queens, was also deified and worshipped as the goddess of war, like Pallas, Minerva, and Bellona, amongst the Greeks and Romans. The religious rites of the Danans were a form of Druidism, and they worshipped idols; three of their kings were named from their chief objects of worship, one called Mac Coill, or the Son of the Wood, from having worshipped the woods; another Mac Ceacht, or the Son of the Plough, his god being that chief instrument of husbandry; and the third Mac Greine, from Grian or the Sun being the great object of his adoration. Midhir, son of Daghdha, was much celebrated in the works of the Irish bards, and his spirit considered to remain in a state of enchantment many centuries after his death. The Danan kings, queens, and chiefs were buried in the great cemeteries of Cruachan in Connaught, and of Tailtean and Brugh of the Boyne in Meath, of which accounts have been given in these notes on South Connaught and Bregia. The Danans were represented as great architects, and said to have built many fortresses in Ireland, amongst others Cathair Crofin, or the stone fortress of Crofin, situated at Tara, and so called from Crofin, one of their queens; Aileach, near Lough Swilly in Donegal, a Cyclopean fortress, of which an account has been given in the note on Tirconnell, was first erected by Neid, one of the Danan chiefs, and hence called Aileach Neid. The Milesian colony from Spain, having invaded Ireland about a thousand years before the Christian era, conquered the Danans in two great battles, one fought at Slieve Mis mountain in Kerry, and the other at Tailtean in Meath, and the Milesians then became masters of Ireland.

The origin of the Danans is involved in much obscurity, and has puzzled various antiquarians. Our Irish annalists make them a branch of the Nemedians, who were a colony of Scythians, from the country near the Euxine sea or Thrace, and afterwards settled in Greece as before stated; others consider they were some of the Pelasgi, a people of Thrace and Macedon, who were the earliest inhabitants of Greece, and Danaus, one of their kings at Argos, is mentioned about fifteen centuries before the Christian era, and from him the Greeks were called Danai, a name resembling the Danan of the Irish writers; others consider the Danans, probably from the similarity of the name, as a tribe of the Dodonai or Dodoneans, who were also Pelasgi, and the founders of the famous oracle and temple of Jupiter at Dodonea in Greece, and also of the oracle and temple of Apollo at Delphi. The learned Villanueva in his Ibernia Phenicea, supposes the Danans might be Phenicians and have gotten the name Danani from the city of Dan in Palestine; others consider, from the similarity of the names, that the Danans were Danes, and our annalists also state that the Danans were some time in Scandinavia, but the name Danes was not used for many centuries after the period assigned for the arrival of the Danans, though it may be observed that the Danes and other

(Gleninn, in Donegal), and from Lough Swilly onward, and took hostages from O'Dogherty.

Kinel Feradaidh, in Tyrone, was completely plundered by Manus O'Donnell.

Scandinnavins were originally Scythians or Goths, from the countries between the Euxine and Caspian seas in Asia, and came to Scandinavia many centuries before the Christian era. Many modern geographers are of opinion that the Danans were either some of the Dannii of North Britain, who are placed by Ptolemy, Camden, Cellarius, and others, in the southern parts of Caledonia or Scotland, and in the northern parts of England bordering on Scotland, or some of the Damnonii, the ancient people of Cornwall, in the south of England, some of whom, it is said, came to Ireland about the first century. But whether the Irish Danans were some of the Dannians of North Britain, or of the Damnonians of South Britain, is doubtful, though, as the Phenicians in early ages traded to the mines of Cornwall, some of the Damnonians, who were of the Celtic race, might have come from Cornubia or Cornwall, and settled in Ireland in very remote ages, together with some of the Phenicians, which might account for the eastern origin attributed to the Danans by the Irish writers. It may be here observed, that the Firbolg tribes of Connaught, called Firdomnians and Damnonians, are by some considered to have been colonies either of the Dannians or Damnonians of Britain; but, according to the old Irish writers, great numbers of the Danan and Firbolg tribes were expelled from Ireland to Britain in very remote times by the Milesians, and from them the Dannians and Damnonians of Britain were descended; and they also state, that the Clanna Breogain, a colony that came from Spain along with their relatives the Milesians, were afterwards in great numbers expelled into Britain; and from these Clanna Breogain, a name which has been latinised Brigantes, were descended the Brigantes of Britain. O'Brien, in his book on the Round Towers, maintains that the Danans were a colony of Iranians or Persians, who came from Iran, which was the ancient name of Persia, and on this he founds his theory, that the Round Towers of Ireland were erected by the Danans for purposes connected with the ancient religious worship of India, denominated Buddhism, and also for astronomical observations. It may be observed that Bodh Dearg, or Bodh Red, was the name of one of the Danan chieftains, and son of Daghda, one of the Danan kings; and from him it is said the lake called Lough Bodh Dearg, now Lough Boderig, an expansion of the Shannon between Roscommon and Leitrim, derived its name, near to which lay the plain called Magh Luirg of Daghda, now the barony of Boyle, in the county of Roscommon; and there is a hill near Rath Cruachan, in Roscommon, called the Hill of Budh. In the third century, at A. D. 226, in the Four Masters, it is mentioned that in the battle of Crionna, in Meath, Fergus Bot, i. e. tinidh, who ruled over Bregia, was slain; this name signifies Fergus of the Fire, or of Bot, as the word Bot or Bod, according to Cormac's Glossary and O'Reilly's Dictionary, signifies fire; and according to O'Reilly, the word Budh, means, life, wisdom, or the world; and the word Bot or Bod is also often written Bud, hence both the words appear to have a similar signification; and it appears probable that Fergus of the Fire or of Bot, was so called from being a fire worshipper; hence Bot, Bod, Bud, or Budh, seems to have been one of the Pagan deities of the Irish; and Vallancey considers that the worship of Budh prevailed in Ireland, being introduced by the Danans, who were Dedanites from Chaldaea. Amongst the traditions of the people, the Danans are said to have been converted into fairies, and to live still in the raths or earthen ramparts called forts, in a state of enchantment; and the Danans are often mentioned as fairies by many of the bards. Also in the traditions of the people is mentioned a fairy king called Bud-an-Bhothair, or Budh of the Roads, who, travelling rapidly along the roads, raises clouds of dust in a whirlwind. The Danans were represented as highly skilled in the arts, and after they had been conquered by the Milesians, they became the chief artificers and mechanics of the country, as architects, workers in metals,

O'Neill, i. e. Art, the son of Hugh, having collected his forces, marched into Tirconnell after O'Donnell had gone to Rome; Manus O'Donnell, with the three Mac Sweeneys, and the principal

&c., and even in the traditions of the people to the present day, they are considered to have been great builders; and to Goban Saor (a name signifying Goban the builder), a man of the Danan race, and a famous architect, is attributed the erection of the Round Towers and many other great buildings in Ireland in the early ages, but others consider that this Goban Saor lived in the times of Christianity, and represent him as a builder of churches; and some are of opinion that he was the same as Gobhan, a saint of the seventh century. A full history of the Danans is given in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote, and also in the Book of Invasions by the O'Clerys.

The Milesians.—An account of this ancient colony has been partly given at p. 123, in the note on South Connaught, and in various other annotations in the course of these Annals, in which it has been shewn from ancient authorities, that the Milesians are represented as a colony originally from Scythia, near the Euxine sea, on the borders of Europe and Asia, in the country now called the Crimea. Their great ancestor was Peniusa Farsa, king of Scythia, and his son Niull having gone to Egypt, and attained great rank there, married the princess Scota, daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, who was drowned in the Red sea. This Niull had a son named Gaodhal, and his descendants were called Clanna Gaodhal, and from Gaodhal came the name Gael, which is the pronunciation of the word, hence, the Irish have been called Gaels and Gadelians. The Gadelians having been expelled from Egypt, sailed back to Scythia under the conduct of their chief, Eiber Seuit, or Eiber the Scythian, and from him they were called Cineadh Seuit, signifying the race of the Scyths or Scythians, and the name Seuit was latinised Scoti, and anglicised Scots, and from the Scoti Ireland, in ancient times, got the name Scotia, which was afterwards applied to that part of North Britain called by the Irish Albain, now Scotland, from a colony of Milesians or Irish Scots who settled there in the third century under a chief from Ireland named Cairbre Riada, but it is to be observed, that the name Scotia was exclusively confined to Ireland till the eleventh century, when it was first applied to modern Scotland. The Gadelians or Scythians again emigrated from Scythia, and having sailed through the Euxine, now called the Black sea, and onward through the Bosphorus, the Hellespont, the Egean or Archipelago, and the sea afterwards called the Mediterranean, they made some settlements in Getulia, on the coast of northern Africa, in the country where Carthage was afterwards founded. From Getulia the Gadelians came to Iberia or Spain, and conquered part of that country from the Iberians or race of Tubal, the ancient possessors, in the territory afterwards called Celtiberia by the Romans, and situated in the northern parts of Spain. The Gadelians were possessed of the territory now forming the province of Gallicia in the north of Spain, and, commanded by one of their celebrated chiefs named Breogain, gained many great battles over the Iberians, and the posterity of this Breogain were named Clanna Breogain, who are called by Latin writers Brigantes. A grandson of Breogain, named Gollamh, became king of North Spain, and was a renowned warrior; he went to Scythia, the country of his ancestors, and became the chief military commander there under the king of Scythia; from thence he went to Egypt and was appointed commander of the Egyptians in their wars with the Ethiopians, and he obtained in marriage the daughter of one of the Pharaohs, king of Egypt, and after some time having returned to Spain, he ruled as one of the chief kings of that country. From his great valour Gollamh was named Mileadh Espaine, signifying the hero of Spain, as the word Mileadh means a soldier, warrior, or knight, like the Latin word Miles, and this name has been latinised Milesius; and his posterity were called Clanna Mileadh, a term which has been anglicised Milesians. After the death of Milesius in Spain his posterity and the Clanna Breogain sent a force to explore Eire or Ireland, under the command of Ith, who was son of Breogain, and chiefs of Tirconnell, defended and protected the country as well as they could; and O'Neill, with his forces, departed eastward from the mountain, and returned to his home without prey or battle.

uncle of Milesius, and a valiant warrior, but Ith and his forces having arrived in Ireland, were attacked by the Tuath De Danan, and Ith himself was mortally wounded, and most of his men slain. The sons of Milesius and the Clanna Breogain shortly after fitted out a fleet of thirty ships, and with a powerful force set sail from Tur Breogain or the Tower of Breogain, at the place called Brigantia, now Corunna in Spain, and arrived in Ireland. The Milesians were commanded by eight of the sons of Milesius, and many chiefs of the Clanna Breogain, but being overtaken by a great storm off the southern coast of Ireland, many ships were wrecked and several of their chiefs drowned, amongst whom were Colpa the swordsman, Ir, Donn, and some other sons of Milesius, but at last they effected a landing at a place called Invear Sceine, now the bay of Kenmare in Kerry, which got its name from Sceine, the wife of Amergin, who was drowned there. The Milesians were commanded by Heremon, Heber, and Amergin, sons of Milesius, together with many chiefs of the Clanna Breogain, and soon after their arrival fought a great battle with the Tuath De Danan, near Slieve Mish mountain in Kerry, where the Danans were defeated; but Scota, the relict of Milesius, daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, who accompanied her sons to Ireland and was present at the battle, was slain, and buried in a valley called after her Glen Scota, and situated near Tralee. The Milesians proceeded to Teamur or Tara, and Tailtean in Meath, where the Danan kings then resided, and in a great battle fought at Tailtean the Danan forces were totally vanquished, and their three kings, Mac Coill, Mac Ceacht, and Mac Greine, together with their three queens, Eire, Fodhla, and Banba, slain; and the Milesians then became masters of Ireland. The period of the arrival of the Milesians is placed by our old historians about a thousand years before the Christian era, their progenitor Milesius being made cotemporary with king Solomon over the Israelites.

The vast antiquity assigned by our old annalists for the various colonies that peopled Ireland in the early ages, has been doubted, disputed, and denied, by many modern writers; but the accounts of our ancient historians are not improbable or inconsistent with the cotemporary history of other nations of antiquity; and though the records of remote events in our history may be exaggerated, distorted, and mixed with fable, so are the early annals and traditions of all other nations partly fabulous, or a compound of facts and fable; and it may be observed that most of the modern writers who doubt or deny the truth of our annals, and represent them as fictions and legends, are mostly men who know little or nothing of the Irish language, annals, or antiquities, or of the cotemporary history of other ancient nations. With respect to the origin of the first colonies that came to Ireland, it will be necessary to give some account of the ancient inhabitants of the nations from which those colonies were derived.

The Shemites or Semitic race.—After the Deluge, Shem or Sem, one of the sons of Noah, and his posterity, according to Josephus, and other ancient historians, peopled the greater part of Asia, and of the Semitic race were the following nations: From Assur or Ashur, son of Shem, came the Assyrians, and Ninus, grandson of Ashur, founded the city of Nineveh, on the banks of the Tigris, and his descendants possessed Asia, from the Euphrates to the Indian ocean. From Arphaxad, son of Shem, came the Arphaxadites, called afterwards Chaldeans; and from Aram, son of Shem, descended the Aramites or Aramcans, afterwards called Syrians, and from the Syrians came the Phenicians; and from Elam, another son of Shem, came the Elamites, called the Iranians or Persians. From Heber, a descendant of Arphaxad, were descended the Hebrews, but Abraham, a descendant of Heber, is considered their chief ancestor, and they were called Israelites, from Jacob or Israel, the son of Abraham, and Jews, from Judah, one of the sons of Jacob. The Arabians or Arabs, called Ishmaelites, were descended from Ishmael, a son of

A. D. 1512.

Hugh O'Mulmocheirge (O'Mulmoghery, anglicised Early), abbot of Dromlane (in Cavan), was drowned.

Abraham, by the Egyptian bond-woman Hagar, of the race of Ham.

The Hamites.—The posterity of Ham or Cham, son of Noah, peopled the greater part of Africa and part of Asia; and Ham himself, as shewn by the learned bishop Cumberland, in his Origin of Ancient Nations, was after his death deified and worshipped as a god by the Egyptians, Ethiopians, and Lybians, under the name of Jupiter Hammon or Ammon, and the famous temple and oracle of Jupiter Hammon dedicated to him in Lybia. Mizraim, son of Ham, peopled Egypt, hence called by Moses, "the land of Mizraim;" and from the ancient inhabitants, called Copts or Gypts, came the name Egyptians. From Canaan, son of Ham, were descended the Canaanites of the land of Canaan in Palestine, and also the Philistines, the Anakim, the Amorites, and Amalekites, who are called in the Scriptures the giant race of Ham, being famous warriors, and men of great strength and stature. From Sidon, son of Canaan, came the Sidonians; and the Tyrians and Carthaginians were mixed colonies of the Phenicians and Sidonians. From Phut, another son of Ham, were descended the Phutites or Lybians; and from Sabas, another son, came the Sabeans. From Cush or Chus, son of Ham, came the Chusites or Ethiopians; and Nimrod, son of Cush, the Ethiopian, founded the city of Babylon, on the banks of the Euphrates, and was the first king of the Babylonians; he is called in the Scriptures a mighty hunter, and described by Josephus as a "bold man, and of great strength of hand." Nimrod became an idolater, and erected the famous temple of Belus, Bel, or Baal, dedicated to the sun at Babylon, and he and his people built the tower of Babel.

The Japhetians.—Japhet, one of the sons of Noah, and his posterity, peopled Europe and part of Asia; from Madai, son of Japhet, came the Madeans, whom the Greeks called Medes; and from Javan, son of Japhet, were descended the Greeks and Ionians; from Thiras, son of Japhet, came the Thracians; and from Thogarima, son of Gomer, son of Japhet, the Phrygians and Armenians; from Thubal, son of Japhet, and his son Iber, came the Iberes or Iberians, afterwards called Spaniards. The Italians were a mixture of Celts, Scythians, and Greeks; the two other chief people of the race of Japhet were the Celts and Scythians.

The Celts, according to Josephus and other ancient historians, were the descendants of Gomer, one of the sons of Japhet, and hence called Gomerites and Gomerians; they were the aborigines or first inhabitants of Europe after the deluge, and they were called by the Greeks Keltai, and by the Romans Celtæ. In the Celtic and Hiberno-Celtic or Irish language, the name was Cealtach, which O'Brien, in his Dictionary, at the words Cealtach and Geilt, considers to be derived from Coill or Caill, a wood, hence Coillteach or Cealtach may signify a Celt or an inhabitant of woods; and the term is supposed to have originated from the Celts in the early ages having chiefly inhabited the forests, or from their having always practised in woods and groves the religious rites of Druidism; or, according to others, the name was derived from Coill, a wood, and teach, a house—as their chief habitations were in the woods, or constructed of wood. The Celts, as the aborigines of Europe, first inhabited those parts on the borders of Europe and Asia, about the Euxine sea, and thence spread over Western Europe, and the countries afterwards called Germany, Gaul, Italy, Iberia or Spain, Britain and Ireland; the western part of the European continent, comprising parts of Gaul, Germany, Spain, and Italy, was denominated by ancient geographers Celtica, or the land of the Celts, a name afterwards applied to Gaul, as the chief country of the Celts.

The Gauls, or inhabitants of the countries now called France and Belgium, were the chief nation of the Celts, and possessed those territories two thousand years before the Christian era. They were called in the Gaulish and Irish languages, Gall and Caill, and Gaillteach, all apparently derived from the word Ceallteach or Geallteach, signifying Celts, and the term Gael, Pierce Mae Graidin, dean of Clan Hugh (in the county of Longford, and diocese of Ardagh), died.

Niall, the son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe, son of Bryan Ballach O'Neill, lord of Trian Congail applied to the Irish, and their descendants the Scots, appears to be derived from the same source. The name Gall amongst the Irish also signified a foreigner, and was applied by them to all foreign people, as Gauls, Danes, and English, while they called themselves Gael. The Gauls were called by the Greeks Galatai, and also Keltai, and their country Galatia and Celto-Galatia; and by the Romans Gaul was called Gallia, and the people Galli, anglicised Gauls. In very remote times, from twelve to fifteen centuries before the Christian era, the Gauls crossed the Pyrenees and planted a colony in Iberia or Spain, which, becoming mixed with the old inhabitants named Iberes, were called by the Romans Celto-Iberi, and their country, situated in the north of Spain, was named Celtiberia. The Gauls likewise, many centuries before the Christian era, crossed the Alps, and settled colonies in Northern Italy, in that part called by the Romans Gallia Cisalpina or Cisalpine Gaul, to distinguish it from Gallia Transalpina or Transalpine Gaul, in France. In those early times the Gauls also planted colonies called Boii or Boiarii and Pannonii, in ancient Bavaria, Bohemia, and Pannonia, in Germany. About four centuries before the Christian era, the Gauls, under Brenn or Brennus, marched into Italy, defeated the Roman forces, and took the city of Rome. The Gauls joined the Carthaginians against the Romans in the Punic wars, and forty thousand of them fought under Hannibal in Italy; and in the year 216 before the Christian era, Hannibal, with his Gaulish infantry and Numidian cavalry, gained the great battle of Cannæ, in which fifty thousand of the Romans were slain. A short time before the Christian era, the Roman armies under Cæsar invaded Gaul, and the various confederated nations of the Gauls, under the command of Vereingetorix, mustered about two hundred and fifty thousand men; they had great troops of cavalry and war chariots, and they fought with great bravery and impetuosity, commencing the battle with fierce shouts and war cries, and fought naked down to the middle, throwing off their short tunics called sagums, when determined to conquer or die; they used long brazen swords, spears, and shields, bows, arrows, and slings, and east innumerable darts and stones; the Gauls also had powerful fleets, and their ships, according to Cæsar, were chiefly constructed of oak, but though fighting with great valour, they were generally defeated by the superior discipline of the Roman legions; and in their wars with Cæsar, for a period of seven years, about one million of the Gauls were slain, and Gaul was reduced to a Roman province.

The Galatians.—About three centuries before the Christian era, the Gauls, under their generals Brenn and Bolgos, with prodigious forces, invaded Macedon and Greece, and passing on into Asia founded the kingdom of Galatia, or Gallo-Greece, in Asia Minor. The Galatians became a celebrated nation, and were famous warriors, and fought as mercenaries in vast numbers, under the kings of Syria and other countries of Asia; and their troops were the most valiant in the east. In the second Book of Maccabees they are mentioned to have advanced as far as Babylon, but were defeated by the Jews, and one hundred and twenty thousand of them slain. The Galatians make a remarkable figure in the wars of the Romans, in the east, with Antiochus, Ptolomey, and Attalus; and Deiotarus, the celebrated king of Galatia, assisted the Romans in their wars with Mithridates and the Parthians. Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, had a body-guard of Galatians, and Augustus Cæsar also presented a body-guard of Gauls to Herod, king of Judea.

The Gauls and Belgians also sent colonies in the early ages to Britain and Ireland, as hereafter explained. Amongst the Celts are to be mentioned the Umbrians, the Etrurians, or Etruscans, the Samnites, Sabines, and some others of the ancient inhabitants of Italy. The Thracians and Pelasgians, the most ancient inhabitants of Greece and the Phrygians, are also considered to have been Celts.

The Scythians.—According to Josephus, and other ancient writers, the Scythians were descended from Magog, one of the sons of Japhet, hence called Magogites. They were called by the Greeks

(parts of Down and Antrim), a man of general hospitality, a promoter of religious orders and churches, a provident and fortunate man, who paid neither rents nor tribute to the Clan Neill or

Skuthai, Skuthike, and Seythes, and by the Romans Scythæ, and Scythi, anglicised Seyths, and Scythians. O'Brien, and other etymologists, are of opinion that the name is derived from the Celtic or Celto-Scythian word, Sciot, which signifies a dart or arrow, and has also the same signification in the Irish language; and this derivation is considered probable, as the Scythian nations were all famous archers, particularly the Parthians; and O'Brien, in the learned preface to his Dictionary, is also of opinion that the Irish names Seuit, and Clanna Seuit, meaning Scythians, as applied to the Milesian Irish, had its origin from the same source, as they are stated to have been of Scythian or Celto-Scythian descent: the name Seuit has been latinised Seoti, and anglicised Scots. The Scythians make a conspicuous figure in the ancient history of Asia, as the Celts did in that of Europe; and Spenser, in his View of Ireland, says, "the Gauls and Scythians were two as mighty nations as ever the world brought forth." The Scythians were amongst the most warlike and valiant people of antiquity, and fought chiefly in war-chariots, and were famous archers; they led a pastoral life, their chief riches being their herds of cattle and horses, and they lived chiefly on milk, and the flesh and blood of their cattle; they worshipped the sun, moon, and winds, and their chief deity was their god of war, called Odin, or Woden, by their descendants, the Gotlis, Germans and Scandinavians; and they sacrificed to their god of war a vast number of horses and other animals. Abaris and Anacharsis, celebrated Scythian philosophers, who travelled in Greece, many centuries before the Christian era, are mentioned by various writers. Justin gives an account of the Scythians, and shews that they were one of the most ancient nations of the world. They were originally settled in Asia, beyond the Caspian sea, and more than two thousand years before the birth of Christ they extended their conquests over Iran or Persia, and as far as the river Indus; and hence they were called Indo-Scythæ. According to Pinkerton, they were expelled from Persia, by Ninus, king of Assyria, more than two thousand years before the Christian era; and he established the Assyrian empire on the ruins of the Scythian; and even earlier than that period, the Scythians are stated to have waged war with Vexor, one of the most ancient kings of Egypt. Great numbers of the Scythians, who were expelled from Asia, settled on the borders of Europe and Asia, about the Euxine and Caspian seas, at least fifteen centuries before the birth of Christ. The Scythians were divided into two great nations, namely, those of Europe and of Asia; and the Scythians of Europe, who settled about the Euxine sea, conquered the Celtic people of that country, and afterwards extended to Germany and other parts of Europe. The Amazons, a famous nation of female warriors, whose chief city was Themiscyra, on the banks of the river Thermodon, in Asia Minor, near the Euxine sea, were Scythians, and celebrated in ancient history. These heroines fought on horseback, armed with helmets, battle-axes, bows and arrows, and engaged in war with the most valiant men, and defeated many champions in single combat. Marpesia, Menalippe, Orythia, and Hippolyta, queens of the Amazons, invaded Greece, and were famous in their battles with Hercules and Theseus; Penthesilea, queen of the Amazons, fought in the Trojan war against the Greeks, but was slain in single combat by Achilles; and Thalestris, queen of the Amazons, is mentioned as having visited Alexander the Great, in Asia. In the seventh century, before the birth of Christ, the Scythians from the borders of the Euxine and Caspian seas, overran a great part of Asia, and conquered part of Judea, in the reign of Josias; made settlements in Palestine, and founded a city there, called by the Greeks Scythopolis, and by the Jews Bethsan. The remarkable prophecies of Ezekiel (chaps. xxxviii., xxxix.), concerning Gog, Magog, and the sons of Gomer, Tubal, and Thogarma, are considered to have reference to these invasions, as the descendants of Gog or Magog were the Scythians, and the descendants of Gomer, Tubal, and Thogarma, were the Celts, the Clan Daly (the O'Neills and O'Donnells), or to the king of England's viceroy, a man of long life and prosperity, a man skilled and learned in all the arts, in history, poetry and music, died on the eleventh of April.

Art, the son of Con, son of Niall Garv O'Don-

Iberians of Asia, and the Armenians; but, according to other interpretations, the prophecies of Ezekiel refer to the conquest of Egypt and Judea by Cambyses, king of Persia, in the sixth century before Christ, as Cambyses ruled over a great part of Scythia, and had Scythians in great numbers in his armies. In Ezekiel are mentioned mighty hosts of these invaders, together with Persians, Ethiopians, &c.; their horses and horsemen clothed in coats of mail, and armed with helmets, shields, swords, spears, bows and arrows; and so prodigious were the numbers of slain, that the materials of the various weapons, as handles of spears, bows and arrows, &c., served the Israelites to burn as fire-wood for seven years. In the year 529, before the birth of Christ, Cyrus the Great, king of Persia, made war on the nation of Scythians, called Massagetæ, who dwelt near the Caspian sea, and having crossed the river Araxes, with an immense army, gave the Scythians a defeat by stratagem; and slew Sargapises, son of Tomyris, their queen; but the heroic Tomyris, having collected her forces, gave the Persians a total overthrow in the passes of the mountains, in which two hundred thousand of them were slain, together with Cyrus himself, whose head she had cut off, and thrown into a vessel filled with human blood, saying, "Glut thyself with blood, for which thou hast always thirsted." In the year 513 before Christ, Darius Hystaspis, king of Persia, made war on the Scythians, and with an army of seven hundred thousand men crossed the Thracian Bosphorus, and marched to the banks of the Ister or Danube, which his forces crossed on a bridge of boats; and at the same time, his fleet, consisting of six hundred sail, entered the Euxine, but the Scythians, under their king Janeyrus, defeated Darius, and eighty thousand of the Persians were slain, and the remainder were forced to make a rapid retreat across the Danube. In the fourth century before the Christian era, Philip of Macedon made war on the Scythians dwelling near the Euxine sea and the Danube, in the country afterwards called the Crimea. Philip, with a powerful army, crossed the Danube, defeated the Scythians, under their king Atheas, with great slaughter, took vast spoils of arms, chariots, and cattle, with twenty thousand captives, and twenty thousand of the best mares in Scythia. Zopyrion, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, with an army of thirty thousand men, crossed the Danube to attack the Scythians, but was slain, with all his forces. It is stated by Plutarch, that Darius, king of Persia, had in his army a great body of Scythian cavalry, with their war chariots, at the battle of Arbela, where he was defeated by Alexander the Great. The Parthians and Bactrians, two powerful nations bordering on Persia, were Scythians; the Parthians were celebrated in their wars with the Romans, and particularly famous as archers; in the year 53, before the Christian era, the Roman legions, under Crassus, crossed the Euphrates, but were totally vanquished, and Crassus himself slain by the Parthians, commanded by Surena. In the century before the Christian era, the renowned Mithridates, king of Pontus, ruled over the Scythian nations about the Euxine sea; he was a man of great valour, and strength of body, very learned, and, according to Pliny, spoke twenty-two languages; for more than twenty years he waged continual war with the Romans, and was one of the most formidable enemies they ever encountered; and in one day he is said to have massacred one hundred and fifty thousand of the Romans in Asia Minor. In his battles with the celebrated Roman general Sylla, according to Plutarch, Mithridates covered the plains of Greece with hosts of Scythian cavalry, and their war-chariots, armed with scythes; their archers, slingers, casters of darts, spearmen and champions, armed with swords, bucklers, iron breast-plates, and brazen helmets. The Massagetæ, the Getæ, the Sacæ, ancestors of the Saxons; the Sarmatæ, progenitors of the Sarmatians; the Basternæ, the Goths, the Vandals, the Daci, or Dacians, the Scandinavians, the Germans, the Franks, who conquered France; the Suevi, Alans, Alemanni, the Longobards, who conquered northern Italy, and gave it the name of Lombardy, and many others, were all powerful people of Scythian origin, who first possessed various parts of western Asia, chiefly the countries about the Caspian sea, and onwards to Persia, but afterwards extended to the Euxine, and adjoining parts of Europe, and finally founded most of the modern European nations. The various people above mentioned were celebrated in their wars with the Romans for many centuries, particularly the Goths and Vandals, the Franks, and Longobards, who overthrew the Roman empire, and conquered the greater part of Germany, France, Spain, and Italy, from the third to the seventh century; and kings of those races, of the Goths, Germans, and Franks, rule over those countries to the present time. The Huns of Asia, who, under the warlike Attila, in the fifth century, overran the Roman empire, are stated by some writers to have been Scythians, but that opinion is erroneous, for the Huns were of the Mongol, or Tartar race, while the Scythians and Celts were of the great Caucasian race.

The Celto-Scythians.—The Romans designated those countries about the Euxine sea, including parts of Europe and Asia, as Celto-Scythia, those territories being inhabited by the Celto-Scythæ, that is, a mixture of Celts and Scythians, and they are mentioned by Plutarch in his life of Marius. The Thracians and the Pelasgians, a people of Thrace, who were the most ancient inhabitants of Greece, were Celto-Scythians; also the Iberians who dwelt in Iberia, between the Euxine and Caspian seas, were a mixture of Celts and Scythians, and from them were descended the Georgians and Circassians, and the Caucasian clans, who have been always famous for the valour of their men, and beauty of their women; and in modern times their bravery has been conspicuously displayed in their resistance to the Russians. The ancient inhabitants of Italy were, as already explained, chiefly Celts, or a mixture of Celts and Scythians. The Cimbrians and Belgians, ancient people of Germany and Gaul, who sent colonies to Britain in early ages, were likewise Celto-Scythians, and so were the Iberians, Celtiberians, and Cantabrians of Spain, and the Brigantes of Spain, Ireland, and Britain; and the Milesian Irish, the Britons, the Picts, and Caledonians, appear to have been all a mixture of Celts and Scythians.

The Celtiberians.—Spain was first peopled after the Deluge by the posterity of Iber, son of Tubal, son of Japhet; from Iber or Iberus, the people were called Iberes and Iberi, and the country Iberia, by the Greeks and Romans. The Iberians of Spain, according to Appian Varro, and Diodorus Siculus, came originally from Iberia in Asia, a country situated between the Euxine and Caspian seas, near the mountains of Caucasus, and in modern times forming parts of Georgia and Circassia. The Phenicians in early ages settled in Iberia, and gave it, according to the learned Villaneuva, the name Spania, from Span, which signified in their language, a rabbit, as the country abounded in rabbits; by the Romans it was called Hispania, and by the Spaniards Espana, anglicised Spain. About twelve centuries or more before the Christian era, a colony of the Gauls crossed the Pyrenees, and settled in the northern parts of Spain, and becoming intermixed with the Iberians, were called by Roman writers Celto-Iberi, as a mixture of Celts or Gauls and Iberians. The Celtiberians were the most valiant people of Spain, and for centuries maintained the independence of their country against the Carthaginians and Romans.

The Cantabrians.—The Scythians in very remote times, according to Strabo, and other ancient geographers, also sent colonies to Spain, and it appears that the Iberians or first inhabitants of Spain, above-mentioned, were Celto-Scythians. Silius Italicus, a Roman poet in the first century, states that the Massagetæ and Sarmatæ, who were Scythians, settled in Spain. The Cantabri, a people in the north of Spain, and some of its earliest inhabitants, were a colony of the Massagetæ, who were Scythians of Asia, near the Caspian sea; and these Cantabrians, in modern times called Biscayans, were a very warlike race, and long resisted the Roman arms; they are often mentioned in the Odes of Horace as "the nell, died in December, of a fit of sickness, in the house of the friars, at Donegal, and was honourably interred in the monastery.

warlike Cantabrian"—"untaught to bear the Roman yoke"—"and subdued after long contests"—"bellicosus Cantaber"—"Cantabrum indoctum juga ferre nostra" and "Cantaber sera domitus catena." The Bascones or Vascones of Roman writers, a people bordering on the Cantabrians, and now called Basques, were some of the Iberians or first inhabitants of Spain, and from them were descended the Vascons or Gascons of France. In the article Basque in the Penny Cyclopædia, it is stated, that according to the Basque historians, these Bascons or Biscayans sent colonies to Ireland in very remote ages, and it is considered by Dr. O'Connor and others, that the Clanna Baoisgne, or famous Fenian warriors commanded by the hero Fionn Mac Cumhaill, in the third century, and so much celebrated by the Irish bards, were some of the Bascons of Spain. The Conceni, a tribe of the Cantabrians of Spain, are considered by Dr. O'Connor, Camden, and others, to have sent a colony to Ireland, and to have been the people mentioned on Ptolemy's Map of Ireland as Conceni or Gangani, and placed in the territories now forming the counties of Clare and Galway. The Luceni are also mentioned on Ptolemy's Map as inhabiting the territories which now form those parts of Kerry and Limerick bordering on the Shannon, and are considered by various geographers to have been a colony of the Luceni, an ancient people of northern Spain, bordering on the Cantabrians. Besides the colonies of Basconians, Conceni, and Lucenians, who came to Ireland from Spain in remote times, it is considered that there were many other Spanish settlers in the south and west of Ireland, as the Spaniards traded extensively to Ireland, and the Irish to Spain in early times, and this mutual intercourse was more particularly carried on between the Spaniards and the people of Kerry, Limerick, Clare, and Galway; hence there is a great mixture of the Spanish race in the inhabitants of west Munster and south Connaught.

The Brigantes.—The learned Baxter, in his Glossary of British Antiquities, and many others, are of opinion, that the Brigantes were the same as the Briges or Phryges of Strabo, and other ancient geographers, and originally possessed the country called Phrygia in Asia Minor, near the Euxine sea. These Phrygians, more than a thousand years before the Christian era, like the Iberians of Asia, a neighbouring nation, sent a colony through Thrace to Spain, which settled near the Celtiberians, and their chief city was called by Ptolemy, and other Greek geographers, Brigantia and Phlaouin Brigantion, and by the Romans Flavia Brigantium, and by Orosius and Ortelius, Brigantia and Brigantium, which is now the city of Corunna in Galicia, in the north of Spain. The Brigantes of Spain are supposed by others to have been Phenicians, but they might have become mixed with the Phenicians, and there was a celebrated Pharos or Watch-tower built, it is said, by the Phenicians at Brigantia, or according to Orosius, this tower was erected by the Tyrian Hercules; it was called by the Irish writers Tur-Breogain, or the Tower of Breogain, and said to have been built by the famous warrior named Breogain, who was king of north Spain, one of the ancestors of the Milesians; and from this tower the Milesians set sail for Erin. The descendants of this Breogain were called by the Irish writers Clanna Breogain, a term latinised Brigantes, therefore there is a remarkable coincidence between the Irish writers and ancient geographers, as to the origin of the Brigantes, the Irish making them a colony from Scythia, near the Euxine sea, who settled in Spain in very remote times, and various geographers considering them to have been Phrygians, who were Celto-Scythians from Asia Minor, also near the Euxine sea. The Clanna Breogain came to Ireland with the Milesians, of whom they were a branch, and were powerful and numerous tribes; they make a remarkable figure in Irish history, and are often mentioned by various writers under the name of Ithians, as the posterity of Ith, son of Breogain, and Lugadians or descendants of Lughaidh, the son of Ith; they were chiefly located in Munster and Leinster, and accounts of them have been already given in the notes on Thomond, Desmond, and Leinster.

Tuathal O'Clery, i. e. the O'Clery, the son of Teige Cam, a man learned in history and poetry, and who kept a house of general hospitality for

On Ptolemy's Map of ancient Ireland in the second century, the Brigantes are placed on the territories in Leinster and Munster, which now form the counties of Kilkenny, Carlow, Wexford, Waterford, and Tipperary, and the city of Waterford was, it is said, in ancient times their capital, and called Brigantia. Camden and Richard of Cirencester consider the Irish Brigantes to have been some of the Brigantes of Britain who fled for refuge to Ireland in the first century, on the conquest of Britain by the Romans, but though some of the British Brigantes may have come to Ireland at that period, their arrival in Ireland was a thousand years before that time, according to our ancient annalists, who also state that the Brigantes of Britain were some of the Clanna Breogain who had been expelled from Ireland by the Milesians, many centuries before the Christian era. As to the origin of the Brigantes of Britain, they are considered by Dr. O'Connor, and by the learned Spaniard Florian del Campo, quoted in the Ogygia Vindicata, to have been originally some of the Brigantes of Spain, who first came to Ireland in very remote times, and some of whom emigrated from thence to Britain; and Dr. O'Connor (Rerum Hib. Scrip. V. I.), states that the Brigantes of Britain are mentioned by Seneca and other Roman writers, under the name of Scoto-Brigantes, as being considered of Scotie or Irish origin, and they were also designated by the epithet Ceruleos, from their bodies being painted of a blue colour. The Brigantes of Britain formed a powerful people in the northern parts of England, and possessed the territories now forming the counties of Lancaster, York, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham, and were celebrated for their valour and long resistance to the Roman legions. The Brigantes of Spain, Ireland, and Britain, were Celts or Celto-Scythians, and spoke a dialect of the Celtic language.

The Cimbrians and Britons.—The Cimmerii of the Roman writers, called by the Greeks Kimmeroi, were an ancient people who inhabited the territories near the Euxine sea, on the borders of Europe and Asia, about the Cimmerian Bosphorus, called the Palus Meotis, now the sea of Asof. These Cimmerians, according to Pinkerton, Michelet and others, were Celts, and having been expelled from their country by the Scythians of Asia, more than a thousand years before the Christian era, settled in northern Germany, and the country called the Chersonesus Cimbrica, now Jutland in Denmark. The term Cimbri, according to Plutarch, signified robbers, or, according to Mallett, the word Cimbri means warriors or giants, and Cimbri in the Gothic and German language signified a robber. According to some writers, the Cimbri were a Gothic or Teutonic race, but Pinkerton and others consider they were originally Celts, and descended from the Cimmerians above-mentioned, but becoming mixed with the Teutonic tribes of Germany, were afterwards a mixed race of Celts and Germans, or Celto-Scythians, and their language was a compound of the Celtic and Teutonic. The Cimbri or Cynri, are mentioned by Tacitus, and other Roman writers, as a very valiant people, of great strength and stature, and were celebrated in their wars with the Romans. About a century before the Christian era, the Cimbri, in conjunction with the Teutones of northern Germany, and the Ambrones of Gaul, who were all very warlike nations, invaded the Roman provinces in Gaul and Italy with immense forces, and defeated the Romans in some great battles, but were at length vanquished by the Roman legions under Marius, with such prodigious slaughter, that the country about Aix in Provence, was fattened with their blood, and the inhabitants, according to Michelet, used for many years no fences or props for their vines, but those made of the bones of the slain. In very remote ages, probably more than a thousand years before the Christian era, according to the Welsh Triads, in the Celtic Researches of Davies, and other ancient records, the Cymry, who were said to have been the first inhabitants of Britain, are stated to have come from the east, near Defrobani, now Constantinople, under a chief called Hu Gadaran, and other colonies of the Cymry are stated to have come from Gaul under a chief named Prydain, who was the son of Aed rich and poor, died after extreme unction and repentance, on the twelfth of November.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Hugh Roe,

Maor, or Hugh the Great, which is the same as the Irish Aedh Mor, or Hugh the Great, and from this Prydain, the country was called Inish Prydain, or the Island of Prydain, from which came the name of Britain, but, according to Camden, the name was derived from Brit, which in the Celtic, and Hiberno-Celtic or Irish, signifies painted or variegated, as the ancient Britons painted their bodies, or, according to O'Brien, the name was derived from Brit, painted, and tan, a territory, hence Britain signified the country of the painted people. The ancient Britons and Welsh are therefore considered to have been descended from the Cimbri of Gaul and Germany, and the Welsh in their own language are called Cymry; and from the same source Wales has been called Cambria, and the people Cambrians. The Cymri or ancient Britons, who were settled in the north of England, were called Cumbri, and gave its name to Cumbria or Cumberland; according to other accounts, the Welsh were descended from the Picts of north Britain, but the Picts themselves, it is probable, were originally some of the Cimbrian race. From these accounts it therefore appears, that the Britons, or first inhabitants of Britain, were descended from the Cimbri of Germany and Gaul, and were, as above stated, chiefly of the Celtic race, but mixed with the Germans or Teutonic race, and spoke some mixed dialects of the Celtic and Teutonic languages.

The Picts and Caledonians.—The Picts were called by the Irish writers Cruithnith, which O'Brien considers to be the same as Britneigh, or Britons; but according to others the name was derived from Cruthen, who founded the kingdom of the Picts in North Britain, in the first century; others derive the name from Cruit, a harp, hence Cruiteach, the Irish for Pict, also signifies a barber, as they are said to have been celebrated harpers. The ancient Britons are mentioned by Cæsar, and other Roman writers, to have painted their bodies of a blue colour, with the juice of a plant called woad, hence the painted Britons were called by the Romans Picti. The Picts or Cruthneans, according to the Psalter of Cashel, and other ancient annals, came from Thrace, in the reign of the Milesian monarch Heremon, nearly a thousand years before the Christian era, and landed at Inver Slainge, now the Bay of Wexford, under two chief commanders named Gud and Cathluan, but not being permitted to settle in Ireland, they sailed to Albain, or that part of North Britain, now Scotland, their chiefs having been kindly supplied with wives of Irish birth. The Cruthneans became possessed of North Britain, and founded there the kingdom of the Picts, which continued there for many centuries, until they were conquered, in the ninth century, by Kenneth Mac Alpin, king of the Dalriadic Scots, or Irish colony in North Britain, and from that time the Scottish kings, of Milesian race, ruled over Scotland, and from them were descended the sovereigns of the House of Stuart. A colony of the Cruthneans, or Picts, from North Britain, settled in Ulster in early times, and are often mentioned from the first to the ninth century; they resided chiefly in Dalraddia and Tir Eogain, or parts of Down, Antrim, and Derry, and became mixed by intermarriages with the old Irish of the Irian race, and were ruled over by their own princes and chiefs; and some of those Picts also settled in Connaught, in the county of Roscommon. According to the Irish writers the Picts, in their first progress to Ireland from Thrace, settled a colony in Gaul, and the tribes called Pictones and Pictavi, in that country, were descended from them, and they gave name to Pictavia, or the city of Poitiers, and the province of Poitou; and from these Picts were descended the Vendéans of France. The venerable Bede states that the Picts came to Ireland from Scythia, or borders of Europe and Asia, and afterwards passed into North Britain. Pinkerton considers that the Picts were Germans or Scandinavians, of Gothic or Scythian origin, but it appears the Picts were chiefly Celts, or a mixture of Celts and Scythians, and spoke a dialect of the Celtic language. The Caledonians, or first inhabitants of Scotland, are considered to have been the same as the Picts, and mixed with Cimbrians or Britons, and some of the Milesian Scots from Ireland. The country returned from Rome, after having performed his pilgrimage. He remained sixteen weeks in London, on his way (to Rome), and sixteen more on was called by the Irish Alba, or Albain, and by the Romans Caledonia. There are various opinions as to the origin of the name Caledonia; some say it was derived from Catluan, the first commander of the Picts, others consider that the inhabitants were called Coill-daoine from Coill, a wood, and daoine, people, as they lived chiefly in the woods, most of the country being covered, in those early ages, with the great Caledonian forest, and from Coill-daoine the Romans made the Latin name Caledonia; others suppose Caledonia to be derived from Coill, a wood, and duna, fortresses, as the chief habitations and strongholds of the people were in the forests.

The Belgians were called, in the Gaulish or Celtic language, Bolg, and Bolgach, and by the Roman writers Bolgæ, Belgæ, and Belgii. O'Brien, in his Dictionary, considers the name to be derived from the Celtic Bolg, a quiver for arrows, as they were great archers; the word Bolgach also signifies corpulent; hence others are of opinion that they might have derived their designation from being stout men of large size; they were celebrated for their bravery, fought with great valour against the Romans, and were called by Cæsar fortissimi Gallorum, or the most valiant of the Gauls. The Belgians possessed an extensive territory, called by the Romans Gallia Belgica, which comprised the northern parts of Gaul or France, and the country now called Belgium; they were divided into many nations or tribes, as the Parisii, Rbemi, Bellovaci, Atrebatæ, Nervii, Morini, Menapii, &c. The Belgians, according to Appian, were a mixed race of Cimmerians and Germans; and others consider they were a mixture of Gauls and Germans, and partly of the same origin as the Cimbrians, of whom an account has been already given. The Belgians of Gaul, being intermixed with the adjoining Germans, partly adopted their language, and hence some have considered they were a Gothic or Teutonic race, but they were chiefly Celts, and spoke a dialect of the Celtic language, but mixed with the German or Teutonic tongue. The Belgians of Gaul, many centuries before the Christian era, sent colonies to Britain, and when Cæsar invaded Britain they were a powerful people, and possessed the southern parts of England, from Suffolk to Devonshire; the following were the chief Belgic tribes: the Cantii, in Kent; the Trinobantes, in Essex and Middlesex; the Regini, and Atrebatæ, in Surrey, Sussex, Hampshire, Berkshire, Wiltshire and Somerset; the Durotriges, in Dorsetshire, and the Damnonii in Devonshire and Cornwall; the capital city of the British Belgians was Venta Belgarum, now Winchester. Colonies of Belgians from Gaul also came to Ireland in the early ages, and under the head Fir-Bolg, an account of them has been given in the preceding part of these articles.

Origin of the Milesians.—The Milesians are represented by our old historians to have been originally a colony of Scythians who settled in Spain, and this statement coincides with the ancient history of Spain, as it has been shewn in the preceding part of this article, on the Cantabrians, that Scythian colonies, and Iberians from Asia, settled in Spain in very remote ages; therefore, it appears probable that the Milesians were a mixed colony of the Celtiberians, Cantabrians, Brigantes, and Phenicians of Spain. The territory said to have been possessed by the Milesians in Spain lay in the north-west of that country, bordering on Celtiberia, and in modern times forms the province of Galicia; and Brigantia, now Corunna, is said to have been the place from whence the Milesians set sail for Ireland, as before explained in the account of the Brigantes. As to the remote period assigned for the arrival of the Milesians in Ireland, there is nothing improbable in the account, when compared with the cotemporary ancient history of other nations; and it may be added, that in sir Isaac Newton's Chronology it is stated, that a colony of Spaniards, by the name of Scots or Scythians, settled in Ireland in the fourth age of the world, or about a thousand years before the Christian era. In Rees' Cyclopædia, in the article on Ireland, it is said, "It does not appear improbable, much less absurd, to suppose that the Phenicians might have colonized Ireland at an early period, and introduced their laws, customs, and knowledge, with a com-his return, and he received great honour and respect from the king of England, namely, king Henry; he arrived safe in Ireland, but was taken ill of a fever for some time in Meath, and on recovering his health he returned to his home, and both laity and clergy were glad and rejoiced at his return.

A great contention arose between O'Donnell paratively high state of civilization; and that these might have been gradually lost amidst the disturbances of the country, and at last completely destroyed by the irruptions of the Ostmen. The various colonies that peopled Ireland in the early ages, as the Partholans, Nemedians, Firbolg, Danans, and Milesians, are all represented by our old historians as having spoken the same language, or different dialects of the Celtic, all these colonies being Celts, or Celto-Scythians, as already explained; hence their language consisted of cognate dialects, of a Celtic or Celto-Scythic language, from which was formed the Hiberno-Celtic, or Irish language of after times. The colony of Fomorians, who were of Phenician origin, must have spoken a dialect of the Phenician language. The religion of all those ancient inhabitants of Ireland was also the same, namely, Druidism, which was the religious system of the Gauls, Britons, and other Celtic nations.

The Gaulish language and manners.—A remarkable similarity has been pointed out in language and manners between the Gauls and the ancient Irish. The similarity between the Celtic language of ancient Gaul, and the Hiberno-Celtic or Irish, has been shewn by O'Brien, in the preface to his Irish Dictionary; and by sir William Betham, in his learned work on the Gael and Cymbri. A few specimens may be given of Gaulish words, latinised by Cæsar and other Roman writers.—Ailp in the Celtic, according to O'Brien, signifies a huge heap of earth, hence came the name of the Alps; the Allobroges, a nation of Gaul, took their designation from Aill, which in the Gallic, as well as in the Irish language, signified a rock, and Brog a habitation, as they inhabited the rocky country near the Alps, hence their name in the Celtic, Aillbrogagh; Armorica, a province of ancient Gaul along the sea, took its name from Air, on, and mur or muir the sea, making the word Airmuirach; Aquitain, another province of Gaul, in the Celtic Agachtain, from Agach, valiant, and tan, a territory, or from Oiche, water, and tan, as they lived along the sea coast; the Auleri, a people of Gaul, took their name from All, great, and learg, a plain, as they inhabited the level country about Chartres; the Carnutes, a people of Gaul, whose capital was Chartres, were celebrated as having the chief seats of Druidism in their country, and derived their name from Carnach, which signified a Druidical priest in the Gaulish and Irish languages. The chief magistrate or judge of the Edui in Gaul, was called by Cæsar, Vergobretus, in the Celtic, Fergobreith, derived from Fer, a man, go, of, and breith, judgments, as he was the chief Brehon or judge; and in the Irish, the word Breitheamh, signifies a Brehon or judge; Vergasillaunus is mentioned by Cæsar as the chief military officer of the Arverni in Gaul; and the name in the Celtic was Feargosaighin, pronounced Feargosailean, and derived both in the Gallic and Irish from Fear, a man, go, with, and Saiglean, a standard, hence signifying a standard bearer; Vercingetorix, the celebrated chief who was chosen generalissimo of the Gauls, was called in their language, Fearcingetoir, derived from Fear, a man, cinn, of the head, go, with, and toir, an expedition, hence signifying the head man of the expedition; Dumnorix, who was chief of the Edui in Gaul, probably derived his name from the Celtic Dunaigh, a host or army, and righ, a king or leader; Brenus or Brennus was a name borne by several kings and chiefs of the Gauls, and according to Thierry and others, signified a king or leader; and the name bears a great resemblance to the Irish word Brian, which signifies a valiant chief, derived from Bri, strength or valour, and an, very great. The Rhine, latinised Rheus and Rhenanus, derived its name from the Celtic Righ, a king or chief, and abhain, a river, pronounced Rce-ain, the king or chief of the rivers; the Rhone, in Latin Rhodanus, comes from the Celtic Roid, swift or rapid, and abhain, a river; the Garonne, a river in France, latinised Garunna, is derived from the Celtic Garbh, rough or rapid, and abhain, a river, pronounced Garv-ain. The Roman writers mention many places in Gaul, terminating in the word Dun, which they latinise Dunum, as Augustodunum, now Autun; Noviodunum, now Nevers; Lugdunum Celtarum, now Lyons; and Lugdunum Batavorum, now Leyden; all these places derived their names from Dun, which signified a fortress in the Gaulish and Irish languages. Numerous other names of places and people in Gaul, and various words could be quoted, shewing the great affinity, almost amounting to an identity, between the ancient Gaulish and Irish languages.

There was also a great similarity of manners and customs between the Gauls and Irish. The Gauls are represented by Cæsar and other Roman writers as a very valiant and warlike people, fiery, impetuous, impatient of control, restless, proud, prone to dissensions amongst themselves, fond of splendid dresses and decorations, wearing gold chains and various ornaments, great talkers and orators, extremely hospitable, social, and courteous to strangers. A remarkable instance of the extraordinary hospitality of the Galatians, a nation of the Gauls as before mentioned, who settled in Asia Minor, is given by Michelet, in his History of France, who relates that one of the Galatian tetrarchs issued a proclamation that for the space of a whole year he would keep open house for all comers, and not only did he entertain the crowds that came from neighbouring towns and districts, but he caused travellers to be seized and detained until they had been fed at his table. An exactly similar public invitation is recorded in the Annals of the Four Masters, at A. D. 1351, in which William O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, in Galway, and his son Malachy, gave a general and abundant entertainment during the Christmas holidays to all the learned of the colleges of Ireland, bards, brehons, harpers, &c., to all travellers, and to all classes both rich and poor, noble and ignoble; and numerous public entertainments of the same kind given by various Irish princes and chiefs are recorded in the course of these Annals.

The Celtic nations.—According to the foregoing accounts, it appears the following nations were Celts: the Gauls and Belgians of France, and the Gauls of Northern Italy; the Galatians or Gauls of Asia Minor; the Boii and Pamoniens of Germany, branches of the Gauls; the Celtiberians of Spain, a branch of the Gauls; the Cimmerians of Germany; the Umbrians; the Etruscans or Etruscans; the Samnites and Sabines of Italy; the Thracians and Pelasgians of Greece; the Britons, the Caledonians, and the Irish. All these nations were chiefly Celts, but some of them, as explained under the head of Celto-Scythians, were partly mixed with the Scythian race. In modern times, the Irish are the chief nation of the Celts, the only Celtic people who to any extent have preserved their ancient language, literature, manners, and customs. There are also some dialects of the Celtic language still spoken in some other parts of Europe, as the Erse, in the Highlands and Hebrides of Scotland; the Manks, in the Isle of Mann; the Welsh, in Wales; the Cornish, in Cornwall; and the Armoric, in Bretagne, in France. A great part of the population of France, Belgium, Germany, Spain, Italy, and Great Britain, is of the Celtic race, though the Celtic language, the magnificent mother tongue of the European nations, has become nearly extinct in all those countries, and the inhabitants being partly composed of the Scythian or Teutonic race, speak the Gothic or Teutonic, and various other tongues.

Celtic and Cyclopean Architecture, composed of huge stones without cement, and of rude massiveness, the oldest monuments in Europe, many of them erected more than three thousand years, still exist in various countries; the most remarkable of which, are the Cyclopean walls of Tiryns and Mycenæ, in Greece, considered to have been built by the Pelasgians, the first inhabitants of that country, hence called Pelasgic architecture; or, according to Clarke, in his travels, by the Celto-Titans, a gigantic race of men in Greece. The Cyclopean walls, and ruins of cities and sepulchres in Etruria or Tuscany, in Italy; the Nuraggi, or Cyclopean towers and O'Neill, i. e. Art, the son of Hugh; and another contest also arose between O'Donnell and Mac William Burke, i. e. Edmond, the son of Rickard. O'Donnell engaged fifteen hundred battle-axe men in Tirconnell, Fermanagh, and the province of Connaught, and gave them Bonaght (quarters or billeting), on those places; he and Manus then marched with their forces from Derry into North Connaught, from thence into Galenga (Gallen, in Mayo), and laid siege to the castle of Beol-an-Chlair, and the town was taken by him, in which he left his guards; they then returned back through Slieve Gamh (the Ox Mountain, in Sligo), into Tircragh, where they remained for some time. When Mac William Burke received intelligence of this, he marched with the whole of his forces to the castle of Beol-an-Chlair (probably Claremorris), wherein O'Donnell had left his guards. As soon as O'Donnell was informed that Mac William had laid siege to the town, he, with all possible haste and expedition, returned back through the Ox mountains again. Mac William, finding that O'Donnell was marching on him, fled from before the town, so that O'Donnell did of Sardinia; the remains of Druidical temples and Cromleacs at Carnac and Poitiers in France; the Druidical temple of Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain, and at Avebury, in Wiltshire, and other parts of England; and on the Island of Anglesea, in Wales; and remains of Druidical temples and Cromleacs in various parts of Scotland; and lastly in Ireland, numerous remains of Druidical temples and Cromleacs in almost every county; and remains of Cyclopean fortresses at Dun Aengus, on the Island of Aran, off the coast of Galway; at Aileach, near Lough Swilly in Donegal; and Staigue Fort, near the Bay of Kenmare, in Kerry; together with other Druidical and Cyclopean remains described in these Annals, in the notes on Tirconnell, South Connaught, Desmond, Moy Liffey, and Bregia.

The Teutonic race.—The Teutones, a people of Northern Germany, of Scythian or Gothic origin, came in the early ages from Asia, into the countries bordering on Persia and the Caspian sea. The name Teuton is derived from the Gothic Teut, which signifies a god; the Teutons were a very valiant and warlike race of men of gigantic stature, and, in conjunction with the Cimbric and Ambrones of Germany and Gaul, were celebrated in their invasion of the Roman empire, and fought many battles with the Roman legions. Teutobochus, king of the Teutons, was a renowned warrior, a man of gigantic stature and prodigious strength, and of such activity, that he could leap over six horses abreast; he is considered to have been ten or twelve feet in height, for when taken prisoner and carried to Rome to grace the triumph of his conqueror, Marius, according to the Roman historian Florus, while he walked beside the triumphal car of Marius, his head reached above the towering trophies, to the great amazement of the Romans. The term Teutons has been applied to various nations of Scythian origin speaking cognate dialects of one great language, the Gothic or Teutonic, which is said to resemble the Persian and Sanscrit. The nations of Teutonic origin were the Goths and Vandals, who overthrew the Roman empire, and conquered parts of France, Spain, Italy, and Africa; the Franks and Burgundians, who conquered France; the Longobards, who conquered Northern Italy or Lombardy; the Suevi, Alemanni, and other powerful nations of ancient Germany; the Saxons of Germany, and Anglo-Saxons, who conquered England; and the Scandinavians, or people of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. In modern times the Teutonic nations are the Germans, Danes, Swedes, Norwegians, Dutch, Swiss, English or British, the Anglo-Irish and Anglo-Americans; and it is estimated that at the present day there are nearly one hundred millions of people who speak the Teutonic tongues in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America.

The Slavonic race.—The Slavonians, sometimes called Sclavonians, were descended from the Slavi or Sclavi of the Roman writers, a Scythian race, who dwelt in Germany. The name is derived from the word Slava, which in the Slavonic tongue signifies glory. The Sarmatians, called by the Roman writers Sarmatæ and Sauromatæ, a race of Scythians from Asia, or, according to others, either Medes or Persians, came to Europe about a thousand years before the Christian era, and settled in the territory called from them Sarmatia by the Romans, which comprised the country now called Poland, and parts of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. These Sarmatians, of whom accounts are given by Tacitus and other Roman writers, were a very valiant people, and celebrated in their wars with the Romans; their chief descendants in modern times are the Poles, but the Slavonic race comprises many nations, all of whom speak dialects of one great language called the Slavonic, as the Poles, the Muscovites or Russians, most of the Prussians, the Lithuanians, the Bohemians, the Moravians, the Illyrians, the Transylvanians, Dalmatians, Bosnians, Bulgarians, Servians, many of the Hungarians and Austrians, the Croats, Carinthians, &c. The Slavonic language is quite different from the Celtic and Teutonic, and considered to be of Indian origin, derived from the Sanscrit, with a mixture of Greek, and it is spoken by about seventy millions of people in Europe and Asia, in the Russian, Prussian, Austrian, and Turkish empires. Thus the three great races of Europe are the Celts, Teutons, and Slavons, all very different in language, manners, and customs, and a remarkable contrast between the Celtic and Teutonic race has been pointed out by various writers.

The Teutonic race are characterized by various writers as cool, steady, slow, calculating, systematic, persevering, taciturn, great reasoners and matter-of-fact people, generally acting with union and concert, fond of wealth, great money-makers, eminent in arts, manufactures, mechanics, trade and commerce, proud, domineering, distant and rough in manners, not hospitable, selfish, and uncourteous to strangers, sturdy, firm, resolute, of cool and determined bravery, acting in concert and combination with great perseverance and energy, and accomplishing great conquests, forming monarchies and empires, and having hereditary rulers.

The Celtic race, as described by ancient and modern writers, are sanguine, quick of temper, fiery, passionate, changeable, fond of novelty, though closely adhering to old customs, careless of riches, unless suddenly acquired, improvident, extremely hospitable and courteous to strangers, polite, generous, friendly, very fond of news, great talkers, laughers, and orators, full of figurative language, wit and satire, very partial to poetry and music, fond of splendid dresses and ornaments, clamorous and boastful, vain, impatient of controul, factious, and prone to dissensions among themselves, greedy of glory, enthusiastic, acting from sudden impulse, fierce and impetuous in valour, and very prone to war, their chief modes of government by tribes, clans, and petty kings, and their rulers elective.

On the various nations and ancient people mentioned in this article, and the early colonies that peopled Ireland, the following works have been chiefly consulted, Josephus, Justin, Plutarch, Tacitus, Cæsar, Bochart, Rollin, Dupin's Historical Library, Thierry on the Gauls, Michelet's France, Bishop Cumberland on the Origin of Ancient Nations, Pinkerton on the Scythians, Newton's and Hales's Chronologies, the works of Camden, Ware, Usher, Keating, O'Flaherty, Dr. and Charles O'Connor, Vallancey's Collectanea, Sir William Betham's Etruria Celtica, and the Gael and Cymric, Villanueva's Ibernia Phenicea, and Chalmers's Caledonia. The ancient history of Ulster will be continued in the next number.

not overtake him. Mac William then marched into Tireragh, and he put guards and provisions into the castle of Eiscir Abhan (castle of Iniscrone, near the river Moy, in Sligo), having taken it from the hereditary owners of the town (the O'Dowds), to whom O'Donnell had given it before that time. When O'Donnell learned that it was into Tireragh Mac William had marched, he quickly and actively followed him back again across the Ox mountain; Mac William, having received intelligence of this, put his son and heir, Ulick, the son of Edmond, son of Riekard, and other guards along with him, into the castle of Iniscrone, and he himself, with all possible speed, proceeded to Ardnaree; a party of O'Donnell's horse having espied Mac William, they pursued him, and compelled his flying forces to swim across the Moy; the pursuers followed him over the Moy, and took many of his men and horses, and he himself escaped with difficulty. O'Donnell returned with his forces, and laid siege to the castle of Iniscrone, in which was the son of Mac William, and after four days' great exertion, they took the castle; he extended hospitality and protection to the guards, but retained Mac William's son a prisoner; he commanded the castle to be demolished, and it was rased to the ground, after which he returned home victoriously and triumphantly. After that Mac William followed O'Donnell to Donegal, and made him a full satisfaction, and O'Donnell permitted his son to go with him home.

O'Donnell, accompanied by the chiefs of North Connaught and of Fermanagh, and by many retained followers, marched into Tyrone, to the residence of O'Neill, i. e. Art, the son of Hugh. In the first place, they spoiled and burned Tyrone before them, as far as Dungannon; they were a week in the country spoiling it, until O'Neill made peace with them, and forgave O'Donnell all the disputes which existed between their ancestors, viz.: the rents of Kinel Moain, Inisowen, and the entire of Fermanagh; O'Donnell, after that, came to Omagh, and in the course of a week repaired the castle of that place, which had been on a former occasion demolished by the earl of Kildare, and O'Donnell left his own guards in it.

Gerald, earl of Kildare, lord justice of Ireland, marched with his forces through Athlone into Connaught; he plundered and burned Clan Conway, took Roscommon, which he garrisoned, after which he entered Moylurg (barony of Boyle), and took the castle of Bally-na-Huamha, after having destroyed a great portion of the country.

O'Donnell proceeded with a great force of foot to the Curlew mountains, to confer with and pay his respects to the earl; he returned the same night to his own camp at Brec Slieve (Brailieve mountain, on the borders of Sligo, Roscommon, and Leitrim), and a few of his men were slain on his return through the pass of Bealach Boy; after that, he laid siege to the castle of Sligo, and spoiled the entire of the territory of the tribe of Bryan Luighneach O'Connor; but he did not succeed in taking the castle on that occasion.

Gerald, earl of Kildare, lord justice of Ireland, marched with a force into Trian Congail (in Down and Antrim), took the castle of Belfast, demolished the castle of Mac Eoin (Mac John), of the Glinns (in Antrim), plundered the Glinns, and a great portion of the country, and carried with him, as prisoner, the son of Niall, son of Con (O'Neill).

Donal, the son of Bryan, son of Donal, son of Henry O'Neill, aided by the tribe of Flaherty Maguire, made an attack on Gillpatrick, the son of Philip, son of Torlogh Maguire; they proceeded to the town of Bunabhann, where they seized on some prey, but they were, however, defeated, and the booty taken from them; many of their people were slain and drowned, including the son of Manus, son of Bryan, son of Conor Oge Maguire, between the town of Bunowan and Inismore; Donal himself, the son of Bryan, was taken prisoner at Tamhnaidhan-Reata, in Fearan-na-Harda of Muintir Luimin, and nine of his people were drowned at the Carraidh (the weir) of Muintir Banan, on the same day.

Philip, the son of Torlogh Maguire, with his sons, and the sons of Thomas, the son of Manus Mac Gauran, made a hostile incursion into Tullaghaw; they plundered Torlogh, the son of Hugh Mac Gauran, tanist of the country, and slew himself while pursuing them to recover the prey. They proceeded from thence to the Cranoge of Mac Gauran, which they took, and also took Mac Gauran himself prisoner, although he was sick; but they afterwards left him behind, as they could not conveniently convey him with them. The son of O'Reilly, i. e. Edmond Roe, the son of Hugh, son of Cathal, soon after overtook those Fermanagh men, and the son of Manus defeated them, and slew Donogh, the son of Redmond, son of Philip Maguire; Philip, the son of Owen, son of Donal Ballach Maguire; Hugh, the son of Owen, son of Torlogh Maguire; Murrough Roe, the son of Murrough, and James, the son of Magrath Maguire, and many others; and he also took many horses from them on that day.

The son of Maguire, i. e. Bryan, the son of Edmond, son of Thomas, died.

Mac Gauran, i. e. Cathal, the son of Hugh, son of Owen, died, and Thomas, the son of Manus Mac Gauran, was nominated lord.

Mac Tiarnan, i. e. William of Tullaghonoho, died.

Failge, the son of Mulmora O'Reilly, was killed by the sons of John, son of Owen, son of Donal Baun, and by James, the son of Torlogh, son of Owen, at Dromlane.

Teige, the son of Donal O'Brien, died; and Bryan, the son of Donal, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, died about six weeks afterwards.

A. D. 1513.

Maurice O'Fihelly, archbishop of Tuam, a master of divinity, a man of the highest reputation for ecclesiastical knowledge in his own time, died, (see an account of him at p. 181, in these Annals).

The official Mac Congal died.

Rossa, the son of Manus Mac Mahon, lord of Oriel, and Teige, the son of Malachy O'Kelly, lord of Hy Maine, died.

O'Donnell encamped before Sligo from the festival of St. Bridget to Whitsuntide, but he did not succeed in taking the town during that period; a gentleman of O'Donnell's people was killed on that occasion, namely, Niall, the son of Heremon, of the Mac Sweeneys of Fanad.

Cathal Oge, the son of Donal, son of Owen O'Conor, the most distinguished lord's son for hospitality, feats of arms, wisdom, and prudence of any in North Connaught, was treacherously slain by his own brother Owen, the son of Donal, near the town of O'Gillgain; Owen, however, was overtaken by the just judgment of God, for he was hanged by O'Donnell in three days after that misdeed.

Owen O'Malley, with the crews of three ships, sailed into the harbour of Killibegs (in Donegal), by night, at which time the chiefs of that country were on an excursion with O'Donnell; they plundered and burned the town, and took many prisoners in it, but they were, however, overtaken by a storm, and being compelled to remain on the borders of the country, they lighted fires and torches convenient to their ships. An intrepid young man of the Mac Sweeneys, namely, Bryan, accompanied by the sons of Bryan Mac Anaspie O'Gallagher, with a number of farmers and peasants, overtook and courageously attacked them; they slew Owen O'Malley, together with five or six score (100 or 120) of his men, and took two of the ships from them, and the prisoners they had made, through the miracles of God, and St. Catherine, for having violated her town.

O'Donnell, at the invitation of the king of Scotland,¹ who sent him letters and messengers, sailed for Scotland with some attendants, and having arrived there, he received great honours and presents from the king; having remained there for three months with him, he advised the king not to come to Ireland as he intended, and O'Donnell returned home after having encountered great perils at sea.

Mac William Burke, i. e. Edmond, the son of Rickard, son of Edmond, son of Thomas, a man who patronised the religious orders and learned men, was treacherously killed by his brother's sons, namely, Theobald Riavach, and Edmond Ciochrach, the sons of Walter, son of Rickard.

O'Neill, i. e. Art, the son of Hugh, marched with a force into Trian Congaill, and burned Moylinny (in Antrim), and plundered the Glinns; the

A. D. 1513.

1. The King of Scotland at that time was James IV., and it would appear from the above passage that he had some thoughts of coming to Ireland, probably on an invasion like that of Edward Bruce in the year 1315, when invited by the Irish chiefs to become king of Ireland, of which an account has been given in these Annals, at the year 1318; and it would seem the more probable that James intended to invade Ireland, as he was then at war with king Henry VIII., and might be anxious to wrest Ireland from the English; but it appears he was dissuaded from coming to

Ireland by O'Donnell, who was then the most powerful of the Irish princes. King James was a very valiant prince, and was married to Margaret, sister of king Henry VIII., but having dissensions with king Henry, he leagued with Louis XII., king of France, against the English; and in 1513, the same year in which he was visited by O'Donnell, he invaded England with a powerful army, and on the ninth of September fought the fatal battle of Flodden Field, in Northumberland, in which the Scots were defeated, and king James himself, with a vast number of his nobility, and fifteen thousand of his men, were slain.

son of Niall, son of Con Mac Quillan, overtook a party of the forces, and slew Hugh, the son of O'Neill, on that occasion. On the following day the force and their pursuers met in an encounter, in which Mac Quillan, namely, Richard, the son of Roderick, with a number of the Albanians (Scots), were slain, after which O'Neill returned home.

The castle of Dunliss (Dunluce, in Antrim) was taken by O'Donnell from the sons of Gerald Mac Quillan, and was given to the sons of Walter Mac Quillan.

Art, the son of Art O'Neill, died on the 6th of August, and was interred at Donegal. Owen Roe Mac Sweeney was killed by his own brother's sons and by Donogh, the son of Torlogh O'Boyle.

Teige-na-Leamhna made a treacherous attack on Cormac Ladhrach, the son of Teige, son of Donal Oge, after each of them had been nominated the Mac Carthy, and the house was set on fire in which Cormac was, and he himself and his constable, having rushed out of the house, slew Teige's constable, and Cormac and his people happily and fortunately made their escape; Desmond was then divided into two parts between Cormac and Teige, until the death of Teige.

Mac Mahon (of Clare), i. e. Teige, the son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Donogh Naglaice, died.

O'Mahony (in the county of Cork), i. e. Conor Fionn, the son of Conor, son of Dermot O'Mahony, died, and that Conor was a man who excelled his ancestors in the government of his territory.

A. D. 1514.

Patrick O'Duibhleachain (O'Dullaghan), abbot of Kells, and Hugh, the son of Gillcreest O'Fay, vicar of Derrybrusk (in Fermanagh), died.

O'Neill, i. e. Art, the son of Hugh, son of Owen, son of Niall Oge, died, and there were very few tanists' or lords' sons of the Tyronians ever before his time so eminent for intelligence, power, wisdom, science, valour and government, as he was; Art, the son of Con, son of Henry, was appointed his successor.

Donogh, the son of Conor O'Brien, was maliciously and unkindredly killed by the sons of Torlogh, son of Murrough O'Brien, namely, Murrough and Donogh, and he was one of the most eminent of the men of Ireland for execution of hand, power and bravery.

Teige-na-Leamhna, the son of Donal, son of Teige Mac Carthy, died on his bed, which was not expected, for he was a man who destroyed most, and on whom most destruction was committed, of any of his race during the memory of man.

The earl of Kildare (Gerald Fitzgerald), gained great sway with his forces, for he overran the province of Ulster, as far as Carrickfergus, and Munster, as far as the palace of Mac Carthy; the same earl marched to Leim-ui-Bhanain (the castle of Lemanaghan in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county, which belonged to the O'Carrolls, see A. D. 1516), but did not succeed in either destroying or taking the castle, a circumstance which seldom occurred to him; he however returned home for the purpose of procuring a greater force and more ordnance, but it so happened that he was seized with sickness, of which he died; and Gerald the earl was a knight of renowned bravery, and princely in rule, words, and judgments.

The earl of Kildare, i. e. Gerald the younger, the son of Gerald, marched with a force into Brefney, where he committed great destruction, and slew O'Reilly, i. e. Hugh, the son of Cathal, Philip his brother, Philip's son, and Gerald, the son of Edmund, son of Thomas O'Reilly; but in short fourteen of the nobles and chiefs of the O'Reillys, besides a great number of their people, were slain, and Mac Cabe, i. e. Maine, the son of Mahon, was also taken prisoner there.

The castle of Colerain was taken and demolished by O'Donnell as an eraic (fine) on Donal O'Kane for having violated his compact.

O'Donnell committed great depredations in Gailenga (in Mayo), where he burned and plundered the country as far as Croaghan of Gallen, and slew O'Ruadhain and many others.

A contest arose between O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Hugh Roe, and O'Neill, i. e. Art, the son of Con, and both parties having engaged a great number of persons, they remained encamped for a long time opposed to each other; but it happened, however, through the grace of the Holy Spirit, and by the advice of their chiefs, that they concluded an amicable peace with each other, having met on the bridge of Ardstraw (in Tyrone), and became gossips to each other. New charts (or deeds), together with the ratification of the old charts, were given by O'Neill to O'Donnell, for Kinel Moain, Inisowen, and Fermanagh; and O'Donnell voluntarily delivered up his son to O'Neill, i. e. Niall Oge (commonly called Niall Conallach), who had been imprisoned with him for a considerable time, as a pledge of his loyalty.

O'Donnell sailed with a fleet of long ships and boats on Lough Erne to Enniskillen, where he took up his abode for a long time, and he preyed and burned the island of Cuil-na-noirer (an island on Lough Erne), and made peace with the people of Fermanagh, after having brought them under his authority.

The son of the great earl, namely, Henry, the son of Gerald, was taken prisoner by the young earl, viz., Gerald Oge.

Hugh, the son of Donal O'Neill, and Con, the son of Niall, made an attack on John, the son of Con, at Cluain Dabhail, burned the town of John, and sent the prey of the country before them. O'Neill and Mac Donnell, with a large force, overtook them, took the prey from them, and gave them a defeat, in which five of the tribe of Art O'Neill were slain, namely, Torlogh, the son of Niall, son of Art; Failge, the son of Niall; Roderick, the son of Hugh, son of Art; Donal Ballach, the son of Art of the Castle; and Hugh, the son of Edmond, son of Art O'Neill. Of the party of Hugh were slain the two sons of Mac Aghiorr, namely, Art Oge and Bryan; also Felim Oge O'Meallan and Con O'Conor, and thirty horses were taken from Con on that occasion.

Pierce Mac Anabbadh More Maguire, and Gillpatrick, the son of Felim Mac Manus, died.

O'Daly of Corcomroe (in Clare), i. e. Teige, the son of Donogh, son of Teige, son of Carroll, a professor of poetry, who kept a house of general hospitality, died in his own house at Finagh Beara (Finvarra, in Clare), and was buried in the monastery of Corcomroe.

A. D. 1515.

Menma (or Menelaus) Mac Cormac, bishop of Raphoe, died.

Owen (or Eugene), the son of Art, son of John, son of Art Mac Caghwel, bishop of Clogher, died.

Gillpatrick O'Hultachain (or O'Donlevy), parson of Aghavea (in Fermanagh), died.

James, the son of Thomas Roe Mac Anabbaidh Maguire, and the son of Redmond, son of the parson Maguire, were killed by the coarb Maguire, in the district of Cleenish.

Donal, the son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, was killed by Hugh Buighe O'Donnell, in Tuaith Bladhaigh, on the 25th of November.

Giolla Duv, the son of Torlogh Maguire, died.

Teige, the son of Torlogh Maguire, died from the effects of being maimed.

Teige O'Higgin and Walter Walsh, two priests, were drowned near Lisgoole.

Cathal, the son of Fergal, son of Donal Baun O'Reilly, died.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, sailed with a fleet of long ships on Lough Erne, and overran the lake as far as Port-na-Cruma, despite of the people of the country. Many slaughters and conflagrations were committed by his forces on the islands belonging to the sons of Edmond Maguire.

O'Neill, i. e. Art, marched with a force into Oriel, and part of his men having come into collision with the people of Mac Mahon, they slew Art Balbh, the son of Mac Mahon, a distinguished military leader, and also Edmond O'Connolly.

A. D. 1516.

William, the son of Donogh O'Ferrall, bishop of Annaly (Ardagh), died.

The erenach O'Muirgheasa, i. e. Niall, and O'Dogherty, i. e. Conor Carrach, died.

The son of Maguire, i. e. Bryan, the son of Conor, son of Thomas Oge, was killed by Bryan Oge Mac Mahon, aided by the sons of Donogh Maguire.

Mac Donnell of Clan Kelly, i. e. Colla, was slain.

A great contention arose between O'Donnell and O'Neill, and each lord engaged many persons. Manus O'Donnell committed great depredations on Henry Balbh O'Neill, and burned the greater portion of the country from the mountain inwards, and Bryan O'Neill committed other immense depredations in Kinel Moain. O'Donnell afterwards marched into Tyrone, and burned Kinel Feradh-aigh, and the entire country as far as the river called Una, and then returned home safe.

The eastle of Sligo was taken by O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, after it had been for a long time out of his possession, and the manner in which he took it was as follows:—A Freneh knight, who had come to perform a pilgrimage at St. Patriek's Purgatory, on Lough Derg, sojourned at the house of O'Donnell on his journey to and from that place, where he received much honour, respect, hospitality, and presents, during which time they formed bonds of friendship with each other. When the knight learned that the eastle of Sligo was defended against O'Donnell, he promised that he would send a ship with large guns; and the knight fulfilled that promise, and the ship arrived at the harbour of Killibegs (in the bay of Donegal), from which it directly sailed to Sligo, while O'Donnell with his forces marched by land, and both parties by land and sea arrived together at the town. The town was destroyed by them before they got possession of it (the eastle), and O'Donnell gave full pardon to the garrison. O'Donnell proceeded from thence into Tirerrill, where he took the eastle of Cul Maoile (Collooney), the eastle of Loeh Deargan (Castledargan), and Dun-na-Mona on the same day; and having garrisoned some of them, he took hostages and prisoners from the others. Mae Donogh of Ballymote, and the son of Mae Donogh, while coming to O'Donnell's forces, were slain by Donogh, son of Torlogh O'Boyle; and O'Donnell after that returned home safe with victory and triumph.

The eastle of Mae Sweeney of Fanat, i. e. Raith Maolain (Rathmullen), fell.

O'Donnell marched with his forces on two different occasions into Tyrone, without battle or opposition being offered him there, and without any deed of note being performed against him or by him, but having overrun and spoiled the greater portion of the country.

A war having arisen between the Geraldines, James Mae Maurice, heir to the earldom (of Desmond), laid siege to Lough Gair (Loughguir, in Limerick); the leaders of his forces were Mae Carthy of Carbery (in Cork), i. e. Donal, the son of Fingin; Cormae Oge, the son of Cormae, son of Teige; Cormae, the son of Donogh Oge Mae Carthy, lord of Alla (Duhallow, in Cork); the White Knight, the Knight of Glin (Fitzgerald, of Limerick), and the Knight of Kerry (Fitzgerald); Mae Maurice, and O'Conor (of Kerry), and the supporting tower of the forces, Mae Carthy More, i. e. Cormae Ladhraeh. John, the son of the earl, went to the Daleassians (O'Briens and other chiefs of Thomond), to complain of the difficulties in which he was placed, because a relationship and connection existed between them, for More, the daughter of Donogh, son of Bryan Duv (O'Brien), was John's wife. O'Brien promised him his friendship and support, and mustered the forces of Thomond, and was joined by Pierce, the son of James Butler, and others; and they then marched to meet the forces of the Geraldines. When the son of the earl beheld the chiefs of the great army of the O'Briens marching on him, the resolution he came to was not to encounter them, and they left the town without incurring any danger, and they separated after that manner.

Mae Carthy More, i. e. Cormae Ladhraeh, the son of Teige, lord of Desmond, a man who best acquired his lordship, and who encountered most opposition until he became undisputed lord, one who was most bountiful to strangers and the indigent, and who maintained the best laws and regulations of any of the lords of Leath Mogha (the southern half of Ireland), died.

The eastle of the town of O'Carroll, i. e. Leimui-Bhanain, (see A.D. 1514), was taken by the earl of Kildare, i. e. Gerald, the son of Gerald, after his father had failed in taking it; and it is doubtful if there was in that time a eastle better fortified and defended than that, until it was demolished on its guards.

Edmond, the son of Thomas Butler, gave Pierce Butler, and the son of Mae Pierce, a signal overthrow, and took from them a great many of their people and retained soldiers.

Mae Conmidhe, i. e. Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan Roe, died.

Torlogh, the son of Bryan Uaine O'Gallagher, the earl of Carriek, died.

The son of Bryan Caoeh, son of Teige, son of Owen O'Conor, was treacherously slain by the son of Teige of the Battle-axe, and by the tribe of the Cearrbhaeh.

A. D. 1517.

O'Conor Faily, i. e. Bryan, the son of Teige, son of the Calvach, died, and Calvach, the son of Teige, was appointed his successor.

Donogh, the son of Torlogh O'Boyle, the best gentleman of his means, who made the most warfare, and performed the most intrepid exploits of any of his own tribe, went with the crew of a boat to Toraigh (Tory Island, in Donegal), and a wind having driven them westward to sea, no tidings of them were ever after heard.

John, the son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill, the most affluent and wealthy lord's son of Ulster in his time, died.

Philip, the son of Torlogh Maguire, a distinguished military leader, died.

Philip, the son of John Buighe Mac Mahon, a man distinguished for his liberality and protection, died.

Art, the son of Hugh, son of Donal O'Neill, was killed by Niall, the son of Con, son of Art O'Neill.

O'Toole, i. e. Art (of Wicklow), was killed by his kinsmen.

The Giolla Duv, son of Donogh, son of Thomas Maguire, died.

Thomas, the son of Ulick, son of Ulick Burke, having carried off a prey from Ormond, was overtaken by a great force at Port Omna (Portumna, in Galway, near the Shannon); the cavalry and people of Thomas were driven from the prey by the pursuers, they captured the prey, and Thomas himself was slain; he was the most distinguished man of his age of the English of Ireland, in his time, for remarkable deeds, for by him many plains had been plundered and laid waste for a long period.

The castle of the lake was taken from the sons of Cormac Ladrach (Mac Carthy), and themselves expelled to Mac Maurice, and Mac Maurice committed great depredations, and he completely plundered Magh O'Guinchind (Magonihy, in Kerry), from the Hills eastward.

The lord justice marched with a force, at the instigation of the sons of the earl's daughter, into Tyrone, and demolished the castle of O'Neill, i. e. of Art, son of Con, namely, Dungannon, on that occasion.

O'Carroll, i. e. Maolroona, committed great depredations in Delvin (in the King's county), and he took and plundered the castle of Cinncoradh; in consequence of this act, a great commotion arose between O'Carroll and the Delvinians, and they and O'Melaghlin having invited the earl (of Kildare), to aid them, they destroyed the castle of Fothair of Delvin, namely, the wall of the castle.

A.D. 1518.

The monastery of the friars at Armagh was obtained for the friars de observantia (Franciscans).

Hugh, the son of Rossa, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, a canon of the chapter of Clogher, parson of Aghalurcher, and parson of Cleenish, on Lough Erne, a man distinguished for hospitality and good humour, and a learned ecclesiastic, died.

Mac Sweeney, of Fanad, i. e. Roderick, the son of Maolmuire, the supporting rock of every combat in the defence of his lordship and country, a man who bestowed precious gifts and property on every one whom he deemed deserving of them, died.

O'Hussey, i. e. Ciothruadh (of Fermanagh), the son of Aithirne, a truly learned poet, and a man who kept a house of general hospitality, died.

Felim, the son of Bryan, son of Conor Oge Maguire, died, after having returned from the city of St. James (of Compostella, in Spain), after his year's pilgrimage, in the year of grace, and was interred in the monastery of Monaghan.

Con and Hugh, the sons of O'Neill, i. e. Donal, the son of Henry, son of Owen, and the coarb Maguire, having gone to plunder Bryan, the son of Con, son of Henry, were overtaken at Domhnach-an-Eich (Donagheevey, in Tyrone), by Bryan, who defeated them; Hugh, the son of Donal, was taken prisoner, Mac Caghwell, i. e. Donogh, the son of Edmond, was wounded, and many of the Kinel Firedaigh were slain; Mac Caghwell afterwards died of his wounds.

Hugh Balbh, the son of Con, i. e. the O'Neill, was taken prisoner by Henry Balbh O'Neill, and he exacted fifteen horses for his ransom, for Philip, the son of Edmond Maguire, made an incursion into Tirkennedy (in Fermanagh), to attack Henry Balbh O'Neill, and took the island of Clapach (in Lough Erne), and carried away from Henry hostages, whom he had, namely, Hugh Balbh, the son of Con O'Neill, and the son of Hugh Mac Caffrey, whom he had (as a hostage) from Philip; Cathal, the son of Dun, son of Edmond Maguire, was slain on the side of Philip on that expedition.

The same Hugh Balbh, the son of Con, i. e.

O'Neill, whom we have mentioned, died in the latter end of harvest.

The son of Mac Manus, i. e. Redmond, the son of Cathal Oge Mac Manus, a charitable and humane man, died.

Mac Murrough, i. e. Art Buighe, (lord of Leinster), the son of Donal Riavach, son of Gerald Cavenagh, died.

Murrough, i. e. O'Melaghlin, one of the most distinguished men of Ireland for bravery and military command, was killed in Moy Elle, by his own brother Art, for he had slain his brother Felim previously, so that it was in revenge of him he was slain by Art; and Torlogh became his successor.

A. D. 1519.

James, the son of Philip, son of James, son of Roderick Mac Mahon, bishop of Derry, died.

Edmund Duv O'Dwyer, abbot of Eas Roe,¹ died on the 1st day of November, and was buried at Donegal,² in the habit of the Order of St. Francis, after having resigned a monastic habit for it.

The coarb of Cluan Conmaicne (abbot of Cloone, in Leitrim), the chief of hospitality, and the provider for the churches of Conmaicne, died.

O'Neill, i. e. Art Oge, the son of Con, a distinguished military leader, a man of humanity and hospitality, died, and his brother, Con Bacach, the son of Con, was appointed his successor.

O'Connor Roe, i. e. Owen, son of Felim Fionn, and Mac William of Clanrickard, i. e. Rickard Oge, died.

Felim, the son of Manus, son of Bryan, son of Donal O'Connor, lord of North Connaught, a charitable, humane man, died.

Teige Roe, the son of Malachy O'Kelly, lord of the Calladh (in Galway), died.

Donogh Cavenagh, a prosperous and affluent man, of the chief nobles of Leinster, died.

Maoilin, the son of Torna O'Maolconry, chief professor of Siol Murray (Roscommon), a man full of law and learning, a man whom the Geraldines and English had selected in preference to all the professors of Ireland, a man who received precious presents and property from all those who patronised him, died in the monastery of Derg, in Teffia.

Fercertne O'Cuirnin, the professor of Owen O'Rourke (of Leitrim), and chief of the learned of his tribe, and Donal Glas O'Cuirnin, died.

Teige, son of Bryan, son of Tomaltach O'Beirne, tanist of Hy Briuin (in Roscommon), died.

The sons of O'Neill, namely, the sons of Donal, son of Henry, made an attack on the son of O'Neill, i. e., Bryan, son of Con, and took large preys on the northern mountain; Bryan having received intelligence of this, collected all the people he could to attack them, and he pursued them, and defeated the sons of O'Neill, after their people had departed from them with the prey. The two sons of O'Neill, i. e. Hugh and Owen, were taken prisoners there, and the son of Owen was slain; Mac Caghwell, i. e. Cu-uladh, the son of Edmond; Thomas, the son of Edmond; and Edmond, the son of Gillpatrick Mac Caghwell, were also slain.

A. D. 1519.

1. The Abbey of Easroe or Ashroe, in Irish, Eas Aodha Ruaidh, signifying the Cataract of Red Hugh, and so called from Aodh Ruadh or Hugh the Red, one of the ancient kings of Ireland, who was drowned in the Cataract called the Salmon Leap, at Ballyshannon, in Donegal, many centuries before the Christian era. The abbey of Ashroe, according to Allemande, was a daughter of that of Boyle in Roscommon, and founded for Cistercian monks in the twelfth century, A. D. 1178, by Roderick O'Cannanan, prince of Tireconnell, and was amply endowed by the O'Cannanans, O'Maoldorys, and O'Donnells, who were successive princes of Tireconnell, and many of those ancient chiefs were buried in that abbey. The abbey of Ashroe was called by Latin writers De Samario, that is, of the river Samer, which was the ancient name of the river Erne: the abbey was situated about half a mile north-east of Ballyshannon, in a glen beside a small but rapid river which flows onward to the Bay of Donegal. The abbots of Ashroe had privilege to a great extent over the great salmon fishery of the Erne, at Ballyshannon, as stated in Archdall's Monasticon; but the abbey, with its lands, fisheries, &c., were all seized by the crown in the reign of Elizabeth; some ruins of this ancient abbey still remain, and adjoining it is an old and extensive cemetery.

2. The Monastery of Donegal.—The name Donegal, in Irish Dun-na-nGall, signifies the fortress of the foreigners, and is considered to have been so called from a fortress erected there by the Danes, as it appears they had some settlements there in the ninth and tenth centuries; for, in an Irish poem by the celebrated bard Flann, the son of Lonan, in the latter end of the ninth century, of whose works an account has been given in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at A. D. 891, and whose death is recorded by the Four Masters under the same year, who style him the Virgil of the race of the Scots, chief of the learned of the Gaels, and the best poet that was in Ireland in his time, it is related that Eigneabán, the father of Donal, prince of Tireconnell, gave his three beautiful daughters in marriage to three Danish lords, named Caithis, Torges, and Tor, to secure their friendship and protect his territory from plunder, and the marriages were celebrated at Donegal, where Eignachán resided. A castle was erected at Donegal by the O'Donnells, about the twelfth century, and down to the seventeenth century it was the chief residence of the princes of Tireconnell. According to the Four Masters, the monastery of Donegal was founded A. D. 1474, by Hugh Roe O'Donnell, prince of Tireconnell, and his wife Fionghuala, the daughter of Conor O'Brien, prince of Thomond, for Franciscan friars. Some ruins of this ancient monastery still remain; and it may be remarked that the abbey of Donegal is particularly celebrated as the place in which the Annals of the Four Masters were compiled, and hence they are sometimes designated the Annals of Donegal.

Rossa and Teige, the sons of Roderick, son of Bryan Maguire, were taken prisoners by the coarb Maguire ; he expelled Roderick, and the remainder of his sons, from the estate, and deprived them of their predatory cattle-troops, whom the coarb kept in pay for his own use, until O'Donnell requested of him to restore his predatory troops again to Roderick.

A great contest arose in Delvin between the tribe of Fergal Mac Coghlan, and the tribe of Donal, in which James Mac Coghlan prior of Gallen, and heir presumptive of Delvin Eathra (barony of Garrycastle, King's county), was killed by the shot of a ball from the castle of Cluan Damhna (castle of Clonana, in the parish of Gallen, King's county).

A. D. 1520.

Nicholas, the son of Pierce O'Flanagan, parson of Devenish, was wrongfully removed from his living by the influence of the laity, and died in Bohoe.

Magennis, i. e. Donal, the son of Hugh, son of Art, died, and Felim the Hospitable, his brother, was appointed his successor, who also died ; and Edmond Buighe Magennis was nominated the Magennis.

Maurice, the son of Thomas, son of Thomas, earl of Desmond, died.

Mac William of Clanrickard, i. e. Ulick, the son of Ulick, died.

Mac William Burke, i. e. Meyler, the son of Theobald, was slain by the sons of Seoinin More, the son of Mac Seoinin.

The son of Maguire, namely, Philip, the son of Edmond, made an incursion into Iochtar Tire (the lower part of the county of Cavan, on the borders of Fermanagh and Monaghan), against the son of Philip O'Reilly, where, having seized some prey, they were overtaken by a strong pursuing force of the tribe of Bryan O'Reilly, and the grand-sons of Cathal O'Reilly, namely, Fergal and Maolmora, and the sons of Donal of Coin Inis gave a defeat to the son of Maguire, and the son of Philip, son of Torlogh Maguire, in which Philip, the son of Maguire, with his son Thomas, the two sons of Philip, the son of Torlogh, namely, Gillpatrick and Edmond ; Torlogh, the son of Flaherty, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, and many others were slain.

Roderick, the son of Hugh Maguire, was treacherously taken prisoner by Donn Buighe, the son of Maguire, i. e. the son of Conor, son of Thomas Oge, and was delivered by him to Gillpatrick Oge, the son of Gillpatrick, son of Edmond Maguire, who put him to death.

Carbry, the son of Conor, son of Carbry, son of Cormac O'Beirne, the counsellor and leading man of Conmaicne Murray (in Roscommon), died.

Torlogh, the son of Felim Mac Coghlan, lord of Delvin Eathra (in the King's county), a man distinguished for wisdom and learning, a man of prosperity and great riches, who built the castles of Feadan and of Cinncoradh, died after a well-spent life,

A great plague raged in Machaire Stefanach (in Fermanagh), of which many persons of note died.

O'Cassidy, i. e. Felim, the son of Teige, chief physician of the tribe of Philip (Maguire), and Roderick, the son of Donogh, son of Hugh Maguire, died.

Maurice, the son of Thomas, son of the earl (of Kildare), the most worthy Englishman of the Geraldines, was killed, with many others, by Con, the son of Malachy O'Moore.

A. D. 1521.

The prior of Devenish, i. e. Redmond, the son of the parson of Innis Maighe Samh (Innismacsaint, in Fermanagh), a benevolent, charitable, and humane ecclesiastic, died.

Mac Mahon (of Monaghan), the son of Glaisne, son of Redmond, son of Roderick, died, and his son, young Glaisne, was nominated the Mac Mahon.

O'Kane, i. e. Thomas, the son of Aivney, who had been forcibly deprived of his lordship some time before by Donogh O'Kane, died.

Donogh, the son of Roderick, son of Bryan Maguire, was killed by the sons of Mac Gauran, namely, Donal Oge, son of Donal Bearnach, and Anthony, the son of Manus Mac Gauran ; and there was not a better man of his tribe in his time than that Donogh.

Grace, the daughter of Thomas O'Heoghain, the mother of the coarb Maguire, a woman of great prosperity and riches, equally distinguished for bestowing presents, and her kind hospitality, died.

Roderick, the son of Eigneachan O'Donnell, was killed by the English, at Dundalk, while in company with O'Neill, namely, Con, the son of Con.

Torlogh, the son of Donogh Mac Sweeney, died.

The lordship of Delvin was divided by O'Melaghlin, i. e. Torlogh, and by O'Carroll, i. e. Maolroona, between Feardorcha, the son of Mae Coghlan, i. e. Fingin Roe, and Cormac.

Sile (Julia), the daughter of Niall Garv O'Donnell, died on the 14th of August.

A. D. 1522.

Redmond Roe Maguire, prior of Lisgoole, died.

An exceedingly great war arose between O'Donnell and O'Neill; Mae William of Clanrickard, the English and Irish of Connaught, the O'Briens, O'Kennedys, and O'Carrolls, united and leagued with O'Neill against O'Donnell in that war. The following were the chiefs from the west who united their forces on that expedition: Mae William of Clanrickard, Ulick, the son of Ulick of the Wine; a number of the chiefs of the O'Briens, Donogh and Teige, the sons of Torlogh, the son of Teige O'Brien, and the young bishop O'Brien (Torlogh O'Brien, bishop of Killaloe); O'Carroll, i. e. Maolroona (of Ely O'Carroll), the son of John; the O'Kennedys (of Ormond); and not they alone, but those also of the Conaicians who had been under his (O'Donnell's) tribute and submission until then, namely, O'Conor Roe; O'Conor Don; Mae William Burke; Mae Dermott of Moylurg, and all those amongst them in Connaught, joined to march against O'Donnell; and it was at the festival of Lady Day in Harvest they appointed to meet O'Neill in Tirhugh. O'Neill, at the same time, mustered the forces of Kinel Eogain (Tyrone and Derry); the Clan Aengusa (the Magennises of the county of Down); the Orgiallians (Mae Mahons of Monaghan and Louth); the O'Reillys (of Cavan); the people of Fermanagh (the Maguires); a very large body of the Albanachs (the Scots of Antrim), commanded by the son of Mae Donnell, i. e. Alexander; there also marched thither numerous forces of the English of Meath, and of the galloglasses of the province of Leinster, of the Clan Donnells and Clan Sheehys (Mac Donnells and Mae Sheehys), on account of the alliance of the earl of Kildare's daughter, who was O'Neill's mother. O'Donnell collected his small, but true and faithful forces, in Tireonnell (in Donegal), namely, O'Boyle, O'Dogherty, the three Mac Sweeneys, and the O'Gallaghers, along with his son Manus (O'Donnell), and they proceeded to a dangerous pass, by which they expected O'Neill would march to attack them, viz. Port-na-dtri-namhad (or the Port of the Three Enemies, probably Burt, near Lough Swilly, in Donegal). When O'Neill received intelligence of this, the direction he took was through Tyrone, without being perceived until he arrived at Termon Dabeog (near Lough Dearg, in Donegal), and from thence to Ballyshannon. The son of Mae Sweeney of Tir Boghaine (barony of Banagh, in Donegal), i. e. Bryan of the Fleet, whom O'Donnell had left to guard the castle of Ballyshannon, defended the town against O'Neill in the best manner he possibly could; but, however, the town was finally taken by O'Neill, and he slew Mae Sweeney, and a great number of his people; among the slain were two of O'Donnell's professors, namely, Dermot, the son of Teige Cam O'Clery, a man learned in history and genuine poetry, and who kept a house of general hospitality for the rich and poor, and the son of Mac Ward, namely Hugh, the son of Hugh, with many others, which happened on the 11th of June; Bundroos and Belleek were also taken and burned by O'Neill on this expedition. On the return of a part of his forces from Bundroos, they slew Rory, the son of Geoffrey, son of Hugh Gallga O'Donnell, and the son of Mac Kelly of Brefney, near Searb-Einsi-an-Fhraoich. When O'Donnell received intelligence of these acts having been committed by O'Neill, he commanded Manus O'Donnell, with a portion of his forces, to march into Tyrone, and plunder and burn the country, and he himself marched with the remainder of the troops through Barnus (Barnesmore mountains, in Donegal), in pursuit of O'Neill, and to protect Tirhugh. As to Manus he laid waste, by fire and sword, all the adjacent parts of Tyrone, slew and destroyed many people, and returned in triumph. When O'Neill was informed that Manus had gone into Tyrone he returned again across the river Finn, and spoiled the country before him as far as Ceann Maghair, from which place he carried off some prey and returned victoriously to his own country. O'Neill afterwards encamped at Cnoc Buidbh¹, at Lough Monann, which is commonly called Cnoc-an-Bogha, with the aforesaid forces, except the army from the west, as we have before stated. O'Donnell, after Manus had reached him with great booty, and found that O'Neill was not at Ballyshannon, and that he did not succeed in overtaking him after plundering Ceann Maghair, returned through Baranus again, and had collected all his forces together at Druim Lighean (Dromlyn, near Lifford, in Donegal), which however were few against many, they then held a council to determine what was best to be done in the great difficulties they had to encounter, for they knew they had not sufficient forces to contend with O'Neill and his army, and also the Conacian troops which were marching to their country, should both succeed in joining each other, so that the resolution they came to was to attack O'Neill, as he was nearest to them, and they considered it preferable to perish on the field rather than be reduced to servitude under any persons living; they then thought it better, as so great an army was opposed to them, to make a nocturnal attack on O'Neill's camp. A notice and communication of these resolutions were conveyed to O'Neill, so that he went on his guard, and watched every pass by which they supposed the Tirconnellians might march on them, while he himself remained encamped in the rear, ready to meet any attack. O'Donnell having arranged, animated and earnestly exhorted his small force, commanded them to abandon their horses, as they would not want them in the battle, if determined to fight in concert, and to conquer; they adopted that plan, and proceeded until they came up to the guards without being perceived, who then began to alarm their forces of the near approach of their enemies, whereupon the Tirconnellians rushed forward with all their might and main, lest the guards should reach O'Neill's camp before them, and it so happened that they arrived at the camp together, and they raised great and loud shouts on their falling in with each other, and their clamour was fiercely answered by O'Neill's soldiers, who bravely and resolutely determined to defend their commander and their camp; both armies engaged in general conflict

1. Cnoc Buidhbh, or the Hill of Budh, where this great battle was fought, was situated near Strabane, in the county of Tyrone, and on the borders of Donegal, a few miles from Lifford. The same place is again mentioned in the Annals, at the year 1557, under the name of Cnoc Buidhb Dheirg, that is, the hill of Budh Dearth, and appears to have got its name from Budh Dearth, or Budh the Red, a celebrated chief of the Tuath De Danan, who was son of Daghdá, one of the Danan kings; there was also another Hill of Budh named from him, situated near Rath Cruachan, in the county of Roscommon; and the large lake or expansion of the Shannon, situated between Roscommon and Leitrim, and called Lough Boderig, also derived its name from this Budh Dearth, the Danan chief. In the life of St. Cormac, from the Book of Leacan, translated into Latin, and published by Colgan in his Acta Sanctorum, Sith Budha, or the Hill of Budh, is mentioned as being situated in Tyrerley, in Mayo, thus three Hills of Budh are recorded; and in the Life of St. Cormac, by Colgan, a curious account is given of the Hill of Budh in Tyrerley, which was supposed to have been haunted by fairies or demons. As already shown at p. 362, in the note on the Danans, it appears probable that the worship of Budh and Fire worship prevailed in Ireland in the early ages; and in the same note it has been mentioned that Fergus Bod or Budh, prince of Bregia, was called Fergus of the Fire; and in the Book of Ballymote, folio 108, he is called Fergus teine Bod, that is, Fergus of the Fire of Budh, which seems to show that he was a worshipper of the Fire of Budh. Vallancey was of opinion that Buddhism prevailed in Ireland, having been introduced by the Tuath De Danan, whom he considered to have been Dedanites from the land of Dedan, in Chaldea; hence the term Tuath Dedan would signify the people of Dedan, as the word Tuath, in Irish, means a tribe or people. The term Bodach, signifying a clown or churl, is considered to have originated from Budh or Bod, as Bodach might mean a Buddhist, and was probably applied as a term of contempt to the worshippers of Budh, after the introduction of Christianity. According to O'Brien, in his book on the Round Towers, the religious rites of Buddhism, which extensively prevailed over India and other parts of Asia, were introduced into Ireland by the Danans, who, he maintains, were Iranians, from the land of Iran or ancient Persia, and that they erected the Round Towers for the worship of Budh, and for astronomical observations, as the ancient Persians and Chaldeans particularly studied the knowledge of the stars. In the works of the Irish bards, the Danans are often mentioned as fairies, and in the traditions of the people they are represented to have been magicians and foretellers of events, and considered to have been converted into fairies, and still to reside in a state of enchantment in the hills, and in the raths or earthen ramparts, commonly called forts. The belief that the Danans were converted into fairies, seems to show that they came from the East, as the system of fairyism was of oriental origin, the fairies being the same as the peris of the Persians, and the ginn or genii of the Arabians, hence it is probable that the fairy mythology was first introduced into Ireland by the Danans. The fairies are called by the Irish Sighe or Sidhe, which signify sprites, spirits, or goblins, and sometimes Sluagh Sighe, or the Host of the Fairies; and also Sidheog and Sigheogaidhe, which signify young or diminutive sprites; the fairies are frequently called Daoine Maithe, that is the Good People, and they are mentioned with great awe by the common people for fear of giving offence to those beings, who have been always considered to have great power over mortals. Donn is the king of the fairies, and Clíodhna or Cleena, and Meibh or Meva, were their chief queens; and from Meibh, came the Scotch and English name of Mab, the fairy queen: Seiva and Deirdre, are also often mentioned as fairy queens; the large hills called Sith Beag and Sith More, in Leitrim, celebrated by Carolan, the Irish bard, and Benaghlin mountain, near Swanlingbar, on the borders of Cavan and Fermanagh, are famous in fairy legends as head quarters of those pigmy sprites, troops of whom, mounted on swift steeds, rapidly traverse the country, headed by Donn their king.

and slaughter; mighty men were subdued, and heroes were hacked on either side; warriors were cut down, slaughtered, and ignominiously mangled by active young soldiers in that battle. It is doubtful if either could distinguish those with whom they should join in the conflict, for they could not perceive each others' countenances on account of the darkness of the night, and their close contact mingled together. O'Neill and his forces, however, were finally defeated, and the camp was left in the possession of O'Donnell. The slaughter committed against O'Neill in that battle was awful, for there were reckoned by the people of the churches, in which great numbers of them were buried, and by those in the neighbourhood, upwards of nine hundred of O'Neill's army who fell in that engagement, so that the fame and renown of that victory spread all over Ireland. The most noble leaders who fell in that battle were the following: Donal Oge Mac Donnell, with an immense number of the galloglasses of the Mac Donnells; Torlogh Mac Sheehy, with a great many of his people; John Bissett, with the greater part of the Scots who came along with him; Hugh, the son of Owen, son of William Mac Mahon, with many of his people, and Roderick Maguire with a portion of his forces; in it also were slain immense numbers of the people of Leinster, and of the men of Meath, and no leader of a force or of an army, small or great, who joined the combined army of O'Neill, but mourned for the loss of their people who fell in that engagement, so that the greatest slaughter that ever happened between the Connallians and Tyronians was that of the battle of Knock Buidhbh. The Tirconnallians, after that, became possessed of the horses, arms, and armour, provision stores, spirituous liquors, and beautiful and precious jewels, amongst the slain of the forces they had defeated; and although O'Donnell's men were without horses marching to that battle, they took away with them many horses which they gained from the warriors vanquished in that slaughter. Some of O'Donnell's forces went to their houses with their booty, without his permission, but he commanded them to return forthwith, and having collected all his forces together, he marched with all possible expedition westward through Barnus More, across the rivers Erne, Droos, and Duff (Bunduff, borders of Leitrim and Sligo), through the lower part of Carbury (in Sligo), and encamped at Ceathramh-na-Madadh, to the north of Benghulban (Benbulbin mountain). The Conacian forces, before mentioned, had marched as far as Sligo, to which they laid siege; it was garrisoned by O'Donnell's people, and they had no interruption in entering Tیرهonnell but to take the town. When the two Mac Williams, the two O'Conors, Mac Dermott, the O'Briens, O'Carroll, and the O'Kennedys, with their forces, heard that O'Donnell had encamped in their neighbourhood, and also of the victory he had gained over O'Neill, they resolved to send messengers to O'Donnell, to sue for peace, and to offer him whatever terms might be determined on by Manus O'Donnell and O'Carroll, between O'Donnell and Mac William, respecting all the compacts and differences they had with each other. The persons sent on this embassy were Teige, the son of Torlogh O'Brien, and other chiefs. While those were engaged in delivering their commands to O'Donnell, the chiefs of that army came to a resolution to retire privately with their forces from the siege they were carrying on, and they acted on that resolution, although it was strange and wonderful that so great an army, and such noble leaders, with such enmity against their opponent (O'Donnell), should retire after that manner, until each party should attempt to satisfy their enmity against each other. Those forces neither halted nor waited for the return of their messengers, or the tidings of peace or war, until they arrived at the Curlew mountains, where the lords and chiefs of that army separated. O'Donnell, however, was not aware that those armies had fled from him after that manner, for, had he ascertained it, he would have pursued them with all possible speed, and punished them. Manus O'Donnell sent at the same time dispatches by the messengers, namely, by Teige, the son of Torlogh O'Brien (and his attendants), and it was at the Curlew mountains he overtook his people. It is doubtful whether O'Donnell obtained greater fame for victory throughout Ireland, by gaining that battle of Knock Buidhbh, in which so many had been slain and so much booty acquired, than he did by this defeat, although a drop of blood had not been shed, or a wound inflicted by either party.

Donal Cleireach, the son of John O'Kane, the most experienced young artist of his tribe, and a man of general hospitality, was slain by the people of the Routes.

Donal, the son of Donal O'Rourke, a man distinguished for his nobility and good actions, was killed by the sons of Felim O'Rourke.

Master Felim O'Corcoran, profoundly learned in the canon laws, died.

A. D. 1523.

John O'Maonaigh (O'Mooney), who was a parson in Geashill (King's county), and a canon of the chapter of Kildare, the most eminent ecclesiastic in South Leinster, in fame and excellence, died.

O'Kane, i. e. Donogh, the son of John, the most distinguished of his tribe in his time in the patronage of literary men and strangers, died.

O'Moore (lord of Leix), i. e. Cedach, the son of Lysagh, died.

Mary, the daughter of O'Malley, and wife of Mac Sweeney of Fanat, the best constable's wife in her time, died.

O'Malley, i. e. Cormac, the son of Owen, a man distinguished for generosity and general hospitality, died.

Mac Tiernan, i. e. Fergal, the son of Gillaisa Oge, son of Gillaisa, son of Bryan, lord of Tullagh-onoho (in the county of Cavan), a charitable, humane man, died, and his brother succeeded in his place.

Bryan (O'Brien), the son of Teige-an-Chomhaid, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan Cath-an-Aonaigh (of the battle of Nenagh), died suddenly at Cluan Ramhfhoda (Clonroad, near Ennis, in the county of Clare), about the festival of St. Patrick.

The son of O'Brien of Thomond, i. e. Teige, the son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan Cath-an-Aonaigh, was killed by a shot of a ball at Ath-an-Chamais, on the river Suir, by the Butlers, viz., by the lord justice, Pierce Roe Butler; and that Teige was the greatest terror to his enemies of any man of his age.

Mac Gilleain, i. e. Loughlin, was killed, and Mac Conway, namely, Malachy, died.

Hugh Buighe, the son of Con, son of Niall, son of Art O'Neill, was killed by Roderick Carrach, the son of Cormac, son of Hugh.

Owen, the son of Felim, son of Donogh, son of Tiarnan Oge O'Rourke, was drowned in the lake of Glen Eda (Glennade, in Leitrim).

Rossa, the son of Roderick, son of Bryan, son of Felim Maguire, died, while imprisoned by the coarb Maguire, namely, Cuchonacht.

Hugh, the son of Art O'Toole (of Wicklow), the most distinguished man of his tribe, in his time, for hospitality and nobleness, was killed by the O'Byrnes.

A war arose between O'Neill, i. e. Con Bacach and O'Donnell, namely, Hugh Duv, the son of Hugh Roe; O'Donnell remained encamped for some time in the spring in Glen Fine, (in Donegal), and Manus O'Donnell, having gone to Scotland, returned safe, after having completed his visit there. O'Donnell and Manus having then entered Tyrone, spoiled and burned the entire country, from Bealach-Coille-na-gCuiritin, as far as Dunganannon. The town of Mac Donnell, viz., Cnoc-an-Cluiche (Aughnacloy, in Tyrone), was burned by O'Donnell, and a splendid garden which was there was cut down and destroyed by his forces; they encamped for a night at Tullahoge, and spoiled and completely plundered the country in every direction; and remained encamped for a night near Carn Siaghail (Carnteel); they slaughtered and destroyed much cattle, committed great depredations, and returned safe, after plundering the country on that expedition.

O'Donnell marched a second time into Tyrone, and plundered and spoiled the country, until O'Neill made peace with him in the latter end of this year, and no other remarkable circumstance occurred between them.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe, after having made peace with O'Neill, and having collected his forces, both of his own country and those at a distance, marched into Brefney to attack O'Rourke; the men of Brefney sent the cattle and property of the country into the recesses, and inaccessible fastnesses of the country, to secure and protect them from O'Donnell; the sons of O'Rourke, with all the forces they could collect, prepared themselves to defend the country, but O'Donnell, however, overran the country on that expedition, and burned the dwellings and corn, so that he left nothing in it worth mentioning unburned.

Gerald, earl of Kildare, the English of Meath and O'Neill, namely, Con, the son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, marched with an immense army against O'Connor Faily, Conall O'Moore, and the Irish of Leinster in general; the Irish, however, agreed to abide by the decision and arbitration of O'Neill between themselves and the earl; and O'Neill, after having made peace between them, delivered the hostages and prisoners of the Irish into the hands of the earl, as a security for all the charges he had against them, and they accordingly separated in peace.

Feradach Buighe O'Madden, tanist of Siol Anmcha (in Galway), was killed by the forces of O'Carroll, i. e. Mulroona.

A. D. 1524.

The two sons of O'Donnell, namely, Niall Garv, and Owen, the sons of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe, confederated together in an insurrection, and were for a considerable time destroying the country, until at length they were influenced to oppose one another. The town of Niall Garv, i. e. the Cranoge of Lough Beatha, was taken by Owen, the town being at the time under his power and protection. Niall, having left the country, returned after a long lapse of time again to attack the town, and remained in ambush in its neighbourhood; Owen, having received intelligence of this, immediately repaired to the place where Niall was, and they fought for a considerable time against each other, until Owen at length was slain on the spot, and Niall, being deeply wounded, died of his wounds shortly after; this was a very lamentable thing, that both of those should have been slain after that manner.

Dermot, the son of Giolla Duv O'Brien, the most distinguished man of his own lordship in supplying the wants of those who required his relief, a man whose hospitality and generosity were most unremitting, a man who was expected long to enjoy the dignity and honours of his estate, died after extreme unction and repentance.

O'Donnell marched with a force into Tyrone, and after having burned and plundered the country, returned safe. The lord justice, i. e. Gerald, the son of Gerald, earl of Kildare, marched with an army to the relief of his kinsman O'Neill, namely, Con, the son of Con, in the middle of harvest exactly, to attack O'Donnell, and chastise him for his ill-disposed enmity; and they did not halt until they arrived at the port of the Three Enemies (near Lough Swilly, in Donegal), for they considered they would be sufficiently secured and protected in that place, being in dread of O'Donnell, the place being surrounded and strongly fortified with deep earthen ditches, and broad entrenchments, which had been formerly constructed by Manus O'Donnell. O'Donnell collected very great forces to defend his territory against the lord justice and O'Neill; besides his own people, the following forces joined O'Donnell, namely, a large body of the Albanachs (Scots), of the chiefs of the Clan Donnell (Mac Donnells), of Scotland, commanded by Mac Donnell himself, i. e. Alexander, the son of John Cathanach; by Angus, the son of John Cathanach, and by Mae Donnell of the galloglasses, with many other chiefs from Scotland; these forces did not halt until they arrived at Drum Lighen (Drumline, in Donegal), and resolved to fight a battle on the following day. Manus O'Donnell proposed to attack the lord justice and O'Neill, that night, but O'Donnell did not agree to that, from the strong position of the place, and from his dread of the lord justice's cannon. Manus, however, without the permission of O'Donnell, went with a party of galloglasses on foot to harass and annoy the forces of the lord justice and O'Neill, and kept up a continued discharge of numerous darts (or arrows), on them, so as not to allow them to sleep or rest; and they slew Calvaeh, the son of O'Brien, with many others, and he was a great loss in his own country. The resolution that the lord justice and O'Neill came to on the following day was, to communicate with O'Donnell, requesting a conference to make peace; these terms were granted, and the lord justice concluded a peace between O'Donnell and O'Neill, and he himself became the security between them; a Cairdeas Criost (a Christian friendship called gossipship, and gossipred), was also made between the lord justice and O'Donnell, so that they parted in peace and perfect friendship, through the miracles of God on that occasion. When the lord justice and O'Neill were returning, they found Hugh, the son of Niall, son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe, son of Bryan Ballach, with a great force, plundering Tyrone; and when Hugh heard of these forces advancing towards him, he sent the greater portion of his own forces before him, with the prey and booty of the country, and he himself remained in the rear, at a great distance, with a small party of his troops, until the main body of the other army overtook and attacked him, and being taken in this dangerous position, he was slain on the spot on the sixth of October. It was a melancholy and mournful circumstance, that so free-born and exalted a chieftain should die after that manner, for his equal was not among the Kinel Eogain for a long time, in nobleness, feats of arms, hospitality, valour, prowess, and defence; and to record his death, the following was composed:

"One thousand five hundred years,
And twenty-four, the statement is correct,
From the birth of the Son of God to the death of Hugh,
Should any inquire to know the fact."

Mac Quillan, i. e. Cormac, and the son of John Duv Mac Donnell, were wounded and taken prisoners, which resulted from that death by O'Neill's people.

Gormley, the daughter of O'Donnell, i. e. of Hugh Roe, the wife of Hugh, son of Niall, son of Con O'Neill, the most benevolent and hospitable woman, and the most bounteous entertainer of the orders (friars), ecclesiastics, learned men, and professors, in which good offices she was supported by her husband, died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

A great contest arose amongst the O'Kanes (of Derry), in which Cumaighe, the son of Bryan Finn O'Kane, and Fear Dorcha MacRory, of the Routes (in Antrim), were slain; in the same contest Hugh Carrach, the son of O'Dogherty, and a number of his people, were slain by Geoffrey O'Kane, the son of Geoffrey, they having gone to aid John, the son of Thomas O'Kane.

Cumaighe Ballach, the son of Donal O'Kane, one of the most distinguished gentlemen of his means, was slain by some of the people of the Routes.

Mac Donogh of Tirrerrill died, i. e. Roderick, the son of Tomaltach, son of Bryan, after which a dispute arose among the Mac Donoghs about the lordship of the country, and Cormac, the son of Teige, son of Bryan, was nominated the Mac Donogh.

Mac Sweeney of Tir Boghaine (barony of Bannagh, in Donegal), i. e. Niall More, the son of Owen, the most renowned constable of his own noble tribe for action and heroism, for determination of mind and counsel, for arraying and attacking, for hospitality and generosity, for great troops and active warriors, by whom most dangerous passes were forced, died, after extreme unction and repentance, in his own castle at Rathain, on the 14th of December.

O'Connor Kerry, i. e. Conor, the son of Conor, went on a predatory incursion into the territory of Alla (Duhallow, in Cork), and was overtaken by Cormac Oge, the son of Cormac, son of Teige (Mac Carthy), who defeated O'Connor, wounded him, and took him prisoner; Conor, the son of Dermot, son of the Giolla Duv O'Brien, and Dermot, the son of Cormac O'Malley, were slain in that engagement by Cormac, the son of Teige.

Mac Carthy Riavach, i. e. Donal, the son of Fingin, son of Dermot, having gone on a predatory expedition into Glenflesg (in Kerry), was overtaken by the people of the country on his leaving the Glen; he himself was taken prisoner, and some of his people were slain.

Mac Rannall, i. e. Cathal Oge, the son of Cathal, was treacherously killed on the lawn of his own town, by the sons of O'Mulvey.

More, the daughter of O'Brien, i. e. of Torlogh, the son of Teige, the wife of Donogh, the son of Mahon O'Brien, a woman who kept an open house of general hospitality, died.

Aibhilin (Eveleen), the daughter of the Knight of Glin (Fitzgerald, in Limerick), the wife of O'Connor Kerry, a worthy, charitable, and humane woman, died.

Torlogh, the son of Felim Buighe O'Connor, was killed by Torlogh Roe, the son of Teige Buighe, son of Cathal Roe.

Roderick, the son of Bryan, son of Philip Maquire, a distinguished military leader, died.

The son of O'Reilly, i. e. Cathal, the son of Owen, son of Cathal, was taken prisoner by the sons of John the son of Cathal O'Reilly; in consequence of which the entire of Brefney was wasted between O'Reilly, and the sons of John O'Reilly. O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Con, marched twice into Brefney with his forces, and destroyed the portion of Brefney belonging to the sons of John; and the sons of John spoiled the portion of the O'Reilly. The young prior (O'Reilly, prior of Cavan), the son of Cathal, son of Fergal, son of John, was killed by the shot of a ball at the eastle of Tullaeh Moain (probably Tullyvin, near Cootehill); and he was a distinguished military leader.

The son of Maguire, i. e. Conor, the son of John, son of Philip, was killed by the tribe of Art O'Neill.

Ross, the son of Roderiek, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, was drowned in the port of Cleenish, after having earried off a prey from the son of Maguire, i. e. Gillpatrick, the son of Conor.

Bryan, the son of Gillpatrick, son of Hugh Oge Mae Mahon; Ardgall, the son of Hugh Oge, and Eoehy, the son of Hugh Oge, came to the town of Mae Mahon, i. e. of Glaisne, the son of Redmond, son of Glaisne Mae Mahon, to ratify and confirm their bonds of peace with him, and having concluded their compact, conditions, and peace with him, by oaths and many sureties, they departed from the town without fear or terror; Bryan-na-moich-eirghe (of the Early Rising), Mae Mahon, accompanied by the household of Mae Mahon, were sent in pursuit of them, by whom Bryan and Ardgall were slain, through enmity and deceit, and they were the two best men of their age of any in their neighbourhood.

John Buighe, the son of Andrew Magrath (of Fermanagh), a respected and affluent man, of great riches, died.

O'Breslen, i. e. Owen Oge, the son of Owen, chief brehon to Maguire, died.

Mae Rithbeartaigh (Mae Rafferty), i. e. Cuchonacht, chief poet to Maguire, died.

A. D. 1525.

A monstrous and abominable act was committed this year, viz., the bishop of Leighlin¹ was treacherously killed by Mae Anabaidh Mae Murrough, while accompanying him in a loving and friendly manner; the persons apprehended by the earl of Kildare, who were guilty of this foul deed, were ordered by him to be conveyed to the place where they killed the bishop, to be first flayed alive in an awful manner, and their bowels to be then taken out and burned before them.

Torlogh, the son of Mahon, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan Chatha-an-Aonaieh (Bryan of the battle of Nenagh), O'Brien, bishop of Killaloe, died.

The dean, son of Bryan Roe Mae Conway, a man who kept a house of general hospitality, died.

The lord justice, the earl of Kildare, namely, Gerald Oge, the son of Gerald, called a council of the men of Ireland, in Dublin, to which came the earls, barons, knights, and other nobles, and the greater portion of the Irish, and of the English of Ireland. Thither repaired O'Neill, i. e. Con Baeach, the son of Con; and O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Hugh Roe, to ratify their compacts and confirm their league of peace, in presence of the lord justice; here they argued and disputed about all the treaties that ever were between them till then before their English and Irish friends, but neither the lord justice nor the other nobles could settle their disputes, and they returned home without peace and again renewed the war.

O'Donnell made two ineursions into Tyrone this year, and burned and laid waste the country in every direction through which he passed, without encountering battle or opposition on his advance or return on either of those expeditions. A peace, however, was concluded between them in the beginning of harvest, and they bound themselves on each side to abide by the decision of the lord justice and Manus O'Donnell.

O'Kane, i. e. John, the son of Thomas, was killed by a party of his own tribe, namely, the son of Roderiek of the Routes O'Kane, the son of Geoffrey O'Kane, and others.

Catherine, the daughter of O'Duigenan, died on the ninth of June, and was honourably interred in the monastery of Donegal.

Rose, the daughter of Maguire, i. e. John, died.

Judith, the daughter of Mae Mahon, i. e. Bryan, died.

A. D. 1525.

1. The bishop of Leighlin here mentioned was Maurice Doran, a Franciscan or Dominican friar, eminent for his probity of manners and eloquence; and according to Ware, he was murdered on the high road near Glen Reynold, by his archdeacon Maurice Cavenagh (or Mae Murrough), because he had reproved him for his insolent obstinacy and other crimes, and threatened him with further correction.

A. D. 1526.

Glaisne, the son of Hugh Magennis, abbot of the monks of Newry, and prior of Down and Saul, was killed by the sons of Donal Magennis, namely, Donal Oge and his brethren.

O'Reilly, i. e. Owen, died, and a great contention arose amongst his race after his death about the lordship, until Fergal, the son of John, was nominated the O'Reilly, by the recommendation of the lord justice, and of many of the nobles of the English and Irish, although there were some of his competitors older than himself.

The son of O'Rourke, i. e. Teige, son of Owen, was treacherously killed by his own brethren.

O'Neill, i. e. Con, and Manus O'Donnell, went before the lord justice to make peace between the Connallians (O'Donnells), and Eugenians (O'Neills), and many of the English and Irish nobles attended to restore peace between them; however, they could not succeed in establishing peace or friendship between them, and they returned without being reconciled on that occasion.

After Manus returned from Dublin, he and O'Donnell marched with their forces, in the beginning of Spring, into Tyrone; they committed great depredations, and took immense plunder in the country, and spent their Shrovetide on those preys at Coill-na-lon (the Wood of the Blackbirds), in Siol Baoighill (O'Boyle's country, in Donegal), and they afterwards returned safely to their homes, with great booty.

An insurrection broke out in North Connaught, in which the greater portion of the inhabitants united against O'Donnell. The persons who thus combined were Bryan, the son of Felim O'Conor, Teige the son of Cathal Oge O'Conor, and the tribe of Cormac Mac Donogh, namely, Owen and Murtogh, with their sons and followers; this party committed depredations in the lower part of Carbury (in Sligo), on the tribe of Felim, son of Owen O'Conor, and they carried the booty away into Moylurg, where the inhabitants were friendly to them, on account of opposing O'Donnell. When O'Donnell received intelligence of those depredations having been committed, he mustered his forces, consisting of some of the chiefs of Tirconnell, and Maguire, i. e. Cuchonacht, with some of the forces of Fermanagh, with which he first marched into Carbury, where he at once demolished the castle of Grange, which was the town of the tribe of Bryan O'Conor. These forces afterwards marched into Moylurg, and spoiled and burned the country, and the people of Bryan O'Conor having escaped on that occasion, he (O'Donnell) returned home. When the O'Conors heard that O'Donnell had returned to Tirconnell, they, and the Mac Donoghs before mentioned, with all their forces, marched to Sligo, and commenced cutting the crops and corn; and they were endeavouring to take the town until a man of note of their party was slain, namely, Roderick Ballach, the son of O'Hart; they retired from the town that day, but again assembled to attack it; when O'Donnell received intelligence of that, he proceeded with all expedition and activity, without stoppage or delay, to relieve Sligo; but, however, they did not wait his arrival, for the O'Conors and Mac Donoghs retired to Beladroichid; O'Donnell, with his forces, pursued them with all possible speed, and overtook and quickly defeated the O'Conors and Mac Donoghs, in which encounter Mac Donogh's son, Malachy, the son of Owen Mac Donogh, with many others, were slain. Bryan, the son of Felim, son of Manus O'Conor, was thrown from his horse, and it was by the denseness and intricacy of the wood about Belindroichid he was enabled to make his escape from them, and some say that he did not perfectly recover from the effects of that defeat until he died.

The Conacian forces left great booty behind them, in horses, arms, and accoutrements, with the Tirconnallians on that occasion; and since the time Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv (O'Donnell), gained the battle of Cedaigh Droighnigh over the Conacians, in which a great number of them were slain, the Tirconnallians did not gain so great a victory over the Conacians, or obtain so much booty, as they did in that defeat of Beladroichid.

O'Neill having proceeded to prevent the building of a castle which was commenced by Manus O'Donnell, at Port-na-dtri-Namhad (in Donegal), Manus met the advanced guard of the force, and took Henry, the son of John O'Neill, prisoner; and O'Neill himself fled in the manner of a defeat.

O'Kane, i. e. Geoffrey, the son of Geoffrey, was killed at Beallach-an-Chamain, by the son of O'Neill, i. e. Niall Oge, and Niall himself was taken prisoner in three days after by O'Neill, and was imprisoned for a long time.

The son of O'Kane, i. e. Geoffrey, heir to the lordship of his own country (in Derry), went on a predatory incursion into Gleneoncadhan, in the month of January, where he perished by the severity of the winter's cold; and no tidings were received of him until his body was found in the end of the following Lent; Henry, the son of Niall, son of Bryan, lord of Baile-na-Braghat, was killed on the same expedition, and many others of their party were either slain or perished of the cold.

The son of Mae Pierce gave a defeat to the sons of Edmond, son of Thomas Butler, in which was slain Conor Oge, the son of Conor Caoch Mac Donnell, a constable of galloglasses, whose feats of arms hitherto, on many occasions, were famous, and particularly on that day, for his great bravery and execution of hand would not suffer him to accept of quarter, which was offered him; a great many commanders, and of the cavalry, and of galloglasses, were slain along with him.

O'Dogherty, i. e. Eachmareach, lord of Inisowen, died, and a great contention arose amongst his own race about the lordship, until Gerald, son of Donal, son of Felim O'Dogherty, was appointed the lord.

O'Donnell marched with a force into Tyrawley, at the instigation of the tribe of Rickard Burke. The chiefs of Tirconnell joined that army, and also Maguire, i. e. Cuchonaet, with the forces of Fermanagh; these chiefs proceeded immediately to Sligo, and O'Donnell's forces conveyed much corn belonging to the tribe of Bryan O'Connor, at Cuil Iorra, to Sligo, and what they did not carry with them they completely destroyed. O'Donnell then marched with his forces into Tyrawley, and took the castles of Caorthanan and of Crossmolina, in which castles he got many prisoners, and much booty; he pulled down and completely demolished those castles, so as to render them uninhabitable, after which he made amicable peace and unanimity between the tribe of Rickard Burke and the Barretts, so that he left them on friendly terms with each other. O'Donnell, on his return, encamped at Colooney, the inhabitants of which being, at the time, in opposition and insubordination to him, he spoiled and burned all the corn belonging to the tribe of Cormac Mac Donogh, after which spoiling and destruction they gave O'Donnell his own terms of peace, and also gave him hostages as security for the fulfilment of every thing they promised; the tribe of Bryan O'Connor acted after the same manner, paid O'Donnell his tribute, and made peace on his own terms, after he had demolished the castle of Grange, and destroyed all their crops and corn; the inhabitants then brought back their cattle to the country, and O'Donnell returned home safe with his forces, in victory and triumph, after that expedition, and it was a short time before November that force was mustered by O'Donnell.

Breasal O'Madden, lord of Siol Anmcha (in Galway), a man distinguished for his mildness, humanity, valour, and just judgments, died.

A. D. 1527

Laurence, abbot of Lisgoole, died.

Maguire, i. e. Conor, died, and the coarb, namely, Cuchonacht, the son of Cuchonacht, the son of Bryan, was nominated the Maguire, as his successor, by O'Donnell.

Torlogh, the son of Eigneachan O'Donnell, and Felim, the son of Geoffrey, son of John Lurg O'Donnell, died.

Mac Donogh of Tirerrill, i. e. Cormac, the son of Teige, son of Bryan, died, and a contest arose amongst the Mac Donoghs about the lordship, until Owen, the son of Donogh, son of Murrogh, was appointed the Mac Donogh.

Bryan, the son of Felim, son of Manus O'Connor, and Donal, the son of Felim, son of Torlogh Carragh O'Connor, died.

Flaherty, the son of Roderick, son of Bryan Maguire, was killed by the people of Tullaghaw, namely, by Anthony, the son of Manus Mac Gauran.

Aulave Oge Duv Mae Auley, the chief of Calry (in Westmeath), was slain by the Clan Coleman; but previous to his death he had his revenge, for he slew at the same place Fiochaidh Mac Geoghegan.

O'Clery, i. e. Giolla Riavach, the son of Teige Cam, a man distinguished in the arts, in history, in poetry, and in literature, a man respected, rich and affluent, and of great power, died in the Franciscan habit (at the monastery of Donegal), on the 8th day of March.

The doctor O'Dunslevey, (O'Duncavey of Donegal), i. e. Donogh, the son of Owen, a Doctor of Medicine, and learned in the other arts, a man of great affluence and wealth, and who kept an open house of general hospitality, died on the 30th of September.

The son of Manus Maguire, i. e. Thomas Oge, the son of Cathal Oge, son of Cathal Oge, Biatach of Seanaigh, (keeper of a house of general hospitality at Seanaigh, in Fermanagh), official of Lough Erne, (vicar general of Clogher), a man learned and experienced in the arts, a man full of fame and excellence, in all the neighbouring districts, died.

Roderick, the son of Murrogh Mac Sweeney, was killed by his own kinsmen.

William, the son of Andrew Magrath, a man of riches and affluence, died.

Caitilin (Katheleen), the daughter of Con, son of Donal O'Neill, a pious and very hospitable woman, who was the wife of worthy men, namely, first of O'Reilly, and afterwards of O'Rourke, died after extreme unction and repentance.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Hugh Roe, marched with a force into Connaught, and the following were those who joined his forces, namely, O'Boyle, O'Dogherty, the three Mac Sweeneys, Maguire, namely, Cuchonacht, with the military of Fermanagh, and the chiefs of North Connaught, with their troops; and they did not halt until they reached Moylurg (in Roscommon), and they laid waste the entire country, both corn and dwellings; they afterwards marched to take the great castle of Mac Costello (in the barony of Costello, in Mayo), which was a strong and impregnable fortress, for that castle was well supplied with all sorts of defensive military instruments that were then used in Ireland, against attacking enemies, such as provisions, ordnance, and every description of weapons. Those chiefs, however, laid siege to the castle, and surrounded the whole place with their forces, so that they permitted no one to pass to or from it until it was at length taken. On the same expedition they took the castle of Mendoda (Banada, in Sligo), the castle of the port of Bally-na-Huamha, and Castlerea (both in Roscommon), and they demolished all those castles after taking them; Hugh Buighe, the son of Dubhaltach (Dudley), O'Gallagher, was slain in that army on O'Donnell's side, before Bealach Buidhe.

The castle of Leithbhir (Lifford, in Donegal), was completed in its stone, wood, and board works, by Manus O'Donnell, while O'Neill carried on war against him; the time Manus commenced this work was on the Wednesday after the festival of St. Brendan, in summer, and it was completed in a part of the same summer.

A. D. 1528.

O'Rourke, i. e. Owen, the son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, son of Tiarnan More, lord of Brefney, the defending pillar of hospitality, feats of arms, and nobility, of the race of Hugh Finn, died in the habit of St. Francis, after extreme unction and repentance.

O'Brien, i. e. Torlogh, the son of Teige, for a long time the most eminent of the Irish of Leath Mogha (Southern Ireland), in nobility and hospitality, a worthy representative of Bryan Boroimhe, in carrying on war against the English, died after extreme unction and repentance, and his son Connor was appointed his successor.

Fionnguala, the daughter of O'Brien, i. e. of Conor-na-Srona, the son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh, the wife of O'Donnell, i. e. of Hugh Roe, who was the most distinguished woman in her time for good name and excellence, as regarded body and soul, after having spent her life and means in acts of charity and humanity, and after having been twenty-two years in the Franciscan habit, died on the first day of Lent, being the 15th of February, and was buried in the monastery of Donegal, which had been founded during her own life-time.

Con, the son of O'Neill, son of Art O'Neill, an experienced military leader, was slain on the 15th of April, by the son of Art Oge O'Neill, i. e. the O'Neill, and by a party of the people of Hugh Maguire; and the two sons of O'Neill, i. e. of Art Oge, namely, Henry and Cormac, who were in imprisonment with O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Con, for a long time before that, were delivered by O'Neill to the sons of Con, son of Niall, who hanged the two in revenge of their father.

Mac Dermott of Moylurg, i. e. Cormac, the son of Roderick, the most distinguished man for hospitality and generosity, the high-tempered steel of Connaught in war and conflict, the defender of his territory against invading tribes, died after extreme unction and repentance, and was succeeded by his brother Dermot.

Mac Carthy Riavach, i. e. Donal, died.

The castle of Colooney was taken from Mac

Donogh by his own brother, Murtoth, the son of Donogh, son of Murrogh; and Mac Donogh himself, and his son Murrogh, were shortly after taken prisoners by O'Dowd, and by the same Murtoth; and another son of Mac Donogh, namely, Donogh, was slain by them at the same time.

O'Donnell, accompanied by a large body of the Scots, commanded by Alexander (Mac Donnell), the son of John Cathanach, marched with his forces into Moylurg; they cut through the pass called Bealach Buidhe (in Roscommon), and after having taken hostages and tribute from Mac Dermott, he returned home safe to his country.

O'Mulvey, chief of Teallach Carolan (in Leitrim) i.e. Cathal, the son of Donal, son of Anthony Buighe, died.

A great wind arose on the Friday before Christmas, which prostrated a great number of trees throughout Ireland, levelled many stone and wooden buildings, and threw down the wall of the monastery of Donegal, and also swept away, sunk, and destroyed many vessels.

III. The Kingdom of Ulster.—The ancient history of Ulster is continued in this article from page 369, and in the former part an account has been given of the first colonies that peopled Ireland, and of the Celts, Seythians, and other ancient nations, and of the Slavonic, Teutonic, and Celtic races who compose the inhabitants of Europe. The Teutonic race, as already explained, form many of the great European nations, as the Germans, Danes, Swedes, Norwegians, Dutch, Swiss, English, and Anglo-Irish, and the colonies planted by them in Asia, Africa, and America. The Germans are chiefly Teutons of Seythian or Gothic origin, but there is also a great mixture amongst them of the old Celtic race. The French are chiefly composed of the Celtic or Gaulish race, but contain a considerable mixture of German or Teutonic blood, for the Franks and Burgundians who conquered Gaul in the time of the Romans were of the Teutonic race, and there is also in France a great mixture of the Roman blood, as the Romans held Gaul as a province for many centuries, and there is likewise some of the Greek race, as the Greeks settled colonies in Gaul. The Italians have a considerable mixture of the old Celtic-Gaulish race, and of the Etrurian race, who were also Celts; they have also much of the Teutonic blood from the Goths, Lombards, and other northern nations who conquered Italy in the time of the Romans; and the German race in modern times rule over a great part of Italy; the Italian people are also to a great extent composed of the old Roman race, with a mixture of Greek blood. The Spaniards and Portuguese contain a great deal of the old Celtic race, with a large mixture of the Seythian and Teutonic race, from the Goths and Vandals who conquered Spain in the time of the Romans; and the Spaniards and Portuguese have likewise a large mixture of the Roman, Carthaginian, and Moorish blood, as Spain was conquered and held for centuries by these different nations. The English are chiefly composed of the Teutonic race, namely, the Anglo-Saxons, Danes, and Anglo-Normans, with some of the Roman race, as the Romans held Britain as a province for five hundred years; there is likewise amongst the English and Welsh a great deal of the old British or Celtic race, and of the Belgians from Gaul, and in modern times there is a large mixture of the Irish Celtic race in England. The Scotch are chiefly composed of the old Celtic race of Picts and Caledonians, with a mixture of Anglo-Saxons, Danes, and Anglo-Normans. The Irish are composed of the old Celtic race, of the Firbolg or Belgians of Gaul, of the Milesians and Brigantes of Spain, who were of Celto-Seythian origin, with a mixture of the Celtiberians, Cantabrians, and Phenicians of Spain, and also of the Fomorians or Africans, who were Canaanites, and of the Danans, a colony of eastern origin, supposed to be Chaldeans or Persians; and lastly, the Irish have a great intermixture of Danish, Anglo-Norman, and Anglo-Saxon blood.

The Milesians, as already shewn in the preceding number, were a colony which came to Ireland from Spain, and are represented by our old annalists as originally Seythians. According to Buchart and other authorities, quoted by sir Laurence Parsons, in his learned work entitled "A Defence of the Ancient History of Ireland," it is shewn that some of the Seythian nations bordering on Phenicia, Palestine, and Syria, became mixed with the Phenicians, and some of those mixed people of Seythian and Phenician origin, or Scytho-Phenicians who had settled in Spain, in very remote ages, are considered to have been the ancestors of the Milesian colony that came to Ireland from Spain about a thousand years before the Christian era. The great affinity between the Phenician and Hiberno-Celtic or Irish language and alphabet, as explained in the article on the Fomorians, has been shewn by various learned antiquaries, as Vallancey, sir Laurence Parsons, sir William Betham, Villanueva, and others, and they have likewise pointed out a similarity between the Irish language and that of the Carthaginians, who were a colony of the Tyrians and Phenicians. The Phenician alphabet was first brought to Greece from Egypt by Cadmus, about fifteen centuries before the Christian era, and Phenix, brother of Cadmus, the Phenician, who first introduced letters amongst the Greeks and Phenicians, is considered by O'Flaherty, Charles O'Connor, and others, to be the same as the celebrated Phenusa or Fenusa Farsa of the old Irish historians, who state that he was king of Seythia, and ancestor of the Milesians of Spain, who came to Ireland, and being a man of great learning, is said to have invented the Irish alphabet which his Milesian posterity brought to Ireland, and it may be further observed, that the Irish in their own language were from Phenius or Fenusa called Feine, a term latinised Phenii, and signifying Phenicians, as shown by Charles O'Connor, and in O'Brien's Dictionary. The Brigantes, of whom an account has been already given as a colony from Spain who accompanied the Milesians to Ireland, were, according to Mariana and other Spanish historians, originally some of the Brigs or Phrygians from Asia Minor, and the same people as the ancient Trojans, and a colony of these Phrygians were some of the first inhabitants of Spain.

Ancient Names of Ireland.—In the time of the first colonies of Partholians, Nemeliuns, Fomorians, and Firbolg, it appears Ireland was known by the names Inis Balga, signifying the Noble or Excellent Island, and latinised Insula nobilis, and Fiodh-Inis, or the Woody Island, latinised Insula nemorosa, from the great forests of oak, &c., with which the country was covered; Crioich Fuinidh, signifying the Final or most remote country, and latinised Terra finalis, was also one of the ancient names of Ireland.

Inisfail, signifying the Island of Destiny, and latinised Inisfalia, and Insula fatalis was likewise one of the most ancient names of Ireland, and it was so called by the Tuath De Danan, it is said, from the Lia-Fail or Liag Fail, called the Stone of Destiny, which the Danans brought to Ireland, and on which the Irish kings were for many ages inaugurated at Tara. Ireland is frequently designated by the bards under the name of Inis Fail, or simply Fail, which appears to have been a favourite epithet. The Danans also gave Ireland the names Eire, Fodhla, and Banba, from three of their queens who were so called; Fodhla, pronounced Fola, and Banba, appear to have been favourite names, and are frequently used by the bards, being beautiful and euphonic in sound.

Erin.—The name Eire became the chief appellation for Ireland, and is pronounced Eir-e, as a word of two syllables; from Eire have been derived the names Eri, Eriu, Eirin, and lastly Erin, hence the inhabitants of Ireland have been denominated in Irish Eirionach and Eirionagh, latinised Erigena, Erigenæ, and Erinenses; Eria, as shown by O'Connor, Keating, and O'Flaherty, was also an ancient name applied to Egypt, and likewise to the island of Crete in Greece, now called Candia; Eire or Erin, be-

A. D. 1529.

ONAL Oge, i. e. the Mac Sweeny of Fanat, the son of Donal, son of Torlogh Roe, lord of Fanat, for one year, died, after having put on the habit of the order of the Virgin Mary (Carmelites or Whitefriars, at Rathmullen, in Donegal).

Edmond, the son of Donal Mac Sweeney, and Edmond Roe, his son, fell on the same day by the hand of Torlogh, the son of Roderick, son of Maolmurry Mac Sweeney.

came the chief name of Ireland, and it is so called to the present day by the Irish people.

Ierne.—By various Greek writers Ireland was called Ierne and Iernis, and in a Greek poem called the Argonautica of Orpheus, written at Athens, more than five hundred years before the Christian era, according to O'Brien in his Dictionary, at the word Eirin, and O'Flaherty's Ogygia, by Orpheus of Crotona, who was called Ononacritus, Erin or Ireland is mentioned under the name Iernis, and it is stated in the poem that the Argonauts passed Neson Iernida, that is, the Island Iernis, and that by Iernis the writer meant Ireland, was the opinion of Bochart, Camden, Usher, and other most learned antiquaries, and Usher remarks, that the Romans themselves could not produce such a testimony of their antiquity: thus Ireland was mentioned by the Greek writers five hundred years before the Christian era, and more than two thousand three hundred years ago; the passages from the Greek poem of Orpheus are given in full, with various able arguments on the point, by sir Laurence Parsons, in his learned "Defence of the Ancient History of Ireland." The famous Argonautic expedition in Greece, under Jason, took place more than a thousand years before the Christian era, and these adventurers, according to various accounts, sailed through the Euxine, and according to some, through the Mediterranean, and by the poem above quoted, they passed the island Iernis, or Ireland. Hadrianus Junius, a Dutch poet of the sixteenth century, thus alludes to Ireland having been known to the Argonauts:—

"Illa ego sum Graiis olim glacialis Ierne Dicta, et Jasonæ puppis bene cognita nautis."

"I am that (island) in ancient times called by the Greeks the icy Ierne, and well known to the mariners in the ship of Jason."

In the work on the universe, styled Periksmou or De Mundo, ascribed to Aristotle; or according to others written by his disciple Theophrastus more than three centuries before the Christian era, the Nesoi Britannici, or the two Britannic islands, Albion Kai Ierne, that is Albion, or England and Ireland, are mentioned; and Dr. O'Connor considers that the name Breattan was derived from the Celtic Breat, metal, and tan, a territory, hence signifying the country of metals, and that the name was first given to it by the Phenicians, from the celebrated tin mines worked in Cornwall by the Phenician traders in very remote times; and according to sir Laurence Parsons and others, the Phenicians are considered to have worked mines of lead and other metals in Ire-

Bryan Ballach, the son of Niall, son of Con O'Neill, was killed by Cormac Mac Quillan, the same Cormac being in the company and friendship of Bryan, after they had left Carrickfergus.

Cathal, the son of Owen, son of Hugh Maguire, died.

Bryan Roe, the son of John Maguire, was killed by the cast of a dart, while endeavouring to intercede between the people of Coole (in Fermanagh), and the people of the Machaire (or Plain).

The son of Mac Dougal of Scotland was killed by the single stroke of a sword, in the door-way of Cuil Mac-an-Treoin, by Hugh Buighe O'Donnell.

The castle of Cuil-Mac-an-Treoin (in the barony of Inisowen, in Donegal), was taken by Manus O'Donnell, and, after a consultation, the result was that he demolished the castle.

The Cosnamhach, son of Fergal, son of Donogh Duv Mac Eagan, the most celebrated professor in land in those early ages; hence Ireland is mentioned as one of the Britannic islands. In the century before the Christian era, Ireland is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus under the Greek name Iris or Irin; and the celebrated Greek geographer Strabo, in the beginning of the first century, calls Ireland Ierne; Dionysius Periegetes, another great Greek geographer in the first century, mentions the Nesoi Britannides, or the Britannic islands, namely, Albion or England to the east, and Ierne or Ireland to the west. In the fourth century, the Roman poet Claudian, in his panegyric on the Roman general Theodosius, celebrating his victories in Britain over the Saxons and Picts of North Britain, and their allies the Scots of Ireland, has the following passage:—

"Maduerunt Saxone fuso Orcades,
Incaluit Pictorum sanguine Thule,
Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Ierne."

"The Orkneys were saturated with Saxon gore, Thule grew warm with the blood of the Picts, and icy Ireland wept over the heaps of her Scots who were slain." Diodorus Siculus gives, from Hecateus, an ancient writer, an account of the Hyperborean island, about as large as Sicily, situated over against Gaul, in which was a famous temple of a round form dedicated to Latona and Apollo (the Sun), in which his priests, with their harps, constantly sung the praises of that deity, and this island is supposed to have been either Britain or Ireland, and that the worship alluded to was Sabeism; Strabo says there was an island near Britain where sacrifices were offered to Ceres and Proserpine in the same manner as at the island of Samos or Samothrace, in Greece, which was the chief seat of the celebrated form of idolatry called Cabirism.

Insula Sacra or the Sacred Isle. Ireland was called by several Roman writers, Insula Sacra, or the sacred island, from its being a celebrated seat of Druidism, and this name is considered to have the same signification as the Greek term Ierne, and derived from the Greek Ieros, sacred, and Nesos, an island. Hanno and Himilco, celebrated Carthaginian commanders, made voyages to various countries of Europe about six or seven centuries before the Christian era, and the record of their voyages, termed Periplus, was deposited by Hanno in the temple of Cronus, at Carthage; and from the Annals of Carthage, in the Punic language, Rufus Festus Avienus, a Roman poet and geographer in the fourth century, extracted an account of various countries from the Periplus of Hanno, and in this work Britain and Ireland are mentioned, and the passage referring to Ireland is as follows, the countries of the Gael, in the laws, poetry, and general Brehonism, died, and was interred at Elphin.

from the poem which is given in the first volume of O'Connor's Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres :

"Ast hinc duobus in sacram, sic insulam
Dixere prisci, solibus cursus rati est ;
Hæc inter undas multam cespitem jactit,
Eamque late gens Hibernorum colit, Propinqua rursus insula Albionum patet."

"But from this place (namely, the Scilly islands, off the coast of England), to the island which the ancients called sacred, is a distance of two days' sail; its land extends widely amidst the waters, and the nation of Hibernians extensively inhabit it, and near it lies the island of the Albiones (that is, Albion or England)."

The origin of the names Ierne and Erin has been variously explained by antiquaries. Bochart and Villaneuva considered that Ierne was derived from the Phenician words Iberin or Iberne, which signified the most remote bounds or habitations, as Ireland was then the most remote part of the known world; and Bochart was of opinion, that as the Greeks did not visit Ireland in those early ages, they got the name Ierne from the Phenicians, the only people who had intercourse with Ireland in those remote times, and are therefore considered to have given Ireland the name Ierne, which appears to be derived from the Irish Eire or Eirinn, and the Phenicians are considered by various able antiquaries to have visited Ireland and settled colonies in it more than three thousand years ago. According to Doctor O'Connor, Camden, and others, the name Eirin signifies the Western Isle, derived from the Irish Iar, the west, and in, an island, as being the most western isle of Europe. Vallancey supposed Erin to be the same as Iran, the ancient name of Persia; and O'Brien, in his book on the Round Towers, maintains the same opinion, namely, that Erin or Irin is the same as Iran or Persia, and says that it signifies in the Persian language, the sacred land, and that it got this name from the colony of Tuath De Danan who came to Ireland from Iran or Persia, and it may be observed that the old Irish historians state that Ireland got the name Eire from one of the Danan queens. Charles O'Connor, in his Dissertations, considers that Eire, or Eri, was derived from Eri-thra, the name of the country of the Eri-threans, who were Phenicians of Syria, near the Red Sea, and a colony of whom came to Ireland. Others derive Ierne from the Greek Ieros, sacred, and ncos, an island, thus signifying the sacred isle, the same as the Insula Sacra of the Roman writers; and lastly, some consider that Ierne was derived by the Greeks from Eire or Eirin, the native name. In the life of Gildas Badoniens, quoted by Ussher, Ireland is called Iren, and the inhabitants Irenses.

Ogygia, or the most ancient land.—Plutarch, in the first century, calls Ireland Ogygia; and according to O'Flaherty, Egypt was also called Ogygia; and Camden says Ireland is justly called Ogygia, which signifies most ancient, as the Irish date their history from the most remote antiquity; O'Flaherty has adopted the name Ogygia for his celebrated work on Irish history and antiquities.

Hibernia.—In the century before the Christian era, Ireland is first called Hibernia by Julius Cæsar, in his account of Britain, in which he thus mentions Ireland:—"Qua ex parte est Hibernia dimidio minor ut existimatur quam Britannia." "On which side (the west), lies Ireland, less by half, it is supposed, than Britain." Tacitus, in the first century, in his life of Agricola, mentions Ireland under the name of Hibernia, and says, "Melius aditus portusque per commercia et negociatores cogniti," thus stating, that its approaches and harbours were better known to commerce and to mariners than those of Britain. By various Roman writers, as Pliny, Juvenal, &c., Ireland is mentioned in those early times under the names Juerna, Juvernica, Onvernica, Ibernia, Ierna, and Vernia; and by the Greek geographer Ptolemy, in the second century, it is called Iuvernica or Ivernica, all of which names, Mac Egan of Ormond, i. e. Donal, the son of Hugh, son of Donal, chief of the learned of Leath Mogha, in laws and poetry, died.

Hibernia, &c., are only changes and modifications of the Greek name Ierne. By Dioscorides, in the first century, as quoted by O'Flaherty, Ireland was called Hiberi; and in the Itinerary of Antoninus, quoted in O'Brien's Dictionary, at the word Eirin, Ireland is called Iberione; and by St. Patrick, in the Latin work called his Confession, which is given in vol. I. of O'Connor's Rer. Hib. Scrip., Ireland is called Hiberione and Hiberia, and the people, Hiberiones and Hiberionaces. By various Latin writers the Irish are called Hiberni and Hibernenses.

Scotia, or the land of the Scots.—Ireland is called Scotia by various Roman and other Latin writers, as fully explained by Ussher, O'Flaherty, and in a treatise by David Roth, bishop of Ossory, appended to the life of St. Patrick, by Jocelyn the monk, translated by Edmond Swift. It got the name Scotia from the Milesian colony who came from Spain, as explained in the article on the Milesians, who were called by the Irish Clanna Scuit, or Scuit, a name which was latinised Scoti or Scotti, and anglicised Scots, and hence the country was called Scotia. Ireland is first mentioned by the name of Scotia, and its inhabitants as Scoti, in the third century, by Latin writers; and from the third to the twelfth century, the country and its people are mentioned under those names by various writers. The celebrated philosopher Porphyry of Tyre, in the third century, is the first writer recorded who called the Irish Scoti, in the following passage from his writings quoted by St. Jerome:—"Neque enim Britannia fertilis provincia tyrannorum, et Scotica gentes omnesque usque ad oceanum per circuitum Barbaræ nationes Moysen Prophetasque cognoverant," "For neither Britain, a province fertile in tyrants, nor the Scottish people, nor all the barbarous surrounding nations, even unto the ocean, have ever known Moses or the prophets." St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, and the Roman poet Claudian, in the fourth century, as before quoted, mention the Irish by the name of Scoti. In the fifth century the Irish are called Scoti by St. Patrick; and in the same century, St. Prosper of Aquitaine, speaking of the mission of Palladius into Ireland, says, "Ad Scotos in Christum credentes, ordinatur a Papa Celestino Palladius et primus episcopus mittitur," "Palladius is ordained by Pope Celestine, and sent as the first bishop to the Scots (the Irish), believing in Christ." In the fifth century, Paulus Orosius, the celebrated Spanish ecclesiastic and historian, thus mentions Ireland:—"Hibernia insula inter Britanniam et Hispaniam sita, &c.; hæc propriæ Britannicæ spatii terrarum angustior, sed cæli solique temperie magis utilis a Scotorum gentibus colitur—hinc etiam Mevania insula proxima est, et ipsa spatium non parva sole commoda, eque a Scotorum gentibus habitatur," "Hibernia, an island situated between Britain and Spain, &c.; this is nearer to Britain, and smaller in the extent of its territory, but more favourable in the temperature of its climate and in its soil; it is inhabited by the nations of the Scots. The Isle of Mann is the nearest to it, and that also is of a considerable size and favourable soil, and likewise inhabited by the Scottish people." In the sixth century, St. Isidore, bishop of Seville, in Spain, thus speaks of Ireland in a passage quoted by Charles O'Connor from Peter Lombard, primate of Armagh. "Scotia, the same as Hibernia, an island very near Britain, is of less extent but by far of a more fertile soil." In the sixth century also, Gildas, the British historian, mentions Ireland as Scotia; and in the seventh century, St. Adamnan, the celebrated abbot of Iona, in his Life of St. Columkille, calls Ireland Scotia, and the Irish Scoti. Killian, a celebrated Irish saint in the seventh century, went as a missionary to Germany, and became the first bishop of Wurzburg, and apostle of Franconia; in his Life quoted by Lanigan, his country is called Scotia in the following passage, "Scotia que et Hibernia dicitur insula est maris oceani fecunda quidem glebis, sed sanctissimis clarior viris." "Scotia, which is also called Ireland, is an island in the main ocean, of a very fertile soil, but more renowned for most holy men." The celebrated Anglo-Saxon historian, the venerable Bede, thus speaks of Ireland in the eighth century:—

Owen, the son of Felim Mac Manus, and his wife, Grace, the daughter of Conor Maguire, died.

"Hibernia autem et latitudine sui status, et salubritate ac serenitate aerum multum Britanniae praestat ita ut raro ibi nix plusquam tridua remaneat; nemo propter hiemem aut fœna secat aestate aut stabula fabricet jumentis. Dives lactis ac mellis insula nec vinearum expers; piscium volucrumque sed et cervorum caprearumque venenatu insignis; hæc autem propria patria Scotorum est. Nullum ibi reptile videri solet, nullus vivere serpens valeat; nam sepe illo de Britannia allati serpentes mox ut proximante terris navigio odore aeris illius tacti fuerint intererint." "But Ireland, from its latitude, and the salubrity and mildness of its climate, far surpasses Britain, so that the snow rarely remains there more than three days; no man makes hay for winter's provision, or builds stables for his beasts of burden. The island abounds in milk and honey, nor is it destitute of vines, and it is famous for fish and fowl, and for deer hunting and goats. This is the proper country of the Scots. No reptile is usually to be seen there, and no serpent can live in it, for though snakes were often brought there from Britain, as soon as the ship approached the land, and the scent of the air reaches them, they die." Nennius, the British historian, and king Alfred in the ninth century, mention Ireland as Scotia, and the people as Scoti; and Giraldus Cambrensis in the twelfth century, also calls Ireland Scotia, and says that North Britain likewise got the name of Scotia, because the people were originally descended from the Irish; St. Bernard, in the twelfth century, mentions Ireland as Scotia. Numerous other writers are quoted by Ussher, Roth, and O'Flaherty, who in the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries denominated Ireland Scotia, and the people Scoti; and even down to the sixteenth century, many Latin writers, particularly on the Continent, call Ireland, Scotia; and it has been fully demonstrated by Ussher and other learned men, that the name Scotia was exclusively applied to Ireland until the eleventh century, when modern Scotland first got the name of Scotia, its ancient name, given to it by the Irish and the natives, being Alba or Albain, anglicised Albany, and the people of Scotland are called by the Irish Albanach and Albanaigh to the present day. As before explained, Scotland was called Caledonia by the Romans, and North Britain by various writers. Pinkerton, in his Inquiry into the History of Scotland, says, "From the consent of all antiquity, the name Scoti belonged to the Irish alone until the eleventh century." But it is to be observed, that many Scotch writers, as Dempster, who was called the Saint Stealer, Buchanan, Mackenzie, &c., confounding ancient Scotia, or Ireland, with modern Scotia, or Scotland, have consequently claimed as natives of Scotland many illustrious Irish saints, missionaries, and scholars, eminent throughout the continent of Europe, and mentioned as Scoti, or natives of Scotia, from the fifth to the twelfth century. From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, various Latin writers, to distinguish between the two countries, mention Ireland as Scotia Vetus, or Old Scotia, and Scotia Major, or the Greater Scotia, and Scotland as Scotia Minor, or the Lesser Scotia; and the Irish were called Scoto-Ierni, and Scoto-Hiberni, or Hibernian Scots, and the people of Scotland, Scoti-Albani, or Albanian Scots.

Insula Sanctorum, or the Island of Saints, and Insula Doctorum, or the Island of the Learned, are names which have been applied to Ireland since the introduction of Christianity, by various Latin writers, in consequence of the many saints and sages celebrated as missionaries, eminent ecclesiastics, learned men, and distinguished professors, who, from the fifth to the twelfth century, went from Ireland to various countries of Europe as preachers of the Gospel, and founders of churches, abbeys, colleges, and schools, in France, Spain, Italy, and Belgium; the learned Peter Lombard, primate of Armagh, and the celebrated Colgan, in their works style Ireland Hibernia Sanctorum Insula. Giolla Moduda O'Cassidy, abbot of Ardraccan in Meath, in the twelfth century, in his poem on the Christian Kings, designates Ireland Eiriu Ogh Inis naNaomh, that is, Sacred Erin, Island of Saints; and Giolla Coeman, a celebrated bard and historian of the

A. D. 1530.

The bishop of Elphin, i. e. the Greek bishop (this bishop is not mentioned by Ware), died.

eleventh century, in a chronological poem on the Pagan Kings commences thus—Eiriu ard Inis na-Righ, that is, Exalted Erin, Island of Kings.

Ireland.—The name Ireland appears to be derived from Eire, hence Eire-land, the land of Eire or Eri, and therefore it was called Ireland and Ireland by the Anglo-Saxons, Anglo-Normans, and English, and latinised Irlandia. The Anglo-Saxons also called Ireland Scuit-land, or the land of the Scots, a name afterwards applied to modern Scotland, as above explained. By the Danes and Norwegians Ireland was called Irlandi and Irar, as may be seen from the Icelandic writers in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities. The Emerald Isle is a poetical name appropriately applied to Ireland in modern times by many writers, from its exquisite verdure, in which it surpasses most other countries; this designation was first given to it in the year 1795, by the celebrated Doctor William Drennan of Belfast, in one of his beautiful poems entitled Erin.

Ptolemy's Geography.—Claudius Ptolemy of Alexandria, in Egypt, a celebrated Greek geographer and astronomer, who flourished in the beginning of the second century, and died about A. D. 140, gave an account of the then known world. He derived his knowledge from Phenician and Tyrian merchants and navigators who had visited the various countries, but chiefly from Marinus of Tyre, a great geographer, who in the first century had written a general geography, and constructed maps of different countries. Ptolemy mentions various travellers from whom Marinus of Tyre derived his information, amongst others Philemon, either a Greek or Phenician, who had visited Icernia or Ireland. Ptolemy commences his geography with a description of Ireland under the name of Iouernia or Icernia, and of Britain under the name Albion, as being the most remote islands of the world known to the ancients. An account of Ptolemy's Geography and Map of Ireland, is given in Ware's works; in the first volume of Doctor O'Connor's Rer. Hih. Scrip., and in the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor, from which works, together with those of Camden, Richard of Cirencester, Cellarius, and Ortelius, and also Villaneuva's Ibernia Phenicea, and Wood on the Primitive Inhabitants of Ireland, the following account of Ptolemy's geography has been collected with illustrations from various other sources.

Cities.—On Ptolemy's Map are given ten chief cities in Ireland. 1. Eblana, a maritime city on the eastern coast, now Dublin. 2. Manapia or Menapia, a maritime city on the south-east coast considered to be Wexford, and by some Waterford, or, according to others, Ferns, in the county of Wexford. 3. Iernis, a city inland on a bay near the southern coast, considered to be either Dunkerron or Kenmare in Kerry. 4. Maholikon, an inland city near the Shannon, considered by Ware to have been Meelick in Galway, but supposed by others to be either the city of Limerick, or Kilmallock in the county of Limerick. 5. Raiba or Rheba, an inland city, now Rheban near Athy, in Kildare. 6. Dounon or Dunum, considered by Ware from its position on Ptolemy's Map to have been Dunamase, in the Queen's county, though supposed by Camden and others to have been Downpatrick. 7. Laberos or Laberus, an inland city, considered by Ware to have been at Kells in Meath, and by Camden at Killare, a few miles beyond Mullingar in Westmeath, at the hill of Uisneach, which was in ancient times a residence of the kings, and a celebrated seat of Druidism; others consider it was Tara, and it is probable that the word Laberos was originally written Taberos, which came near the sound of the Irish word Teamuir or Tara, where there was a city in the early ages, and which place was celebrated as the chief residence of the ancient kings. 8. Nagnata or Magnata, a great maritime city on the western coast, is considered to have been either Sligo or Mayo. 9. Rigia or Regia, an inland city considered to have been either Athlone or Limerick, or, according to others, Athenry. 10. Rigia or Regia, another inland city so called, and supposed to have been situated at Clogher in Tyrone, which was a place of note and seat of Druidism in those early times, but it is more pro-

A chapter of friars was held at Donegal, and O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, supplied them with all the necessaries they stood in need of during the time they remained together.

bahle it was Emania, which was in those ages the celebrated residence of the kings of Ulster.

Promontories and Islands.—The following are the promontories and islands marked on Ptolemy's Map. 1. Hieron akron, signifying the Sacred promontory, being derived from the Greek Ieros or Ieron, sacred, is placed on the south eastern coast, and considered by Ware to have been Greenore point, near the bay of Wexford, but is much more probably considered by Dr. O'Connor to have been Carusore point or headland, further south on the coast of Wexford, and Dr. O'Connor says it was called in the Irish Curn-Soir, that is, the eastern carn or heap, as there was a great Cairn or heap of stones there, and it is supposed to have been a great seat of Druidism; hence it was designated by the Tyrians and Greeks Hieron akron, or the Sacred promontory. 2. Notion akron or Notium, signifying the southern promontory, is placed on the southern coast, and considered to have been Mizen Head, in the county of Cork. 3. Boreion akron or the northern promontory, is considered to have been the headland now called Telting Head near Killybegs, at the bay of Donegal. 4. Ouenik-nion or Venienium, is considered to be now Ram's Head or Horn Head, near Tory Island, on the coast of Donegal. 5. Robogdion, now Malin Head, in the peninsula of Inisowen, on the coast of Donegal. 6. Isamnion, now St. John's Foreland, at the bay of Dundrum, on the coast of Down. 7. Ricina, an island, now Rathlin, off the coast of Antrim, which was anciently called in Irish Recrain. 8. Limnon or Limni, now the island of Lambay off the coast of Dublin, which probably was derived from the ancient Irish name. 9. Edoru or Edri, now the Hill of Howth, the ancient Irish name of which was Edair or Binn Edair, signifying the Promontory of Edair.

Rivers, Harbours and Lakes.—The following are the rivers, harbours, and lakes on Ptolemy's Map: 1. Senous, or Senus, is the name given by Ptolemy to the Shannon, which resembles the Irish name Sionain, Sionna, or Sinna, and is derived, by Dr. O'Connor and others, from Sean, old, and amhain, a river, hence signifying the Old River, and is pronounced Shanoun, or Shanain, and latinised Senamus. 2. Dur, now the river Mang, together with the harbour of Castlemaine, and bay of Dingle, in Kerry; and it may be observed that the word Dur, in Irish, signifies water. 3. Ternis, now the river and bay of Kenmare, in Kerry. 4. Daurona, the river Blackwater, in Munster, which name might have been derived by Ptolemy from the Irish word Dubhambain, or Duavon, which signifies the Black River; it was also called Avonmore, signifying the great river. 5. Birgous, or Birgus, now the river Barrow, in Leinster, and the united stream of the Suir, Nore and Barrow; it is called by some writers Brigus, and was named by the Irish Berbha, pronounced Bereva, and probably derived from Bior, water. 6. Modonous, or Modonus, now the river Slaney, in Wexford. 7. Oboka, now the river Ovoca, in Wicklow, which name appears to be derived from the Irish Oba, a river, and oiche, water, thus signifying the river of the waters, as it is composed of the confluence of three rivers, called the Meeting of the Waters, in the Vale of Ovoca. 8. Bouinda, or Bavinda, by some written Bubinda, now the river Boyne, in Meath, called in Irish Boin, or Boind, and considered to be derived from Bo, cows, and amhain, or Avon, a river, hence signifying the river of the cows, being always famous for the herds of cattle grazing along its pasture lands. 9. Ausoba, or Ausona, now the river and Bay of Galway, and the name appears to have been derived from Lough Corrib, which communicates with the bay of Galway, and was in Irish called Loch Oirbsen, hence the name might have been made in Greek Ausona or Orhsona, and which lake was so called from Orbsen, a Phenician merchant, who was drowned there. 10. Libnious, or Libnius, now the river and bay of Sligo, which might probably be derived from the Irish Sligeach, or Sligneach, the letter s being omitted. Raious or Ravius, now the lake and Katheleen, the daughter of Mac Sweeney, the wife of O'Dogherty, and Rose, the daughter of O'Kane, the wife of Felim O'Dogherty, died.

Conor Oge O'Boyle, tanist of the O'Boyles, was river Erne, to the bay of Donegal; the lake and river Erne were in ancient times called by the Irish, Samer, a name latinised Samaris, by Giraldus Cambrensis, and others; the lake and river in after times got the name Erna or Erne, as already explained in these notes. The term Raious or Ravius, applied by Ptolemy to Lough Erne and its river, was probably derived from the Irish name Samer, which is pronounced like Saver or Sauer, hence he might have made the word Sauraious, therefore, by a change or omission by a transcriber of sau, the first part of the word, the remainder became raious. 12. Ouidoua or Vidua, now Lough Swilly, and its river in Donegal; and the name was probably derived by Ptolemy from the Irish Oiche or Visg, water, and dubh, dark, thus signifying the dark water, which would be pronounced like Oighdhu, and therefore comes very near the Ouidoua of Ptolemy. 13. Argita, now the river Foyle, and Lough Foyle, in Derry and Donegal, which name was probably derived from the Irish Fairge, as Lough Foyle is a great inlet of the ocean, and the word was made Argita, as there is no F in the Greek language. 14. Logia, now Lough Neagh, and the river Bann, in Antrim and Derry; and the name appears to have been derived by Ptolemy either from the Irish Loch, a lake, or from Lough Each, the ancient name of the lake, pronounced like Loughough, and therefore very near the name Logia. 15. Quinderius, latinised Vinderus, now the river Lagan and bay of Belfast, in Down and Antrim; this name was probably derived from the Irish, Amhain, a river, and doire, of the oak, as this river might have flowed through oak forests; and the name in Irish would be pronounced like Quindericy, which comes very near the Greek Quinderios.

The towns and cities of the ancient Irish were denominated Baile, Brugh, and Cathair; the terms Rath and Lios, as before explained, were applied to the circular earthen ramparts commonly called furts; and the terms Dun, Dinn, and Duingean, were applied to fortresses of Cyclopean architecture, composed of large stones without cement, and also partly constructed of earthen ramparts; Cathair was a name generally applied to stone fortresses, and sometimes applied to a city. It may be here observed, that the term Dounon, applied by Ptolemy to one of the ancient cities which is considered to have been situated at the place afterwards called Dunamase, in the Queen's county, was derived from the Irish, Dun, a fortress; and Rigia, an ancient city considered to have been Emania, near Arinagh, the celebrated residence of the ancient kings of Ulster, was probably derived from the Irish Righ, a king or royal, and Suidhe, a seat, which would be pronounced like Righlhee, from which the geographer made the Greek word Rigia, and therefore signifying a royal residence. The habitations and fortresses of the ancient Irish, composing the cities or towns enumerated by Ptolemy, were constructed partly of rude stone work and earthen ramparts, but chiefly of wood from the oak forests with which ancient Ireland abounded; stone buildings, castles, &c., were not generally introduced into Ireland till the tenth and twelfth centuries, though some of the stone churches were built as early as the sixth and seventh centuries, and if the Pagan theory of the Round Towers be true, some of them were erected centuries before the Christian era.

Tribes and People.—With respect to the various tribes and people placed on Ptolemy's Map as inhabitants of Ireland in the first and second centuries; some accounts of those located in Meath, Leinster, and Munster, have been given in the various topographical notes on those territories, in the course of the Annals. 1. The Eblanoi or Ehlani, are placed by Ptolemy on the territory now forming the county of Dublin, north of the river Liffey, and the county of Meath, which anciently formed parts of Moy Liffey and Bregia. As before explained, the name Eblana, which was applied by Ptolemy to the city of Dublin, was probably written originally Deblana, and derived from Dubhlinn, which was the ancient Irish name of Dublin, therefore the Eblani or Deblani, killed by the son of O'Boyle, i. e. Niall, the son of Torlogh, at Leacach, on the 6th of January.

Felim, the son of Conor O'Boyle, was killed by the sons of O'Boyle.

would in Irish be Dubhlínidh, and signify the inhabitants of the territory of Dublin, and thus might be accounted for the people called Eblanians. II. The Kaukoi or Cauci, are placed on the territory now forming that part of the county of Dublin south of the Liffey, with parts of Wicklow, Carlow, Kildare, and Queen's county, which were comprised in the ancient territories of Cualan, Hy Kinsellagh, Leix, and Moy Liffey. These Kaukians are considered by Camden, Ware, O'Connor, and others, to have been a colony of the Cauci or Chavei, German tribes near the river Weser, in the country now called Lüneburg, but they are considered by Villaneuva to have been a people from North Spain, near the Cantabrians, and that they were so called from their chief city named Cauca. As the Kaukoi are placed by Ptolemy chiefly in the territory called by the Irish Cualan, which comprised Wicklow and the southern parts of Dublin, the name may have been derived from the Irish Cualanuidh, signifying the people of Cualan. III. The Manapioi or Menapii, are placed on the territory now forming the county of Wexford and part of Waterford, which were comprised in Hy Kinsellagh and Desies. These Menapians are considered by various geographers, as explained at pp. 194, 218, in these notes, to have been a colony of the Menapii of Belgic Gaul, who dwelt near the river Scheld, in the country afterwards called Brabant, and the districts about Antwerp; this opinion partly coincides with our old historians, who state that the Firbolg colony, now admitted to have been Belgians from Gaul, first landed at Inver Slainge, now the bay of Wexford, and settled in Leinster, and, as explained in these notes at pages 217, 219, according to the ancient annalists, Labhra Loingseach, an Irish prince, brought to Ireland more than two centuries before the Christian era, a large body of troops from Gaul, whom he landed at Inver Slainge or Wexford, and located in Leinster. IV. The Brigantes, of whom an account has been given at page 366, are placed on the territories now forming the county of Waterford, with parts of Tipperary, Kilkenny, and Queen's county, comprised in the ancient territories of Desies, Ormond, and Ossory, and were, as already shown, a colony from Galicia, in North Spain, a branch of the Milesians, and called by the Irish Clanna Breogain, from which was derived the name Brigantes. V. The Koriondoi or Coriandi, of whom some account has been already given at page 173, are placed on the territories now forming the northern part of the county of Cork, with parts of Tipperary and Limerick, in the ancient territories of Desmond, Thomond, and Ormond; these Coriondians were considered by Camden and others to have been a colony of the Coritani of Britain, who inhabited those parts of England now forming the counties of Lincoln and Leicester, and Camden states that these Coritani fled to Ireland about the first century, on the conquest of Britain by the Romans, but the Coriondi are considered by Villaneuva to have been a branch of the Brigantes, and originally some of the Phenicians who had settled in North Spain. As considered by Ware and others, Coriondi was probably derived from Corca, the Irish name of Cork, hence Coren-daoine would signify the people of the territory of Cork, which comes near the word Coriondi. VI. The Ouodiai or Udai, latinised Vodii, are placed in Desmond on the territory now forming the southern parts of Cork, with some adjoining parts of Kerry; they are considered by Charles O'Connor, with great probability, to have been the same as the Clanna Deagha of the Irish writers, and which were also called Ua-Deaghaidh, a name pronounced like Udai, and comes very near the Greek name Ouodiai, therefore these Udians appear to have been the same as the Clanna Deaghaidh, a name anglicised Degulians, who were famous warriors in Munster in the first and second centuries, and of whom accounts have been given at pages 146, 173, in these notes. VII. The Outernoi or Uterni, called also Iuerni and Ibarni, are placed in southern Desmond, in parts of Cork and Kerry, and these Uternians or Ivernians, are considered by Ware, Villaneuva, and others, Maolmurry Mac Sweeney, constable of Tir Boghaine, died.

Donal, the son of Bryan, son of Donal O'Neill, made a predatory incursion into Magherastephana to have been a colony of the Iberi from North Spain. VIII. The Ouelliboroi, Illiberi, Velliberi or Velabri, are placed in the south western part of Munster, now forming the western parts of Kerry, and these Illiberians or Velabrians, are considered to have been a colony of the Illiberi or Velliberi of northern Spain, who, according to Dr. O'Connor, are mentioned by the Spanish historian Orosius, in the fifth century, and they are considered by Dr. O'Connor to have been a colony of the Celtiberians from North Spain, who were celebrated as the most valiant of the ancient Spaniards, and are designated by Cellarius—"Nobilissimus populus Hispania:"—"The most noble people of Spain." IX. The Lucenoi or Luceni, are placed in West Munster, in the north-western parts of Kerry, and adjoining parts of Limerick, as far as the Shannon; these Lucenians are considered by Camden, Dr. O'Connor, and others, to have been a colony of the Lucenses of North Spain, in parts of Galicia bordering on Cantabria, and stated by Strabo to have been of Scythian origin, which coincides with the accounts of the Irish historians, who make the Milesian colony which came to Ireland from Galicia in Spain, originally Scythians. X. The Konkanoi, Concani, or Ganganai, are placed in Thomond and South Connaught, on the territory now forming the county of Clare, and southern parts of Galway, and considered by Camden, O'Connor, and others, to have been a colony of the Concani of Cantabria in North Spain. These Concanians being a branch of the Cantabrians, were of Scythian descent, or Celto-Scythians, as explained at page 365, where it has been shown, according to Orosius, and other ancient writers, that the Cantabrians of Spain were partly of Scythian origin, and it has been also shown that colonies of the Bascons or Biscayans, a branch of the Cantabrians, came to Ireland in the early ages. The Concani are supposed to have given its name to Connaught, called by the Irish Conacht. XI. The Auteri or Auteri, are placed in southern Connaught, now forming the northern part of Galway, and the county of Roscommon, and are considered by Dr. O'Connor to have been a colony of the Autrigones of Cantabria in Spain, and the learned Spaniard Joachin Villaneuva, in his Ibernia Phenicea, is also of the same opinion; others suppose that the Auteri of Ptolemy might have been the same as the Athachtuatha of the Irish writers, who were some of the Firbolg tribes or Belgians located in Connaught, and are mentioned as Attacotti, by Latin writers, a name anglicised Attacots. XII. The Nagnatui are placed in North Connaught, now the counties of Sligo and Mayo, and these Nagnatians or Nannatians are considered by Wood and others, to have been a colony of the Nannetes, from Armorica Gaul, now the country about Nantz in Bretagne, in the west of France; and this opinion appears not improbable, and coincides with the accounts of our old historians, who place the landing and settlement of one of the Firbolg or Belgic colonies in West Connaught, where they were chiefly located, in the territory now forming the counties of Mayo and Sligo, as explained in the notes on North Connaught. XIII. The Erdinói or Ernidi, are placed in the territory of ancient Brefney, and some adjoining parts of Ulster, which now form the counties of Cavan, Leitrim, and Fermanagh. They were the same as the Ernidhe of the Irish writers, and so called from possessing the territories about Lough Erne. These Erneans, according to the Irish historians, were some of the Firbolg tribes who possessed these territories in the early ages, until conquered by the Milesians, and they make a remarkable figure in remote times, long before the Christian era, in their battles with the Milesian kings. The Brefnians of after times were partly composed of the old Firbolg tribes, but chiefly of the Milesian stock called the Hy-Briune race, or Heremonians of Connaught; an account of the Hy-Briunians and Brefnians has been given in the notes on Brefney and South Connaught. XIV. The Oueniknoi or Venici, are placed in the north western part of Ulster, now the county of Donegal, and these Venicians are considered by Wood and others to have been (in Fermanagh), where his party seized a prey; the people of the county having collected together, pursued them to Slieve Beatha (in Monaghan), where they overtook them; Donal turned on the pursuers, and defeated them with slaughter, in which [de feat] the two sons of Owen Roe O'Neill were taken prisoners, and three of the sons of Roderick of Leargan; two sons of Manus Mac Mahon; the son of Henry, son of Bryan; and Thomas of the Caraic (the Rock), the son of Edmond Maguire, were slain.

Gilpatrick, the son of Cormac, son of Art Maguire of Coole, died, and he kept the best house of hospitality of any man of his means in Fermanagh in his time.

O'Donnell marched with a force into the province of Connaught, and he first proceeded through Coillte Conchobhair (or the Woods of Conor), thence through the Tanaisteacht (the territory of the tanist), into Moylurg, to Corraidhe-Droma Ruisg (Carrick-on-Shannon), crossed the Shannon, and burned and laid waste Muintir Eoluis; some of his men were slain about the castle of Leitrim, among whom were Manus, the son of Fear Dorcha Mac Sweeney, and Torlogh Duv, the son of Mac Coileen. After that he proceeded westward across the Shannon into the plain of Connaught, to Droichead-Atha-Mogha (the bridge of Ballymoe), across the river Suck; he burned and devastated Clan Conway; he also burned Glinsce and Kill Cruain (Glinske and Kileoan, in Galway), the towns of Mac David (Burke), and got immense booty in those countries; he also burned Ballintober after that, and received his tria colony of the Veneti, a celebrated nation of Armorica Gaul, mentioned by Cæsar as a powerful maritime people, having a great fleet and large ships, chiefly constructed of oak; they inhabited that part of Gaul now forming the country about Vannes in Bretagne, in the west of France; therefore the Veneti and Nannetes above-mentioned, might have probably been some of the Firbolg colonies of the Irish annalists, who are considered to have been Belgians from Gaul. XV. The Robogdii or Rhobogdii, are located in the north of Ulster, about Lough Swilly, and in the peninsula of Inisowen in Donegal, and in some adjoining parts of Derry, about Lough Foyle. The promontory called by Ptolemy Robogdion, as already shown, is now Malin Head in Inisowen, on the coast of Donegal, and, as before stated, it appears to have derived its name from Robhog, a Fomorian chief, of whom an account has been given at p. 341, in the note on the Fomorians, as a famous builder who had erected several fortresses, and probably from a fortress erected by him on this promontory, it got its name Dun-Robhog or Robhog-Dun, from which Ptolemy formed the Greek name Robogdion, and hence the inhabitants of the adjoining territory were called by him Robogdii. These Robogdians were most probably tribes of the Fomorians or African pirates, who, according to our ancient annalists, had settled in very remote ages in the territory now called Donegal, and other parts of the coast of Ulster. XVI. The Darinoi or Darini are placed in the north-eastern parts of Ulster, on the territories now forming the counties of Derry, Antrim, and Tyrone. As Doire, signifying an oak wood, was the ancient Irish name of Derry, as before explained, the term Doirindh, in Irish, would signify the inhabitants of the oak woods; and the name exactly corresponds with the Greek word Darinoi, used by Ptolemy; therefore these Darinians appear to have derived their designation from inhabiting chiefly the oak forests with which these territories were covered in those remote ages. XVII. The Oulontioi, Uluntii, or Voluntii, are located in the eastern parts of Ulster, now forming the counties of Down, Armagh, Monaghan, and Louth. These Uluntians appear to have been the same as the people called by the Irish writers Ulltaidh, signifying Ultonians or Ulstermen, and latinised Ultonii, and the term Ulltaidh was always applied by the Irish chiefly to the inhabitants of the territories which now form the above named counties as constituting the chief part of ancient Ulster.

The Spanish Colonies.—From the preceding accounts, it appears demonstrated that various colonies from Northern Spain, as the Brigantes, Bascenians or Biscayans, Cantabrians, Celtiberians, Coriandians, Iliberians or Velabrians, Uternians, Lucenians, and Coneanians, who were mixed colonies probably of Iberians, Celto-Seythians and Phenicians, settled in Spain, came to Ireland in very remote ages and peopled the greater part of the country, and these accounts coincide with our ancient annalists about the arrival from North Spain of the colonies called Clanna Miledh or Milesians, and Clanna Breogain or Brigantes.

With respect to Ptolemy's geography, much of its explanation must, after a lapse of nearly two thousand years, depend on conjecture. It appears he gave many tribes and territories designations different from the Irish names, but he was, of course, under the necessity of making many changes in translating the Irish terms into Greek, and some mistakes must have occurred in the course of time by various transcribers in writing those names. The original Greek names of Ptolemy have been here given, together with the same names as latinised by Ware, and other writers: but it may be observed, that there is a far greater affinity between the Greek and the Celtic or Irish words, than between the Irish and the Latin. From inaccurate information, the great geographer may have misplaced on his Map some of the tribes, territories, cities, rivers, and headlands, though, on the whole, Ptolemy's geography is generally accurate, and when explained, coincides, to a very great extent, with the accounts of tribes, territories, and remarkable places given by the ancient Irish historians.

Another ancient geographer, Marcianus of Heraclea, who wrote in the third century, and copied the works of the celebrated Greek geographer Artemidorus of Ephesus, who lived in the century before the Christian era, thus describes Ireland:—"Juvèrnia Insula Britannica ad Boream quidem terminatur oceano Hyperboreo appellato, ab Oriente vero oceano qui vocatur Hibernicus, a Meridie vero oceano Virgivio; sexdecim habet gentes; undecim civitates insignes; fluvios insignes quindecim; quinque prænominata insignia et insulas insignes sex." "Juvèrnia (Ireland), a British isle, is bounded on the north by the ocean called the Hyperborean; on the east, by the sea which is called the Hibernian; and on the south, by the Virgivan sea; it contains sixteen nations, and eleven famous cities, fifteen large rivers, five great promontories, and six remarkable islands." The Hyperborean here mentioned, is the Northern sea; the Hibernian, is the Irish sea, between central Ireland and Great Britain; and the Virgivan sea, is St. George's Channel, between Southern Ireland and England; St. George's Channel and the Irish sea were called Seythica Vallis, or the Seythian valley, by Gildas, the British historian in the sixth century, as it was the sea that separated the Seythians or Irish Scots from Britain.

bute from O'Connor Roe, viz.:—six pence from every quarter of his estate, and returned home through Beallach Buidhe, without sustaining any injury, after having spoiled Moylurg. After that O'Donnell entered Brefney, and his forces burned the best wooden house which was in Ireland then, viz.:—the house of Mac Consnamha (now the name of Ford, a family near Lough Allen in Leitrim), situated near Lough Allen, and the entire of Brefney, from the mountain westward, was spoiled and laid waste by them on that expedition.

Hugh Buighe O'Donnell committed great depredations in Gallenga (Gallen, in Mayo).

O'Donnell marched with a force, in the month of September, against Mac William Burke, on which occasion he destroyed a great portion of the country; after which a peace was concluded between them, and O'Donnell returned safe to his home.

The earl of Kildare, i. e. Gerald, the son of Gerald, who had been imprisoned with the King of England for a long time, returned to Ireland, accompanied by a Saxon lord justice (Sir William Skeffington), and they both committed great destruction on the Irish; they took O'Reilly prisoner, after having appeared before them on their own assurance of protection.

Roderick, the son of Owen, son of Hugh Balbh, son of John O'Dogherty, who was a great loss in his own country, died.

The daughter of O'Boyle, i. e. Rose, the daughter of Torlogh, son of Niall Roe, a charitable and hospitable woman; and Sile (Julia), the daughter of O'Fallon, the wife of Carbry, the son of the prior, a woman distinguished for her humanity and good personal figure, died.

Hugh O'Flanagan, the son of the parson of Inis-Maighe-Samh (Inismacsaint, in Fermanagh), a man learned in philosophy and arts, a pleasant and prosperous man, who kept a good house of general hospitality, died.

A. D. 1531.

Tuathal, the son of O'Neill, i. e. the son Art, son of Con, was taken prisoner by O'Neill, namely, Con, the son of Con.

Mac Carthy Riavach, i. e. Donal, the son of Fingin, son of Dermod, lord of Hy Carbery (in Cork), a man of good government and regulations, of great hospitality and generosity, a man who gave general invitation to all the men of Ireland who wished to avail themselves of it, died.

Donogh, the son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, tanist of Thomond, a man of hospitality and nobility, died.

The son of O'Dogherty, i. e. Niall, the son of Conor Carrach, died.

Con, the son of John Buighe Mac Mahon, was killed by Mac Mahon, and the sons of Bryan Mac Mahon.

Owen, the son of Gillpatrick Oge Maguire, was killed by his brother Edmond.

Conor, the son of Cathal, son of Dun Maguire, was killed by the people of Iochtar Tire.

O'Flanagan, of Tura (in Fermanagh), i. e. Manus, the son of Gilbert, son of Cormac, a distinguished nobleman, who kept an open house of general hospitality, died on the 25th of February; and Gillaisa, the son of Torlogh, was nominated the O'Flanagan.

Murtogh, the son of Conor Mac Coghlan, prior of Gallen, and vicar of Leth Manchain (both in King's county), was treacherously put to death by Torlogh Oge O'Melaghlin, aided by Roderick.

Dermod, the son of John Mac Hugh, the most distinguished man for nobleness and humanity of the tribe of Hugh, the son of Mulroona, died.

Cormac, the son of Cathal Oge, son of Cathal Mac Manus, a noble keeper of a house of hospitality, died.

Tuathal, the son of O'Donnellan, of Machaire Maonmaighe (the plain of Maonmoy, in Galway), and Gillpatrick, the son of Adam Mac Ward, died.

The son of Maguire, i. e. Cormac, made a hostile incursion into Kinel Feradhaidh (in Tyrone), where he took a prey from the son of Bryan O'Neill, and slew the son of Bryan himself, while endeavouring to recover his property; and Maguire's son carried off with him the booty.

The Saxon lord justice; the earl of Kildare, and some of the chiefs of the Irish, marched with an army into Tyrone, at the instigation of O'Donnell, of Niall Oge O'Neill, and of the tribe of Hugh O'Neill; they burned Tyrone, from Dungal to Avonmore (the river Blackwater); they demolished the new castle of Purt-an-Failleagain, and devastated, by fire and sword, the estate of Bryan-na-Moicheirghe (O'Neill), and Monaghan was abandoned before them. O'Donnell and Niall joined those English forces at Ceann Ard (Kinnard, now Caledon, in Tyrone), and they demolished the castle of Kinnard. O'Neill was at this time before them, with an immense force, and they did not therefore attempt to pass him into Tyrone; so those forces respectively returned to their homes, without O'Neill making peace with them, or ceasing from hostilities.

Roderick Gallda, the son of O'Neill, was taken prisoner by O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Con.

Hugh Oge, the son of Thomas, son of Thomas, son of the Giolla Duv Maguire, died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

James O'Flanagan, the son of the parson of Inch, a man who bore a great name and eminence in his own country, died.

The town of O'Donnelly (Ballydonnelly in Tyrone, now Charlemont), was assaulted by Niall Oge, the son of Art, son of Con O'Neill; he demolished the castle, and took prisoner the son of O'Neill, the foster-brother of O'Donnelly; he carried him away, together with the horses, and the valuable property of the town.

The castle of Belleek (near Ballyshannon), was taken by Hugh Buighe O'Donnell, from which resulted the disturbance of Tirconnell.

Maguire marched with his forces into Tirconnell, at the instigation of O'Donnell, because the sons of O'Donnell were contending with each other, lest the one should be elected to the government in preference to the other, after their father's death, for the fame and renown of Manus O'Donnell spread not only through Tirconnell, but also through all other parts of Ireland, and he was at the same time in contention with his own kinsmen. O'Donnell feared that they might commit fratricide on each other, and that consequently his own power would be weakened in consequence; and it was therefore he invited Maguire to his place, to see if they could bring Manus into a state of subordination, and get him on amicable terms with his relatives. Maguire and Hugh Buighe O'Donnell, marched with their forces, until they arrived at the river Finn, and preyed all that part of the country, from one end to the other, which was then under the jurisdiction of Manus; at that time Manus was on the plain of Castlefinn, with the entire of his forces, and the sons of Manus, with a portion of his people, proceeded across Sgairbh Becoige, to protect the town, and to meet and oppose the forces which were then marching against them; but, however, they were defeated by Maguire, and by Hugh Buighe, and were obliged to take refuge in the castle; one of the O'Gallaghers belonging to the country of Manus, made a thrust of a spear at Torlogh, the son of Donogh, son of Bryan, son of Philip Maguire, by which he was mortally wounded, after which he was conveyed to his house, where he died in the course of three nights, after the victory of repentance. All parties then returned home to their fortresses.

A. D. 1532.

Thomas (Butler), the son of Pierce Roc, i. e. the earl of Ormond, was slain in Ossory by Dermot Mac Gillpatrick, heir to the lordship of Ossory. It was not long after that before Dermot was delivered up by his own brother, Mac Gillpatrick, into the hands of the earl, who confined him in chains in revenge of his son, and of every other evil deed Dermot had committed against him to that time.

O'Carroll, i. e. Maolroona, the most distinguished man of his tribe for renown, valour, prosperity and excellence, to whom poets, travellers, ecclesiastics, and literary men were most thankful, and who gave most entertainment, and bestowed more presents than any other who lived of his lineage died: he who was the supporting mainstay of all persons; the

A. D. 1532.

1. The Elyians were the people of Ely O'Carroll, a territory which comprised, as before explained, the barony of Clonlisk, and the greater part of Ballybritt, in the King's county, with the barony of Lower Ormond, in Tipperary. The territory of Ely O'Carroll formed part of ancient Munster, and the O'Carrolls were princes of Ely O'Carroll, and had their chief castle at Birr, now Parsonstown, in the King's county. As stated in the text, O'Carroll was relative, by marriage, to the earl of Kildare, for the earl's daughter was married to Mulroona O'Carroll, the celebrated prince of Ely whose death is here recorded; and another of the earl's daughters, according to Lodge, was married to Bryan O'Connor, lord of Offaley, which connexions were some of the charges brought against the earl of Kildare when he was confined by Henry VIII. in the Tower of London, where he died, for by the statute of Kilkenny, it was punished as treason if persons of English descent should form any fosterage or intermarriages with the Milesian Irish. The ordnance above mentioned in the text, and called Falkein, were those pieces of cannon at that time denominated Falcons, as they bore the shape of falcons.

rightful victorious rudder of his race ; the powerful young warrior in the march of tribes ; the active triumphant champion of Munster ; a precious stone, a carbuncle gem ; the anvil of knowledge, and the golden pillar of the Elyans¹ ; he died in his own fortress, on the festival day of St. Matthew the Evangelist, and his son Fearganainm was appointed his successor. On the same day, before the death of Maolroona, his sons defeated the earl of Ormond, and the sons of John O'Carroll, and took from them many horses, and some ordnance, which were called Fabcuin, from which followed the name Bel-atha-na-bhFabcuin to the ford where they gained that battle, and that was Maolroona's last victory. Fearganainm, as we have mentioned, was nominated the O'Carroll over his seniors, namely, the sons of John O'Carroll, on account of which great troubles arose in the country, for the sons of John, in the first place, took the castle of Birr, from which they continued to spoil the country ; the son of the parson O'Carroll fell by the son of O'Carroll, i. e. Teige Caoch, on the plain of Birr, in consequence of which O'Carroll, i. e. Fearganainm, brought his relative by marriage, the earl of Kildare, lord justice of Ireland, to attack the sons of John, and they took the castle of Kill Iurin, Caislean-na-Hegailse, and the castle of Balindooney ; they then encamped in the house of the son of Biorra (the monastery of Birr), and continued skirmishes were carried on between them and the guards of the castle, until the earl received a ball in his side, which was fired from the castle, when they stormed the castle and took it ; the earl then returned, but the ball continued lodged in him until the following spring, when it came out on the other side. It was to record the death of Maolroona O'Carroll the following was composed :

"One thousand and five hundred,
And two and thirty years,
From the birth of Christ who saved us,
To the harvest in which O'Carroll died."

Owen, son of Tiarnan, son of Owen O'Rourke, a distinguished gentleman, was killed by O'Mulvey and his kinsmen, in the monastery of Dromahaire.

Torlogh, the son of Mac Clancy (of Dartry, in Leitrim), was killed by his own two brothers, in the door of Mac Clancy's castle ; and Bryan

O'Rourke, in revenge of this slaying, committed great destruction in Dartry.

Mary, the daughter of Mac Sweeney of Fanat, the wife of O'Boyle, died suddenly, after having been pitched from her horse at the door of her own mansion, on the 21st of April.

Mac Quillan, i. e. Walter, the son of Gerald, was slain in the church of Dunboe (in Derry), and Conor, the son of O'Kaue, a man of affluence and great property, was burned in it ; and Mac Conuladh, i. e. James, the son of Art, son of Culadh, was taken prisoner by the sons of Donal Cleirach O'Kane.

Bryan, the coarb of Fenagh, died ; Cormac O'Hultachan, erenach of Aughavea, died.

Mac Gauran, i. e. the son of Manus, son of Thomas, chief of Tullaghaw, died.

John, the son of Philip, the son of Torlogh, son of Philip Maguire, was killed by Donal, the son of Maguire, i. e. the son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, with the thrust of a dagger.

O'Maolconry, i. e. Torna, the son of Torna, died ; and Conor, the son of Donal Roe, was nominated the O'Maolconry, as his successor, and he died shortly after.

O'Donnell and Maguire proceeded to the Saxon lord justice William Skeffington, and after they confirmed their friendship with each other, the lord justice accompanied them into Tyrone, and they demolished Dungannon, and spoiled the country.

The earl of Kildare, i. e. Gerald, the son of Gerald, returned to Ireland after being appointed lord justice by the king.

O'Donnell, accompanied by Mac Donnell, namely, Alexander, the son of John Cathanach, marched with a force into Moylurg ; and after O'Donnell had preyed and burned Moylurg, Mac Dermod paid him his tribute at length, after which he granted him peace.

The sons of O'Neill, namely, the sons of Art Oge, Donal, and Tuathal, who were in imprisonment with O'Neill for a long time, were hanged by him.

The castle of Ardnaree (in Sligo), was taken by the sons of O'Dowd from the son of John Burke, and a great contest arose between them and the family of Rickard Burke, and they committed great depredations and slaughter on each other.

Awful depredations and immense plunders were committed by Niall Oge O'Neill, on Ruibilin Mac Donnell, and he carried off the spoils into Fer-managh.

Cormac, the son of Maguire, was treacherously taken prisoner by the sons of O'Neill, namely, Feardorcha, the son of Con, son of Con; and Felim Doiblenach, the son of Art Oge, son of Con O'Neill; a number of his horsemen were slain, among whom were William, the son of Dermod, son of Cormac Mac Caffrey; Giolla Ballach, the son of Henry Buighe Mac Caffrey, with many others, and some others were taken prisoners; the sons of O'Neill did not however return safe, for the greater portion of their people were beaten and wounded, along with Felim, the son of O'Neill.

A. D. 1533.

Mac Dermott of Moylurg, namely Dermod, the son of Roderick, son of Dermod, was treacherously slain by the sons of Owen, the son of Teige Mac Dermott; and Owen, the son of Teige, assumed the lordship after him.

O'Mulloy, i. e. Donal Caoch, the son of Cosnamhach, lord of Fercall (in King's county), was treacherously killed by his own brother Peregrine, and by his brother's son, Art, on the plain of Laimnela, and his brother Cahir was nominated the O'Mulloy.

Felim Bacach, the son of Niall, son of Con O'Neill, died.

The two sons of Felim, the son of Roderick Bacach O'Neill, were slain by Manus O'Donnell.

Edmond, the son of Con, son of Niall, son of Art, was killed by the sons of Maguire.

The castle of Sligo was taken by Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Hugh O'Connor, in a nocturnal assault, after the castle had been betrayed and given up by the guards. The castle of Ard-naree was in a like manner taken at night by the sons of Thomas Burke, from the sons of O'Dowd.

O'Donnell committed great depredations on O'Hara Buighe, between the two rivers (Ballinacarra river, and Coolaney river, called Abhain Bhuidhe, both in the barony of Lieney, county of Sligo), in consequence of O'Hara not paying him his tribute.

Niall, the son of Murrough Mac Sweeney, the best and most accomplished young man of his tribe, was killed on the bridge of Sligo.

Murtogh, the son of Felim, son of Torlogh Carrach O'Connor, was hanged by O'Donnell on the lawn of the castle of Eanach after his sons and kinsmen refused to deliver up the castle to him.

The earl of Kildare marched a second time into Ely, to aid Fearganaim O'Carroll, to Suidhe-an-Roin (Shinrone, in King's county); while besieging the castle, one of his best constables was slain, and after having taken the castle, he returned home. Anthony Carrach, the son of John, was nominated O'Carroll, in opposition to Fearganaim, in consequence of which warlike contentions arose in Ely.

Cormac Mac Coghlan, lord of Clan Conor died.

Cahir Mac Coghlan, archdeacon of Clonmacnois, died.

A. D. 1534.

O'Connor Roe (of Roscommon), i. e. Teige Buighe, the son of Cathal, died, and his son, Torlogh Roe, was nominated the O'Connor.

Mac Dermott of Moylurg, i. e. Owen, died at the Rock, after having been a year in the lordship, during which time Moylurg was in a state of commotion. The abbot of Boyle, namely, Hugh, the son of Cormac Mac Dermott, was nominated the Mac Dermott; but the sons of Teige Mac Dermott took the Rock from him, and the country was not less disturbed during his time.

Owen, the son of Hugh, son of Niall, son of Con (O'Neill of Clanneboy), the best man that lived of the race of Hugh Buighe, was killed by some Scots with the cast of a dart, on Lough Cuan (Strangford Lough, in Down).

Torlogh Duv O'Dempsey was treacherously killed by his own kinsman, Murtogh Oge O'Dempsey, while under the protection of God and St. Eimhin (in the sanctuary of Monastereven, in Kildare), and Murtogh Oge himself was slain after that in a conflict, by O'Moore, through the miracles of God and St. Evin.

O'Gallagher, i. e. Edmond, the son of John, son of Tuathal, died suddenly.

Cormac, the son of Fergal Mac Ward, a man learned in poetry, and the most charitable and humane man of his tribe, in his time, died after extreme unction and repentance.

Maolmuire Mac Keogh, the intended chief professor of poetry in Leinster, a man of learning and of extensive knowledge in poetry, and who kept a good house of hospitality, was accidentally killed by his mother's brethren, namely, the sons of O'Toole.

Manus Buighe O'Duigenan was strangled by his own wife at night.

Great complaints and accusations were forwarded by the English nobles and the council to the king of England, Henry VIII., against the lord justice, the earl of Kildare, namely, Gerald Oge, the son of Gerald, son of Thomas, who then possessed the supreme power and government of Ireland; the earl proceeded to the king's residence to make his defence, but it was of no avail to him, as he was taken prisoner, and sent to the Tower, where he remained imprisoned for a year, during which time they carried on proceedings against him; the earl left, at his departure for England, the king's sword of state in the possession of his son Thomas, although others state that William Skeffington succeeded him as lord justice.

A. D. 1535.

The earl of Kildare, lord justice of Ireland, Gerald Oge, the son of Gerald, son of Thomas, the most illustrious of the Irish, and of the English of Ireland, in his time, for his fame and renown had spread not only throughout all Ireland, but his greatness and noble exploits were heard of in the distant countries of foreign nations, died in imprisonment in London. After that Thomas, the earl's son, prepared to be revenged on the English for his father's death, and upon all those who conspired to have him expelled from Ireland; he gave up the king's sword, and committed many evils against the English; the archbishop of Dublin, who was his father's enemy, and many others along with him, came by their death through him; he took Dublin from Newgate outwards, and received hostages and prisoners from the rest of the town, through their fear of him; he completely plundered and laid waste all Fingall, and from Slieve Roe to Drogheda, and all Meath was made to tremble by the earl's son on that occasion. When the king obtained intelligence of this, he sent relief to the English, namely, William Skeffington as lord justice, accompanied by Leonard

Gray, and a large fleet, and they immediately commenced to spoil all the possessions of the earl's son; they took the castle of Thomas, namely, Magh Nuadhat (Maynooth in Kildare), his residence, and expelled him from his own territory; his father's five brothers, namely, James Meirgeach, Oliver, John, Walter, and Richard, also rose up against Thomas, to aid the English, for they expected that one of themselves should obtain the earldom, if Thomas could be conquered. When the forementioned Saxons found it impossible to take Thomas prisoner, after depriving him of his towns and manors, and banishing him to seek the protection of the Irish of the south of Ireland, particularly the O'Briens and O'Conor Faily, all of whom were combined in a powerful confederacy to carry on the war against them (the English), they, in council, came to the resolution of offering him a pretended peace, and then taking him by treachery. They accordingly sent lord Leonard to the earl's son, and he promised him pardon on behalf of the king, so that he cajoled him to go with him to England, where the earl's son was immediately made prisoner, and sent to be closely confined in the king's Tower. Lord Leonard then returned to Ireland, and William Skeffington, who was lord justice, having died, he (lord Leonard Gray), succeeded as lord justice, and brought to his residence the sons of the great earl of Kildare, i. e. Gerald, the son of Thomas, namely, James Meirgeach, Oliver, John, Walter, and Richard, and they were some time in his company and friendship, but finally he made them prisoners, although they were under his protection, and they were immediately conveyed to the king's Tower, where the heir to the earldom, namely, Thomas, was, so that the six were confined there. (See A. D. 1537).

Eigneachan, the son of Donal O'Donnell, was killed by the sons of O'Boyle.

Judith, the daughter of O'Neill, i. e. of Con, the son of Henry, son of Owen, the wife of Manus O'Donnell, died on the 21st of August, in the prime of life and dignity; she was the most illustrious woman of her age, in her time, for piety and hospitality, and was only 42 years of age when she departed this life, and was interred with great solemnity in the Franciscan monastery of Donegal.

Mac Sweeney of Tir Boghaine, i. e. Maolmurry

More, the son of Niall Mac Sweeney, was treacherously slain by his own brother Niall, at the door of Mac Sweeney's castle at Rathain, on the festival of SS. Peter and Paul.

Ferdorcha Mac Coghlan, lord of Delvin Eathra (in King's county), died, and Felim, the son of Myler Mac Coghlan, became his successor.

Fingin, the son of Conla Mac Coghlan, was killed by Fearganainm, the son of Ferdorcha.

Murtogh Mac Donogh, the son of Murrogh, and his two sons, John Glas and Fergal, were slain at Moy Imleach, by O'Hara Buighe, after they had been treacherously betrayed by one of their own people.

Mac Auliffe (a chief in the county of Cork), gained a great battle, in which the lord of Claonglaise, and Mac Gibbon, with a large number of the Clan Sithieh (Mac Sheecheys), were slain; Maolmurry, the son of Bryan Mac Sweeney, the constable of Mac Auliffe, was also slain in the beginning of the engagement.

Malachy, the son of Carbry O'Beirne, was slain by the sons of Cathal, the son of Mac Dermott.

A. D. 1536.

The monastery of Dromahaire was accidentally burned by night while all persons were asleep, and Heremon O'Donnell, a friar minor, was burned in it, and a great deal of property also destroyed.

Many diseases and distempers raged this year, viz., a general plague, the Galar breac (the small pox), the flux and fever, of which many died.

Cormac Oge, the son of Cormac, son of Teige Mac Carthy, one of the most worthy of the Irish of Leath Mogha, died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil, and was buried at Kilcrea, (in the county of Cork).

Mac William of Clanrickard, i. e. John, the son of Rickard, son of Edmond, died, after which a great contention arose in Clanrickard, about the lordship, whereupon they nominated two Mac Williams in the territory, namely, Richard Bacach (the Lame), the son of Ulick, and Ulick, the son of Rickard Oge, and in the contest Ulick-na-gCean (Ulick of the Heads), aided Richard Bacach.

O'Reilly, i. e. Fergal, the son of John, son of Cathal, lord of Ily Briane and Conmaicne (Cavan, and part of Leitrim), a generous, mild, upright, benevolent, and very hospitable man, died after communion and sacraments.

Mac Claney, chief of Dartree (in Leitrim), i. e. Feradach (Frederick), the son of William, a charitable and humane man, died.

Thomas O'Higgin, chief professor in poetry of the men of Ireland and Scotland, died.

Felim, the son of Felim O'Rourke, died while imprisoned by Bryan, the son of Owen, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke.

Cathal, the son of Seoinin, son of John O'Mulmoieherghe, a man of lasting hospitality and affluence, died.

The chiefs of North Connaught, namely, Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Hugh; Teige, the son of Cathal Oge O'Connor, the Mac Donoghs, and the O'Dowds, marched against the sept of Rickard Burke, at the instigation of the bishop Barrett (Richard Barrett, bishop of Killala). The people of the country fled before them, with their property, to the Termon of Tiarnan Oiridh (monastery of Erew, in the parish of Crossmolina, county of Mayo), but the bishop carried off the preys out of the Termon to the forces, and would not restore them, in honour of the saint.

Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Hugh, son of Torlogh Carraeh O'Connor, was nominated the O'Connor; and he was the first person who was nominated O'Connor in North Connaught, of the sept of Bryan Luighneach, for Mac Donail Mac Muircheartaigh was the title borne by the chief who was head of that sept until then; it was for the purpose of ennobling and honouring the lords who preceded him that he assumed this new title. This new O'Connor, and the son of Cathal Oge O'Connor, made a hostile incursion against the Clan Costello, but not having succeeded in taking a prey, or gaining any booty, they encamped about Kilcoleman (in the barony of Costello, county of Mayo), the town of the son of Roderick Mac Costello, who came forth and surrendered himself to O'Connor, on condition that he would spare his town; and he presented to O'Connor a splendid coat of mail, which was then in his possession, but which coat of mail had been formerly the property of Bermingham. O'Connor returned to Sligo with his hostage (Mac Costello), until he should receive a full ransom for his redemption.

At that time war and contentions arose between O'Donnell and all the chiefs of North Connaught, except alone Bryan, the son of Owen O'Rourke, for he did not aid any of them at that time; in consequence of that contention, O'Donnell collected his army, and was joined by his sons, except Manus, who did not come with his father's forces on that occasion, being influenced by O'Neill. O'Donnell's army was joined by Maguire, i.e. Cucconacht (Constantine); the son of O'Neill, Niall Oge, the son of Art; the son of O'Reilly, i.e. Aodh (Hugh), the son of Maolmora (Miles), with all the troops of O'Reilly; the Mac Sweeneys and O'Boyles came in O'Donnell's army as usual. These forces marched from Ballyshannon about the close of the day, and they halted and encamped between the rivers Duff and Drowis (on the borders of Leitrim and Sligo). After having taken their dinners and refreshments, they sent scouts and sentinels to watch the pass between them and Moycedne (the plain along the sea shore, on the borders of Leitrim and Sligo), because they dreaded that the O'Conors with their forces would attack them in their encampment, for they were then all collected in Sligo, fully armed and anxious to attack, and resolved to give battle to O'Donnell as soon as they encountered each other. The first person of the forces (of O'Donnell) who went to guard the pass was O'Boyle, namely, Niall, the son of Torlogh, who hoped he should encounter his enemies, to exercise his vengeance on them. The party of Hugh Buighe, the son of O'Donnell, proceeded to guard in another direction, without the knowledge of O'Boyle, or any of his party, and both parties happened to meet, and they did not recognise each other, in consequence of O'Boyle having engaged in conflict, and having fought so fiercely and precipitately against his enemies, as he thought, so that he slew a great number of them in a short time, and while he was contending with them in that manner, they encircled him, and he was at length slain by his own faithful friends, on the second day of the kalends of August; and the death of Niall, son of Torlogh, was a great loss to the poor, the indigent, the clergy and soldiers. Although this great loss was a source of tribulation to O'Donnell, it did not, however, prevent his expedition, and he proceeded forward to Sinnfhir, and a body of the cavalry of Cathal

Oge, composed of the O'Harts, having marched to Braghaid Chuillighe, a party of O'Donnell's cavalry proceeded to oppose them, and both parties having encountered at Ballagh-Duin-Iarain (in the barony of Carbury, in Sligo), a brave horseman of the O'Harts was slain in the conflict, after which both parties withdrew. O'Donnell remained in his camp that night, and on the following morning he marched to Fearsad-Ranna-an-Liagain (a pass on the river of Sligo, which flows from Lough Gill), to cross into Cuil-Irrae. O'Connor was at this time in Sligo, preparing his people to march against O'Donnell to prevent him from crossing at the pass. While the tide was in, the forces on both sides were closely watching, and reconnoitering each other. O'Connor perceiving that he had not equal forces to oppose O'Donnell, came to the resolution not to engage him in that place, and he and his forces, being dismayed and terrified at the approach of O'Donnell, he arranged and marshalled his men, and after preparing their guns and accoutrements at the verge of the pass, he marched them off to another more secure place. O'Donnell then crossed the pass unopposed, as the place was left unguarded and undefended; after that, some of the chiefs of North Connaught sent flying parties to attack O'Donnell's forces, but they were, however, met and opposed by the other party, and a man who was a great loss to the Mac Donoghs was slain on that occasion, namely, Malachy, the son of Teige, son of Roderick, who fell by the shot of a ball, and another horseman of O'Donnell's forces, namely, James Ballach, the son of Niall, son of John (O'Donnell), was slain by a thrust of a spear. After that they retired, and O'Donnell then proceeded into the territory of the tribe of Bryan O'Connor, in which he remained for three nights, spoiling and burning the country, during which time O'Connor remained encamped near him at Belandroichid. He (O'Donnell), then marched westward across the strand, into Tireragh of the Moy, and his forces destroyed much corn and many towns, for the entire country was in his power, except a few of its castles, and they seized upon much cattle about the Ox mountain; they marched westward across the river Moy, at the instigation of the sept of Rickard Burke, in pursuit of some of the cattle preys belonging to the O'Dowds, and on that occasion, they happened to meet with the daughter of Walter Burke, the wife of Owen O'Dowd, while carrying away her property. The prey and booty seized on that expedition by O'Donnell's forces was so immense, that two beeves were frequently given for a Bonn (a piece of money which varied from a groat to a shilling), in his camp at that time. Mac Dermott, the sons of Teige Mac Dermott, and the sons of Mac David, came to aid the people of North Connaught, against O'Donnell. After having completed his expedition in Tireragh, O'Donnell prepared to return home. The chiefs of North Connaught, and those forces which came to aid them, put on a firm resolution of giving battle to O'Donnell on his return, but they gave him a feeble and flying attack, at the pass of Rinn-an-Liagain. The cause of this place being called Rinn-an-Liagain was, that Liagan, a heroic warrior of the Fomorians, was slain there by Lughaidh Lamhfada (a king of the Danans), while on his march to the battle of Moytuire, and from him it derived its name. It was during that skirmishing attack, while O'Donnell's forces were crossing this pass, that a horseman of the people of Cathal Oge O'Connor, namely, Hugh Ballach, the son of Bryan, son of Hugh, was slain, and the son of Mac Dermott, i. e. Hugh, the son of Owen, son of Teige, was deeply wounded. O'Donnell returned home without receiving rent, tribute, submission, or homage from the chiefs of North Connaught on that occasion, which was an unusual occurrence with him.

Donogh, the son of Teige, son of Roderick, son of Conor, son of Teige, son of Tomaltach, son of Maurice Mac Donogh, was nominated the Mac Donogh, although Mac Donogh himself was not dead at the time, namely Owen, the son of Donogh, son of Murrough, who, however, was near the termination of his age, having lost his sight. A contention arose between the sons of Owen and Mac Donogh about the lordship, but nothing of consequence was spoiled between them.

The Giolla Duv, the son of Hugh, son of Roderick O'Connor, died.

O'Connor Sligo; Bryan, the son of O'Rourke, and the son of Cathal Oge O'Connor, marched with their forces, at the request of Mac Dermott, and of the sons of Teige Mac Dermott, against Torlogh Roe, the son of Teige Buighe, the son of Cathal Roe O'Connor. They spoiled the Cluainte

(a district in Roscommon), both the churches and country; from thence they passed into the Tuatha (also in Roscommon), and the O'Hanleys gave them hostages and prisoners in behalf of their territory. They then proceeded into Hy Maine, and they spoiled and completely plundered every person who was friendly to O'Connor Roe, except those who were protected by O'Rourke's son, for it was not to plunder he went thither, but rather to make peace between Mac Dermott, his kinsmen, and O'Connor Roe, together with those who joined either party in the contest. Caislean-an-Turraig (the castle of Turrick, in Galway), was taken and demolished by these forces, and Donogh, the son of Edmond O'Kelly, came and surrendered himself to them, lest his country should be spoiled. Those forces then returned, after having completed their expedition to their satisfaction, and took the hostages with them to Sligo, namely, the son of O'Kelly and the son of O'Hanley; they also carried away the speckled portal-door of the castle they had taken, to put it on the gateway of the castle of Sligo.

The Saxon lord justice marched westward with an army into Munster, and to Carricocainnell (the castle of Carrickagonnell, near Limerick), and broke down Murrough O'Brien's bridge (O'Brien's-bridge in Clare), and some say that Donogh, the son of O'Brien, was concerned in instigating the lord justice to undertake that expedition.

Bryan Ballach, the son of Owen, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, was nominated the O'Rourke, and he demolished Caislean-an-Chairthe (the castle of Glencar, in Leitrim).

Donal, the son of Donogh O'Kelly, an experienced commander and tanist of Hy Maine, from Caraidh to Grian (in the counties of Roscommon and Galway), and Eigneachan, son of Malachy, son of Donogh, his brother's son, were both treacherously slain by Malachy, the son of William, son of Malachy O'Kelly, at the Fews of Athlone, at the instigation of the sons of Donal's own brother, i. e. the sons of Teige, the son of Donogh O'Kelly.

The sons of Mac William of Clanrickard, namely, John Duv and Edmond Roe, the sons of Rickard, the son of Ulick, were slain by the sons of the other Mac William, namely, the sons of Rickard Oge, after they were overtaken in a pursuit, while carrying off the preys of the country.

Mac Costello, i. e. John, the son of Giolla Duv, a bounteous and very hospitable man, and a distinguished military commander in noble exploits, was treacherously killed by a party of his own kinsmen.

O'Connor Faily, i. e. Bryan, the son of Cahir, was expelled from his territory, and after many of his people had been slain, all his castles were taken and demolished by the Saxon lord justice, i. e. lord Leonard (lord Leonard Gray), and it was through the conspiracy, and at the instigation of O'Connor's own brother, Cathal Roe, these acts were perpetrated.

Donogh O'Carroll deposed Ferganainm, and Anthony Carrach, his brother, and deprived them both of their lordship.

A. D. 1537.

A contention arose between Hugh Buighe O'Donnell and Manus O'Donnell; Hugh, who was in possession of the castle of Donegal, was aided by the sons of O'Boyle; a great commotion spread throughout Tirconnell, on account of the contentions carried on between the sons of O'Donnell, and through this a great many of the tribe of the bishop O'Gallagher were slain by the sons of O'Boyle, namely, the son of Torlogh Oge, the son of Bryan, and the two sons of Owen Ballach, the son of Bryan, with many others.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Hugh Roe, the son of Niall Garv, son of Torlogh of the Wine, lord of Tirconnell, Inisowen, Kinel Moain, Fermanagh, and North Connaught; a man to whom rents and tributes had been paid by other territories over which he had jurisdiction and power, such as Moylurg, Machaire Chonacht (the plain of Connaught, in Roscommon), Clan Conway (in Galway), Costello, Gallen, Tyrawley, and Conmaicne Cuile (all four territories in Mayo), in the west; and in the east O'Kane's country (in Derry), the Routes (in Antrim), and Clannaboy (in Down and Antrim); for of all those territories there was none that had not given him tributes, besides willing payments for his protection. It was this man that compelled the four lords (the O'Neills), who ruled in Tyrone in his time, to give him new charts (or deeds) of Inisowen, Kinel Moain, and Fermanagh, to confirm the old charts which his ancestors held for these territories, so that the government and the service of all their forces were peaceably and submissively under his control; this was not to be wondered at, for his enemies never gained a victory over him, nor did he ever retreat one foot from any force, whether small or great; he was a man distinguished for repressing evil deeds and bad practices, for destroying and banishing rebels and plunderers; a rigid enforcer of the established laws and ordinances; a man during whose time the seasons had been favourable, so that both sea and land had been fruitful and productive during his government; a man who had established every person in his country in his rightful inheritance, so that none of them might bear enmity to another; a man who had not suffered the English power to come into his country, for he had formed a league of peace and amity with the king of England, as soon as he saw that the Irish would not submit to the superiority of any one among themselves, but that friends and relations fiercely contended against each other; a man who properly protected from violation the sacred properties belonging to the religious orders, ecclesiastics, poets and professors. The forementioned O'Donnell, namely Hugh, the son of Hugh Roe, died on the 5th of July, being Thursday, in the monastery of Donegal, having previously taken upon him the habit of St. Francis, having repented his transgressions and faults, and done penance for his sins and the frailties of his life, and was buried in the same monastery with great honours and solemnity, which were his due; Manus O'Donnell was inaugurated his successor by the coarbs of Columkille¹, with the permission and consent of the nobles of Tirconnell, both lay and ecclesiastical.

Maguire, i. e. Cuchonacht, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, lord of Fermanagh, a charitable, humane man, the most distinguished of the race of Clan Colla that had lived for a long time for manual exploits, nobility, and hospitality, and who brought all from Clones to Caol Uisge (the Narrow Water, on the river Erne, near Ballyshannon) under his jurisdiction; a man who

A. D. 1537.

1. The Coarbs of Columkille, that is, the successors of St. Columkille, who were abbots of Derry; of Raphoe and Kilmacrennan in Donegal; and of Drumcliffe in Sligo; over all which territories it appears the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell, extended their authority.

suppressed plunderers and evil doers, a man who was prosperous and wealthy during his time, wastreachersously slain on Creachan in Lough Erne, namely, the Island of the Friars, by the tribes of Thomas Maguire and of Torlogh Maguire, namely Flaherty, the son of Philip, son of Torlogh, and was first buried at Devinish, but in some time after his remains were exhumed by the Friars Minor, and conveyed to the monastery of Donegal, where they were re-interred by the friars with due solemnity.

O'Neill, i. e. Con, marched with a force into Trian Congail, and spoiled and plundered a great part of the country; but O'Neill's son, however, was taken prisoner in the rear of the forces, at Belfast, and O'Neill then returned home.

Niall Oge, the son of Niall, son of Con O'Neill, lord of Trian Congail (O'Neill, lord of Clannaboy, in Down and Antrim), died suddenly at that time; O'Neill returned again into Trian Congail, and obtained his son, who was in imprisonment there; contentions and disputes arose in Trian Congail about the lordship.

Niall, the son of Hugh, son of Niall, son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe, heir to the lordship of Trian Congail, a man who was likely to follow in the footsteps of his ancestors, in nobility and hospitality, in patronising learned men and exiles, was slain by the Scots.

The son of O'Reilly, namely, Bryan, the son of Fergal, an immense loss in his own country, was slain by the people of the Saxon lord justice, who had gone to make depredations in Clan Mahon (in the county of Cavan).

The son of Mac Sweeney, i. e. Maolmurry, was killed by the sons of Murrough Mac Sweeney.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, marched with a force into North Connaught, in the month of September, spoiled much corn, and burned and overran the entire of North Connaught, namely, Carbury, Tireragh, the two Lieney's, Corran, and Tirerrill

(all in Sligo). On that expedition the town of O'Hara Riavach was taken by O'Donnell, and after O'Hara himself was in his power, he extended to him his protection and mercy, and carried him away prisoner to his house.

O'Gara, i. e. Owen, the son of Dermot, son of Owen, lord of Coolavin (in Sligo), died.

Teige, the son of Hugh, son of Hugh Mac Connamha (Ford), chief of Muintir Kenny (in Leitrim), died.

The son of O'Reilly, namely, Cahir Modardha (Cahir the Stern), the son of John, son of Cathal, was slain by the English, while in pursuit of his property.

The son of O'Dogherty, i. e. Niall Caoch, the son of Gerald, son of Donal, son of Felim, was slain in a nocturnal attack by Roderick, the son of Felim O'Dogherty, at Baile-na-gCananach, in the Termon of Derry.

O'Flanagan of Tura, i. e. Gillaisa, and his son, were slain by his own kindred, and much damage was done in Fermanagh, both by burning and plundering, after the death of Maguire.

Depredations and burnings were committed by the Calvach O'Donnell, in Clanawley, and he also plundered O'Kane.

O'Conor Faile regained the jurisdiction of his own territory, despite of the Saxon lord justice, and of his own kinsmen, namely, the sons of O'Conor; and many persons were slain by him.

The son of O'Melaghlin, i. e. James, the son of Murrough, was killed by the son of O'Conor Faile; and he was the most illustrious and renowned of his race in his age.

Torlogh Cleireach, i. e. O'Melaghlin, was slain in Calry (in Westmeath), by the sons of Felim, namely, Cedach and Conall, and Art O'Melaghlin assumed the place of O'Melaghlin.

Thomas, the son of the earl of Kildare,² the best man who lived in his time of the English of

2. The Rebellion of Silken Thomas.—The following particulars of the great insurrection commonly called the Rebellion of Silken Thomas, have been collected from Stanihurst, Campion, Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, Lodge's Peerage, the Histories of Moore and Mac Geoghiegan, and various other sources. As already explained at the year 1535, Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, lord deputy of Ireland, was summoned to England in the year 1534, and on various charges was imprisoned in the Tower of London, where he died in the month of December following; on his departure from Ireland he left his son Thomas, then a young man in the 21st year of his age, in his stead as lord deputy. An unfounded report having reached Ireland that the earl had been beheaded in London, lord Thomas, enraged at the news, organised a powerful insurrection against the English government. He was generally called by the Irish Thomas-an-t-Sioda, signifying Thomas of the Silk, from the splendid silken banners borne by his horsemen, and also from their dresses being elegantly embroidered with silk. Lord Thomas was a young man of great spirit, abilities, and valour, but fiery, rash, and impetuous. According to Cox and others, he proceeded from the mansion of the earls of Kildare, in Thomas-court, Dublin, on the 11th of June, 1534, and marched through the city to Dames-gate, accompanied by seven score horsemen in Ireland, and his father's five brothers, as we have before mentioned, namely, James Meirgeach, Oliver, John, Walter, and Richard, were put to death in England, on the 3rd of the Nones of February ; their coats of mail, with waving plumes in their helmets, and bearing silken hanners ; they crossed the river and proceeded to St. Mary's Abbey, where the council, according to appointment, waited his coming, and attended by many of his armed followers he rushed into the council chamber. The lord Thomas addressed a speech to the council with great vehemence, which is given as follows by Cox :—"Howsoever injuriously we be handled and forced to defend ourselves in arms, when neither our service, nor our good meaning towards our prince's crown availeth, yet say not hereafter but in this open hostility which we here profess and proclaim, we have shewed ourselves no villains nor churls, but warriors and gentlemen. This sword of state is yours, and not mine ; I received it with an oath and used it to your benefit, and I should stain mine honour if I turned the same to your annoyance. Now have I need of mine own sword which I dare trust. As for the common sword it flattereth me with a painted scabbard, but hath indeed a pestilent edge, already bathed in the Geraldine's blood, and now is newly whetted in hope of a further destruction. Therefore save yourselves from us as from open enemies. I am none of Henry's deputies, I am his foe. I have more mind to conquer than to govern, to meet him in the field, than to serve him in office. If all the hearts of England and Ireland that have cause thereto, would join in this quarrel, as I hope they will, then should he soon be made sensible, as I trust he shall, of his tyranny and cruelty, for which the age to come may lawfully score him up among the ancient tyrants of most abominable and hateful memory."

The primate, George Cromer, archbishop of Armagh, and lord chancellor, who was present, besought lord Thomas in a long and pathetic oration (which is given by Cox), the tears trickling down his cheeks, not to enter into rebellion which would cause his destruction, but to retract his hasty declarations, and keep the sword of state, but all to no purpose ; Fitzgerald flung down the sword of state on the council table with great violence and indignation, and departed with his associates ; lord Thomas addressed his soldiers in the Irish language, which it appears was chiefly spoken by all his followers, for it is said they did not understand a word of the speech made by primate Cromer at the council table, and imagined he was making an oration like a bard or Brehon, in favour of Silken Thomas, and cheered him accordingly ; it is stated by Cox that lord Thomas's chief bard, named Nelan, recited a rhapsody in praise of his master. Lord Thomas proceeded to organise his forces, and applied to his cousin, lord James Butler, son of the earl of Ossory, to join in the confederacy, but lord Butler gave him a downright refusal. It is stated by Cox and others, that lord Thomas despatched for assistance Charles Mac Rannall, archdeacon of Kells, as his ambassador, to Pope Paul III., and sir Dominick Poer to the emperor Charles V., to whom he sent as a present twelve great hawks, and fourteen fair horses or hobbies. Lord Thomas was joined by many men of note both of the Anglo-Irish and Irish chiefs, as O'Neill of Tyrone, O'Connor of Offaly, his kinsman, O'Moore of Leix, several of the Fitzgeralds, sir Richard Walsh, who was called parson of Lough Seudy in Westmeath, Peter Lynch, lord of the Knock in Meath, John Burnell of Balgriffin in Fingall, captain James Field of Lusk, De Bathe of Dollard's town, captain James de la Hilde, Oliver Grace, Teeling, Purcell, and many others, amongst whom is mentioned Rouks or Rourks, probably O'Rourke, who is called by Campion a pirate of the seas. Lord Thomas with his troops proceeded to plunder Fingal, and the citizens of Dublin collected their forces, intending to intercept a prey at the bridge of Kilmainham ; they were defeated by Fitzgerald's men near the wood of Salcock, where four score of the citizens were slain. In the mean time John Allen, archbishop of Dublin, and the chief baron Patrick Finglass, got into the castle and fortified it for security, and alderman John Fitzsimon sent into the castle 20 tuns of wine, 24 tuns of beer, two thousand drying ling, 16 hogheads of beef, and various other articles. Archbishop Allen, afraid to stand a siege, left the castle and privately got on board a ship in the Liffey at night, but the vessel was stranded at Cloutarf, and the archbishop proceeded to the adjoining village of Artane, to the house of Mr. Hollywood, where, on the 25th of July, he was taken prisoner by some of lord Thomas's party, and brought before him, on which he said in Irish "Beir uaim an Bodach," that is, "Remove the Churl from my presence," intending, says Cox, to imprison him, but some of Fitzgerald's fierce followers barbarously murdered the bishop in revenge of old resentments, for archbishop Allen had always been a most determined enemy to the Geraldines, having been sent to Ireland for that purpose by cardinal Wolsey, and Allen was chiefly instrumental in having the earl of Kildare summoned to London, where he was imprisoned in the Tower. All the murderers were excommunicated and cursed in tremendous terms, as related by Cox. Lord Thomas made prisoners the haron of Howth and Luttrell, chief justice of the common pleas, and sent some of his captains and forces to besiege the castle of Dublin ; they opened a fire on it with three pieces of ordnance called falcons ; the besiegers being stationed in Sheep-street, now Ship-street, but they were driven thence by the cannon of the castle, and the houses which were thatched, says Cox, were burned by wildfire cast in from the castle ; lord Thomas endeavoured to prevent the supply of water to the city, by stopping all the rivers near Dublin ; he burned Thomas-street, New-street, and other parts of the city, and fortified his men near Thomas-court ; he also besieged Newgate, which was bravely defended by the gaoler, Richard Staunton, who being an excellent marksman, killed many of the besiegers. The citizens made a powerful sally on Fitzgerald's forces, defeated them, and slew one hundred of his galloshes, who left their falcon behind them, and lord Thomas himself was forced to take refuge in the abbey of Grey friars in Francis-street for the night, until he was able to join the remainder of his forces. Fitzgerald then agreed to raise the siege of Dublin, and hostages were delivered between himself and the citizens ; he next proceeded with his forces to Howth, and planted his artillery on the promontory to attack and prevent the landing of the forces coming from England against him, commanded by Musgrave and the two Hamertons ; these two commanders, with 180 soldiers, arrived from England, and on their march to Dublin were encountered near Clontarf by lord Thomas at the head of 200 horsemen, and they fought valiantly, and one of the Hamertons wounded Fitzgerald in the forehead, yet the English forces were mostly all slain, and those who were taken prisoners he sent to the castle of Maynooth ; their ships were forced from Howth, and a vessel freighted with choice English saddle horses was also taken by captain Rourks, whom Cox calls Fitzgerald's pirate. Soon after the Engleby and Daeres, with a body of horse, landed at Skerries in Fingall, and sir William Brereton and his son John also arrived from England with 250 soldiers, and were followed by captain Salisbury with 200 archers, who landed at the slip near the bridge of Dublin. Sir William Skeffington arrived in Dublin in October, as lord deputy of Ireland, attended by lord Leonard Gray, who was nominated marshal ; they made every preparation to carry on the war against lord Thomas ; the English fleet sailed towards Drogheda and captured Brode, one of Fitzgerald's naval commanders, on which, says Cox, he was so much enraged that he threatened to besiege Drogheda, where the lord deputy proceeded, and at the high cross proclaimed lord Thomas a traitor. In the following spring hostilities recommenced, and lord Thomas had at this time in his possession six strong castles, namely those of Portlester in Meath, Maynooth, Rathangan and Athy in Kildare, Ley in Queen's county, and that of Carlow, all well garrisoned ; he proceeded himself to Connaught to raise forces amongst his allies, but in the mean time the lord deputy Skeffington, taking advantage of his absence, proceeded to Maynooth, the castle of which he commenced to besiege on the 15th of March ; sir William Brereton summoned the castle to surrender, to which, says Cox, a scoffing and ludicrous answer was returned after the Irish manner, whereupon the artillery began to play, but made no impression for ten or twelve days ; a breach however was at last effected, and the besiegers made an assault and slew many of the garrison. The castle could have held out till Fitzgerald's return, being extremely all the Geraldines of Leinster were dispossessed of their properties, and expelled; the earldom of Kildare was assumed for the king, and every person who was taken of their people both lay and ecclesiastical was put to death and exterminated; their destruction and loss were immensely lamented throughout Ireland at that time.

A new heresy and error arose in England, through pride, vain-glory, avarice, sensuality and many strange speculations, so that the people of England went into opposition to the Pope and to Rome. They at the same time embraced extraordinary opinions, and the old law of Moses, in imitation of the Jewish people, and nominated the strong, and garrisoned by one hundred choice men, but, says Cox, "the perfidious governor Christopher Parese (who was lord Thomas's foster-brother), a white-livered traitor, resolved to purchase his own security with his lord's ruin, and got letters conveyed to the lord deputy, importing that he would surrender the castle on certain conditions, which concerned only his own profit, without mention of his safety. The lord deputy accepted the offer, whereupon Parese, after some advantage gained in a sally, caused the garrison to rejoice and carouse to that degree that they were all dead drunk, and then upon a signal given the English scaled the walls and entered the castle. Captain Holland, being one of the first, happened to leap down into a hoghead of feathers and stuck there, and sir William Brereton having got in cried out "St. George," whereat one of the garrison awoke and shot at captain Holland, but he was rescued out of the feathers by his companions, who killed the soldier. The castle was then taken, and sir William Brereton advanced his standard on the top of the turret." The spoil and plunder of this castle, says Cox, were exceeding great and rich, this being accounted the best furnished house belonging to any subject in the king's dominions. "The lord deputy entered in the afternoon, before whom," says Cox, "two varlets, James Delahyde and Hayward, both choristers, prostrated themselves, warbling a sweet sonnet called Dulcis amica; their melodies saved their lives, which, at the request of chief justice Aylmer, the deputy pardoned. Parese expecting some great reward, with abundance of confidence and great familiarity, presented himself before the deputy, who told him that he was to thank him on the king's behalf for his service, which saved much charge and many lives, and doubted not when the king was acquainted therewith, he would provide for him during his life; and the better to advise the king how to reward him, he desired to know what Fitzgerald had done for him. Parese set agog, with this discourse, recounted the most minute instances of Fitzgerald's liberality to him, upon which the deputy replied 'And how Parese couldst thou find in thy heart to betray the castle of so kind a lord?' then turning to his officers he bids them pay him the money, and then chop off his head. 'Had I know'd this,' says Parese, 'your lordship should not have had the castle so easily'; whereupon one Mr. Boyce, who was present, cried out in Irish a n-Antrath, that is, 'too late,' which occasioned afterwards a common saying, "too late quoth Boyce;" thus Parese, after being paid the stipulated sum, as if in mockery, was immediately afterwards beheaded, as he had made no conditions about his life being saved. At the time the castle was surrendered, there were amongst the garrison Donogh O'Donagan, master of the ordnance, the dean of Kildare, and sir Simon Wnsh, a priest, and it was stated by them that the emperor of Germany had promised to send lord Thomas ten thousand men in May, and that he was also to receive aid from the king of Scotland; a few days after the surrender of Maynooth, twenty-five of the principal persons in the garrison were beheaded, and their heads placed on the castle turrets.

In the mean time lord Thomas, aided by O'Connor Faaly and king during his own reign chief head of the church of God. New laws and statutes were enacted by the king and council, according to their own will; they ruined the religious orders who were entitled to hold worldly possessions, namely, Monks, Canons, Nuns, Friars of the Cross, and the four poor orders, viz., the Minor order, the Preachers, Carmelites and Augustinians; and the possessions and livings of all those were taken up for the king. They demolished the monasteries, sold their roofs and bells, and there was not a monastery, from Aran of the Saints to the Iccian sea, that was not shattered and completely destroyed, except only a few in Ireland, which the English did not find out others, raised a force of seven thousand men, with which he designed to raise the siege of Maynooth, but upon news of its surrender his men deserted him daily; with his few remaining forces he proceeded to Clane in Kildare, and the lord deputy marched to Naas, where he took seven score of Fitzgerald's galloglasses, all of whom he put to death, one only excepted, named Edmond O'leme, who escaped stark naked to lord Thomas; there was a bog between both parties, but the lord deputy's artillery put Fitzgerald's few troops to flight, and he was never after able to muster any considerable force, though he frequently defeated and slew many of the English by skirmishing parties and ambushes in Meath and Kildare, particularly at Trim and Rathangan, and he attacked Athboy, burned part of Trim, besieged Dunboyne, and ravaged much of the English Pale. In the early part of this insurrection, lord Thomas with his forces, accompanied by O'Neill, the O'Moones, and O'Conors, &c., marched to Kilkenny, and laid waste much of the country of the Butlers, and defeated their troops under lord James Butler, son of the earl of Ossory; and in the course of the insurrection, the O'Tooles and O'Byrnes of Wicklow rose out and plundered the English settlements in Dublin, and destroyed the great castle of Powerscourt, the erection of which had cost the earl of Kildare five thousand marks. Lord Leonard Gray was sent to England for troops, and returned in August, 1535, with a body of horsemen and archers, who were garrisoned in different parts of the Pale. Lord Thomas retired to Munster amongst the O'Briens of Thomond, endeavouring to raise forces, where he was followed by lord Gray and sir William Brereton; after some skirmishes Fitzgerald surrendered to lord Gray, on promise of pardon, and rode with him to Dublin in the latter end of August, and soon afterwards accompanied lord Gray to England, but the king being enraged and implacable, caused lord Thomas to be arrested on his way to Windsor, and he was imprisoned in the Tower, where he suffered the most severe privations, having scarcely any clothes to cover him, and forced to go bare-footed and bare-legged in the coldest weather, according to authorities, quoted by Moore in his History of Ireland. In the following spring the five brothers of the earl of Kildare who had died in the Tower, and were the uncles of lord Thomas, were invited to a banquet by lord Gray on promise of protection, but according to Leland, were treacherously made prisoners and sent to England, and they were confined in the Tower along with their nephew, lord Thomas, although it is stated by the Four Masters that they opposed him, but according to other accounts, two or three of them joined in his insurrection; his five uncles were sir James and sir John Fitzgerald, knights of Rhodes and of St. John of Jerusalem, and Oliver, Richard, and Walter Fitzgerald. Lord Thomas, together with his five uncles above-mentioned, were all hanged and beheaded at Tyburn, on the 3rd of February, 1536, though the event is stated by Cox to have taken place in February, 1537, and it is also mentioned at that year in these Annals. Burnell of Belgriffin, and John Travers, an ecclesiastic, particular friends of Fitzgerald, were also executed at Tyburn.

or discover. They also broke and burned the celebrated images, shrines, and the relics of the saints of Ireland and England. They also burned, after that, the image of the illustrious Virgin Mary, which was at Athtruim (Trim in Meath), which wrought wonders and miracles, and healed the blind, the deaf, the lame and persons affected with various diseases; also the Staff of Jesus, which was in Dublin, and wrought miracles from the time of St. Patrick to that period, and had been in the hands of Christ while he was among men. They made Archbishops, and Sub-Bishops for themselves, and though great was the persecution of the Roman emperors against the Church, it is doubtful if so great as this ever came from Rome; so that it would be impossible to relate or give a description of it, unless told by a person who saw it.³

3. Suppression of Monasteries.—In the years 1537, 1538, and 1541, various Acts of Parliament were passed for the suppression of religious houses in Ireland, and during the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth, all the abbeyes, monasteries, priories, convents, &c., were abolished; their extensive lands and endowments were confiscated and seized by the crown, and the abbey and church lands, and Erenach lands, all of which were denominated Termon lands, were conferred in large grants on laymen, chiefly the nobility and gentry of the country. Numerous colleges, seminaries, and schools attached to the abbeyes, were also suppressed, and likewise the hospitals and Biatachs. The Biatachs were charitable institutions or houses of hospitality, and are frequently mentioned in the course of these Annals; the name in the Irish is Biadhtach, derived from Biadh food, and teach a house, hence signifying houses of entertainment, and the lands appropriated for their maintenance were termed Baile Biadhtach, anglicised Ballybetaghs, that is, the townland of the Biatach, and the name Biatach or Betagh, was likewise applied to the keepers of those houses, who were sometimes laymen, and sometimes ecclesiastics, and many of them are recorded in the course of these Annals. These Biatachs were amply endowed with grants of lands, cattle, sheep, &c., by the Irish princes and chiefs, for the public entertainment of all travellers and strangers; the sick, the poor, and indigent. These houses of hospitality were extremely numerous in all parts of the country in ancient times, and it is estimated that there were at least two thousand of them throughout Ireland, one or more generally in every parish. These houses were generally erected at cross-roads, always well supplied with provisions and meat boiled in large cauldrons, and supplies of various kinds were always kept ready cooked for all comers.

At the Reformation, according to the accounts in Ware's works, and Archdall's Monasticon, there were in Ireland the following monasteries:—

Abbeys and Priories of Augustinians, Canons, and Canons regular, Arosians, and Victorines,	223
Convents of Canonesses or Augustinian Nuns,	38
Priories of Premonstratensians or White Canons, a branch of the Augustinians, who were also called Norbertines,	8
Houses of Hermits of St. Augustine, called Austin friars, Commanderies, Preceptories, and Priories of Knights Hospitallers, or of St. John of Jerusalem, under the rule of St. Augustine, some of which institutions had previously belonged to the Knights Templars,	22
Hospitals and Priories of Trinitarians under the rule of St. Augustine, established for the redemption of captives in the Holy Land, and also of Cruciferi or Crouched Friars called Cross-bearers,	14
Abbeys and Priories of Benedictines, called Black Monks,	9
Convents of Benedictine Nuns, called Black Nuns,	5
Abbeys and Priories of Cistercian Monks or Bernardines, Cistercian Nunneries,	42
Abbeys and Priories of Dominican Friars, called Black Friars and Friars Preachers,	2
Abbeys and Priories of Franciscans or Grey friars, including the Friars Minors, Observantines, and Conventuals	41
Convents of Carmelites or White Friars,	114
A Priory of Culdees at Armagh,	20
	1
Total,	563

The abbots of the following monasteries were mitred abbots, and together with the priors here mentioned, making in all twenty-four, sat amongst the lords, barons, and bishops, as spiritual peers in the Irish Parliament, according to Ware and others. The abbot of the Cistercian monastery of Mellifont in Louth, the first of that order founded in Ireland, in the twelfth century. The abbot of the Cistercians of Bective in Meath. The abbot of the Cistercians of Baltinglass in Wicklow. The abbot of the Cistercians of Dunbrody in Wexford. The abbot of the Cistercians of Tintern in Wexford. The abbot of the Cistercians of Jerpoint in Kilkenny. The abbot of the Cistercians of Douske in Kilkenny. The abbot of the Cistercians of Tracton in Cork. The abbot of the Cistercians of Monaster-Nenay in Limrick. The abbot of the Cistercians of Abington or Wothney in Limerick. The abbot of the Cistercians of Holy-Cross in Tipperary. The abbot of the Cistercians of Monaster-Evin in Kildare. The abbot of the Cistercians of St. Mary's Abbey in Dublin. The abbot of the Augustinians of St. Thomas the Martyr, in Dublin. The prior of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, at Kilmainham in Dublin. The prior of the Augustinians of the Holy Trinity or Christ Church, Dublin. The prior of the Augustinians of All Saints in Dublin, now Trinity College. The prior of the Augustinians of SS. Peter and Paul at Newtown, near Trim in Meath. The prior of the Augustinian monastery of the Virgin Mary at Louth. The prior of the Benedictines of Downpatrick in Down. The prior of the Augustinians of Great Connall in Kildare. The prior of the Augustinians of Kells in Kilkenny. The prior of the Augustinians of Athassel in Tipperary. The prior of the Augustinians of Rattoo in Kerry.

It is stated in the text of the Annals, that the monasteries were all demolished from Arau of the Saints to the Iccian Sea; Aran of the Saints was the Island of Aran, in the Atlantic, off the coast of Galway, which was in ancient times a celebrated seat of religion, and several churches were erected there, the ruins of which still remain, and the island was called in Irish Araun-na-Naomh, signifying Aran of the Saints. The Iccian Sea mentioned in the text under the name of Muir Niocht, is the sea between Great Britain and France, particularly that part of the English Channel called the Straits of Dover, and it got that name from the Portus Iccius, which, according to the old geographers, was either the harbour of Boulogne or Calais in France; hence the sea was called Mare Iccium.

Destruction of Images.—Sir Richard Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, reign of Henry VIII., says, that in the month of May, 1538, "the lord deputy Leonard Gray, marched from Trim to pursue O'Reilly of Cavan, who made his submission, and the deputy then proceeded against Savage, a degenerate Englishman, into Ardes and Lecale (in the county of Down), and there also took Magennis's castle of Dundrum, and seven other castles, and wasted and preyed all that country, and which was worse, he burned the cathedral church of Downe (Downpatrick), and defaced the monuments of the saints Patrick, Bridget, and Columbus, and committed many other sacrileges; and about the same time the images of saints were every where defaced or taken away, and particularly the famous image of the Blessed Virgin at Trim, was burned, and the oblations and treasures which votaries had offered there, were also taken and carried away."

St. Patrick's Crozier.—This remarkable relic, which was also called St. Patrick's Staff, is frequently mentioned in the Lives of St. Patrick, particularly in the Tripartite Life, by Colgan, in his Trias Thaumaturga, p. 263, and in Lanigan, (vol. i. p. 178), and

A.D. 1538.

Hugh Buighe O'Donnell, the son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe, heir to the lordship of Tirconnell, a man skilled and learned in all the arts, the most distinguished man for benevolence, hospitality, feats of arms, fierce conflicts and in the pass of danger, and who was expected to benefit most the lordship of his own country, according to promise and appearances, died at Kilodomrair (Killymard, in Donegal), after communion and sacraments, on the 22nd of March.

Niall, the son of Con, son of Art O'Neill, a likewise in St. Patrick's Life, by Joceline the Monk, in the twelfth century. Numerous miracles are said to have been performed by this staff, which was compared with the rod of Moses; St. Patrick is said to have received it from a hermit who lived in an island of the Etruscan sea, supposed to have been Lerins, near Antibes, off the coast of France, where there was a celebrated monastery in ancient times, in which St. Patrick studied some years, and, as before stated, he was considered to have been a native of Gaul; according to Joceline the name of the hermit was Justus, and he had brought the staff from the Holy Land, and it was said to have been possessed by our Saviour, hence called in Irish Bachall Iosa, latinised Baculus Jesu, signifying the Staff of Jesus; by the Irish writers it was generally called Bachall Phadraig, that is, the Staff of Patrick, the word Bachall in Irish signifying a staff, like the Latin Baculus; hence Bachall, or Bachall Easpuic, that is, a bishop's staff, was the term applied to a crozier, therefore by Patrick's staff was meant his crozier. This staff or crozier is frequently mentioned by the ancient Irish annalists, and in the Annals of the Four Masters, at A.D. 784, it is mentioned in a passage thus translated from the Irish by Dr. O'Connor, "Sacilega direptio Baculi Jesu, et Reliquiarum Patricii per Donnachadum filium Donaldi apud Arcem Orientalem (dictum Rath-Airthir) apud Nundinas." "A sacrilegious carrying off of the Staff of Jesus, and relics of St. Patrick, by Donogh, the son of Donal, at the eastern rath, called Rath Airthir, at the Fair or Assembly." Rath Airthir signifies the eastern Rath, and was probably situated near Arinagh. At A.D. 1027, in the Annals of Tigearnach, the Baculus Jesu is thus mentioned: "Bacal Iosa da sharugadh" which Dr. O'Connor (Rerum Hibernicarum Scrip. v. ii. p. 279), thus translates: "Baculum Jesu sacrilege raptum," that is, "The staff of Jesus was sacrilegiously carried off." In the Annals of the Four Masters, at A.D. 1030, it is thus again mentioned: "Bachall Iosa do sarugadh im thri caiplibh agus ro marbhadh ria Cionnomhle an fear roda saraih," which is thus translated by Dr. O'Connor: "Baculum Jesu ablatum sacrilege, cum tribus equis, et occisus est ante novem dies vir qui sacrilege id temeravit," that is, "The staff of Jesus was sacrilegiously carried off, together with three horses, and the man who sacrilegiously dared to do that deed was slain before nine days." It is to be observed that in all these passages translated by Dr. O'Connor, he renders the word sarugadh a sacrilegious and forcible carrying off, which is the real meaning of the word. Again, in the Annals of the Four Masters, at the year 1080, this relic is mentioned, where it is stated that a hostile force was led by Torlogh O'Brien, king of Thomond, to Dublin and Meath, where Malachy, king of Meath, came into his camp with the Staff of Jesus, accompanied by the successor of St. Patrick and the clergy of Munster; and again in the same Annals, at the year 1143, it is mentioned that Muiredach O'Duffy, archbishop of Tuam; the lords and chiefs of Connaught; the successor of St. Patrick, having the Baculus Jesu with him; the coach of St. Feichin (the abbot of Fore), with the Bell of St. Feichin, together with the Bo han of St. Kevin, were all as pledges of a peace between Torlogh O'Connor, king of Connaught, and Murtogh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath.

St. Bernard, in his Life of St. Malachy, archbishop of Armagh in the beginning of the twelfth century, as given in the Benedictine edition of the Fathers, thus speaks of the Baculus Jesu: "Porro Nigellus videns sibi imminere fugam, tulit secum insignia quedam sedis illius, textum scilicet Evangeliorum, qui fuit beati Patricii, Baculumque auro tectum, et gemmis pretiosissimis udonatum quem nominant Baculum Jesu, eo quod ipse Dominus (ut fert opinio) eum suis manibus tenuerit, atque formaverit. Et hæc summæ dignitatis et venerationis in gente illa. Nempe notissima sunt celeberrimæ in populis, atque in ea reverentia, apud omnes ut qui illa habere visus fuerit, ipsum habeat episcopum populus stultus et insipiens." "Nigel, however, seeing that his flight was impending, took with him certain celebrated things belonging to that see (Armagh), namely, the Book of the Gospels, which had belonged to St. Patrick, and a staff covered with gold, and adorned with the most precious gems, which they named the Staff of Jesus, because the Lord himself (as the opinion is), held it in his own hands, and formed it; and these were held in the highest honour and veneration in that nation. For these things were most remarkable and celebrated amongst the people, and held in such reverence by all, that whoever was seen to possess them, the foolish and silly people considered him to be the real bishop." It is to be observed that this Nigel, above-mentioned, had at that time usurped the see of Armagh, and seized upon the Baculus Jesu, and the Book of the Gospels, thereby endeavouring to secure his succession to the see. Colgan, in his Trias Thaumaturga, p. 6, has the following passage: "Thassachus fuit faber ærarius S. Patricii; fuit primus qui Baculum Jesu pretioso tegumento obclavit, Ecclesia ipsius est Rath-Colptha juxta Dunum ad Orientem." "Tassach was the worker in metals of St. Patrick, and he was the first who ornamented the staff of Jesus with a precious covering; his church is Rath-Colptha, near Downpatrick, to the east." This St. Thassach lived in the fifth century, and is mentioned in the Lives of St. Patrick, as skilled in the working of metals, and in the art of a goldsmith. In the year 1180, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, the Bachall Phadraig, or St. Patrick's Staff, was removed from Armagh to Dublin by William Fitz Adelm. Giraldus Cambrensis, in the twelfth century, thus mentions this relic: "Inter universos Hiberniæ Baculos lignæque naturæ Sanctorum reliquias, virtuosus ille et famosus, quem Baculum Jesu vocant, non immerito primus et precipuus esse videtur; per quem, vulgari opinione, S. Patricius venenosus ab insula vermes eiecit, cuius siquidem tam incertus est ortus quam certissima virtus. Nostris autem temporibus et nostrorum opera, nobilis thesaurus ab Armachia Dubliniam est translatus." "Amongst all the croziers of Ireland, and relics of saints made of wood, that potent and famous one which they call the Staff of Jesus, not undeservedly, seems to be the prime and chief, by which, in the common opinion, St. Patrick banished poisonous reptiles from the island. The origin of it is, indeed, as uncertain, as its virtue is certain. But in our times, and by the assistance of our people, this noble treasure was translated from Armagh to Dublin." William Fitz Adelm de Burgo, lord deputy of Ireland, was the person who, either in A.D. 1179 or 1180, transferred St. Patrick's crozier from Armagh, and deposited it in Christ Church, Dublin, where, from the twelfth to the sixteenth century, it was preserved with the greatest care, and held in the highest veneration; but in A.D. 1538, the gems and golden ornaments being removed, it was publicly burned, together with many other religious relics, in High-street, by order of George Browne, archbishop of Dublin, as related in D'Alton's Archbishops of Dublin. In Ware's Annals of the reign of Henry VIII. are the following passages: "Also about the same time (A.D. 1538), among the famous images whereunto pilgrimages were designed, the statue of the Blessed Virgin Mary was burned, then kept at Trim, in the abbey of the Canons Regular, and the gifts of the pilgrims were taken away from thence. The image of Christ crucified, in the abbey of Ballibogan, and St. Patrick's Staff, in the Cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity at Dublin, which William, the son of Adelm, brought from Armagh, and gave as a gift to that church in the year 1180, underwent the like fate.

worthy man, distinguished for noble deeds and excellence, was slain in a nocturnal attack by the son of Niall O'Neill, in the castle of Omagh, after the town had been betrayed by a party who were in the castle; Niall O'Neill then demolished the castle, and his own son was pursued for that slaying.

The son of Mac Clancy, i.e. Cahir, the son of Feredach, the son of William, heir to the chieftancy of Dartry, died at Dun Cairbre (the castle of Duncarberry, near the Atlantic, at Bundrowes in Leitrim).

Ferganaim, the son of Feardorcha (Ferdinand), Mac Coghlan, tanist of Delvin Eathra (in King's county), was slain by the sons of the prior Mac Coghlan.

O'Donnell, i.e. Manus, marched with a force into North Connaught, and fortunately succeeded in taking the castle of Sligo, which was well furnished with guards and ordnance, after it had been for a considerable time out of his possession, being strongly defended against his father, so that it could not be taken until then. After having taken the castle, and left his guards in possession of it, he marched into Moylurg, and spoiled the entire country. On his return he came to the castle called Moy O'Gara (in the barony of Coolavin, county of Sligo), which was taken by him; it happened, however, that Niall Garv, the son of O'Donnell, was unfortunately killed by the shot of a ball from the castle, at the time they attacked the town; but O'Donnell pardoned the person by whom the deed was committed, who, under his protection, was set at liberty; O'Donnell returned safe with his forces, except that great loss, after having spoiled Moylurg, and the plain of Connaught, except such as those who paid him his tribute.

A. D. 1539.

O'Brien of Thomond, i.e. Conor, the son of Torlogh, son of Teige, died, after having been in the lordship for a considerable time, during which his country flourished in great affluence and prosperity. Murrough, the son of O'Brien, i.e. the son of Torlogh, son of Teige, was inaugurated his successor, as a just reward of his own merits.

O'Donnell, i.e. Manus, marched with a force into North Connaught, between Christmas and the festival of St. Bridget, and having received from the inhabitants his full tribute and hostages, he returned home safe.

O'Neill, i.e. Con, having gone to O'Donnell's residence at Donegal, about Easter, they formed between them a league of peace, amity, and alliance, as strictly and as firmly as possible, with each other.

The son of Maguire, i.e. Cormac, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, tanist of Fermanagh, a worthy man, distinguished for his nobleness and hospitality, was treacherously slain by the people of his own brethren, and even in their presence.

O'Neill, i.e. Con, and O'Donnell, i.e. Manus, marched, with mutual accord and consent, with their forces into Meath, and such territories as did not pay them tribute they devastated and burned before them as far as Tara. They seized an immense booty on that expedition, and the Irish had not mustered an army to attack the English in the latter times, that spoiled so much of the property of Meath, than did these predatory forces; great indeed was the booty, consisting of gold, silver, brass, iron, treasure, and every kind of property and goods in general, they took from the towns of Ath-Firdiadh (Ardee) and Nua-Chongbhail (Navan), having completely plundered them on that expedition. On the return of those forces, there was exultation, boasting, vain-glory, and pride, about the immense booty they obtained without any opposition. When the Saxon lord justice, lord Leonard, received intelligence of this, he collected all the English forces in Ireland, with those of many of the great towns of Meath, both lay and ecclesiastic, and all the fleets on the neighbouring coasts, and particularly an immense fleet which lay in Cuan-Cairliune (the bay of Carlingford); after all those forces were brought together by the lord justice, he marched in pursuit of the Irish army to Oriel, to a place called Bel-athahoa, in Fearnmaigh¹. The Irish forces were

A. D. 1539.

1. The Battle of Bellahoe was fought in August 1539, and the place called Bellahoe, or Ballyhoe, is situated in the parish of

Magheracloone, in the barony of Farney, county of Monaghan, which place is mentioned in the text as Fearnmaigh, from which came the name Ferney or Farney; the place is situated on the not able to form into proper order as they should, neither did they obey the commands of their leaders to keep and defend the field of battle, but rather dispersed in a scattered and disorderly manner, and left a great deal of their own property, as well as the booty they had taken from the English, in the hands of their enemies at that place, after they were defeated; many of their common soldiers were slain, and not a few of their chiefs besides; and of the Tirconallians Maolmurry Meirgeach, son of John Roe Mac Sweeney, fell on the field of battle. Magennis, i.e. Murtogh, was taken prisoner by a party of the people of Oriel, after having been separated with a few from his own forces in that defeat of Bellahoe; he was kept privately in imprisonment for a considerable time, and they afterwards treacherously slew him at the instigation of some of his own tribe, who gave a bribe to those who had him in confinement, for putting him to death.

Niall Oge O'Boyle was killed by Conor, the son of O'Boyle.

O'Melaghlin, i.e. Art, a prosperous, intrepid man, and his son, Cahir O'Melaghlin, dean of Clonmacnoise, were slain at Fornoicht (Forgney, in Longford, on the borders of Westmeath), by the sons of Felim O'Melaghlin; and Felim assumed the lordship.

Mae Coghlan, i.e. Felim, the son of Myler, was borders of Cavan, Monaghan, Meath, and Louth, between Kingscourt, Carriekmacross, and Ardee; and the large lake of Ballyhoe is situated partly in the parish of Drumcondra, county of Meath, and partly in the parish of Magheracloone, in the county of Monaghan, and from this lake runs the river Legan, at which the battle was fought. The following particulars of it have been collected from Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, Campion, Leland, and Mac Geoghegan. Con O'Neill, prince of Tyrone, who was called Con Bacach, or Con the Lame, together with O'Donnell, Magennis, O'Kane, O'Hanlon, Mac William, and others, jointly invaded the Pale with a powerful force, marched to Meath, burned Ardee and Navan, and plundered all the country through which they passed, till they came to the hill of Tara, where they reviewed their forces with great ostentation; and having taken vast booty, they returned towards home. The lord deputy, Leonard Gray, having some time before sent to England for aid, sir William Brereton was immediately despatched to Ireland with 250 Cheshire men, and, together with these, the lord deputy collected the forces of the Pale, with the mayors and citizens of Dublin and Drogheda, and marched to Bellahoe, where O'Neill was encamped on the other side of the river. The English forces came to the river by break of day; James Fleming, baron of Slane, led the van; but Robert Halfpenny, his standard bearer, having declined to advance because of the danger, he substituted the valiant Robert Betagh of Moy-nalty, in Meath, to carry the standard, and he rushed boldly into the river, being well supported by Mabe of Mabestown, a commander of great courage. The lord deputy's forces with great difficulty crossed the river, and after a sharp conflict, at length succeeded in routing the Irish galloglasses; Mabe, and many of the Anglo-Irish forces were slain; but O'Neill's forces were at length slain at Beandehor, (Banagher, in King's county), by the sons of O'Madden, namely, Malachy Godh, after mass on a Sunday, on the second of the Nones of July.

The lordship of Delvin (in King's county), was divided by O'Melaghlin, namely, Felim, between Art, the son of Cormac Mac Coghlan, Donal, the son of Ferdorcha (Ferdinand), and Malachy, the son of Edmond.

A. D. 1540.

Roderick O'Maoleoin, bishop of Ardagh, and coadjutor bishop of Clonmacnoise, a prosperous and affluent man, died. (This Roderick O'Malone is not given in Ware's Bishops; Terence Kerawan, or Kirwan, was then bishop of Clonmacnois).

The monastery of Clonroad, (at Ennis, in the county of Clare), was given to the friars de ob-servantia, at the request of O'Brien, namely, Murtogh, the son of Torlogh, and of the nobles of Thomond, with the permission and consent of the superiors of the order of St. Francis.

The English, in every place throughout Ireland where they established their power, persecuted and banished the nine religious orders, and particularly, they destroyed the monastery of Monaghan¹ and beheaded the guardian, and a number of the friars.

defeated, and the booty recovered. According to Cox, Magennis, lord of Iveagh, was slain, together with about 400 of O'Neill's men. Mac Geoghegan, in his History of Ireland, says "Les Irlandois perdirent dans cette action pres de quatre cens hommes tues avec Magennis, un de leurs chefs; la perte des Anglois ne fut pas moins grande, ayant laisse quelques-uns de leurs chefs, entr' autres le general Mabe, morts sur le champ de bataille." "The Irish lost in that engagement nearly four hundred men slain, together with Magennis, one of their chiefs; the loss of the English was not much less, having left some of their commanders, amongst others general Mabe, dead on the field of battle." In some of the English editions of Mac Geoghegan, the number of the Irish slain has, by some typographical error, been made four thousand instead of four hundred, as in the French original, whereas, according to Cox, and all the other accounts of this battle, only about four hundred of the Irish were slain; and as, according to Mac Geoghegan, nearly the same number of the English were killed, therefore about eight hundred fell on both sides in this battle. The lord deputy, says Cox, commanded in person with great courage, and after the battle, he knighted on the field, for their services, the chief justice Aylmer, Talbot, of Malahide, James Fitzsimon, mayor of Dublin, and Michael Courcey, mayor of Drogheda. Sir John Davies says of this battle, "that prosperous fight at Bellahoe, on the borders of Meath, the memory whereof is yet famous."

A. D. 1540.

1. The Monastery of Monaghan was founded by St. Moelodius, or Maclodius, about the sixth century, and the place was called Muineachan, signifying the town of the monks; it was an Augustinian abbey of note for several centuries, and many of its

The two sons of O'Boyle, namely Niall Roe and Conor, were in dispute and contention with each other, and Niall went to make an attack on Conor at Luachras (Loughros, near Ardara, county of Donegal), for it was there Conor's place of residence was, and he remained for a night in ambush in the church of Seanchan. On the following day Conor appeared on the hill near the church, when Niall sallied forth with his party from the church; when Conor beheld them advancing towards him, he retired to avoid coming in contact with them, as he had only a few of his men along with him, and who were of no service to him. The direction he took alone was down across the strand of Loughros; Niall pursued him as quickly as he could, and having outrun his own party, he challenged Conor to a single combat, whereupon they attacked each other actively and fiercely, without regard to friendship or relationship; Conor gave a stroke to Niall on the crown of the head and felled him to the ground, upon which Conor fled from the place, being wounded. Niall's party having come up to him, he told them to follow Conor, as he was not himself in danger of death on that occasion; Niall's people accordingly did so, and overtook Conor at the side of a lake in the neighbourhood; they did not come into close combat with him, but knocked him down with the stones which lay along the margin of the lake, and they then attacked him with their arms; on their return they found Niall quite dead; and there were not of their tribe in their time a greater loss, than those two who were slain by each other.

The sons of William Mac-an-Easpuig O'Galagher, namely, William Oge and Hugh Gruama, were slain by the sons of O'Boyle, namely, Donal and Torlogh, in revenge for the death of their father.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, marched with a force into the province of Connaught, and did not halt until he entered Moylurg, from whence he proceeded to Clan Conway (in Galway); and he devastated and burned the entire of Moylurg, and Clan Conway, after which he took a prey at the Curlew mountains, and then returned home safe, in triumph and victory.

O'Donnell collected a force, and the following persons joined him, namely, Niall Conallach, the son of Art Oge, tanist of Tyrone, and the son of Mac Donnell of Scotland, namely, Colla, the son of Alexander, together with a great many of the Scots. O'Donnell and those forces, in the first place, marched into Fermanagh, and spoiled a large portion of the country in the beginning, until he received securities and pledges for the payment of his tribute; after that, they marched through Brefney O'Rourke, and from thence to the Curlew mountains, where they encamped. They cut away the pass of Bealach Buighe, and cleared every other difficult pass before them. The entire of the Clan Maolroona (Mac Dermotts), came to them after that, and gave hostages to O'Donnell for whatever he might demand thenceforth, and he then returned home safe.

The sons of O'Donnell, i. e. of Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, namely, Donogh Cairbreach, and John of Lurg, rebelled against O'Donnell, namely, Manus, their own brother, and took possession of the Cranoge of Lough Beatha (in the parish of Gartan, barony of Kilmacrenan, county of Donegal), from which they began to spoil the country. O'Donnell took them both prisoners, and also Eigneachan O'Donnell, at Baile-na-Congbhala; he hanged John Lurg, and bound Eigneachan and Donogh in chains; and he broke up and completely demolished the Cranoge of Lough Beatha.

O'Dogherty, i. e. Gerald, the son of Donal, son of Felim, a man distinguished for nobility and hospitality, died at an advanced age, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Donall, the son of Niall O'Boyle, was nominated the O'Boyle.

John, the son of O'Donnell, was slain by the sons of Murrough Mac Sweeney, of the Tuatha (that is, of the Districts in Donegal. See p. 52, note on Tirconnell).

The castle of Leitrim was erected by O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan, the son of Owen, while a great war was carried on against him on every side, viz. in abbots are mentioned by the Four Masters, Colgan, and Archdall, from the eighth to the fifteenth century, when, in A. D. 1462, the monastery was rebuilt and re-founded for Conventual Franciscans, by Felim Mac Mahon, lord of Monaghan. Its abbots were chiefly of the family of Mac Mahon, and it continued to flourish to the period above mentioned by the Four Masters, when the abbot was beheaded; the extensive possessions of the monastery were seized by the crown, and, according to Archdall, were granted to Edward Wythe, and a castle afterwards erected on its site by Edward, lord Blaney.

Moylurg, in Muintir Eoluis, and in Brefney O'Reilly, and his own son, supported by a party of the men of Brefney, also warred against him; but he, however, completed the castle in a short

IV. The Ancient Kings of Ulster.—In this article is continued the ancient history of Ulster, and in the preceding parts accounts have been given of the various colonies that possessed the country in the earliest ages, as the Partholarians, Nemédians, Fomorians, Firbolg and Danans. Partholan resided at Inis-Samer, an island at the bay of Donegal, adjoining the town now called Ballyshannon; and, as already explained, various great battles were fought between the Nemédians and Fomorians in the territory now called Donegal, and in other parts of Ulster. When the chief, named Ith, the son of Breogain, came from Spain to explore Ireland, he proceeded to Ulster, where the Tuath-De-Danan kings then resided, at the fortress of Aileach Neid, near Lough Swilly, in Donegal; but his forces were defeated, and he himself was mortally wounded at a place called Mogh-Ith, or Moy-Ith, signifying the plain of Ith, which was situated, as appears by a passage in the Annals of Inisfallen at the year 1197, on the borders of Tyrone, Derry, and Donegal, between Ardstraw, in Tyrone, Raphoe in Donegal, and the city of Derry, but appears to have been chiefly in Donegal, in the barony of Raphoe, and adjoining the ancient fortress of Aileach. The Milesians from Spain, and the Clanna Breogain, soon afterwards invaded Ireland, conquered the Danans, and became masters of the country. The three sons of Milesius divided the island amongst them; Heber and his descendants, called Heberians, had Munster; Ilermon and his posterity, named Iheremonians, had Leinster and Meath, and the descendants of Ir, the third son, called Irians, or Clanna Rory, had Ulster, while Amergin, the fourth son of Milesius, was appointed chief bard of the kingdom, with great power and privileges. In the division of the kingdom, the Firbolg tribes obtained lands in Leinster, with the greater part of Connaught, which they held in subjection to the Milesians. These events, according to the old annalists, took place about a thousand years before the Christian era. Many places in Ulster in those early ages derived their names from the chiefs of the Milesians and Clanna Breogain. Mogh Muirthemhne, or the plain of Murhevney, now the plains of the county of Louth, derived its name from Murhevney, son of Breogain, a chief of the Clanna Breogain, or Brigantes of Spain, who accompanied the Milesians to Ireland. Sliabh Cuailgne, now Slieve Guillion, in Armagh, derived its name from Cuailgne, another son of Breogain, a celebrated commander, who was slain there in a battle with the Danans; he was buried on the mountain, and a cairn, or huge heap of stones, was raised over him as a sepulchral monument, which remains to this day. Sliabh Fuaidh, now the Fews mountains in Armagh, obtained their name from Fuaidh, another son of Breogain, who was slain there by the Danans. From Colpa the Swordsman, one of the sons of Milesius, who was drowned while attempting to land, the place called Inver Colpa, or the bay of Colpa, derived its name: it is situated at the mouth of the Boyne near Drogheda, and the adjoining parish is called Colpe to the present day. Dun Sobairce, or the fortress of Sobairce, derived its name from Sobairce, king of Ulster, of the race of Ir, who erected a fortress, and resided there nearly nine centuries before the Christian era; it is now called Dunseverick, and is situated on a bold rock projecting into the sea, near the Giant's Causeway; some of the O'Kanes, chiefs in Derry, and likewise of the Mac Quillans, powerful chiefs in Antrim, had their residence in former times at the castle of Dunseverick, of which some ruins still remain. Ard Macha, or the hill of Macha, now Armagh, was so called either from Macha, wife of Nemédus, who, according to the old annalists, was buried there more than a thousand years before the Christian era, or from Macha, queen of Ireland, who had her residence there about four centuries before the Christian era, as hereafter explained. Rath-Mor-Muighe-Linne, or the Rath of Mora of Moylinne, an ancient fortress and residence of the kings of Ulster, was so called, according to O'Flaherty, and the Annals of Tigernach, at A.D. 161, from Mora, wife of Breasal, king of Ulster, and, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, this fortress was erected a short time previously in the second century, by Bania, daughter of the king of Denmark, and wife of the celebrated Tuathal Teachtmair, monarch of Ireland. Rath More of Moylinne was a residence of the kings of Dalaradia, or Ulidia; it is situated near Lough Neagh, in the present parish of Antrim or Donegore, and the place is still known as the Manor of Moylinny.

Kings of the Irian race.—The Irian kings, of the posterity of Ir, ruled over Ulster for more than a thousand years, and for a period of nearly seven centuries, namely, from about 350 years before the Christian era to A.D. 332; they had their chief residence at the palace of Eamhain Macha, or Emania, near Arinagh, where about thirty-five kings reigned, all of the Irian race, except three or four of the Iheremonians of Ulster; and of these kings of Emania, accounts are given in the Annals of Ulster and of Tigernach, published by Dr. O'Connor in the Rer. Hib. Scriptores, and in O'Flaherty's Ogygia. Of the Irian kings of Ulster, according to the Ogygia, twenty-four became monarchs of Ireland, or Ard-riagthe, and also one queen of Ulster of the Irian race, namely Macha, became queen of Ireland about 350 years before the Christian era, and was the only supreme queen that ever reigned over Ireland; she is called by the Irish writers Macha Mongruaidh, signifying Macha of the red or golden tresses, from the colour of her hair, and her name has been latinised Macha Auri-coma. Amongst the most celebrated of the Irian kings of Ulster, who also reigned as monarchs of Ireland, were Ollamh Fodhla, or Ollav Folla, the famous legislator, whose reign is placed by Tigernach, O'Flaherty, and others, about seven centuries before the Christian era: he founded the conventions of Tara, or great triennial legislative assemblies, of which an account has been given at p. 297 in these annals. Cinbaath, or Kimbaath, king of Ulster, who became monarch of Ireland from about 350 to 300 years before the Christian era, erected the palace of Eamhain Macha, which was also partly constructed by his queen, the above-mentioned Macha Mongruadh, daughter of Aodh Ruadh, or Hugh the Red, a monarch of Ireland of the race of Ir, about four centuries before the Christian era, who was drowned at the place called from him Eas-Aodha-Ruaidh, anglicised Easroe, signifying the cataract of Red Hugh, and now known as the waterfall called the Salmon-leap, on the river Erne, at Ballyshannon, in Donegal. Macha was married to her cousin king Kimbaath, who died of the plague at Emania, and she reigned after him seven years as supreme queen of Ireland. According to Keating, Eamhain Macha derived its name from queen Macha's having marked out the area of the building by her breast-pin or bodkin, as Eo-muin, or Eamhuin, signifies a pin for the breast or neck: the name Eamhain Macha is pronounced Evan-Macha, and latinised Emania Ruairidhe Mor, that is, Rory or Roderick the Great, whose name, according to the Ogygia, has been latinised Rudricius Magnus, was seventy years king of Ulster, and seventeen years supreme monarch of Ireland; he flourished about 150 years before the Christian era, and was one of the most celebrated kings of the Irian race; the kings and chiefs of his posterity took the name Clanna Rua-raidhe, or Clanna Rory, a name which O'Flaherty and O'Connor have latinised Rudricii, anglicised Rudricians. Conchobhar-Mac-Nessa, or Concovar, the son of Nessa, so called from his mother Nessa, was a king of the Irian race, who lived at Emania, and reigned over Ulster sixty years, and is highly celebrated in Irish history for his valour, munificence, and patronage of the bards and learned men of his age; he flourished at the commencement of the Christian era, and died, according to the Ogygia, A.D. 43. Some historians state that he became a believer in the Christian faith in consequence of having heard an account of the crucifixion. The reign of Concovar is very remarkable in the works of the Irish bards, as connected with an account of the famous heroes called the Red-Branch Knights of Ulster; the wars between Ulster and Connaught, and many other extremely interesting events in his time. From their first settlement in Ulster down to the fourth century, the Irian kings ruled over that province for more than a thousand years; during the ages before the Christian era, as recorded by the old annalists, they had many space of time, and spoiled a great deal in Moylurg on his enemies.

intestine commotions in Ulster among themselves, and various wars with the other provincial kings, and also with the Fomorians or African pirates, who had settled in Ulster in remote ages, and with the Firbolg tribes and Danans. No estimate can now be formed of the unknown thousands who were slain in those sanguinary wars, from the earliest times down to the Christian era, comprising a period of many centuries.

The Cualgnean War and Red-Branch Knights of Ulster.—The kings of Emania established an order of warriors who were highly celebrated, and known by the name Curaidhe-na-Craoibhe-Ruaidhe, that is, Knights of the Red Branch, and they were so called, it is supposed by some, from bearing devices of red branches in their banners, or, according to others, from their chief place of residence, which was called Teach-na-Craoibhe-Ruaidhe, signifying the house of the Red-Branch—a large building erected at Emania, adjoining the palace of which it formed a part, and here they had their banqueting halls, where the kings of Emania gave grand entertainments to guests and strangers; there was also another building called Craobh-Dearg, signifying also the Red-Branch, where the knights kept their weapons, standards, and military trophies, and made preparations for their battles and expeditions; adjoining these was a third building termed Bron-Bearg, signifying the house of sorrow, where the sick and wounded warriors received medical attendance, and were provided with all things necessary for their recovery. A further account of the palace of Emania is given in the subsequent part of this article. The Red-Branch Knights flourished at Emania chiefly about the commencement of the Christian era and the early part of the first century, in the reign of the celebrated Concovar Mac Nessa, king of Ulster; indeed the period from the first to the fourth century would appear to have been the most heroic era of Ireland, for during that time flourished the renowned Red-Branch Knights of Ulster; the famous Fiana Eirionn, or Fenians of Ireland, who were the chief warriors of Meath and Leinster; the Munster heroes, designated Clanna Deagha, and the Damnonian or Firbolg champions of Connaught called Clanna Morna. The chief commanders of the Red-Branch Knights were the celebrated champions Cuchullin; Conall Cearnach, or Kearnach, that is, Conall the victorious; Celteair-na-g-Cath, that is, Keltcar of the battles, from whom Rath-Celteair derived its name, afterwards called Dun-da-leath-glas, now Downpatrick, and Laoghaire Buadhach, or Laoghaire the valiant. The Cualgnean war, celebrated by the bards under the name of Tain-Bo-Cuailgne, signifying the spoil of the cattle of Cualgne, had its origin from the taking of a great prey of cattle by the people of Connaught, commanded by one of their champions named Ceat, the son of Magach, from the neighbourhood of Cualgne, now Slieve Gullion mountain, near Armagh, and also from the plain of Muirthemne, now the county of Louth. In consequence of this great cattle-spoil, arose the Cualgnean war between Ulster and Connaught, which commenced, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, eight years before the Christian era, and continued for a period of seven years; in its course many bloody battles were fought, and in the various fierce conflicts, probably not less than fifty thousand men were slain on both sides. The Ulster forces were commanded by their king, Concovar Mac Nessa, by Conall Kearnach, Cuchullin, and the other chiefs of the Red-Branch Knights above mentioned; the Connaught troops were commanded by Ceat or Keat, the son of Magach, together with Fergus Mac Roigh, a nephew of king Concovar, who was Rioghdamhna, or prince presumptive of Ulster, but having revolted against Concovar, he was expelled from Emania, and took refuge at the court of Cruachan in Connaught, where he was received into the favour of Oilioll Mor and Meiva, then king and queen of that province; and being a very valiant warrior, he was placed in command over the Connaught forces. Meadhbh, or Meva, queen of Connaught, was daughter of Eochy Feiloch, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, and the most celebrated of the heroines of Ireland, conspicuous for her valour, abilities, and beauty; she reigned over Connaught for ninety-eight years, and died, according to the Ogygia, about the middle of the first century, in the 120th year of her age; she resided at the palace of Cruachan in Connaught, which was erected by her father, and situated near Elphin, in Roscommon. Meva lived there in a style of great splendour, and is highly celebrated by the Irish bards; during the war with Ulster, this heroine, like one of the Amazons of old, often commanded her own troops in person, and is represented by the historians as wearing an Aislin, or golden crown, on her head, seated in her war-chariot, proceeding to battle, and surrounded by a retinue of war-chariots and champions. During this war the palace of Emania was taken and plundered by the Connaught troops; and various battles took place, in one of which Firdia Mac Damhain, or Firdia, the son of Damhain, who was one of the famous Damnonian or Firbolg champions of Connaught, was slain in single combat by the hero Cuchullain, at a ford on a river in Muirthemne, which was called after him Ath-Firdia, or the ford of Firdia, now Ardee in Louth. Keat, the son of Magach, another celebrated champion of Connaught, slew in single combat many of the best warriors of Ulster; but, while carrying off their herds to Connaught, as trophies of victory, was pursued and slain by Conall Kearnach, at a place called from his death Ath-Ceit, or the ford of Keat; Conall also slew Bealchu of Brefney, another great champion of Connaught. Conall Kearnach having proceeded with his forces to the palace of Cruachan, in Connaught, killed, with a thrust of his spear, Oilioll More, husband of queen Meva, and king of Connaught, and returning with the spoils of the palace, was pursued by the Connaught warriors, overtaken, and slain at a ford on a great river in Brefney, and the place was called from him Beal-Atha-Chonail, and is now known as Ballyconnell in the county of Cavan. This Conall Kearnach was one of the most valiant and renowned of all the Irish warriors, and famous as a swordsman and wrestler; he was descended from the Irian kings of Ulster, called Clanna Rory, and his son Irial-Gluimhar, was king of Ulster, for forty years about the middle of the first century. The posterity of Conall Kearnach possessed a great part of Dalaradia, now the county of Down and part of Antrim, and also of Muirthemne, now the county of Louth, which was called from him Conall Muirthemne, and Machaire Chonail, or the plain of Conall. In the genealogies of Keating and O'Brien many eminent families in Ireland are mentioned as descendants of Conall Kearnach, as the Magennis, lords of Iveagh in the county of Down; the O'Moores, princes of Leix, in the Queen's county and Kildare, and many other chiefs, of whom accounts are given in the subsequent part of this article under the head Irians. Cuchullain, the other great chief of the Red-Branch Knights, was, like Conall Kearnach, his relative and cotemporary, one of the most renowned of the Irish warriors for strength and valour, and celebrated for many ages in the compositions of the bards; he was paternally descended from the Heremonian chiefs of Ulster called Ernans, or Clanna Deagha, and maternally from the Irian kings of Ulster. In the seventeenth year of his age he distinguished himself by his undaunted valour in pursuing and attacking the Connaught troops who had carried off the cattle spoils of Cualgne; he afterwards became famous in many battles and single combats with celebrated warriors; he had his chief fortress and residence at Dundalgan, now Dundalk, and was slain, according to some accounts, in a great battle on the plains of Muirthemne, and, according to the Ogygia, in the second year of the Christian era, in the 27th year of his age; in the Annals of Tigernach, he is mentioned as the most renowned hero of the Milesians. Cuchullain is made the hero of some of Mac Pherson's Poems of Ossian, but these productions, though containing many beautiful passages, are not the genuine Ossianic poems, and abound in anachronisms; Cuchullain, who flourished about the commencement of the Christian era, being placed by him in the third century, and made cotemporary with Fionn Mac Cumhaill and the Fenian warriors. Various Irish M.S. compositions on the Cualgnean war and Red-Branch Knights of Ulster, are mentioned by Keating and O'Flaherty, by Dr. O'Connor, in his notes on the Four Masters, and in O'Reilly's Irish writers: the chief of them are Tain-Bo-Cuailgne, or the spoil of the cattle of mott and his wife, the daughter of Mac William of Clanrickard, to the schools of Ireland, and to all those who were in the habit of receiving presents, to come to them at the Roek, (of Lough

A general invitation to an entertainment was given by Roderick, the son of Teige Mac Der-

Cuailgne; Brisleach-Muighe-Muirthemne, or the battle of Moy Murthemney; Dearg Ruathar-Chonaill-Cearnaigh, or the sanguinary conflicts of Conall Kearnach, and Oidheadh-na-gCurraidhe, or the death of the heroes; a poem by Congal, a famous bard, brother of queen Meva, on the death of the seven Maines, princes so called, who were sons of Oilioll and Meva, and were all slain in the Cualgnean war: this poem is quoted by O'Reilly. Copies of these various compositions are in the collections of Sir William Betham and other libraries, and if properly translated and published, would be found to contain much curious and interesting information on these remote periods of Irish history.

Kings of Ulster, from the first to the fourth century.—The following were the kings of Ulster who reigned at Emania during that period according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, the Annals of the Four Masters, Tigearnach, and other authorities. Concovar Mac Nessa, king of Ulster, died A.D. 48, and was succeeded by his son Cumusgaeh, who reigned three years. Glaisne, another son of Concovar, succeeded, and reigned nine years. Irial Glunmhar, son of Conall Kearnach, succeeded as king of Ulster, and reigned forty years, from A.D. 60 to A.D. 100. Fiacha, son of Irial, succeeded, and after him Fiatach Fionn, of the race of Heremon, became king of Ulster, and was also monarch of Ireland three years, and died A.D. 119. Elin, who was of the Irian race, succeeded as king of Ulster, and in his reign, in the beginning of the second century, the Firbolg tribes of Connaught revolted against the monarchy, and being joined by Elin and the Irians of Ulster, defeated and slew the monarch Fiacha Finoladh, in a great battle fought at Moybologue in Brefney, as related at page 345, and Elin then became monarch of Ireland for four years, but was defeated and slain, A.D. 130, at the Battle of Aichle or Acoill, near Tara, by Tuathal Teachtnmar, son of the former monarch Fiacha Finoladh; Tuathal then became monarch, and was one of the most celebrated of the Irish kings of the race of Heremon.

The battle of Moylinny.—Mal, a descendant of Conall Kearnach, became king of Ulster after Elin, and in A.D. 160 the forces of the monarch Tuathal, and those of the Irians of Ulster, fought a great battle at Magh-Linne, in which king Tuathal was defeated and slain by Mal, after he had reigned over Ireland thirty years, and Mal then became monarch. The place where this battle was fought in Dalraderia was called Moin-an-Catha, or the Bog of the Battle, and likewise Ceann-Guba, or the Hill of Grief, in the Four Masters, and the place was situated where the river Ollar and Ollarha have their source, and is considered to have been near the town of Antrim, or, according to others, in the vicinity of Olderfleet, near Larne. Mal, after he had reigned as monarch of Ireland four years, was slain, A.D. 164 by Feidhlim Reachtnmar, or Felim the Lawgiver, son of king Tuathal, and Felim became monarch. Breasal succeeded his uncle Mal as king of Ulster for nineteen years, and Tibradh Tireach, son of Breasal, succeeded for thirty years, and he slew Conn-Cead-Cathach, or Con of the Hundred Battles, the celebrated monarch of Ireland. Ogaman, son of king Fiatach Fionn, of the race of Heremon, succeeded as king of Ulster twelve years, and Aongus Gaibnion, grandson of Tibradh, succeeded fifteen years. Fiacha Araidhe, son of Aongus, succeeded for ten years, and Fergus, surnamed Dubhdeadach, or black teeth, a descendant of Ogaman, succeeded as king of Ulster four years, and usurped the monarchy for one year, having expelled king Cormac from Tara; but Cormac having collected his army, the forces of Fergus were defeated, and he himself was slain A.D. 254 at the great battle of Crionna in Meath. Rossa, of the Rudrician race, or Clanna Rory, succeeded Fergus as king of Ulster for one year, and Aongus Fionn, son of king Fergus, succeeded for two years. Fergus Fogha, of the Irian race, succeeded and reigned as king of Ulster seventy-five years; he was slain, as hereafter explained, A.D. 332, and was the last of the Ultonian kings of Emania.

The Battle of Dubhcomar.—Fiacha Sraibhtine, son of Cairbre Liffeachair, and grandson of Cormac, both monarchs of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, succeeded to the monarchy A.D. 298, and reigned thirty-one years. Eochy Doimhleoin, brother of king Fiacha, was married to Alechia, daughter of Updar, king of Alba, or Scotland, by whom he had three sons called the three Collas, namely, Colla Uais, or Colla the Noble; Colla-da-Chrioel, or Colla of the two Territories, and Colla Meann, or Colla the Famous. The three Collas being very valiant, warlike, and ambitious princes, combined against their uncle king Fiacha, and aspired to the monarchy; they collected powerful forces, and being joined by seven Catha or legions of the Damnonions or Firbolg tribes of Connaught, they fought A.D. 327, according to the Ogygia, a fierce battle against the army of the monarch Fiacha at Crioel Rois, south of Tailtean in Bregia, in which the royal army was defeated, and many thousands on both sides, together with king Fiacha himself, were slain. This was called the battle of Dubhcomair from Dubheomar, the chief Druid of king Fiacha, who was slain there, and the place where the battle was fought was near Teltown, in a direction between Kells and Navan, near the river Blackwater in Meath. After gaining the battle, Colla Uais usurped the monarchy, and reigned four years, when he was compelled to abdicate the throne by Muiredach Tireach, or Muiredach the Patriot, son of king Fiacha, who then became monarch of Ireland. The three Collas and their principal chiefs, to the number of three hundred, were expelled from Ireland, and forced to take refuge amongst their relatives in Albany; but they soon afterwards returned, and were pardoned by their cousin king Muiredach.

The Battle of the Three Collas.—The three Collas, assisted by king Muiredach, collected a powerful army, and joined by numerous auxiliaries, and seven legions of the Firbolg tribes of Connaught, marched into Ulster to wrest the sovereignty of that province from the Irian kings. Fergus Fogha, king of Emania, assembled his forces to oppose them; and both armies having met, fought a tremendous battle, which continued for six successive days; but the Collas were at length victorious, the forces of Fergus Fogha being vanquished, and himself slain; but Colla Meann fell on the side of the victors. This engagement was called by the Irish writers Cath-na-ttri-g Colla, or the battle of the three Collas, and also Cath-Cairn-Enchalethearg, being fought at a place so called in Fermoy, in Dalraderia, and the place is now known as the parish of Aghaderg, in the barony of Iveagh, county of Down, on the borders of Antrim and Armagh; and there is still there a great heap of stones or cairn at Drummillar, near Loughbrickland. This battle was fought A.D. 332, and as there were powerful forces collected on both sides, and the fierce contest continued for six days, immense numbers must have been slain; probably not less than ten thousand men fell on both sides, and the historians state that the slaughter was so great that the earth was covered with dead bodies, from Carn Eochy to Glenrighe, now the vale of the Newry river, a distance of about ten miles. The victory of the three Collas transferred the sovereignty of Ulster from the Irian kings, who reigned at Emania nearly seven hundred years, to the Clan Colla, who were of the race of Heremon. Immediately after their victory, the Collas proceeded to the palace of Emania, which they plundered and burned to the ground, so that it never after became the habitation of any of the Ultonian kings. The period assigned by O'Flaherty in his Ogygia for the duration of Emania, from its first foundation by king Kimbath, 352 years before the Christian era, to its destruction by the three Collas A.D. 332, is six hundred and eighty-four years. In the Cualgnean war, and the numerous great battles fought between the Irian kings of Ulster and the monarchs of Ireland, together with the battles of the three Collas, all comprising a period of about 340 years of fierce contests, it is probable that not less than one hundred and fifty thousand men were slain.

The Palace of Emania.—An account of the first erection of Emania, and the origin of its name, has been given in the preceding part of the present article; it was long a favourite theme of the Irish bards, who celebrated its splendour under the Irian kings, and its glories associated with the achievements of the renowned Red-Branch Knights of Ulster. Accounts are given of great Legislative Assemblies held there in those early ages, and Kea, near Boyle), and they were all plentifully supplied by that couple.

Teige, the son of Bryan, son of Manus Mac Dermott Roe, was drowned in the Bann, while along with O'Rourke's forces.

of magnificent entertainments by the kings, with various amusements peculiar to those times. In the preceding part of this article an account has been given of the habitations of the Red-Branch Knights at Emania, and the entire of the buildings appear to have been of vast extent and rude magnificence, like the palace of the ancient kings at Tara, surrounded with great earthen ramparts, and the interior buildings chiefly constructed of wood, particularly of oak, with which Ireland abounded in those early ages, and these ancient palaces were also partly composed of great stone walls without cement, in the style denominated Cyclopean architecture. According to Colgan in his Trias Thaumaturga, there were in his time, in the year 1647, extensive remains of Emania. The site of Emania is about two miles westward of Armagh, near the river Callan, at a place called Navan hill, which name was thus anglicised from the Irish Cnoc-Eanahain, or the hill of Emania; and Dr. Stuart, in his History of Armagh says, that near Navan hill is a townland called Creeve Roe, which, as already explained, was the site of the habitation called Craobh-Ruadh, which was the residence of the Red-Branch Knights. Around Navan hill, between the base and summit, is a foss and moat, or earthen rampart, the whole comprising an area of about twelve acres; and there are also there some circular mounds or forts, so that these remains of ramparts, and great earth works of such an extent as to include twelve acres, demonstrate the greatness of the ancient palace and fortresses of Emania. Stuart also states, that in an adjoining townland called Trea, there is an earthen rampart or mound still traditionally called the stables of the kings.

The following passages of a poem on Emania have been translated from a copy in the library of Sir William Betham, of the ancient Irish work denominated Dinseanchus, which was written by Amergin, a celebrated bard in the sixth century:—

"This plain on which our steeds have ran,
According to the strictest testimony of truth—
On it was built an abode to commemorate
The death of Macha, the wife of Nemedius.

"Before this famous fortress was erected,
Nemedius clear'd of woods twelve great plains—
Of those was this pleasant plain,
O'er which they ruled with powerful sway.

"Macha, always victorious and triumphant;
The renowned daughter of Hugh of the red weapons—
Here was she buried, the fairest of the fair,
Who by Rectaidh Righdearg was slain.

"It was not formed without the attending aid
Of the stern sons of Dithorba—
An affair for the learned to perpetuate the name
Of Emania on the rising ground of the plain.

"In grief for her their sorrow to record;
The hosts of Ulidia in every time
Held, unremittingly, in the east
The assembly of Macha on the great plain."

In the article on Ptolemy's Geography, at pp. 303, 304, an account has been given of the various tribes placed in Ulster by the Greek geographer in the beginning of the second century, namely, the Erneans, the Venicians, the Robogdians, the Darinians, and the Uluntians or Ultonians. The following accounts of the tribes and clans of ancient Ulster have been collected from the old annalists, historians, and topographers.

The Degadians, called by the Irish writers Clanna Deagaidh,

James Oge, the son of the prior Mac Coghlan, was treacherously beheaded by Ceadach O'Melaghlin, in his own castle, i.e. Caislean-an-Fheadain (in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county), and great destruction befel the country on that latinised Degadii, were the posterity of Aongus Turmeach, who was a monarch of Ireland of the race of Heremon, about 150 years before the Christian era; Fiach, son of king Aongus, had a son named Oilioll Aronn, who got great possessions in Ulster, and his descendants, according to O'Flaherty, were called Ernaans, but it is to be observed that they were quite a different tribe from the Erneans of Brefney, who were of the Firbolg race. Senn, son of Oilioll Aronn, had a son called Deag, and he and his brethren, of the race of the Ernaans, being Heremonians, were expelled from Ulster by the Irians, or Clanna Rory, the ancient possessors. Deag being a celebrated warrior, went with his followers to Munster, and was favourably received by Duach, king of that province, and afterwards monarch of Ireland of the race of Heber. After the death of Duach, Deag became king of Munster, and his tribe got extensive possessions in that province. The Deagadians got their tribe-name, Clanna Deagaidh, from this Deag, and an account of them has been given at pp. 146, 150, in the note on Thomond; they settled in Munster a short time before the Christian era; and during the first, second, and third centuries, they make a remarkable figure in Irish history, as the chief warriors and military commanders of Munster; several of them became kings of Munster, and three of them were also monarchs of Ireland, namely, Ederscol, grandson of Deag, and the son of Ederscol, namely, Conaire Mor, or Conary the Great, a celebrated monarch, who made military expeditions to Gaul and Britain. According to the Ogygia, Conaire reigned sixty years, and died A.D. 60; and his reign is remarkable, as during it the birth of Christ took place. Conaire II., a descendant of Conaire I. was monarch of Ireland, eight years, in the beginning of the third century, and died A.D. 220, according to the Ogygia. The Degadians, or Ernaans of Munster, are designated in O'Heerin's Topographical Poem as "the princes of Erna of the golden shields." Of the race of the Degadians, according to Keating, O'Flaherty, and O'Brien, were the O'Falveys of Kerry, hereditary admirals of Desmond, the O'Connells of Kerry, Limerick, and Clare; the O'Flynnns, O'Sbeas, O'Cullenans, O'Donegans, and some other chiefs of note in Munster, of whom accounts have been given in the notes on Thomond, Desmond, and Ormond.

The Dalriadians, or Dalriadinians, were a branch of the above mentioned Degadians of the race of Heremon, being descended from Cairbre Riada, one of the sons of the monarch Conaire II.; from Cairbre Riada his posterity took the tribe name Dal-Riadimh, signifying the descendants of Riada, as the Irish term Dal means a part, a tribe, or posterity; hence it was prefixed to many tribe names; the name of the tribe of Dalriada has been latinised by O'Flaherty and others Dalriedii and Dalriedini, and the territory they possessed was denominated Dalriada and Dalriada. Cairbre Riada and his posterity obtained an extensive territory in Ulster called from them Dalriada, which now forms the northern parts of the county of Antrim; this Cairbre Riada was a celebrated warrior, and, according to the Irish historians, and the venerable Bede, he led his forces into that part of North Britain called Albany, now the west of Scotland, and settled a colony there in the territory which now forms Argyleshire, and other adjoining parts of Scotland, during the reign of Art, monarch of Ireland, in the early part of the third century. Before that period, and even previous to the Christian era, colonies from Ireland settled in Albany, or Scotland, and some of the Firbolg tribes of Connaught, called Attacots, who were expelled from Ireland in the first and second century, settled in the western parts of Scotland; various alliances and intermarriages between the Irish kings and the kings of the Picts and Caledonians, are mentioned by the Irish historians before the Christian era. Various other colonies, chiefly from Ulster, went to Albany from the third to the fifth century, and conquered a account. Felim O'Melaghlin brought the English and the treasurer (sir William Brabazon) with him to Delvin; but, however, they could not take the castle of Fedan, and they returned home, after having destroyed a great deal.

Donal, the son of Ferdoreha Mac Coghlan, chief of his own sept, died before James Oge, the son of the prior, had been slain.

great part of Scotland from the Picts and Caledonians. The country conquered by Cairbre Riada, and his followers in Albany, was denominated the kingdom of Dalriada, and the colony was called Dalriadians, like their ancestors in Ireland. In the latter end of the fifth century Ere, or Eric, a descendant of Cairbre Riada, was prince of Dalriada in Ulster, and his sons Fergus, Loarn, and Aongus, led another colony from Ulster to Albany, and became masters of a great part of Western Scotland, as Argyleshire, Bute, the Hebrides, &c.; and Loarn became the first king of the Albanian Scots in the beginning of the sixth century, A.D. 503. Fergus, brother of Loarn, succeeded as king, A.D. 513, and kings, the descendants of Loarn and Fergus, ruled in succession till the ninth century, when Kenneth Mac Alpin, one of their posterity, became king of Albany, and in A.D. 842, he conquered the kingdom of the Picts, and thus became the first king of all Scotland. Of the Dalriadic race, who were a branch, as above shewn, of the Irish Milesians, of the race of Heremon, sixty-one kings reigned over Albany or Scotland, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and other authorities, during a period of 783 years, from king Loarn, A.D. 503, to the death of Alexander III. king of Scotland A.D. 1286. The Scottish kings of the houses of Baliol and Bruce, and lastly the house of Stuart, kings of Scotland and of Great Britain, were maternally a branch of the Dalriadic kings, descended from the Milesian Irish race, as shown in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, Charles O'Connor's Ogygia Vindicated, Chalmer's Caledonia, and likewise in the learned Dr. Slater's poem, entitled Pala-Albion, on the history of Great Britain, in which is the following passage, speaking of king James I. of England—

"At quoniam Arcto Scotico Rex noster ab orbe, Nec minus occiduis, perhibent, Scotus ortus Hibernis,
Qui Britonum parent sceptris, mihi pauca recensens Musa age, et Ogygios Iernes referato colonos,
Insula Vergivio circum undique cineta profundo, Quæ fuerit Graiis olim glacialis Ierne."

"But since our monarch is sprung from the northern Scottish world, and as likewise shown, he is a Scot, descended from the western Hibernians, who are subject to the British sceptre; relating a few matters, O Muse! proceed to describe the Ogygian Iernian colonists (the Irish), whose island, encompassed by the deep Vergivian sea, was in ancient times known to the Greeks as the icy Ierne." In Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, in the reign of James I. the following passage is quoted from a speech delivered by king James at the Council table in White Hall, on the 21st of April, 1613:—"There is a double cause why I should be careful of the welfare of that people, (the Irish) first as king of England, by reason of the long possession the crown of England hath had of that land; and also as king of Scotland, for the ancient kings of Scotland are descended of the kings of Ireland."

The Dalaradians, in Irish Dal-Araidhe, a name which has been latinised Dalaradii, were so called as descendants of Fiachla Araidhe, a king of Ulster in the third century, who was of the Irian race, or Clanna Rory; his posterity chiefly possessed the territory called from them Dalaraidhe, and latinised Dalaradia, which comprised the present county of Down, with the southern parts of Antrim, as explained in the note on Dalaradia, and this territory was also called Ulidia; the Dalaradians were the same as the Irians, hereafter described.

The Cruthneans, or Picts, called by the Irish Cruithnidh, and latinised Crutheni, of whom an account has been given at p. 206, sent colonies from Scotland to Ireland about a century before the Christian era, and these Cruthenians were located chiefly in Dalaradia, now the counties of Down and Antrim, and also in a part of Derry, and were mixed by intermarriages with the Irians; several kings and chiefs of those Irish Picts are mentioned in the old annals.

The Irians, of whom accounts have been given in the preceding parts of the articles on Ulster, were also called Clanna Rory, a name anglicised Rudricians, and latinised Rudricii, as before explained, being the descendants of the monarch Rughraidhe, of the race of Ir. They were divided into two great branches, namely, the descendants of the renowned warriors Conall Kearnach, called Clann-Conaill, and the posterity of his cotemporary and relative Fergus Mae Roigh, king of Ulster, both of whom flourished in the beginning of the first century, and of whom accounts have been given in the preceding part of this article, under the Red-Branch Knights. The Clann-Conaill, or descendants of Conall Kearnach, according to the genealogies of Keating, O'Flaherty, O'Brien, and O'Halloran, were the O'Moores, princes of Leix, in Kildare and Queen's county; the Macennises, lords of Iveagh, in the county of Down, who possessed the baronies of upper and lower Iveagh and Lecale, with part of Mourne; the O'Donlevys, or Mac Dunlevys, who were in ancient times kings and princes of Uladh or Ulidia, now the county of Down, and part of Antrim; the Mac Eochys, princes of Dalaradia, a name now rendered O'Heoghey and Hoey, and they were a branch of the Mac Dunlevys; the O'Loingsys or Lynches; and the O'Lalors or Lawlors, who were in ancient times likewise princes of Dalaradia, and also chiefs of note in Leix, or Queen's county; the O'Garveys, who were powerful chiefs in Down and Armagh, of whom accounts are given at the end of O'Brien's Irish Dictionary; the Mac Artans, or Mac Cartans, lords of Kinel Fogartaigh, now the baronies of Kinelarty and Dufferin, in the county of Down; the Mac Gowans, or O'Gowans, a name anglicised Smiths, were powerful chiefs in Down, and many clans of them also settled in Donegal, Leitrim, and Cavan; the Mac Wards, clans in Down and Donegal; the O'Carolans, chiefs of Clan Derinott, near Derry; the O'Kennys, chiefs in Louth, and others.

The Clan-Fergus were the descendants of Fergus, surnamed Mac Roigh, from his mother Roigh or Rogia, and was son of Rossa Ruadh, or Ross the Red, and grandson of Rughraidhe, the celebrated king of Ulster, and monarch of Ireland, before mentioned; Fergus was three years king of Ulster about the beginning of the Christian era, but was dethroned by his uncle Conceobar Mac Nessa, who became king of Ulster. Fergus was expelled from Emania, and retired to Connaught, where he was well received by Meva, the famous queen of that province, by whom he had three sons named Ciar, Core, and Conmac. Ciar settled in west Munster, and possessed a large territory called from him Ciar-Rioghacht, signifying the kingdom of Ciar, from which was derived the name of the county of Kerry; from this Ciar were descended the O'Conors in ancient times, kings and princes of Kerry; and also the O'Scanlans, chiefs in Kerry, and likewise in the county of Louth, and also the O'Brosnaghans. From Core, the second son, who possessed a large territory in North Munster, or Thomond, were descended the O'Conors, lords of Coremroe, in the county of Clare, and the O'Loghlins, who were styled princes and lords of Burren, in Clare; also the O'Calhills, O'Conways, O'Caseys, O'Tierneys, some of whom anglicised the name to Lord, the word Tiarna in Irish signifying a lord; the O'Marcaehans, or O'Markeys, some of whom changed the name to Ryder, the word Marcaeh in Irish meaning a horseman; these chiefs and clans were located in different parts of Munster, and also in Ulster. Conmac, the third son, and his posterity, called Conmacnians, possessed extensive territories, named from them Conmaicne in Annaly, or Longford, in West Breffney or Leitrim, and also in Galway and Mayo. The chief families of the Conmacnians were the O'Ferralls, princes and lords of Annaly, or Longford; the Mac Rannalls, a name anglicised to Reynolds, who were lords of Conmaicne of Moy-Rein and Muintir-Eoluis, in Leitrim; the Mac Keoghs, who were chiefs in Galway, and also in Leinster; the Mac Shanleys; O'Rodaghans; Mac Dorchys; O'Mulveys; O'Morans, and O'Mannings, chiefs and clans in various parts of

A. D. 1541.

OISTEROUS and excessively stormy weather, both frost and snow, happened in the beginning of this year, which prevented tillage and ploughing from being properly performed throughout Ireland.

O'Carroll, i. e. Ferganainn, the son of Mulroona, was treacherously killed, although blind, by Teige, the son of Donogh, son of John O'Carroll, his kinsman, and by the son of O'Mulloy,

i. e. John, the son of Donogh Caoch, in the castle of Clonlis (in King's county); and although O'Carroll was at the time an old man, and far advanced in years, he had performed such feats of arms, and gave such assistance as redounded to his fame and renown against his slayers; twelve of his people were slain along with him.

O'Mulloy, i. e. Cahir, a man of great fame and excellence in his own time, died.

Tessauran (in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county), both houses and churches, was burned and plundered exactly in Lent, by the sons of O'Madden, namely Murrough, Breasal, and Cathal.

Felim O'Melaghlin proceeded after that to Clonfert, and plundered and demolished the great church and monastery at Clonfert.

Tuathal Balbh (the Stammerer), the son of John, son of Roderick O'Gallagher, one of the most Longford, Leitrim, and Roscommon. An account of all the chiefs and clans of the Irian race, and the territories possessed by each, will be found in the notes on Dalaradia, Orgiall, Brefney, Annaly, Leix, Thomond, and Desmond.

The Dal-Fiatachians, in Irish Dal-Fiatach, latinised Dal-Fiatacii, were so called, as the descendants of Fiatach Fionn, or Fiatach the Fair, who was king of Ulster, and monarch of Ireland in the beginning of the second century, and of the race of Heremon. The Dal-Fiatachians were a powerful tribe in Ulster, and located chiefly in the territories which now form the county of Down, and in parts of Antrim, Armagh, and Louth. Ogaman, King of Ulster, who has been already mentioned, was of this tribe, and his descendant, Fergus, was king of Ulster and monarch of Ireland; Eochy Gonnat, or Eochy the Wounder, grandson of Fergus, became monarch of Ireland for about one year after the celebrated Cormac, and died A. D. 279, according to Ogygia. Many of the race of Dal-Fiatach were kings of Ulladh, or Ulidia, from the fourth to the twelfth century, of whom accounts are given by O'Flaherty and Mac Firbis. According to Colgan, as quoted by Mac Geoghegan, Eochy, son of Muredach, of the tribe of Dal-Fiatach, was king of Ulidia in the time of St. Patrick; but being an obstinate Pagan, and having opposed the apostle, the sceptre was transferred to his brother Carroll, and many of his posterity became kings of Ulidia. The O'Carrolls, kings and princes of Orgiall for many centuries, were, according to Mac Geoghegan, the descendants of the above mentioned Carroll; but according to other authorities, the O'Carrolls were of the race of Clan Colla, as hereafter explained. The O'Carrolls ruled over Orgiall, chiefly in that part of it now forming the county of Louth, down to the Anglo-Norman invasion, when John de Courcey and his followers conquered Louth and a great part of Ulster. Donogh O'Carroll, prince of Orgiall, the last celebrated chief of this race, in co-operation with St. Malachy, archbishop of Armagh, in the twelfth century, A. D. 1142, founded and amply endowed the famous Cistercian monastery of Mellifont in Louth, the first of that order established in Ireland, which was filled with monks sent over by St. Bernard from his abbey of Clareval in France; the monastery of Mellifont, which had extensive possessions, was for many centuries celebrated as a seat of learning and religion, and some of its venerable ruins still remain. Iarlath, the second archbishop of Armagh, after St. Patrick, was of the tribe of Dal-Fiatach, and there were many other eminent men of this race. The Mac Cans, ancient chiefs of note, and lords of Clanbreasail, now the baronies of O'Neill and in Armagh, were of the race of Dal-Fiatach, according to Mac Geoghegan.

The Ulidian Kings.—After the conquest of the kings of Emania by the Clan Colla in the fourth century, the ancient kings of Ulster, of the Irian race, lost the greater part of that province, and were confined to Ulladh, or Ulidia, which name it appears they gave to the territory, more anciently called Dalaradia, and which comprised the present county of Down and southern parts of Antrim, over which some of the Irians, of the race of Conall, Kearnach, and others of the tribe of Dal-Fiatach, ruled as kings, princes, and chiefs, from the fourth century till the Anglo-Norman invasion and conquest of a great part of Ulster by John de Courcey and his followers, in the latter end of the twelfth century. The kings of Ulidia had their chief residence and fortress at Rath-Celtair, which was also called Dun-da-Lethglas, afterwards Downpatrick, and accounts of these Ulidian kings are given in the annals of Tigearnach, of Ulster, and of the Four Masters.

The Orgiellians, or race of Clan Colla.—An account of the princes, named the three Collas, has been given in the preceding part of this article. After their conquest of the Irian kings, and the destruction of Emania, in the early part of the fourth century, they became possessed of the greater part of Ulster, and founded the kingdom of Orgiall, which was long possessed by their posterity. Ancient Orgiall comprised the territories which now form the counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh; but the term Orgiall was also originally extended to parts of Tyrone, Derry, and Antrim, and likewise to Fermanagh,—over all which territories the race of Clan Colla had extended their authority; but they were deprived of a great part of their possessions in the fifth century by the Hy Niall race, as hereafter explained. The name Orgiall, or Airgiall in the Irish, was latinised by O'Flaherty and others Orgiellia and Ergallia, and anglicised Orgiall and Oriel, and sometimes Uriel; but the term Oriel was, in after times, chiefly confined to the present county of Louth. The chief residence of the kings and princes of the race of Clan Colla in early times was at Clogher in Tyrone, which was also a great seat of Druidism, and got its name from the Cloch-Oir, or golden stone, a famous Druidic idol, which was worshipped there. The following were the chiefs and tribes of the race of Clan Colla, who were a branch of the Heremonians. The Mac Donnells of Dalriada, who became earls of Antrim, and likewise the Mac Donnells of the Hebrides in Scotland, who were lords of the Isles; the powerful men among the chiefs of Tirconnell, died in February ; he was a man of great bravery and valour, who slew and subdued all opponents, and never went to battle or conflict, but he carried away hostages. It happened to him at one time, while on a visit, that he heard one of the friars of Donegal preaching a sermon, and in the course of the sermon he heard it stated, that those who slew, or shed blood, should have a bad reward ; and having pondered upon this subject in his mind, he put on the resolution of never wounding any man, which he fulfilled during his life.

Mac Quillan, i. e. Roderick, the son of Walter, gave the sons of Hugh O'Neill a great overthrow, in which Angus, the son of Donogh, son of Maolmurry Mac Sweeney, and a number of the galloglasses of Tirconnell were slain ; a company of galloglasses, of the Clan Donnell (Mac Donnells), with many others, were also slain there. Mac Quillan marched a second time with a force against the sons of Hugh O'Neill, and slew Con and Donal, the sons of Hugh.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, having gone to the Saxon lord justice (Sir Anthony St. Leger) at Cavan ; the lord justice received him with great honour and respect, and they formed a league of peace and amity with each other on that occasion.

The eastern Cranoge, on the lake of Glen-Dallain (a fortress on the lake of Glencar, or Glennade, in Leitrim), was taken by the sons of Donal, son of Donogh O'Rourke, from Donogh, the son of Donogh O'Rourke. In some time after, the sons of Donogh O'Rourke, namely, Donal and Ferganaim, made an attack on the Cranoge, and privately set fire to the fortress ; that act was perceived and detected, and they were pursued on the lake, and were overtaken by the sons of Donal ; Ferganaim, the son of Donogh, was slain, and drowned by them ; and Donal having been taken prisoner, was hanged by the sons of Donal, the son of Donogh O'Rourke.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, marched with a force to join the Saxon lord justice in Tyrone, and they overran and spoiled the country on that occasion ; the lord justice came back into Meath, and O'Donnell having parted with him, returned through Tyrone, and arrived safe, without getting battle or opposition going or coming on that expedition. O'Donnell directed his march on the eastern side of the lake (Lough Erne) in Fermanagh, and spoiled Cuil-na-Noirear, and all the country on the eastern side of the lake, both by land and islands, having his boats and vessels spoiling and preying the islands, while his forces plundered by land, so that he left them without corn that year.

O'Donnell, in some time after that, marched with his forces into Fermanagh, on the western side of the lake, and sent a portion of his forces in boats along the lake, while he himself, with the remainder, proceeded by land ; they conjointly plundered the country, both by land and water, as far as Enniskillen ; they broke and demolished the castle of Enniskillen, and victoriously returned safe from that expedition.

Donal, the son of Niall Garv, son of Hugh Roe (O'Donnell), was slain by O'Boyle, after Donal had gone to aid Torlogh, the son of O'Boyle, in opposition to his father ; they at first

Mac Mahons of Monaghan and Louth, who were princes of Orgiall, and lords of Monaghan ; the O'Carrolls, already mentioned, who were princes of Orgiall before the Mac Mahons in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, were, according to some accounts, of the race of Clan Colla, but of the tribe of Dalriatach according to others ; the Maguires, princes and lords of Fermanagh, and barons of Enniskillen ; the O'Hanlons, lords of Orior, in Armagh, and Royal Standard Bearers of Ulster ; the O'Kellys, princes and lords of Ily Maine in Galway and Roscommon ; the O'Maddens, lords of Siol Anmelta, in Galway ; O'Naghtans, or O'Nortons ; and the O'Mulallys, chiefs of note in Galway ; the Mac Eyoys, chiefs of the barony of Moygoish in Westmeath ; the O'Flanagans, lords of Tura, in Fermanagh ; the O'Muldoons, chiefs of Lurg ; the O'Cassidys, chiefs of Coole ; the Mac Gillfinnens, lords of Pettigoe ; the Mac Donnells, chiefs of Clankelly ; the Mac Manus, Magraths, and Mac Tullys, were all chiefs of note in Fermanagh. The Mac Kennas, chiefs of Truagh, in Monaghan ; the O'Neneys, or Mac Neneys ; the O'Haurattys ; O'Connollys ; O'Neillans ; O'Boylans ; Mac Ardells ; Mac Osgars ; Mac Gil-

Michaels, or Mitchells, and the O'Keirans, were all chiefs of note in various parts of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh ; the Mae Sheekeys, great commanders of galloglasses in Ulster, and also in Leinster and Munster ; the Mac Cabes of Monaghan and Cavan, also celebrated commanders of galloglasses, under the O'Reillys and O'Rourkes, princes of both Brefnecs and in various parts of Ulster ; the Magees and Mac Gilmores, chiefs in Down and Antrim ; the O'Flynn, lords of Ily Tuirtre, a territory along Lough Neagh, in the county of Antrim ; the Mac Rorys ; Mac Dougalls, or Mac Dowells ; the Mac Allisters, some of whom changed the name to Saunderson ; the Mae Cleans, all chiefs of note in Down and Antrim, and likewise all the same clans of the Hebrides in Scotland ; the Mac Quillans, powerful chiefs in Antrim, in former times, are by some considered to have been of the race of Clan Colla, and to have come from Scotland ; but, according to others, they came from Wales. Accounts of the various chiefs of the race of Clan Colla, and the territories possessed by each, have been given in the notes on Orgiall, Dalaradia, Dalriada, Fermanagh, South Connaught, Brefnecy, and Meath.

put O'Boyle to flight, but O'Boyle having turned on them, defeated them, and slew the son of Niall O'Donnell.

Con, the son of Bryan, son of Owen O'Rourke, was slain by the Clan Manus of Tirtuathail.

Mac Ward, i. e. Conor Roe, the son of Fergal, chief professor in poetry to O'Donnell, a president of schools, and a man profoundly learned in poetry and other arts; a man who founded and maintained an open house for general hospitality, died, after extreme unction and repentance, on the 20th of December.

A. D. 1542.

The son of O'Neill, i. e. Felim Caoch, the son of Con, son of Con, was slain by Mac Donnell of the galloglasses, with one blow of a dart, and two other sons of O'Neill died.

Bryan, the son of Niall Connallach, son of Art Oge, son of Con O'Neill, heir apparent to the lordship of Tyrone, the most distinguished man that came of the race of Eogan, the son of Niall, for a long period, for nobility, hospitality, and feats of arms, died in the old castle.

The son of O'Brien, i. e. Torlogh, the son of Murrogh, son of Torlogh, the most distinguished man of his age, in his time, for manual action, fame, and excellence, died at Inchiquin.

The son of Con Mac Conmeadha, son of Donogh, son of Roderick, son of Mac Conceanmoir, was unkindredly slain by the son of Con, son of Roderick, son of Con, son of Roderick, son of Mac Concheanmoir.

Cormac, the son of Dermot, son of Teige Cam O'Clery, a worthy friar minor of the convent of Donegal, died.

Mac Conway, i. e. Bryan Dorcha, the son of Solam (Solomon), a man eminent in poetry and literature, a man of affluence and great wealth, and who kept an open house of general hospitality for all persons, died about the festival of Columkille, through the miracles of God and Columkille, and through the malediction of O'Robartaigh, because he had violated and dishonoured the great cross which he had struck previous to that time.

O'Melaghlin, i. e. Felim Oge, the son of Felim, son of Con, son of Art, son of Con, son of Cormac

Oge, son of Cormac Ballach, was slain at Ballysgigin (Gigginstown, barony of Delvin, Westmeath), in the night, by the sons of Mac Geoghegan, Conla, and Cedach Roe, and by Edmond Roe Dillon; he was a man duly entitled to the titles and lordship of his ancestors, and it was to record the death of O'Melaghlin, the following was composed:

"One thousand and five hundred years,
And forty-two without falsehood;
From the birth of Christ, through the sin of the Tree,
To the death of Felim O'Melaghlin."

The sons of O'Madden marched with their forces to attack the castle of Fedan (in King's county); they plundered and burned the town, and slew Malachy O'Raighne on that occasion; the people of the country pursued them to Tigh-Sarain (Tessauran), but were, however, defeated, and Malachy, the son of Edmond Mac Coghlan, David, the son of Felim, son of Donogh, and Torlogh, the son of Fergal, son of Conor, with many others, were slain on the 4th of the Nones of October.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, marched with a force into North Connaught, and was accompanied by his sons, Calvach and Hugh; those sons and O'Dogherty proceeded before the main body to Ballymote, and having plundered Mac Donogh, they carried away the prey to O'Donnell; the chiefs of North Connaught, and particularly Mac Donogh of Ballymote, who sought after his property, came to O'Donnell, and paid him his tribute on that occasion.

O'Conor, i. e. Torlogh Roe, was taken prisoner by Roderick, the son of Teige Mac Dermott, on the Rock of Lough Kea.

The Calvach O'Donnell went on a predatory excursion against the sept of Hugh Ballach, son of Donal, and he plundered and slew some of them, and victoriously returned home safe.

O'Donnell and Calvach marched with a force in the summer of this year, and were joined by O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan Ballach, and also by O'Kane, i. e. Manus, the son of Donogh, with their forces. When those combined forces collected, they resolved to march against Mac Quillan, i. e. Roderick, the son of Walter, and did not halt until they arrived at the Bann, where they divided the forces into three companies, to pass the fords, as the boats of the Bann were taken away from them. Mac Quillan, with a large force of the English along with him, was at the other side of the river, guarding it, to prevent them from crossing it; but, however, they succeeded in crossing the Bann despite of them, although in doing so they ran great risk and imminent danger of being drowned. After having landed, they dispatched their light scouring parties through the country, some as far as Cnoc-Lea (Knoeklaide, in Antrim), and another party along the Bann southwards; and they seized an immense substantial booty and great preys in every place through which they passed; however, the parties commanded by Calvaeh O'Donnell, by O'Rourke, and by O'Kane, took greater booty and more numerous preys than the other forces did. Each of those forces encamped separately with their preys and booty that night. O'Donnell on the following day commanded them to destroy and slaughter this great cattle prey, which was done accordingly; and it would be difficult to enumerate or relate the vast number of cattle that had been destroyed there, besides all the live stock that the people of Brefney and the O'Kanes carried off with them to their respective countries. After that Mac Quillan came to O'Donnell, and gave him great presents, consisting of horses, armour, and valuable articles, and made peace with him. O'Donnell and his forces returned home safe and victoriously from that expedition.

Mac Quillan, i. e. Roderick, the son of Walter, and the son of Mac Donnell, entered the territory of O'Kane, and committed great depredations. O'Kane, i. e. Manus, the son of Donogh, went in pursuit of the prey, accompanied by a party of the Mac Sweeneys who were then with him, namely, the son of Mac Sweeney of Fanat, and the sept of Roderick Mac Sweeney. O'Kane and the Mac Sweeneys having overtaken Mac Quillan carrying off the prey, a fierce engagement ensued between them, in which the son of Mac Quillan, and the Scots who were along with him, were defeated with great slaughter, and the son of Alexander Carrach Mac Donnell, and the son of Mac Shane, with many others of Mac Quillan's forces, were slain. Mac Quillan himself, and the son of Mac Donnell, escaped with difficulty, and a great number of their people were drowned in crossing the Bann.

Mac Quillan, after having brought to his aid the Saxon treasurer (Sir William Brabazon), with a large body of English, marched a second time with his forces against O'Kane. They took O'Kane's castle at Leim-an-Mhadaigh (Newtown-Limavady in the county of Derry), and slew and destroyed all the guards that were in the fortress; and Mac Quillan departed safe after victory on that occasion. Mac Quillan, in some time after, took the Mac Sweeneys into his pay, namely, the sept of Roderick Mac Sweeney; the son of Donogh, son of Mac Sweeney of the Distriets; the son of Murrough Mac Sweeney, and the son of Mac Sweeney of Banagh, with a great many more young men of the Clan Sweeney. The Mac Sweeneys having gone to Mac Quillan's place, were received in the most honourable and friendly manner by him; but, while arranging and stipulating their terms with him, a treacherous and malicious plot was concocted and agreed on by the son of Mac Donnell, by the Scots, and also by Mac Quillan's people, to attack this noble and brave clan of the Mac Sweeneys, after having gone thither, and after having agreed in their compact with Mac Quillan. They resolved on putting this plan into execution, and they accordingly attacked them unguarded and unawares after having departed from Mac Quillan's town, so that they slew the greater portion of them; the son of Mac Sweeney of Banagh, and the son of Murrough Mac Sweeney, were slain there, and only a few of them escaped that massacre.

The crew of a long ship came from the west of Connaught to Tireconnell for the purpose of plunder and traffic, and landed at Rathlin of Muintir Birne (Rathlin O'Birne Islands, off the coast of Donegal), in Tir Boghaine (barony of Banagh). Torlogh, the son of Mac Sweeney of Banagh, having received intelligence of this, attacked and slaughtered them, so that not one escaped to tell the tale except alone their chief and leader who commanded them, namely, the son of O'Flaherty, to whom Torlogh gave quarter, and had him escorted home safe to Conmaienemara (Connamarra, in Galway).

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, the son of Hugh, son of Hugh Roe, marched with a force into Connaught in the harvest of this year, and the chiefs of North Connaught came to him in peace and friendship and paid him his tribute, and humbly submitted to his government, after which he returned to his home.

Not long after O'Donnell had disbanded his forces, when Mac William of Clanrickard, namely, Ulick of the Heads, the son of Rickard, and Mac William Burke, i. e. David, the son of Ulick, collected another great force to march into North Connaught. In the first place, they took the town of O'Flanagan of Belathauachtair (in the barony of Roscommon); after which they themselves, Mac Dermott, and the sons of Teige Mac Dermott, proceeded into North Connaught; and the chiefs of North Connaught having come to Mac William, he took them prisoners, and returned back to Clanrickard with hostages and sureties; and the sureties were O'Dowd, Mac Donogh of Corran, and some of the Mac Sweeneys of Connaught, including Maolmurry (Mac Sweeney), the son of Colla, who died in his imprisonment before he had been liberated, and other hostages from the son of Cathal Oge O'Connor.

The son of O'Donnell, i. e. the Calvach, having gone to the English lord justice, made a league of peace with him on the part of O'Donnell, and also on his own behalf, and after having ratified it returned safe.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, conferred Tura and Lurg (both in Fermanagh) on Maguire, namely, John, the son of Cuchonacht, O'Donnell having before that destroyed a great deal on Maguire. In return for this, Maguire submitted himself, his country, and lands to O'Donnell, and particularly Maguire gave him the service of his own forces, and those of his territory, or a fine in every case where he (O'Donnell) would not obtain forces; he also bound himself to pay half an eric (fine) to O'Donnell for every person who should be killed throughout the entire of Fermanagh.

A. D. 1542.

The Earls created at this time were, as mentioned in the text, Conn O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, who was called Conn Bacach, or Conn the Lame; Ulick Burke, earl of Clanrickard, who was commonly called Ulick-na-gCeann, signifying Ulick of the Heads, a name which originated, according to Lodge, in consequence of his having made a great heap of heads of persons slain in battle, which he had covered with an earthen mound; according to Lodge, he held in fee the territory called Clanrickard, which comprised the six baronies of Loughrea, Dunkellin, Kiltartan, Clare, Athenry, and Leitrim, in the county of Galway. The third created was Murrough O'Brien, earl of Thomond. The conditions

O'Neill, i. e. Conn Bacach, the son of Con, having gone to the king of England, namely, Henry the Eighth, the king created O'Neill an earl,¹ and commanded him not to have himself called O'Neill any longer; and O'Neill received great honour from the king on that occasion.

Mac William of Clanrickard, namely, Ulick of the Heads, and O'Brien, i. e. Murrough, having gone to England, each of them was created an earl, and they returned home safe, except Mac William, who had been in a fever, and was not perfectly recovered therefrom.

Maolmurry, the son of Owen Mac Sweeney, was slain by the sons of Maolmurry, the son of Colla Mac Sweeney, in a week after the death of Maolmurry, the son of Colla, himself.

The sons of Maolmurry, son of Colla, were expelled from the country, their castles were destroyed, and one of themselves with some of their followers were slain.

Maguire, i. e. John, and the sons of O'Donnell, i. e. of Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, namely, Roderick and Naghtan, went on a predatory incursion into Dartry (in Leitrim), and having sent their preying parties through the country, Naghtan, the son of O'Donnell, was killed by the cast of a dart.

Felim Duv, the son of Hugh O'Neill, was killed.

Mary, the daughter of Mac Gauran, the wife of Mac Clancy (of Dartry, in Leitrim), i. e. of Feredhach (Frederick), died.

A. D. 1543.

Edmond, the son of Bryan O'Gallagher, bishop of Raphoe, died on the 26th of February, after having experienced great opposition respecting the bishopric.

on which these three earls got their titles are curious. They were compelled to renounce their Irish names and titles; the earl of Clanrickard had to give up his designation of Mac William; the earl of Tyrone was obliged to abandon the name of O'Neill; and it is stated in Cox, and in Lodge's Peerage, that the earl of Thomond was compelled utterly to forsake and give up the name of O'Brien, and all claims to which he might pretend by the same, and to take such name as the king should please to give him; and he and his heirs, and the inhabitants of his lands, should use only the English dress, manners, customs and language, and keep no kerns or galloglasses; and the same conditions were imposed on O'Neill, earl of Tyrone.

The son of Mac Sweeney of Fanat, i. e. Maolmurry, the son of Donal Oge, heir to the lordship of Fanat, was slain by the sons of Mac Sweeney of Fanat, namely, Donogh and Maolmurry, the sons of Torlogh, son of Roderick, son of Maolmurry. Before he fell he displayed extraordinary valour, bravery, feats of arms, and execution of hand, in accordance with his usual achievements, for he slew Dudley, the son of Ferdorcha Mac Sweeney, the most renowned warrior opposed to him.

The son of Mac Sweeney of Banagh, namely, Eoin Modardha (John the Stern), the son of Niall More, died in the early part of his age and noble actions.

The son of O'Boyle, namely, Bryan, the son of Niall, son of Torlogh, was treacherously killed by the sons of Niall Oge O'Boyle, who were in his friendship, and along with him in his pay.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, attended the great council at Dublin, together with his kinsmen, Eigneachan and Donogh. They were imprisoned for some time, but were afterwards set at liberty, by advice of the lord justice and of the chiefs of Ireland in general, and peace and amicable arrangements were made between them. Con O'Donnell, his brother, who had been in England for a long time, was also reconciled to him, after which Con returned to England to the king's residence, where he was retained with honour and respect.

O'Donnell having given the castle of Lifford to Cahir, the son of Tuathal Balbh O'Gallagher, and to a party of the tribe of Hugh O'Gallagher, to be guarded by them, they put on the resolution of keeping the castle for Hugh, the son of O'Donnell, and for themselves, and sent away O'Donnell's party and the doorkeeper of the fortress. O'Donnell and Calvach became enraged at this conduct, and Calvach with his followers attacked them in revenge for what they had done, and many persons were killed on either side, besides all the cattle and property that changed hands and was destroyed. Dudley, the son of Colla Mac Sweeney, a galloglass distinguished for his bravery and feats of arms, was slain by the people of the town. Donogh, the son of O'Donnell, aided the tribe of Hugh O'Gallagher; and Roderick, the son of O'Donnell, Ferdorcha, the son of John, son of Tuathal O'Gallagher, and his sons, and the son of John Ballach, son of John, were taken prisoners by Donogh, the son of O'Donnell, and by Cahir, the son of Tuathal Balbh O'Gallagher.

The son of O'Dogherty, i. e. Cahir, the son of Gerald, son of Donal, son of Felim, was slain by the sons of O'Dogherty, namely, Roderick and John, the sons of Felim, son of Conor Carrach, and they also slew the son of Hugh Gruama O'Dogherty; and O'Donnell marched with his forces against O'Dogherty, to take revenge of him for the deaths of those persons. He commenced destroying the corn of the country, until he received hostages from O'Dogherty, as pledges for the payment of his tribute, and his own demand for the crimes which had been committed. After that Cahir, the son of Tuathal Balbh, was taken prisoner by O'Dogherty, and was delivered by him into the hands of O'Donnell, and O'Donnell himself took Torlogh, the son of Felim Finn O'Gallagher, prisoner; and he conveyed those hostages to Lifford, in the hope he might recover the fortress into his possession, but did not succeed on that occasion.

The tribe of Owen Mac Sweeney, and the tribe of Cormac Mac Donogh, having gone on a predatory excursion against O'Hara Buighe, were overtaken by O'Conor, i. e. Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Hugh, and by O'Hara, who gave a defeat to the Clan Sweeney, in which Roderick Mac Dougall, the sons of Maolmurry, the son of Owen (Mac Sweeney), and a number of the tribe of Cormac Mac Donogh, together with many of their people, were slain on that occasion.

Mac Sweeney of the Districts, and his son Bryan, were taken prisoners by a fleet from West Connaught on Inis-Mac-an-Duirn (an island on the coast of Donegal), and were carried away into captivity.

Warlike dissensions arose between Maguire and the tribe of Torlogh Maguire. The tribe of Torlogh went into Tirconnell, and continued to harass and plunder the people of Fermanagh. Maguire at length came to O'Donnell, and made peace and amity with him, as he formerly had done.

Maurice, the son of Patrick O'Maolconry, a man eminent in history and poetry—a man of wealth and great affluence—a learned writer, by whom many books had been written and poems composed, and by whom schools were superintended, and who entertained many of those scholars in his own house, died, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

Cedach O'Melaghlin was inaugurated chief over the Clan Colman, in opposition to Roderick O'Melaghlin; and the Clan Colman were not in a happy state during the time of those two, which happened to have been a bloody contention, as it had been in the time of Felim, for war, plundering and burning, want and famine, lamentation and desolation, prevailed in their time in the country; rent and tribute were levied for each of them in Magh Corran (in Westmeath), and immense evils were perpetrated between them both, though short had been their government. Roderick and his kinsmen made a nocturnal attack on Moy Gallen, in Delvin (in the King's county), and burned and plundered the plain. They were pursued by Malachy Balbh O'Madden, and by Art Mac Coghlan, who gave them battle at Gallen, in which Cormac O'Melaghlin, the brother of Roderick, together with thirteen men of the chiefs of his people, were slain or drowned on that occasion.

A. D. 1544.

The earl of Clanrickard,¹ Ulick of the Heads, the most illustrious of the English of Connaught, died, and he was much lamented in his own country. A great contention arose in Clanrickard about the lordship, and Ulick, the son of Rickard Oge, was nominated the Mac William, although opposed by many in the country and at a distance, who supported the claims of the sons of Mac William, i. e. Thomas, the son of Ulick of the Heads.

Roderick O'Melaghlin was slain at Clarthia by Richard Dalton, aided by his kinsmen, in a nightly attack, and it was on behalf of Cedach O'Melaghlin they committed that murder.

The son of O'Neill, i. e. Niall Conallach, the son of Art Oge, a tanist, who suffered most by the troubles and evils of war among the Kinel Owen and the Kinel Connell of any that came of the race of Eoghan, the son of Niall; a worthy representative of the lordship of Tyrone had it been conferred on him; a man full of skill, and learned in all the arts; died in the old castle of a sudden disease.

Mac Sweeney of Fanat, i. e. Torlogh, the son of Roderick, son of Maolmurry, a brave, warlike, active man, who suffered much by war and commotion in his own country for a considerable time until then, was slain by the sons of Donal Oge Mac Sweeney, in revenge of the death of his brother, who had been slain by his sons; the names of these sons of Donal Oge, by whom that killing was committed, were Roderick Carrach, and Donal Gorm; John, the son of Donogh, son of Maolmurry, was slain, along with Mac Sweeney; but the person by whom John was killed, namely, Donal Gorm, did not escape himself without being deeply wounded. After that Roderick Carrach, the son of Donal Oge, was nominated the Mac Sweeney.

Murrough, the son of Mac Sweeney of the Districts, a man distinguished for hospitality, nobility, and activity, and his brother Donogh, died.

Margaret, the daughter of Mac Donnell, namely, the daughter of Angus of Iligh (the island of Ila, in the Hebrides), the wife of O'Donnell, i. e. of Manus, after Judith, the daughter of O'Neill, died on the 19th of December.

Sile (Julia), the daughter of Manus O'Donnell, the wife of O'Boyle, i. e. of Donal, died on the 14th of February.

Calvach, the son of O'Donnell, having gone to the English Lord justice, brought back with him some Saxon captains to the residence of O'Donnell in Tirconnell; O'Donnell, the Calvach, and those captains, with some ordnance and other im-

A. D. 1544.

1. The Earl of Clanrickard.—According to Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, on the death of Ulick Burke, earl of Clanrickard, a great contest arose between his sons about the title and inheritance, because the earl's first wife, Graine or Grace O'Carroll, who was mother of his eldest son, Richard Burke, had been formerly married to O'Melaghlin (a lord in Westmeath), who was still living and undivorced as was alleged; and she being still alive, the earl married Honora Burke, and was afterwards divorced from her, and married Mary Lynch, mother of John Burke, Graine, the first wife, being still living. But the earl of Ormond, and other commissioners sent by the lord deputy and council to settle this affair, soon determined the matter, and finding that the pretended marriage with O'Melaghlin could not be proved, adjudged Graine to be the earl's true wife, and placed her son Richard Burke in the earldom and estate of his father, according to the laws of England; and because he was under age, they made Ulick Burke captain of the country during his good behaviour, and the minority of the earl.

plements for taking towns, proceeded to Lifford, to take it from the tribe of Hugh O'Gallagher. O'Donnell delivered the hostages he had for a considerable time of the tribe of Hugh Buighe, namely, Cahir, the son of Tuathal, and Torlogh, the son of Felim Fionn, to the English, on their march to the town, to terrify and alarm the people of the fortress; they afterwards attacked the castle, but in the beginning one of the Saxons was slain, and in retaliation for the death of the Saxon, they slew Cahir, the son of Tuathal, in his chains. Hugh, the son of O'Donnell, and the tribe of Hugh O'Gallagher, then gave up the castle for the deliverance of the son of Felim Fionn, and of the other son of Tuathal Balv, who were in chains, and they themselves quit the country after that; O'Donnell, after having given the Saxons their pay, permitted them to return.

O'Donnell marched with a force into the Routes (in the north of the county of Antrim), and took Inis-an-Lochain, on which was a wooden castle, and an impregnable fortress in the possession of Mac Quillan, and after O'Donnell had taken the castle, he gave the castle to O'Kane; on the same expedition O'Donnell took the castle of Baile-an-Lacha (Ballylough, in the parish of Billy), and he found much property, consisting of arms, armour, brass, iron, butter, and provisions, in those castles; O'Donnell also took after that Inis-Locha-Burrann and Inis-Locha-Leithinnsi (Loughlynch, in the parish of Billy), in which he likewise found much property, and after having burned the surrounding country, he victoriously returned home safe.

A war arose between O'Donnell and O'Neill, and O'Donnell placed himself in ambush in the neighbourhood of the old castle; he slew several persons, and took the grandson of Bryan, and some others, prisoners on that occasion.

O'Neill made a prey along the river Finn.

Calvach O'Donnell made a prey in Tyrone.

O'Donnell made another prey in Tyrone.

The sons of Mac Donnell, namely, James and Colla, accompanied by a body of Scots, came by invitation to Mac Quillan, and they and Mac Quillan proceeded to Inis-an-Lochain, and took the town from O'Kane's guards; Bryan, the son of Donogh O'Kane and all that were with him on Inis-an-Lochain, together with all the property, arms, armour, and spoils, were entirely burned by them, and Mac

Quillan committed great destruction on O'Kane at that time.

O'Kane having taken into his pay some galloglasses of the tribe of Roderick Mac Sweeney, and on a certain day that Mac Quillan had crossed the Bann to make some prey, O'Kane pursued him along with the galloglasses and overtook them, and having taken the prey from them he slew and wounded many of his people.

The earl of Ormond having marched into Clanrickard to aid his kinsman, William Burke, the son of Rickard, he was defeated by the sons of Rickard Oge, and a brave baron belonging to his people, namely, Macoda, was slain, together with upwards of forty of the earl's forces, in the gateway of the castle of Athenry, on that occasion.

The castle of Banagher was rebuilt by O'Carroll, i. e. Teige Caoch, in spite of the opposition of the Clan Colman and the O'Maddens, who were then in contention with each other.

Malachy, the son of Breasal O'Madden, one of the two lords who governed Siol Anmcha, and he could not have been more hospitable and generous had he been sole lord, was killed by Malachy Gott O'Madden, in a week after the commencement of the rebuilding of Banagher.

A. D. 1545.

Mac Sweeney of the Districts, i. e. Owen, died in Umalia of O'Malley (in Mayo).

Eignaghan O'Donnell was slain by a party of the people of the Calvach O'Donnell.

O'Conor Sligo, i. e. Teige Oge, the son of Teige, the son of Hugh, was slain by a party of the people of Moylurg.

Calvach O'Donnell defeated the sons of O'Donnell More in the battle of Coil-na-gCuirittin, in which Donal Cairbreach O'Donnell was slain.

A part of Christ Church, in Dublin, was thrown down by some accident and a stone coffin discovered, in which was found the body of a bishop, in episcopal dress, with ten gold rings on his fingers, and a golden mass chalice standing by the side of his neck; the body lay in its own form, its size being exactly excavated in the stone; it was raised up perfect and was placed in a standing position supported by the altar, and left there for some time; no part of the body was decayed or the dress faded, which was a great sign of sanctity.

A dispute arose between the Earl of Ormond¹ and the lord justice, namely, the chancellor, and both proceeded to the king to lodge their complaints, and they both vowed that only one of them should return, which was verified, for the earl died in England, and the lord justice returned to Ireland. The death of that person, namely, James, the son of Pierce Roe, son of James, son of Edmond Bütler, would have been a great loss, were it not for all the injury he had committed against the church, by the advice of the heretics.

The son of Mac William of Clanrickard, namely, Thomas Farranta, the son of Ulick of the Heads, son of Rickard, son of Ulick of Knocktow, went on a hostile expedition into Siol Anmcha; when he was perceived in the country by the people of Siol Anmcha (the O'Maddens of Galway), they pursued him to Bealach-Tire-Ithain, where he was slain, together with twenty of the best of his party, by the people of Malachy Balbh.

Great famine happened in this year, so that six pence of the old money were paid for the loaf in Connaught, and six silver pennies in Meath.

A contention arose between O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan Ballach, the son of Owen, and his own brother by the mother's side, namely Teige, son of Cathal Oge O'Conor, lord of Sligo; great destruction was committed by both parties, and among those concerned was Torlogh O'Reilly, the relative by marriage of O'Rourke, who was killed by the shot of a ball, in the door-way of the castle of Sligo, by Cathal Oge.

Mac-I-Brien of Ara, i. e. Conla, was slain in his own castle by some prisoners whom he had in confinement.

John, the son of Giolla Duv, son of Conor, son of Donogh, son of Donal of the Defeats Mac Sweeney, was slain by Conor, the son of Murrogh, son of Conor Mac Sweeney.

Teige, the son of Thomas, son of Scanlan, son of Dermot Mac Gorman, was unkindredly killed by the sons of Murtogh Mac Gorman.

Pierse O'Morrissey, a master of schools, and one of the general lecturers of the men of Ireland, a man distinguished for charity and piety, died.

Donal, the son of the great official Mac Congal, died.

A. D. 1546.

Donal, the son of Hugh Duv O'Donnell, the son of Hugh Roe, was treacherously slain on the 20th of April, by O'Gallagher, namely, Owen, the son of Edmond, aided by his wife Honora, the daughter of Tuathal Balbh O'Gallagher, after he had been sent to his place at Inis Samer (at Ballyshannon), under the protection of God, Mac Ward, i. e. Geoffrey, and Peregrine, the son of Dermot, son of Teige Cam O'Clery; his death was a lamentable loss, for there was not a man of his age of the race of Conall, the son of Niall, from whom more was expected as a military commander.¹

Many of the Geraldines, namely, William, the son of James, son of the earl of Kildare, and Maurice of the Wood, the son of James Meirgeach, the son of the earl, and other young men along with them, rose against the English, resolved to be revenged of them for their expulsion from their estates; they committed innumerable depredations, among which were the plundering of Ballymore-Eustace (in the county of Dublin), the depredation of Rathbille (Rathvilly in Carlow), and the neighbouring district; they plundered and burned Rath

A. D. 1545.

1. The earl of Ormond.—According to Cox, great contentions arose at this time between the lord deputy, sir Anthony St. Leger, and the earl of Ormond, who opposed a tax attempted to be levied on the people by the government, the exchequer being empty; "both," says Cox, "were sent for by the king, and they proceeded to England along with the lord chancellor John Allen, who was imprisoned in the Fleet, and deprived of the great seal, and sir Thomas Cusack was made lord keeper; soon after, in the latter end of October, the earl of Ormond and thirty-five of his servants were poisoned at a feast at Ely House in Holborn, so that he and sixteen of them died, but whether this happened by accident or mistake, or was done designedly, could not be discovered."

A. D. 1546.

1. "The O'Neills, O'Donnells, and O'Doghertys," according to

Cox, "had at this time made some overtures to the French king (Francis I.) about assistance to manage an insurrection, and they proposed to him to become his subjects, and to shake off the yoke of England, provided he would procure the Pope's gift of Ireland, and send two thousand arquebusses, two hundred light horsemen, and four cannon to their assistance. The French king thought the offer so considerable, that he sent over, in the year 1545, John de Montluc, bishop of Valence, his ambassador to Ireland, to learn the truth of their circumstances, &c.; the bishop arrived at Lough Foyle on Shrove Tuesday, and the next day was, by O'Dogherty, carried to his house, which was a great dark tower; the bishop soon after went to Rome, but being unable to separate the Pope from the interest of the emperor, this negotiation had no effect."

Iomdhain (Rathangan in Kildare), and carried away on that occasion many thousand heads of cattle too numerous to be recorded.

O'Kelly and the tribe of Breasal O'Madden, made a hostile incursion into Siol Anmcha, against Malachy Gott O'Madden; the inhabitants of the country pursued and attacked them, but, however, they turned on their pursuers and slew upwards of forty of them, and the country and Ormond sustained a great loss by that conflict. Clare, Carbury, and Castle Carberry (in Kildare), were plundered and burned by the forementioned insurgents, and by the son of O'Conor Faily, i. e. Donogh. After that O'Conor himself, namely, Bryan, and O'Moore, i. e. Gillpatrick, joined in this commotion; when the lord justice, namely, Anthony St. Leger, received intelligence of this, he proceeded into Offaley, and plundered and burned the country as far as Tochar Cruachain (Croaghan in King's county), where he remained two nights, and returned without getting battle or submission. O'Moore, and the son of O'Conor, namely, Roderick, attacked the town of Ath-Ai (Athy in Kildare), burned the town and the monastery, and committed great destruction by burning and slaughter on the English and Irish inhabitants on that occasion. The lord justice marched a second time into Offaley, and remained fifteen days in the country, plundering, spoiling, and burning churches and monasteries, and destroying cattle and corn. He garrisoned the town (Athy), against O'Conor, with one hundred horsemen, one hundred musketeers, one hundred battle-axe men, and one hundred soldiers, with their attendants, and left them plenty of provisions and all other necessaries. He then marched with his large army into Leix, and the earl of Desmond came to him with a very great force to his assistance, and they continued fifteen days more plundering that country. They took a castle which belonged to O'Moore, viz., Ballyadams, which they garrisoned, and after that the lord justice despatched letters to the chiefs of Offaley, requesting them to return to their country and abandon O'Conor, and that they should receive pardon. They accordingly returned, but not long afterwards the English treacherously overran their country, and carried away many thousands of their cattle. O'Conor and O'Moore were proclaimed outlaws throughout Ireland, and their estates were seized for the king; O'Conor proceeded to Connaught for the purpose of obtaining forces, but the people of Fercall and Mac Geoghegan attacked O'Conor's party at the instigation of the lord justice, and took from them much cattle and many prisoners. The Clan Colman (O'Melaghlin of Westmeath), and Muintir Tadhagain (the Foxes of Westmeath), did the same, and it is doubtful if so much prey and booty was collected together in the latter times as had been on that occasion; so that it was after that manner the most prosperous and wealthy man of that part of Ireland in which he lived, namely, Bryan O'Conor, had been dispossessed and expelled from his territory; he however remained in Connaught until the following Christmas, after having been proclaimed a traitor by the English.

Mac Gillpatrick, i. e. Bryan, made a prisoner of his own son Teige, who was a distinguished military leader, and sent him to Dublin with his crimes written along with him, and the English put him to death at the request of his father.

New coin was introduced into Ireland made of copper,² and the Irish were compelled to use it

2. Brass Money.—In A. D. 1546, according to Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, "the necessities of the state obliged king Henry VIII., to coin brass or mixed money, and to make it current in Ireland by proclamation, to the great dissatisfaction of all the people, especially the soldiers." Ware also says that about this time king Henry, to maintain his charges in Ireland, being hard put to it for lack of monies, gave directions to coin brass money, and commanded it by proclamation to pass current and lawful money in all parts of Ireland. Simon, in his Essay on Irish Coins, says "the money struck for Ireland in this reign was little better than brass." This base coin was made current in Ireland instead of silver, in six-pences, groats, half-groats, and pennies, and it was also circulated in the reign of Edward VI.; but Simon says that queen Mary, on her accession to the crown, in order that she might ingratiate herself with the people of England, prohibited the currency of the base money there, and ordered gold and silver money to be made of a better standard; but Ireland was particularly excepted in the proclamation issued for that purpose. In A. D. 1554, the second of Philip and Mary, ten thousand pounds worth of base monies were coined for Ireland, according to Simon, and in the years 1556 and 1557, seven thousand pounds worth of the same were coined into shillings, six-pences, and groats for Ireland, and five thousand five hundred pounds more of this base money was coined into Harp-groats, so that in less than three years about twenty-three thousand pounds worth of this base money was coined and circulated in Ireland. These coins are estimated by Simon not to have been worth more than about one-fourth of the value for which they passed, so that one pound of this base money was only worth five shillings. In the reign of Elizabeth, according to Simon, the ounce of silver in England was first divided into instead of silver money. The English power was very great at this time in Ireland, and it is doubtful if the people of the south of Ireland were ever in such bondage before that time.

Teige O'Coffey, chief professor of poetry in the schools of Ireland, was taken prisoner by the English, and was imprisoned in the king's castle for a quarter and a half (three months and six weeks), on account of being in league with the Irish, and it was believed he would be put to death, but at length he escaped safe.

The English built the castle of Dangan (at Philipstown, in King's county), and pulled down the church of Killduirti, and used the materials in the work; they also plundered the parson of Croaghan.

A. D. 1547.

Edward VI. was proclaimed king of England on the 28th of January.¹

sixty pennies, which was in ancient times divided only into twenty pennies, so that one of the old silver pennies of the reigns of the Edwards was equal to three pence of the reign of Elizabeth. The base money coined by Elizabeth being decried in England, says Simon, was sent over in great quantities into Ireland, where the Bungals, as they were then called, went for six-pence, and the broad pieces for twelve pence, but in a short time after, the former passed only for two-pence, and the latter for a groat, and when they were refused elsewhere, they passed in Connaught, the first for one-penny, and the last for two-pence. Bunn or Bonn was the Irish term applied to various coins from a groat to a shilling, and geal means white, and the Bungals above-mentioned signify shillings; the broad piece mentioned was about half-a-crown, but of such base metal that its value was afterwards reduced to two-pence, and the shilling passed for one-penny. About the year 1600, according to Simon, money was coined for the service of the army in Ireland, so debased that it contained only between two and three ounces of silver to nine ounces of brass; this base money, according to sir John Davies, Fynes Morrison, Camden, and Simon, was sent over in great quantities to pay the army engaged in Ireland against Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, as the war drew yearly out of England upwards of one hundred and sixty thousand pounds sterling. This base money, being extensively circulated, caused goods and provisions of all kinds to rise to double the usual price, and produced great impoverishment and discontent, not only amongst the Irish, but in the English army. In the reign of James I., proclamations were issued ordering the base money of the reign of Elizabeth to pass at one-fourth its former value, that is, the shilling for three-pence, and the six-penny piece for three half-pence; and in the same reign it was ordered that money should pass current in Ireland at one-third more than in England, thus an English shilling passed for sixteen pence in Ireland, five shillings for six and eight pence, and a pound was equal to about twenty-six shillings. King James II., to supply funds for the support of his army, and various expenses in Ireland, was under the necessity of substituting base money for silver, and, according to Simon, set up two mints, one in Limerick, and the other in Capel-street, Dublin, where a vast quantity of base money was coined, consisting of half-crowns, shillings, and six-pences, made of a mixed metal of a whitish colour, consisting of copper, brass, and tin, and also some Mac Sweeney of Banagh, i. e. Niall Oge, was slain on the 3rd of September, by his brother's sons, the sons of Maolmurry, Donal Oge and Bryan Oge. The place where he was killed was in the new bawn, where he had been imprisoned for the death of his father, whom he had slain on a former occasion; their other brother, Maolmurry Meirgeach, did not join them in that slaying.

Mora, the daughter of O'Carroll, an excellent and hospitable woman, died.

The insurgents suffered a great defeat at the town of the Three Castles (in the county of Kilkenny), by the English, and by Brian-an-Chog-aigh (Bryan of the War), the son of Torlogh O'Toole, in which the two sons of James, the son of the earl (of Kildare), namely, Maurice of the Wood, and Henry, together with fourteen of their people, were taken prisoners, and afterwards conveyed to Dublin, and all cut in quarters except Maurice, who was confined in the king's castle until it might be determined by the council what pennies made of copper and lead or pewter, and circulated throughout the country as a substitute for silver coin. The various base coinages made current in Ireland by the kings and queens of England, and extensively circulated instead of silver money, were, of course, extremely injurious to the trade and commerce of the country, and greatly impoverished the inhabitants.

A. D. 1547.

1. King Edward VI.—At the death of Henry VIII., on the 28th of January, A. D. 1547, Edward, his son by Jane Seymour, then only in the tenth year of his age, succeeded as king Edward VI., and on the 20th of February was crowned at Westminster. Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, the king's maternal uncle, was created duke of Somerset, and made protector of the kingdom during his minority; king Edward died on the 6th of July, A. D. 1553, in the sixteenth year of his age, and seventh of his reign.

Lords Lieutenant.—The following account of the lords lieutenant and deputies during the reign of Edward VI., has been collected from Ware, Cox, Borlase, &c. In A. D. 1547, sir Anthony St. Leger was a third time appointed lord deputy, and in the same year sir William Brahaizon, and in 1548 sir Edward Bellingham landed at Dalkey, and was made captain-general and marshal of Ireland, with a force of 600 horse, and 400 foot, and was, according to Borlase, a man of great valour, and a celebrated military commander:—"vir fortissimus et militari scientia clarus;" he was recalled the same year, and soon after died in England. St. Leger, according to Cox and Borlase, took with him to England Bryan O'Connor and Patrick O'Moore, the great lords of Offaley and Leix, whom he had formerly subdued, to each of whom the king gave a yearly pension of one hundred pounds, but O'Moore died in London the same year. In 1549, sir Francis Bryan, an Englishman who had married the countess dowager of Ormond, and was governor of the counties of Tipperary and Kilkenny, was appointed marshal of the army and lord justice, and sworn in Christ Church, Dublin, the 29th of December, but died the 2nd of February following, at Clonmel, when advancing against Teige O'Carroll, lord of Ely, and was buried in great state in the cathedral church of Waterford. In the same year sir William Brabazon, vice-treasurer, was a third time appointed lord justice, and carried on a campaign against Cahir Mac Art O'Cavenagh in death he should receive. These plunderers and insurgents were thus scattered and put to flight after that manner; and although their power was of short continuance, being only one year, yet they committed immense depredations.

O'Connor and O'Moore, after some of their clans had gone for them to Ath-Croich (a ford at Shannon Harbour), crossed the Shannon, and collected a great force, for the purpose of taking revenge on the English, who deprived them of their estates and properties, and they afterwards passed into Leinster.

A great wind arose on the night before the festival of St. Bridget, (31st of January), and it is doubtful if so great occurred since the birth of Christ; it destroyed churches, monasteries, and castles, and particularly the two western wings of the church of Clonmacnois.

The English exercised such great authority and power, that all persons dreaded to give food or protection to O'Connor or O'Moore.

Anthony St. Leger was deprived of the lord justiceship, and Edward Bellingham, a new lord justice, succeeded in his place.

Maurice of the Wood, the son of the earl of Kildare, was put to death in Dublin.

A great prey was seized, viz. five hundred cows, by Malachy Gott O'Madden, in Hy Donnellan (the country of the O'Donnellans, in Galway).

The castle of Athlone was repaired by the English, namely, by William Brabazon, the King's treasurer in Ireland, and by the English and Irish of Meath, despite of O'Kelly, i. e. Donogh, the son of Edmond, and the Irish of Connaught. The lord justice's forces were at that time in Leix, constructing a fortified rampart at O'Regan's Bawn, in which they left guards to oppose O'Connor and O'Moore.

Covthach, the son of Malachy, son of Breasal

O'Madden, the best young man of his age, viz. 21 years, of his own tribe, was slain by the people of O'Carroll, and of Malachy Balv O'Madden; Murrough Riavach, the son of O'Madden, the brother of Malachy Balv, who was in imprisonment with Covthach, was hanged in revenge of him, by Covthach's kinsmen and people, and the two were carried at the same time to be interred.

O'Connor and Cahir Roe, along with their kinsmen, entered into a new compact with each other against the English, for the English deprived those also of their estates, as they had deprived O'Connor; and it was on that account they joined in alliance with O'Connor.

O'Moore, and the sons of Cahir O'Connor, made a hostile incursion into the county of Kildare, and they burned and plundered the greater portion of the territory of the Eustaces; they after that remained in the country until the lord justice overtook them, defeated the Irish, and slew two hundred of their foot soldiers on that occasion.

O'Melaghlin, i. e. Conn, the son of Art, and his kinsmen, were defeated by Niall, the son of Felim O'Melaghlin, and the people of the baron of Delvin, in Faithche Ciarain, in which Conn O'Melaghlin, and his brother Cormac, tanist of Clan Colman, together with one or two score along with them, were slain.

O'Connor, i. e. Bryan, and O'Moore, i. e. Gillpatrick, after having been forsaken by the Irish, made their submission unconditionally, under the guarantee of an English nobleman, namely, the lieutenant, and that was a bad protection.

Peregrine, the son of Edmond Mac Coghlan, chief of his own tribe, was treacherously slain by Malachy O'Melaghlin, and by Murrough, the son of Torlogh.

Mac Murrough (lord of Leinster), i. e. Murtogh, the son of Art Buighe, died.

Leinster; Brabazon died, says Borlase, on the 7th of the Ides of July, in the tents in Ulster, and was buried in Trinity Church, Dublin, and his heart carried to England. In A. D. 1550, sir Anthony St. Leger, about the 10th of September, arrived at Dublin, being the fourth time appointed lord deputy; Cahir Mae Art Cavenagh, says Borlase, made his submission, solemnly renouncing before him, the council, and many lords, the name of Mac Murrough. In A. D. 1551, sir James Crofts was designed as deputy, but coming to Dublin while St. Leger was in Munster, he did not receive the sword till May the 23rd, at Cork, where St. Leger then was. During his time, says Borlase, "even this year a King of Arms, a Herald, named Ulster, was first instituted in Ireland; his province was all Ireland, and the first that had it was Nicholas Narbon." Borlase further remarks—"the Liturgy in English was also this year printed in Dublin, and enjoined by authority; many memorable acts he (Crofts), did in Ireland; he repaired the castle of Belfast, and placed a garrison there; coming for England he was certified by sir Henry Knowles, that Mary, dowager of Scotland, (queen of James V.), had sent O'Connor's son into Ireland to give encouragement to a new insurrection, which by his prudence, deferring his journey, he prevented without noise, and took ship for England at Howth, December 4th 1552. In the year 1552 sir Thomas Cusaek, of Coffington in Meath, lord chancellor, and sir Gerald Aylmer, chief justice of the King's Bench, were on December 4th, in Trinity Church, Dublin, constituted lords justices.

A. D. 1548.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, gave his own son Calvach, and O'Kane, namely, Manus, the son of Donogh, a signal overthrow at Sraith-Bo-Fiaich (Ballybofey, in the barony of Raphoe, county of Donegal), in which O'Kane himself, and many others, were slain, on the 7th of February.

Mary, the daughter of Mac Conmee, died on the 4th of April.

O'Connor and O'Moore went to England, along with the lieutenant, at the mercy of the king, and the king gave their estates, viz., Leix and Offaley, to the lieutenant and his kinsman, (the Bel-linghams), who built two large courts, namely, the camp in Leix, (Maryboro', in Queen's county), and the Dangan in Offaley (Philipstown, in King's county). They then began to let those lands for rent to the English and Irish, as if they had been their own rightful inheritance, after having dispossessed and expelled their hereditary heirs, O'Connor and O'Moore, with their families, and all their kindred.

O'Melaghlin, i. e. Teige Roe, brought Edmond a Faihi (called by Cox and Mac Geoghegan Edmond Fahy, by others Edmond White), and his Leinster forces with him, into Delvin, to plunder it; and it so happened that Malachy, the son of Art O'Melaghlin, was taken prisoner by Edmond Fahy, and sent by him to Dublin, although he had come to the country along with Edmond himself, at the request of the king's council. The castle of Kinkora and the monastery of Gallen (both in King's county), were taken by O'Melaghlin, and by Edmond, but O'Melaghlin returned in sorrow, without gaining hostages or submission. Edmond Fahy was engaged at the same time in taking possession of Delvin (in the King's county), on behalf of the king, and in opposition to O'Melaghlin, so that it was after that manner O'Melaghlin had brought a rod with him by which he was himself beaten, for Edmond Fahy dispossessed and expelled himself and all his race from Delvin, and drove him from it as the new swarm (of bees) drives away the old swarm. After that he nominated Art, the son of Cormac, the Mac Coghlan; he took that portion of the country belonging to Cormac, the son of Ferdorcha, from him, and then plundered, expelled, and banished him across the Shannon, westward into Hy Maine, and after expelling Cormac he took possession of the castle of Kilcoman, into which he put the provisions of the tribe of Fergal, and his own guards. Cormac and the Hy Manians marched, on the 9th of May, with a force into Delvin, and burned and completely plundered Cluain-I-Flaithile and Knock-Ratha-Benain, and slew six persons, and the only son of O'Siaghail (O'Sheil), i. e. Murtoigh, the best physician of his age in the surrounding neighbourhood. It happened afterwards that they encountered Mac Coghlan, the people of the country, and their hired soldiers who accompanied them, at Bel-atha-nageaorach (the ford of the sheep), on Dubh Abhain (the black river), in which engagement Cormac and his forces were defeated, and upwards of twenty of them were slain, along with Malachy, the son of John O'Kelly, Felim, the son of O'Fallon, and the son of Dougall Mac Naghtan; they lost upwards of twenty horses, together with much arms and armour, and many of them were drowned; on the following Monday they were all beheaded, and their heads were brought to the town of Edmond Fahy, viz. Bally Macadams, in Kinel Fearga, in Ely O'Carroll, and were raised on spears as trophies of victory.

Edmond Fahy encamped before the castle of Fedan for the space of eight days, and Cormac Mac Coghlan, who was in the castle, was compelled to give him hostages, after which he and Edmond made a gossipship with each other.

A great war having arisen between the French, English, and Scotch, Donogh, the son of O'Connor Faily, and the sons of Cahir O'Connor, entered into the king's pay, and were sent to England to aid in the war, along with a great number of fighting kerns of Leinster and Meath, and were thus removed from their patrimony.

Calvach O'Carroll went to Dublin, to attend the great court, but he was treacherously taken prisoner, and confined in the king's castle, and none obtained any information of the cause, or how he could be ransomed.

The lieutenant (sir Francis Bryan), and Edmond Fahy, marched with their forces twice into Ely, on which account O'Carroll, i. e. Teige Lusc, got greatly alarmed, and consequently a war broke out between them. Not long afterwards Edmond Fahy demanded of Mac Coghlan, and the people of Delvin, to march with him on a predatory incursion into Ely; they however refused to comply with his request, on which account Edmond became enraged and exasperated, and dissensions having ensued, O'Carroll and Mac Coghlan expelled Edmond, on account of his tyranny and overbearing conduct towards them; they took the castle of Kilcoman, and the castle of Kincora, from him, and it was after that manner he was deprived of Delvin, after having been in dire bondage by him for half a-year.

Saighir Chiarain (Seirkeiran, in King's county), and Killcormae, were burned by the English, and by O'Carroll.

The lieutenant and the English marched with a force into Delvin, at the instigation of Edmond Fahy, to take revenge for his expulsion; they burned and plundered from Bealach-an-Fothair to Tochar, and also the town of Mac Huallachan, in Lusmagh (in King's county); they remained encamped for a night at Ballynacloiche, and returned home on the following day with prey and booty, without battle or conflict.

Magh-Slaine (a plain in Westmeath), was laid waste by O'Melaghlin, i. e. Teige Roe, aided by the English of Athlone, and the fleet of the Caladh (that is, of the port on the Shannon near Athlone).

The castle of Ely, the castle of Delvin, i. e. Banagher, the castle of Magh-Isdean (Moystown, in King's county), and Clochan-na-gCeapach (Cloghan, in King's county), were demolished, lest they should be taken possession of by the English.

The Red Captain (supposed to be one of the Butlers of Ormond), marched with a force against O'Carroll to Carraic-an-Chomhraic¹ (in the barony of Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary), and O'Carroll gave them battle, in which he slew two or three score of them. The Red Captain marched at three different times with his forces in one-quarter of a year to Carrick-an-Chomhraic, but he did not succeed in gaining the castle, or any part of the country, and was obliged to return without obtaining any advantage, after having sustained much injury, and losing many of his men.

Cahir Roe O'Connor was taken prisoner by Rickard Saxanagh Burke (Rickard Burke, earl of Clanrickard, surnamed Saxanagh, or the Saxon), who delivered him into the hands of the English.

O'Carroll burned the Aonach (Nenagh in Tipperary), both monastery and town, from the fortress outwards, and on the same occasion he burned the monastery of Uaithne (Owney in Tipperary), expelled the English therefrom, and confounded them very much, and subdued their strength and power so much, that he commanded them to quit his country (Ormond in Tipperary, which was part of Ely O'Carroll), except alone a few guards which were in Nenagh, viz., in the Tower, of the son of Manus. Cahir Roe O'Connor was put to death in Dublin, and Malachy O'Melaghlin was liberated from his imprisonment with the English.

O'Moore, i. e. Gillpatrick, died suddenly in England, and his death would have been a great loss were it not for the power of the English.

Moy Corran, both houses and churches, was plundered by O'Carroll, i. e. Teige Caoch, and by Mac Coghlan, namely, Art, the son of Cormac, in

A. D. 1548.

1. Carraic-an-Chomhraic, considered to be Carriekahorig, in the barony of Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary, near the Shannon, between Furtunna and Burrisokane. There are various other places mentioned in the Annals in the course of this year, the situation of which has not been exactly explained. Caislen Cinnehoradli was a castle at the place now called Kincor, within about half a mile of Ferbane, on the northern bank of the Greater Brosna river, opposite to the priory of Gallen. Caislen Cilleomain was a castle situated at the place now called Kileummin, in the parish of Tissarin, barony of Garrycastle, King's county, between the towns of Cloghan and Shannon Bridge. Cluain-l-Flaithile is supposed to be Clonaughil near Birr, where a castle formerly stood. Cnoc-Ratha-Benain, considered to be the place now called the Knock, near Leap castle, in the barony of Ballybrit, King's county. Bel-Atha-na-gCaorach, on the Black river, was situated on the Blackwater, a small river about two miles north of the Greater Brosna, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county. Caislen-an-Fheadain is now Fadden castle, near Belmount, in the parish of Tissarin, King's county. Saighir Chiarain is the parish of Saiger or Seirkieran, in King's county. Kilcormaic is now called Frankford, a town in the King's county, in the ancient territory of Fer-call, the principality of the O'Mulloys, and this church was their chief burial place. Bel-Atha-an-Fhothair, probably the townland between Birr and Banagher, called Ballaghanagher. Tochar, supposed to be in the parish of Lusmagh, King's county. Baile-Mie-Uallachain, also in the parish of Lusmagh, near the Shannon, about two miles west of Banagher, barony of Garrycastle, an ancient district possessed by the O'Hoolaghans, now called Coolaghans. Baile-na-Cloiche is a townland in Lusmagh, known by the name of Coolelough and Ballynaeloughe, adjoining Ballymaecoolahan. Clochan-na-gCeapach, now Cloghan, in the King's county. At A. D. 1546, Tochar Cruachain, mentioned in the text, is the place now called Togher, near Croaghan Hill, about four miles from Philipstown, in the King's county; it derived its name from the great Togher, or bog-pass, through which a road led in former times towards Meath. For the accurate topographical accounts of these places the translator is indebted to the information kindly communicated by that learned antiquary, Thomas L. Cooke, Esq., of Parsonstown, in the King's county, author of the History of Parsonstown or Birr.

revenge of the treachery of the Delvinians, and they encamped that night at Leacach Amadlain.

John, the son of O'Neill, marched with a force against the Clanaboy, and Bryan Fogartach O'Neill, the son of Niall Oge, son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe, a prosperous and warlike man, and a man distinguished for benevolence and hospitality, and the resplendent luminary of his own tribe, was slain by John O'Neill on that expedition.

A. D. 1549.

O'Boyle, i. e. Donal, the son of Niall, son of Torlogh, died on the 4th of August.

Eveleen, the daughter of O'Donnell, and wife of O'Boyle, died.

Malachy Gott O'Madden, tanist of Siol Anmcha, was slain by Malachy Modardha O'Madden, and his kinsmen, in revenge of his father and brother.

Niall O'Melaghlin attacked the house in which O'Melaghlin, i. e. Teige Roe, and his kinsman Murrough were, in the town of Newcastle (probably Newtown in Fertullagh, in Westmeath). The house was burned over them, and upwards of twenty persons in it were either killed or wounded, nine of them were slain on the spot, and O'Melaghlin and his kinsman escaped, but Murrough was wounded on that occasion.

The lord justice, Edward Bellingham, went to England, and William Brabazon, i. e. the treasurer, was appointed in his place, and a great court was held in Limerick by that lord justice. O'Carroll went to that court under the guarantee of the earl of Desmond, the mayor of Limerick, and the English and Irish nobles who attended that court, and he returned back safe, after having gained terms of peace for himself and for those of the Irish in alliance with him, namely, Mac Murrough, O'Kelly, O'Melaghlin, and several others who are not recorded.

Bally Mac Adam was taken from Edmond Fahy, and the O'Carrolls were reinstated in it, which was a source of great joy and gladness to the people of Ely.

Donogh O'Ferrall, tanist of the O'Ferralls (of Longford), was treacherously slain by his own brother.

O'Sullivan, i. e. Dermot, a warlike, valiant, friendly, and pious man, was burned by powder in his own castle (at Dunboy, in the county of Cork), and his brother, Awlave O'Sullivan, who succeeded him, was afterwards slain.

A. D. 1550.

Roderick, the son of Donogh, son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, bishop of Derry, and a friar of the unrestricted order (of Franciscans), died on the 8th of October, and was interred at Donegal, in the habit of St. Francis.

The abbot of Easroe (Ballyshannon), John, the son of Donal Roe O'Gallagher, died on the 29th of April.

Mac Sweeney of Banagh, i. e. Torlogh Meirgeach, was slain in the town of Mac Sweeney, by the Clan Coilin, namely, William, Teige, and John, and by the Clan Coinaigeann (probably Cunninghamams from Scotland), on the 8th of January. Roderick Ballach, the son of Owen Roe Mac Sweeney, having gone to obtain the lordship of Tir Banagh from O'Donnell, and not having succeeded, he proceeded to Killybegs, and completely plundered the town, but in a quarter of a year after that he was slain by Maolmurry, the son of Hugh, on the 31st day of March.

Mac Ward of Tirconnell, i. e. Fergal, the son of Donal Roe, a man truly learned in poetry, and a professor of schools, a man distinguished for fame and excellence throughout Ireland in his time, and who kept a house of general hospitality, died.

Anthony St. Leger, who was lord justice in Ireland before, came again as lord justice, and a great number of the Irish chieftains repaired to meet him at the great court in Dublin.

Rickard Saxanagh, the son of Ulick of the Heads, was nominated earl (of Clanrickard).

A. D. 1551.

The archbishop of Cashel, Edmond Butler, the son of Pierce, earl of Ormond, died.

Murrough, the son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh O'Brien, earl of Thomond, by the English and the king, but always O'Brien according to the Irish usage, a victorious man in battle, valiant in combat, respected, rich and of great affluence, the first man of the race of the O'Briens who was called earl, died, and his brother's son, Donogh, the son of Conor, was appointed his successor.

Cathbhar, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe (O'Donnell); the son of O'Boyle, and the son of Mac Sweeney of Banagh, together with a long ship's crew, were slain by the Scots at Toraigh (Tory Island, off the coast of Donegal), on the 16th of September.

Graine (Grace), the daughter of Manus, son of Hugh, son of Hugh Roe (O'Donnell), the wife of O'Rourke, i. e. of Bryan, the son of Owen, died on the 29th of September.

The lord justice, Anthony St. Leger, was recalled, and James Crofts was sent to Ireland to succeed him as lord justice.

The lord justice marched with a force in the beginning of harvest into Ulster, and despatched the crews of four ships to Reachrann (the Island of Rathlin, off the coast of Antrim), to plunder it. James and Colla Maol Duv, the sons of Mac Donnell of Scotland, were on the island to defend the place; an engagement ensued, in which the Saxons were overthrown, and not one of them escaped to tell the tale excepting the lieutenant who commanded them, whom the Scots kept as a prisoner until they got in his stead their own brother, namely, Somhairle Buidhe Mac Donnell (commonly called Sorley Boy Mac Donnell), who had been imprisoned by the English of Dublin, a year before that time, besides another great ransom along with him.

A great court was held in Dublin upon the return of the lord justice. O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Con, earl of Tyrone, was taken prisoner at that time, through the accusations and complaints of his own son, Ferdorcha, i. e. the baron, whereupon the young sons of O'Neill waged a great war against the English and the baron, in revenge of the imprisonment of their father, and much destruction was committed between them.

The English marched with a force again into Ulster to avenge their enmity upon the sons of Mac Donnell, the sons of O'Neill, and the son of Niall Oge, son of Niall, son of Conn, son of Hugh Buighe. The Ultonians and Scots were prepared to meet them, and after they had encountered each other, a fierce and desperate battle ensued, in which the English were defeated, and two hundred of the Saxons, and of their Irish allies, were slain, and such of them as escaped returned in disgrace and discomfiture from that expedition.

A great court was held in Athlone, and Mac Coghlan having repaired thither, obtained his pardon, and a patent for his estate, and Delvin Eathra (barony of Garrycastle, in King's county), was put under rent for the king.

O'Connor Faily, i. e. Bryan, who was incarcerated since the time he had been conveyed to England, having made an effort to escape, was retaken; his life was however again spared, but he was condemned to lasting imprisonment.

Donal Mac Congal died.

A. D. 1552.

Clonmacnois was plundered and devastated by the English of Athlone; they took the large bells out of the Cloiteach (the steeple or belfry), and left neither large nor small bell, image, altar, book, gem, nor even glass in a window in the walls of the church, that they did not carry away with them; and that truly was a lamentable deed, to plunder the city of Kiaran, the patron saint.

Teige O'Rourke, the son of Owen, tanist of Brefney, was hanged by his own people. Some have asserted that Bryan O'Rourke, his father's brother, was concerned in that execution.

Mac Sweeney, of Fanat, i. e. Roderick; Niall, his kinsman; and Bryan, the son of Edmond, were treacherously slain at Mainister.

Mahon, the son of Bryan, son of Teige, son of Torlogh O'Brien, was slain by the people of Donogh, the son of Conor O'Brien.

The son of O'Brien of Thomond, i. e. Dermot, the son of Murrough, son of Torlogh, died on the night of the festival of St. Bridget, and was interred in the monastery of Ennis.

A great war arose this year, between the English on one side and the Ultonians, excepting a few, and the Scots on the other side, and many evils were committed between them.

The lord justice (sir James Crofts), marched again with an army into Ulster against the son of Niall Oge, namely, Hugh O'Neill (O'Neill of Clanaboy), and the Scots. A party of the English headed by the son of Savadge, proceeded before them with a preying force, but were met at Belfast by the son of Niall Oge, who vigorously attacked them, put them to flight, and killed the son of Savadge, together with two or three score of his men. The other forces, however, advanced, and commenced to build a castle at Belfast, but they gained no victory, took no spoils or hostages, and their pride was very much humbled on that occasion. Ferdorcha, i. e. the baron, the son of O'Neill, marched with a great force to aid the lord justice and the English, but not being able to come up to them that night, he encamped in their neighbourhood. John Donnngail each O'Neill, his brother, pursued him with another party, made a nocturnal attack upon the camp of the baron's forces, and defeated and slew an immense number of his men. William Brabazon, the king's treasurer in Ireland for a long period, and who was for some time lord justice, and by whom a court was erected in Athlone, died on the same expedition; his body was conveyed in a ship to Dublin, and his heart was afterwards sent to the king as a token of his services and loyalty towards him.

O'Neill being still in imprisonment, his son John Donnngail each, and the son of Niall Oge, namely Hugh, carried on the war against the baron and the English, to revenge his incarceration.

The lord justice marched with another army into Ulster in harvest, and only succeeded in destroying the crops; some of his people were slain, and he returned without gaining submission or peace.

A great war arose between O'Reilly and the Saxons, and O'Reilly committed many depredations on them.

O'Connor Faily being in England, no person expected his return.

The baron of Delvin (Nugent of Westmeath), having gone to England, returned back after having transacted his affairs to his satisfaction.

The lord justice, James Croft, having gone to England, the chancellor, Thomas Cusack, i. e. Cusack of Ballycuisin (in Meath), was appointed lord justice in his place.

A. D. 1553.

Mary was proclaimed queen of England on the 6th of July.¹

Donal and Torlogh, the sons of Conor O'Brien,

A. D. 1553.

1. Queen Mary.—On the death of Edward VI., on the 6th of July, 1553, his sister Mary, then in the 37th year of her age, succeeded as queen of England; she was daughter of Henry VIII. by his first wife Catherine of Arragon, who was daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Spain, and widow of prince Arthur, brother of king Henry VIII. Mary was created princess of Wales, but after the divorce of her mother she was deprived of that title, which was conferred on the princess Elizabeth, daughter of king Henry by Anne Boleyn. Edward VI. was induced to alter by his will the succession to the crown in favour of lady Jane Grey, and exclude his sister Mary, she being a Roman Catholic. Lady Jane Grey was daughter of Henry Grey, marquess of Dorset and duke of Suffolk, and being maternally descended from king Henry VII. of England, and from Louis XII., king of France, was therefore of the blood royal, and considered to have some claim to the crown; she was married to lord Guildford Dudley, son of John Dudley, earl of Warwick and duke of Northumberland, who conspired to exclude Mary from the throne, and had his daughter-in-law, lady Jane, proclaimed queen of England, but she reigned only ten or twelve days. The duke of Northumberland headed an insurrection in support of lady Jane, but was defeated by queen Mary's forces, taken prisoner, and executed on Tower Hill, in August, 1553, and in February 1554, lady Jane Grey and her husband lord Dudley, who were imprisoned in the Tower, were likewise beheaded for high treason. In July 1554, Mary was married in the cathedral of Winchester to Philip, prince of Spain, son of Charles V., emperor of Germany; Philip became king of Spain as Philip II. in 1556, so that he was at the same time king of Spain and king-consort of England; for by an act of the English Parliament Philip was permitted to take the title of king of England during the life of queen Mary; hence this reign is designated "the reign of Philip and Mary," and their coins were struck as those of Philip and Mary. As Philip became king of Spain, Naples, and Sicily, and was a prince of the German empire, the titles borne by him and his queen in all public documents were "Philip and Mary, by the grace of God, king and queen of England, Ireland, France, Spain, Naples, Sicily, and Jerusalem, defenders of the faith, arch-duke and arch-duchess of Austria, duke and duchess of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant, count and countess of Hapsburgh, Flanders, and Tyrol." The king resided sometimes in England, and occasionally in Spain, during the life of his queen, and Mary died on the 17th of November, 1558, in the 43rd year of her age, and the 6th of her reign.

Lords Lieutenant.—In 1553, sir Thomas Cusack, lord chancellor, and sir Gerald Aylmer, chief justice of the King's Bench, were lords justices, and in the same year on the 11th of November, sir Anthony St. Leger landed at Dalkey, being a fifth time appointed lord deputy, and was sworn and received the sword in Trinity Church, Dublin, on the 19th of the same month; he continued till 1556, when he returned to England. In 1556 Thomas Ratcliffe, viscount Fitz-Walter, and afterwards earl of Sussex, was appointed lord deputy, and arrived in Dublin on Whit Sunday, and was sworn in Christ Church. The earl of Sussex, says Cox, brought over with him twenty-five thousand pounds in money to provide against the Scots Islanders, and Irish rebels; he made an expedition into Ulster against the Scots, who in great numbers came from Argyleshire and the Hebrides, under the Mac Donnells, Mac Dougalls, and other Scottish chiefs at this period, and made frequent incursions into Ulster, particularly in Down and Antrim, against the English settlers there; the Scots were generally in alliance with the O'Neills, O'Donnells, and other chiefs of Ulster, against the English government, and it appears that their chief place of rendezvous was the island of Rathlin, off the coast of Antrim. The Scots Islanders besieged Carrickfergus at this time, but they were defeated by the lord deputy in July, and two hun-made a nocturnal attack on their brother Donogh More, the son of Conor, lord of Thomond, at Clonroad (at Ennis in Clare); they plundered and burned the town, and slew some people, and O'Brien, i. e. Donogh, betook himself to the tower which was in the town for protection; that transaction took place in the beginning of Lent, and the cause of that contention among the O'Briens was, that Donogh had obtained from the king the right of succession for his own son, on whom the title of baron was conferred in opposition to his senior, therefore these brothers became incensed, and perpetrated the forementioned attack, although some have asserted that they were not justified in the act they committed. In consequence of this, disturbances arose in Thomond, but this contention did not long continue, for Donogh More O'Brien, the earl of Thomond, having died on Passion Saturday following, Donal succeeded in his place.

Judith, the daughter of Manus O'Donnell, the wife of O'Conor Sligo, died on the 16th of June.

Donogh, the son of Torlogh, son of Murrough O'Brien, died.

Niall, the son of Felim O'Melaghlin, tanist of Clan Colman, a prosperous and warlike man, and the best man of his age belonging to his tribe, was treacherously slain by O'Melaghlin, namely, Teige Roe, at Bel-an-Atha, while returning from the court of Mullingar.

Moy Corran (in Westmeath) was plundered, and its castles taken, viz., Clonlonan and Caislean Nua (Newcastle), and O'Melaghlin was expelled therefrom by the baron of Delvin, and the English of Athlone, in revenge of the death of Niall, the son of Felim.

Mac William Burke, i. e. Richard-an-Iarainn (of the Iron), was defeated by the sons of Thomas Bacach Burke, and the people of Gallen (in Mayo), and Richard himself was taken prisoner, and one hundred and fifty of his forces slain.

O'Brien, i. e. Donal, marched with a force into Leinster, and held a conference with the English in Leix at the Port (probably Portuehinch or Portarlinton, in Queen's county), and they separated in peace; they took hostages from O'Carroll as guarantees for keeping the peace.

The daughter of O'Conor Faily, i. e. Margaret, went to England on the strength of her friends and relatives there, and also of her knowledge of the English language, to ask the release of her father of Queen Mary, and having appealed to her mercy, she obtained the release of her father, whom she brought with her to Ireland; other hostages were, however, given in his stead to the lord justice and the council, namely Roderick O'Conor, the eldest of his own sons, and others along with him.

Gerald Oge and Edward, the sons of the earl of dred of them slain, and sir Henry Sydney, who accompanied the deputy, slew with his own hand James Mac Connell or Mac Donnell; the earl of Ormond and sir John Stanley likewise behaved with great bravery. The lord deputy having placed a garrison and supplies in Carrickfergus, returned to Dublin, and left Stanley as governor of Ulster. These invasions of the Scots were so frequent and fierce, that an act was passed at this time in the Irish Parliament, and, according to Cox and Campion, it was made treason to introduce or receive any of the Scots into Ireland, and it was made felony for the Irish or English to intermarry with the Scots without a license under the great seal. The lord deputy then marched to Leinster and Munster, and received the submission of many chiefs. In 1557, in the months of June and July, Sussex held a Parliament in Dublin, which in November was adjourned to Limerick, and in the following March to Drogheda. Amongst other acts passed in it, statutes were enacted, says Cox, to punish heresies and to repeal all acts against the Pope in the reign of Henry VIII., also for forming into counties the territories of Offaley and Leix, which belonged to the O'Conors, O'Mulloys, O'Carrolls, Mac Coghilans, O'Moores, O'Dempseys, O'Dunns, &c., and they were accordingly formed into the King's and Queen's counties, the chief town of the former, anciently named Dangan, being called Philipstown, in honour of king Philip, and the chief town of the latter Maryborough, from queen Mary. The lord deputy in July went on an expedition against the O'Maddens of Galway, and took from them the castle of Meelick; in August he again marched into Ulster with his forces, accompanied by the earls of Kildare and Ormond, and the barons of Baltinglass, Delvin, Dunboyne, and Dunsaney; he attacked the Scots and Irish, but only succeeded in taking some preys; in October he came to Dundalk, spoiled the country and burned Armagh, except the cathedral; he thence marched to Newry, returned to Dublin, and went to England. In 1557 Hugh Curwin, an Englishman, archbishop of Dublin, and lord chancellor, with sir Henry Sydney, treasurer, were appointed lords justices, and in the same year Sydney was appointed lord deputy, and made some expeditions against the O'Mulloys of Fereall, and other chiefs in King's county. In 1558 Thomas, earl of Sussex, returned as lord deputy, and was sworn in Christ Church, on the 1st of May; he brought over with him five hundred soldiers, and, says Cox, "had an order to coin brass money and make it current by proclamation, which he did." In June he marched into Munster against Donal O'Brien, he proceeded to Limerick and Thomond, dispersed their forces, took the castles of Bunratty and Clare, and restored the country to the earl of Thomond. In June the earl of Desmond made his submission to the deputy; he next proceeded to Galway, and was well received by the bishops and clergy of Tuam, Clonfert, and Clonmacnoise, who went to meet him in procession. In September the deputy shipped his forces at Dalkey, and sailed to Ulster to attack the Scots; he proceeded to the island of Raghlin, off the coast of Antrim, and, though he lost one of his ships in a storm, he took the island from the Scots, placed a garrison in it, and having sailed to the coast of Scotland, he plundered and laid waste Cantire and other parts of Argyleshire and the Hebrides; he then returned to Carrickfergus, burned the possessions of the Scots in Autrim, and came to Dublin in November.

Kildare, returned to Ireland after having been in exile at Rome, in Italy, and in France, for the space of sixteen years, and they obtained the restoration of their estates and of the earldom from the queen. The son of the earl of Ossory, i. e. Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce Butler, also returned, and was appointed earl in his father's place. The heir of the Mac Gillpatrick, i. e. Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan, also returned along with the sons of the earl of Kildare, and the earl of Ossory. The greater portion of the inhabitants of the southern half of Ireland were greatly rejoiced at their return, and no one thought that any of the race of the earl of Kildare or of O'Conor would ever return to Ireland.

The baron of Delvin marched with a force into Delvin Eathra (in King's county), at the instigation of Cormac Caoch and the race of Fergal Mac Coghlan, a fortnight after November. He remained encamped two nights in the country, and plundered and burned from Bealach-an-Fothair to Tochar-Cinn-Mona, and great was the destruction committed by that force, although they did not effect any considerable prey or slaughter.

A retaliatory contention arose between Mac Coghlan and the race of Fergal and O'Mulloy, and excessive damages were committed between them. In that contest a surprising act was perpetrated at Cluan Nona (Clononey, in King's county), viz., a rustic of the people of the town acted treacherously on the guards of the town, slew three eminent men of them with a wood-cleaver, bound a woman who was inside, and took the castle, which was a bold act for any one common man to perform.

O'Brien, i. e. Donal, expelled from Beann Mor the earl of Clanrickard, who was besieging John Burke.

A. D. 1554.

Cahir, the son of Art, son of Dermot Lamh-dearg (of the Red Hand) Mac Murrough, a man distinguished for his prosperity and valour, and a worthy heir to the lordship of Leinster, were it not for the invasion of the English, died.

O'Carroll, i. e. Calvach, was slain by William Odhar and the tribe of Maolroona O'Carroll, and by Conal Oge O'Moore, in revenge of his treachery to Teige Caoch before that time, and that evil deed was well retaliated on him, for he himself, and Teige, the son of Donogh, his brother, were expelled for that crime in the space of a year; William O'Carroll was nominated the O'Carroll in his place.

Donal O'Brien, lord of Thomond, marched with a force to the castle of Dun Michil (in Clare), against Conor Groibhleach, the son of Donogh O'Brien, to take the castle from him; the earl of Ormond came with his forces to expel O'Brien from the castle.

O'Brien marched with a force in a week after that into Clanrickard, and committed great depredations on a part of the country; from thence he proceeded to Dun Lathrach, and the tribe of Rickard Oge, and the tribe of Myler Burke came to him and entered his service for pay and support.

The battle of Ceannsalach at Cloch-Chinnfao-ladh (Cloghaneely, in Donegal), was fought between the Mac Sweeneys of the Districts on the first of November precisely, and the principal persons in this engagement were Mac Sweeney, i. e. Owen Oge, the son of Owen, his brother Torlogh Carrach, and Niall, the son of Maolmurry, on the one side, and the sons of Donagh Mac Sweeney on the other side, namely, Hugh Buighe, Edmond, Conor, and Donal. Mac Sweeney, his brother Torlogh Carrach, and Niall, the son of Maolmurry, fell on the one side, and Edmond and Conor, the sons of Donogh, on the other side, and many chiefs along with those were also slain on both sides.

The earl of Kildare, with a large force, joined by the baron of Delvin, and a great body of the Irish, marched into Ulster against Felim Roe, the son of Art, son of Hugh O'Neill, at the instigation of John Dongaileach, the son of O'Neill; they committed great depredations, and upwards of fifty of their men were slain on that occasion.

O'Neill, i. e. Con, the son of Con (earl of Tyrone) marched with a force to attack the Clannaboy, and after entering the territory, Hugh, the son of Niall Oge O'Neill, and the sons of Mac Donnell, collected all the forces they had to oppose them, and an engagement ensued, in which O'Neill was defeated with great slaughter, three hundred of his forces being slain.

A great Boroimhe (cattle tribute), viz: three hundred and forty cows, was allotted and levied on Delvin Eathra (in King's county), by the earl of Kildare, as an eraie (fine) for his foster brother Robert Nugent, who was killed by Art, the son of Cormac Mac Coghlan.

O'Connor Faily, i. e. Bryan, was imprisoned by the English.

Hugh, the son of Anmchadh O'Madden, lord of Siol Anmcha, died, and John, the son of Breasal O'Madden, succeeded in his place.

Teige, the son of Hugh O'Coffey, chief professor of Ireland and Seotland in poetry, died.

Cormac, the son of Ferdoreha Mac Coghlan, chief of his own branch, and heir to the lordship of Delvin Eathra, died at Clonlonan.

V. The Kingdom of Ulster.—In this article is continued from p. 418 the ancient history of Ulster, which, in the annotations to the preceding numbers, had been brought down to the fourth century, with an account of the princes and chiefs of the race of Clan Colla, who conquered the old race of the Irian kings of Emania, and became the chief rulers of Ulster.

Foreign invasions—Battle of Derry.—In Hanmer's Chronicle, which was compiled in the reign of Elizabeth chiefly from the ancient record called the Book of Hourth, an account is given of various foreign invaders, composed of Danes, Germans, Gauls, Spaniards, and Britons, who came to Ireland in vast numbers in the beginning of the fourth century, in the time of the Roman Emperor Constantine, who reigned from A. D. 312 to 337. The Franks, Saxons, and other German tribes at this time, invaded Gaul, and fierce battles were fought between them and the Roman legions under Constantine, who treated the vanquished with dreadful severity. Constantine and his generals also made military expeditions in Britain against the revolted Britons, Picts, and Caledonians, and it is probable that some of those various tribes of Franks, Saxons, Britons, Picts, and Caledonians, who were subdued by Constantine, fled from the Roman arms to seek new settlements in other countries, and invaded Ireland at this period, being likewise joined by Danes and Norwegians. According to Hanmer the first body of those invaders, to the number of thirty thousand, "landed at the Derrie, where Conkedagh, one of the princes of the north, being prepared for them, by a sleight set their shipping on fire, and met with them in a place where they were all overthrown, so that with their arms those among the Irish that formerly wanted some, were furnished, and made fit for the wars." This invasion appears to have taken place between the years 320 and 330; and the Irish king, mentioned as Conkedagh, who defeated the foreigners at Derry, might have been Colla Uais, who, according to the Ogygia, was monarch of Ireland from A. D. 327 to 331, and afterwards king of Ulster, and his name, by the mistake of some transcriber, might have been made Conkedagh, or there might have been a prince of that name in Ulster at the time; others suppose it was Conn-Cead-Cathach, or Conn of the Hundred Battles, but this opinion involves an anachronism, as Conn was monarch of Ireland in the latter end of the second century.

The Battle of Knockingen.—According to Hanmer, another great body of the invaders came to Lambay, off the coast of Dublin, landed their forces at the Follesse of Skerries, and having set their men in battle array, marched to a place now called Knock-na-Gean, that is the hill of dead men's heads, where Dermot Lamhdearg, king of Leinster, met them and fought a cruel battle with equal fortune for the space of four days; the Irish, by reason of the spoil and victory got at the former battle (at Derry), were mightily encouraged, and also the milk and fresh meat which the country yielded them, and the strangers wanted, made them the more able to fight; to be short, the strangers were overthrown, and thirty-six thousand of them slain, whose arms furnished Ireland thoroughly to encounter with the rest of the combination." It appears from this account that those foreigners must have had immense forces, as the enormous number of 36,000 of them were slain in this tremendous battle; and it also appears that the Ultonians, who had defeated an army of the same invaders at Derry, followed them to the borders of Meath, and fought in this engagement, assisting the men of Meath and the Lagenians under Dermot Lamhdearg, or Dermot the Red-handed, king of Leinster. The place where this battle was fought is now known as Knockingen, near Balbriggan, on the sea shore in Meath, at the river Delvin, which separates the counties of Meath and Dublin; from this great battle the place got its name Cnoc-na-g-Ceann, signifying the Hill of Heads, and there is there still on the sea shore a large sepulchral mound, like a green hillock, in which, as described in D'Alton's History of Drogheda, when opened in the year 1840, by George Alexander Hamilton, Esq. of Balbriggan, were found vast quantities of fragments of human bones, which had been burned or calcined according to the customs of those ancient days, and near the same place along the shore, between that and Balbriggan, are some other mounds, and no doubt these mounds were the sepulchres of the warriors slain in that battle. More of those invaders, with immense forces, about the same time, landed in Munster, and fought many terrific battles with the natives about the bay of Ventry, but were at length vanquished, with prodigious slaughter, by the men of Munster, of which battles an account has been given at p. 173, in the note on Desuond, and they are celebrated under the title of Cath-Fionn-Tagha, signifying the battle of Ventry, in some ancient Irish M.S. compositions, copies of which still remain.

The race of Hy Niall.—The great families of Hy Niall, a name signifying the race of Niall, took their designation from their renowned ancestor Niall Naoigiallaidh, who was monarch of Ireland for twenty-seven years, in the latter end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth century, and ruled from A. D. 379 to 406, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia. Niall was son of Eochy Muighneadhoin, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon, and descended from a long line of illustrious kings, including the celebrated monarchs Cormac and Conn of the Hundred Battles; he was a famous warrior, and surnamed Naoi Giallaidh, signifying of the Nine Hostages, in consequence of his having taken hostages from nine different nations during his expeditions, and he is therefore named by Latin writers Niallus Novi-Obsidum, signifying Niall of the Nine Hostages, and also Niallus Magnus, or Niall the Great. He made many military expeditions into Gaul and Britain, in one of which, while reclining on the banks of the Loire, in Armorica Gaul, he was slain with a shot of a poisoned arrow by an Irish prince named Eochy, the son of Eana Cinsealach, king of Leinster, with whom he had former feuds. A remarkable circumstance connected with the history of Niall of the Hostages, is that of his having brought to Ireland from Gaul, in one of his military expeditions, along with many other captives, a boy, who was sold as a slave to a chief named Milcho in Dalaradia, where he remained seven years tending the flocks of his master at Slieve Mis mountain, in Antrim, and, escaping from his captivity, returned to Gaul, and afterwards became the illustrious apostle of Ireland, St. Patrick. From Niall of the Hostages were descended many of the royal houses, and most illustrious families of the Milesian race; they were named Hy Niall, signifying the posterity of Niall, and are mentioned by the Latin writers under the names Hy-Nielli and Nielli, and sometimes Nielidani, anglicised Hy-Niall, and sometimes Niellians. As already shown in the notes on Meath, Moy-Liffey, and Bregia, the Hy-Niall were divided into two great branches, namely, the Southern and Northern.

The South Hy-Niall were the posterity of Laoghaire, Maine, Conall Crinathan, and Fiacha, four sons of king Niall, and they and their posterity ruled as kings of Meath over the territories now forming the counties of Meath and Westmeath, with parts of Longford, Dublin, Kildare, and King's county, from the fifth century to the English invasion in the latter end of the twelfth, a period of nearly eight hundred years. The heads of the Southern Hy-Niall took the name of Clan Colman, and their chief families were the O'Melaghins, kings of Meath, and the Mac Geogheghans,

A. D. 1555.

ODH (Hugh), the son of Niall Ogc, son of Niall, son of Con, son of Hugh Buighe son of Bryan Ballach, O'Neill, lord of Clannaboy, an opulent, generous, benevolent and very hospitable man, a royal prince, excelling other chiefs, a lord in powerful defence, a man who gave neither submission nor obedience to any of the Irish, and who did not permit hostages or prisoners to leave his country, and who always kept hostages; a man who gave many defeats to the English and Irish in defending his territory against them, was slain by the Scots with the shot of a ball.

princes of Kinel Fiacha in Westmeath. A full account of these, and all the other chiefs of the southern Hy-Niall, will be found at p. 6, and at p.p. 292, 314 in the notes on Meath and Bregia. Of the southern Hy-Niall, besides being kings of Meath, twenty-three also became supreme monarchs of Ireland, from the fifth to the eleventh century.

The North Hy-Niall were divided into two great branches, namely, the descendants of Eogan, and of Connall Gulban, two of the sons of Niall of the Hostages. Connall Gulban was a celebrated warrior, and called by the bards Connall-na-gCleas-cruaidh, signifying Connall of the Hardy Deeds, and he got the name Gulban from being nurtured near the mountain Ben-Gulban, now called Benbulbin, and situated near the shore of the Atlantic, or bay of Sligo. Connall was slain in a battle with the men of Breifne at Magh-Sleacht, A. D. 464, according to the Annals of Four Masters, and was buried by St. Cailin of Fenagh, in the woody solitudes of Moyrein; Magh-Sleacht was the ancient name of Fenagh in Leitrim, and the surrounding territory was called Moyrein. Eogan, brother of Connall, according to the Four Masters, died of grief for his loss A. D. 465, and was buried at a place called Uisge-Chaoín, or the Calm water, now known as Iskeahen, in the barony of Inisowen, county of Donegal, and within a few miles of Derry, where was an ancient church, of which some ruins still remain; from Eogan the Peninsula of Inisowen got its name, in Irish Inis-Eogain, signifying the island of Eogan, or Owen. These two celebrated sons of Niall of the Hostages are remarkable in Irish history as the founders of the chief principalities in Ulster, and the progenitors of the renowned race of the Northern Hy Niall, and particularly as the ancestors of the two most illustrious of the Milesian families, the O'Neills and O'Donnells. In the fifth century these two brothers and their posterity conquered part of Ulster, from the old chieftains of the Irian race, or Clanna Rory, and also took possession of a great part of the territories of the Clan Colla in the same province. The country conquered by Eogan and his descendants comprised the present counties of Tyrone and Derry, with Inisowen, in Donegal, and the remainder of Donegal was possessed by the posterity of Connall, as explained at p.p. 49, 51, in these notes. The territory pos-

Tomas Susig (Thomas Sussex), a new lord justice, came to Ireland, and Anthony St. Leger, the old lord justice, was recalled.

That lord justice immediately after marched with an army, at the instigation of O'Neill, to expel the Mac Donnells and the Scots who were taking possession of, and making settlements in the Routes (in the north of Antrim), and in Clannaboy. The lord justice, with his forces, remained for six weeks making devastations on the Scots, and he committed many depredations on them, and slew one or two hundred of the Scots, and afterwards returned with his forces, without receiving submission or hostages.

Bryan, the son of Cahir Roe O'Connor Faily, was killed by Donogh, the son of O'Connor, i. e. of Bryan.

The lord justice of Ireland collected an army to march into Munster, and O'Brien mustered another force to oppose him, with which he marched into Hy Regan (Oregon, in Queen's county), to meet the lord justice; they there made peace with sessed by Eogan and his descendants was named Tir-Eogain, that is, the country of Eogan, or Owen, from which came the name Tir-Owen, or Tyrone, and his posterity was called Cineal-Eogain, or Kinel-Owen, that is the race of Eogan, Owen, or Eugene; hence this tribe-name has been anglicised Eugenians. The territory possessed by Connall Gulban and his descendants was named Tir-Connall, or Tir-Connell, now the county of Donegal, and his posterity were named Cineal-Connall, or Kinel-Connell, anglicised Connallians.

The Hy Niall Kings.—In the preceding part of the present article, an account has been given of the kings of the Southern Hy Niall, a great number of whom were kings of Meath and monarchs of Ireland, and many of the Northern Hy Niall were kings of Ulster, and also monarchs of Ireland. The Eugenians, according to the accounts of Keating, O'Flaherty, and various other authorities, furnished, from the fifth to the tenth century, sixteen of the monarchs of Ireland, and during the same period, nine of the Connallians likewise became monarchs, thus making twenty-five sovereigns of the Northern Hy Niall, and, as explained at p. 292 in those notes, twenty-three of the Southern Hy Niall were monarchs, thus making in all forty-eight kings of the Hy Niall race, who exclusively ruled over Ireland for a period of 600 years, from the fifth to the eleventh century, when king Malachy II. was deposed, A. D. 1002, by Brian Boroimhe, king of Munster, and head of the Dalcassians, who assumed the sovereignty of Ireland, and thus transferred the sceptre from the Heremonians to the race of Heber. The Eugenians and Connallians were the chief rulers of Ulster, from the fifth to the latter end of the sixteenth century, a period of more than a thousand years, and their head chiefs, who, as hereafter explained, took the names of O'Neill and O'Donnell, make the most remarkable figure in Irish history.

The Palace of Aileach.—The chief residence of the kings of Ulster, and monarchs of Ireland of the Northern Hy Niall race, including Eugenians and Connallians, was at the royal fortress of Aileach, in Tirconnell, which was situated on a high hill or mountain, called Grianan, on the eastern shore of Lough Swilly, south of Inch Island, in the parish of Burt, or Fahan, barony of each other, O'Brien in behalf of the Irish, from the Barrow to the Shannon, and the lord justice on behalf of the English of Munster.

Inisowen, and county of Donegal. This fortress was called Grian-an Aileich, from Grianan, which signifies a palace or royal residence, and Aileach, or Oileach, a stone fortress, derived from Ail or Oil, a rock; it was likewise named Aileach Neid, or the stone fortress of Neid, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, from its having been first erected by Neid, one of the Tuath De Danan princes, and it was used as a residence in very remote ages by the Danan kings. According to Colgan's Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, he visited the fortress of Aileach, where he was well received by Eogan, son of Niall of the Hostages, who then resided there. In the Four Masters, and other annalists, accounts are given of various kings and princes of the Northern Hy Niall, who resided at the palace of Aileach, a name which has been latinised Alichia, and hence these kings of Ulster are frequently styled kings and princes of Alichia. The Eugenians, and their descendants the O'Neills, and also the Mac Loghlins, or O'Loghlins, who were a branch of the O'Neills, appear to have chiefly resided at Aileach in early times. According to the Four Masters, Aileach was often attacked by the Danes in the ninth and tenth century, particularly in A. D. 900, when it was taken by them; and again it was taken and plundered in A. D. 937 by the Danish forces, who came up with a fleet into Lough Swilly, on which occasion they took prisoner Murkertach O'Neill, the celebrated prince of Aileach, who, however, was soon after liberated. Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster in the year 1101, with a powerful force invaded Ulster, marched to Easroe, now Ballyshannon, proceeded to Inisowen, and took the fortress of Aileach, which he demolished, in revenge of the destruction of the palace of Kincora, the royal seat of the kings of Munster, near Killaloe in Clare, which had been burned in the year 1088 by Donal Mac Loghlin, king of Ulster. After the destruction of Aileach, the O'Neills, princes of Ulster, had their chief fortress and residence at Dungannon, in Tyrone. The celebrated fortress of Aileach was of a circular form, built of large stones well fitted together, and of great strength, constructed in the style of Cyclopean architecture. There are still considerable remains of the stone fortress, and the wall varies from ten to fifteen feet in thickness, and is of immense strength; the circumference of the building is about 100 yards, and it was surrounded with three great earthen ramparts, of which there are still some remains along the top of the mountain, and also traces of the ancient road which led between rocks to the fortress. In the ancient work called Dinseanchus, which gives an account of palaces and remarkable places in Ireland, and an excellent copy of which is in the library of Sir William Betham, made from the books of Leacan and Ballymote, an account is given of this fortress, which is denominated Aileach Fririn, from which the following passages have been literally translated:—

"Aileach Fririn the level platform,
The noblest royal fortress in the world,
To which strong-hold led Horse-roads through five ramparts.

"Many its houses, rare its stones,
And just were its tributes;
Lofty castle is Aileach Fririn,
The rath of the worthy man.

"Pleasant stone fortress—
Protecting house of heroes—
Here the Dagda slept
On this hill—red are its flowers.

"Delightful seat is Aileach Gabran, Greenly-blooming are its bushes:
Ground under which the Dagda placed
The burial mound of Aedh.

The son of O'Donnell, i. e. the Calvach, went to Scotland, attended by a few chiefs, and obtained some forces from Mac Cailin, namely, Giollaes-

"I now relate each cause,
From which Aileach received its name;
Together with its noble chiefs,
The house of armed warriors.

"Eochy Ollathair divided Erin,
Greyer than the mist on the plain
Was the grey aspect of the man;
Three were the sons of Eochy,
The good man who was free from envy,
Aengus, Aedh, and Kermad of fierce conflicts.

"To Aileach of the Dagda,
Above every abode in Ulster,
Belonged the government of Erin,
As recorded to us in books.

"Of all the works of Erin,
The oldest is Aileach Fririn;
I will not confer on it
More praise than it deserves.

"Twice twenty years, except a year,
As it was exactly computed,
This work of the hands of heroes
Passed to the sons of Milesius.

"Neid, son of Indai, high king;
In the north, the country of flocks,
Was the first brave man by whom Obach was forsaken for Aileach.

"Nine kings of Adam's race,
All of one name, ruled at Aileach;
Eochy was the name of each man
Appointed there to power.

"Eochy Ollathair was the first man
Who governed there with order;
Eochy Edgothach who felt
The persecution of fierce battles.

"Eochy Opthach, and Eochy Feidlech,
A man of swords, whose life,
Terminated by a natural end,
Eochy Airin and Eochy Buadhach."

"Eochy More, who slaughtered cattle
Eochy Doimlen the fair,
Who was well proved in the thick of battle,
And Eochy Moyvone, high king of Inis-Enaigh.

"Son of this man was Niall,
The bulwark of troops—a man
Who met no defeat in battle—
Who subdued many nations of the world.

"The fair Cruthnean Carinna
Was his renowned and lovely mother;
The descendants of the great Niall
Were kings of Aileach of valiant arms.

"Large-sized and fair-handed
Were those youths of heroic race;
Eogan, son of Niall, from a child
Was possessed of the strength of a hero.

puic Donn, commanded by Master Arsibel (Archibald); he then returned with a great force of "An aspect glowing with hospitality

Had this fair man of Feral;
Ineacht, the fair daughter
Of king Monach, was mother of Eogan.

"He had the disposition of a king,
The courage of a hero, and agility of a lion;
The race of Eogan—fair chieftains—
The noble warriors of Temor.

"Their fingers were adorned
With bright and brilliant rings;
The noblest host in all Erin
Is the assembly of Aileach.

"Sixteen chief kings ruled
Of Eogan's race over Erin;
They defended the birth-right of those in exile,
And received hostages from every country."

It appears from the foregoing passages of the poem, that the Tuath De Danan were the first who founded the fortress of Aileach; and it is stated by Mac Firbis and others, that it was erected by Garbhan and Frighrin, two celebrated builders of the Fomorians; and several of the Danan kings are mentioned as having resided there; amongst others, Dagda the Great; several kings of the Milesian race, mentioned in the poem, likewise resided there, and lastly the princes of the Hy Niall race, or descendants of the celebrated monarch, Niall of the Nine Hostages.

Introduction of Christianity.—In the early part of the fifth century, during the reign of Laoghaire, son of Niall of the Hostages, Palladius and St. Patrick preached the gospel in Ireland; but it is considered by Usher, Lanigan, and other ecclesiastical writers, that Christianity was partially introduced into Ireland in the third and fourth centuries. The old annalists record three remarkable persons who became converts to the Christian faith before the missions of Palladius and St. Patrick, namely, Concovar Mac Nessa, the celebrated king of Ulster in the first century; Moran, the famous judge, or chief Brehon of Ireland, son of king Cairbre Ceann-Cait, in the beginning of the second century, and the renowned Cormac, monarch of Ireland about the middle of the third century. An account of the missions of Palladius and St. Patrick, with a sketch of their lives, has been given at p. 270 in these notes. The mission of St. Patrick is placed by Lanigan from A. D. 432 to 465, but extended to A. D. 493 by Usher and others. The mission of the great Irish apostle is particularly connected with Ulster, as the scene of his early captivity, and afterwards of his first preaching of the gospel, and the foundation of the see of Armagh, the seat of the Primacy of Ireland, the cathedral church of which was founded by him A. D. 455, according to Lanigan, all of which events are amongst the most important connected with the introduction of Christianity into Ireland. The era of the Hy Niall race of kings is remarkable as commencing with the introduction of Christianity, king Niall of the Hostages, as before stated, having brought St. Patrick, then a youth in the sixteenth year of his age, to Ireland, amongst other captives he had taken in his military expeditions to Gaul and Britain.

The Battle of Cula-Dreimhne.—According to the Four Masters and other authorities, Curman, son of Eochy Tiormearna, king of Connaught, was put to death by Dermot Mac Carroll, monarch of Ireland, though Curman had been under the protection of St. Columkille, from whose hands he had been violently forced away. This circumstance led to the great battle of Cula-Dreimhne, fought in the territory of Carbury, near Sligo, A. D. 555, between the forces of Meath and Leinster, under the monarch Dermot on the one side, and the people of Tir-Eogain and the Scots, and spoiled and laid waste Tirconnell, and it was on that expedition he brought Tir-Connell on the other, commanded by the princes Fergus and Donal, sons of Murtogh Mac Earca, former monarch of Ireland, and aided by the forces of Aodh, or Hugh, king of Connaught; in this battle the army of the monarch Dermot was totally defeated, three thousand of his men being slain, and he himself having hardly saved his life by flight. In A. D. 558, after he had reigned twenty years, according to the Four Masters, Dermot Mac Carroll was slain by Aodh Dubh, or Black Hugh, the son of Suibhne, king of Dalaradia, at Rath Beg in Moyline, now Moylinne, near the town of Antrim; this Black Hugh is called by other writers king of the Picts of Dalaradia. The head of king Dermot was carried to Clonmacnois, and interred there, but his body was buried in the abbey of Connor, in Antrim.

The Battle of Monadoire.—In A. D. 557, according to the Four Masters, was fought the great battle of Monadoire Lothair, by the forces of the northern Hy Niall, both Connallians and Eugenians, against the Picts of Alban, in which their forces were totally overthrown, and seven princes of the Picts, together with Aodh Broac, were slain. The place where this battle was fought was situated somewhere in the Highlands of Scotland and it is mentioned that the country of Lea and Carn Eolaig, the fortresses of the Picts, were laid waste.

The National Convention of Dromceat.—In the latter end of the sixth century, A. D. 590, a great national council or convention was held in Ulster, of which an account is given by Keating and O'Flaherty. This assembly was convened by Aodh, or Hugh, son of Ainmireach, then monarch of Ireland, of the race of the Connallians, or Tirconnell branch of the Hy Niall, and it was attended by the provincial kings, princes, chiefs, bishops, abbots, and clergy. St. Columkille, abbot of I-Columkille, or Iona in the Hebrides, who was of the Connallian race, of Tirconnell, and is celebrated as the apostle of the Picts and Caledonians, came to this convention, accompanied by Aidan, king of the Albanian Scots, who was likewise of Milesian Irish descent. This national council was held at Dromceat, in Kianachta, near Glengiven, in that part of Tir-Eogain, now called Derry, and was convened by the monarch Hugh, to settle a great contention that arose between himself and the bards, whose order the king considered too numerous, powerful, and dangerous to the state, and therefore had resolved to suppress; but St. Columkille opposed their abolition, and advocated their continuance under proper regulations as a useful national institution, and through his influence, the bards, under due restraints, were continued, and all disputes between them and the monarch amicably arranged.

The Battle of Moy-Rath.—During the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries, various great battles were fought in Ulster, as recorded in the Four Masters, the Annals of Ulster, Keating, &c. Many of those conflicts took place between the princes and chiefs of Ulster amongst themselves, and with the other provincial kings, and several also with the Albanian Scots, Picts, and North Britons, who frequently made hostile incursions with powerful forces into Ulster, and had fierce contests with the Ultonians. The most remarkable of the battles fought in those ages was that of Moy-Rath, which was celebrated by the Irish bards and annalists under the designation of Cath-Muighe-Rath, or the Battle of the Plain of the Rath, and was fought at a place called Magh-Rath, in Dalaradia, now Moira, in the county of Down; some difference as to its chronology occurs in the Irish annalists; the Four Masters mention it at A. D. 634, and the Chronicon Scotorum, and Annals of Ulster, at A. D. 636; but the Annals of Tigernach give it at A. D. 637, which is considered most correct. Accounts of this battle are given in Charles O'Connor's Dissertations on the History of Ireland, in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, in Keating, and in Colgan's Life of St. Columkille, by St. Adamnan, but chiefly in an ancient Irish M. S., a copy of which is in the library of Sir William Betham. In the beginning of the seventh century, Congal Claon, a valiant prince of the Irian, or Rudrician race, and according to O'Connor, a man of extraordinary abilities and with him a cannon called the crooked gun, by which he demolished the new castle of Inisowen, and also the castle of Eanagh. When he first arrived in the country he took O'Donnell, great ambition, was king of Uladh, or Ulidia, and ruled over the territory which now forms the county of Down and part of Antrim, but attempted to recover the sovereignty of all Ulster, which had been wrested from his ancestors by the Heremonians, of the race of Clan Colla and Hy Niall. This Congal was son of Scanlan Sciath-Leathan, or Scanlan of the Broad Shield, king of Ulidia, and having collected a powerful force, gave assistance to Donal, a prince of the Connallian branch of Hy Niall, who was a competitor for the monarchy, and in a great battle at Traigh-brena in Ulster, according to the Four Masters, they defeated and slew, A. D. 623, Suibhne Meann, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Hy Niall, and Donal then became monarch. Congal Claon again collected a powerful force to depose his former ally, Donal, with whom he fought at Dun-Ceithirn, in Ulster, a great battle, A. D. 624, according to the Four Masters; after immense slaughter on both sides, Congal was vanquished, and forced to fly for refuge to North Britain, where he remained in exile many years, during which time he formed a powerful league with foreign princes for the recovery of Ulster. In the year 637 he invaded Ireland with an immense force of foreign auxiliaries, consisting of Albanian Scots, Picts, Britons, Anglo-Saxons, and Franks; he landed on the coast of Dalaradia, in some part of Down, or Antrim, where he was joined by his Irish allies of the Irian race in Ulster. Amongst the foreign commanders in Congal Claon's army are mentioned Donal Breac, king of the Albanian Scots, with his three brothers Aedh, Congal, and Suibhne; the Britons were commanded by Conan Rod, or Conan the Red, son of the king of the Britons; the Anglo-Saxons by a chief called Garbh, and the Franks by a prince named Dairbre, supposed to be Dagobert. The monarch Donal collected the forces of Ulster, composed of the Eugenians, Connallians, and Clan Colla, which he commanded in person, and was assisted by many celebrated chieftains of the various clans. Both armies having met at Moy-Rath, fought one of the most tremendous battles recorded in the ancient history of Ireland; it was continued with unremitting fury for six successive days, but on the seventh day, which was on a Tuesday, the 24th of June, Congal Claon, after displaying the most consummate valour and abilities, was slain, together with almost all his Irish forces and foreign allies. Cealleach, who was prince presumptive to the throne of Ulster, and a renowned warrior, slew in single combat, and beheaded Conan Rod the British prince, and likewise Dairbre, commander of the Franks. Donal Breac, king of the Albanian Scots, having narrowly escaped with his life, fled from the field of battle with a small remnant of his forces, and sailed to Scotland. It is said that St. Columbkille foretold this war, as stated in his life by St. Adamnan, abbot of Iona, in a passage given in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, at the year 657, in his account of the Scottish kings "this prediction was fulfilled in our days in the war of Moy-Rath, when Donal Breac, the grandson of Aidan, was depopulating, without any provocation, the provinces of Donal, the grandson of Ainnireach, and from that day to this the Irish have been reduced to the last extremity by foreigners, which gives me the most heartfelt grief." There were probably about thirty thousand men engaged at Moy-Rath, and from the obstinacy with which this fierce conflict was continued for seven successive days, during which it is said the warriors on each side displayed the most determined bravery, and fought like lions, there could not have been on both sides less than ten or twelve thousand men slain.

The Battle of Fiertsí.—In A. D. 665, according to the Four Masters and others, in the reign of Seachnasach, monarch of Ireland, the Picts of North Britain, with a powerful army, invaded Ulster, and fought a bloody battle with the Irish at Fiertsí, but after a dreadful carnage on both sides, the Ultonians at length defeated the invaders, very few of whom escaped from the field of battle, and fled to their ships; the place where this engagement was fought is considered by Dr. O'Connor and others to have been at Belfast. About A. D. 670, the Picts again invaded Ulster, plundered and burned the famous monastery of Bennebor in Dalaradia, now Bangor, in the county of Down, and massacred or dispersed one thousand monks.

The Battle of Moy Linne.—An account is given in O'Connor's Dissertations, and in the Four Masters, at A. D. 680, of a great battle fought at Rath Mor of Moy-Linny, which was situated near Lough-Neagh, in the parish of Antrim. Cathasach and Ultan, princes of the Cruthneans, or Picts of Dalaradia, having leagued with the North Britons and Saxons, brought over an immense number of those foreigners, but their combined forces were defeated by the chiefs of the northern Hy Niall, with great slaughter, and both Cathasach and Ultan were amongst the slain. This battle was fought in the reign of Fionnachta Fleadhach, or Finnachta the Banqueter, a name which has been latinised by O'Flaherty, Finnacta Epu-laris, and by Dr. O'Connor, Finnacta Convivator; this king was designated the Banqueter from his great hospitality and magnificent feasts. He was of the southern Hy Niall, and resided at his palace of Dun-na-Sciath, or the Fortress of the Shields, which was situated on the banks of Lough Ennell, near Mullingar, in Westmeath. This monarch, after a reign of twenty years, was slain in battle A. D. 693, on the 14th of November, and in commemoration of his justice, munificence, and many virtues, the anniversary of his death was held as a festival for many ages.

In A. D. 683, according to the Four Masters and other authorities, the Anglo-Saxons, under a general named Bert, or Bertus, invaded Ireland, being sent by Egfrid, king of Northumberland; they landed on the coast of Bregia, in Meath, and committed great ravages along the territories between Dublin and Drogheda, plundering churches and monasteries, and carrying off many captives and great booty. The monarch Fiaachta attacked those invaders, and slew many of them in a great battle fought in the month of June at Rathmore, near Atboy, in Meath; but Bert and the remainder of his forces effected a retreat, and succeeded in carrying off the plunder and many captives. In the following year Adamnan, abbot of Iona, was sent on an embassy to king Egfrid, in Northumberland, to complain of those sacrileges and plunders committed by the Saxons, and he succeeded in recovering the captives, and reparation was made for the devastations committed. The venerable Bede greatly condemns king Egfrid for these hostile aggressions against the Irish, who he says were "a harmless nation, which had been always most friendly to the Anglo-Saxons."

The Battle of Moy-Cuilinn.—In A. D. 702, according to the Annals of Ulster and other authorities, in the reign of the monarch Loingseach, the Picts and North Britons invaded Ulster with great forces, but were defeated by the Ultonians with prodigious slaughter, and almost all slain at a place called by Keating Magh Cuilinn, and stated in the Annals of Ulster to have been situated in Airdo, in the mountains, probably Ardes, in the county of Down.

The Battle of Cloch-Mionuire.—In the reign of the monarch Fergal, about A. D. 710, the Picts and North Britons again invaded Ulster with great forces, but were defeated by the Ultonians in a fierce battle fought at a place called Cloch-Mionuir, in Dalriada, which was situated in some part of the north of Antrim.

The battle of Murbolg.—In A. D. 725, according to the Four Masters, the Picts were again defeated, and vast numbers of them slain by the Dalriadians at Murbolg, a place situated near the Giant's Causeway, in the county of Antrim.

The Battle of Foghart.—In A. D. 732, in the reign of Aodh, or Hugh Allain, monarch of Ireland, according to the Four Masters and others, Aodh Roin, or Hugh the Hairy, king of Ulidia, having greatly oppressed the clergy of Ulster, and plundered the churches, a complaint was made against him to the monarch by Congusa, then archbishop of Armagh; the monarch collected a large army, and assisted by the northern Hy Niall, fought a great battle at Foghart, on the plain of Muirthemhine, now Faughart, near Dundalk, in which the Ulidiaas were defeated with great slaughter,

i. e. Manus, his father, prisoner at Ros Racha, and did not permit those Scottish forces to depart from the November in which they arrived, until the following festival of St. Brendan; O'Donnell remained in imprisonment until his death.

and Hugh Roin himself slain, and beheaded on the stone of the Conventions, or oblations, at the door of the church of Foghart, and some curious verses, composed by the archbishop Congusa on this circumstance, are given in the Four Masters.

In the various wars enumerated in Ulster, and many more battles not recorded, from the first to the eighth century, comprising a period of seven hundred years of almost incessant conflicts of the kings of Ulster, either amongst themselves, or with the other provincial kings, and with the monarchs of Ireland, and of fierce contests with foreign invaders, including the Cualgnean war of seven years duration between the Red-Branch Knights of Ulster, and the Connaught forces; the conflicts of the Clan Colla chieftains with the kings of Emania; the contests of the Hy Niall princes for the sovereignty of Ulster with the Ulidian kings; the battle of Moy-Rath, and the various other fierce engagements of the Ultonians with the invading Picts, Britons, Anglo-Saxons and Franks, no doubt there were, during these seven centuries of continued and sanguinary contests, not less than three hundred thousand men slain in Ulster.

In the latter end of the seventh century, Alfred, an Anglo-Saxon prince, son of Oswy, king of Northumbria, and who was himself afterwards king of Northumbria, having been exiled from England, retired to Ireland, where he studied many years in its seminaries, according to the venerable Bede, in his Life of St. Cuthbert. Alfred travelled over all parts of Ireland, and, as mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish writers, at A. D. 885, he, under the name of Flann Fionn, or Flann the Fair, composed a poem on Ireland, consisting of ninety-six verses, and commencing thus:—

“Ro dheat in Inis Finn Fail
In Eirin re imarbhaidh”

“I found in the fair Inisfail
In Ireland while in exile.”

A version of this poem into English has been made by the translator of these Annals, from which the following passages are taken relating to Ulster in the seventh century—

“I found in Armagh the splendid,
Meekness, wisdom, circumspection,
Abstinence in obedience to the Son of God,
Noble, prosperous learned sages.

“I found in the country of Conall
Brave victorious heroes;
Valiant men of fair complexion,
The exalted stars of Erin.

“I found in the province of Ulster,
Long-blooming beauty, hereditary vigour,
Young scions of energy,
Though fair, yet fit for war, and brave.”

The Eugenians.—In the preceding part of the present article, an account has been given of the Eugenians, as the chief branch of the northern Hy Niall, descended from Eogan, one of the sons of king Niall of the Hostages; the head chiefs of the Eugenians in the tenth century took the name Ua-Neill, or O'Neill, from Niall Glundubh, a celebrated king of that race, who was monarch of Ireland in the tenth century, and was slain A. D. 919, in a great battle with the Danes near Dublin. The O'Neills, as kings and princes of Aileach, kings of Ulster, and princes of Tir-Eogain, make a very conspicuous figure in Irish history, from the eleventh to the seventeenth century, for a period of five hundred years, during the greater part of which they maintained their independence and

A. D. 1556.

Giolla Colaim O'Clabaigh, the coarb of St. Patrick, at Uaran of Magh Aoi', the head of hospitality and wealth of the coarbs of Connaught, a general entertainer of the rich and poor, died in power to a great extent, amidst incessant wars with the English of the Pale, and various British settlers. Their celebrated chiefs are constantly mentioned throughout these Annals, and an account of their territories and other particulars, has been given at p. 49, in the note on Tir-Eogain. The O'Neills, as princes of Tir-Eogain, ruled over the territories which now form the counties of Tyrone and Derry, with Inisowen, in Donegal. In the eleventh century, a branch of the O'Neills took the name of Mac Loughlin, sometimes mentioned as O'Loughlin, from Loughlin O'Neill, one of their chiefs, and during the eleventh and twelfth centuries were very powerful, and some of them became princes of Tir-Eogain, and of Aileach, kings of Ulster, and two of them, as hereafter shown, became monarchs of Ireland. Many celebrated chiefs of the Mac Loughlins are mentioned in the course of these Annals; but it appears, that in the thirteenth century, they were put down by the superior power of the O'Neills. A powerful branch of the O'Neills, as explained at page 21, in the note on Dalaradia, in the fourteenth century, became lords of Clannaboy, and possessed extensive territories in the counties of Down and Antrim, down to the seventeenth century, and many celebrated chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. They were called Clann-Aodha-Buidhe, signifying the Clan of Hugh the yellow-haired, from Aodh Buidhe, one of their celebrated chiefs; and the tribe and territory were thence designated Clannaboy, or sometimes Claneboy. The territory was divided into North and South Clannaboy, the North comprising the baronies of Belfast, Massareene, Antrim, and Upper Toome, in the county of Antrim; and South Clannaboy contained the baronies of Ardes, Castlereagh, Kinealarty, and Lecale, in the county of Down. In the reigns of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, the head chiefs of the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone, were created earls of Tyrone, and barons of Dungannon, and in modern times a branch of the O'Neills were created earls O'Neill, in the county of Antrim.

The other chiefs and clans of the Eugenians, the posterity of Eogan, and his five sons, Muiredach, Fergus, Oilíoll, Felin, and Eochy, were the O'Catians, or O'Kanes, powerful chiefs in Derry, and lords of the greater part of that territory; the Mac Caghewells, O'Donnellys, O'Hagans, O'Hamells, O'Horans, O'Hoseys, O'Connellans, all chiefs of note in Tyrone. The Mac Sweeney's, celebrated chiefs in Donegal, and distinguished commanders of galloglasses in Ulster, and likewise in Connaught and Munster; the O'Gormleys; O'Dubhdiamas; O'Donegans; O'Brolchans; Mac Closkeys; Mac Gilligans; Mac Gill Kellys; O'Freels; O'Quinns; O'Hagarty's; O'Mulvihills, all chiefs and clans of note in various parts of Derry and Donegal. The O'Creaghs, who in early times went from Ulster, and settled in Munster, and of whom there were many highly respectable families in Clare, Limerick, Cork, and Tipperary, were a branch of the O'Neills of Tyrone, and likewise the O'Nibells of Munster, of both which families an account has been given at p. 154, in the note on Thomond. Accounts of the O'Neills, and various chiefs of the Eugenians, and the territories possessed by each, have been given at pp. 50 to 52, in the note on Tir Eogain and Tir Conaill.

The Connallians.—As before stated, the Connallians were the posterity of Conall Gulban, one of the sons of king Niall of the Hostages. The head chiefs of this race took the names of O'Maoldora and O'Cannanain, from two princes their ancestors, who were so called, and many celebrated chieftains of the O'Maoldoras and O'Cannanains are mentioned in the Four Masters in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, and they extended their power not only over Donegal, but other parts of Ulster. In the tenth century some of the head chiefs of the Connallians took the tribe name of Clanna Dalaigh, from Dalach, one of their chiefs, whose death is recorded in the Annals at A. D. 868, but they afterwards Clanrickard, after he had been expelled thither from Oran, and after his son Dermot Roe O'Clabaigh had been slain by the Clan Conway.

O'Moore (of the Queen's county), i. e. Conall Oge, was taken prisoner by the lord justice.

The castle of Lis-Chuaine, in Delvin, was com-took the name O'Domhnaill, or O'Donnell, from Domhnall, another of their celebrated chiefs in the beginning of the tenth century. The elder chieftains of Tirconnell, the O'Cannanains, and O'Maoldoras, were put down by the superior power of the O'Donnells, who, in the latter end of the twelfth and beginning of the thirteenth century, became the chief rulers of the territory, and as princes of Tirconnell, possessed the greater part of Donegal, but afterwards got the whole of that country, and also extended their power over some of the northern parts of Sligo, and for a long time held the castle of Sligo, for which they often had contests with the English, and also with the O'Conors; the O'Donnells probably claimed Carbury in Sligo, as that territory was originally possessed, and got its name from Cairbre, one of the sons of Niall of the Hostages. The O'Donnells, as princes of Tirconnell, make a conspicuous figure in Irish history, from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century, and their great actions are particularly recorded in the course of these Annals, where it appears they frequently extended their power, not only over Donegal, but also over parts of Derry, Tyrone, Fermanagh, Brefney, Sligo, and Roscommon, and frequently exercised a jurisdiction in the inauguration of the princes and chiefs, and levied tributes on those territories. The O'Neills and O'Donnells, from the accounts of all the annalists, appear to have been by far the most powerful, warlike, and valiant of the Irish chieftains, and kept up the most numerous bodies of disciplined troops, and from the twelfth to the seventeenth century, during a period of nearly five hundred years of incessant warfare, maintained their independence against the Anglo-Irish forces of the Pale, and the armies of England. Several of the O'Neills and O'Donnells were distinguished military commanders in the Irish Brigades, in the service of France, Spain, Austria, and other foreign states.

The other chiefs of the Connallians, who were collateral branches of the same stock as the O'Donnells, were the O'Doghertys, lords of Inisowen, in Donegal; the O'Boyles, lords of Boylagh, and the O'Gallaghers, powerful and warlike chiefs in Tirlugh, in Donegal; the O'Breslens, chiefs of Fanat, and eminent Brehons in Donegal and Fermanagh; the O'Hughes, and several other chiefs in Donegal, an account of whom, and the territories possessed by each, has been given at page 52, in the note on Tirconnell. The O'Dalys were the elder branch of the O'Donnells, and many families of note of the name were located in Connaught, Meath, and Munster, and several of them are recorded in the course of these Annals as bards, historians, and eminent literary men.

The Colmanians.—An account of the kings, princes, chiefs, and clans of the southern Hy Niall, and the territories possessed by each, has been given at p.p. 6 to 8, and also at p.p. 248, 314, 315, in the notes on Meath, Tefia, Annaly, Offaly, Moy Liffey, and Bregia. The South Hy Niallians were descended from four of the sons of king Niall of the Hostages, namely, Laoghlaire, Fiacha, Maine, and Conall Crimthan, powerful princes, who in the fifth century got possession of the territories which formed the ancient kingdom of Meath, comprising the present counties of Meath and Westmeath, with part of Longford, and parts of Dublin, Kildare, and King's county. The posterity of these four princes possessed the territories of the ancient kingdom of Meath, from the fifth to the twelfth century, but from the latter end of the twelfth to the beginning of the seventeenth century, amidst incessant warfare and fierce contests with the Anglo-Normans and English settlers, the southern Hy Niall lost all their hereditary possessions, and of this powerful race there are no descendants of any note, or large landed proprietors, to be found on the territories of ancient Meath at the present day. The head families of the southern Hy Niall took the name of Clan Colman from one of their ancestors, a celebrated chief named Colman More, in the sixth century, who was son of Dermot Mac Carroll, monarch of Ireland, and whose death is recorded at A.D. 552 in the Four Masters. The head chiefs of the Clan Colman took the name of O'Melaghlin in the eleventh century, and were celebrated as kings of Meath, kings and princes of Tara, princes of Bregia, and lords of Clan Colman, an extensive territory in Westmeath. The designation Clan Colman, or Colmanians, was mostly confined to the family of O'Melaghlin, but sometimes also applied to all the chiefs of the southern Hy Niall. The other principal chiefs of the southern Hy Niall were the Mac Geoghegans, princes of Kinel Fiacha, an extensive territory in Westmeath, about Mullingar, &c. The O'Mulloys, princes of Fercall, in King's county; the O'Harts; the O'Connollys, O'Kellys, and O'Regans, princes of Tara; the O'Coindealbhains, or O'Kindellans, a name changed to O'Conlivan, and O'Connellan, princes of Hy Laoghlaire, in Meath and Westmeath; the O'Sionachs, a name anglicised to Fox, lords of Tefia, in Westmeath; the O'Carys, lords of Carberry, in Kildare; the O'Rorys, or Rogers; O'Carrolls and O'Duvans, chiefs in Meath; the O'Fallons; O'Breens; O'Hughes, or O'Heas; O'Hanveys; O'Hennesseys; O'Hanrahans; O'Kearneys; O'Caseys; O'Coffeys; Mac Conways; O'Dooleys; O'Mulledys; O'Scullys; O'Shields; O'Tolargs; Mac Ruars; O'Fagans; O'Currys; O'Corrigan, and O'Murrys, all chiefs of note in various parts of Westmeath. The O'Quinns, chiefs of Muinter Gilgann, and lords of Rathcline, had the barony of Rathcline, in Annaly, or Longford; the O'Ronans; O'Dalys; O'Sleivins; Mac Cormacs; Mac Gilligans, and Mac Gavans, chiefs in Annaly. Of the southern Hy Niall, were also the following chiefs, the O'Maolconrys of Roscommon, celebrated bards and historians to the O'Conors, kings of Connaught; the O'Higgins of Westmeath and of Connaught, eminent bards and historians; and also the O'Duignans, of Kilronan, in Roscommon, distinguished literary men, and hereditary historians of the Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg. Many eminent men of these literary families are recorded in the course of these Annals.

The Hy-Briunians.—An account of the chiefs of the race of Hy-Briune has been given at p.p. 75, 125, in the notes on Brefney and South Connaught. These Hy-Briunians, who were the Heremonians of Connaught, were descended from Bryan, king of Connaught, in the latter end of the fourth century, and who was brother of king Niall of the Hostages, and therefore they were a collateral branch of the same stock as the race of Hy Niall. The chief families of the Hy-Briunians were the O'Conors, Kings of Connaught; the O'Rourkes, princes of West Brefney, or Leitrim; the O'Reillys, princes of East Brefney, or Cavan; the Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg, in Roscommon; the O'Flahertys, lords of West Connaught; the O'Malleys, chiefs in Mayo; the Mac Oireaghtys, chiefs in Roscommon; the Mac Gaurans; Mac Tiernans, or Mac Kernans; and Mac Bradys, chiefs in Cavan, and many other chiefs of note in Connaught and Ulster, of whom accounts have been given in the above mentioned notes on the Hy-Briunians and Brehnians. Thus it appears that the kings, princes, and chiefs of the Hy Niall race, descended from king Niall of the Hostages, ruled over Ulster and Meath, and the kings, princes, and chiefs of the Hy Briune race, the posterity of Bryan, king of Connaught, brother of the monarch Niall, ruled over Connaught, therefore these two great branches of the Heremonians, were the rulers of Leath-Cuinn, or the northern half of Ireland, comprising the kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught; and the Hy Niall kings likewise reigned exclusively as monarchs of Ireland for a period of six hundred years, from the fifth to the eleventh century, and two of the Hy Briune race, kings of Connaught in the twelfth century, were likewise supreme sovereigns, namely, Torlogh O'Conor, and his son Roderick, the last Milesian monarch of Ireland.

A. D. 1556.

1. Uaran Maighe Haai, now the parish of Oran, in the half barony of Ballymoe, county of Roscommon. The term Uaran signifies a fountain of pure spring water, and may have been some celebrated well which, as stated in the text, lay in Maighe Haai, pleted by Malachy O'Dalachain, on the festival of St. Matthew the Evangelist.

O'Brien, i. e. Donal, defeated Teige, the son of Murrogh O'Brien, at the castle of Dysart (in Clare), in an engagement, in which thirty or upwards were slain.

Donogh, the son of O'Conor Failly, i. e. Bryan, who had been under the guarantee and protection of the earl of Kildare, was taken prisoner by the lord justice at Druim-da-Maighe. The lord justice and the earl sent despatches, respectively, to the queen of England, to learn what she would say should be done with those prisoners, for the lord justice had at the time in imprisonment O'Conor and Donogh, with several others. O'Moore and Donogh O'Conor were set at liberty on the responsibility of their guarantees, namely, the earl of Kildare and the earl of Ormond, a circumstance little expected.

O'Ferrall Baun, i. e. Teige, the son of Conmac, died at a fine old age.

O'Madden, i. e. John, the son of Breasal, lord of Siol Anmcha, was slain by Breasal Duv O'Madden, and two lords were appointed over Siol Anmcha, namely, Breasal Duv and Malachy Modardha.

Anthony, the son of William O'Coffey, chief professor of Ireland in poetry, was treacherously killed by night at Ballinluig, in Moybachla, and it was not discovered by whom he had been slain.

O'Dogherty, i. e. Felim, son of Conor Carrach, died on the 6th of December.

A. D. 1557.

Armagh was twice plundered in one month by the lord justice, Thomas Sussex.

Mac Murrogh,¹ i. e. Murrogh, son of Maurice Cavenagh, was put to death in Leighlin by the English, for he had been preparing to gain power and oppose them, and they treacherously seized him in the council-house.

The castle of Fadden, in Delvin Eathra (in King's county), was taken by a prisoner who was confined in it, and he delivered it into the hands of Mac Coghlan, who expelled the tribe of Fergal, and hanged the hostages on Shrove Monday, which happened to be the 1st of March.

The castle of Racra (on the townland of Roughra, near Shannon Bridge, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county), was demolished by O'Melaghlin and the English of Athlone; and after that a commotion arose between Mac Coghlan and O'Melaghlin.

Offaly was plundered, and the O'Conors were again expelled from their country, and hostages taken from them by the lord justice; the following were the hostages: O'Conor Failley, his brother's son, Rossa, the son of Murrogh, with many others; and all those hostages were put to death by the English, except O'Conor alone.

O'Moore, i. e. Conall, was taken prisoner by the English, and was put to death by them at Leighlin. It was a source of great sorrow among the Irish to behold their chiefs and nobles destined to that end, although they could not help them.

The lord justice marched with an army to expel the Siol Conchobhair (O'Conors of Offaley), from Meelick (in Galway), after having learned that they were in that place; he prepared and took with him some cannon to Athlone, and had them conveyed from thence in boats to Meelick, and his forces went through Bealach-an-Fhothair (Ballaghanogher), to Lurgan of Lusmagh (parish of Lusmagh, barony of Garrycastle, King's county), commanded by himself; he took Meelick and Breachluain after that, and Donogh, the son of Colla (O'Madden), and several others of the guards, were or Moy Aoi, an ancient territory in the present county of Roscommon, and was thus designated to distinguish it from Uaran Mor, or the great spring, now Oranmore, in the county of Galway. This place was also known by the name of Uaran-ui-Chlabaigh, probably so called from O'Clabaigh the coarb of St. Patrick, mentioned in the text, who was then abbot of Oran. St. Patrick founded a church here in the fifth century, and Cethecus, called Cetgen in the book of Armagh, one of his disciples, was appointed bishop of it, whose remains lie here interred. The ruins of the old church are still to be seen, near which is the remnant of one of the ancient Round Towers, about twelve feet high, and eleven feet three inches in internal diameter; the walls are four feet six inches thick, and the stones, which are of two different kinds of limestone, are extremely well cut, and fit closely together.

A. D. 1557.

1. Mac Murrogh.—The Mac Murroghs or Cavenaghs and their allies, according to Mac Geoghegan, made some incursions at this time into the southern parts of the county of Dublin, but they were surprised and dispersed by the garrison of the city, and several of them were slain; a body of one hundred and forty of them withdrew to the fortress of Powerscourt in Wicklow, where they determined to defend themselves; they were besieged by the troops under the command of sir George Stanley from Dublin, and being unable to withstand the great number of their besiegers, were obliged to surrender, and being brought to Dublin seventy-four of them were put to death.

slain by him. The country was completely spoiled and plundered on that occasion, and the sons of Malachy Balbh (O'Madden), and the insurgents along with them, were expelled from the country. The lord justice left a Saxon constable, namely Mr. Francis, in possession of Meelick, and he took hostages from the two O'Maddens, namely, Malachy Modardha and Breasal; and he also took hostages from Mac Coghlan, namely, his own son, and some others. So that it was after that manner that Siol Anmeha was taken, and it is impossible to relate or reckon how much damage had been done on that expedition, which took place exactly three weeks before Lammas.

O'Ferrall Bane, i. e. Donal, was killed by Fachtna, the son of Teige O'Ferrall; and Fachtna himself was for that act afterwards expelled by the English.

Donal, the son of Lisagh O'Moore, lord of Slieve Margy (in Queen's county), was hanged by the English, viz. by Mr. Sili.

The lord justice marched with a force into Fercall (in King's county), to expel the plunderers from it, having heard that they were in the woods of Fercall; he took Theobald O'Mulloy and others prisoners, and he proceeded from thence to Ely, and took Leim-ui-Bhanain², and it was the goodness of his horse that enabled O'Carroll to escape from him. The lord justice returned back, after having greatly disturbed the peace of the Irish of those places; he afterwards went to England, and left the treasurer in his place. The treasurer (Sir Henry Sydney), marched with another force into Fercall, to take revenge on O'Mulloy, i. e. Art, for giving protection to the wood kerns and the insurgents; the country was plundered from the wood eastward, Baile-Mac-Abainn, and Lann-Eala (parish of Lynally, barony of Ballycowan, King's county), both houses and churches, were burned, and the son of O'Mulloy, namely, the Calvach, was slain at Beal-Atha-glaise, by the treasurer and his forces, on that occasion; he came a second time and burned the country, cut down the woods, and gave neither peace nor rest to O'Mulloy,

2. Leim-ni-Bhanain, i. e. O'Banan's Leap, now called Leap, a village situated between Parsonstown and Roscrea, in the King's county, where the O'Carrolls, lords of Ely, had a castle, and there is still one there called Leap Castle, therefore this place is not the castle of Lemanaghan, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county, as stated by mistake in the Annals at the year 1514; Bailebut expelled and banished him, and proclaimed him a traitor; he conferred the lordship on Theobald O'Mulloy, after having left his son as a hostage with him in his stead.

An awful war arose between the English and all the Irish who were opposed to them, viz. the O'Conors, O'Moores, O'Mulloys and O'Carrolls, and it is impossible to relate how many depredations, slaughters and plunders were committed by them, from the Shannon to Sliabh Ruadh, from Bladhma to Cliodhna, and from the Eoir to the same Cliodhna (Slieve Roe mountains, on the borders of Dublin and Wicklow; Bladhma is the Slievebloom mountains, on the borders of the King's and Queen's counties; Cliodhna was near Cork, and Eoir was the river Nore, in Kilkenny).

O'Carroll, i. e. William Odhar, having got an advantage, took Caislean-an-Leime (Leap castle), from the English.

Torlogh, the son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige-an-Chomaid O'Brien, died.

John O'Neill, the son of Conn, son of Conn, collected and marshalled a very great army to march into Tircconnell, and all the Orgiellians and all the English and Irish from Traigh-Bhaile-Mic-Buain (Dundalk), to the river Finn, came and joined his army. Those forces did not halt till they came to Carricleith, between the two rivers, namely, the Finn and Mourne, where they formed an extensive military encampment, in which they spent their time very pleasantly in the camp of the son of O'Neill, for they carried on the selling and buying of Meadha (mead or metheglin) wine, fine clothes, and all sorts of commodities. The son of O'Neill received intelligence that the people of Tircconnell had sent their cows and cattle herds into the retired parts and fastnesses of the country in their rear. He said that act should avail them nothing, as whether they were in Leinster or Munster he would pursue them until he should bring them under his own jurisdiction, so that henceforth there should rule over Ulster only one king. With respect to the people of Tircconnell they were thus circumstanced, that O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, Mic-Abainn seems to be the place called Ballyrickvere, not far from Lynally; this information has been kindly communicated by that learned antiquary, T. L. Cooke, Esq., of Parsonstown, who correctly states, that the English name is derived from the Irish Leim, which signifies a Leap.

was in bad health and unable to move, having been for two years previously imprisoned by his son Calvach, during which time Calvach ruled the country, and his brother Hugh, with his followers, were in opposition to him, and at this time he was along with John (O'Neill) his kinsman, namely, his mother's brother. When Calvach received intelligence that John (O'Neill) had encamped with his army on the borders of his territory, he weighed in his mind what he should do under the impending danger which threatened him, and he then consulted his father Manus what plans should be adopted against his enemies, whenever they should enter the country. The advice which O'Donnell, his father, gave him was this, that as he had not an equal number of forces with the son of O'Neill he had better not give him battle, but to watch the movements of their people should they enter his country, and then to endeavour if he got an opportunity, to attack their camp by surprise, and by that means, he was of opinion, he should conquer them, and on this plan they agreed. As to John O'Neill, he advanced with his forces from Carrickleith, without stopping or halting, having crossed the river Finn and proceeded near Raphoe through the Lagan, and halted and encamped beside Bally-Aighidhchaoin, convenient to a stream which flows from the well called Cabharthach, and his forces pitched their tents and booths there. Calvach was on the same day with his son Conn at Mullogh-Beinnin, attended by a small party, which consisted of only thirty horsemen and two companies of galloglasses of the Mac Sweeneys of Fanat, namely, one of the sept of Roderick, commanded by Walter, the son of Murrough, and the other of the sept of Donal, commanded by Donal Gorm Mac Sweeney. When Calvach heard that John (O'Neill) had marched to that place with his forces, he sent two of his faithful men to reconnoitre them, whose names were Donogh Oge, the son of Donogh Roe Maguire, and Maurice Mac Ailin; those two proceeded without being perceived until they were in the midst of the forces, who were so numerous and extensive, that they themselves could not know one another, even if it were day, except alone by recognising their leaders. Those two forementioned persons proceeded along from one fire to another, until they came to the great central fire, which was before the door of the tent of O'Neill's son, from which an immense light blazed forth, because he commanded the centre, and at it were sixty stern warlike galloglasses with their sharp, well-mounted battle-axes prepared for action, and sixty resolute determined Scots, with their weighty broad-sided heavy-striking swords in their hands, drawn ready for execution, watching and guarding the son of O'Neill. When the time arrived for the forces to take their food, and while it was divided and distributed amongst them, the two spies whom we have mentioned, extended their hands for their portions like the others to the distributor, and what they received was a helmet full of meal, with a due proportion of butter. With those proofs they returned to their people, and on exhibiting them, all they related about what they had seen was believed. Calvach commanded his men to put on their armour quickly, which was instantly obeyed. The two battalions then formed themselves into one body, and Conn O'Donnell, on foot, took the centre between Walter and Donal (Mac Sweeney), while at the same time he gave his horse to his father. Having marched forward to the camp, they did not halt until they reached the central companies, who were guarding the son of O'Neill, and they made a vigorous and unexpected attack on the people of the camp. Then followed on both sides slaughter, destruction, conflict, discomfiture, cutting and clashing of sharp-edged battle-axes and high tempered cleaving swords, until warriors were cut down, and heroes subdued by the assaulting party. When John (O'Neill) heard the sound of the great forces, and the clamour of the hosts, he was certain that the enemy attacked his camp, and he fled through the back of his tent unperceived. It rained calmly, dripping during the night without intermission, so that the brooks and rivers of the country became flooded. The forces of the Tyronians were at length defeated by the force of fighting and conflict, with sanguinary slaughter. John (O'Neill) fled unattended by any of his people except two of the party of Hugh, the son of Manus O'Donnell, along with Donogh, the son of Felim Finn O'Gallagher, and they proceeded through the most direct and private ways until they crossed the Daol (Deel), Finn and Derg (rivers, on the borders of Tyrone, Derry, and Donegal), and it was by swimming those three rivers along with his two attendants, he got across them, and proceeded from thence to Tearman-ui-Moain (Termonamungan in Tyrone); he purchased a horse that night from O'Moan, and arrived by the break of day at Airegal-da-Chiarog (Errigal Keeroge in Tyrone). Calvach remained with his small force the rest of the night in the camp, which had been held by John O'Neill in the beginning of the night, with much mirth, enjoying and feasting themselves till the following morning, with the wines and viands of that host which they had just defeated. On the following day an immense deal of property appeared to their view, consisting of arms, armour, valuable goods and horses, so that four score horses of the booty fell to the share of Conn the son of Calvach, besides the splendid steed of the son of O'Neill, which was called Mac-an-Iolair (the Son of the Eagle), and it is doubtful if so much valuable booty had been taken at the battle of Knock Buidhbh Derg, which was gained by O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Roe, against O'Neill, as was obtained by the Tírconnallians on that occasion.

A. D. 1558.

The earl of Desmond¹, namely, James, the son of John, son of Thomas, son of James, son of Gerald, the earl, died, and his territory could not well spare that good man, for during his time it was not found necessary to infold cattle or to close the doors, from Duncaoin in Kerry, to the Meeting of the Three Waters of the green borders at the extremity of the province of Eochy, the son Luchta, and to Leinster, and his son Gerald was appointed his successor.

O'Brien of Thomond, i. e. Donal, the son of Connor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh, was expelled from his hereditary estate, and deprived of his earldom, by the lord justice of Ireland, namely, Thomas Fitzwalter (Thomas Ratchiffe, viscount Fitzwalter and earl of Sussex), and his brother's son Conor, the son of Donogh, son of Conor O'Brien. Clonroad (at Ennis), Bunratty, and Great Clare, the chief family seats of the country, and not these alone but the entire country, both waste and inhabited, were given into the hands of the son of Donogh O'Brien, by the English, and he was also appointed earl over that country, and he was the first earl of the Clan Cais (Dalcassians) by title, but not by inauguration. Abomination, hatred, disgust and terror, seized the Gaels of fair Banba (Ireland) on account of that act, namely, the banishment of Donal O'Brien; and the clans of Conn and of Cahir (the posterity of Con of the Hundred Battles, and of Cahir More, both celebrated monarchs of Ireland), the race of Heremon, and of Heber, of Ir, and of Ith, were alarmed on account of that humiliation.

The baron O'Neill, i. e. Ferdorcha (this Ferdorcha is called Matthew, baron of Dungannon, by the English writers), the son of Conn Bacach, son of Conn, son of Henry, son of Owen, was unkindredly slain by the people of his brother John, and the cause of his death was that he was nominated to succeed to the patrimony, should his father die before him.

The son of O'Conor Faily, i. e. Donogh, the son of Bryan, son of Cahir, son of Conn, son of the Calvach, was slain by O'Dempsey, namely, Anthony, the son of Hugh; that death left the Barrow in mourning, and Offaly feeble, and Leinster in sorrow; and that act was perpetrated precisely at the festival of St. Patrick.

The earl of Clanrickard gave the Scots a complete overthrow; and that earl was Rickard, the son of Ulick of the Heads, the son of Rickard, son of Ulick of Knoectow, the son of Ulick Meadhonach, the son of Ulick of the Wine; and the Scots who were thus defeated were, Donal, son of Dougall, son of Gillespie Mac Ailin; and Dugald, the son

A. D. 1558.

1. The earl of Desmond.—The vast territory possessed by the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, is here pointed out; it extended over the greater part of the counties of Cork and Kerry, and also over parts of Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, as shown in these Annals in the note on Desmond. Dun Caoin mentioned in the text is now called Dunquin or Donquin, sometimes called Dunquene, a parish in the barony of Corcaquinney, county of Kerry, near Ventry harbour and Dunmore Head; the Meeting of the Three Waters is the confluence of the rivers Suir, Nore, and Barrow, at the bay of Waterford; the province of Eochy, the son of Luchta, was Munster, which was so called from Eochy, an ancient king of Munster, who flourished about a century before the Christian era; the earl's territory as mentioned in the text, also extended to Leinster, as his jurisdiction appears to have reached over the greater part of Waterford, and thence to the borders of Kilkenny.

of Donogh, son of Gillespie Mac Ailin, two young chivalrous constables, who bartered their services for a long time with the Ultonians and the Tirconnallians, among whom they boasted of their great activity and superior valour, and having left the eastern countries, proceeded into Connaught to exalt their names. They first went into the territory of Carbry the son of Niall (Carbury in Sligo), through the lower part of Tirerrill, to the district of Gallen (in Mayo), which Cormac Galleng, the son of Teige, son of Kian, son of Oilíoll Olum (king of Munster in the second century), gained by conquest, after he had forfeited his father's protection, to the country of Amhalgaid, the son of Fiachrach (Tyrawley, in Mayo). Mac William, i. e. Rickard of the Iron, the son of David, son of Edmond, son of Ulick, came thither to meet them, and promised them support, for the purpose of plundering his neighbours, and devastating his enemies. When the earl of Clanrickard received intelligence that those foreign troops had come to his neighbourhood, he collected all the armed forces and ordnance he could command, and did not halt till he came to the place where those Scots were stationed at the Moy. It was well for him to have attacked them there, for he overthrew those foreign forces and stern warriors who had not taken it into their consideration how far removed they had been from their own country and kinsmen, for they suffered their enemies to slaughter them on the spot. Donal and Dugald were slain there, and their preservation would have been a greater victory than their death, because a full equivalent of any kind of wealth might be obtained as a ransom for them. The power of the Scots was very much lessened in the province of Connaught for a long period of their time through that defeat.

The English defeated O'Carroll, i. e. William Odhar, the son of Fearganainm, son of Mulroona, son of John O'Carroll, on the plain of Cinncoircaide; many young soldiers were lost, and heroes were slain, and amongst those who fell was Murrough Gencach, the son of Edmond, son of Murrough, son of Edmond Mac Sweeney, one of the constables of the Dalcassians, and a native of Tirboghaine (Banagh in Donegal); O'Carroll himself escaped from that disaster.

The archdeacon of Killaloe, Donogh Oge, the son of Donogh, son of Nicholas O'Grady, a lord both in church and country, died.

Elizabeth was proclaimed queen of England on the 17th of November.

A. D 1559.

O'Neill, i. e. Conn Bacach, the son of Conn, son of Henry, son of Owen, died, after having spent his age and time without reproach or dispraise; and his death would have been considered a great loss among the Kinel Owen, were it not for his very advanced age, and that he left a legitimate heir to succeed him, namely, John Dongaileach (O'Neill).

Edmond Butler, the son of Thomas, son of Edmond, son of Thomas, died, lord of the territory of Cluan Meala (Clonmel), and of Cathair-Duin-Iascaidh (Cahir, in Tipperary) on the river Suir; a mild melodious trumpet; a delightful, fair-sided, beautiful, blooming youth, but who was cut off in the prime and early part of life; and his father's brother, Pierce, the son of Edmond, succeeded in his place.

The earl of Thomond, i. e. Conor, the son of Donogh, son of Conor O'Brien, laid siege to Inchiquin in the month of June, precisely, against the sons of Murrough O'Brien; one of the sons of Murrough, namely, Donogh, was in possession of the town, and Teige, the son of Murrough O'Brien, was in constant attendance, and continually under the protection of the earl of Desmond, since the expulsion of Donal O'Brien, till that time. Teige complained to the earl of his bad treatment, and said he feared he should be without town or kinsman, unless he obtained immediate relief. The earl entertained Teige's grievances favourably, and called a muster of his brave troops, and a gathering of his tribes; he did not, however, wait for a proper mustering of his forces, but marched directly forward with boldness and confidence across the waters of the clear flowing Shannon. When the earl of Thomond received intelligence of the march of his army towards him, he raised the siege of Inchiquin, left the camp empty, and entreated his dear friend, the earl of Clanrickard, to come to his relief. It was well for him to have asked that request, for he did not wait to be asked the second time, but immediately marched to the place where the earl of Thomond was then. As to the earl of Desmond, he did not halt until he arrived on the plain of Inchiquin, and returned the same night to Baile-I-Aille, and the camps of the earls were not far distant from each other that night. The earl of Desmond got up by the break of day the following morning, and put his valiant forces into order and battle array, for he expected he should not escape from those two earls, who were in pursuit of him, without a battle. In that opinion he was not mistaken, for they commenced skirmishing, and fighting each other from their respective camps, until they arrived at the top of Knock-Fuarchoilli. It was there that destiny decreed, and fate permitted them to meet on the same plain, at which place the sway of battle of Clan Cais (the Daleassians) had forsaken them on that day, for it had been till then their accustomed lot to defeat the Geraldines before them on every hill on which they had hitherto engaged; but even on that day, Teige, the son of Murrough O'Brien, fought on the same side with Gerald in the battle. Gerald, the son of James, and Teige O'Brien, turned the destruction of the battle and the conflict of the hill against the noble and warlike earls, who coveted his subjugation, and sought to dispossess him; so that they (the earls), left their men under the power of the arms of their opponents, and at the mercy of their enemies. They left on the field Donogh Gobha, the son of Bryan, son of Torlogh, son of Teige Mac Mahon, and a number of the chiefs of Siol Aodha (Mac Namaras of Clare) were slain there, with the chief constable of Clanrickard, namely, Edmond, the son of Roderick More Mac Sweeney, and Colla, the son of Murrough, son of Roderick More; the three sons of Murrough, the son of Donogh, son of Donal of the Defeats Mac Sweeney, namely, Conor, the constable of Thomond; also Owen and Donogh, and the sons of Edmond, the son of Murrough, son of Edmond Mac Sweeney, namely, Maolmurry Buidhe and Donogh. We shall, however, enumerate no more, but the earl of Desmond returned home after a victorious conquest and successful defeat.

O'Carroll, i. e. William Odhar, the son of Fear-ganaium, son of Mulroona, son of John, marched at the head of a powerful force against the Mac I-Brien of Ara, (in Tipperary), namely, Torlogh, the son of Murrough, son of Donal, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Murrough-na-Raithnighe. O'Carroll, with great expedition devastated and completely plundered the country, from Bel-an-Atha to the Mill of O'Hogan; on the same day he slew the brother of Mac I-Brien, namely, Murrough, the son of Murrough, a distinguished leader, the most harmless of the youths of the tribe of Bryan Roe. After that, the Mac I-Brien called a gathering of his friends to take revenge of O'Carroll, for the injurious indignity done him; and after his noble troops had collected about him he marched forward and put on the resolution of completely plundering Hy Carthin (Ikerrin in Tipperary), on that expedition. The place where O'Carroll happened to be by fate on that night before him was, on the top of a hill in Ikerrin, on which he could hear any movement going on in the country about him, and it was at the foot of the hill where O'Carroll rested, that Mac I-Brien sent forth his scouts to plunder the districts. After these parties had gone forth from him, O'Carroll perceived them in battle array, and in fighting order, but not one escaped the power of his arms, or otherwise being captured, of all those that came within his reach in that place. On that occasion, every one of Mac I-Brien's party who fought were slain, and among those killed was his constable, Heremon, the son of Giolla Duv, son of Conor, son of Donogh Mac Sweeney; Mac I-Brien himself was taken prisoner, and there was profit in that capture, for he was not set at liberty without a ransom.

Teige-an-tSuasain, the son of Donal, son of Conor O'Brien, died in Fermanagh, in the territory of Maguire, while visiting amongst his remote friends, after he had been expelled from his patrimony along with his father, the year before that; he was the most distinguished man of his age for swiftness of foot, activity, military achievements, and equestrianism, of the race of Cormac Cas, and he was interred at Aughavea.

Calvach O'Donnell was taken prisoner by O'Neill, i. e. Shane (John), on the 14th of May, which happened after the following manner: Cathbar, the son of Manus, having been in contention with Calvach and his son Con, and the place where Cathbar kept his residence was at the Cranoge of Lough Beatha. Con, the son of

Calvach, collected the forces of the country and laid siege to the Cranoge, and Calvach was at this time

Reign of Elizabeth.—On the death of queen Mary, on the 17th of November, 1558, her half-sister Elizabeth, daughter of Henry VIII. by his second wife Anne Boleyn, succeeded as queen of England; Elizabeth was then in the 25th year of her age, and died on the 24th of March, A. D. 1603, in the 70th year of her age, and 45th of her reign.

Lords Lieutenant and Deputies.—The following account of the lords lieutenants, deputies, and lords justices, in the reign of Elizabeth, has been collected from Borlase's Reduction of Ireland, Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, Ware, and various other sources. In 1558, Thomas Ratcliffe, earl of Sussex, who had served under queen Mary, was continued lord deputy, and had an army of 1360 foot, and 320 horse, but going to England the same year, sir Henry Sydney, president of Wales, was sent over as lord deputy; he marched northward to defend the Pale, and having proceeded to Dundalk, had a conference with Shane O'Neill, at whose request he became his gossip, and attended as sponsor at the christening of his child. Shane (John), having assumed the title of the O'Neill, was in contention with his brother Ferdorcha, whom the English writers call Matthew, and who had been created baron of Dungannon, and was to succeed his father Conn, as earl of Tyrone. In 1559, Thomas, earl of Sussex, returned as lord lieutenant, and landed at Bullock, near Dublin, on the 27th of August, and in January following held a Parliament at Dublin, in which, amongst various other statutes, it was enacted, that every person holding any ecclesiastical or temporal offices, must take the oath of supremacy, and also an Act for consecrating archbishops and bishops, and maintaining the queen's right to the crown of Ireland, and making it treason to deny her authority; and, according to Mac Geoghegan, a proclamation was issued to abolish the Mass. Sussex had, according to Cox, instructions to people Ulster with English, and to recover Lecale, Newry, and Carlingford, from the Scots; Sussex returned to England, and in February, 1560, sir William Fitz-William was appointed lord deputy. Shane O'Neill at this time reduced Calvach O'Donnell, Maguire, O'Reilly, and other chiefs to subjection, and assumed the sovereignty of Ulster. In 1561, about April, the earl of Sussex came over again as lord lieutenant, and sir William Fitz-William was appointed lord justice. Sussex received the submission of Shane O'Neill, and returned to England in January, leaving Fitz-William as lord justice. In 1562, in July, Sussex came back as lord lieutenant, and in 1563, during the months of April, May, and June, he carried on contests with Shane O'Neill in Ulster, and had various conflicts with his forces at Dungannon, Tullaghoge, Armagh, and other places, committed great depredations, and carried off, according to Cox, no less than three thousand three hundred kine, and one thousand five hundred garrons (horses) and mares, which were divided amongst his soldiers, and he then returned to Drogheda. About this time the lord lieutenant Sussex formed the ancient territory of Anally into the county of Longford, and Connaught was divided into six counties, Clare, Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, and Leitrim, but Clare was afterwards added to Munster; the various Irish chiefs of those territories were deprived of the authority they held under the laws of tanistry, and compelled to make their submission to the crown. In 1564 Sussex was recalled, and in 1565 sir Nicholas Arnold came from England as lord justice in May, and had an army of 1596 men, but he was recalled in the month of January following. In 1565 sir Henry Sydney, who had been treasurer of Ireland under queen Mary, came over as lord deputy in January, and in 1566 carried on contests with Shane O'Neill in Ulster, and took from his territory, according to Cox, two thousand cows, and five hundred garrons. He restored to O'Donnell the castles of Donegal and Ballyshannon; in this year sir Warham St. Leger was appointed president of Munster, and sir Edward Fitton, president of Connaught. In 1567 Sydney went to England, and left the Rev. Dr. Robert Weston, lord chancellor, and sir William Fitz-William, treasurer, as lords justices. At this time Donal Mac Carthy More of Desmond, who in 1565 had been created earl of Glencar, and baron of Valentia, says Cox, at Killodtomrair, with a few forces, besides some women and poets; a party of the Tirconnallians despising those titles, assumed that of king of Munster, and, having confederated with O'Sullivan, Mac Donogh, Mac Sweeney, and others, laid waste the possessions of the English settlers in Roche's country, and carried off seven hundred sheep, fifteen hundred cows, and one hundred garrons. In 1568 sir Henry Sydney returned as lord deputy; he landed at Carrickfergus in September, and received the submission of Torlogh Lynogh O'Neill, who, on the death of John, assumed the title of O'Neill, and having defeated the Scots, and slain their chief, Alexander Oge Mac Donnell, he took a body of one thousand Scots into his pay. The deputy then proceeded to Dublin, where he convened a Parliament in January, in which, amongst other statutes, an Act of attainder was passed against the late Shane O'Neill, and for the extinction of the name of O'Neill, and that the queen be entitled to the county of Tyrone, and other parts of Ulster. In 1569 sir Peter Carew, who took the barony of Idrone in Carlow from the Cavenaghs, became president of Leinster, and sir John Perrott was appointed lord president of Munster; in this year Pope Pius V. issued on the 5th of March, a Bull of excommunication against queen Elizabeth. In 1571 Sydney went to England, and his brother-in-law sir William Fitz-William was appointed as lord justice, and afterwards as lord deputy. To maintain the war in Ireland and various expenses, it was computed, according to Cox, that queen Elizabeth, since she came to the crown to this time, had spent £490,779, or nearly half a million of money, an enormous sum in those days, and estimated to be equivalent to ten or twelve times the amount at the present day, while, he says, the revenue during the same period came to no more than £120,000. In 1575 sir Henry Sydney returned a third time as lord deputy, and having landed at Skerries, on the 12th of September, he proceeded thence to Drogheda, as the plague raged in Dublin; he marched into Ulster against the Scots, who, under Sorley Buighe Mac Donnell, had attacked Carrickfergus and other places, slew many of the English, plundered their settlements, and took possession of the Glins and Routes in Antrim, and devastated all the country as far as Newry, where marshal Bagnall resided. Sydney next proceeded to Leinster, and in Kilkenny received the submission of the celebrated Rory Oge O'Moore, who had laid waste the English settlements in Kildare, King's and Queen's counties. He next proceeded to Waterford, where he was magnificently received, and he there attended at the burial of sir Peter Carew, whose ancestors, says Cox, had been marquesses of Cork, and who claimed a mighty estate, comprising the greater part of ancient Desmond, in the counties of Cork, Waterford, and Kerry, and Mac Carthy Riagh, Cormac Mac Teige, Mac Carthy of Muskerry, Barry Oge of Barrymore, O'Mahony, O'Driscoll, O'Daly, and other great chiefs, apparently recognised Carew's claims in opposition to the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, and proposed that if sir Peter would come and reside amongst them they would advance him three thousand kine, with sheep, hogs, and corn, and annually pay him all reasonable demands, but his death put an end to all these speculations. The deputy proceeded to Cork and Limerick, received the submission of many chiefs, and went to Thomond, which, says Cox, "formerly belonged to the English lords of Clare, and was inhabited by many English, but now not a man of English extraction to be found there." He imprisoned the earl of Thomond, kept his brother in irons, and made sir Donal O'Brien sheriff; he thence went to Galway where came, says Cox, seven of the family of Clan-Donnells, and after them Mac William Eighter, who could speak Latin though he could not speak English, and he made his submission; the O'Malleys and other chiefs of Mayo, and likewise the sons of the earl of Clanrickard, who were called Mac-an-Earlas, made their submission, and in 1576 the lord deputy returned to Dublin, but soon after was obliged to visit Galway again, to put down the insurrection under the earl of Clanrickard's sons, and having taken Clanrickard's castles, he sent the earl prisoner to Dublin. The lord deputy then proceeded to Limerick, and appointed sir William Drury, president of Munster; he then marched again into Galway to oppose the earl of Clanrickard's informed O'Neill that Calvach was in that place unguarded and unprotected. The opportunity was not neglected by O'Neill, and he proceeded with all the forces he could possibly collect, unawares and sons, who had gotten two thousand Scots to their assistance, and besieged Loughrea, but were defeated by the English forces assisted by Mac William Oughter; Sydney restored Mac William to most of his castles, and having appointed sir Nicholas Malby governor of Connaught, he returned to Dublin in October, and continued lord deputy till September, 1578, when he went to England, having been at different times eleven years chief governor of Ireland. In 1578 sir William Drury was appointed lord deputy, and having marched to Munster against the earl of Desmond, he came to Limerick, where he executed twenty-two criminals, and thirty-six at Kilkenny, one of which, says Cox, "was a blackamoor, and two others were witches, and condemned by the law of nature, for there was no positive law against witchcraft in those days." From this curious circumstance mentioned by sir Richard Cox, who was a lawyer and had been lord chancellor of Ireland, it appears that he believed that these persons executed were actually witches, and an act against witchcraft was passed in this reign, A. D. 1585, in the Parliament held in Dublin by the lord deputy sir John Perrott. The deputy afterwards went to Waterford, in September 1579, where he soon after died. In 1579, on the death of Drury, sir William Pelham was made lord justice in October, and having appointed the earl of Ormond governor of Munster, and sir Warham St. Leger, marshal of that province, he soon after in person proceeded to Kilkenny, Cashel, and Limerick, to organise Munster against the earl of Desmond, and afterwards went to Thomond, Galway, and Athlone, and returned to Dublin in January; he next proceeded to Wexford, Waterford, Clonmel, and Limerick, and concerted measures with the earl of Ormond against Desmond, with whose forces he had several engagements in Connello, and other parts of Limerick and Kerry, and proceeding through those two counties, the English forces plundered and ravaged the territories of the earl of Desmond, and of the Fitzmaurices, barons of Lixnaw, and carried off several thousand sheep and cattle. In 1580 Arthur Grey, called lord Grey of Wilton, came to Ireland as lord deputy, and landed at Howth on the 12th of August, and was sworn in St. Patrick's church on the 14th of September. He appointed the earl of Ormond governor of Munster, and Adam Loftus archbishop of Dublin, and the earl of Kildare, governors of the Pale, and captain Zouch, governor of Munster. The lord deputy Grey had various conflicts with the earl of Desmond, and the Irish chiefs of Leinster and Munster, and in his time also took place the massacre of the Spaniards in Kerry, all of which events are hereafter related in the course of these Annals. From the many acts of cruelty committed by lord Grey, he was recalled in 1582, and left Ireland in August. In 1582 Adam Loftus, archbishop of Dublin and lord chancellor, and sir Henry Wallop, treasurer of the army, were in September appointed lords justices; the earl of Ormond arrived from England and landed at Waterford with 400 men; he was made governor of Munster, and attacked the earl of Desmond's forces. In 1584 sir John Perrott was appointed lord deputy, and landed at Dalkey in June; sir John Norris was appointed president of Munster, and sir Richard Bingham governor of Connaught. The deputy proceeded to Mullingar, and thence to Galway and to Limerick, and afterwards to Leinster, and received in the different provinces the submission of many chiefs; he returned to Dublin, and soon after proceeded to Ulster with one thousand foot, some kerns, and, says Cox, the risings out of the Pale, and at Newry received the submission of Torlogh Lynogh O'Neill, Magennis, Mac Mahon, and other chiefs; he sent some ships to Lough Foyle to attack the Scots, and proceeded to Clannaboy against Sorley Buighe and Bryan Carragh Mac Donnell, with whose forces he had many conflicts, and he received submission and hostages from them and the O'Neills, O'Donnells, O'Kanes, &c. Perrott formed seven counties in Ulster, namely, Armagh, Monaghan, Tyrone, Coleraine, afterwards called Derry, Donegal, Fermanagh, and Cavan, and appointed for the first time sheriffs, justices of the peace, and other officers in those counties, and desired that a chief justice might be sent over to abolish the laws of tanistry. In April 1585, he held a great Parliament in Dublin, of which an account is given in these Annals, and in it amongst other statutes, an act was passed against witchcraft and sorcery. Perrott proceeded to Ulster in summer to oppose the Scots who had landed with great forces under Alexander Mac Sorley Buighe Mac Donnell, and he received the submission of various Irish chiefs at Dungannon. In one of their encounters with the English forces the Scots were defeated near Strabane, according to Cox, and their commander Alexander Mac Donnell, being taken prisoner, his head was cut off and sent to Dublin, where it was fixed on a pole, and on the deputy's return to Dublin in August, old Sorley Buighe himself came and made his submission. In 1558 Perrott was recalled on some charge of misgovernment, and after his return to England was tried for high treason, found guilty, and imprisoned in the Tower of London, where he died in 1592; Perrott was said to be a natural son of king Henry VIII., and in a passage from his life quoted by Borlase, his government of Ireland is thus praised:—"Pacifecavit Conaciam, relaxavit Mediam, subjugavit Ultoniam, fregit Laganium, ligavit Mononiam, extirpavit Scotos, refrenavit Anglos." In 1588 sir William Fitzwilliam, who had before been chief governor, was again appointed lord deputy on the 30th of June; when he sought some reward for his services, says Cox, "he was answered at White Hall, that the government of Ireland was a preferment and not a service, and he ever after endeavoured to make his profit of that office." Several vessels belonging to the Spanish Armada having been wrecked on the coast of Ulster, the lord deputy proceeded there to seize the treasure, of which affair an account is hereafter given. In 1589 Fitzwilliam proceeded to Connaught, and received at Galway the submission of sir Murrough O'Flaherty, several of the Burkes, and other chiefs. In 1593 the University of Trinity College, Dublin, was founded. In 1594 Fitzwilliam was recalled, and sir William Russell, youngest son of Francis, earl of Bedford, was appointed lord deputy, and arrived at Howth on 31st of July. Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, made his submission to the deputy, but in 1595 again took up arms against the queen, in Ulster, and was proclaimed a traitor; sir John Norris was sent over as commander of the army. In 1594-95-96, Russell made campaigns in Ulster, Connaught, and Leinster, as related in the course of these Annals. In 1595 general Norris was appointed president of Munster, and in 1597 sir Richard Bingham, for his great severity, was removed from the government of Connaught, and sir Conyers Clifford appointed in his place. Disagreements having arisen between Russell and general Norris, the deputy was recalled. In 1597 Thomas, lord Boroughs, was appointed lord deputy, arrived in Dublin on the 15th of May, and received the sword in St. Patrick's church, on Sunday the 22nd; he made a campaign to Ulster, and in a conflict with Hugh O'Neill, his forces were defeated, and himself mortally wounded, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, he was carried to Newry where he died in a few days. In 1597, on the 30th of October, sir Thomas Norris, president of Munster, brother to sir John Norris, and son of Henry, lord Norris of Rycot, was appointed lord justice, but he soon after resigned, and in the same year Adam Loftus, archbishop of Dublin, lord chancellor, and sir Robert Gardiner, chief justice, were appointed lords justices; the earl of Ormond was appointed lieutenant-general of the army, and sir Henry Bagnall, marshal, who was slain in 1598 at the great battle of the Yellow Ford, near the river Blackwater, on the borders of Armagh and Tyrone, in which the English forces were defeated with immense slaughter by Hugh O'Neill, as recorded in these Annals. In 1598 Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, and earl marshal of England, son of Walter, earl of Essex, who had made a settlement in Ulster, in the county of Down, but died at Dublin, as hereafter recorded, was appointed lord lieutenant, and arrived on the 15th of April; he brought over an army of 16,000 foot, and 1300 horse, and was accompanied, says Borlase, by many of the prime gentlemen of England; his army was soon after increased to 20,000 men, well armed, equipped, and disciplined. Sir George Carew was made treasurer at war; on the death of sir Henry unnoticed, until he surrounded the house in which Calvach was, in the monastery; they took himself and his wife, the daughter of Mac Gilleain, and carried them off into Tyrone. O'Neill after that gave Calvach a direful and merciless imprisonment, and cohabited with Mac Gilleain's daughter until she brought forth children to him, and if that had not been a temporary respite for the Tirconnallians, it was an unhappy circumstance for the Irish to have been deprived of their chief after that manner.

A. D. 1560.

The daughter of Mac Carthy, i. e. Eveleen, the daughter of Donal, son of Cormac Ladhrach, the wife of the earl of Desmond, namely, of James, the son of John, son of Thomas, in her youth, and afterwards the wife of the earl of Thomond, namely, Conor, the son of Donogh, son of Connor, died; a charitable, humane, benevolent, pious woman was that countess, and she was interred in the burying place of her ancestors, viz., at Oirbellach, (Irrelagh, or Mucruss abbey, at the Lakes of Killarney).

Mac Mahon, i. e. Art Maol, the son of Redmond, son of Glaisne, was slain by the Scots in O'Neill's forces, while unguarded, between two armies in the Routes of Mac Quillan; he was the foremost in every battalion, and the defender of his portion of the province against the men of Bregia and of Meath. His brother's son, namely Hugh, the son of Bryan-na-Moicheirghe, son of Redmond, son of Glaisne, was appointed his successor.

Teige and Owen, the sons of O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan Ballach, the son of Owen O'Rourke, came by an untimely death; Owen in the first place, and the manner in which he came by his death was this, that being in imprisonment with his kinsman Teige, in the town of Leitrim, it happened that he got an opportunity of his guards, and having slain the sentinel set over him by Teige, he went on the top of the castle wall, and cried out that he had the castle in his power, and that it was not fitter for the country to support Teige than him. A soldier of Teige's who was outside, having heard this, laid his cheek to his gun, and took a direct aim at Owen, so that the ball passed through his middle, and he fell dead. Teige was drowned in the harvest of this year, while in the act of going to sleep on a low, sequestered Cranoge (or wooden retreat on a lake), in Muintir Eoluis. To attack them was the same as if a serpent's nest, or to plunder a bird of prey, or to approach a lion's lair, should they fight on the same side.

Teige Buighe, the son of Kian, son of Oilíoll O'Hara, was killed by Cathal Oge, the son of Teige, son of Cathal Oge O'Connor, and there had never sprung in Connaught of the race of Cormac Gallen a better entertainer of man and horse than he was.

Rumours of war, and appearance of conflict, arose between the earl of Desmond, namely, Gerald, the son of James, son of John, and the earl of Ormond, i. e. Thomas, son of James, son of Pierce Roe, son of James, son of Edmond. The cause of this contention was some lands along the river Suir and Eoganacht of Cashel (in Tipperary), the inheritance of the race of Eogan Mor and of the descendants of Cormac Cas, which estates those earls were dividing between them; and when these noblemen could not be reconciled, they agreed on a certain time to meet in a pitched battle, and the place of battle which they appointed was Bothar More, in the neighbourhood of Cnamechoill, and Tipperary. Each party collected their forces respec-

Bagnall, sir Richard Bingham was sent over as marshal of the army, but as soon as he landed he died in Dublin, and sir Samuel Bagnall was sent with 200 foot and 100 horse, which landed at Carlingford. Essex made some expeditions in Munster, Leinster, and Ulster, and lost great numbers of his forces in various conflicts with the Irish chiefs, but did not succeed in reducing them to subjection, though he received an additional supply of 1000 men; he returned to England in September, 1599, and having quarrelled with the queen was sent to the Tower, tried for high treason, and beheaded on the 25th of February, 1601. In 1599 Adam Loftus, archbishop of Dublin and lord chancellor, and sir George Carew, treasurer at war, were in September appointed lords justices. Sir Thomas Norris, lord president of Munster, died at Mallow of a wound he had received in a conflict with the tively of both English and Irish, from Bealach Conglais of the son of Drindesa the Fenian, in the west of the two noble provinces of Munster, to the white-blossomed Barrow, and from the lake of Garman Glas, the son of Bomalica (Wexford), to the foaming broad harbour of Limerick, in the extremity of Hy Fingint, and of the lesser Decies (in Waterford), to Caol-an-Chosnamha. After those great armies having met face to face and front to front, the Almighty God sent the angel of peace to them, to establish concord among those forces, and having sensibly reflected concerning that battle, they separated without fighting on that occasion.

Burkes, and sir Warham St. Leger, marshal of Munster, was slain in single combat near Cork, by Hugh Maguire, chief of Fermanagh; sir George Carew, afterwards earl of Totness, was appointed lord president of Munster, and sir Arthur Savage governor of Connaught. In 1599 sir Charles Blount, lord Mountjoy, afterwards earl of Devonshire, was appointed lord lieutenant; he landed at Howth on the 24th of February, and lodged at lord Howth's castle that night. Mountjoy continued lord lieutenant to the year 1603, and death of Elizabeth; he made many campaigns in the different provinces, and fought numerous battles with Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, Red Hugh O'Donnell, and various other chiefs, of which accounts are given in the course of these Annals.

Thomas and James, the sons of Maurice Dny, son of John, son of Thomas, son of the earl (of Desmond), marched with a force into Carberry (in Cork). The son of Mac Carthy Riavach attacked the plunderers, namely, Donogh, the son of Donal, son of Fingin, son of Donal, and Torlogh, the son of Mulmurry, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh Mac Sweeny, of the tribe of Donogh More, from Tuatha Toraidhe (the territories of Tory Island, in Donegal), happened to be with him at the time, with a brave select party of galloglasses. They pursued the warlike troops to the banks of the Bandon (the river Bandon), and defeated the invading forces beside the river, exactly opposite Inis Eoghanain (Inishannon), on the other side. Two or three hundred of the valiant forces of the Geraldines were either slain or drowned, and although the Carbrians were victorious, they sustained a great loss in that battle, for Torlogh Mac Sweeny lost a hand and foot, and was obliged to use a wooden leg to carry him from that time to his death.

The earl of Thomond marched into the west of Connaught against Murrough of the Battle-Axes, the son of Teige, son of Murrough, son of Roderick O'Flaherty: he proceeded into Crioeh Seach (Joyce's country, barony of Ballynahinch, county of Galway), through Fuathaidh and Bun-an-Blonnain. The people of the town of Galway went to prevent him passing Atha-Tire-Hoilein, but he passed it, partly through consent and force, and he crossed through the central plain of Clanrickard, going and returning on the same expedition.

Mahon, the son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Donogh, son of Donal, son of Torlogh Meith¹, sailed with a ship's crew and some boats from Aran to Desmond; he took some hostages in the southern country, and some affirm that he did not get them properly, but that it was through friendship they had come. On his return back with his booty, the wind became rough and the firmament became stormy, and the ship and boats were separated. While the ship was endeavouring to make for Aran, in the beginning of the night, the sail was forced from the hand of the chief mariner, who was winding the rope, and was rent into fragments in the air, after which the ship struck on a rock at the mouth of Cuan-an-Fhir-Moir (Great Man's Bay, near the Bay of Galway), in the west of Connaught, and was lost, with its crew, except Mahon and three others; upwards of one hundred were drowned in the harbour, among whom was Tuathal O'Malley, the best steersman of a fleet of long ships in his time.

Teige, the son of Murrough O'Brien, was taken prisoner at Limerick by command of the lord justice, and was sent thence to Dublin to be imprisoned; and it was asserted by some persons that the people of the west of Thomond were concerned in that capture.

O'Gallagher, i. e. Owen, the son of Edmond, son of John, the most harmless chief's son in Ulster, died.

A. D. 1561.

Art, the son of Felim Finn O'Gallagher, bishop

A. D. 1560.

1. The O'Briens of Aran. Torlogh Meith, or the Corpulent, here mentioned, was one of the O'Briens, lords of Aran. In O'Brien's Irish Dictionary, at the word Tromer, and also in Vallancey's Collectanea, an account is given of the O'Briens, lords of Aran, who were a branch of the O'Briens, kings of Thomond, and were located at Tromer, in the county of Clare. From the thirteenth to near the end of the sixteenth century, these O'Briens were powerful chiefs, and lords of the Isles of Aran, off the coast of Galway and Clare, over which they exercised the authority of captains and admirals, and protected Galway and the adjoining coasts from pirates; they kept up a large fleet on the Isles, and in consideration of their protection of the trade and harbour, they received annually a tribute of twelve tuns of wine, and other revenues, from the merchants of Galway. They were generally designated the Clan Teige, or Mac Telges, from their great ancestor Tadhg Gle, or Teige the Fair O'Brien, son of Dermot O'Brien, king of Munster in the twelfth century, a descendant of Brian Boru. The O'Briens held their rank as lords of Aran till about A. D. 1585, in the reign of Elizabeth, when they were expelled by the O'Flahertys, chiefs of West Connaught; the O'Briens of Aran are again mentioned at A. D. 1565 in these Annals.

of Raphoe, died at Cenninaghair, on the 13th of August, and was greatly lamented in Tirconnell.

Mary, the daughter of Calvach, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv O'Donnell, the wife of O'Neill, i. e. John, died of indignation, disgust, grief, and dire affliction for the cruel and heartless incarceration inflicted by O'Neill on Calvach, her father, in her presence.

O'Beirne (of Roscommon), i. e. Teige, the son of Carbry, son of Malachy, a learned man, and well versed in Latin, in Irish, and also in the civil and canon law, died, and his young son was appointed in his place.

Anthony, the son of Ferganainm, son of Mulroona, son of John O'Carroll, was slain in the town of O'Cuirc (a name anglicised O'Quirke), in Ormond; there was no sufficient cause for killing or taking him prisoner, and the people of Ely were orphans after him, for churches were deprived of relief and protection after Anthony's death.

Naghtan, the son of Calvach, son of Manus O'Donnell, was accidentally killed by the cast of a dart which he himself had thrown, and which was cast back to him again.

The lord justice of Ireland, namely, Thomas Fitzwalter (Thomas Ratcliffe, viscount Fitzwalter and earl of Sussex), marched into Tyrone to take revenge for the capture of Calvach O'Donnell, and also for his own quarrels with the country. He encamped with a great army at Armagh, and constructed deep entrenchments, and impregnable ramparts about the great church of Armagh, which he intended to keep constantly guarded. O'Neill, i. e. John, having received intelligence of this, sent a party of his faithful men and friends with Calvach O'Donnell to guard and keep him from the lord justice, and they conveyed him from one island to another, in the recesses and sequestered places of Tyrone, until the lord justice should leave the country. After some time the lord justice sent out from that camp at Armagh a number of his captains, with one thousand men, both horse and foot, to take some prey and plunder in Oriel. O'Neill having received private information and intelligence of those great troops marching into Oriel, proceeded privately and silently to where they were, and came up to them after they had collected their prey; a battle ensued, in which many were slain on both sides; and finally the preys were abandoned, and fell into the hands of their original possessors on that occasion.

O'Neill continued to prey and lay waste the territory of Bregia and Meath at that time; and Tirconnell was subdued and environed by him, after having taken Calvach prisoner before that. O'Donnell being sick and infirm, there was no person filling the office of ruler of Tirconnell at that time. O'Neill, i. e. John, assumed the supreme government of the entire province of Ulster, from Drogheda to the river Erne, so that it was not an inappropriate title to call him Coigheadach (the ruler of a province) over Ulster at that time, were it not for the contest carried on against him by the English.

Calvach O'Donnell was set at liberty from his imprisonment by O'Neill, after he had been ransomed by the Tirconnallians.

The same lord justice collected another great force to march into Tyrone, in the harvest of this year, at the instigation of Calvach O'Donnell, and there came in his army the five earls who were then in Ireland, namely, Gerald, the son of Gerald, son of Gerald, son of James, son of John, son of Thomas, earl of Kildare; Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, earl of Ormond; Gerald, son of James, son of John, son of Thomas, earl of Desmond; Conor, the son of Donogh, son of Conor, son of Torlogh O'Brien, earl of Thomond; and Rickard, the son of Ulick of the Heads, son of Rickard, son of Ulick of Knoc Tuagh, earl of Clanrickard. The lord justice and those earls marched with their forces into Tir Eogain without opposition or fighting, until they reached Lough Foyle (in Derry). On the lord justice's return the resolution he came to was, to make peace with O'Neill, to grant him pardon, and take his guards with him from Armagh. After that the lord justice proceeded with his forces into Tir-Conaill Gulbain (Tirconnell), and gave the command of the fortresses, and of the castles of Tirconnell, to Calvach O'Donnell. He then proceeded across the river Erne into the territory of Carbury, to lay siege to the castle of Sligo; Calvach having taken notice of this, came to the resolution of sending privately his own standard to the castle, and had it planted on the battlements of the tower, where it floated visibly to the view of all. The lord justice enquired aloud whose colours were those he beheld, to which Calvach replied, and said it was his ensign, and that the town had belonged to himself and his ancestors from remote times, after which the lord justice delivered the keys of the town to Calvach.

O'Neill went to England about the 1st of November, to visit the queen, and he received great honours and respect from her, and he returned back in the May of the following year.

Owen, the son of Hugh Buighe, son of Hugh Duv O'Donnell, a nobleman distinguished for his learning, and knowledge of many arts, died.

Teige, the son of Torlogh, son of Niall, son of Torlogh O'Boyle, was killed at Termon Magrath by the son of Alexander Galda.

A. D. 1562.

O'Rourke¹, i. e. Bryan Ballach, the son of Owen, son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, son of Tiarnan More O'Rourke, the chief of Siol Feargna, and of the tribe of Hugh Finn, a man to whom submission, tribute, superiority, and support were yielded by all those from the Caladh, in the territory of Hy Maine, to Drobhaois of the tower fortress, on the plain of the torrent, on the borders of the renowned province of Ulster, and from Granard of Tefia to the strand of Eothuile the carpenter, in Tir Fia-chra of the Moy, a man who had the most select collection of poems and laudatory poets of any of his tribe, died from the effects of a fall he received, and his son Hugh Gallda was appointed his successor.

The earl of Thomond went with a force to gain jurisdiction over the territory of O'Conor (of Clare), and into Glen Corbraighe; the son of O'Loughlin, namely, Malachy, the son of Anthony, son of Malachy, son of Roderick, son of Ana, son of Donogh-an-Chuil, the son of Ana Bacach, was slain at Cloich Geanna, on his side, by a shot on that occasion. The same earl proceeded with a force to gain power over Caenrighe (barony of Kenry, county of Limerick), at the same time, on which occasion Dugal, the son of Giolla Duv, son of Conon Mac Sweeney, was slain on his side.

A. D. 1562.

1. O'Rourke here mentioned, was prince of Brefney, and his jurisdiction appears to have extended at this time over Leitrim, with parts of Rosecommon and Sligo, as the place named Caladh, in the text, signifies a ferry or port, and was situated at the Shan-

Mac Giollariabhaigh, namely, Rickard, the son of Dunn, son of Conon, son of Thomas, son of Donal, died, and it was said he was the best officer the earl of Thomond had in his time; and Conon, the son of Conon, son of Rickard, succeeded in his place.

Donal, the son of Conon, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, he who had been earl of Thomond before Conon, the son of Donogh, and whom the Irish styled O'Brien, returned from his expulsion, exile, and banishment from Ulster to his own inheritance; and it was in the same week that Teige, the son of Murrough, son of Torlogh, returned, after having made his escape from Dublin, and after they had both come to the country they joined against the earl of Thomond, who encamped a large force to oppose them. The first hostile movement made by these kinsmen against each other was a nocturnal attack made by the two sons of Murrough O'Brien, on the fortress of the town of Mac Regan, in which they slew some persons, and collected some booty, but were pursued by the people of the country. The place where the day dawned on these warlike forces respectively, was at Cahir Mac Gorman, in the centre of Hy Fermaic, and in the upper part of Dalgais (county of Clare). Those sons of Murrough O'Brien, namely, Teige and Donogh, shamefully endured their defeat as far as Cnoc-an-Sgamhaill, above Rath Blathmaic, but they at length turned on their pursuers, and were defeated by the earl's people, and a great number of their chiefs and common soldiers were slain. Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Giolla Duv, son of Torlogh O'Brien, was taken prisoner, and also Bryan Duv, son of Donogh, son of Conon-na-Srona O'Brien, and he did not depart without leaving the prey with Teige, the son of Murrough O'Brien, as his ransom.

Donogh, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, son of Thomas Maguire, died; he was a man who bore the name of being the most inoffensive of his age among the Irish of the north, and a man whose death was not expected to take place on his bed.

non, in Rosecommon; and Drobhaois, mentioned, is the river Drowis, which falls into the bay of Donegal, at Bundrowis, on the borders of Leitrim and Sligo; Granard, of Tefia, is Granard, in Longford; and the strand of Eothuile, is near Ballysadare, in Sligo.

Hugh, the son of Niall Oge Mac Sweeny, of Tir Boghaine, died of the small-pox.

Magrath of Termon Dabeog died.

Mac Mahon, i. e. Hugh, the son of Bryan-na-Moicheirge, the son of Redmond, son of Glaisne, was slain by the people of Farney.

A. D. 1563.

O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, the son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv, son of Torlogh of the Wine, lord of Tirconnell, Inisowen, Kinel Moain, Fermanagh, and North Connaught, a man who did not suffer the lords who governed in his neighbourhood, or on the borders of his territory, to exercise any excesses or undue influence till the time of his sickness and infirmity; a man who was fierce, violent, determined, and severe against his enemies and opponents until he brought them under obedience to his jurisdiction; a man of mildness, friendship, authority, kindness, benevolence, and great hospitality to learned men, strangers, poets, and professors, the religious orders and clergy, as recorded by sages and historians; a man learned and versed in many arts, and of superior information and knowledge in all the sciences, died on the 9th of February, in his own fortress at Lifford, in the castle built by himself in despite of O'Neill and the Tyronians, and he was interred in the burial place of his progenitors and ancestors at Donegal, in the monastery of St. Francis, with great honour and solemnity, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

O'Sullivan Beirre, i. e. Donal, the son of Dermot, son of Donal, son of Donal, son of Dermot Balbh, fell by the hand of a bad chief, namely, Mac Giollachuda (Mac Gillycuddy), and though famous had been his father Dermot, that Donal was a worthy heir to him, and his kinsman, Owen O'Sullivan, succeeded in his place.

Margaret, the daughter of James, son of John, son of Thomas, son of the earl (of Desmond), the wife of Mac Maurice of Kerry, died, and was much lamented.

Thomas, the son of Maurice Duv, son of John, the son of the earl, died.

Thomond remained a continued wave of war, and scene of contention from one kalend to the other this year.

The castle of O'Gawley was taken and destroyed against the sons of Murrough O'Brien, by the earl, who had brought thither some ordnance and forces from Limerick, and the castle of O'Carthy was also taken by the earl.

Mac Bruaidealha (Mac Bruodin), chief professor of Hy Breacain (Ibracken, in Clare), and of Hy Fearmaic (also in Clare), namely, Dermot, the son of Conor, son of Dermot, son of John, died and his kinsman Maoilin succeeded him.

A. D. 1564.

O'Rourke, i. e. Hugh Gallda, the son of Bryan Ballach, son of Owen, son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, was treacherously and maliciously put to death by his own people, in Leitrim of Muintir Eoluis. On that account the whole country on all sides attacked Bryan, the son of Bryan O'Rourke, as it was stated that it was at his instigation that treacherous misdeed had been committed, although he took no part in the transaction. Hugh Buighe, the son of Bryan, son of Owen O'Rourke, their other kinsman, the junior of Hugh Gallda, but the senior of Bryan, assumed the title of O'Rourke, on the authority of O'Neill.

O'Donnell, i. e. Calvach, and O'Boyle, i. e. Torlogh, repaired to Dublin to the lord justice to confer with him, and O'Donnell received great honour and respect from him. O'Donnell having set out for home came to Fermanagh, where he stopped, and O'Boyle proceeded to his own residence; Con, the son of Calvach, was there to meet him, and O'Boyle had not been long in the town when Con prevailed on him to go with him to Donegal, in the hope of taking it from Hugh, the son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe, who had possession of it at that time. Hugh resided at that time in the new tower, and he sent Eignaghan and Con, the sons of Hugh Buighe, son of Hugh Duv, namely, his brother's sons, into the old castle, and these two were the persons who betrayed the town to Con. After that, Con and O'Boyle having arrived at the town, remained there for some time; the sons of Hugh Buighe received Con without hesitation, but they said they would not permit O'Boyle and his people to enter; O'Boyle's people replied that they would not allow their lord to go in from them alone, and O'Boyle afterwards went to the monastery of the friars to pay them a visit. Con O'Donnell and the sons of Hugh Buighe, commenced to demolish the tower in which Hugh, the son of Hugh Duv, was; they did not however perceive, until a very numerous party poured into the town, and surrounded it in every direction. The persons who commanded this movement were, O'Neill, namely, John; and Hugh, the son of Manus O'Donnell, with very great and numerous forces, they having received intelligence that O'Donnell was on his way from Dublin, and that the other kinsmen were in contention with each other; Con the son of Calvach was taken prisoner there, on the 14th of May; and harassing parties of O'Neill's forces overran Tir Boghaine (Banagh in Donegal), and slew the son of Mae Sweeney, namely, Maolmuire Meirgeach, the son of Maolmuire, son of Niall, in Glen Eidhnidhe; and also Hugh Meirgeach, the son of John Modarda Mac Sweeney, with many others.

The O'Briens being in contention with each other this year, the sons of Conor, son of Torlogh O'Brien, namely, Donal, and Teige, and the sons of Murrough O'Brien, Teige, and Donogh, went to make a prey along Abhain-o-gCearnaighh (the river Ougarnee, at Sixmile-bridge, county of Clare), in Clan Cuilein (baronies of Tulla and Bunratty, in Clare), at which time the earl happened to have been at Rosroe; besides other towns, they particularly burned and completely plundered that town. The people of the country in every direction, from Sliabh Oidheada-an-Righ (the Mountain of the Death of the King, in the southern part of Clare, near Seariff), to Luehad, and from Rinn-Eanigh to Seariff, pursued and overtook them; they attacked at an opportunity the earl's forces, and slew nearly one hundred of them on that occasion, and they did not attempt afterwards to oppose them until night. The O'Briens proceeded, without receiving a wound, or losing a drop of blood, through the upper part of Thomond, across the Finn-Learga (the Fair Slopes) of the Fergus, carrying with them their prey and captures. They afterwards engaged and took into their pay a great number of the Mac Sweeneys from beyond the Shannon, and also of the Clan Sheehys, who had the range of the country, its preys and booty, under their controul until the period of their engagement had expired; but, however, there did not remain with the inhabitants of the country as much in value of their cattle as had been conveyed out of it by those mercenaries, in lieu of their hire.

Coreomroe (in Clare), with its rents, Buanacht Bona (subsidies), and tributary lands in the territories of Thomond, and also its church livings, were conferred on Donal O'Brien, as a recompense for the lordship of Thomond, and for preserving the peace during the winter of this year.

Maurice Duv, the son of John, son of the earl (of Desmond), went to make a prey in Muskerry; Dermot and Cormac, the sons of Teige, son of Cormac Oge, son of Cormac, son of Teige Mae Carthy, overtook and beheaded Maurice; but his preservation, however, would have been more profitable than any victory they gained by his death; and the man who was slain there was the high-tempered steel of the Geraldines in dangerous conflict, the plunderer of his enemies, and the slayer of his opponents.

A. D. 1565.

Judith, the daughter of James (Fitzgerald of Desmond), the son of Maurice, son of Thomas, died, and was very much lamented in Leath Mogha, on account of her charity and humanity.

It happened on a certain expedition the earl of Desmond, i. e. Gerald, the son of James, son of John, had made into the Desies of Munster, that the lord of Decies, namely, Maurice, the son of Gerald, son of John, son of Gerald, sent treacherously for the earl of Ormond, namely Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, in order that he might lie in ambush for the earl of Desmond. The earl (of Desmond) having come to the country, he never perceived until he was surrounded on all sides at a place called Ath Meadhain¹; the

A. D. 1565.

1. Ath Meadhain, the place where this conflict occurred, is stated by Cox and others to have been Affane, in the county of Waterford, where the earl of Desmond's party being attacked unawares on the 1st of February, were defeated, and two hundred and eighty of his men were slain; Desmond himself received a pistol shot from Sir Edward Butler, by which he was severely wounded in the thigh, and having fallen from his horse he ever after continued lame; he was taken prisoner and brought to Clonmel, and as soon as he had sufficiently recovered, he was, according to Mae Geoghegan, sent prisoner to London and confined in the tower.

large body of the ambushed troops attacked, wounded, and took him prisoner, and a great number of his people were either slain or taken prisoners along with him. The Butlers were full of joy and gladness on account of the great booty and the number of prisoners they had taken on

VI. The Danish Wars.—In this article is given an account of the Danish invasions and wars in Ireland, and the principal battles fought between their forces and the Irish, and likewise an account of the Danish kings of Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick, collected from the Annals of the Four Masters, Innisfallen, and Ulster, the various histories of Ireland, Ware's Annals, Hanmer's Chronicle, Mallett's Northern Antiquities, Wheaton's History of the Northmen, Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian and Celto-Norman Antiquities, Turner's Anglo-Saxons, Thierry's Norman Conquest, Speed's Annals, Chalmer's Caledonia, Olaus Magnus on the Northern Nations, and various histories of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, by Saxo Grammaticus, Olaus Wormius, Torfeus, Johannes Meursius, Bartholine, Pontoppidan, Laing's Chronicle of the Kings of Norway, &c.

The Scandinavians.—The inhabitants of ancient Scandinavia, or the countries which now form Sweden, Norway and Denmark, according to the accounts of their own old historians, Olaus Magnus and others, came originally from Asia, about a thousand years before the Christian era, but according to others, only five centuries before that period, while some make their arrival only about one century before the birth of Christ. They came from the east, under the conduct of a celebrated chief named Odin, whom they afterwards worshipped as their chief deity and god of war. The Scandinavians were of Scythian origin, and came from those countries on the borders of Europe and Asia about the Euxine and Caspian seas, and are generally considered to have been some of the people called Goths, so celebrated in their wars with the Romans. The Cimbrians and Teutons of Northern Germany, four or five centuries before the Christian era, as shown in the article on the Teutonic nations in the Penny Cyclopaedia, peopled the Chersonesus Cimbrica, or great peninsula of Jutland in Denmark, with part of Sweden, and some other countries along the shores of the Baltic, and these Cimbri and Teutones were amongst the most valiant nations of antiquity, and celebrated in the century before the Christian era in their wars with the Romans. The Danes, Swedes and Norwegians belong to the Teutonic race, and speak dialects of the Gothic or Teutonic tongues, of the same origin as the language of the Germans, Dutch, English, and other Teutonic nations. The Scandinavians were a very valiant and warlike race, and in after times, under the names of Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, Northmen, and Noruans, became famous for their piratical incursions and invasions of various nations of Europe, from the seventh to the twelfth century. They fitted out powerful fleets from their pine forests, and under the conduct of their chiefs, called Vikingir, or Sea Kings, this fierce and brave, but semi-barbarous race of restless robbers frequently ravaged the coasts of France, Spain, Italy, Britain, and Ireland, and as they continued Pagans till the tenth and eleventh centuries, they destroyed with unrelenting fury every thing connected with Christianity and civilization, and laid waste cities, towns, colleges, monasteries and churches throughout various countries. It appears, from Turner and others, that a great number of petty kings ruled over Scandinavia in those early times, ten or twelve in Norway, nineteen in Sweden, and several in Denmark; but this was the general mode of government in those times, there being numerous petty kings and kingdoms in various countries.

Fleets.—The Scandinavians fitted out powerful fleets, having great facilities for the purpose afforded by the magnificent oak and pine forests of Norway, &c., and the chief power of those pirate kings consisted in their ships and maritime forces; and it is mentioned by the Danish historians, quoted by Mallett, that Harold, king of Denmark, and Ilacon, a Norwegian Viking in the tenth century, had a fleet of seven hundred ships; and according to Turner's account of the battle of Brunanburgh, in Northumberland, in the tenth century, Aulaf, the Danish king of Dublin, and his allies, entered the Humber with a fleet of 615 ships. The Danish and Norwegian kings who invaded England and Ireland in the ninth and tenth centuries had frequently fleets of 200 and 300 ships; these vessels are stated by Mallett to have been originally small galleys, sometimes twelve-oared barks, but in the tenth and eleventh centuries, they had ships capable of containing 100 or 120 men each; and Harold Harfager, and Olaf, kings of Norway, are mentioned to have constructed huge long ships, called dragons and serpents, some of them carrying thirty-four banks of rowers.

Warriors and Weapons.—The Scandinavian chiefs were called Iarls, the same as the English earls, and their champions were renowned for strength and valour. Frotho, an ancient king of Denmark, according to Saxo, ordained that no warrior should be admitted to any command in the armies who was not prepared on all occasions to attack one enemy, to face two, to retire back only one step from three, and not to retreat till actually assailed by four. Many Danish and Norwegian champions celebrated for their great strength and gigantic stature are mentioned in the Saga of the Icelandic historians; and in the great battle of Stamford Bridge, in England, in the eleventh century, between Harold Hardrada, king of Norway, and Harold king of England, when the forces of the Northmen were put to flight, a single Norwegian warrior stopped the pursuit for some hours, by defending the pass of the bridge, and, according to Speed and others, killed with his battle-axe more than forty of the English soldiers, and kept the bridge until he was himself slain by the cast of a dart. In more modern times Charles XII., king of Sweden, equalled this warrior in bravery, and was not surpassed by any of the heroes of antiquity in any country for Herculean strength and invincible valour. The chief weapon of the Northmen was the battle-axe, which was double-edged and very heavy, and when wielded by a powerful arm, was capable of cleaving through iron helmets and armour with a single blow; they also used battle-hammers, and clubs studded with short spikes and knobs of iron; their swords were short, strong, and crooked like scymitars, but they sometimes used long straight swords; they also used long spears, javelins, darts, daggers, slings, bows, and arrows. Their shields and bucklers were mostly made of wood, sometimes covered with skins of animals; sometimes made of wicker-work, or interwoven osiers and small rods; their chiefs sometimes used iron and brazen shields, and many of them were ornamented or embossed with silver; the shields were of an oval form, and many of them so large as to cover the entire body, and in battle, when hard pressed, they made a rampart of their shields, by locking them into each other in a circle, within which they were defended from the darts of their enemy; their shields also formed a shelter, or sort of tents, when encamping on the fields in wet weather. Their helmets were mostly made of strong leather, but the chiefs wore iron and brazen helmets; their coats of mail, breast-plates, thigh and leg armour, were sometimes of leather, but the chiefs mostly used those made of iron, brass, and other metals. The Danes and Norwegians who under Asculph Mac Thorkil, the last Danish king of Dublin, defended that city against the Anglo-Normans, in the twelfth century, are thus described in Hanmer's Chronicle: "They were all mighty men of war, and well appointed after the Danish manner, being harnessed with good brigandines, jacks, and shirts of mail, their shields, bucklers, and targets were round and coloured red, and bound about with iron, and as they seemed in arms, so were they no less in minds, iron-strong and mighty." In this battle at Dublin, John le Dene, a valiant Norwegian warrior from the Orkney islands, with a single blow of his battle-axe, cut off the thigh of an English horseman, so that the limb fell to the ground on one side, and the body on the other. The Northmen rushed to the battle with great shouts and clashing of arms, excited by the battle-songs of their Skalds, or bards, and uttering invocations to Odin and Thor, their gods of war and victory. In their expeditions they often brought with them their women and children, whom they secured in their encampments, but many of these warlike women fought like the Amazons of old among their Scythian ancestors. The forces of the Northmen were, of course, chiefly foot, and as they could not convey horses in their ships, that day, and the result of that capture was, that the two earls went to England by command of the queen, and having remained for some time in London, they returned back in peace and friendship.

they probably had none in battle except such as they might take in the countries they invaded

The Standards and Banners of the Danes and Norwegians bore chiefly the figure of a Raven, which bird was sacred to Odin, their god of war, and representations of a raven may be seen given in Speed's Annals, as the chief armorial ensign of the Danish kings; and, according to Speed, there was a figure of a raven also on some of the coins of the Danish kings. According to Thorkelin, in his Fragments of Icelandic History, the raven was sacred to Odin as a bird remarkable for its fierceness and sagacity, and its figure was borne on the standards in battle, with open beak and expanded wings, and he says that the figure of a dragon was also one of their ensigns, and borne on their ships. The three daughters of the famous king of Denmark, Ragnar Lodbrog, according to the Saga, wrought the figure of the Reafan, or raven, accompanied by magical incantations, on the standard of their brothers, Hingvar and Hubba, who invaded England in the latter end of the ninth century, and this ensign was supposed to give omens of victory or defeat—if it fluttered forward in the wind it presaged success, but if it drooped it portended defeat. The celebrated Doctor William Drennan, of Belfast, in a beautiful poem on Glendalough, has the following passage on the raven standard of the Danes:

"From the bleak Scandinavian shore,
The Dane his raven-standard bore;
It rose amidst the whitening foam,
When the fierce robber hated home;
And as he ploughed the watery way,
The raven seemed to scent its prey,
Outstretched the gloomy ominous wing
For feast of carnage war must bring."

Mythology—An account of the Scandinavian idolatry is given in the sacred book called the Edda, which is described in Mallett's Northern Antiquities, and it appears they worshipped a great number of gods and goddesses; their chief deity was Odin, worshipped as the god of war, like Mars amongst the Romans, and by the Saxons and Anglo-Saxons under the name of Woden, or Wodan, hence the day of the week dedicated to him was called Wodensdag, in English Wednesday. Odin was the most powerful of the gods, and dwelt in Valhalla, the Pagan Paradise of the Scandinavians, where the palace of Odin was situate, and had 540 gates, or grand doors; in his halls he received and welcomed the spirits of the departed heroes slain in battle, and entertained them in continual feasting, and with copious libations of ale and mead, or hydromel, while Odin himself was eternally regaled with goblets of wine, but none drank that beverage but the god himself. The Valkyrie were the attending goddesses of Valhalla, who, on their winged steeds, attended battle fields, and conveyed the spirits of the warriors who fell bravely fighting to the banquets prepared for them in the hall of Odin, and served them with ale and mead in cups formed of the skulls of their enemies. To Odin were sacred the wolf and raven, and he was represented as always attended with two of each, which he fed with his own hands. Thor, the son of Odin, was next to him the most powerful of the gods, and worshipped likewise by the Saxons, and the day dedicated to him was called Thorsdag, hence Thursday; he was named Asa Thor, or the lord Thor, and was the god of thunder, the winds and storms, nearly the same as Jupiter amongst the Greeks and Romans; Thor is supposed to have been the same as Taran or Etaran, an idol god of the Gauls, Britons and other Celtic nations. Like Odin, Thor had a magnificent palace, in which were 540 halls, and he was represented in a chariot drawn by two he-goats; he was armed with a club or battle-hammer, and had on his hands gauntlets or gloves of iron, and the belt of prowess round his middle, and, thus prepared, he warred against the Giants and Genii, who were the enemies of the gods. Thor was the favourite god of the Norwegians, hence the names of many of their chieftains, as Thorgis or Turgesius, Thorkil, Thorstein, Thorfin, Thoralf, Thorfeus, &c. Frigga or Freya, wife of Odin, and mother of Thor, was their chief female deity, and worshipped as the goddess of Love, Beauty, Pleasure, Fruitfulness, and Plenty; she resembled the Venus of the Romans, and also represented the Earth, and was worshipped by the Saxons under the name of Hertha; the day dedicated to her was named Frige-dag, hence Friday. The Scandinavians had many minor deities, as Tyr, a warrior god, next to Thor in greatness, a subaltern deity to Odin, the god of War, and as a dispenser of victories was worshipped by warriors. Balder, son of Odin, was the god of Wisdom and Beauty, and represented the Sun, like Apollo among the Greeks and Romans. Brage was the god of Eloquence and Poetry, and Frey was god of the Weather, and Seasons, and ruled over the productions of the earth. Njord was the god of the Ocean, the Neptune of the Northern nations, and was naturally much worshipped by those pirates and sea kings. Heimdall, or the god with the golden teeth, was the sentinel or janitor of the gods, and was seated in the celestial fortress which guarded the entrance to their palace, to prevent the giants from forcing their way across the bridge; he slept less than a bird, and his sight was so strong that he could see by night as well as by day, more than a hundred leagues around him, and his ear was so acute that he could hear the grass growing, and the wool on the sheep's back; he had a trumpet to sound alarms, the blasts of which were heard through all the worlds; he drank hydromel in the secure and tranquil palaces of the gods. Hilda.—As Odin was the god of War, or Mars of the Scandinavians, Hilda was worshipped as their goddess of War and Battles, the same as Bellona and Pallas amongst the Greeks and Romans.

Palaces and Temples of the gods.—There were great temples dedicated to Odin, Thor, and Frigga, in various places, particularly one at Upsal in Sweden, the roof of which was said to be 900 ells in circumference, and partly covered with plates and chains of gold; and there was a magnificent temple dedicated to Thor near Dronthim, by Hacon, king of Norway; but these great temples were rased to the ground, and the grand idols destroyed, after the introduction of Christianity. The magnificent palace represented as the habitation of the gods, or heaven, was called Asgard, and situated in Asia; it was a palace of immense size and magnificence, the foundations being mountains, the walls of stone, and the roof, as far as the eye could reach, covered with brilliant plates of gold, and golden shields. In this palace dwelt Alfader, or the universal father who made the world, the heavens and earth, and also man, and gave him a spirit that lives after the body dies; in Gimle, or Vingolf, the palace of friendship, dwelt the good after death.

The Northmen also worshipped various other gods and goddesses too numerous to be here mentioned, amongst others Nor, who was father of the giants, and his daughter Night and Dag, or Day, the daughter of Night. Loke, the son of a giant, was the god of deceit and evil, and called the calumniator of the gods, and the disgrace of gods and men, the same as Satan; one of his children was the wolf Fenris, a monster who was chained to a rock, but at some time was to encounter the gods, and destroy the world; the second was the great serpent of Midgard, which encircled the world, and the third was Hela, or Death, whom the gods precipitated into Nifleheim, or the hell of the Scandinavians, where she possesses vast apartments, strongly built, and fenced with large grates of iron, and she was attended by many monsters, as grief, famine, hunger, delay, sickness, pain, cursing and howling; and in this abyss, situated below in the ninth world, was the abode of the wicked, and from it issued pestilential rivers, tempests, and whirlwinds. The Scandinavians had their priests and priestesses, and offered up sacrifices to their gods, and, like their Scythian ancestors, they sacrificed hecatombs of horses, and also oxen, hogs, dogs, eekes, and other animals, and every ninth year, at the temple of Upsal, in the sacred grove of Odin adjoining it, human victims, chiefly captives taken in war, were sacrificed in great numbers, 99 men being offered up at each of the great sacrifices, but this practice of offering human victims to their gods prevailed amongst all the Pagan nations of antiquity.

Mahon, the son of Torlogh Mantagh, son of Donogh, son of Donal, son of Torlogh Meith (O'Brien, see note at A. D. 1560), was treache-

Witchcraft.—The Scandinavians worshipped goddesses called Nornas or Nornies, and the Fates, or fatal sisters, and the doctrine of witchcraft extensively prevailed amongst them, hence Milton alludes to this subject in his Paradise Lost, when describing Sin and her attendant demons:

“Nor uglier follow the night-hag when called,
In secret riding through the air she comes,
Lured by the smell of infant blood to dance
With Lapland witches, while the labouring moon
Eclipses at their charms.”

In the Anthologia Hibernica for June, 1794, is given a very curious account of witchcraft in Denmark, in the Pagan times, taken from the Icelandic Saga. A hag named Heida, who was famous for her skill in magic, divination, and witchcraft, went attended in state by thirty men servants, and was waited on by fifteen young women; in the Ranga Saga is given an account of another celebrated witch named Thorbiorga, who, together with her nine sisters, were all professional witches, and famous for their prognostications and knowledge of futurity; they frequented public assemblies and entertainments, when invited, for purposes of divination. Thorkil, a Danish earl, in order to know when a famine and plague which prevailed would cease, sent for Thorbiorga to tell the time; on her arrival she was dressed in a gown of green cloth, closely buttoned from top to bottom, about her neck was a string of glass beads, and her head was covered with the skin of a black lamb, lined with that of a white cat; her shoes were calf-skin, with the hair on, tied with thongs and fastened with brass buttons; on her hands were gloves made of the skin of a white cat, with the fur inward; about her waist she wore a Hunlandic girdle, at which hung a bag containing her magical instruments, and she supported herself on a staff ornamented with many knobs of brass; on her entrance the whole company rose and saluted her, and earl Thorkil advancing, took her by the hand, and conducted her to the seat prepared for her, on which was a cushion of hen's feathers; after some ceremony, and refreshments set before her, Thorkil, humbly approaching the prophetess, requested to know the future event; she replied, that next day she would fully satisfy him, and on the morrow, having put her instruments of divination in order, she commanded Godreda, one of her maidens, to sing the magical song called Vardlokur, or the words of fortune, which she sung with so clear and sweet a voice as delighted the company, and particularly the prophetess, who declared that she then knew many things respecting the famine and sickness of which she was ignorant before, and that these calamities would be of short duration. The term applied to witches by Danish writers was Stryga, and it appears that cats were particularly connected with witchcraft amongst the northern nations, that sagacious animal being considered capable of seeing into futurity, and hence the skins of cats were worn by witches, and cats and witches were always represented as companions. Witches were also considered frequently to change themselves into hares, and thus run with great rapidity on their mischievous errands; and there prevailed a belief amongst the common people in Ireland, that they were invulnerable by leaden bullets, and could be shot only by a sixpence, or other piece of silver, or a silver ball. The wizards, or male conjurers, were also held in high esteem, particularly in Scotland. The doctrines of witchcraft, sorcery, and necromancy, were probably derived from Druidism, the witches being nearly the same as the Druidesses of more ancient days, and hence Ban-draoi, or a Druidical woman, was also applied to a witch. The other terms applied by the Irish were Piscog, commonly pronounced Pistreoge, signifying witchcraft, and Easar-luigheacht, which also meant witchcraft, or witchery; hence Beam-Easarluighe, or Cuilneach Easarluighe, signified a woman, or hag of sorcery; magic, sorcery, and necromancy, were also termed Deamhnoireacht, which meant demonism. In the Erse, or Scottish Gaelic, witchcraft was termed Buideacht, and Buideachas, rously slain by his own companions and kinsmen in his own residence at Aircin, on Aran (Aran island off the coast of Galway). When the nobles of and also Druideacht, the latter word signifying Druidism; a witch was termed Beann-Buideach, and a wizard Draoidh, that is, a Druid, and sometimes Fiosaiche, which meant a fortune-teller. The doctrines of witchcraft, wizards, warlocks, and weird sisters were very prevalent in former times in Scotland, of which copious and very curious accounts are given in Sir Walter Scott's Letters on Witchcraft and Demonology, and still more admirable and vivid descriptions of witches and their incantations are given in Shakspeare's Macbeth. In Ireland, particularly in Ulster, the belief in witchcraft extensively prevailed in former times, and, as already stated in these Annals, an Act against witchcraft was passed in the Irish Parliament held at Dublin A. D. 1585, in the reign of Elizabeth. The Evil Eye, called by the Irish Beim-sul, signifying a stroke of the eye, a belief connected with witchcraft, was in former times very prevalent in Ireland, as well as in Scotland and England, and it was believed that certain wizards, witches, and evil-minded persons, had the power of injuring, or even causing the death of cattle, horses, and even human beings, especially children, by their malignant looks. This belief also extensively prevails amongst the Turks and Arabs, and in various countries of Europe; in Italy it is called Mal Occhio. It was also a superstition amongst the Greeks and Romans; by the Greeks it was termed Baskania, and by the Romans Fascinatio, and thus Virgil alludes to it in a passage where the shepherd laments that his tender lambs were bewitched:

“Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos.”

The doctrines of witchcraft were very prevalent among the Romans, and Canidia, a famous witch, is celebrated by Horace; the term Saga, signifying a wise woman, or sorceress, was applied to a witch in the Latin language; and in the English the name is derived from the Saxon Wice, which also signifies wise. Fairyism has been much connected with the Danes in Ireland, in the traditions of the people, who consider the Danes to have erected the circular earthen ramparts or raths, called forts, and that the fairies were left there by the Danes to guard their treasures until their return to Ireland, which is expected to take place at some future time. The opinion that the Danes erected all the raths is erroneous, for though they may have built many of them, yet most of these ramparts were constructed by the ancient Irish, centuries before the Danes came to Ireland. In the traditions of the people, the Tuath De Danan and Fairyism were connected, of which an account has been given at p. 379 in these notes; and it is probable that, from the similarity of the names, the Danes and Danans may have been confounded with each other, and some of the raths may have been constructed by the Danans in the early ages. The terms Sighe, Sighcog, and Siabhra, were applied by the Irish to Fairies, hence came the names Siabhrog, a Fairy habitation, Sluagh-Sighe, the Fairy host, and Bean-Sighe, a Fairy woman; the Fairies were also called by the Irish Deamhain-Acdhir, signifying Demons of the Air, and frequently Daoine-Maithe, meaning the Good People, being so denominated for fear of giving them offence, and dreading their power.

The Skalds or Bards of the Scandinavians were highly celebrated; they were very numerous, and many of their compositions still remain, such as war songs, &c., containing bold, vivid, and admirable descriptions of warriors and battles; they were highly honoured, and it is stated that the renowned hero, Harold Harfager, king of Norway, in the tenth century, placed the Bards at the banquet above all the officers of his court. The Skalds always accompanied the kings and chiefs on their expeditions, to compose and recite their war songs, and animate the champions in battle; for the poems they composed in honour of kings and heroes they received rich rewards of splendid dresses, gold and silver ornaments, weapons, &c. In Turner's Anglo-Saxons an account is given of a famous Skald of the Danes in England, named Gunlauger, who composed a poem on king Ethelred, for which he received a present of a gold ring weighing seven ounces; and the same bard having gone to Ireland, sang his compositions for one of the kings there, who offered him a present of two ships, but his treasurer told him that the rewards always given to poets were gold rings, swords, clothes, &c., which were then presented to him; he next went to the Orkney Islands, where he got from one of the Earls a present of a silver axe. Several of the kings and chieftains of Denmark and Norway were themselves Skalds, and composed war songs, &c.; the Skalds were mostly natives of Iceland, and, from the seventh to the twelfth century, not less than two hundred of them, eminent in their art, are recorded. These Bards were, as in other nations in the early ages, the annalists of these countries, and their prose historical compositions were called Saga, which signifies Stories. The most celebrated of the Icelandic Sagas are those of Snorro Sturleson, an eminent writer of the thirteenth century, whose great work on the Norwegian kings, styled Heimskringla, or the Chronicle of the Kings, has been translated into English by Laing, and published in 1844; and it is also partly translated into Latin, in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities.

Galway received intelligence of that act, they went to take revenge for the crime on the people who committed the treachery, whom they forced to fly

The Mythology of the Scandinavians was a creed admirably adapted for warriors, as it inculcated courage and contempt of death as the highest virtues, and the heroes who fell in battle were for ever honoured and entertained with magnificent banquets in the Hall of Odin. Their doctrines led to such contempt of death that many warriors rushed into the thick of battle, anxious to fall, and several committed suicide, in haste to enter their Elysium, and join the glories of Valhalla. The composition called the Death-song of Lodbrog gives a strong but faithful picture of the fierce and warlike spirit of the Northmen. Ragnar Lodbrog was one of the most famous of the sea kings; he was son of Sivard, king of Denmark, and descended from the kings of Norway; Ragnar became king of Denmark, and having fitted out large fleets, he made many expeditions, as a Vikingir or Sea king, along the coast of the Baltic and German Ocean, and, during a victorious career of thirty years, frequently invaded France, England, Scotland, and Ireland, about the middle of the ninth century; and during one of his expeditions he is stated to have spent an entire year in Dublin. About A. D. 865, Ragnar invaded England, and landed his forces in Northumberland, where he fought a great battle with Ella, king of the Northumbrian Saxons, in which, after performing prodigies of valour, Lodbrog was at length vanquished by superior numbers, and being taken prisoner, he was treated with great barbarity, thrown into a dungeon, and closed in there with a number of vipers, by which he was bitten to death. Together with his fame as a sea king, Ragnar was also a Skald, and composed many war songs. Johnstone, author of the Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities, has given from the Icelandic Saga, in Danish and Latin, with a free English version, a composition styled Lodbrokar Quida, signifying the Epicudium, or Death-Song of Lodbrog, which was supposed to have been recited by him while under the torments of death in the dungeon. This composition is considered to have been the war song of this Corsair king, enumerating his various victories, to which the two or three last verses were added after his death, it is said, by his wife Aslanga, who was a great poetess. The following is a literal translation of the death song of Lodbrog, from the Danish and the Latin version of Olaus Wormius, which is given in Blair's Dissertations, prefixed to Ossian's Poems, and this translation is also partly taken from Johnstone, each stanza in the Danish commences thus: Huggom ver med hiaurvi, which, in the Latin version is variously rendered, Pugnauimus ensibus, concidimus ensibus and secuinus ensibus, and signifies according to Mallet, We fought with swords, We cut with swords, We hewed with swords, &c.; hence, these variations have been given in the present translation.

"We fought with swords—when first in Gothland (Sweden)
We came and slew the mighty monster;
Then I obtained my Thora, and was called
The warrior who had transfixed the Dragon
With my sword of surpassing brightness;
And Lodbrokar was I thenceforward named.

from their houses, and they betook themselves to their boats and set out to sea, and where they landed was at Cuan Ruis, in the territory of

"We smote with swords—when in early youth
Towards the east, in the Bay of Eyra (Elsinore),
We made the torrents of blood to flow,
For the yellow-footed birds and beasts of prey;
There the hard steel sounded on the helmets,
The entire ocean was one wound,
And the Raven waded in the blood of the slain.

"We hewed with swords—in my twentieth year,
Then we raised our spears on high,
And gained renown in every land:
At the port of Dwina, in the east (at the Baltic),
Eight earls have we conquered;
Then did we supply the Eagle
With a plentiful feast in that slaughter;
The warriors fell, and the warm stream
Of wounds flowed into the ocean waves.

"We hacked with swords—against Hleiden's queen (in Sweden),
And sent hosts of Helsingians to the hall of Odin;
To Iva's mouth we steered our ships—
The entire waters were as one wound,
And the earth was red with the warm stream;
Then did the weapon deeply bite,
The sword rung on the coats of mail,
And quickly clove the shields asunder.

"We fought with swords—none fled that day
Till amidst his ships Herraudus fell (in Sweden);
No braver larl than he in battle
Did e'er with his galleys plough the sea;
In his long ships, where'er he sailed,
At every time the valiant chief
With cheerful heart to the conflict came.

"We smote with swords—then did the hosts drop their shields,
When the spear flew at the breasts of heroes,
And the battle-axe hacked near Scarfia's rocks (in Norway);
Bloody was the buckler in battle,
Before Rafno the king was slain;
From the heads of warriors, in streams,
Flowed the warm blood down their armour.

"We hewed with swords—on Ullar's plain (Upsal), Loud roared the spears ere King Eistein fell;
We traversed the fields, gleaming in gold,
To fight in the land of the prostrate foe;
The lance pierced the painted shields,
And from the brain, through the wounded neck,
The stream flowed in the shock of helmets.

"We hacked with swords—at Iudero's Isle (Drontheim),
The crows could then make an ample feast,
And Fala's wolves had a full banquet;
Difficult it was to defend the heroes:
At the rising sun I saw the darts pierce,
And the bow shoot forth the iron arrows.

"We fought with swords—at Born Holm (in Denmark)
Stained were our shields with gore;
There we firmly grasped our spears,
Bucklers were broken by clouds of darts,
The arrows flew from the bows of elm;
In the carnage Voluir fell,
There was no braver king than he;
Then the wild heast enjoyed his prey.

"We smote with swords—in Flanders' land (Belgium),
Fierce was the fight ere king Freyr fell;
Then was Hilda highly rejoiced,
The hard blue weapons, reeking with blood,

Western Corcabaiscinn (probably Kilrush, in Clare). Donal, the son of Conor O'Brien, having been informed of this, proceeded with all possible despatch to them, and succeeded in taking the greater portion of them prisoners, whom he brought with him, bound in close chains, to Moy Glac, in the south of Corcomroe, in order that their sorrow and sufferings might be the greater in view of the place where they had perpetrated the crime; he hanged some of them, and burned others, as their evil deeds deserved.

Cut their way through the golden mail;
The direful sword, in days of old,
Gave to the wolves a plenteous prey;
Long did the virgin mourn that morning's slaughter.

"We hewed with swords—and I saw fall
Of our adversaries many hundreds
Amidst their ships, at a promontory of England;
For six days continued the contest;
At length we vanquished our insolent foes,
At the rising sun they were subdued in battle,
And beneath our weapons Valdiofer fell.

"We hacked with swords—at Bertha-ford (Perth)
A rain of blood from our weapons ran,
Lifeless bodies became a prey to hawks;
The bow twanged, and the keen darts
Quickly pierced through the coats of mail;
Our swords, sharp as the viper's poison,
Were smeared with gore from gashing wounds.

"We fought with swords—at Hadninga's harbour (Orkney Isles)
High towered our crests in fierce encounter;
Then might the warriors be seen,
Who with baneful weapons shattered the shields,
And clove the helmets in the clash of arms;
Delightful to my heart was the sight,
As if I sat in state near my blooming bride.

"We smote with swords—in Northumbria's land
A storm of blows descended on our shields,
Till the lifeless bodies fell to the earth,
And none on that morning needed
To rouse the rueful sport of Hilda;
Helmets were cleft by keen swords,
Delightful to me as if I had welcomed
A youthful widow to the highest seat.

"We hewed with swords—in the Sudreyan Isles (Hebrides), Herthiof himself was forced to fly,
And Rogvalder fell amidst the shower of arms;
The kites were grieved for the death of their friend,
The breaker of helmets in the strife of swords,
Who from his bow-string shot the unerring darts.

"We hacked with swords—piled in heaps lay the slain,
Glad was the falcon's kindred at the shout of battle,
And the wolf and eagle enjoyed their prey.
In the stern shock of swords and shields
Fell valiant Marstein, Erin's king,
And the hungry crows had a feast prepared
That day at Vedra-fiord (Waterford).

"We fought with swords—and hosts of heroes
Have I seen fall at early dawn,
Slaughtered amidst the din of arms;
The sharp sword pierced the heart of my son;
Egil slew Agnar, the undaunted youth;
On Hamdi's buckler the spears resounded,
While our banners glittered in the sun.

O'Neill, i. e. John, the son of Con, son of Con, son of Henry, gave the sons of Mac Donnell of Scotland, i. e. of Alexander, the son of John Cathanach, namely, James, Angus, and Sorley, a great overthrow, in which Angus was slain, and James wounded and taken prisoner, and he died in a year after of the mortification of his wounds; his death was very much lamented, and he was a man distinguished for hospitality, feats of arms, liberality, conviviality, generosity, and bestowing of gifts, and there was not his equal amongst the

"We smote with swords—the sons of Endil
Cut up for wolves a plenteous prey;
For seven days, at Seaia's fight (Isle of Sky);
Red were our ships with reeking gore,
As if 'twere damsels carried wine;
Amidst the din of elashing arms
Full oft were Skogul's bucklers rent,
By Skiold's warriors in that battle

"We hewed with swords—oft have I seen
The fair-haired lover of the maiden fall,
And the widows' wooer in early morn;
Ere king Aurun fell at Ila's Bay (Hebrides),
Shields were smashed and chieftains slain,
Pleasing was the sight, as when the attending maid Hands the goblets round of warm wine.

"We hacked with swords—in early morn,
In the South, at Leinster's Isle,
With three kings in the strife of arms;
Few with joy escaped that conflict,
And many were a booty to beasts of prey;
The hawk and wolf tore the mangled slain,
Erin's blood was shed in streams,
And copious flowed into the deep.

"We fought with swords—and shields were riven
By strokes of weapons raised on high;
Then were the spears resounding heard
On Hilda's mail of golden colour;
Future ages shall admire the plain,
On Anglesey's Isle, where we met our adversary.
We strode as warriors in battle array;
Our wounding spears, dyed in blood,
Were hurled as swift as the dragon's flight,
Near the promontory along the river.

"We smote with swords—amongst men
What youth is fairer than he advancing
Far amidst the tempest of javelins,
And falls o'erwhelmed by adverse wounds;
And these escape not human woe
Who never seek the field of war;
But 'tis hard to excite the coward's heart
To the strife of swords and deeds of valour.

"We hewed with swords—that I esteem
An equal contest, man to man,
When chief meets chief, nor yields in combat—
Such was the warrior's pride in days of old;
Ever brave in the battle's whirlwind
Should be the admirer of the fair.

"We hacked with swords—but unerring fate
Experience shows to await us all;
And none their destiny can evade.
I ne'er believed that Ella
Would have ended my days, when I led

Clan Donnell of Ireland or of Scotland at that time, and his own people would not hesitate to give his weight in gold could he be thereby ransomed; many others were also slain in that battle of Glen Taisi (probably Glentask, in the parish of Dunluce, county of Antrim), who are not recorded.

Murrough, the son of Donal, son of Roderick O'Flaherty, was drowned.

O'Clery, i. e. Teige Cam, the son of Tuathal,

My conquering ships into his harbours,
When I strewed his land with heaps of slain,
And for wild beasts made plenteous prey,
Along the bays of the Scottish shores.

"We fought with swords—still I delight
When I think of the banquets prepared
By the father of Balder to regale the brave;
There we shall copiously drink of ale,
Out of cups which are formed of the skulls of foes,
As we joyously enter the palace of Fjolner,
No grief is felt there by departed heroes,
No faulting words of fear shall I utter,
As I enter the joyful Halls of Odin.

"We smote with swords—ah! soon would come Aslauga's sons with burning brands,
And wage fierce battle against my foes,
Did they but know their father's doom,
His vitals gnawed by venomous vipers;
I for my offspring sought a mother,
Whose blood would give them valiant hearts.

"We hewed with swords—soon shall my crown
Devolve to my succeeding heirs;
The adder's poison menaces life,
The viper now penetrates my heart;
But still to my spirit the thought yields joy,
That Odin's spear shall soon pierce Ella;
My sons shall come with swelling rage,
And full avenge their father's fate;
Those noble minded youths most sure
Will peace reject with utmost scorn.

"We hacked with swords—in one-and-fifty battles
Have we raised our spears in distant lands;
From my earliest youth I learned the task,
To tinge my sword with hostile blood,
And no king my equal have I ever met;
The goddesses will give me welcome—
I resign my life without a sigh.

"Now cease our song—the goddesses come
And invite me home to the Hall of Odin;
Happy there, on a high-raised throne,
Seated with gods, I shall quaff my ale.
The hours of my life have passed away,
And in joyous laughter shall I die."

The first verse of this composition requires some explanation; the dragon, serpent, or monster, mentioned as having been slain in Gothland by Ragnar, was a fierce champion who had killed many people in Sweden, but was slain in single combat by Ragnar, who was covered with a kind of armour made of the skins of animals, hence he was surnamed Lodbrog, which signifies, according to the Latin translation, hirsuta bracca, or hairy trowsers; and on killing this fierce chief, Ragnar obtained as his bride Thora, the daughter of Heraudus, king of Sweden, and he became himself king of Denmark. Ragnar in his various expeditions, according chief historiographer to O'Donnell, a man learned in poetry and chronicles, the sustaining prop of a house of hospitality for learned men, strangers, and the noble sons of literature in the neighbouring countries, died on the 20th day of October, at a fine advanced age, after having gained the victory over the world and the devil, and he was interred in the Franciscan monastery of Donegal, with very great honour and solemnity.

to the Danish historians, made conquests amongst the Swedes, Norwegians, Saxons, Russians, English, Irish, and Scots, and he had by his three wives thirteen sons, many of whom became kings. It appears from Thorkelin's Fragments of Icelandic History, that the sons and descendants of the renowned Ragnar were famous warriors; his son Biorn became king of Sweden; another son, named Sigurd, was king of Denmark, and a third, called Huitserk, became king of Norway; the famous Harold Harfager, or Harold the Fair-haired, the first king of all Norway in the ninth century, was also a descendant of Lodbrog. Sigurd, king of Denmark, son of Ragnar, married Blea, daughter of Ella, king of Northumberland, by whom he had a son named Knut or Canute. Gorm, son of Knut, exceeded all men in strength and stature; he became king of Denmark, and married Thyra, daughter of Edward the Elder, king of England; she was called Denmark's delight, and he had by her two sons named Knut and Harold; Knut excelled all men in beauty of features and form, and he was called Denmark's love; Knut and Harold often invaded England, and also came to Ireland, and attacked Dublin, where, as hereafter shown, Knut was slain; on the death of Gorm his son, Harold, succeeded as king of Denmark, and was the first of his nation who was converted to the Christian faith in the tenth century. Sueno, or Sweyn, grandson of Harold, and Canute, son of Sweyn, kings of Denmark and Norway, also became kings of England. Many of the descendants of Ragnar Lodbrog, as hereafter shown, also became Danish kings of Northumbria, and kings of the Danes of Dublin.

The Danes in England.—During the ninth and tenth centuries, the Danes and Norwegians, with great fleets and powerful forces, frequently invaded England, ravaged the greater part of the country, and plundered and burned towns, cities, abbeys, and churches. They continued their devastations for nearly two centuries, in the reigns of Egbert, Ethelwolf, Ethelbald, Ethelbert, Alfred, Edward, Athelstan, Edmond, Edred, Edgar, Ethelred, Edmund Ironside, and other Anglo-Saxon kings, with whom they fought innumerable fierce and bloody battles; and they were able to effect settlements and conquer many parts, particularly Northumbria and other northern territories of England, where Danish and Norwegian kings ruled for a long period; and they extended their power over the greater part of the north of England, in the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, called Northumbria, Deira, Bernicia, and Mercia. Their chief leaders, in the conquest of Northumbria, were Hingvar, or Ivar, Huhha, and Halfdan, sons of the famous Ragnar Lodbrog, who invaded and conquered that country, and took it from the Saxon kings, to avenge the death of their father by Ella, king of Northumbria, as related in the above poem. Reginald, Sitric, and Niel, or Nigel, who were grandsons of Ragnar Lodbrog, and several princes their descendants, as Godred, Aulaf, and Sitric, became in succession kings of the Northumbrian Danes, and many of these Danish kings of Northumbria were likewise kings of the Danes of Dublin, as hereafter explained. The Danes and Norwegians called Northmen levied immense contributions on the Anglo-Saxon kings, and compelled them to pay a great annual tax or tribute denominated Dane-geld, consisting of an immense sum of gold and silver, amounting to more than thirty thousand pounds a year, an enormous sum in those times, and equivalent to twenty times the amount at the present day. In the latter end of the tenth century, in the time of Ethelred II., commonly called

A. D. 1566.

'DONNELL, i. e. Calvach, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv, son of Torlogh of the Wine, fell from his horse in the beginning of winter, on the 26th of November, on the open road between Bally Aghaidhchaoín (probably Ballyaghan, barony of Raphoe in Donegal), and Tem-plerath, in the midst of his horsemen, without a stumble or jolt, without starting or fright, after his return from England in that year; that Calvach was the Unready, who reigned from A. D. 979 to 1013, the Danes and Norwegians made frequent incursions, and extended their power over the greater part of England, and levied immense tributes, of which accounts are given by Turner and Speed, who state that, in A. D. 980, they received £10,000; in 993, £16,000; in the year 1000, they got £24,000; in A. D. 1006, £36,000; and in the year 1010, they levied no less than £48,000. In A. D. 1011, according to Speed, the Danes under Thorkil attacked Canterbury, took Alphegus, the archbishop, prisoner, and slew 900 monks with a vast number of citizens; and he states, that in all more than 43,000 persons were slain in this massacre. The archbishop refusing to give them a ransom of £3,000, they stoned him to death at Greenwich. In A. D. 1013, Sueno, or Sweyn, king of Denmark, invaded England with immense forces, defeated the Saxons, and king Ethelred being forced to fly into Normandy, Sweyn became king of all the Northern half of the kingdom, but dying in England, A. D. 1014, he was succeeded by his son Knut or Canute; after various contests with the valiant Saxon king, Edmond Ironside, they agreed to divide the kingdom between them, Canute reigning in the north, and Edmond in the south; but on the death of Edmond Ironside, 1017, Canute, then in the 22nd year of his age, became king of all England, and also of Denmark and Norway; he afterwards appointed his son Sweyn king of Denmark, and another son, Horda Knut, king of Norway; Canute became one of the most celebrated kings in Europe in that age, and was styled Canute the Great; on his death, in 1035, he was succeeded as king of England by his son Harold Harefoot, who died in 1039, and was succeeded by his brother Horda Knut, or Hardicanute, king of Norway, who died in 1041, and was the last Danish king of England; he was succeeded by the Saxon king Edward the Confessor and Harold. In the year 1066, Harold Hardrada, king of Norway, invaded England with a large fleet and powerful forces, for the recovery of the kingdom, but, in a great battle at Stamford Bridge, was defeated and slain by the Saxons under king Harold; but in the same year the Normans of France, who were originally Danes and Norwegians, defeated and slew the Saxon king Harold, and became masters of England under William the Conqueror.

In Scotland, the Norwegians, in the ninth and tenth centuries, made many settlements, and conquered the Orkney Islands and the Hebrides, and likewise the Isle of Mann, together with the greater part of the northern counties of Scotland; and the Norwegian kings and Iarls ruled over the Isle of Mann, and the Hebrides a lord in sense and personal figure, a warrior in bravery and valour, severe and fierce against his enemies, mild and amicable to his friends, without extolling or boasting in the greatest goodness he performed, a person who it was not supposed would die after that manner, but rather that he would revenge the wrongs of his race; his brother Hugh, the son of Manus O'Donnell, was inaugurated his successor.

Mary, the daughter of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, the wife of Magennis, died on the 8th of October.

Rose, the daughter of Maguire, i. e. of Cuchonacht, the Coarb, the wife of Hugh Buighe, son of Hugh Duv (O'Donnell), died on the 22nd of July.

Maguire, i. e. John, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, son of Thomas Maguire, died on the 29th of September, in the lord justice's army, after he had been expelled down to the middle of the thirteenth century, and to the fifteenth century, over the Orkney Islands.

The Normans.—The following sketch of the history of the Normans has been collected from the Saga of Snorri, in Laing's Heimskringla, and Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities, Speed's Annals, Turner's Anglo-Saxons, Thierry's Norman Conquest, and various other sources. In the latter end of the ninth century, Rolf or Rollo, a Norwegian Iarl, according to Snorri, sprung from the ancient kings of Norway, having committed many piratical depredations, was expelled from Norway by king Harold Harfager. Rollo retired with his ships to Denmark, and afterwards to the Orkneys and Hebrides, and was joined by many Danish and Norwegian warriors; they attacked England, but, unable to make any settlement there, after several attempts, being opposed by king Alfred, they set sail for France, overran a great part of that country, and finally Rollo, at the head of thirty thousand Danish and Norwegian warriors, compelled Charles the Simple, king of France, to cede to them the principality of Neustria, which from these Nordmen, Northmen, Normands, or Normans, got the name of Normandy. This event took place in the beginning of the tenth century, A. D. 911; and Rollo received his principality, and obtained in marriage Gisella, daughter of king Charles of France, on condition that he and his followers should adopt the Christian faith, with which terms the Norwegian chief complied, and he and his people became Christians. This valiant chief was a man of great strength and stature, and of such a size that no horse could carry him, hence, as he always went on foot, he was called Rolf Gaunger, that is, Rolf the Walker. Rolf or Rollo and his descendants, as dukes of Normandy, ruled over that province from the tenth to the thirteenth century; and in the eleventh century, William, duke of Normandy, conquered England.

Many of the most eminent noble families of France were of Norman descent; and in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the Normans of France, under counts William Bras-de-fer or Iron-arm, Robert and Roger Guiscard, and other warlike leaders, conquered a great part of Southern Italy in the ancient Apulia, now part of the kingdom of Naples, and also Sicily; and they and their descendants became dukes of Apulia and Calabria, princes of Capua and kings of Sicily, and ruled over those countries with great glory for more than a century. In the eleventh century, Count Bohemond, son of Robert Guiscard, the Norman conqueror of Apulia, with his cousin Tancred, two of the most famous warriors of the Crusades, after various victories in the East led from his country by O'Neill; he was an intelligent, skilful, and bountiful lord, and he would be no dishonour to the greatest government he could obtain, on account of the number of learned men and strangers entertained by him, and the amplitude of his gifts and presents; Cuchonaught, his brother, was appointed his successor.

O'Rourke, i. e. Hugh Buighe, the son of Bryan founded the kingdom of Antioch, over which his descendants ruled as princes for a long period. During the Crusades, the Norman nobility of France and England furnished a vast number of valiant warriors who gained great victories over the Saracens in Syria; amongst others, Richard Cœur de Lion, or the Lion-hearted King of England, was one of the most renowned warriors who led their forces to the Holy Land, and by his valour won the great battle of Ascalon, and other victories in Palestine. The Norman nobles of England and France likewise produced many of the most valiant champions amongst the Knights Templars, the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, of Malta, and of Rhodes, famous in those ages in the East, for their defence of the Holy Land and other parts of Christendom, against the Turks and Saracens.

The Anglo-Normans.—About the middle of the eleventh century the Norman dukes of France claimed the crown of England, and in A. D. 1066, William, duke of Normandy, a descendant of Rollo, collected a powerful fleet consisting, according to Turner and others, of more than a thousand sail, for the invasion of England; he landed with an immense army at Pevensey in Sussex, on the 28th of September, and on Saturday, the 14th of October, fought the great battle near Hastings, in which the Anglo-Saxons, under Harold their king, were totally vanquished. In this battle six thousand of the Normans, and about sixty thousand of the Saxons, were slain; or, according to Speed, nearly sixty-eight thousand of the English fell. Harold himself, the last Saxon king of England, while valiantly fighting under his own standard, was killed by the shot of an arrow in the eye, which pierced his brain. The victory of Hastings, won by the valour of the duke of Normandy, thus transferred in one battle, and in a single day, the Anglo-Saxon sceptre to the Normans of France, and their duke became king of England under the title of William the Conqueror. The descendants of William reigned for many centuries as kings of England; and even to modern times, collateral branches, inbred with some of the Norman blood, have reigned as kings and queens of England; and the descendants of the old Norman nobility form many of the most powerful families of the aristocracy of Great Britain and Ireland to the present day.

Norman architecture.—The Normans and Anglo-Normans were equally eminent in the arts as in war, and introduced the style denominated Norman architecture, of which there are still many magnificent and beautiful specimens, such as ruins and remains of castles, cathedrals, churches, abbeys, &c., in France, England, Ireland, and Scotland.

In Ireland the descendants of the Normans of France who conquered England, became masters of a great part of the country in the latter end of the twelfth and beginning of the thirteenth century, under Richard de Clare, earl of Pembroke, commonly called Strongbow, and his followers, denominated Strongbow-men, and they still form many of the most powerful families of the Anglo-Irish nobility. The principal families of the Anglo-Normans in Ireland were the de Clares, earls of Pembroke, and their successors the Marshalls, earls of Pembroke and lords of Leinster; the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, earls of Kildare, and dukes of Leinster, the de Burgos or Burkes, lords of Connaught, earls of Ulster, earls of Clanrickard, earls of Mayo, &c.; the Butlers, earls of Ormond, &c. &c.; the de Laceys, lords of Meath and earls of Ulster, and the de Mortimers, their successors; the de Courcys, earls of Ulster and barons of Kinsale; the de Carews, earls of Cork and barons of Idrone, in Carlow; the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry; the Graeces of Kilkenny, barons of Courtstown; the le Poers of Waterford, earls of Tyrone and barons of Decies; the de Barrys of Cork, earls of Barrymore; the de Raches of Cork, viscounts of Fermoy; the de Vescys, lords of Kildare; the Fitz-Eustaces, barons of Portlester and Balinglas; the de Nugents, barons of Delvin and earls of Westmeath; the de Barnwalls, barons of Trimlestown; the de Neterviles, barons of Dowth, in Meath; the de Nangles, barons of Navan; the de Prestons, viscounts of Gormanstown; the de Flemings, barons of Slaue; the Tyrrells, barons of Castleknock; the Dillons, earls of Roscommon and barons of Kilkenny West, in Westmeath; the de Berminghams, barons of Athenry, in Galway, and earls of Louth; the Taaffes, earls of Carlingford and barons of Ballymote, in Sligo; the Tallots, barons of Malahide and earls of Shrewsbury, Waterford, and Wexford; the St. Laurences, earls of Howth; the Sarsfields, viscounts of Kilmallock, in Limerick, and earls of Lucan, in Dublin; the Plunkets, earls of Fingal, barons of Louth and barons of Dunsaney, are of Danish descent. There were many other families of note besides those above mentioned of Anglo-Norman descent in various parts of Ireland, as the Devereuxes, Darcys, D'Altons, Tuites, Petits, Delamers, Dexters, Barretts, Cusacks, Cruises, Cantwells, Cogans, Nagles, Prendergasts, Stantons, de Verdons, de Gernous, Fitzsimons, Fitz-Heurys, de Bathes, Bellets, le Bruns or Browns, de Peppards, de la Hoyde, de Phepoe, de Husseys, Keatings, Fitzstephens, de Muntmoreneys, de Rochforts, Purcells, &c.

As hereafter shewn, Danish and Norwegian kings ruled over Dublin and some other parts of Ireland for more than three hundred years, from the ninth to the twelfth century; and the Anglo-Normans, the descendants of the Normans of France of Danish and Norwegian origin, afterwards became possessed of the greater part of Ireland; therefore it appears from the foregoing accounts that in the ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, the warlike Danes and Norwegians, and their descendants, the valiant Normans of France conquered England and the greater part of Ireland and Scotland, a great part of France, part of Italy, with Sicily, and also Antioch in Asia.

The Danes in Ireland.—The terms Lochlann, Lochlinn, Lochluinn, and Crioch Lochluinn, were applied by the Irish writers to Scandinavia or the countries comprising Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; the word Lochlann according to O'Brien, in his Irish Dictionary, is derived from the Irish Loch, a lake, and the Germano-Celtic lann, which means land; hence the word Lochlann signifies a Land of Lakes, a term applicable to those countries about the Baltic, which abound in great lakes and inlets of the sea. A Dane or Norwegian was called by the Irish Lochlannach, signifying a Lake-lander, or person from the land of lakes; in the plural Lochlannaigh, or Lake-landers. According to others the name Lochlannach, in the plural Lochlannaigh, was applied to the Danes and Norwegians, and derived from Loch, a Lake, and lann, strong, hence signifying powerful, or strong at sea, as they always came with great fleets. A distinction was made by the Irish between the Danes and Norwegians, from the colour of their hair and complexion; the Danes, according to Duall Mac Firbis and others, being denominated Dubh-Lochlannaigh, signifying Black Lake-landers, being chiefly dark-haired; and the Norwegians Fionn-Lochlannaigh, or White Lake-landers, being mostly of a fair complexion, with fair or reddish hair. Gall, according to O'Brien, originally signifying a Gaul, was a term applied by the Irish to various foreign nations, as the Gauls, English, Danes, &c., while they call themselves Gael; and the name Gaill, signifying strangers or foreigners, was very generally applied to the Danes and Norwegians by Irish writers; and they also made the distinction between them, designating the Danes by the term Dubh-Ghaill, or Dark-haired Foreigners, and the Norwegians as Fionn-Ghaill, or Fair-haired Foreigners; and hence, according to some, was derived the name of the territory near Dublin called Fingal, from the Fionn-Ghaill, or Fingallians, who were Norwegians; but the word is sometimes given by the Irish writers Fine-Gall, which signifies the Foreign People. The Danes and Norwegians were likewise called by the Irish Gcinte, signifying Gentiles or Pagans, and the distinction was made as usual Dubh-Ghcinte, or Dark Gentiles, meaning the Danes, and Fionn-Ghcinte, or Fair-

Ballach, was slain at Ballintogher, by the Connallians, because they considered that the son of the daughter of Manus O'Donnell, namely, Bryan na-Murtha, the son of Bryan, son of Owen, was entitled to the lordship of Brefney.

Mac Carthy Riavach, i. e. Fingin, the son of haired Gentiles, signifying Norwegians. They were also often mentioned by the name of Danar, signifying a Danish man, in the plural Danair, or Dainfhir, and latinised Dani. By various writers the Danes and Norwegians were designated Northmen, and Norsemen, and sometimes Normans, but incorrectly, as the latter term was only applicable to the Normans of France, and hence the word Northmen, as well as Normans, has been latinised Normanni. The name Ostmen, or Eastmen, was also generally applied to the Danes and Norwegians, and latinised Ostmanni by various writers.

Expeditions and Foreign Alliances of the Irish Kings.—It appears from the old historians, that the Irish had intercourse with the Danes and Norwegians in very remote times, and accounts are given of alliances between the Irish kings and those of Lochlann. According to the ancient annalists, and the Psalter of Cashel, quoted by Keating, O'Flaherty, and O'Halloran, Lughaidh Riabhdearg, monarch of Ireland in the first century, was married to Dervorgal, daughter of the king of Lochlann, or Denmark; and Tuathal Teachtmair, monarch of Ireland in the second century, was married to Bania, daughter of the king of Denmark and Finland; and Feilimith Reachtmar, or Felin the Legislator, monarch of Ireland, son of king Tuathal, was married to Ughna or Una, daughter of the king of Denmark, by whom he had a son, Conn Cead Cathach, or Con of the Hundred Battles, a celebrated monarch of Ireland in the second century. Cormac Cas, king of Munster in the third century, was married to Oriund, daughter of the king of Denmark, by whom he had a son named Mogha Corb, who became king of Munster, and was a famous warrior; he invaded Denmark with a powerful force to support his maternal uncles in a contest for the crown of that country, and after gaining some great victories, he succeeded in placing his uncles, Osna and Airid, on the throne of Denmark; these were probably Frotho and Harold, who were kings of Denmark about that time. Saxo Grammaticus, and other Danish historians of the twelfth century, state that some of the Danish kings invaded Ireland at a very remote period, and these accounts are likewise given by various writers quoted at pp. 55 to 60 in Hanner's Chronicle, and also mentioned by Johannes Meursius, in his History of Denmark, in which works it is stated, that in the reign of Augustus Cæsar, a short time before the Christian era, Fridelf, or Fridelinus, king of Denmark, came to Ireland with his forces, and took Duhlin; but the Danes were soon after attacked and defeated by the king of Leinster, and forced to fly from Ireland. Frotho III. king of Denmark, son of Fridelin, next invaded Ireland, according to Saxo, fought battles with two Irish kings, whom he calls Cepo, and Chervill, and compelled them to give him tribute; Conaire Crinthan, and Cairbre Ceann-Cait, were the monarchs of Ireland in the first century, about this period, and one of them may have been the king mentioned by Saxo under the name of Cepo, and several of the petty kings were named Cearbhail, or Carroll. Some of the Irish annalists mention that Concovar Mac Nesa, the celebrated king of Ulster in the beginning of the first century, defeated the Danes who came to Ulster under the command of Daval, son of the king of Lochlann, in a battle at Enagh Macha, a district supposed to have been situated in the territory of Armagh or Tyrone. Various kings of Denmark, as Fridelf I. and II., and Frotho I., II., and III., are stated by the Danish historians to have invaded Britain and Ireland in the first century, and likewise Frotho IV., in the History of Denmark by Meursius, in which is the following passage, speaking of the conquests of king Frotho in various countries: "Eodem modo et Hiberniam recepit, quæ jam denuo desciverat et Ugletto rege cæso, ac Dufflino urbe capta, pro tributo denegato, maximum thesaurum inde reportavit."—"In like manner he won Ireland, which he a second time ravaged; and having slain king Huglet, and taken the city of Dublin for refusing tribute, he took from thence immense treasure." Saxo states that Frotho sent with his forces two famous champions named Haco and Starcater, who were men of immense strength and gigantic stature, and fought several combats with the Irish warriors Segathus and Suidanus; it is difficult to ascertain who king Uglet or Huglet was, the Irish name having been changed by the Danish writers; but it might have been Eogain, Ugaine, or Ugaire, ancient names of Irish kings. It is stated in Hanner's Chronicle, from Saxo, that some of the troops of the celebrated Fenian warriors of Ireland, in the third century, were partly composed of Danish champions; and it appears that many Danish and Norwegian warriors, in the third and fourth centuries, fought at the great battles of Gaura and Knoc Ingin, in Meath, which have been described at pp. 267, 436, in these notes.

From the accounts of the ancient annalists and historians, it appears that the Irish kings in the early ages made many military expeditions into foreign countries. Ugaine Mor, or Hugony the Great, called by O'Flaherty Hugonius Magnus, who was monarch of Ireland about three centuries before the Christian era, and contemporary with Alexander the Great, is stated to have sailed with a fleet into the Mediterranean, landed his forces in Africa, and also attacked Sicily, and having proceeded to Gaul, was married to Caesair, daughter of the king of the Gauls, Labradh Loingseach, or Lavra of the Ships, called by O'Flaherty Lauradius Navalus, grandson of king Hugony, having been exiled from Ireland, attained a high military command in the armies of Gaul, and brought to Ireland a body of Gaulish troops, consisting of 2,200 men, with whom he recovered the kingdom and became monarch; he located this Gaulish colony in Leinster, about the place afterwards called Wexford, as stated at pp. 217, 219, in these notes. Aengus, grandson of Lavra, became monarch of Ireland about 280 years before the Christian era; and according to the Book of Reigns, quoted by O'Halloran, is said to have led his forces into Greece, and it was considered that he was in alliance with the Gauls, who, about that time, invaded Greece and Asia Minor with powerful forces. During the Punic wars the Irish are supposed to have sent auxiliary troops to their Celtic brethren, the Gauls, who, in alliance with the Carthaginians under Hannibal, fought against the Roman armies in Spain and Italy. Conaire More, or Conary the Great, and Crinthan the Heroic, both monarchs of Ireland about the commencement of the Christian era, made expeditions to Britain and Gaul, and assisted the Picts and Britons in their wars with the Romans. At A. D. 9, Crinthan is mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters as having been slain at his fortress, called Dun-Crimthainn, which was at Binn Eadair, now the Hill of Howth, after his return from one of those expeditions, in which he brought to Ireland various spoils, amongst other things a splendid war chariot, gilded and highly ornamented, and golden-hilted swords, and shields, embossed with silver, a table studded with three hundred brilliant gems, a pair of greyhounds coupled with a splendid silver chain, estimated to be worth one hundred Cumal, or three hundred cows, together with a great quantity of other precious articles. Tacitus, in his Life of Agricola, states, that one of the Irish princes who had been expelled from his own country waited on Agricola, who was then the Roman general in Britain, and stated that the country could be subdued by one of the Roman legions, with a few auxiliaries. This Irish prince was probably Tuathal Teachtmair, who was about that time in Albany, or Caledonia, having been exiled from Ireland on the death of his father, Fiacha Finioladh, monarch of Ireland, who had been slain during the revolt of the Firbolg tribes of Connaught. Tuathal afterwards became monarch of Ireland, and the first year of his reign is placed at A. D. 77 by the Four Masters; and as Agricola, with the Roman legions, carried on the war against the Caledonians about A. D. 75, to 80, the period coincides chronologically with the time Tuathal was in exile in North Britain, and he might naturally be expected to apply to the Romans for aid to recover his sovereignty as heir to the Irish monarchy. Amongst the foreign expeditions of the Irish princes about this period, may be mentioned that of Eogan More, or Mogha Nuadhat, a famous king of Munster in the second century, who went to Spain and Donal, son of Fingin, son of Donal, died ; a man who had no regard for the affairs of this world, and took no thought for its wealth or substance.

married Beara, a Spanish princess, who was daughter of Heber, king of North Spain, in the country afterwards called Castile; Eogan returned to Ireland with a powerful force of Spanish auxiliaries, and fought the great battle of Moylena, where he was slain, as described at p. 245 in these notes. The celebrated Red-Branch knights of Ulster, in the first century, and the famous Fenian warriors of Leinster, in the second and third centuries, are mentioned to have made expeditions to Britain, and as allies to the Picts, Caledonians, and Britons, fought against the Roman legions with great bravery ; and Cormac, the celebrated monarch of Ireland in the third century, made descents into Gaul and Britain, and assisted the natives against the Roman power. Crimthán III., a descendant of the kings of Munster, of the race of Heber, monarch of Ireland in the third century, is also mentioned by Keating, O'Halloran, and others, as having invaded Gaul and Britain, broken through the Roman Wall, and at the head of the Irish, Picts, and Britons, fought against the Roman armies. The celebrated Carausius, a Menapian, who in the third century became Roman emperor in Britain, is considered by Ussher, Ware, Camden, and other antiquaries, to have been an Irish chieftain, a native of Menapia, which was the ancient name of Wexford, as explained at p. 218 ; and he is called by the Roman writers a citizen of Menapia. He was a man of extraordinary military abilities and bravery, trained from his youth in naval expeditions, and having entered the Roman army in Britain in the reign of the emperors Diocletian and Maximian, he was appointed commander-in-chief of their fleets in the northern seas, to bring under subjection the Franks, Saxons, and Scandianians, who attacked the Roman settlements in Gaul and Britain. Carausius having conquered these pirates, he attained such power and popularity that in A. D. 288 he assumed the Purple, and declared himself Roman emperor in Britain, and having defeated the forces of the emperor Maximian in several naval engagements, Maximian was forced to acknowledge him as his associate in the empire ; but after a reign of about seven years, Carausius was slain by Alectus, who became chief commander in Britain. There are still extant some coins of Carausius as emperor, and from the specimens of them given in Speed's Annals, the head of Carausius shows strongly marked Irish features. The renowned monarch Niall of the Nine Hostages made many military expeditions into Gaul and Britain, in the latter end of the fourth century, and had many conflicts with the Roman armies ; he was slain, as before stated, in Gaul, on the banks of the Loire, and his nephew, the heroic Dathi, the last Pagan monarch of Ireland, in the beginning of the fifth century led his forces into Britain, broke through the wall of Severus, and fought many battles with the Roman legions ; having carried his victorious arms through Gaul, he was killed by lightning at the foot of the Alps. An account has been given at p. 415, in the notes on the Irish colonies called Dalriadians, who settled in Albany or Scotland from the third to the sixth century, and having conquered the Picts and Caledonians, became kings of Scotland. Various passages from the Roman poets refer to the invasions of Britain by the Irish Scots, and their contests with the Roman legions. Claudian, speaking of the battles of the Roman general Stilico with the Britons and Picts and the Scots of Ireland, in the latter end of the fourth century, says,

"Totam cum Scotus Iernem, Movit et infesto spumavit renige Tethys."

"When the Scot moved all Ireland against us, and the ocean foamed with his hostile oars." Claudian also, when celebrating the victories of the Roman general Theodosius against the Picts, Britons, and Irish, in the fourth century, has the following passage :

"Maduerunt Saxone fuso Oreades,
Incaluit Pictorum sanguine Thule,
Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Ierne."

"The Orkney islands were moistened with the gore of slaughtered

O'Madden, i. e. Malachy Modardha, the son of Malachy, son of Breasal, died ; he was learned in Latin and Irish, and the most inoffensive of the Saxons ; Thule grew warm with the blood of the Picts, and icy Ireland wept over the heaps of her Scots slain."

Foreign invasions from the fourth to the eighth century.—An account has been already given from p. 436 to 440, of various invasions of the Picts, Britons, Anglo-Saxons, and Franks, particularly in Ulster, and of many great battles fought between those invaders and the natives from the fourth to the eighth century. According to the Welsh Chronicles, quoted by Hammer at pp. 99, 101, the renowned Arthur, king of Britain, and Uther Pendragon, with fifteen thousand warriors, invaded Ireland in the beginning of the sixth century, and fought various battles with the king of Leinster, named Giolla More ; this was Colman More, king of Leinster, who, according to Keating, governed that province for 30 years at the beginning of the sixth century. Giolla More, in his turn, invaded Britain, it is said, with fifteen thousand men, and fought several battles with the forces of king Arthur and Uther Pendragon. In the latter end of the sixth century, about A. D. 586, according to Hammer's Chronicle (p. 134), wherein he quotes Dowling's Annals of Ireland, Grace's Annals of Kilkeny, and other works, Gurmund or Gurmudus, son of the king of Norway, at the head of a fleet of pirates, Danes, Norwegians, Saxons, &c., ravaged the coasts of Britain and Ireland, and having overrun Leinster, he made his son, Burchard, duke of Leinster ; many other curious particulars on this subject are mentioned by Hammer.

Danish Invasions in the eighth and ninth centuries.—The Northmen who invaded Ireland were, according to the opinions of Ussher, Ware, and others, a mixture of Danes, Norwegians, and Swedes, with Finlanders, Frisians, Livonians, Esthonians, Courlandians and Saxons, from the countries about the Baltic, and from parts of Russia, Prussia, Germany, and Holland. The first invasions of the Northmen occurred at the latter end of the eighth century, when they also invaded the Orkneys, Hebrides, and other parts of Scotland, and plundered the celebrated monastery of St. Columkille at Iona, and massacred the monks. In A. D. 794, according to the Annals of Ulster, the churches of Rathrain, now the Island of Raghlinn, off the coast of Antrim, were burned, and horribly devastated, and reduced to desolation by the Gentiles ; and in A. D. 797 they destroyed the monastery of Holm Patrick, or St. Patrick's Island, near Skerries, off the coast of Dublin ; they also took preys of cattle from the country, and the sacred shrine of St. Dochonna was broken by them, and they carried off great spoils along the sea coasts of Ireland and Albany. The Danes and Norwegians, in these notices, are called Geinte, that is, Gentiles or Pagans, and the same attacks are also mentioned at A. D. 793, in the Four Masters. It appears that the Norwegians were the chief pirates who committed these depredations, but they were also accompanied by some Danes. In A. D. 801, according to the Annals of Ulster, Iona in the Hebrides was burned by the Gentiles or Northmen, which is mentioned by the Four Masters at the year 797. Various other accounts of the invasions of the Northmen, in the beginning of the ninth century, are given in Keating, O'Halloran, Ware, the Four Masters, the Annals of Ulster and of Innisfallen, from which works the following notices are taken : In A. D. 807 the Northmen invaded West Munster, but were defeated near Lough Leue, in Kerry, by Art, son of Cathal, king of Munster ; and about the same time they also landed in Connaught, and laid waste Inis Murray and Roscommon. In these incursions they laid waste the country, and destroyed the abbeys and churches. In A. D. 813 they again invaded Munster, but were defeated with great slaughter, and pursued to their ships by Féim, son of Crimthán, king of Munster. In A. D. 811 the Northmen or Gentiles, according to the Annals of Ulster, were slaughtered in several parts of Ireland, and in 812, according to Ware, the Danes invaded Ireland with a great fleet. In A. D. 815, according to some accounts, Thorgis or Turgesius, called king of Norway, first invaded Ireland with powerful forces, and ravaged many parts of the country ; and in A. D. 819 the Gaill or Foreign-chiefs of Ireland in his time, the defender of his land and territory against the invasion of neighbours, the pillar of protection of women, of the ers, according to the Four Masters, laid waste Edair, now Howth, and carried off captives many women, and they also devastated Beg Erin in Wexford. In A. D. 823, the famous monastery of Bangor was destroyed by the Northmen, who scattered the relics of St. Congal, carried off his shrine, and massacred 900 monks; but Muredach, king of Ulster, attacked and defeated them in a great battle, in which 1200 were slain, and the remnant of them fled to their ships. In A. D. 827 the Northmen landed at Newry, but were defeated in a fierce battle by Lethlobar, son of Loingseach, prince of Dalaradia, now the county of Down, and part of Antrim; and the Annals of Ulster record a remarkable circumstance in the same year, namely, the slaughter of an immense number of large swine by these Foreigners at Ard-Cianachta, which formed part of the present county of Derry.

The Battle of Tailtean.—About A. D. 826, the tribe called Gailonaghs, who were probably of Firbolg origin, and very numerous in Leinster and Meath, leagued with the Danes; but Concovar, or Conor, then monarch of Ireland, and Murtogh, son of Eogan, king of Ulster, collected their forces, and defeated the Gailonaghs and their allies, in a great battle fought on the plains of Tailtean in Meath.

Battle of Dromconla.—About A. D. 830 the Lagenians, under Lorcan their king, defeated the Northmen in a great battle at Drom Conla, in Leinster. A. D. 831 the Northmen landed with great forces at Waterford, and laid waste many parts of Munster, Cork, Limerick, &c., and also the city of Lismore, and its famous college, abbey, and churches. In the Four Masters, at A. D. 829, the first devastation of Armagh by the Northmen is mentioned to have taken place.

Battle of Derry.—According to the Four Masters, at A. D. 832, Niall Caille, monarch of Ireland, and Murtogh, gained a great victory over the Foreigners at Derry, and great numbers of them were slain; and in this and the following year, these invaders laid waste Ferns, Glendalough, Slane, and many other churches, and also Mungret, and many of the churches of Munster.

In A. D. 836 Turgesius, after having gone to Norway and Denmark, returned to Ireland with powerful forces, and a fleet of 120 ships, 60 of which entered the Boyne, landed their troops near Drogheda, and laid waste many parts of Meath; the other 60 ships sailed up the Liffey, and landed their forces at Dublin. With these combined Danes and Norwegians, Turgesius traversed many parts of Ireland, ravaged and laid waste the country, plundered and burned the churches and monasteries, and had various conflicts with the Irish forces. In this year is recorded a terrific battle with the Northmen at Invear-na-mBarc, or the Harbour of the ships, against the Hy Niall of Meath, from the Shannon to the sea, in which the Foreigners were victorious.

Battle of Glasgleann.—Malachy, king of Meath, and the Lagenians, in A. D. 836, defeated the Northmen in a great battle at Glasgleann, in which 1700 of them were slain; and according to the Four Masters the Foreigners were slaughtered in the same year at Easroe, now Ballyshannon; and, according to Keating, they were also defeated in a great battle at Moy Ith, near Raphoe, in Donegal. About the same time the Northmen were defeated with great slaughter by the people of Cianachta, and Saxolb their general was slain. In A. D. 837, the Conacians were defeated in a great battle by the Northmen. In A. D. 839 Armagh and its churches, &c., were burned by the Danes.

The Northmen in Dublin.—According to the Four Masters the Northmen first took possession of Dublin in A. D. 836; Turgesius was then their commander; and in A. D. 840 he and his Norwegians erected a strong fortress at Dublin, on the hill where Dublin Castle now stands; they sent out their forces from thence, and plundered various parts of Ireland, and burned many churches and monasteries, as those of Clonmacnoise, Clonard, Ard-braccan, Duleek, Clonfert, Kildare, Glendalough, Ferns, Lismore, Emly, &c., and also the churches of Ulster, as Armagh, Downpatrick, Louth, Clones, Devenish, and all the churches of Lough Erne and poor, of the weak and destitute; and he was succeeded by Donal, the son of John O'Madden.

Pierce Butler, the son of Edmond, lord of the Brefney. All the churches, monasteries, and colleges of Ireland were repeatedly ravaged during many years by these Foreigners under Turgesius. In A. D. 840 the Northmen also erected a strong fortress at Linduachail, now Magheralin, near Moira, in the county of Down. In A. D. 844 Turgesius plundered Armagh, and expelled the primate Forannan, and all the ecclesiastics and students, then amounting to several thousands, and the primate was afterwards taken prisoner, and carried off in their ships to Limerick, together with all his relics and attendants.

Battle of Casan Line.—About A. D. 844 the Northmen were defeated by the Ultonians, under king Niall Caille, and 700 of them slain at Casan Line, near Lough Neagh, and the river Lagan, on the borders of Down and Antrim.

Battle of Carn Brammit.—In A. D. 845, according to the Four Masters, Carroll, son of Dunghall, prince of Ossory, defeated the Foreigners of Dublin in a great battle at Carn Brammit, in which 1200 of them were slain; and in A. D. 846 the monarch Malachy defeated them in a great battle, in which 700 of them were slain.

Battle of Sciathneachtain.—A. D. 846, the Danes and Norwegians were defeated in a great battle at Sciathneachtain in Desies, on the borders of Tipperary and Waterford, by the men of Munster, and the Lagenians, commanded by Olchobar, king of Cashel and bishop of Emly, and Lorcan king of Leinster, in which 1200 of the Foreigners were slain, together with Tomar or Tomrar, tanist earl to the king of Lochlann.

Battle of Dun Maeltuile.—In the same year the Eugenians of Cashel defeated the Foreigners at Dun Maeltuile, and slew 500 of them; and Olchobar, king of Cashel, attacked the fortress of Cork, then in possession of the Foreigners; and about this time the forces of the Northmen were defeated with great slaughter at Hy Figinte, on the borders of Limerick and Kerry. It has been stated that king Olchobar himself was slain in one of these battles in Munster, but that is a mistake, as he did not die till A. D. 850, according to Ware and Lanigan on the Bishops of Emly.

In A. D. 846, the Northmen were defeated by Tigernach, prince of Loch Gabhair in Meath, in a great battle at Daire Disirt Dachon-na, in which 240 of them were slain, or, according to the Annals of Ulster, 1200.

Death of Turgesius.—This celebrated Norwegian king, who was called by the Irish writers Tuirghes, was, according to the Four Masters, taken prisoner in 843, and drowned in Loch Uair, through the miracles of God, Kiaran, and other saints. This event is referred, by Ussher and others, to A. D. 848, and to 844 in the Annals of Ulster. Turgesius succeeded in establishing his power to a great extent in Ireland for a period of about thirty years, and exercised over the natives a tremendous tyranny. He had fleets stationed on the great lakes throughout Ireland, as Loughs Neagh, Strangford, Foyle, Swilly, and Erne, in Ulster, Lough Corrib, in Connaught, Lough Ree, on the Shannon, in Meath, and Lough Dearg in Thomond; and his forces, proceeding from their ships, ravaged all parts of the adjacent territories. He is said to have erected throughout Ireland a vast number of those circular earthen ramparts or raths, commonly called forts and Danes' raths, where he kept his troops encamped, and from which they issued out to plunder the towns, churches, and country. It is stated by Keating and others that he had chiefs stationed in all parts of the kingdom, and his soldiers quartered on the inhabitants, over whom they exercised the greatest insolence and oppression, plundered and consumed all their property, cattle, corn, provisions, &c., and he imposed on every house or head of a family in Ireland a yearly tribute of one ounce of gold, which if not punctually paid, he had the defaulter's nose slit or cut off as a punishment, and hence this tax was termed by the Irish Airgid Srona, that is, Nose Money. They destroyed the towns, colleges, and monasteries, massacred many thousands of the monks and clergy, and introduced their own Pagan priests and idols; they banished or killed the Bards and Brehons, burned their books, and destroyed the various works district of Clonmel, died; he was a man who obtained the title and inheritance of his estate without contention or battle, a person who did not of art. It seems surprising that Turgesius could for so long a period have established his power, and maintained his authority in the heart of the kingdom, but it appears from the many fierce battles fought, and the vast numbers slain on both sides, that during the time of Turgesius he had powerful forces of Danes and Norwegians under his command, probably not less than one hundred thousand fighting men; besides, it is to be observed that the Irish kings and chiefs never made any combined effort, or entered into a confederacy to expel those foreigners, being continually engaged in civil war and discord amongst themselves, and many of them also entered into alliance with the foreign enemies; whereas, if they had acted in concert, they could have easily annihilated the power of the Northmen, for the Irish were equal in bravery, and far superior in forces to those foreigners, though it must be admitted that the Danish and Norwegian warriors were not easily vanquished, for they had from the northern nations, from time to time, very great and well-disciplined forces; besides, it is to be remarked, that these valiant and warlike Northmen, in the tenth and eleventh centuries, subdued the powerful Anglo-Saxon kings of the Heptarchy, and became masters of England. Turgesius sometimes resided in his fortress at Dublin, and, according to some accounts, also at Tara, but he had his chief fortress and residence, called Dun Turgeis, or the Fort of Turgesius, situated on a high hill near Lough Lene and Castlepollard, in Westmeath, within about two miles of the Ben, or Great Hill of Fore; the hill on which was erected the fortress of Turgesius, forins on one side a high precipitous rock, so that his stronghold was almost inaccessible and impregnable; some of the earthen ramparts still remain, and to this day the story of Turgesius is told in the traditions of the people. The kings of Meath at that time had their chief residence also in Westmeath, at Dun-na-Sciath, or the Fortress of the Shields, on the banks of Lough Ainnin, now Lough Ennell, near Mullingar; and at this time Malachy was king of Meath, a prince of the Southern Hy Niall, who in A. D. 846, according to Ogygia, became monarch of Ireland. Turgesius, it is said, in the insolence of his power, made to king Malachy the dishonorable proposal of demanding his daughter Melcha as a concubine; the king, indignant at the demand, resolved to rid his country of the tyrant, but pretending to agree to the proposal, he by a well-concerted stratagem got introduced to Turgesius fifteen valiant and well-armed youths, disguised as females, who made Turgesius prisoner, and opened the gates of his fortress to the forces of Malachy, who massacred all the Danish guards, carried off Turgesius himself bound in chains, and drowned him, according to the Four Masters, and the Annals of Ulster, in a lake called Loeh Uair, now supposed to be Lough Hoyle, in Westmeath, or, according to others, he was drowned in Lough Ainnin, now Lough Ennell, near Mullingar; on the death of Turgesius the Irish made a general and simultaneous rising throughout Ireland, and massacred vast numbers of the Northmen.

In A. D. 847, the Danish garrison of Dublin was attacked, and the city plundered, by Malachy, monarch of Ireland, and Tigernach, lord of Loeh Gabhair, in Meath; and in the same year a fleet of 140 ships of the king of the Gaill, or Foreigners, meaning Danes or Norwegians, came to Ireland, according to the Four Masters, to attack the Foreigners who were in Ireland before them, so that between both they disturbed all Erin; or 240 ships came in A. D. 848, according to the Annals of Ulster. At this period it appears that the Dubh Ghaill, or black Foreigners, that is the Danes, came with large forces to Dublin, and made great slaughter on the Fionn Ghaill, or fair-haired Foreigners, that is, the Norwegians, destroyed their fortress, and carried off many men captives, and great wealth; and a second devastation is recorded in A. D. 849, in which the Danes took the fortress of the Norwegians at Linduachail, or Magheralin, near Moira, in the county of Down, and slaughtered a vast number of them, amounting to 1000, according to Keating.

A. D. 850, according to the Four Masters, the Norwegians with possess or procure one penny of the property of the church by right of Pope or Prince; and he was succeeded by his son Theobald.

160 ships came to battle with the Danes at Snamh Eidlineach, now considered to be Belfast Lough, and having fought with great fury on both sides for three days and three nights, the Danes were at length victorious, and the Norwegians were obliged to leave their ships in their hands. In the same year Armagh was devastated by the Foreigners of Linduachail, on the Sunday after Easter, but soon after the Northmen were slaughtered in eastern Bregia, or Fingal, and also at Rath Aldain, by the people of Cianachta, and the year following Cathmal, king of the half of Ulster, was slain by the Foreigners.

A. D. 853, according to Ware and Giraldus Cambrensis, Aulaf, Sitric, and Ivar, three brothers, who were Norwegian princes, came to Ireland with a great fleet and powerful force of Northmen, and Aulaf became king of all the Danes and Norwegians throughout the country. Aulaf took possession of Dublin, Sitric of Waterford, and Ivar of Limerick; it appears according to some accounts that those chiefs came rather in a peaceable manner, and were permitted by the Irish kings to form settlements for the purposes of commerce, but Ware and others are of opinion that they took possession of those places by force of arms. They enlarged and fortified those cities, and the colonies of Danes and Norwegians also afterwards got possession of Wexford and Cork, all of which maritime cities they held for a period of more than three hundred years, down to the English invasion, towards the latter end of the twelfth century, and though the Irish kings frequently reduced the Northmen to subjection, it appears they were not anxious altogether to expel them from Ireland, but permitted their residence on condition of their becoming tributaries to them. Several of the Danish kings of Dublin, of whom accounts are hereafter given, were named Aulaf, and the name has been sometimes incorrectly written Anlaf, as in the Danish it is Olaf or Aulaf, sometimes in English made Olave, and latinised Olaus and Aulavus; by the Irish writers the name is made Anlhaobh, and latinised Anlafus. In 851, according to the Four Masters, Aulaf, son of the king of Lochlann, came to Ireland, and all the Foreigners in Ireland gave him hostages, and he took tributes from the Gaels, or Irish.

Battle of Fochla.—In A. D. 854 a fierce war was carried on between king Malachy and the Northmen, who it appears had some Danish allies; and in the same year a great victory was gained by Aodh, the son of Niall, over the Foreigners at Glen Fochla, in the northern part of Meath, and a vast number of them were slaughtered.

In A. D. 856, according to the Annals of Ulster, Ivar and Aulaf, with the Danes of Ireland, gained a great victory in Munster over Cathal, king of that province; and in the same year, according to the Four Masters, a victory was gained by Carroll, prince of Ossory, and by Ivar, in the territory of Aradh, over the Kinel Fiacha, who were joined by the Danes of the northern part of Ireland, and it is stated that the army of Carroll and Ivar amounted to 6400 men.

Battle of Drom Damaighe.—In A. D. 859, king Malachy defeated the Danes of Dublin in a great battle at Drom Damaighe, in which great numbers of them were slain; the place signifies the Hill of the Two Plains, and was situated in the southern part of Meath. In the same year Maolguala, king of Desmond, was stoned to death by the Danes of Cork.

In A. D. 861 Muiregan, prince of Nais or Naas, in Kildare, and of the eastern Liffey, was slain by the Northmen; and in the same year Aulaf, Ivar, and Huaisi, the three chiefs of the Danes, and Lorean, prince of Meath, laid waste the country, and in the same year there was a great slaughter of the Foreigners at Fert-na-g-Cao-raeh by Carroll, who cut off and carried away forty of their heads.

In A. D. 862, Aodh Finnliath, monarch of Ireland, it appears had leagued with Aulaf, the Danish king of Dublin, in conjunction with whom he overran the kingdom of Meath, then divided into two principalities; Aodh or Hugh put to death Lorean, one of those princes, and the other, named Concovar, was drowned in the Boyue, at Clonard, by his accomplice, Aulaf.

A shower of fish fell in Tirconnell this year.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Manus, marched with a force into Tyrone, precisely in the winter, and having committed great depredations, he returned home safe.

A. D. 1567.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, marched with a force

Battle of Lough Foyle.—In A. D. 864, the Foreigners of Ulster having assembled all their forces at Lough Foyle, near Derry, the monarch Hugh Finliath collected his army and pursued them; a fierce battle was fought, in which the Foreigners were defeated, and 1200 of them slain; and, according to the Four Masters, 240 heads were collected in one place in the presence of the king. Numerous chiefs besides those were slain in that great battle, and many of the wounded were carried into the churches and baptised after their wounds were healed.

In A. D. 865, a victory was gained by Mac Gathan over the Danes of Dublin, in which their chief Odolb Micle was slain. It appears that some of the Danes were converted to Christianity about this time, as it is mentioned in the Four Masters, at A. D. 866, that Connach, abbot of Clonmaenois, who was of the race of the Foreigners, or of Danish descent, died.

Battle of Clondalkin.—Aulaf, the Danish king of Dublin, erected a castle or strong fortress at Cluan Doleain or Clondalkin, near Dublin; but in A. D. 865, it was set on fire by the Irish, under Mac Gathan, and the son of Ciarnan, and one hundred heads of the chiefs of the Danes were collected in that slaughter; soon after, Aulaf, in revenge, planned an ambuscade, in which were slain or taken prisoners, 2000 of the Irish; and in A. D. 867, is recorded the death of Maolciarain, the son of Ronan, the most valiant man of eastern Ireland, and a hero terrible to the Foreigners.

Battle of Cill Ua Daighre.—In A. D. 866, a great and celebrated battle is recorded by the Four Masters, in which Flann, prince of Bregia, collected all the warriors of Bregia and Leinster, together with the Foreigners of Dublin, and marched his army, amounting to 5000 men, to Cill-ua-Daighre, in Meath, against the monarch Hugh Finliath, and they fought a fierce battle, in which the monarch was victorious, and vast numbers of the Bregians, Lagenians, and their allies were slain, together with Carlus, the son of Aulaf, king of the Danes.

In A. D. 867, Aulaf, at the head of the Northmen of Dublin, devastated and burned Armagh, with its churches, &c., and 1000 persons were either slain or taken prisoners, and he carried off great spoils and treasures.

A. D. 869, according to Ware, the Annals of Ulster, and others, Aulaf and Ivar, with a fleet of 200 ships, and a great force of the Foreigners of Ireland, sailed to England to the assistance of Hingvar, Hubba, and Halfdan, the Danish chiefs, sons of king Ragnar Lodbrog, who at that time invaded England with powerful forces, and conquered Northumbria. Aulaf and Ivar subdued a great part of Scotland, and returned to Dublin in A. D. 870, with their fleet of 200 ships, and an immense booty, together with many captives, Anglo-Saxons, Britons, Scots, and Picts; and in the same year, the Foreigners took the fortress of Dunseverick, in Ulster, which had never been taken before. In A. D. 870, Aulaf died at Dublin, and his brother Ivar became king of the Northmen of all Ireland and of Britain, but died in A. D. 872; and Ostin, the son of Aulaf, became Danish king of Dublin. In A. D. 875, Ostin, with a large fleet, invaded Scotland, and defeated the Scots and Picts with great slaughter, but was himself soon after treacherously slain by his own countrymen; and Godfrid or Godfrey, son of Ivar, became king of the Northmen in Dublin.

About A. D. 880, according to authorities quoted in Hanmer's Chronicle, and also according to Buchanan, the Scots and Picts precisely in the spring, and having crossed Lough Foyle, proceeded to Slieve Carbatch, and he completely plundered and preyed all around him, and returned home safe.

O'Neill, i. e. John, the son of Con Bacach, son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, having mustered a very large force for the purpose of marching into Tirconnell against O'Donnell, namely Hugh, his sister's son, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Oge, son had various contests with the Irish and Danes of Dublin; and the Scots, under their king Gregory, invaded Ireland, defeated the Irish forces near the river Bann or Boyne, marched through Meath, and took Dublin, but by the intercession of Cormac, then bishop of Dublin, peace was concluded between the Irish and Scots.

According to the Four Masters and others, in A. D. 878, the Foreigners of Dublin destroyed Duleek, and carried off many captives; but Barrith, a valiant hero of the Northmen, who was their chief commander, was soon after slain and burned in Dublin, by the miracles of God and St. Kieran.

A. D. 883, Kildare was laid waste by the Danes of Dublin, and they carried off 90 men captives to their ships, together with Suibhne, the abbot, and all the precious articles in the place.

In A. D. 885, the Danes of Dublin, under Godfrey, son of Ivar, defeated the forces of Flann Sionna, monarch of Ireland, in a great battle, probably fought in Meath, in which immense numbers were slain on both sides; and amongst the Irish, Hugh, the son of Concovar, king of Connaught; and Lergus, bishop of Kildare, with many other persons of note. About this time, Godfrey was treacherously slain by the contrivance of his brother Sitric, who became king of the Northmen of Dublin; and about A. D. 890, a powerful Danish chief named Geoffrey Merle, contested the command of the Northmen, against Sitric, son of Ivar; the city was torn by intestine factions, and divided into two parts between them, Sitric ruling over one, and Geoffrey Merle over the other. In A. D. 892, Sitric, who had slain his brother Godfrey, was himself killed by his own people; and his brother, Aulaf II., succeeded as Danish king. In A. D. 885, Heremon, the son of Hugh, king of Ulster, was slain by Eloir, a chief of the Northmen; and in A. D. 888, the men of North Connaught gained a great victory over the Foreigners, in which their chief Elor, the son of Barith, was slain.

In A. D. 890, Armagh was laid waste by the Danes of Dublin, under their chief named Gluniarn, which signifies Ironknee; they burned the cathedral, plundered the churches, and carried off 710 captives. In A. D. 891, Flann, prince of all Bregia, was slain at Olbha, by the Northmen.

Battle of Tirconnell.—In A. D. 891, the Connallians, under Atteid, defeated the Foreigners in a great battle in Tirconnell, in which 900 of them were slain, together with Aulaf, the Danish king of Dublin, grandson of Ivar, and Gluntradluna, the son of Gluniarn.

A. D. 897, the Northmen of Dublin were expelled from their fortress in that city, by Carroll, the son of Muiregan, prince of East Liffey, and the men of Leinster, aided by Maolfinnia, with the men of Bregia; and the Foreigners left a great number of their ships behind them, and half of them being slain, the remainder of them fled beyond the sea. In the same year, a famine prevailed amongst the Foreigners of Dublin, who were at Inis Mac Nechtain, now the island called Ireland's Eye, near Howth. In A. D. 898, the death of Maolfinnia, who was son of Flannacan, prince of Bregia, is recorded in the Four Masters; and his memory is celebrated by one of the bards as one of the most famous heroes of that age, who had defeated the Foreigners in many battles, and was a descendant of the renowned warrior Conall Cearnach, chief of the Red-Branch knights of Ulster.

of Hugh Roe, and to prey and plunder the country as he had formerly done, when O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, was not able to defend or protect his principality or country, through infirmity and sickness, and the quarrels and conflicts of his own sons with each other. The place where O'Donnell happened to be with his few forces, along with Hugh, the son of Hugh Oge, i. e. Hugh Duv, the son of Hugh Roe, and his relatives, was at Ard-an-Ghaire, on the north side of the bay of Swilly, and having received intelligence that O'Neill had marched with his forces to the country, he sent messages calling on those chiefs in his neighbourhood, while he himself remained in expectation of them, but, however, they did not all come at his call, as it was very early in the day. Such, however, as were there along with him, unexpectedly beheld at a distance, on the opposite side of the Fearsad (or pass) of Swilly, a mighty force advancing towards them in troops and companies; they did not halt, but marched onward in battle array, and without stopping crossed the pass, as the tide was out at the time. O'Donnell having perceived that, at once drew up in order and array his small select force, and sent a troop of his cavalry, commanded by the son of O'Donnell, namely Hugh, the son of Hugh, to attack the front of the enemy, in order that he himself might bring his foot forces across the open plains to some secure place where his foes could not circumvent or surround them. O'Donnell's horsemen having engaged with the advanced cavalry of O'Neill, Niall, the son of Donogh Cairbreach, son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe; Donal Ultach (Mac Dunlevy), the son of the doctor, chief physician to O'Donnell; and Mac Rabhartaigh, the keeper of the Cathach of Columkille (see note at A. D. 1497, p. 334), were slain by O'Neill's forces, but some, however, state that it was by his own people Niall O'Donnell fell; on the side of the Tyronians the son of Mac Mahon and several others were slain. When the son of O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Hugh, perceived the great numbers opposed to him, and that his lord had retired to a place of security, he followed him, and halted there in expectation of receiving reinforcements from his people to overtake him. He had not been long in that great suspense when he beheld companies of his faithful friends advancing towards him, and was overjoyed at their arrival. Those who came to his aid were, in the first place, Mac Sweeney of the Districts, namely, Murrough Mall, the son of Owen, son of Owen; the sons of Mac Sweeney Fanat, Torlogh Oge, and Hugh Buighe, and Mac Sweeney Banagh, i. e. Maolmurry, the son of Hugh, son of Niall; and when these forces had come together they formed no great force, for they did not number more than four hundred. O'Donnell then complained to those chiefs of his wrongs and injuries, and said to them that it would be better and more agreeable for him to die on the field, rather than to suffer all the disgrace and ignominious treatment exercised by the people of Tyrone against himself, his kindred, and relations, such as none of his ancestors had ever endured or submitted to before, but particularly the insult and ignominy which they had then exercised against him, viz. by forcibly expelling and banishing him from his fortress. All these chiefs coincided in the sentiments delivered by the noble prince, and said that the complaints and opinions he had expressed were true, and that they were willing to attack O'Neill and his forces. Intrepidly bold and bravely determined was the resolution they came to, viz. to encounter so great a hazard and danger as awaited them, but, however, they regarded more their honour and their inheritance than they valued their lives and bodies. With elated unanimity they then returned back in a well-arranged small body, and amicably united force, to attack O'Neill's camp. When O'Neill beheld them advancing directly towards him, he was greatly excited in his mind with compassion for them, and said, "I am very much surprised and astonished that those people should not find it easier to submit to us, and acquiesce in our terms, than come before us to fight and be forthwith annihilated." While engaged with those observations, the troops of Tirconnell rushed forward with boldness and impetuosity in front of O'Neill's forces; that seemed to be no startling sight to O'Neill's soldiers, for they were accoutring themselves as fast as possible until they had marched up to them; when they came in close view, fierce and ill-favoured were the threatening and grim looks they exchanged with each other from their piercing eye-balls, and having raised aloud their united war-cry, which was sufficient to put to flight unwarlike and faint-hearted soldiers, on their rushing together; they then began to strike heavily, powerfully destroy, fell and slay one another for a considerable time, until men were laid prostrate, warriors cut down, youths covered with wounds, and strong heroes hacked in the slaughter. But, however, the Tyronians were at length defeated by superior feats of arms, so that they were forced to fly from the field of battle, and retreat by the same way they had come, although it was impossible for them to return at that time, for the sea had flowed over the pass by which they had come in the early part of the day, which rendered it impassable; but the precipitancy of the defeat, and the determination and fierceness of their pursuers to take revenge for their insults, enmity, and injuries, left them no alternative but to face it. They rushed so precipitately to the flowing tide, that not one took heed for the safety of his kinsman, or near relative, although it was no refuge from peril or danger for them to flee to the dark deep ocean bay which was before them; that undertaking was not a warming after cold, nor preservation after peril, for a vast number of them were drowned in the deep flowing tide, although every one was happy to fly to it as a place of refuge, as he thought, from the enemy. Vast numbers of O'Neill's forces perished at that place, either slain or drowned; the most eminent of these were Bryan, the son of Henry, son of John O'Neill, and his brother; Mac Donnell the galloglass, O'Neill's constable, and a great number of the Mac Donnells along with him; Dudley O'Donnelly, O'Neill's foster-brother, one he most esteemed and valued in the world, along with many of his kindred and a vast number of Muintir Choinne (O'Quinns) and of Muintir Again (O'Hagans). But in short thirteen hundred of O'Neill's forces were either slain or drowned in that battle; and it is stated in other books that upwards of three thousand of O'Neill's forces were lost on that day. As to O'Neill, he escaped from that battle, and he would have preferred that he had not, for his mind and faculties were affected ever after it; he privately fled, unnoticed by any one, southward along the river until he passed Ath Tairsi, in the neighbourhood of Sgariff-Sholais, by the guidance of a party of the O'Gallaghers, who were of O'Donnell's own clans and people, and he did not stop, but proceeded through every private uninhabited place until he arrived in Tyrone. Few houses or residences, from Carlingford to the rivers Finn and Foyle, were without copious weeping and general lamentation; immense and incalculable was the booty, consisting of horses, arms and accoutrements, left in possession of the Tirconnallians on that occasion; it was on the 8th of May that battle of the Pass of Swilly was fought.

After O'Neill had gone to Tyrone, as we have before stated, he took no rest or recreation, nor did he sleep a wink until he sent despatches inviting the sons of James, the son of Alexander, son of John Cathanach, the sons of Mac Donnell, from Scotland. That was the cause of shortness of life, and of death, for him to invite the sons of the man who had fallen by his hands on a former occasion. They accordingly came with a large fleet, and landed at Bun-Abhann-Duine (Cushendun bay, in Antrim), in Ulster, where they constructed a strong camp, with numerous entrenchments. When O'Neill received intelligence of that large force having come to his aid, without taking into consideration his former enmity towards them, he incautiously committed himself to the protection of that fierce and revengeful clan, without pledge or security, in order that he might avenge his enmity and hatred against the Tirconnallians. The reception he got from them, after being in their company for some time, and after they had detailed their former animosity and injuries, was suddenly to attack him, and instantly cleave him with their swords, so that they left him dead on the spot. The race of Eogan, son of Niall, much lamented the death of him who was there slain, for that O'Neill, namely, John,¹ was their Concovar, as a provincial King, their Lughaidh of

A. D. 1567.

1. John O'Neill was the son of Con, who had been created earl of Tyrone by king Henry VIII.; he was called by the Irish, Shane-an-Diomais, or John the Proud; and also, Shane Dongaileach, from being fostered by O'Dongaileach, or Donnelly, chief of Ballydonnelly, in Tyrone. John was a man of fine person, great energy, abilities, and bravery, but extremely proud and insolent; he carried on frequent and fierce contests with the O'Donnells, O'Reillys, Maguires, Mac Mahons, Magennises, Mac Donnells, and other chiefs whom he reduced to subjection, and called himself King of Ulster; he had likewise violent contentions with his illegitimate brother Ferdorcha O'Neill, who was created baron of Dungannon, and is usually called Matthew by the English writers. Matthew was in the English interest, and supported by them as successor to Con, earl of Tyrone, against John, who was recognised by the Irish under the laws of Tanistry, as the legitimate represen-the long hand in valour, their champion in chivalry and bravery, and it was to record his death that the following was composed :

" Five hundred and sixty seven
And one thousand years exactly,
From the time of Christ's incarnation
To the death of John, the grandson of Con."

After the death of John, Torlogh Luineach, the son of Niall Conallach, was nominated the O'Neill.

The earl of Desmond was taken prisoner at Cill-Mocheallog (Killmallock in the county of Limerick), by the lord justice, who conveyed him to Limerick, from thence to Galway, to Athlone, and finally to Dublin. This capture was made after the festival of St. Patrick, and in November following his kinsman John, the son of James, came to the English to inquire after the earl, but he was immediately made prisoner, and both were afterwards sent to England.

Mac Pierce (Butler), namely, Edmond, the son of James, son of Edmond, died ; he was a man of general hospitality, and who kept an open house of entertainment, and was learned in tongues and languages ; his son James was appointed in his place.

John Burke, the son of John, son of John of the Teeth, the son of Ulick Roe, was slain by some common persons, and ill-disposed clowns, of the earl of Clanrickard's people.

The son of O'Brien of Thomond, i. e. Teige, the son of Donogh, son of Conor, son of Torlogh ; the son of the earl of Ormond, namely, James junior, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, and the son of Mac Carthy, i. e. Owen, the son of Cormac Oge, son of Cormac, son of Teige, died this year.

Manus, the son of Edmond, son of Manus Mac Sheehy, was slain by Mac Maurice of Kerry, namely, Thomas, the son of Edmond, son of Thomas ; and there was not a man of his tribe in his time more distinguished for hospitality and feats of arms.

The bridge of Athlone was built by the lord justice of Ireland, sir Henry Sydney, namely, Henri Mor-na-Beorach (big Henry of the Ale).

tative of the illustrious race of O'Neill. John lived in a style of great magnificence and hospitality, resembling that of the ancient kings ; he kept, says Cox, two hundred tuns of wine in his cellar, at Dundrum, but Cox probably meant Dunganon, in Tyrone, which was the chief seat of the O'Neills, and not Dundrum, which is situated in the county of Down. He had a body guard of six hundred galloglasses, and kept ready for the field a force of four thousand foot and a thousand horse. O'Neill fought various battles against the English forces, under the earl of Sussex, and other deputies, gained some victories over them, and was, in his turn, frequently defeated ; in 1560, he marched into Meath, and laid waste various parts of the English pale. In 1561, by the advice of his kinsman, the earl of Kildare, he made his submission to the deputy, and went to England to effect a reconciliation with the queen ; he was attended by his body guard of several hundred galloglasses, consisting of picked men of great strength and stature, armed with swords and battle-axes, their long curling locks flowing down their shoulders, their linen vests dyed of a yellow colour with saffron, and wearing woolly cloaks and short tunics, and thus arrayed in the military costume of their country, they astonished the citizens as they marched through the streets of London ; Camden says, in his Life of Elizabeth, that the Londoners marvelled much at the strange sight ; O'Neill was attended by Mac Sweeney, commander of his galloglasses ; Mac Caffry, his standard bearer ; O'Gallagher, his marshal ; O'Gnive, his hereditary bard, and several other officers. O'Neill was well received by Elizabeth, and entered into a treaty with her in presence of the ambassadors of Sweden and Savoy ; the queen gave him, at his departure, valuable presents, and lent him £2500 ; for some time after his return to Ireland, he sided with the queen's forces, attacked the Scots, and in 1564 slew, with his own hand, their commander, James Mac Donnell, and drove them out of Ulster. O'Neill afterwards resisted the English rule, and ravaged their settlements ; and in 1565, according to Cox, he resided at his mansion about six miles from Dundalk, and having mustered his forces, attacked Dundalk, made incursions into the Pale, and spoiled the English settlements ; he afterwards attacked the English garrison at Derry, and many were slain on both sides, including colonel Randolph, the governor ; in the following April, the ammunition took fire, and blew up the town and fort of Derry, and killed twenty men. In 1566, O'Neill attacked Armagh, and burned the town and cathedral to be revenged, he said, of his enemy primate Loftus, and to prevent the English from lodging within its walls, for which archbishop Loftus, according to Ware, solemnly cursed, and had sentence of excommunication pronounced against him in Dublin. English commissioners were sent to treat with him, but he refused the title of earl of Tyrone, and called himself O'Neill, saying, " that his blood and power were better than the mean title of earl, that his ancestors were kings of Ulster, that he won the province by the sword, and would keep it by the sword." In 1567, the Irish chiefs of Ulster revolted against O'Neill, and his forces were defeated by O'Donnell, as stated in these Annals ; he was also attacked by the lord deputy, sir Henry Sydney. O'Neill endeavoured to form an alliance with the Scots, and for that purpose, proceeded to Clannaboy, where Alexander Oge Mac Donnell was encamped with six hundred Scots ; they received him with apparent friendship, and caroused together, but an altercation having arisen, Alexander Oge, with Mac Gillespie and many others, furiously attacked O'Neill with their drawn swords and hewed him to pieces, and likewise slew almost all his attendants in revenge of the death of James Mac Donnell, who had been slain by O'Neill, as before stated. William Piers, an English officer and agent of the court, is stated in Stuart's Armagh to have excited the Scots to assassinate O'Neill ; and, according to Ware and Stuart, after O'Neill had been buried four days, Piers raised the body, cut off his head, and carried it pickled in a pipkin to Drogheda, on the 21st of June, to the lord deputy, Sir Henry Sydney, who ordered it to be placed on a pole on the top of Dublin Castle. " Piers," says Stuart, " received a reward of one thousand marks for the part he had taken in stimulating the Scots to this base murder." The place where O'Neill was killed was near Cushendun, in Antrim, and he was buried in a ruined church, where his grave is said to be still pointed out. According to Stuart and other authorities, the war with John O'Neill cost Elizabeth about one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, independent of many cesses ; and in the various conflicts, 3500 British soldiers and great numbers of Irish auxiliaries were slain. In February, 1569, an act of Attainder was passed against the late John O'Neill, and all his extensive estates, together with the greater part of the county of Tyrone, were confiscated and seized by the crown, and various parts were planted with British settlers.

A. D. 1568.

The countess of Clanrickard, namely, Margaret, the daughter of Donogh, son of Conor, son of Torlogh (O'Brien), a woman of great fame among the Irish, and the supporter of her friends and relatives, died.

Mac Mahon, lord of eastern Corcobaiscin (in Clare), i. e. Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, died, and Teige, the son of Murrough, son of Teige Roe, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, succeeded in his place.

Mac Sweeney of Fanat, i. e. Donal Gorm, the son of Donal Oge, was treacherously slain by a party of his own people, viz., Muintir Sruithin.

Cathleen, the daughter of Maguire, i. e. of Cuchonacht, the wife of O'Boyle, namely, Torlogh, the son of Niall, son of Torlogh, the best chief's wife in Ulster, died on the 5th of January.

James, the son of Maurice, son of John, son of the earl (of Desmond), marched with a force, at Lamas precisely, against Fitz-Maurice of Kerry, namely, Thomas, the son of Edmond. That James was the leader of the Geraldines, in place of the sons of James, son of John, who were imprisoned in London for a year before that time. The country was preyed and plundered, burned and devastated, with great expedition, by James and his forces; the greater portion of the inhabitants of the country fled, and carried away with them all the property they possibly could to Lic Snamha (Lixnaw, in Kerry). The forces of James were so very numerous that he constructed two large extensive camps on either side of the town. He sent O'Conor Kerry, and the Clan Sheeheys, with their predatory forces, and an adequate number of chiefs and leaders from the main body to the east side of the town, and he himself, along with a select party, to accompany him, went to the western side of the town, and Fitz-Maurice and his people were in great difficulties between them. There happened to be then very warm weather, and excessive drought, as was customary at that season, so that the inhabitants and the cattle were obliged to drink the brackish tide-water of the river, by reason of their great thirst. Fitz-Maurice's constable at that time was Edmond, the son of Giolla Duv, son of Conor, son of Donogh, son of Donal-na-Madhma (Donal of the Victories), Mac Sweeney, who had but a small party of galloglasses of his own followers along with him, probably not exceeding fifty men, who had fulfilled their period of service; but, however, they did not deem it honourable to depart from Fitz-Maurice while in that predicament. There happened also to be in that town John-na-Seoltadh (John of the Sails), the son of Donal O'Malley, with the crew of a long ship, who were in alliance with the fleet of Fitz-Maurice, and who had come thither to pay them a visit, freely, and without any engagement, and he did not think it proper to forsake him on that occasion. Fitz-Maurice went to consult those chiefs, to know what should be done; they answered and said with one accord. "The condition we are placed in is next to death, and we shall receive no relief with the consent of those who are opposed to us and besieging us, and since you are not disposed to submit to the son of Maurice, the son of the earl, what we recommend you to do is, to try your luck and prosperity for wealth and property this day, and receive as your portion of Ireland all that which shall be under the feet of your opponents, and let us attack the Clan Sheeheys, as our wrath and anger are greatest against them." Having determined on that resolution, they quickly, with one accord, made themselves ready, and Fitz-Maurice mustered and put into battle array the small but faithful party which was about him, and the Mac Sweeneys were appointed to lead the attack. No estate or principality, in their opinion, was more acceptable to the Clan Sheeheys, and all those along with them, than to behold them advancing towards them in that order, for they were better pleased to have the opportunity of conquering them at once than remain any longer circumstanced as they were, eating green ears of corn, and drinking cold water. As to Fitz-Maurice and his people, they did not deviate from the direct road until they came in contact with the Clan Sheehey, when both parties tried with each other the strength of their sharp spears, the force of their battle-axes, the goodness of their swords, and the hardness of their helmets. After having fought desperately for some time, the brave forces of the Geraldines were defeated, and began to retreat, and turned their backs from maintaining the field of battle; they were closely pursued by the men of Fitz-Maurice of Kerry, who continued cutting and slaying them, so that it was not easy to enumerate all of the Geraldines, and of the Clan Sheeheys that fell in that defeat ; there was slain there O'Connor Kerry, i.e. Conor, the son of Conor, who was greatly lamented, and was at that time one of the most mournful losses sustained by the Clanna Rory ; he was the enlivening spark of his race and relatives, and, though a junior, he obtained the government of his patrimony over his seniors ; he was the supporting prop of learned men, strangers, and professors of all denominations, and was the sustaining pillar of war and conflict against neighbouring and distant foes ; there also fell there Edmond Oge, the son of Edmond Mac Sheehy, high constable of the Geraldines, a man of affluence and great wealth, distinguished for his bounty, and for keeping a house of hospitality ; also Murrough Balbh, the son of Manus Mac Sheehy ; Teige Roe O'Callaghan ; the son of O'Dwyer ; the son of the White Knight ; Faltach (Wall) of Dun Maoilin (Dunmoylan in Limerick) ; and John, the son of Gerald Fitzgerald, the heir of Leac Bebhionn ; Roderick, the son of Manus Mac Sheehy was taken prisoner, and many others were either slain or taken prisoners on that occasion.

A. D. 1569.

The bishop of Killaloe, i. e. Torlogh, the son of Mahon, son of Torlogh O'Brien, died.

O'Shaughnessey, i. e. Giolla Duv, the son of Dermot, son of William, son of John Buighe, the supporting mound of all the English and Irish who came to his place, died ; he was, though not learned in the Latin or English, the most esteemed and admired man by the English of his time ; and his son John succeeded in his place.

Slaney, the daughter of Murrough, the son of Teige, son of Torlogh O'Brien, died.

Morepheeck, the daughter of Bryan, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh O'Brien, the wife of O'Shaughnessey, i. e. of Dermot, the son of William, son of John Buighe, a woman distinguished for her personal figure and benevolence, died.

James, the son of Maurice, son of the earl (of Desmond), having become a warlike and turbulent person this year, all the English and Irish of Munster, from the Barrow to Carn-Ui-Neid (Cape Clear, in Cork), joined and united with him in a league against the council of the sovereign.

The earl of Ormond, namely, Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce, son of James, son of Edmond, being in England, his two brothers, Edmond of the Port and Edward, joined James, the son of Manrice, and those two sons of the earl having gone, on Great Lady day, through the fair of Innis Cortha¹, seized an immense quantity of property, consisting of horses, cattle, gold, silver and foreign goods, at that fair ; the earl having returned to Ireland the same year, he made peace for his kinsmen with the state.

Sir Henry Sydney, lord justice of Ireland, marched with a great force in the harvest of this year, against the people of Munster, after the peace and league which they had ratified ; the direction he took was through the south-west of Leinster, and he did not halt until he entered the territory of Hy Maeaille (Imokilly, in Cork), in Munster, and having constructed a strong camp of active forces at Baile-na-Martra (Castlemartyr) and remained for a week besieging the town, the Momonians threatened every day of that week to give battle to the lord justice and his force, which, however, they did not put into execution. The town was at length taken by the lord justice, and he garrisoned it on behalf of the queen ; from thence he proceeded through Barry's Country (barony of Barrymore, in Cork), and Gleann Maghair (Glanmire), on his way to Cork ; the Momonians collected from all directions, were met there to give him battle ; but, however, the lord justice was permitted to march onwards, and he remained for some time at Cork ; during that time several of the insurgents, adherents of James, came to seek protection and pardon. The lord justice went from thence to Limerick, and destroyed portions of the towns of Munster, between Cork and Limerick ; Clun Duvain and Baile-I-Bechain in Thomond (Clare), were taken by the lord justice on that expedition, and he afterwards proceeded to Galway ; he remained in that

A. D. 1569.

1. Inis Corrtha, now Enniscorthy, in the county of Wexford, at the fair of which town, on the 15th of August, according to Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, this James, son of Maurice or Fitzmaurice, who was of the family of the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, committed great outrages ; and he likewise, according to Cox, besieged Kilkenny, and robbed old Fulco Quimerford of Callan, who had been servant to the three earls of Ormond, of two thousand pounds in money, besides plate, household stuff, corn and cattle.

town for some time, to bring under subjection the Dalcassians and Clan William (Burkes), and West Connaught; and on leaving Galway he took Dun More Mic Feorais (Birmingham's Dunmore), and also Roscommon; he appointed a president, at the town of Athlone, over the entire province of Connaught, who governed and brought under subjection all the country from Droghaish (Bundrowes, in Leitrim), to Limerick; he was the first president ever appointed over that country, and his name was sir Edward Piton (Fitton). The lord justice returned into Fine-Ghall (the English settlements or the Pale), and to Dublin, at the end of that harvest, after he had victoriously brought the country under subjection; and no viceroy of Ireland, with such a force as he commanded, ever performed so prosperous an expedition as he did on that occasion.

A. D. 1570.

Mac Sweeney Fanat, i. e. Torlogh Oge, the son of Torlogh, son of Maolmurry; his kinsman Hugh Buighe Roe, and Mac Sweeney of the Districts, i. e. Murrough Mall, the son of Owen Oge, were treacherously slain at Dun-na-Long, in the presence of O'Neill, i. e. Torlogh Luineach, by the Clan Donnell galloglasses; and the fall of those three was a great grievance to the hospitality, generosity, strength, power, defence, and support of the north of Ireland; and the death of one of them, particularly, was a lamentable loss, although the other two were also distinguished persons, namely, Murrough Mall, who was eminent above all others in valour; an unquenchable fire, the most illustrious warrior of the Irish, the chief combatant of the men of Ulster against the men of Ireland, the conquering champion in the peril of conflict, the protector of the treasure house, and of the precious wealth of the Mac Sweeneys was that Murrough; his brother, Owen Oge, succeeded him, and his other brother Donal was appointed in the place of Mac Sweeney Fanat.

Eignachan, the son of Hugh Buighe O'Donnell, was treacherously slain while returning from O'Donnell's forces, by Feardorach, the son of O'Gallagher, and his people, aided by others of the tribe of Donogh O'Gallagher.

Mac Namara, i. e. John, the son of Sioda, son of Mac Con, son of Sioda, son of Teige, son of Loughlin, lord of the eastern part of Clan Cuilcin (in Clare), died; he was a noble majestic man, the favourite of women and of daughters for mirth and gaiety; Donal Riavach, the son of Cumeadhá, son of Donogh, succeeded him.

The president of the province of Connaught (sir Edward Fitton), issued a proclamation to the O'Briens and the people of South Connaught, for holding a court in the monastery of Ennis in Thomond. Teige, the son of Murrough O'Brien, was Sirriam (Sheriff) in the country at the time, and he was the first sheriff of Thomond; he laid in a supply of provisions and spirituous liquors at the monastery of Ennis, for the use of the president; the president afterwards came to the town about the festival of St. Bridget. The earl of Thomond, i. e. Conor, the son of Donogh, son of Conor O'Brien, was at that time in Clare, and the president on the third day sent for him, and despatched some of his officers and a body of his cavalry to request the earl's attendance; it happened to be at the same hour of the day that they and Donal, the son of Conor O'Brien, who was also coming to him, arrived at the castle gate, and the resolution that the earl formed was to take Donal prisoner, and all those that were within the chains of the gate, and also to kill those who were outside; the remainder of them fled as fast as they could, and with the full speed of their horses, to the president at Ennis. The president departed the following day, and was conducted from the country by Teige and Donogh, the sons of Murrough, son of Torlogh (O'Brien), who led and directed him by the most private, sequestered, and intricate ways; the earl, determined to attack, pursued them until they arrived that night at Gort-Innsi-Guaire.¹ When these tidings reached the lord justice he became enraged and exasperated, and he and the council came to the resolution of requesting the earl of Ormond, i. e. Tho-

A. D. 1570.

1. Gort Innsi Guaire, now Gort, in the county of Galway, signifies the field of the Island of Guaire, and was so called from Guaire, an ancient king of Connaught, in the seventh century, who was so renowned for his hospitality that his name passed into a proverb amongst the Irish, who in speaking of any one distinguished as a hospitable man, said he was as generous as Guaire; this Guaire was ancestor of the family of the O'Shaughnessys, formerly chiefs of note who possessed Gort in Galway.

mas, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, in the name of the queen, to chastise the earl of Thomond for his very outrageous conduct, for they were near relatives and friends of each other. The earl of Ormond marched forthwith into Thomond with his forces, and the earl (of Thomond), accompanied by Conor, came to hold a conference with him, and promised he would be guided by his will and that of the council; he also gave his castles into the possession of the earl of Ormond, viz., Clonroad, great Clare, and Bunratty, and Donal O'Brien, and the chiefs of Thomond whom the earl had as hostages, were set at liberty, and also those hostages belonging to the president in like manner. The earl afterwards became sorry and unhappy in his mind for having parted with his castles, and for having delivered up his hostages, for he had no fortress in his possession but that of Magh O mBraeacain (Ibraken in Clare), in which he placed a strong and faithful garrison, and he came to the resolution never to submit himself to the laws or mercy of the council of Ireland, and preferred to be proclaimed and outlawed, and abandon his estate and patrimony, rather than make his submission to them. He afterwards remained privately for some time in Clan Maurice (in Kerry), and proceeded from thence, about the festival of St. John, to France, where he remained for some time; he afterwards came to England, where he obtained mercy, pardon, and honour from the queen of England, who gave him letters to the council of Ireland commanding them to honour the earl; and he returned to Ireland in the winter of the same year.

The same president (sir Edward Fitton, president of Connaught), and the earl of Clanrickard, namely Rickard, the son of Ulick of the Heads, son of Rickard, son of Ulick of Knock Tuagh, laid siege to Sruthra² in the summer of this year. There were in that force along with the president a selection of chiefs, powerful warriors, equestrian heroes, and champions of South Connaught, from Moy Aoi to Echtge, and from Galway to Athlone; there were also in the president's camp a great number of captains and their soldiers along with them, and two or three companies of Irish mercenary soldiers; and there were also there Calvach, the son of Torlogh, son of John Carrach, son of Mac Donnell, with his two sons and his forces, and a party of the tribe of Donal, the son of John, son of Owen-na-Laithighe Mac Sweeney, namely, Hugh, the son of Owen, son of Donal Oge, and Donal, the son of Murrogh, son of Roderick More, along with their select companies of galloglasses, and another company of galloglasses of the Clan Dougalls; the ordnance and military of Galway were also there, and an active troop of cavalry consisting of three hundred men with their spears and coats of mail. When Mac William Burke, namely, John, the son of Oliver, son of John, received intelligence of that great mustered force which the president and the earl had about Shrulc, he was grieved at heart and much troubled in mind at the circumstance, and at once he called to his aid the Burcaidh Iochtaracha (the lower or northern Burkes of Mayo), and the race of Myler Burke; the Clan Donnell galloglasses, and Murrogh of the Battle-axes, the son of Teige, son of Murrogh, son of Roderick O'Flaherty. These having come with all they could possibly muster together of Scots and Irish soldiers, and young warriors, did not halt until they arrived at a hill which was near the camp of the president and the earl, where they consulted among themselves on the best plan to be adopted to attack and put to flight those formidable strong forces which had come thither to attempt to deprive them of their country and estates. They, in the first place, determined on converting their cavalry into foot soldiers, whom they arranged in close and regular order, and they bound themselves to each other not to disperse or break that order whether they were defeated or should conquer; they were also commanded, should son or kinsman of theirs fall before them, not to mind them, but to pass them over at once as if they were unknown enemies; and they marched in that order to meet the other army. As to the president and the earl,

2. The Battle of Shrulc.—The engagement above-mentioned was fought, according to the annalists, near Sruthra now Shrulc, a village in the parish of Shrulc, barony of Kilmaine, county of Mayo, near Headford, on the road from Galway to Westport; the river called Blackwater which runs through the village, separates the counties of Mayo and Galway. The place mentioned under the name of Moy Aoi in the text was a plain so called in Roscommon, and Echtge was the appellation of the mountain now called Slieve Baughta, on the borders of Galway and Clare.

they arranged their artillery, their soldiers, their halberd men, and their men in armour on foot, on the dangerous narrow passes by which they expected the other party would attack them, and they placed alongside of them the Clan Sweeneys, the Clan Donnells, the Clan Dougalls, and all the foot forces in general, while they themselves, with all the brave active cavalry they had, took up their position on the other wing of the army. It was an enterprise of difficulty, and an arduous attempt for the warriors of West and North Connaught to advance against that formidable position. Nevertheless they marched forward, but did not proceed far when they got their sides perforated, and their bodies lacerated, by the first volley of fiery shot discharged at them from the guns, and (of arrows) from the well-formed flexible bows; they, however, took neither fear nor flight, and neither daunted nor disordered by the wounds of those volleys, but advanced with intrepidity directly forward, and tried the full force of their spears, the high temper of their swords, and the weight of their battle-axes on the heads and crests of their antagonists, who did not long withstand the attack, but gave way precipitately and broke their ranks in the rear with an abrupt flight, so that the powerful party who attacked them gained the entire of the ground which they had occupied, and continued cutting down all those before them; and, pursuing the flying party, they pressed closely and hard after the defeated companies for the space of two miles from the camp, along which they cut down and slaughtered great numbers. After Mac William Burke's forces had passed the cavalry which had been drawn up on one side, companies of those cavalry charged the rear of the pursuing party, and cut down a great number of their people, and many more would have been destroyed were it not for the closeness and firmness of their ranks, and the good order in which they had been formed in the beginning of the day; they however returned after having slaughtered, defeated, and conquered their enemies. One thing, however, which they neglected to complete their victory, since they had cleared the field of battle after defeating their enemies, was not to have remained that night in the camp, for had they remained, there would have been no dispute about the fame and renown of having gained a complete victory. As to the president and the earl of Clanrickard, and the Clan of Donal Mac Sweeney, who had not given way to their opponents on that day, they remained with some of their soldiers in the camp that night; they were afterwards engaged in recognising and burying their relatives and friends, and relieving their wounded over the field of battle. On the side of the English a great loss was sustained by the death of Patrick Cusack, and there were also slain on the same side Calvach, the son of Torlogh, son of John Carrach (Mac Donnell), and many others whose names are not recorded. On the other side fell Walter, the son of John, son of Myler Burke, who was generally called Cluas-le-Doininn (or an Ear to the Storm); also Randal, the son of Mac Donnell of the galloglasses; the two sons of John Eireanach, two constables of the Clan Donnells of Scotland, and an immense number both of the Irish and Scots of the Clan Donnells, Mac Sweeneys, and of the adherents of the Burkes, were also slain there. The northern forces who conquered all before them, but who did not, however, keep possession of the field, were persuaded that they had gained the battle, while the lords who remained that night in the camp were of opinion that they were entitled to the fame of having obtained the victory.

The earl of Ormond, namely, Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, marched with a force in the harvest of this year westward across the Suir to Cliu-Mail-Mac-Ughaine,³ in Hy Conaill

3. Cliu Mail Mac Ughaine, signifying Cliu of Mail, the son of Ughaine, was a territory so called from being possessed by Mail, the son of Ughaine More, or Hugony the Great, a monarch of Ireland about three centuries before the Christian era, and who divided Ireland into twenty-five portions amongst his sons; it appears from the text that this territory of Cliu Mail was situated in Hy Conaill Gabhra, which was the ancient name of the district which now forms the baronies of Upper and Lower Connello, in the county of Limerick, and some adjoining parts of Kerry. Ciarraidhe Luachra, signifying Kerry of the Rushes, was the ancient name of a great part of Kerry bordering on Limerick, and appears to have comprised the baronies of Iraghticonnor or O'Connor's country, Clanmaurice, Trughenackmy, Corkaguiney, and Magonihy, and the name is still retained in that part of it called Slieve Logher mountains, in the barony of Trughenackmy. Leamlhain is the river Lein or Lane, which flows out of Lough Lein, one of the Lakes of Killarney, and falls into the bay of Castlemaine, therefore Dun Loich, now Dunloch or Dunloe, was some castle situated near that river; the province of Conrai Mac Daire, or Conry, the son of Daire, was a name applied to one of the ancient provinces or divisions of Munster.

Gabhra, and to Ciarraidhe Luachra, and did not halt until he took and demolished Dunloich (Dunloe or Dunlogh, at the Mac Gillycuddy Reeks), above Leamlhain, in the south of the province of Conry Mac Daire; he took hostages and much booty on that expedition, and returned back by the same rout without battle or opposition, and the reason was that the sons of the earl of Desmond were imprisoned in London, and James Fitzmaurice (or the son of Maurice), was alone of his tribe opposed to the English and the Geraldines, and the entire country was in opposition to him; and another cause why the earl got no opposition was, that he was aided by the queen's forces on that expedition.

A. D. 1571.

Mae Namara, i. e. Teige, the son of Cumeadha, son of Cumara, son of John, the supporter of his own people and friends, and the spoiler and devastator of his enemies, died, and his son John succeeded in his place.

Cusack,¹ i. e. Thomas, the son of John, president of the council of the English in Ireland, and who had been three times viceroy of Ireland, died.

Mac Gorman, i. e. Malachy, the son of Thomas, son of Malachy Duv, the supporter of the poor and of houses of hospitality, died.

James Mac Maurice took Kilmallock,² not so much from a desire of obtaining its wealth and great treasures, although its riches were immense, but because it had always been the place of rendezvous and rallying point of the English and Geraldines against James. The inhabitants, who had gone to sleep happily and soundly in the early part of the night, were roused from their slumbers before sunrise the following morning, by a very fierce attack made by the warlike troops of the Mac Sweeneys and Mac Sheehys, who were in the service of James Mac Maurice. They proceeded to divide among themselves the gold, silver, various riches and precious articles, which the father would not have acknowledged to his heir, or the mother to her daughter on the day before; they were engaged for three days and nights in carrying away every kind of treasure and precious goods, including cups and ornamented goblets, upon their horses and beasts of burden, to the woods and forests of Aharlow, and sent some of them privately to their friends and wives. After having destroyed and demolished its stone and wooden buildings, they set fire to the town and raised a dense dark cloud of thick smoke over it, so that Kilmallock became the receptacle and abode of wolves, in addition to all the misfortunes which had befallen it before that time.

A Saxon president was appointed over the two provinces of Munster in the spring of this year, whose name was sir John Perrott; he had with him a large fleet of ships and vessels, and also commanders and captains; and all the leaders, nobility, lords and chiefs of the country at once joined him. The common soldiers, insurgents, mercenaries, and retained troops of the country joined James (Mac Maurice), although of all his fortresses he had then only Caislean-na-Maingne (Castlemaine in Kerry). The president commanded the men of Munster to come to him with all their forces, bringing at the same time their own provisions to besiege Castlemaine about the following festival of St. John; they accordingly did so, and laid siege to the castle from the festival of St. John to the middle of harvest, but they effected nothing, and did not take the castle that year. The president then marched to Cork and permitted the men of Munster to return to their homes.

A. D. 1571.

1. Sir Thomas Cusack of Cusington and Lismullen in Meath, was lord justice of Ireland, and also Master of the Rolls and lord chancellor, in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward, and Mary.

2. Kilmallock, in Irish Cill Mocallog, and so called from St. Moecallog, who founded a monastery there in the seventh century, is an ancient town in the county of Limerick, which was strongly fortified with earthen ramparts, and surrounded with a stone wall of great strength, and had four lofty gate-way towers; it was one of the principal strongholds of the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, and of the English, in the county of Limerick, and, as above related, taken by surprise by James Mac Maurice, or Fitz-Maurice, as he was commonly called, a nobleman of the family of the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond; on taking the town Fitz-Maurice is stated to have slain the sovereign and several of the principal English inhabitants, in order to prevent its occupation by the lord deputy. The town was partly restored soon after by the encouragement of the lord deputy sir Henry Sydney. Kilmallock, as a strong military station of the English, is connected with various other remarkable events in the reign of Elizabeth, and there are still remaining some extensive ruins of the walls, castles, churches, &c., which show the ancient greatness and importance of this place, sometimes designated the Irish Balbec.

About the festival of St. Patrick in this year sir Edward Fitton, president of the province of Connaught, proclaimed a court to be held for eighteen days' time in the monastery of Ennis, to correct and bring under subjection the Dalcassians and the people of South Connaught. The president proceeded thither with a well disciplined force of cavalry and well armed soldiers, for he remembered the dangerous position in which he had been placed by the Dalcassians the preceding year, and he employed himself for the space of those eighteen days before mentioned, in establishing laws and regulations, and suppressing crimes and lawlessness. The earl of Thomond, namely, Conor, the son of Donogh O'Brien, surrendered to the president his estate and lordship as a reparation for the lawless acts which had been formerly perpetrated against him, and having of his towns in his possession only Ibracken at that time, he also delivered that territory to him, so that the Plain, Bunratty, great Clare, and Clonroad, were in possession of the president on his leaving the country; he also received hostages from all the chiefs of Thomond, which he took to Athlone, and it was no easy matter to enumerate the hundreds of cows that were given to him from Thomond during the two years he remained president over them.

John, the son of Giolla Duv, son of Dermot, who had been the O'Shaughnessey since the death of his father till this year, was deprived of the title and of Gort by his father's brother, namely, Dermot Riavach, the son of Dermot, for he was entitled to it by right of seniority.

A. D. 1572.

The archbishop of Tuam, i.e. Christopher Boidicin (Bodkin) died, and was interred in Galway.

The bishop of Kilfenora, i. e. John Oge, the son of John, son of Auliff O'Niallain, a preacher of the word of God, died, and was interred at Kilfenora.

Margaret, the daughter of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, a woman full of hospitality, integrity, wisdom, piety, purity, and chastity, died.

The lord of Decies, i. e. Maurice, the son of Gerald, son of John, son of Gerald, son of James, son of Gerald, son of the earl (of Desmond), died, and his brother James was appointed his successor.

John (Burke), the son of Thomas, son of Rickard Oge, son of Ulick Roe, son of Ulick of the Wine, was drowned in the river Suck.

Henry O'Craidhen (O'Crean), a wealthy affluent merchant of North Connaught, died.

Owen Roe, the son of Fergal, son of Donal Roe Mac Ward; Maurice Ballach, the son of Perigrine, son of Dermot O'Clery; and Mac Ui Mhoirin, were hanged by the earl of Thomond, namely, Conor, the son of Donogh; the Maurice and Owen before mentioned were learned in history and poetry, and that treacherous act was the cause of satire and maledictions to the earl.

John, the son of Colla, son of Donal, son of Owen Mac Donnell, died.

The president of the province of Connaught, Sir Edward Fitton, proclaimed a court to be held about the festival of St. Patrick, at Galway, of all those who were under the queen's authority, from Limerick to Sligo. At that citation came the earl of Clanrickard, and his sons Ulick and John, with the chiefs of their people; the tribe of Rickard Oge Burke; Mac William Iochtair, namely, John Burke, the son of Oliver, son of John, together with the Burkes, and the Dalcassians and their retinue. After having joined the president at Galway, the two sons of the earl of Clanrickard, Ulick and John, heard some private rumour, on account of which they dreaded the president, and privately fled from the town; when the president was informed of that, he took the chiefs of Clanrickard and imprisoned them in the town, and having arrested the earl, their father, he took him with him to Athlone, and from thence to Dublin, where he left the earl, and he himself returned back to Athlone. When the earl's sons received intelligence of that affair, they called upon the retained soldiers and mercenary forces of the neighbouring districts to come to them without delay; that call was promptly attended to by the Mac Sweeneys of Upper and Lower Connaught, and by the Mac Donnells, the galloglasses, with many hundreds of Scots along with them. Before these were able to assemble at one place, the president took his troops and soldiers with him to Galway, and having brought the ordnance and forces of Galway along with him, he proceeded to Achaidh-nanIubhar,¹ viz.: the town of the sons of Donal O'Flaherty, and it was Murrough of the Battle-axes, the son of Teige O'Flaherty, that induced him to go on that expedition. Having left two of the tribe of Donal O'Flaherty about the castle, the president afterwards half demolished and took the castle, and left all that remained of it in the possession of Murrough of the Battle-axes O'Flaherty; the president afterwards returned to Galway, through Clanrickard and Hy Maine, without opposition or battle, and arrived at Athlone. After the forementioned force had collected from all quarters to the earl's sons, they and Mae William Burke, namely, John, the son of Oliver, bound themselves to co-operate with each other, and the first thing they did after that was to commence demolishing the white-walled towers, and the strong castles of Clanrickard, so that they destroyed the castles of the country from the Shannon to Burren (in Clare) excepting a few. After that they plundered the country between the rivers Suak and Shannon, and the woody districts, and all those who were in alliance or league with the English, as far as the gates of Athlone. The direction they afterwards took was on the right hand along the Shannon eastward, directly to Slieve Baghna-na-dTuath (Slieve Bane mountains, in Rosecommon), and having proceeded over the ferry of Annaly, they burned Athleague (now Lanesborough, partly in Longford and partly in Rosecommon), and continued to burn, devastate, plunder and spoil every town before them, until they went as far as West Meath; of those towns was Mullingar, and from thence they went to the gates of Athlone, and burned all the town from the bridge outwards. From thence they proceeded on the other side to Delvin of Mae Coghlan, (in the King's county), from whence they returned back to Siol Anmeha (in Galway), and they did not leave a chief of a district from Eashtge to Droos (from the borders of Galway and Clare to Bundrowes, in Leitrim), but they compelled to join them in their warfare on that expedition. They demolished the walls of the town of Athenry, its stone houses and castle, and dilapidated the town, so that it was not an easy matter to rebuild it for a long time after. They went a second time into West Connaught, despite of the people of Galway, and the English soldiers whom the president had left to aid in guarding the town, and slew the captain of those Saxon soldiers at the western gate of the town. It was in despite of the O'Flahertys that they had gone on those two occasions to the country, and they had no way to pass to and from it but through Ath-Tire-Hoilein alone, and on each occasion they committed immense depredations and plunders on Murrough O'Flaherty. The earl's sons were thus engaged from the end of spring to the middle of harvest, plundering the merchants and every thing they could belonging to the English, and also to the Irish. The resolution the council of Dublin and the nobles of the English finally came to was, to set the earl at liberty in peace and amity, over his territory and lands, that he might pacify his sons; and he having returned to his country in the harvest of this year, pacified his sons, who disbanded their soldiers after having paid them their stipend and wages. James Mae Maurice, the son of the earl (of Desmond), was along with the sons of the earl of Clanrickard on those expeditions, waiting for the purpose of bringing the Scots with him into the country of the Geraldines, and it is impossible to relate all that James encountered of perils and great dangers, of want of food, and sleep, and with only a few forces and adherents, from the English and Irish of the two provinces of Munster during that year.

The president (Sir John Perrott), of the two provinces of Munster, laid siege to Castlemaine in the summer of this year, and he had with him the forces of the two provinces of Munster, both of the English and Irish, and of the large towns, with their ordnance, powder, and lead. The troops of the entire race of Eogan More (the Mae Carthys, and other chiefs of Desmond), were in that camp, and there were also there Fitzmaurice of Kerry, namely, Thomas, the son of Edmond; the Barrys, and the Roehes. The entire of those forces be-

A. D. 1572.

Aughanure, in Irish Achaidh-na-nIubhar, signifying the field of the yews, and so called from the number of old yew trees formerly there, was the chief fortress of the O'Flahertys, lords of West Connaught, or Connemara, and situated near Oughterard, at Lough Corrib, in Galway, where some remains are still to be seen of this old castle, which was of immense strength and great antiquity.

sieged the castle for the space of three months, and they at length took it, through the want of provisions, and not indeed for want of defence; and it was for the purpose of bringing the Scots to relieve the castle that James Mac Maurice had been along with the sons of the earl (of Clanrickard), as before stated.

A great mortality prevailed this year among men and cattle.

VII. Danish Wars in the tenth century.—In the preceding article an account has been given of the Danes, Norwegians, and Normans, and of the Danish invasions and battles in the eighth and ninth centuries; and in this article is continued, from page 469, an account of the Danish wars in the tenth century. As stated at p. 469, Anlaf II. became Danish king of Dublin, A.D. 892, and was slain shortly after, in a great battle with the men of Ulster in Tirconnell; and A. D. 897 the Northmen were expelled from Dublin by the Irish princes and chiefs of Leinster and Meath, but about A. D. 900, the Northmen again returned to Dublin with a large fleet and powerful forces, and fought a battle with the Lagenians, in which they were defeated with great slaughter.

A.D. 900 the Danes had a fleet on Lough Swilly, and they took the celebrated fortress of Aileach in Donegal, the ancient residence of the Kings of Ulster for many ages.

About A. D. 903, according to the Saga of Snorro, as given in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities, Thorgils and Frotho, sons of Harold Harfager, or Harold the Fair-haired, the famous king of Norway, with a powerful fleet attacked the coasts of Scotland and Ireland, and coming to Dyflinni or Dublin, took that city, where Frotho was put to death by poison, and Thorgils became king of the Northmen of Dublin, over whom he ruled for some years, but was at length slain by the Irish. About A. D. 907, according to the Saga, Aulaf the Fair, a descendant of Harold Harfager and son of Halfdan king of Upland in Sweden, a famous pirate king, came to Ireland, took the city of Dublin, and became ruler of the Northmen, but fell in battle with the Irish, therefore, according to this account, he was Aulaf III. About the same time Eyvinder, another Swedish prince, came to Ireland and married a daughter of Kiarval an Irish king (probably Carroll, who was at that time king of Leinster), and had by her a son named Helge, who was brought up in Ireland and became a famous warrior. About A. D. 905 or 907, according to the British Chronicle quoted by Hanner, p. 176, the Danes came to Ireland with great forces, laid waste a great part of the country, and slew Cormac and Kyrral, Irish kings, but Keating considers that this account is confounded with the battle of Bealach-Mugluna in Leinster, fought about this time between the monarch Flann Sionna and Cormac Mac Cuilleanain, archbishop of Cashel and king of Munster, in which Cormac, and also Carroll, king of Leinster, were slain; but it is probable there might have been Danish auxiliaries in that battle.

A. D. 910 the Northmen came with a great fleet, according to the Four Masters, and landed at Port Lairge or Waterford, and, according to the Annals of Ulster, the place is called Loch-da-Caech, which was the ancient name of the Bay of Waterford. According to Ware and the Annals of Ulster, Baridh or Barredo, the son of Oetir, and Ragnal or Reginald, the son of Ivar, became about A. D. 910, rulers of the Northmen in Dublin, but having contended for the supremacy, they fought A. D. 913 a fierce naval battle at the Isle of Mann, in which the forces of Barredo were totally defeated, and himself slain, and Reginald became Danish king of Dublin. In A. D. 913 and 914, the Northmen are mentioned in the Four Masters as having come twice to Waterford with a great fleet, and laid waste a great part of Leinster and Munster. A. D. 914, according to Ware and others, a great Danish fleet arrived in Dublin under the command of Godfrey Mac Ivar, who attacked the city with great fury, took, and put the garrison to the sword. This fleet probably came from Northumbria, as Godfrey, grandson of Ivar, was then the Norwegian king of Northumbria. A. D. 916 the Danes of Dublin invaded Wales, and devastated the Island of Anglesey and other parts.

Battles of Cinnfuath and Tobar Gletrach.—A. D. 915 the Danes of Dublin plundered and burned the famous monastery of Kildare; and in the same year, according to the Four Masters, or

A. D. 916, according to the Annals of Ulster, Sitric, the grandson of Ivar, with his fleet, was taken at Ceanntuath, in the east of Leinster, which was the name of a promontory apparently on the coast of Wicklow or Dublin, where the Danes had a fortress; Reginald, grandson of Ivar, came with another fleet of Foreigners to the bay of Waterford, but they were slaughtered by the men of Munster. The forces of the northern and southern Hy Niall were led by Niall Glundubh, monarch of Ireland, and having joined the men of Munster to attack the Foreigners, he encamped at Tobar Gletrach, in Magh Femhin, near Clonmel in Tipperary, on the 22nd of August, and the Foreigners came to that place on the same day. The Irish forces attacked them at three o'clock in the afternoon, and a fierce battle was fought, in which the Danes were defeated, and on both sides 1100 men, together with many chiefs, were slain. Fresh battalions rushed from the fortress of the Foreigners to the aid of their people, and the Irish pursued them to the fortress where Reginald, king of the Dubh Ghalls or Danes, was with his forces, and king Niall having attacked them, many of his men were wounded; Niall after that remained twenty nights to the rere of the Fortress against the foreigners. In the same year Sitric, the grandson of Ivar, at the head of the Danish forces, fought a battle at Ceanntuath above mentioned, against the Lagenians, whom he defeated, and 600 of them were slain, together with Ugaire, king of Leinster, and many chiefs, amongst others Maolmora, son of Muiregan, prince of East Liffey; Muirgon, lord of the Three Comans, &c.; and Maolmaedhog, archbishop of Leinster, and abbot of Glen Uisenn, a man celebrated for his wisdom and learning. In A. D. 916 Oitir and Reginald, lords of the Danes of Waterford, invaded Albany or Scotland, and fought a great battle with the Scots, who were aided by the Saxons, and commanded by Constantine, king of Scotland; the Danish forces in four great bodies commanded by Godfrey, grandson of Ivar, Reginald, Oitir, and Gragahan, after a fierce battle were defeated with great slaughter, and Oitir with many other chiefs were slain. In this year the Danes of Dublin devastated Kildare, Leighlin, and other churches of Leinster, and slew many of the monks and clergy.

Battle of Dublin.—In A. D. 917, according to the Four Masters, the Danes of Dublin, and of other parts of Ireland, having collected their forces under the command of Ivar and Sitric Gale, or Sitric the valiant, fought on the 17th of October a great battle with the Irish, near Dublin, in which they gained the victory, and Niall Glundubh, monarch of Ireland, together with a vast number of his forces were slain. King Niall was joined by the princes and chiefs of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, and as there were great forces collected, and the battle long contested with great bravery, it is considered there were five or six thousand men slain on both sides. There fell on the side of the Irish, together with their king Niall, and a vast number of common soldiers, Conor O'Melaghlin, prince of Tara, and heir apparent to the throne of Ireland; Ceallach, son of Fogartach, prince of South Bregia; Hugh, son of Eochagan, king of Ulidia; Maolcraoibhe O'Duibhsionach, prince of Orgiall; Maolcraoibhe, prince of Tortan, and many other chiefs. Several curious verses on this battle, are quoted from the Bards by the Four Masters, in which it is mentioned that it was fought on a Wednesday, and that that direful day was long mournful to the Irish. This great battle was fought at the northern side of Dublin, near the sea shore, probably between Dublin and Clontarf. The following passages have been literally translated from the verses on this battle quoted by the Four Masters, which have also been translated into Latin by Dr. O'Connor.

"Mournful was that day, that direful Wednesday,
When fell the hosts under the feet of the shield bearers,
In the Battle of Dublin, for ever detestable,
Where by wicked men fell the illustrious Niall.

A. D. 1573.

Shrove Sunday, and the festival of St. Bridget (the 1st of February), fell on the same day this

"And Concovar, the hero of noble deeds,
Hugh, the munificent son of Eathach of Ulidia,
Maolnithy, the noble leader of battalions,
With numbers of brave soldiers and valiant warriors.

"The sons of kings and of queens
Did that mournful fight of Dublin destroy,
Guarded were the captives and led in chains,
Miserably dragged along after the army.

"There was none to mourn them on the sea shore,
Lamentable was that Wednesday, a direful day;
Woeful this day, as a sepulchre is Erin,
For the victory gained by the Red King of the Danes.

"The heavens are seen without a sun,
For the plains of Hy-Niall have lost Niall;
There is now no equal strength of warriors,
No peace or joy for the armies.

"No pleasing intercourse of man with man,
Since the lamented chief has fallen;
Mournful is that, O yellow plain of Bregia,
Thou delightful region of prosperity.

"The king of heroes is separated from thee,
And long shall be remembered in song,
Niall the warrior who gave many wounds;
Vanished are the champions of after times."

It is stated that Niall recited the following verse as a war-song the day before the battle:

"He who wishes to see the various-coloured banners,
And the swords of the hosts of heroes,
And the green spears of direful wounds,
Let him repair to Ath Cliath at early morn."

This Niall Glundubh, monarch of Ireland, was a valiant warrior, and head of the Northern Hy-Niall of the race of Eogan, and from him the princes of Tir Eogain or Tyrone took the name of O'Neill.

Battle of Kinnaght.—In A. D. 918, Donogh, monarch of Ireland, successor of Niall Glundubh, collected his forces and fought a great battle at Ciunnachta in Bregia, in Meath, at a place called Tigh Mic Eochaidh, or Mic Nechtain, against the Danes of Dublin, in which a vast number of the Foreigners were slain; and in that battle it is stated the Irish were avenged for the defeat of Dublin, for the Four Masters say there fell as many nobles of the Northmen as had been slain of the chiefs of the Irish at the Battle of Dublin. Many of the Irish chiefs were also slain at Ciannachta, amongst others Murtogh, son of Tiarnan, prince or heir presumptive of Brefney. In this year the stone church of Kells in Meath was demolished by the Danes, and many persons martyred.

In A. D. 919 the Danes of Dublin, under Godfrey, the grandson of Ivar, settled in Dublin, and Armagh was laid waste by his forces on the Saturday before the festival of St. Martin, but he spared the churches, the Culdees, and the sick; he devastated the country as far as Inis Labhradh, in the east, as far as the river Bann, and to the north as far as Magh Uilsen, but the Ultonians under Murtogh, prince of Ulster, son of king Niall Glundubh, defeated the Foreigners, and slew a vast number of them, and the remnant escaped through the darkness of the night. In the same year Olbho, a chief of the Danes, had a fleet of forty ships on Lough Foyle, and plundered Inisowen; Fergal, prince of Focbla, attacked them, killed the crew of one vessel, which he destroyed, and carried off its spoils and treasures. The Danes, with another fleet of 20 ships, came to Ceann Maghair, a cape in the east of Tirconnell, year; the Annunciation happened after Easter, and the Ascension in Spring, which was considered by all persons to be extraordinary.

under the command of Uathmaran, the son of Barith. In this year the Danes plundered Ferns of St. Moeg, in Wexford, and various other churches in Leinster. In A. D. 920 the Danes of Limerick, commanded by the son of Ailgi, came with a fleet on the Shannon as far as Athlone and Lough Ree, laid waste and plundered Clonmacnois, and all the islands of the lake, and carried off immense spoils of gold, silver, and precious articles. In the same year the Danes laid waste the islands of Fothart, and slew 1200 of the Irish, and Abel, a scribe, was martyred by them. In A. D. 921, according to Ware, Reginald, son of Ivar, king of the Northmen, died at Dublin, and was succeeded by the above mentioned Godfrey, who plundered Armagh; this is Godfrey II., Danish king of Dublin, and he was also king over the Danes of Northumberland, as hereafter shown. In A. D. 922 the Danes had a large fleet on Lough Erne, and laid waste the islands and peninsulas of the lake and the country on all sides, and they remained on the lake until the summer following. In the same year the Danes had a fleet on Lough Cuan, now Strangford Lough, in the county of Down, and they slew Maolduin, heir presumptive to the kingdom of Ulster; the Four Masters record in the same year that 1200 of the Danes of Lough Cuan were drowned in Lough Ruidh-re, probably Lough Ree on the Shannon. At this time contentions arose between the Danes of Dublin and of Limerick, and Godfrey led his forces from Dublin, but an immense number of them were slain by the Danes of Limerick, under the son of Ailgi. In the same year Colla, the son of Barith, lord of the Danes of Limerick, came with a fleet to Lough Ree, and plundered the country. A. D. 924 the Danes of Lough Cuan took the fortress of Dunseverick near the Giant's Causeway, and great numbers were slain and many made prisoners.

Battle of Cuan Cruimther.—In A. D. 924 the Danes of Dublin and Ulster were defeated on Thursday, the 28th of December, in a great battle at the bridge of Cuan Cruimther, by the Ultonians under Murtogh Mac Neill, prince of Aileach, in which 800 of them were slain, together with Albdann or Halfdan, the son of Godfrey; Aufer; Roilt or Rolf, and other chiefs. In the same year the Foreigners were defeated at the Bay of Belfast, by Murtogh Mac Neill, who cut off the heads of 200 of them. About the same time it is mentioned that another force of the Danes, who were stationed at Ath Cruithne, or the Ford of the Picts in Ulster, were nearly cut off by famine, till Godfrey, lord of the Danes of Dublin, came to their relief.

A. D. 925 Sitric II., grandson of Ivar, lord of the Dubh Ghaill and Fionn Ghaill, that is, of the Danes and Norwegians of Dublin, died, and Godfrey, with his Danish forces, left Dublin and went beyond the sea, but returned in six months, and in the same year it is stated that the Danes of Linn Duibhaill, that is, of Magheralinn, in the county of Down, left Ireland. In A. D. 926, Kildare was laid waste by the Danes of Waterford, under the son of Godfrey, and he carried off many captives and great spoils. In A. D. 927 Loch Oirbsen, now Lough Corrib in Galway, was taken possession of by the Danes of Limerick, who with a great fleet plundered the adjoining country, and in the same year Kildare was laid waste by Godfrey on the festival of St. Bridget. In A. D. 928 Godfrey, grandson of Ivar, with the Danes of Dublin, took and plundered the abbey of Ferns, and slew one thousand people. The Danes of Lough Corrib were slaughtered by the Conacians, and in the same year the Danes, commanded by Torolbh, took possession of Lough Neagh, and fixed their camp at Rubha Meia. Accolb, Earl of the Danes, with a great multitude of his men, were slain in Leinster by the people of Hy Kinsellagh. A. D. 929 the Danes of Limerick were defeated at Lough Ree. Godfrey went to Ossory to expel the grandson of Ivar. About this time Faolan, king of Leinster, and his son Lorean, were taken prisoners by the Danes of Dublin. A. D. 930 Torolbh, an earl of the Danes, was defeated and slain by Murtogh Mac Neill and the men of Dalaradia.

Battles of Mucknoe and of Lough Neagh.—In A. D. 931, Conang, the son of king Niall Glundubh, having entered into an Mac Ailin, i. e. Gillespy, the son of Gillespy, the most humane of the Gael in Scotland, died.

Magrath, i. e. William, the son of Aengus, the chief professor of the Dalcassians in poetry, a man eminently learned in arts and skilled in husbandry, died.

Donogh Riavach, the son of Teige O'Kelly, died.

A Saxon earl, namely, the earl of Essex, came alliance with the Danes of Ulster, defeated the Ultonians in a great battle at Ruha, near Lough Neagh, in which upwards of 1000 of them were slain. In the same year Arinagh was laid waste about the festival of St. Martin, by Aulaf, the son of Godfrey, and the Danes of Strangford Lough, and the Danes also took possession of Lough Erne, and plundered and laid waste the country and churches as far as Loch Gamhna or Lough Gawna, on the borders of Cavan and Longford. Matbadan, prince of Ulidia, having joined the Danes under Aulaf, son of Godfrey, they laid waste and plundered the province of Ulster as far as Slieve Beatha to the west, and Mucnamha to the east, that is, Slieve Beagha mountain and Mucknoe, both in the county of Monaghan, but they were pursued by Murtoigh Mac Neill, prince of Aileach, who gained a great victory over them, and carried off 200 of their heads, together with many captives and great booty; and it is stated in the Annals of Ulster that 1200 of the Danes and their allies were slain.

The Danes of Waterford and Limerick.—In the ninth and tenth centuries the Danes and Norwegians are mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters, Innisfallen, and Ulster, as having frequently arrived with great fleets and powerful forces at Loch-da-Chaoch in Desies, now the Bay of Waterford, and fought many fierce battles with the Irish in various parts of Munster, of which accounts have been given in the preceding parts of these articles, from the years 800 to 900. The Danes and Norwegians held the cities of Waterford and Limerick, and likewise Cork and Wexford, as well as Dublin, from the ninth century down to the English invasion, towards the latter end of the twelfth century, and were ruled over by their own lords and chiefs, sometimes called kings and Iarls. In A. D. 853, as before stated, Sitric, a Norwegian chief, planted a colony of Northmen in Waterford, and became their king. This place was called by the Irish Port Láirge, but the Danes and Norwegians gave it the name Vedra-Fiord, which, according to some, signified the Port or Harbour of the Father, being so called in honour of Odin, their god and father, or, according to Johnstone, the name was derived from the Danish Vedr, a storm, and Fiord, a harbour, hence signifying the Port or Harbour of storms; and from Vedra-Fiord came the English name Waterford. Several kings of the Northmen of Waterford are mentioned in the Irish Annals and by Ware. In A. D. 893 Patrick, son of Ivar, king of the Northmen of Waterford, was slain. In A. D. 914 the Northmen landed at Waterford, but were defeated with great slaughter by the prince of Idrone. In 915 the Danes of Waterford plundered and burned the famous abbey and city of Lismore, marched into Meath, and laid waste the country. From the year 915 to 930, Reginald, son of Ivar, Sitric and Oittir, are frequently mentioned as lords of the Northmen in Waterford. In A. D. 1000, Ivar, the Danish king of Waterford, died, and was succeeded by his son Reginald, who in A. D. 1003 erected the strong stone fortress called Reginald's Tower, which is still standing, and known by the name of Ring Tower; Reginald died in 1020, and was succeeded by his brother Sitric, who in 1023 was killed by the people of Ossory; and in A. D. 1036 Reginald is mentioned as his successor, and he was slain at Dublin by Sitric, Danish king of that city. In A. D. 1038 Commanus, son of Raban, king of the Danes of Waterford, was slain, and the city was burned by Dermot Mae Maol-na-inBo, king of Leinster, and in the same year the Danes of Dublin marched to Waterford, which they plundered and burned. In A. D. 1089 the Danes of Dublin, Waterford, Wexford, and Wicklow, with their combined forces, marched to attack Cork, but were defeated by the Irish with great slaughter. An account of the battles of the Danes of Cork, Waterford, and Wexford, with the English under Strongbow and his followers, is hereafter given.

In Limerick, the Northmen, as before stated, settled, in A. D. 853, a colony under Ivar, brother of Sitric, the Danish king of Waterford, and Aulaf, another of these Norwegian princes, who was brother of Ivar and Sitric, settled a colony in Dublin. The Northmen for more than two hundred years ruled over Limerick, and many of their lords and leaders are mentioned in the course of these articles, in the accounts of the various battles. From about A. D. 900 to 950 Tomar, and other Iarls of the Danes of Limerick, are frequently mentioned. From A. D. 920 to about A. D. 930, Keating, O'Halloran, and others, mention Tomar, lord of the Danes of Limerick, as having a fleet on the Shannon, and plundering the adjoining parts of Munster and Connaught, and proceeding as far as Athlone and Lough Ree in Meath, plundering the abbies and churches, as Clonmacnois, Clonfert, &c., and carrying off great spoils of gold, silver, and precious articles; and Keating mentions that the Danes of Limerick were defeated about this time by the people of Connaught, and many of their forces slaughtered, together with Harold, son of Ivar, lord of the Danes of Limerick. In A. D. 931, according to the Four Masters, a chief of the Danes of Limerick, who was called Aulaf Cenn Carrach, defeated the chiefs of Hy Maine in Galway, with great slaughter; and in A. D. 932 the Danes of Limerick devastated Connaught as far as Moylurg in Roscommon; and in A. D. 934 Aulaf Cenn Carrach again ravaged the country, and came from Lough Erne across Brefne, and as far as Lough Ree on the Shannon, and laid waste the country on Christmas night, and he remained for the space of seven months spoiling and plundering Magh Aoi in Roscommon, and other parts of Connaught. In A. D. 935 Aulaf, the son of Godfrey, lord of the Danes of Dublin, came with his forces to Lough Ree, and carried off captive Aulaf Cenn Carrach, and the Danes who were with him, and destroyed their ships. In a subsequent part of this article an account is given of various battles fought with the Danes of Limerick, Waterford, and Cork, and great victories gained over them by the celebrated Ceallachan, king of Cashel, and Brian Boru.

In A. D. 932 Godfrey II., Danish king of Dublin, died; he is called in the Annals of Ulster the most cruel king of the Northmen; he was succeeded by his son Aulaf, who was Aulaf IV. In A. D. 934 Clonmacnois was devastated by the Danes of Dublin, and again in the same year plundered by Ceallachan, king of Cashel, and in the same year Donogh, monarch of Ireland, attacked the Danes of Dublin and burned the city, and in A. D. 935 the Danes of Dublin, under Aulaf, left their fortress and went to England, but Aulaf returned to Dublin in 936 with fresh forces, as hereafter mentioned.

The Battle of Brunanburgh.—An account of the Danes and Norwegians who conquered Northumbria, and other parts of England, in the ninth century, is given in Speed's Annals, and Turner's Anglo-Saxons, and in the article on Northumberland in the Penny Cyclopaedia. In A. D. 867 Hingvar or Ivar, Huhba, and Halfdan, men of incredible strength, says Speed, and who were sons of the famous Ragnar Lodbrog, king of Denmark, of whom an account has been given at p. 460 to 462, invaded England with a great fleet and powerful forces of Danes and Norwegians, and having slain in battle at York, Osbert and Ella, the Saxon kings of Northumbria, together with an immense number of the Anglo-Saxons, they became masters of the country. The ancient kingdom of Northumbria, in the time of the Heptarchy, according to Speed and others, contained the provinces of Deira and Bernicia, and comprised the territories which now form the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Durham. Hingvar and Hubba also conquered parts of Mereia in the present county of Nottingham; their extensive possessions in the north of England were termed the Danelagh, and Halfdan became their first king, and divided these great territories amongst his followers. On the death of Halfdan, A. D. 883, Godred, or, according to others, Gormo, succeeded as king, and after him Eric, who about A. D. 902 was slain in battle by the in the harvest of this year to preside over the province of Ulster, and went to reside at Carrickfergus and in Clannaboy. Bryan, the son of Felim

Saxon king Edward the Elder. Soon after another invasion of the Northmen took place under Reginald, Sitrie, and Niel or Nigel, the two latter being sons of Iingvar or Ivar; they defeated the Northumbrians and Scots, and seized the kingdom of Northumbria. Nigel was killed by his brother Sitrie, who became very powerful, and married the sister of Athelstan, king of England; and this Sitrie also became Danish king of Dublin, and his death is recorded at A.D. 925 in the Four Masters. On the death of Sitrie, his son Godefrid or Godfrey succeeded, but was defeated and expelled from Northumbria by Athelstan; this Godfrey became Danish king of Dublin as before mentioned, and on his death A. D. 932, was succeeded by his son Aulaf, as Danish king of Dublin; he is called in the Saga Olaf Raudi, or Aulaf the Red, and stated to have been born in Ireland; he was a warrior of great strength and valour, and married a daughter of Constantine, king of Scotland; he ruled not only over Dublin, but extended his power over the Orkneys, the Hebrides, and Isle of Mann, and was styled king of Ireland and the Isles. Aulaf determined to make an attempt to recover the kingdom of Northumbria, collected all the Danish forces he could in Ireland, and was joined by a great number of Irish kerns as auxiliaries; he sailed from Dublin with all his ships, and having collected many other vessels from the Scottish isles, he entered the Humber in Northumberland with a mighty fleet, consisting of no less than 615 ships, according to Turner and others. Aulaf was joined in Northumbria by all the Danes and Norwegians in England, and by many of the British princes of Wales and Cumbria, and likewise by the Scots under his father-in-law, king Constantine. Athelstan, king of England, mustered a powerful army of the Anglo-Saxons, commanded by himself in person, his brother Edmond, and many famous champions. An account of the various celebrated chiefs who fought at Brunanburgh, is given by Turner, and in the Icelandic Saga, and amongst others is mentioned a famous Norwegian warrior named Thorolf, who fought on the side of Athelstan; he was a man of immense strength and gigantic stature, and his spear is thus described in the Saga:—He held in his hand a spear, the iron head of which was two cubits in length (more than three feet), terminated in a four-sided sharp point flattened on both sides; the shank which entered the handle was long and thick, and the shaft, to the length of a cubit above the shank, was of great thickness and covered with iron; the shaft or handle was ten feet long, making the entire spear about fourteen feet in length, and this formidable weapon was called Brinhuarar, that is, the Piercer of Coats of Mail. Aulaf the day before the battle made the exceeding bold experiment of entering the camp of Athelstan, disguised as a harper, and played before the king in the royal tent; he laid a plan of surprising the English camp that night, and would have succeeded had not the intention been accidentally discovered soon after his departure, in consequence of his having been seen, when beyond the precincts of the camp, indignantly throwing away the gold he had received from king Athelstan, for his musical performance, and this circumstance having led to the discovery, the English were guarded against a surprise. Both armies encountered at a place called Brunan-Burgh, signifying the Town of the Fountains in Northumbria, and fought one of the most tremendous battles recorded in those ages. Milton in his History of Britain calls it "the bloodiest fight that ever this Island saw." After a furious and long contested conflict, and the most heroic valour displayed by the champions on both sides, Aulaf and his allies were at length vanquished with prodigious slaughter, and he fled to his ships in the Humber with a small remnant of his forces; five kings and twelve earls are recorded to have fallen on the side of Aulaf, and king Constantine narrowly escaped with his life, and fled with a few followers to Scotland. There were at least one hundred thousand men engaged in that battle, and on both sides there were not less than fifty thousand slain. There is a difference of chronology as to the time of this battle; Turner and Thierry place it in the year 934, but it was fought A. D. 937, according to various other

Bacach O'Neill, of Codhnach, ruled over Trian Congail and Clannaboy at that time, and many depredations and conflicts took place between authorities. This battle is mentioned in the Annals of Ulster at A. D. 936, in which it is stated, that a terrible, lamentable, and horrible war was fiercely carried on between the Saxons and Northmen, in which unnumbered thousands of the Northmen fell, and king Aulaf with a few escaped; and on the other side an immense multitude of the Saxons were slain, but king Athelstan gained a great victory. There is an ancient poem on the battle of Brunanburgh in the Saxon chronicle, and a version of it in Danish and Latin, is given in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities, from which it has been literally translated as follows:—

"Athelstan the king, of earth the lord,
The giver of collars to the brave,
And his brother Edmond Etheling,
A lasting glory won in battle
By the edges of swords at Brunanburgh.

"The wall of shields they cleaved,
And hewed the warriors' banners;
As for the sons of Edward, to them
It was natural from their ancestors,
Often in the field against every foe,
To defend their land, their treasure, and homes.

"Pursuing, they destroyed the Scottish people (the Irish and Scots),
And their fleet of ships while the slaughtered fell;
The field resounded with the strife of warriors,
From the rising of the sun in morning hour,
Till the noble creature hastened to her setting,
The greatest star rejoicing above the earth,
The candle of God, the Eternal Lord.

"There lay many mighty chiefs,
The strong Northmen were cut down,
Pierced with darts over their shields,
And the Scots were weary of the red battle.

"The race of the Western Saxons
In chosen bands, laid prostrate
Their hated foes throughout the long day,
Nor did the Mercians fear the strife of arms.

"Then was there no safety for the warriors
Who came with Aulaf across the sea,
And o'er the ocean's bosom sought the land,
To mingle their might in this fatal conflict.

"On the field of battle pierced with wounds,
Fell five kings, commanders of heroes,
With seven of Aulaf's valiant earls,
And of the Scottish seamen, a countless number.

"There the dreaded leader of the Northmen
Was put to flight, and few his followers;
The mournful king wept as he returned
O'er the deep waves with the remnant of his warriors.

"Constantine of the North amongst his kinsmen
Did not exult at the shock of battle,
For there his friends and kindred fell,
O'erwhelmed in the strife of fierce contest.

"There did he leave his valiant son,
Mangled with wounds on the field of slaughter,
Nor could the yellow-haired race, dauntless in war,
Glory in the fortune of that day's fight.

Bryan and the earl, until the following festival of St. Patrick.

Murrogh, the son of Dermod, son of Murrogh

"Neither could Aulaf, the brave in battle,
And old in war, or his surviving heroes,
Boast that they who commanded there
Had victory won on that fatal field.

"The fierce blows and piercing of weapons,
And the councils of their chiefs they rue by turns,
And they long lamented they had dared to contend
On the field of war with the sons of Edward.

"The mournful remnant of the Northmen
Fled in their ships o'er the sounding sea,
With Aulaf their king in sorrow,
And o'er the deep ocean returned to Dyflin (Dublin).

"Then did the two valiant brothers,
Athelstan the king, and Etheling,
Return to the land of the West Saxons,
And left behind the bewailers of battle.

"On the field the black ravens feed,
With pointed beaks on the carcasses of foes,
The croaking toad, and hungry eagle,
The kite, and wild wolf of the woods.

"Never had there been in this island
A greater slaughter, or more men destroyed,
Before this time by the edges of swords,
As recorded in the books of the old sages ;

"Since the Angles and Saxons came from the East
Over the broad waves and conquered the Britons,
The mighty artificers of war,
The earls excelling in valour,
Subdued the people and obtained the land."

In A. D. 936 after the return of Aulaf, and the remnant of his forces to Dublin, from the battle of Brunanburgh, they again commenced their depredations, and laid waste Kilcullen in Kildare, and carried off, according to the Four Masters, one thousand captives, but soon after Donogh, monarch of Ireland, in conjunction with Murtogh Mac Neill, assembled their forces and attacked the Danes of Dublin, and afterwards spoiled and laid waste all their possessions from Dublin to Ath-Tristan, or the Ford of Tristan, which was situated on the river Greese near Athly, in Kildare. In A. D. 937 or 939, the Danes took the fortress of Aileach, the celebrated residence of the kings of Ulster, and having made Murtogh Mac Neill prince of Aileach, prisoner, they carried him off to their ships on Lough Swilly, but he soon after made his escape from them, to the great joy of the Irish. In the same year the Danes under Aulaf, son of Godfrey, left Dublin, through the miracles of God and St. Mactalius, who was an ancient bishop of Kilcullen in the sixth century, and was a patron saint of Dublin. In A. D. 938 Blacar, son of Godfrey, and brother of Aulaf, came to Dublin, and was king over the Danes there until A. D. 943, when he was driven from Dublin by his brother Aulaf, who returned from England, but Aulaf dying soon after, was again succeeded by Blacar. In A. D. 937 Ceallachan, king of Cashel, with the men of Munster and Danish auxiliaries from Waterford, plundered Meath and carried off great spoils and many captives. In A. D. 938 Harold, grandson of Ivar, and son of Sitric, lord of the Danes of Limerick, was defeated and slain in Connaught, by the chiefs of Aidhne in Galway.

Battle of Moy Cisi.—In A. D. 939 the Danes of Dublin were defeated by the men of Offaley, commanded by Amergin their prince, and by the people of Kinel Fiachain Westmeath, in a great battle at Magh Cisi, in which 1000 of the Foreigners with many of their chiefs were slain. In A. D. 940, according to the Annals of Ulster, Downpatrick was devastated by the Danes, which was avenged by God and St. Patrick, as other Foreigners came from beyond the sea, and expelled them, and their commander the son of Reginald, was soon after slain. In the same year Blacar and the Danes of Dublin plundered Clonmacnois, Kildare, and other churches.

O'Brien, was slain by Ulick Burke, the son of Rickard, son of Ulick of the Heads, aided by O'Shaughnessey, namely, Dermod Riavach, the

The Battle of Ardee.—The Danes of Dublin, under Blacar their king, fought a great battle with the Irish of Ulster, commanded by Muirheartach Mac Neill, in which, after great slaughter on both sides, the Ultonians were defeated, and Muirheartach himself was slain. This battle was fought, according to the Four Masters, in A. D. 941, but according to the Annals of Ulster, A. D. 943, which is considered the correct chronology, and the day of the battle was Sunday the 4th of March. The place mentioned as the scene of this battle, according to the Annals of Ulster, was Glassliathain near Clan Cain of the men of Ross, now Clonkeen, a few miles north of Ardee, in the county of Louth, towards Carrickmacross, on the borders of Monaghan. Some verses to the following effect from one of the bards, are quoted on the death of Muirheartach, by the Four Masters :

"From hence vengeance and death shall prevail
Against the race of Conn for ever,
Since the lamented Murkertach has fallen,
The Gael henceforth shall continue orphans."

This Murkertach Mac Neill was so called being son of the valiant king Niall Glundubh, who, as already stated, was slain at A. D. 917, in a great battle with the Danes of Dublin. Murkertach or Murtogh Mac Neill, was Righ-Damhna or heir apparent to the throne of Ireland; he resided at the ancient palace of Aileach in Donegal, and was generally styled prince of Aileach. The heroic Murkertach was distinguished for military abilities, and one of the most renowned warriors Ireland has produced; he was designated Muircertach-na-gCochall-geroicenn, signifying Murtogh of the leathern Cloaks or Jackets, from his having invented a particular kind of leathern coverings for his soldiers, which partly served as armour. He kept up a hattalion of those warriors perfectly disciplined, and at the head of twelve hundred of them, he, in A. D. 941, set out from his fortress of Aileach, made a circuit of Ireland, and compelled all the provincial kings and princes to do him homage and deliver hostages as Roy-Damna or heir apparent to the throne, being the successor elect of Donogh, the then reigning monarch. During his tour Murkertach marched to Dublin, and took with him as a hostage Sitric, a Danish lord of great note, who is called by the Irish writers Sitric-na-Sead, that is, Sitric the Wealthy, and was son of Sitric, the former Danish king of Dublin. Murkertach proceeded to Leinster and took with him as an hostage Lorcan, king of that province; from thence he marched to Munster, made Ceallachan, king of Cashel, prisoner, put a fetter on him, and conveyed him away; proceeding thence to Connaught, Concovar, the son of Teige, king of that province, came to him, and having made his submission no fetter was put on him. With all these captive princes Murkertach returned to Aileach, and they were for nine months feasting there, and he then sent those hostages to the monarch Donogh, who then reigned at Tara. Murkertach, as mentioned in the previous part of this article, fought many fierce battles with the Danish forces during a period of more than twenty years, and gained many great victories over them; and he is designated by the Four Masters as the "Hector of Western Europe." The character of this renowned warrior, equally distinguished for his valour and patriotism, is thus eloquently drawn in the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor:—"His character lies entombed in the history of a people hardly inquired after in our time. He had as great a genius for war as any man that this island has perhaps ever produced. The endowments of his heart were still greater; of all enemies he was the most generous, of all commanders the most affable. Elevated, beneson of Dermot, son of William, son of John Buighe, and it was by the hand of O'Shaughnessey he was slain; Gort was taken from O'Shaughnessey by John Burke, in revenge of the death of his brother.

volent, and captivating, he was unhappily taken off at a time when his character put him in possession of a power which probably would have relieved his country from bondage." Cormacan Eigeas, or Cormacan the Learned, who was chief poet of the north of Ireland, and the particular friend and follower of Muircertach, and who died A. D. 948, and is mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at A. D. 941, composed a poem on the tour of Muircertach, which is preserved in the Leabhar Gabhala, or Book of Invasions of the O'Clerys, an excellent copy of which is in the library of Sir William Betham, who has kindly lent it to the translator of these Annals for the purpose of making extracts. The poem commences thus:

"A Mhulreheartaigh mhic Neill nair, Ro ghabhais giallu Innsi Fail."

"O Murkertach, son of valiant Niall, Thou hast taken the hostages of Innsi Fail."

Faolan, king of Leinster, another celebrated champion distinguished in the battles against the Danes, is mentioned at this time by the Four Masters, and his death recorded at A. D. 940, in some verses quoted from one of the bards, of which the following is a translation:

"Faolan the terrific, dreaded in war,
Whose mighty voice extinguished the din of battle,
The warlike chieftain of Cualan (Wicklow),
The heroic king of Leinster was slain;
The strong hand of the Heremonians of Erin,
The champion who conquered the Danish battalions,
A light that shone like the morning star,
Was the valiant warrior Faolan."

In A. D. 941 (or 943), the day after Murkertach was slain at the battle of Ardee, Armagh was devastated by the Danes under Blacar, but in the same year Roderick O'Canannan, prince of Tircennell, gained a victory over the Danes of Lough Foyle, and in this year also Lorean, the son of Faolan, king of Leinster, was slain by the Northmen after he had laid waste Dublin, and gained a victory over them in the beginning, for which he is greatly celebrated in verses quoted by the Four Masters.

Battle in Dublin.—In A. D. 942 Congalach, who was afterwards monarch of Ireland, with Brann, son of Maolmorda, king of Leinster, and Cenlloch, son of Faolan, Roydamna of Leinster, led their forces to Dublin, took its houses, its granaries, ships, and fortifications, all of which they burned, and carried off its women, sons, and common people captives; its warriors and soldiers were slain, its youths dispersed through the cities and fortresses of Ireland; many of its people were wounded, some of them were drowned, others burned or made captives, and only a small portion escaped in a few ships, who went to Delganny in Wicklow, where it appears the Danes had a stronghold. There are verses quoted by the Four Masters on this battle, from which the following passage is translated:

"Dublin of the Swords was destroyed,
With many of its shield-bearing champions;
The men of Tomar were made to tremble,
And vanquished in the western world.
Victor in that battle was Brann of Carman,
The invincible champion of Almain,
And by the king of Leinster of the spears
They were discomfited with slaughter;
Valiant in the defence was Congalach,
The warrior of Bregia of great victories."

Carman is considered to have been Mullaghmast, and Almain, Allen, both in Kildare.

In A. D. 943, the Danes of Lough Neagh were defeated with great slaughter, and their fleet destroyed, by Donall O'Neill, the son of Murkertach Mac Neill above-mentioned. This Donal was

James Mac Maurice carried on war and conflict with the English this year, until a treaty of peace was ratified between him and the president of the two provinces of Munster, precisely in Spring; grandson of king Niall Glundubh, and was himself afterwards monarch of Ireland; and the first of the northern Ily Niall who took the name of O'Neill. In this year Blacar, king of the Danes, was expelled from Dublin, and his brother Aulaf ruled there after him.

Ceallachan, King of Cashel, of the race of the Eugenians of Desmond, flourished at this time, and makes a remarkable figure in the history of Munster for a period of more than twenty years, from about A. D. 930, to his death in 954; he was a famous warrior, and an account of his exploits is given in Keating, O'Halloran, and the Annals of Innisfallen; he fought many battles with the Danes of Waterford, Limerick, and Cork, and gained many great victories over them, but in his contentions with the other provincial kings he frequently fought in alliance with the Foreigners against his countrymen.

Battle in Desies.—In A. D. 941, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, the Danes of Waterford and their allies were defeated in two battles at Desies in Waterford, and Ferns in Wexford, by the men of Munster, under Ceallachan of Cashel, and 2000 of the Foreigners were slain. In A. D. 943 the Danes of Limerick, having encamped at Cloch Beathach, in Ossory, now Rathbeagh in Kilkenny, plundered Ferns a second time.

Battle of Roscrea.—About A. D. 942, according to Keating and O'Halloran, was fought a great battle with the Danes at Roscrea. A great annual fair was in those times held at Roscrea, in Ormond or Tipperary, which commenced on the festival of St. Peter and Paul, and continued fourteen days; it was attended by merchants from all parts of Ireland, and even from foreign countries. The Danes of Limerick, whose chief at that time was Tomar, together with those of Waterford, and also the Danes of Connaught, formed the project of attacking and plundering the merchants and people at this fair, and of seizing the vast quantities of merchandise and treasure collected there. Olfinn, chief of the Danes of Connaught, was their principal leader, and marched his men secretly as possible, in detached parties, through Galway towards the Shannon, where embarking in their boats they crossed the river in great numbers, and were joined by the Danish forces of Limerick and Waterford. On their assembling in Ormond, an alarm was communicated by the Irish throughout the entire country, by lighting fires on the hills; and having collected all their forces, and being joined by the people at the fair, they armed themselves as well as possible, and having assailed the Danes with great fury on all sides, after a fierce and sanguinary conflict the Danish forces were totally defeated, and four thousand of them were slain, together with their general Olfinn, and many other chiefs.

Battle of Singland.—About A. D. 943, according to O'Halloran and others, the Danish forces of Limerick and Waterford were defeated by the men of Munster, under the command of Ceallachan, king of Cashel, and about two thousand of them slain in a great battle at Saincangal, now Singland, near Limerick. Aulaf, chief of the Danes, had his skull cloven through his iron helmet by Ceallachan himself, with a single blow of his battle-axe; the chiefs under Ceallachan acted with equal valour; O'Sullivan killed in single combat, and cut off the head of Moran, son of the king of Denmark; O'Keefe ran his spear through the body of Magnus, the Danish standard bearer, and Lochlin, another Danish champion, was slain in single combat by O'Riordan. About this period, according to Keating, O'Halloran, and others, Ceallachan of Cashel defeated the Danes in many other battles, and he is stated on one occasion to have presented at Cashel to O'Keefe, one of his principal champions, 100 helmets, 100 swords, 100 shields, and 100 captives, as a reward for his valour in various battles.

Battle of Dundalk.—An account has been given at p. 173, in the note on Desmond, of the battles fought at Armagh and Dundalk, A. D. 944, against the Danish forces under Sitric, who had by treachery taken Ceallachan, king of Cashel, prisoner at Dublin, having proposed to give him his sister in marriage. The chiefs of the Eugenians of Desmond, and of the Dalcassians of Thomond, and it happened, through the miracles of God and the intercession of James, that the earl of Desmond, namely, Gerald, the son of James, son of John, and having collected the Munster forces, marched to Ulster for the rescue of Ceallachan, who was kept prisoner at Armagh, then in possession of the Danes. The Munster chieftains defeated the Danish forces with great slaughter, and took from them the city of Armagh; the Munster chiefs having at the same time fitted out a great fleet to attack that of the Danes which was stationed at Dundalk, having Ceallachan a prisoner on board, a terrific sea-fight took place between them in the bay of Dundalk, in which, after a slaughter of about two thousand men on both sides, the Danish forces were at length vanquished, and Ceallachan was liberated and led in triumph to Cashel by his valiant countrymen. Sitric, commander-in-chief of the Danes, and his brothers Tor and Magnus, with many other chiefs were slain, and many of the bravest of the Irish chieftains likewise fell in this fierce conflict. A full and curious account of this expedition for the rescue of Ceallachan is given in an ancient Irish MS. entitled Torruigheachd Cheallachain Chaisil, that is, the Pursuit for the rescue of Ceallachan Cashel, a valuable copy of which is in the library of Sir William Betham, and also another copy in the possession of Mr. Geraghty, the publisher of these Annals.

In A.D. 945, Ceallachan king of Cashel, and his son Donogh, proceeded to Clonfert in Galway, and plundered the Danes. In A.D. 946 also, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, Tomar, earl of the Danes, came to Limerick, from which he proceeded to Inis Cealltrach, an island on the Shannon, the churches of which he burned, and also those of Muic-Inis and Clonmacnois, the islands of Lough Ree, and other parts on the Shannon, and proceeded from thence to Meath, which he plundered from one end to the other. In A.D. 950 Godfrey, son of Sitric, proceeded with a fleet from Waterford, and took hostages from the people of Desmond, as far as Ros-Ailithre, now Rosscarbery, in Cork. In A.D. 951, according to Innisfallen, Godfrey, son of Sitric, was slain, together with 500 of his forces, in Desies, by the Dalcassians and Eugenians. In A.D. 953 Clonmacnois was plundered by the Danes of Limerick, aided by the men of Munster.

Battles at Slane and Dublin.—In A.D. 944, according to the Four Masters, Clonmacnois, and the churches of Meath, with Killeen in Kildare, were laid waste by the Danes of Dublin, and by Aulaf Cuaran. In A.D. 945, Roderick O'Canannan, prince of Tircconnell, with the forces of Ulster, marched to Meath, where he was joined by the monarch Congalach, and some Danish auxiliaries, under Aulaf Cuaran, and they fought a great battle at Slane against the Danes of Dublin, great numbers of whom were slain, and many others drowned in the Boyne; on the side of the Irish fell, in the thick of battle, Scolaigh O'Aedhagain, lord of Dartry; Garbith, prince of Hy Crimthain; and Hugh O'Rourke, the son of Tiarnan, prince of Brefney. In the same year, Dublin was plundered by king Congalach. In A.D. 946, a great battle was fought at Dublin, by Congalach, monarch of Ireland, with the forces of Meath and Ulster, against the Danes of Dublin, commanded by Blacar, son of Godfrey their king, in which the Danish forces were defeated, and 1600 of them, together with Blacar himself, were slain. Some verses, to the following effect, on this battle, are quoted by the Four Masters:

"On Thursday, Congalach, the leader of heroes,
At Dublin illustrious was the warrior;
He avenged the death of the sons of noble clans,
And with points of darts destroyed the Danes."

In the same year, the Danes led their forces to Druimrath and burned its Dertech, a term applied to an ecclesiastical building, and 150 in it; this place is now called Drumrany, in Westmeath, where there was a celebrated monastery founded in the sixth century, in honour of St. Enan.

Battle of Muinebrocain.—In A.D. 948, the Cloitchech, that is, the Belfry, or otherwise the Round Tower of Slane, which was at the time full of relics and religious people, was burned by the Danes of Dublin; Caoinchair, a learned lecturer of Slane, who his brother, John, who had been in imprisonment in London for six years previously, were liberated by permission of the English council, and they ar-was called Probus by the Latin writers, and who wrote a Life of St. Patrick, was burned to death in the Belfry on that occasion, and amongst the relics was the crozier of the patron saint (St. Ercus), and a bell superior to all others. In the same year the Danes of Dublin, and other parts of Ireland, collected immense forces, and marched into Meath under Godfrey, the son of Sitric, Ivar, and other leaders; Roderick O'Canannan, prince of Tircconnell, at the head of the Irish of Ulster, and the men of Meath, advanced to attack them, and both armies having met on the festival of St. Andrew the Apostle, namely, the 30th of November, fought a terrific battle, in which, according to the Four Masters, the Danish forces were totally defeated, and six thousand of their bravest warriors were slain, with many others of inferior note, but towards the end of the conflict the valiant O'Canannan himself was slain in the thick of battle. Amongst the Danish chiefs fell Ivar, tanist of the Danes, and Godfrey, with the few survivors, fled to Dublin. This celebrated chieftain Roderick O'Canannan, who gained this splendid victory over the Danish forces, was one of the heirs presumptive to the throne of Ireland, and of the same race as the O'Donnells, princes of Tircconnell; and, according to Charles O'Connor, he was one of the most distinguished men of that age for abilities and valour. The place where this battle was fought was situated in some part of Meath, and is supposed by some to have been near Ardbraccan. In A.D. 949, the Danes of Dublin, under Godfrey, son of Sitric, plundered Kells, Donogh Patrick, Ardbraccan, Tulain, now Dulane, Disert Ciarain, and Killscire or Kilskeyre, all places near Kells, together with many other churches in Meath, but they particularly devastated Kells, and carried off from thence more than three thousand persons captives, and took besides abundant spoils of gold, silver, many relics, and various other riches and precious articles. In this year a great plague, flux, and famine, prevailed amongst the Danes of Dublin.

On the death of Athelstan, king of England, A.D. 941, Aulaf of Brunanburgh, the Danish king of Dublin, again invaded England with powerful forces, defeated king Edmond, and recovered the dominion of Northumbria; on the death of Aulaf, A.D. 943, another Aulaf his cousin, and Reginald his brother, became rulers of the Danes of Northumbria; Eric and Gormo are mentioned as succeeding kings, but in A.D. 960, Edred, king of England, recovered Northumbria from the Danes, which was however again conquered in the beginning of the eleventh century by Sweyn and Canute, kings of Denmark. On the death of Aulaf IV., A.D. 943, he was succeeded as Danish king of Dublin, by his cousin, Sitric III., who was slain in the great sea fight at Dundalk, A.D. 944, as before mentioned, and Blacar, brother of Aulaf, again resumed the government of Dublin, but was slain A.D. 946, as above stated, and he was succeeded as Danish king of Dublin by Godfrey III., son of Sitric III.; and this Godfrey, according to O'Flaherty's Ogygia, in the article on Constantine, king of Scotland, was grandson of Gormo, the Danish king of Northumberland. According to the Annals of Innisfallen, Godfrey III. was slain A.D. 951, in a battle in Desies with the Eugenians and Dalcassians, and he was succeeded by his son Aulaf V.

Conversion of the Danes.—The Northmen, or Danes and Norwegians in Ireland, continued Pagans until this time, worshipped idols, and offered sacrifices to their gods Odin and Thor, but in the time of Godfrey III. the Danes of Ireland became partly converted to the Christian faith, about A.D. 948 or 950, according to Ware and others; and according to the Annals of Innisfallen, at A.D. 948, the Danes of Dublin were converted, and received baptism. According to Ware, the monastery of the Blessed Virgin Mary in Dublin, afterwards called Mary's-abbey, was founded at this time by the Danes for Benedictine monks; in the eleventh century, as hereafter shown, Christ Church in Dublin was founded by the Danes, and there were many Danish bishops in Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick.

About A.D. 950, according to the History of Denmark by Meursius, two famous warriors, Harold and Knut, sons of Gormo rived in the harbour of Dublin. The earl was afterwards taken and put under arrest in the town, and John was permitted to visit the fair plains of Munster, and see after his patrimony, and all those that lived of his followers.

The president of the two provinces of Munster (sir John Perrott), went to England in the beginning of the ensuing harvest, after having pacified and subdued the country, and leaving officers, counsellors, and captains of his own, to rule and preside over it, in accordance with his own wishes; the departure of the president was lamented by the poor, the widows, the infirm and indigent of the country. The earl of Desmond, after that, having found an opportunity, made his escape without the permission of the council, about the festival of St. Martin following, and without their knowledge or notice, and travelled in three nights from Dublin, accompanied by a few, until he arrived in the very midst of the Geraldines; the victorious chief who had then arrived among them was welcomed, and although accompanied only by a few, it was not long after until he had hundreds at his command, and caused a great commotion in the country; in the course of one month after he expelled the English forces and hired soldiers who were in possession of the fortresses and chief towns of the men of Munster, for at that time the president and his Saxons possessed Kenry (in Limerick), with its castles, Baile na-Martra (Castle Martyr in Cork), and Castlemaine (in Kerry); all those places and their garrisons were taken by the earl, and he did not leave a resident chief of any town in the country, from the Meeting of the Three Waters to Bealach Conglais (from the confluence of the Suir, Nore and Barrow, at Waterford, to near Cork), and from Bealach Conglais to Limerick, that he did not bring under subjection, and place under the controul of his soldiers and officers in that one month. He proclaimed to the clergy and professional men the restoration of their privileges, and replaced the ecclesiastical orders in their respective places, according to the Pope's law, as had been customary.

An intestine commotion arose amongst the Dalcassians, and those on the one side in that contention were Donal, the son of Conor O'Brien, and Teige, the son of Murrogh O'Brien; and on the other side were the sons of Donogh O'Brien, namely, the earl and Torlogh; but the earl himself was not in the country on that occasion. A dispute arose between Teige, the son of Conor, and Teige, the son of Murrogh, who were 'till then united in aiding Donal, the son of Conor, against the sons of Donogh, so that they separated; and the cause of that dissension was through Teige, the son of Conor, who went and joined his enemies, namely, the sons of Donogh O'Brien, against his brother Donal, the son of Conor, and Teige, the son of Murrogh, and the people of Upper Thomond. Teige, the son of Conor, after that, to revenge his anger on Teige, the son of Murrogh, collected soldiers and insurgent galloglasses of the Geraldines from beyond the Shannon, and took them with him to aid the sons of Donogh O'Brien, who had along with them great numbers of the Butlers, and of the Mac Sweeneys of the country, namely, of the tribe of Donal, the son of John Mac Sweeney, and also the forces of the earl commanded by his brother Torlogh, the son of Donogh. The place where the entire of that army met together was at

III., king of Denmark, invaded England and Ireland with great forces; they besieged Dublin, and Knut was killed by the cast of a dart, but Harold, having taken the city, remained in it for some time; he afterwards became king of Denmark. About A.D. 952, according to the Saga, Eric king of Norway, a great warrior, ravaged the Orkneys, Hebrides, Isle of Mann, and coasts of Ireland, but was slain in battle with the English. About A.D. 956, according to the Saga, Trygva, king of Norway, invaded Scotland and Ireland, and he is thus mentioned by one of the Skalds:

"The warrior who dyed his sword with blood,
The breaker of strong shields in battle;
The valiant king who came in his ships,
And fought in night with Ireland's heroes."

Olaf or Aulaf, son of Trygva, king of Norway, also a famous warrior, is stated in the Saga to have ravaged the coasts of France, England, Scotland, and Ireland, and he is thus described by an Icelandic bard:

"The prince whose name struck terror
Into the valiant warriors of the islands,
Emulous of glory, and of Erin's conquest."

He came to Dublin, and was married to Gyda, sister or daughter of Aulaf Quaran, a Danish prince, and it is stated that he was converted to the Christian faith, and resided a long time in Ireland. This Aulaf Quaran is often mentioned about this period by the Irish writers under the name of Aulaf Cuaran, and he appears to have been a chief of note, and to have been often in alliance with the Irish against the Danes of Dublin. In A.D. 950, the Irish annalists mention a great victory gained by the Danes against the men of Albany, or Scots, the Britons and Saxons. In A.D. 951 Clonmacnois was ravaged by the Danes of Limerick and the men of Munster, and in the same year Aulaf Cuaran laid waste Inis Doimhle, and the islands of Ulster. In A.D. 952, Donal O'Neill, together with the Danes, plundered Bregia.

Ard-na-gCabog, where the river Fergus (in Clare), falls into the sea ; and they afterwards, to revenge their animosity on South Thomond, marched through the east of Hy Cormaic, and through the borders of Hy Fearmaic (both districts in the south of Clare). The plundering, and continued cry and wailing of the defenceless, warned the people of their progress in every place through which they passed ; they afterwards proceeded by the stone road (or causeway) of Currofin, and by the gate of Inehiquin and Bothar-na-Mac-Righ (the Road of the King's sons), and some of their people took garments and property out of Kill-Inghine-Baoith (Kilneboy in Clare), and the violation of the church of the female saint was not an omen of success or victory for the Dalcassians. They afterwards proceeded in a north-western direction through the wilds of Corcomroe and Burren, and having sent out predatory parties through the country, they collected all the booty of the territory to one place before night, and they then encamped, which however was not a place of repose on account of the crying and wailing of women and widows lamenting the loss of their plundered properties. When Donal, the son of Conor O'Brien, and Teige, the son of Murrough O'Brien, received intelligence that this great force had passed by, they collected all the forces they could muster on the moment, and they encountered at Carn-Mic-Tail (probably Carne, in the parish of Kilcorney, county of Clare). Those who accompanied them thither were the sons of Edmond Mac Sheehy, who had come three nights previously from beyond the Shannon with a select body of galloglasses ; a company of young men of the tribe of Giolla Duv, the son of Conor, son of Donogh, son of Donal of the Victories Mac Sweeny, and also Ulick, the son of Rickard Saxanach, the son of Ulick, son of Rickard Burke, who had come the day before to visit his kinsman Teige, the son of Murrough O'Brien. Having then come to an unanimous resolution to pursue the forces, Donal, the son of Conor O'Brien, began to excite them to act bravely, and thus addressed them : "My brave people, I have learned from sages and historians that it is not by a large army or host that victory is gained, and of the success of a battle there are no better authorities ; these people have committed too great excesses and crimes against us, viz., to attack us in our own

dear country, and have preyed and plundered our people ; moreover, though numerous those are, they are only a mixed army composed of persons from various quarters, who would as quickly fly as they have marched hither, should they have an opportunity of escaping with their lives from the field in which we are to fight." That exciting speech delivered by Donal made the desired impression on his people, and they promised him that they would all make it a fraternal cause against their enemies, and they determined on sending persons to view and reconnoitre the camp that night. Teige, the son of Conor O'Brien, and Torlogh, the son of Donogh O'Brien, with their forces, remained attentive and watchful beside their camp that night, till day break the following morning, and at the rising of the sun they marched forward to Slieve-na-Groidheadh, and by the left hand of Bel-Atha-an-Ghobhann, and the forces of the country were at the same time marching slowly along side of them, for the purpose of encountering them, and both armies having respectively exhibited their broad-extended banners, they proceeded to the Fearsad (ford) of Kill Mainehin (Killnamaheen, near Ennistymon, county of Clare), exactly at Beolan-Chip. Teige, the son of Murrough, and the forces in general, began to rebuke Donal O'Brien for the length of time they were without engaging with the other army, for they had marched in a parallel direction with each other from Baile-Atha-an-Gobhann to this place. Teige, the son of Conor, and Torlogh O'Brien, proceeded with their forces to the top of the hill of Beolan-Chip, in the best position as appeared to them for fighting ; the other forces and the people of the country were pursuing them up the high rugged slope before them as quickly as they could possibly go, and before they came within fighting distance the constables of Teige and Torlogh became alarmed, terrified, startled, unsteady, wavering, and began to give way, and at once took to flight ; the other party pursued, discomfited, cut them down, and slaughtered them in twenties and thirties, in twos and threes, from that place to Beinn-for-Mala. It was not in the same direction that those parties fled, for the horsemen proceeded to the right along the sea westward, while the foot went directly in a south eastern direction. Both parties, however, were hotly pursued, and the cavalry threw away their baggage from their horses as quickly as they could, and Torlogh O'Brien, with twelve horsemen of his body-guard, made their escape by their efforts, and the fleetness of their horses, and others of his people were wounded and taken prisoners, amongst whom were Teige, the son of Conor O'Brien, and his son Torlogh, for they remained on the hill in expectation that their people would rally round them; some of the earl's own people, who were supposed would get no quarters, were taken prisoners, and many others were slain; clamorous were the crows, birds of prey, fowls of the air, and the wolves of the forest, over the bodies of brave men, being the result of the slaughter of that day. South Thomond was the better for a long time after that of all they had left of prisoners, horses, accoutrements, arms, and ordnance, and also of their own cows and cattle on that day.

Maurice O'Clery, namely, the son of Giolla Riavach, i. e. the O'Clery, a man distinguished in history and general literature, a man of respect and great affluence, died in Muintir Eoluis, and was buried at Fenagh of Moyrein (in Leitrim), in the church of St. Caillin.

A. D. 1574.

Con, the son of Calvach, son of Manus O'Donnell, was treacherously taken prisoner by the earl of Essex, in the earl's own camp, and was afterwards sent to Dublin.

The earl of Desmond continued to plunder and harass his enemies in the spring of this year, and he defeated Mac Carthy More, namely, Donal, the son of Donal, son of Cormac Ladhrach, and the son of Fingin, namely, Donogh, the son of Donal, son of Fingin, was slain by the earl's people, and his death was the cause of lamentation in Desmond; they also slew a young constable of the chiefs of Clan Sweeney, viz., of the Clan of Donogh Baeach, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh, son of Owen, son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, and many other chiefs besides.

It happened that the son of the earl of Desmond, namely, John, the son of James, found an opportunity of taking a well fortified castle of the district of Clonmel, called Doire-an-Lair, which he garrisoned with some of his own trusty people, as guards. When this intelligence reached the lord justice of Ireland, sir William Fitzwilliam, and the earl of Ormond, namely, Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, the taking of that castle renewed their recent and old animosities against the sons of the earl of Desmond, and they commanded the men of Meath and of Bregia, the Butlers, and the English settlers in general, to march and completely ravage Leth Mogha (Leinster and Munster). They did not halt until they pitched their tents and booths about Derry-an-Lair, which they finally took, and all its guards were beheaded by the lord justice. His people and allies were at this time so much forsaking the earl of Desmond, that he came to the resolution of waiting on the lord justice, and submit to him, and he was compelled to surrender to him the castles of Castlemaine, Dungarvan, and Kenry, and all depredations committed between them were forgiven by both parties.

An amicable treaty of peace was concluded between Bryan, the son of Felim Bacach O'Neill, and the earl of Essex, and Bryan after that gave an invitation to a feast, and amongst those invited was the lord justice (sir William Fitzwilliam), and the nobles of his people, where they enjoyed themselves together in mirth and cheerfulness for the space of three days and three nights. At the termination of that time, while drinking and carousing agreeably together, Bryan, with his brother and wife, were taken prisoners by the earl; and all his people, without reserve, men, women, sons, and daughters, were put to the sword in his presence. Bryan, with his wife and brother, were sent to Dublin, where they were cut into quarters, and this was the result of their entertainment. That monstrous massacre, and detestable and treacherous misdeed, which were perpetrated on the lord of Clannaboy O'Neill, chief and senior of the race of Eogan, the son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, and of the greater portion of the Gael of Ireland, excepting a few, was a sufficient cause of abomination and disgust to the Irish people.¹

The sons of the earl of Clanrickard, namely,

A. D. 1574.

1. The O'Neills of Clannaboy.—An account of the O'Neills, lords of Clannaboy, a great branch of the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone, and the territories possessed by them, has been given at pp. 21, 441, in the notes on Ulster, where it has been shown that they possessed extensive districts in the counties of Down and Antrim,

William and John, having broken their faith, and disregarded their affinity towards each other, John Burke engaged in his service a great number of Scots and Irish mercenary soldiers. The earl of Ormond afterwards obtained protection for him, and he delivered hostages to the earl as a security of his allegiance to the queen.

A shower of hail stones fell on the Kalends of May in this year, which was so extraordinary and uncommon, that there were many persons in Ireland who never witnessed such a shower, and there were many others whose strong built family residences were swept away by it. The corn crops which had been sown three months, or half a year previous to that time, were left bare without stalk or blade, and the same shower left soft blue lumps, as large as the hail stones that fell, on the legs of those who were struck by them.

The son of Teige, son of Teige O'Rourke, was slain by some of the people of Brefney, on the plain of Dromahaire.

A. D. 1575.

Roderick, the son of Hugh, i. e. the O'Donnell, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv O'Donnell, namely, North and South Clannaboy: the North comprising the baronies of Belfast, Massareen, Antrim, and Upper Toome, in the county of Antrim; and South Clannaboy containing the baronies of Ardes, Castlereagh, Kinealarty, and Lecale, in the county of Down; and many celebrated chiefs of the O'Neills of Clannaboy have been mentioned in the course of these Annals. Bryan O'Neill, above mentioned in the text, lord of Clannaboy, was possessed of the greater part of the property of his ancestors, and, according to Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana (p. 341), had immense flocks, no less than thirty thousand cows, besides great numbers of other cattle, horses, sheep, &c. According to Cox, queen Elizabeth in 1573, gave a grant to Walter Devereux, earl of Essex, of the moiety of the seignories of Clannaboy in Down and Antrim, with part of the Glins and Routes in Antrim, and the queen herself was to hold the other moiety. The earl was obliged by indenture to go thither with 200 horse and 400 foot, and that every horseman volunteer who served gratis for two years was to have 400 acres of land, and a foot soldier 200 acres, at two pence an acre quit rent. The earl was to have building timber free from the woods of Killulltagh, was to be captain-general for seven years, and was to plant a thousand English inhabitants on his territory. Essex landed with his forces at Carrickfergus in August, 1573, and was appointed governor of Ulster, and earl marshal of Ireland; he was accompanied by the lords Dacre and Rich, sir Henry Knowles, three sons of lord Norris, and many other Englishmen of note. The lord deputy Fitzwilliam becoming jealous of the high authority of Essex, would only consent to his becoming governor of Ulster. Essex on his arrival with his forces was at first kindly received by Bryan Mac Felim O'Neill, lord of Clannaboy, but on learning the object of his arrival to plant a colony in his territory, and deprive him of his hereditary lands, he joined the standard of Torlogh Lynogh O'Neill, against the English, and the forces of Essex encountered much opposition from the O'Neills, O'Donnells, and others, but he succeeded in taking the castle of Lifford from Conn O'Donnell.

was slain in a contention at Donegal, by Cahir, the son of John, son of Tuathal O'Gallagher, which he much regretted.

Great heat and extreme drought happened in the summer of this year, so that there was not rain for one hour, either by day or night, from May to Lammas (August). In consequence of this drought loathsome diseases and afflicting maladies, namely a plague, were generated in an excessive degree amongst the English and Irish in Dublin, in Naas of Leinster, Ardee, Mullingar, and Athboy. Many a castle between those places was left without a guard, many a flock without a shepherd, and many bodies, even of the nobility, were left unburied, through the effects of that distemper.

A new lord justice, namely, sir Henry Sydney, came to Ireland in the harvest precisely, and he landed first in the province of Ulster, and found all Ireland in one wave of war and commotion; he established peace, union, and friendship between the Tirconnallians and Tyronians, and throughout the province of Ulster, as it was amongst them he first landed, and that lord justice expelled to England the earl of Essex, who had invaded Ulster, and acted treacherously towards Con, the son of

After some time, as stated by the Four Masters, O'Neill invited the earl of Essex to an entertainment, though it is erroneously stated by other writers that Essex invited O'Neill. According to Curry in his History of the Civil Wars, and Leland in his History of Ireland, after O'Neill and Essex at this entertainment had made good cheer together for three days and nights, O'Neill, with his wife and brother, were suddenly seized by the earl's order, his friends were slaughtered before his face, nor were the women and children spared; O'Neill himself, with his brother and wife, were sent prisoners to Dublin, where they were cut in quarters. Leland, in his Reign of Elizabeth, relates the affair exactly in the same manner, and says—"This execution produced universal discontent and horror." The earl of Essex unable to settle his colony, soon after went to England for fresh forces, and in 1576 as mentioned in those Annals, made a second expedition to Ulster but failed, and was forced to retire to Dublin, where he soon after died, it was supposed by poison, through the contrivance of Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester, who, two days after the earl's death, married his widow, the countess of Essex. The English family of Savage, long before the reign of Elizabeth, settled in the county of Down, and got extensive possessions in Ardes and Lecale, and some of them were styled the lords Savage of the Ardes. In the reign of Elizabeth, sir Thomas Smyth, an Englishman, and his son Thomas Smyth, got large grants of lands, and attempted to plant a colony in the Ardes and Clannaboy, but after several conflicts with the O'Neills, and the warlike clan of the Mac Gilmores, Smyth and his followers were slain, after they had expended ten thousand pounds in the expedition. In the reign of James I., the territory of Clannaboy was seized by the crown, and part was restored to Conn O'Neill, a descendant of the old proprietors, but a great part of Clannaboy soon after passed, as shown in Lodge's Peerage, into the hands of the Scotch family named Montgomery, who became earls of Mount Alexander, and in after times there were no families of any note of the great O'Neills of Clannaboy.

Calvach (O'Donnell), and Bryan, the son of Felim Baeach (O'Neill).

Con, the son of Calvach O'Donnell, and Con, the son of Niall Oge O'Neill, who had been imprisoned in Dublin, effected their escape at the time the lord justice came to Ireland; and Con O'Donnell remained concealed in the wilds and recesses of his own country, until the lord justice sent him a pardon. The lord justice afterwards went, in the beginning of winter, through Moy Breagh (Bregia), and Meath, and from thence to the tributary territories of Leinster, and he made peace between the English and Irish of Ormond and Meath, and the race of Rossa Failge (the O'Conors, &c., of Offaley), and the clans of Conall Cearnach (the O'Moores, &c., of Leix); he then proceeded direct south-west to Waterford, Youghal, and Cork, about Christmas, and destroyed and beheaded a vast number of insurgents, and bad subjects, in all the countries through which he passed.

An intestine commotion arose amongst the O'Briens this year; the sons of Conor O'Brien, and the sons of Murrough O'Brien, were engaged on the one side in this contention, and the sons of Donogh on the other side, namely, the earl, and Torlogh, and Tuath-na-mBuile, and Tuath-na-Fearna (in Thomond), were plundered and entirely burned in one night's depredation, including cattle, corn, and dwellings, on all, both lay and ecclesiastical lands, by that earl.

James Mac Maurice, the son of John, son of the earl (of Desmond), with his wife and family, went to France in the spring, through fear of the English, after the earl and John had made peace with the English.

Hugh, the son of Boetius Mac Clancy (in Thomond), a professional lecturer in laws and poetry, a buyer of wine, and one of the most upright Brehons of a territory in Ireland, died.

A. D. 1576.

Mac Carthy Riavach, i. e. Donogh, the son of Donal, son of Fingin, died, and his death was the cause of lamentation to the clans, of sadness to the tribes, and of sorrow to the landed proprietors of his own country; a man who yielded obedience to his seniors, but who did not submit to his juniors; he was interred in the burying place of his father and grandfather, at Tigh-Molaga (Timoleage in Cork), and his brother, Owen Mac Carthy, was appointed his successor.

Anthony, the son of Hugh O'Dempsey, was treacherously slain in his own town at Cluain-nan-Gamhan (Cloneygowen, barony of Philipstown, King's county).

Colla, the son of Giolla Duv, son of Conor, son of Donogh, son of Donal of the Victories, son of Owen, son of John-na-Lathaidhe Mac Sweeney, a man of success in fight and conflict, and who kept a house of hospitality, and was a constable of the Dalcassians, died.

Boetius Oge, the son of Boetius, son of Murrough Mac Clancy, chief professor of Brehonism to the Dalcassians (in Thomond), and a man who kept an open house for general hospitality, died.

William Oge Mac-an-Ward, the son of Cormac, chief professor in poetry to O'Donnell, a superintendent of schools, a man eminent in literature and general knowledge, the sustaining and supporting pillar of students and men of learning, died at Dromore, on the 22nd of February.

Torlogh, the son of Tuathal Balbh O'Gallagher, a distinguished man of his clan, was slain by the Conacians on the 16th of November.

The daughter of O'Boyle, namely Judith junior, the daughter of Torlogh, son of Niall, was drowned on St. James' day, while learning to swim, in the river of Srath Buighe (in Donegal).

John Modarda, the son of Mac Sweeney of Bagnagh, died on Easter Day, a young man whose death was the most lamented of any of his tribe at that time.

Conor Oge, the son of Donogh Maguire, and a number of the chiefs of Ferlurg (in Fermanagh), were slain at Truagh (in Monaghan).

Donal, the son of Dermot, son of Malachy Mac Gorman (either in Carlow or Clare), died in the spring, and he was the most distinguished man of rank, by fame and report, for manual action and for hospitality, of any of his tribe in his time.

The great monastery of Cavan, and the entire of Cavan itself, from the great castle downwards to the river, were burned by the daughter of Thomas (O'Reilly), the son of the baron, through jealousy; and there was not so much destroyed in any of the Irish towns as there had been there.

Great depredations were committed by Bryan O'Rourke this year in Annaly (county of Longford).

The lord justice before-mentioned, Sir Henry Sydney, and he was a knight by title, nobility, action, and valour, came about the festival of St. Bridget from Cork to Limerick, and was accompanied by the nobles of Munster, both English and Irish, and on the other side was attended there by the Dalcassians in his retinue. He made peace between the inhabitants of the two provinces of Munster on that occasion, and abolished and suppressed the custom of keeping poets and literary men, public festivals, kerns, Buannadha (called Bonaghts, or retained soldiers), and their leaders; he then took his departure from the people of Munster, and brought the O'Briens to escort him to Galway, where the chiefs of South Connaught waited on him, namely the earl of Clanrickard, with his two sons, Ulick and John; Mac William Iochtair, namely, John, the son of Oliver, son of John, and Murrough of the Battle-axes, the son of Teige, son of Murrough, son of Roderick O'Flaherty, and the O'Kellys, with their retinues. The result of that convention at Galway was to hold the Dalcassians responsible in making restitutions to those who demanded such from them, except alone Donal O'Brien, whom the lord justice selected for his own service (as high sheriff), over the county of Clare, to govern it, which Donal did by executing vicious malefactors, bad characters, and rebels, so that no one thought it necessary to watch their cattle or close their doors while Donal was in office. The lord justice, after establishing peace among all persons wherever he visited throughout Ireland, came to Dublin, and brought with him the sons of the earl of Clanrickard as prisoners, for all they had destroyed on the queen's people, while demanding the release of their father before that time. After the lord justice had arrived in Dublin with these prisoners, he was seized with a strong feeling of kindness in his heart, and he permitted those prisoners respectively, namely, the O'Briens and Burkes, as an alleviation to their minds, to go and visit their friends in the neighbouring territories, but not to pass the boundary into their own country until, at some future period, he might permit them to do so; they promised him they would act accordingly, but when the sons of the earl of Clanrickard arrived on the borders of their country they disregarded their promise and entered their estate, and some assert that it was by the permission of their father that they did so. It was shortly after when this journey proved to be a source of sorrow to his country, for the lord justice about five nights afterwards went in pursuit of them to Athlone, and their father, the earl of Clanrickard, was compelled to surrender to him the town of Loughrea, and all his estate, lands, and possessions, stone buildings, and castles, and he himself was taken prisoner in the name of the queen; after that the earl was conveyed to Dublin, and was confined in a narrow cell, where he could hear the voice of neither friend nor companion. The lord justice left a number of captains in Clanrickard, who, as well as the sons of the earl, began to plunder and completely spoil the country between them, so that entire territory was a hundred times over disturbed and devastated between them on that occasion. Vast numbers of both English and Irish were slaughtered, and an immense deal of cattle, of flocks, and of clothing, changed owners during the autumn and winter of this year. The wilds and recesses, the coarse boggy mountains, and the dense wooded hills, were the portion of the earl's sons of their own estate at that time; and the chief fortified family residences of the territory, and the bright-sided beautiful hills of the country, were abandoned by them. Edmond Mac William Burke of Castlebar also joined in alliance the earl's sons, the consequence of which was that the lord justice took Castlebar from him, and expelled himself, his wife, and family into Clanrickard.

The earl of Essex, who had been expelled in the previous year by the lord justice, Sir Henry Sydney, came back as governor over the province of Ulster this year, and landed in Dublin, where, in a fortnight after, being taken suddenly ill, he died; his shirt and heart were sent to his friends in confirmation of his death.

A new president, namely, William Drury, was appointed over the two provinces of Munster this year, and Thomond being separated from the province of Connaught, was added to that of Munster. The president took a circuit of all the great towns of Munster, to confirm laws and regulations; he destroyed malefactors and robbers, and he put to death Barrett (of Cork), and two noble distinguished young constables of the tribe of Maolmurry (Mac Sweeney), the son of Donogh, son of Torlogh, namely, the son of Murrogh, son of Maolmurry, and the son of Donal, son of Maolmurry; from thence he proceeded to Limerick, and hanged a number of the chiefs and of the common people of the O'Briens, and many others besides.

James Mac Maurice was in France this year.

Roderick Oge, the son of Roderick, son of Conal O'Moore (of Leix), and Conor, the son of Cormac, son of Bryan O'Conor (of Offaly), with their wood kerns, were in opposition to the English at this time, and all those that were living of the race of Rossa Failge, and of Conall Cearnaach, were in alliance with them, and shortly after these people assembled in turbulent hundreds, and they burned and completely destroyed great portions of Leinster, of Meath, and of Fine-Gall (either Fingall, or the English settlements).

A. D. 1577.

Conor, the son of Bryan, son of Owen, son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, son of Tiarnan More O'Rourke, a man young in age, but old in hospitality and feats of arms, died.

O'Kane, i. e. Aibhne, the son of Cumaghe, son of Roderick of the Routes, was drowned in the Bann; and Roderick, the son of Manus, son of Donogh, was appointed his successor.

Meva, the daughter of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, who was first married to Mac Gille Eoain (Mac John), of Scotland, and secondly to Donal Cleirach O'Kane, a woman who enjoyed this world in happiness, prosperity, and affluence, and was highly distinguished in fame and excellence, in hospitality, and elegant manners, and who spent a long time in piety at Donegal, died, after performing many virtuous deeds, in the 87th year of her age.

Dudley, the son of Niall Oge Mac Sweeney, of the Mac Sweeneyes of Banagh, was slain at the Babhdhun Maol, by Donal Oge, the son of Maolmurry; and that Dudley was a man distinguished for noble deeds, for personal figure, good manual action, and hospitality.

Donal, the son of Sorley Buighe, the son of Alexander, son of John Cathanach, son of Mac Donnell, was slain by O'Neill.

Onora, the daughter of James Mac Maurice, son of Thomas, son of the earl (of Desmond), who was the wife of Pierce Butler, the son of James, son of Edmond, son of Pierce, died.

The son of Bryan Carrach Mac Cormac was slain by O'Neill's forces.

Torlogh Mac Anabaidh O'Dwyer (of Tipperary), an ingenious, intelligent man, died, and was greatly lamented in his own country.

Mac Gorman, i. e. Thomas Oge, the son of Thomas, son of Malachy Duv (in Carlow or Clare), died, and his kinsman John was appointed in his place.

Alexander, the son of Calvach, son of Torlogh, son of John Carrach (Mac Donnell) was slain in a combat by the son of Theobald Buighe Mac Jennings, in the gateway of Galway; and very few of the sons of galloglasses in Ireland at that time were more opulent, bonntiful, and generous than he.

Teige, the son of Murrogh, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, died, although it was not supposed he would have died upon his pillow as he did, having been so frequently engaged in hard contested conflicts and dangerous passes, as a heroic warrior, a champion in bravery, a bear in activity, and unsubdued in valour.

William, the son of Donal Riavach, son of Teige Duv O'Kelly, died in Dublin, while on a visit with captain Malby, and no man of his age in Hy Maine was more lamented.

O'Callaghan (of Cork, see note on Desmond), i. e. Donogh, the son of Teige Roe, son of Anthony, son of Cahir, died, and Ceallachan, the son of Conor, son of Donogh, was nominated the O'Callaghan.

A monstrous and abominable treachery was committed by the English of Leinster and Meath, on all those of the people of Offaley and Leix who were in their alliance, and who had remained under their protection, which happened in the following manner: They were all invited to attend, together with as many as they could possibly bring with them, at the great Rath of Mullach Maistean¹, and after they had come to that place, four ranks

A. D. 1577.

The Massacre of Mullaghmast.—The passage above translated on this subject is as follows, in the Irish of the Four Masters:—

“ Feall ugrhranna adhuatlimhar do dhenamh la Gallaibh Laighean, agus Midhe ar an meid baoi ina rann fein, agus ro an for a nionchaibh do Uibh Failghe, agus do Laoighis. Ba hamlaidh do ronnadh ind sin. Ro togairmeadh iad uile dia ttaisbenadh eus an lion as lia no caomhsadaois do thabhairt leo go Raith mhoir Mhul-of foot soldiers and of cavalry forces completely closed round them, who began to slaughter them indiscriminately, killing them and completely cutting them off, so that not one of them to tell the tale escaped from thence alive.

John, the son of James, son of John, son of the laigh Mhaistean agus iar rochtain doibh gus an maighlin sin, Ro hiahdadh ceithri sreatha ina nuir timeall ina ccuairt do saigh-diuribh, agus do mharcshluagh, agus ro gabhadh oca ndiubhracadh gan dicheall, oca mudhucchadh, agus oca mor mharbhlughadh cona tearna sceolanga, na claitheach ass a mbeathaidh diobh."

The place called Mullaghmast is situated in the parish of Narragmore, partly in the baronies of Kilkea, Narragh, and Rheban, in the county of Kildare, within about a mile of the town of Ballymore, and four or five miles from Athy. The Hill of Mullaghmast is large, and of considerable height, commanding an extensive prospect of the surrounding country; on its summit is situated a circular earthen rampart, very large and high, comprising in the interior an area of about two acres. This Rath was a strong fortress, and the residence of some of the kings or chiefs of Leinster, in remote times, and according to Seward and other topographers, it was a place of assembly for the conventions of the states of Leinster in ancient days, and it may be remarked that Naas, in Kildare, was likewise an ancient residence of the kings of Leinster, and a place where assemblies of the states were convened for legislation and other purposes. Raiba, now Rheban, is mentioned on the map of Ireland, by the Greek geographer, Ptolemy, in the second century, as one of the ancient cities of Ireland, and was situated a few miles from Mullaghmast, near Athy, on the banks of the Barrow. In the districts adjoining Mullaghmast, are several sepulchral mounds, the burial places of ancient kings and warriors, and amongst others may be mentioned the Moat of Ascul, at which, in A. D. 1316, the forces of the English Pale were defeated in a great battle by the Irish and Scots, under Edward Bruce. There are also some great pillar stones, and other Druidical remains near Mullaghmast, which show it to have been a place of note in remote ages. Mullach Maistean, or the Hill of Maistean, is mentioned by the old annalists, and by Keating and other historians, as the scene of some great battles, particularly two described at pages 221, 245, in the notes to these annals, on the territory of Leix, which were fought near Maistean, in the first and second centuries. Amongst the ancient notices of Mullaghmast may be mentioned the following curious passage, given in vol. vi. at p. 38, of Hollinshed's Chronicles, written in the reign of Elizabeth:—"There is also in the county of Kildare a goodly field, called Mullaghmast, between the Norragh and Kilkea; divers blind prophecies run of this place, that there shall be a bloody field fought there, between the English inhabitants of Ireland and the Irish; and so bloody, forsooth, it shall be, that a mill in a vale hard by it shall run four-and-twenty hours with the stream of blood that shall pour down from the hill. In the top of this height stand moats or rundles, very formally fashioned, where the strength of the English army shall be encamped. The earl of Sussex being lord lieutenant of Ireland, was accustomed to wish, that if any prophecy were to be fulfilled, it should happen in his government, to the end he might be general of the field." The earl of Sussex was lord lieutenant of Ireland in the latter end of the reign of queen Mary, and beginning of that of Elizabeth—about fourteen years before the affair at Mullaghmast. An account of the massacre above mentioned in the text of the Four Masters, is given by various other historians, and the circumstances which led to it were as follows:—In the reign of Philip and Mary, A. D. 1558, Thomas Ratcliffe, earl of Sussex, lord lieutenant of Ireland, formed the ancient territories of Offaly and Leix into the King's and Queen's Counties, and the old chiefs, the O'Conors, O'Carrolls, O'Moores, O'Mulloys, Mac Coghlan, O'Dempseys, O'Dunns, &c., were deprived of most of their hereditary possessions, which were transferred to various English settlers, as the Bellinghams, Barringtons, Bowens, Cosbys, Digbys, Hartpoles, Hovendens, Hetheringtons, Rushes, &c. Many fierce conflicts took place between those British settlers and the old Irish proprietors at various times, in the reigns of Mary and Elizabeth. As mentioned by the Four Masters, and various writers, the Irish chiefs were invited to a friendly conference at the great Rath of Mullaghmast, where they assembled to the number of 400, all heads of clans, on New year's day, A. D. 1577, in the 19th year of the reign of Elizabeth, as stated by Rawson in the introduction to his Survey of Kildare, and by various other authorities. On assembling in the Rath, the Irish chiefs were suddenly surrounded by three ranks of horse and foot, and all massacred; or, according to some accounts, 399 were slain, and only one man escaped alive from the slaughter. In Rawson's Survey of Kildare, published in 1807, are the following passages respecting this massacre:—"Thirty years since a hole was shown in the Rath where it was said the heads of the victims were buried; at that time it was twenty feet deep, but now nearly closed. The successful assassins took possession of the properties of the unfortunate gentlemen, but in such detestation is that act held by the country people, that they believe a descendant from the murderers never saw his son arrive at the age of twenty-one; and, indeed, the properties so acquired, have melted away, and got into other hands." According to the accounts of different writers, and the traditions of the people, the chiefs slain at Mullaghmast were the O'Conors, O'Moores, O'Dempseys, O'Dowlings, O'Dunns, O'Dorans, O'Kellys, O'Lalors, &c., and likewise some of the Fitzgeralds, all of whom were heads of clans in Kildare, King's and Queen's counties. Dr. Curry, in his History of the Civil Wars in Ireland, gives in the Appendix a memorial from a MS., the original of which is in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, and was written by Captain Thomas Lee, or Leigh, an officer under the government, in A. D. 1594, being the 37th year of the reign of Elizabeth, at which time sir William Fitzwilliam was lord deputy. This memorial, drawn up by Captain Lee, was addressed to queen Elizabeth, and is entitled "A Brief Declaration of the Government of Ireland, &c., showing its corruptions and discovering the causes of the discontents of the Irishry." After enumerating various acts of cruelty and misgovernment committed against the Irish, and condemning the course pursued by various governors, he thus alludes to the massacre of Mullaghmast:—"They have drawn unto them, by Protection, three or four hundred of those country people, under colour to do your majesty service, and brought them to a place of meeting, where your garrison soldiers were appointed to be, who have there most dishonourably put them all to the sword; and this hath been by the consent and practice of the lord deputy for the time being." The lord deputy at that time was sir Henry Sidney. Fynes Morrison, who was secretary to the lord deputy Mountjoy, in the reign of Elizabeth, in his History of Ireland (folio edition, p. 3.) as quoted in Curry's Civil Wars, chap. iii. thus speaks on this subject:—"After the 19th year of queen Elizabeth, viz. Anno 1577, the lords of Connaught and O'Rourke made a composition for their lands with sir Nicholas Malby, governor of that province, wherein they were content to yield the queen so large a rent, and such services, both of labourers to work upon occasion of fortifying, and of horse and foot to serve upon occasion of war, that their minds seemed not yet to be alienated from their wonted awe and reverence to the crown of England; yet, in that same year, an horrible massacre was committed by the English at Mullaghmast, on some hundreds of the most peaceable of the Irish gentry, invited thither on the public faith, and under the protection of government." Leland, in his History of Ireland, in the reign of Elizabeth, at A. D. 1573, speaking of the murder of O'Neill of Clannaboy, by the earl of Essex, says, in reference to the massacre of Mullaghmast, as recorded in the Irish annals—"In like manner these annals assure us, that a few years after, the Irish chiefs of the King's and Queen's counties were invited, by the English, to a treaty of accommodation, but when they arrived at the place of conference, they were instantly surrounded by troops, and all butchered on the spot. Such relations would be more suspicious if these annals, in general, expressed great virulence against the English and their government, but they do not appear to differ essentially from the printed histories, except in the minuteness with which they record earl (of Desmond) was taken prisoner in Cork by the president, William Drury, and was sent to Dublin, and confined in the same place with Rickard Burke, earl of Clanrickard, and it was not made known what was the cause. The sons of that earl of Clanrickard came on peaceable terms with the English, but were at war with the people of Thomond.

The same president came to Thomond a fortnight before the festival of St. John, with a large force of English, and of the nobles of the two provinces of Munster, and held a court at Ennis for eight days. The Daleassians having refused to go under tribute to the sovereign, he left a marshal, with a violent rash force, to bring them under subjection. The president afterwards returned to Limerick, and commenced beheading the chiefs and common people in the neighbouring cantreds of Limerick, and amongst those was Murrough, the son of Murtogh, son of Mahon, son of Donogh, son of Bryan Duv O'Brien, the most distinguished man, in fame and excellence, of the heirs of Carriekagonnell and Aherlow.

The earl of Thomond. i. e. Conor, the son of Donogh, son of Conor O'Brien, went to England to complain to the queen of his troubles and oppression, and he obtained a patent for his estate and towns, and of most of the church livings of Thomond, and a general pardon for his people; he returned about Christmas, after receiving great honour and respect from the sovereign, and he thought himself that he had obtained his estate, from that time forth free from the unjust jurisdiction of any officers, but, however, the marshal, before the earl's return, exercised severe oppression on the people, so that they were compelled to go under taxes to the queen, viz., ten pounds from each barony; and that was the first tribute of the Daleassians.

A contention arose between the earl of Desmond, i. e. Gerald, the son of James, son of John, and Fitzmaurice of Kerry, namely, Thomas, son of Edmond, son of Thomas, and the earl took Bally-Mie-an-Chaim (in Kerry), from Fitzmaurice. The young abbot O'Torna having joined the earl, was killed in the castle door of Lixnaw, by a ball shot after the earl had entered the castle, and had there been no other evil done between them than the death of that abbot, the loss would have been great enough. A great number of Fitzmaurice's people were killed and drowned the same day; they carried on this conflict for a considerable time, until at length they made peace, and Bally-Mie-an-Chaim together with his prisoners, were delivered up to Fitzmaurice, with an immense deal of kine and horses.

Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh, the son of John Buighe Mae Mahon (of Monaghan), went to plunder the people of Mac Mahon, and Mac Mahon himself, namely Art, the son of Bryan of the Early Rising, the son of Redmond, son of Glaisne; and Hugh was slain by Mae Mahon, and his people, and it is doubtful if any of the Clan Colla in his time was more to be lamented, and in fame and renown he was not inferior to him by whom he had been slain.

A wonderful star appeared in the south-east in the first month of winter, from which extended a long sloping tail, in the form of a bow of effulgent brilliancy, whose light illumined the earth all around, and the firmament above; and this star was visible in all parts of western Europe, and astonished all persons in general. (This was a comet which appeared in this year).

James Maemaurence was in France this year likewise.

the local transactions and adventures of the Irish; and sometimes they expressly condemn their countrymen for their rebellions against their prince." Mac Geoghegan, in his History of Ireland, at A.D. 1577, appears to allude to Mullaghmast in the following passage:—"Francis Cosby being appointed governor of Leix, ruled that country as a true tyrant; his son, Alexander, equal to him in cruelty, wreaked his vengeance on inoffensive Catholics, for the hard treatment he had received from O'Moore. Having convened a meeting of the principal inhabitants in the castle of Mollach, under pretence of the public welfare, he had them all murdered by assassins, posted there for the purpose, violating thereby all honour and public faith. One hundred and eighty men of the family of O'Moore, with many others, were put to death on this occasion." Dr. Curry, in his History of the Civil Wars (chap. iii.) quotes the following account from a translation of an Irish MS., furnished by Charles O'Connor, of Belanagare:—"The Kalends of January, on Tuesday, 1577. In this year, the English of Leinster and Meath committed horrid murders on such of the O'Moore's, O'Conors, and others of the King's and Queen's counties as kept the peace, sued for protection, and held no correspondence with those of their kindred who still stood out in arms against the English government. The English published a proclamation, inviting all the well-affected Irish to an interview on the Rathmore, at Mullaghmast, engaging at the same time for their security, and that no evil was intended. In consequence of this engagement, the well-affected came to the Rathmore aforesaid, and soon after they were assembled, they found themselves surrounded by three or four lines of English and Irish, horse and foot, completely accoutred, by whom they were ungenerously attacked, and cut to pieces, so that not a single man escaped."

A. D. 1578.

HE son of O'Neill, i. e. Henry, the son of Torlogh, son of Niall Conallach, son of Art, son of Con, marched with a force into Tirconnell against the son of O'Gallagher, namely Maolcoba, the son of Cahir, son of Torlogh Oge; when his forces had proceeded to carry off prey, and to plunder the town, it happened that the son of O'Gallagher was at that time outside of the town, and having attacked the young chief, who had been left with a small portion of his party, he gave him no quarter, but immediately put him to the sword and slew him on the spot; it would have been better for the Eugenians that they had not gone on that expedition.

Mac Clancy of Dartry (in Leitrim), namely, Cathal Duv, the son of Feredach, died, and his son, Cathal Oge, succeeded in his place.

O'Byrne (of Wicklow), namely, Teige Oge, died at an advanced age; and Dunlang, the son of Edmond O'Byrne, was nominated the O'Byrne.

O'Duigenan of Killronan, namely, Dolbh, the son of Dubhthach, chief professor of Tirerrill (in Sligo), a learned historian, and a man who kept a house of general hospitality, a man of conviviality, cheerfulness, and affability, died, and his son Maolmurry succeeded in his place.

Rory Oge,¹ the son of Rory Caoch, son of Co-nall O'Moore, fell by the hand of Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan Mac Gillpatrick, and that Rory was the chief spoiler and insurgent of the men of Ireland in his time, and no one was disposed to fire a shot against the crown for a long time after him.

Pierce Butler, the son of James, son of Edmond, son of Pierce, died, and he was of the ancient nobility of the English of Munster.

O'Callaghan, i. e. Callaghan, the son of Conor, son of Donogh, son of Teige Roe, was drowned in Avonmore (the river Blackwater, in Cork), and it was a loss to his reputation that he had departed before he spent an entire year in the enjoyment of his patrimony, between the death of his grandfather and his drowning; the son of the prior O'Callaghan, namely, Conor of the Rock, the son of Dermod, son of Teige Roe, son of Anthony, son of Cahir, was appointed his successor.

Slaney, the daughter of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh (O'Brien), died; she was the wife of Bryan, the son of Donogh Bacach, son of Murrough Caoch, son of Bryan Mac Mahon (of Clare), and a woman who spent her life without reproach, until she died at an advanced age.

Sioda, the son of Mac Con, son of Sioda, son of Mac Con, son of Sioda (Mac Namara), tanist of the eastern portion of Clan Cuilein (in Clare), was slain on Slieve Eachtge, while in pursuit of a prey, which was carried off by the kerns of Clanrickard.

O'Heyne, i. e. Roderick of the oak-wood, the son of Flann, son of Conor, son of Flann, died; he was a man eminent for hospitality and feats of arms,

A. D. 1578.

1. Rory Oge O'Moore.—An account of the O'Moore, princes and lords of Leix, in Queen's county and Kildare, and descendants of the renowned warrior Conall Kearnach, chief of the Red-branch knights of Ulster, has been given at p. 247 in these notes; they were celebrated chiefs, famous for their valour in their contests with the English, and made frequent incursions into their possessions, and plundered the Pale, to which the annalists allude in the above passage. This Rory Oge O'Moore defeated the English forces in several engagements, and maintained his independence for many years in the reigns of Mary and Elizabeth, and recovered a great part of the territory of Leix, possessed by his ancestors, which he held to the time of his death. In the course of his various conflicts with the Hartpoles, Cosbys, and other British settlers, he plundered the English settlements, and burned the towns of Naas, Leighlin-Bridge, Carlow, Rathcoole, &c., and took great preys and spoils in Kilkenny. In 1578, O'Moore was surprised in one of his fastnesses in the woods by a party of the forces of Bryan Fitzpatrick, baron of Upper Ossory, who had joined the English, and after a determined conflict with superior numbers, Rory was mortally wounded, and died on the 30th of June. The lord deputy, sir Henry Sydney, as mentioned in Lodge's Peerage on the barons of Ossory, in one of his dispatches states that the baron of Ossory was offered one thousand marks, due by proclamation on the head of O'Moore, but he only accepted one hundred pounds, which he divided amongst his men, for their present reward and future encouragement. Amongst the heroic actions of Rory O'Moore, Mac Geoghegan and others mention that on one occasion, having been betrayed and surprised by night at his residence in the woods by Robert Hartpole, at the head of two hundred of the English, the valiant O'Moore alone performed the amazing exploit of cutting his way through their ranks with his sword, and escaped insafely. His son Owen, generally called Owny Mac Rory O'Moore, was also a very valiant chieftain, and a celebrated commander in the wars against Elizabeth; he defeated the English forces in many engagements, in one of which, in the year 1599, he cut off a great number of the troops of the earl of Essex, in a defile in their progress through Leinster, at a place called from that circumstance Bearna-Cleitigh, signifying the Pass of Plumes, from the great quantity of plumes left there, which were worn in the helmets of the English knights who were slain.

from early life to his end ; his brother's son, i. e. Owen Mantach, the son of Edmond, was appointed in his place.

Myler, the son of Walter, son of John, son of Myler Burke, sheriff of the county of Mayo, was killed at Caslen-na-Helle (the castle of the Neale, in the barony of Kilmain, in Mayo), in a nocturnal attack made by his kinsman, Edmond, the son of Thomas of the Plain, the son of Myler, in consequence of some controversy which happened between them at an assembly on the previous day.

Leitrim of Muintir Eoluis was taken by an English captain of the people of Nicholas Malby, from O'Rourke, in the spring of this year, and Dromahaire was demolished by O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan, son of Bryan, son of Owen. Leitrim was afterwards left by the English in possession of the sons of Teige O'Rourke ; but shortly after that the same town was taken by O'Rourke, with the permission of the English, and despite of the sons of Teige.

Sir Henry Sydney, lord justice of Ireland, went to England in November, and was accompanied thither by captain Malby, and was succeeded by William Drury, president of the two provinces of Munster. The lord justice took along with him the earl of Clanrickard, namely, Rickard, the son of Ulick, son of Rickard, son of Ulick, and his son William Burke, to bring them before the English council.

The earl of Kildare, namely, Gerald, the son of Gerald, who had been under arrest in England for two or three years before that time, came to Ireland about Christmas.

Thomas, the son of Patrick, son of Oliver Plunkett, lord of Lughmaighe (Louth), was slain by Mac Mahon, namely Art, the son of Bryan of the Early Rising, the son of Redmond, son of Glaisne.

The seneschal of the county of Wexford, through treachery, appointed to hold a conference with Fiacha Mac Hugh (O'Byrne), the son of Redmond, son of John of Gleann Maoilughra (Glenmalure, in Wicklow) ; Fiacha discovered that it was through treachery the seneschal appointed that conference, and he therefore formed a counter plot against him, and slew one hundred of the young men and chiefs of the country, with many of the common soldiers.

Bryan, the son of Cahir Cavanagh (of Carlow), the son of Art, son of Dermod Lamhdearg (the Red-handed), died.

John, the son of Donal, son of Thomas, son of Teige Mac Clancy, chief professor in Brehonism to the earl of Desmond, died ; and there was not a Brehon (or judge), of a territory in Ireland at that time who had a better landed property and mansion than he had.

The earl of Clanrickard was still in confinement in London.

A. D. 1579

Donal, the son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh O'Bricn, died, in the 65th year of his age, after a long infirmity, an approved repentance, and having gained the victory over the world and men ; he was interred with honour and solemnity in the monastery of Ennis, and his son Torlogh was appointed his successor ; and it was to record his death the following was composed :

"One thousand five hundred, the record is right,
Together with nine and seventy years,
From the incarnation of the son of God
To the death of Donal, who was free from fault."

Onora, the daughter of Donogh, the son of Connor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, died, and she was greatly lamented in Leth Mogha.

Sir Edward Fitton, the treasurer, died.

Roland Eustace, the son of Thomas, son of Richard, died.

Hugh, the son of John, son of Redmond, son of John, son of Hugh, son of Donal Glas, died, and he was the chief of the branch of Raghnaill, and lord of Glenmalure ; he was a warrior and spoiler against the neighbouring English and Irish. (This was Hugh O'Byrne of Wicklow, chief of the branch of Rannal, from whom the name Ranelagh was derived).

O'Shaughnessy, i. e. Dermod Riavach, the son of Dermod, son of William, son of John Buighe, and his brother's son William, the son of Giolla Duv, son of Dermod, fell by each other's hands in a treacherous attack made by O'Shaughnessy on William in the vicinity of Ard Maoldubhain ; William was slain on the spot, and O'Shaughnessy was wounded, of which he died soon after ; John, the son of Gilladuff, was after that nominated the O'Shaughnessy.

Torlogh of the Wooden Leg, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh, son of Roderick Mac Sweeney, fell by the hand of Bryan Ballach, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, son of Bryan Mac Sweeney, at the gate of Cork.

Captain Malby returned to Ireland, with great presents from the sovereign.

Bryan-na-mBarog, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh Mac Sweeney, brother of Torlogh before mentioned, died.

James, the son of Maurice Duv, son of John, son of Thomas, son of the earl (of Desmond), returned from France; and it was rumoured that he had come with a greater number of ships than he had actually brought; he landed at Oilean-in-Oir, near Daingean-Ui-Chuis, in Kerry. The earl of Desmond was at this time encamped at Cuillean-O-gCuanagh, where he had commenced to erect a castle, and having heard of the arrival of that fleet in Kerry, he went to see it. The chief marshal of the two provinces of Munster, by name Arthur Carter and Master Davidh, and all of the queen's people in Munster also proceeded to that fleet, as did likewise the kinsmen of the earl of Desmond, the two young sons of James, son of John, son of Thomas, namely, John and James Oge, and they were in confederacy with James Mac Maurice, and they made an attack by night upon the marshal and Master Davidh at Tralee, and they beheaded them while lying on their couches and beds; they then brought James on shore, and all went to the woods of Claen-glais and Coill More. James, soon after landing, proceeded from these woods on his first expedition, with all his horse and foot forces, through the centre of Hy-Conaill-Gabhra and Clan-William, and they began to plunder every place through which they passed. The people of the country collected and assembled to pursue them, and first of all came the sons of William Burke, son of Edmond, namely Theobald and Ulick, and Theobald dispatched messengers to the territory of Aes Greine, requesting Mac I-Brien of Ara to come to expel the traitor from the country. Mac I-Brien sent a force of galloglasses and giomanachs (common soldiers), to Theobald; these then pursued the warlike troops, and overtook James, who had halted in a dense solitary wood to wait their approach, and an engagement ensued between these respective forces in which James was struck in the hollow of his chest by the shot of a ball, which caused his death; but, however, he defeated those warlike forces who pursued him. A lamentable loss took place there, for Theobald Burke was slain, a young warrior who was a worthy heir to an earldom, in valour, in command of a force, and in his knowledge of the English language, and of the ancient Irish. James Mac Maurice had not passed far from the field of battle when the weakness of death came over him, upon which he made his will in a few words, and ordered his faithful people, that on his death they would cut off his head, in order that his enemies might not discover him, so as to recognise or mutilate him.¹

The lord justice of Ireland, sir William Drury,

A. D. 1579.

1. Landing of the Spaniards and death of Mac Maurice.—The celebrated James Mac Maurice, so often mentioned at this period, was James Fitzgerald, son of sir Maurice Fitzgerald, who was brother of James, the fifteenth earl of Desmond. James Mac Maurice is called by various writers Fitzmaurice, which has led to some mistakes about him, and he has been sometimes confounded with the family of Fitzmaurice, earls of Kerry. The following particulars of the affairs above-mentioned in the Annals, have been collected from Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, Mac Geoghegan's Ireland, Lodge's Peerage, and various other sources. James Mac Maurice, in conjunction with his cousin Gerald Fitzgerald, sixteenth earl of Desmond, and several others of the nobility and chiefs of Munster, having resisted the Reformation, and taken up arms against queen Elizabeth, became the military leaders of that province, and made a remarkable figure in the course of these Annals. Mac Maurice was a very valiant commander, and during a period of about ten years, as a leader in Munster, had various fierce conflicts with the English forces; he went to France in 1575, and having remained there for about two years endeavouring to obtain some troops from king Henry III., in which, however, he did not succeed, he went from thence to Rome, where, Mac Geoghegan says, he was received with distinction by Pope Gregory

XIII.; at Rome he became acquainted with Cornelius O'Mulrian, or O'Rian, titular bishop of Killaloe, and also with a gentleman named Thomas Stukely, an Englishman, who was supposed to be a natural son of king Henry VIII., but nothing certain was known as to his family; he was a military adventurer, and appears to have been a man of considerable abilities. At this time Philip II., king of Spain, who had been married to Mary, queen of England, was at variance with Elizabeth, and in conjunction with the Pope, according to Cox, prepared troops to assist the Irish Catholics, and 2000 men, according to Mac Geoghegan, were raised in the states of the church for the expedition to Ireland, under the command of Hercules de Pise; Stukely was also appointed as one of the commanders, and, according to Cox, he had conferred on him the titles of Marquess of Leinster, earl of Wexford, and Carlow, viscount Murrogh, and baron of Ross; and, at the head of 800 soldiers, set sail from Civitta Vecchia, in the Papal states, for Lisbon, where it was appointed he should meet James Mac Maurice, with other forces raised in Spain and Portugal. Stukely, on his arrival with his fleet at Lisbon, instead of coming to Ireland, was induced to join Sebastian, king of Portugal, who was then preparing for an expedition to Africa; on their arrival in Africa, a fierce battle was fought, in which three kings were slain, namely, Sebastian, king of Portugal, and his ally Mahomet, son of Abdallah, king of Fez, was at that time in great Cork of Munster, and the earl of Kildare and sir Nicholas Malby, with their forces, were along with him there; they proceeded to Limerick, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Kilmallock; the earl of Desmond waited on them, and endeavoured to convince them that he had no part in bringing over James Mac Maurice, nor in any of the evil deeds committed by his kinsmen, and he gave his only son and heir to the lord justice as security for his allegiance and loyalty to the crown of England. The earl was promised that his country should not thenceforth be spoiled, but although promised, it was not fulfilled, for his people and cattle were afterwards destroyed, and his corn and dwellings were burned. The lord justice then departed from the camp at Kilmallock, accompanied by three or four captains, and four hundred English and Irish soldiers, to search the great wood in expectation of discovering some of the enemy; it so happened that they encountered the young sons of the earl of Desmond, namely, John and James Oge, at Gort-na-Tiobrad, where a fierce engagement ensued between them, in which the lord justice's forces were defeated, and three of their captains were slain, namely, captain Herbert, captain Eustace, and captain Spris (Price), together with three hundred of their men, and the remnant fled with the tidings to the camp. The lord justice after that removed his camp to Belatha-nan-Deise, in the very centre of Clu of Mal, the son of Ugaine (in the baronies of Connello, county of Limerick), where he took his death-sickness, and he left captain Malby to carry on the war against the Geraldines, and he himself was conveyed in a carriage to Waterford, where he died. The lord justice selected at the court of Dublin to succeed him was a gentleman of the queen's people, who had arrived that very week, namely, sir William Pelham, who had come for the purpose of defending the territory of Bregia, Meath, and the English Pale, against the O'Neills and the Irish of the North of Ireland and of Leinster, whilst the lord justice who died, and captain Malby, had been engaged in bringing the people of Munster to subjection. The earl of Ormond came to Ireland the same week, after a sojourn of three years in England. Captain Malby, after the death of the lord justice, proceeded to Limerick to remodel his army, and procure provisions for his soldiers, and from thence he went to Easgebtene (Askeaton, in Limerick), and it happened to be the very day on which the young sons of the earl of Desmond came into the county of Limerick to fight and make captures. They and the captain met each other front to front, although they could have shunned and avoided him; a fierce conflict took place between them, and the captain's people bravely encountered and fought the Irish forces, and at length defeated them; and Thomas, the son of John Oge, son of John, son of Thomas, son of the and Abimelec, king of Morocco; Stukely, and the greater part of the Italians, fell in this battle fighting under the standard of Sebastian. Mac Maurice having come from Spain to Portugal, found with indignation that his cause had been betrayed by Stukely; he collected the remnant of the Italians who had returned from Africa, and being joined by some Cantabrians, and a few English and Irish exiles, he set sail for Ireland, and landed at Smerwick in Kerry, in the latter end of July, 1579, with three ships, and a small force, only amounting to about eighty or one hundred men; he was accompanied by Nicholas Saunders, an English ecclesiastic, who was appointed the Pope's Nuncio or Legate in Ireland, and by another ecclesiastic named Allen. The place where Mac Maurice landed was called Ardennennt, in the harbour of Smerwick, in the west of Kerry; and in the harbour is a small rocky island which forms a natural fortress; this is the place mentioned above in the Annals, under the name of Oilean-an-Oir, or the island of the Gold, and the fortress erected there by another body of the Spaniards who arrived in the following year was called Fort del Or. Daingean-I-Chuis, mentioned in the text, is Dingle-I-Conch, or Dingle, from which the harbour of Smerwick is about six or eight miles distant; the other places mentioned in the text are Ily-Conaill-Gabhra, now the two baronies of Connello, in Limerick, and the woods of Claenglais were about the same place, on the borders of Limerick and Kerry, where the battle was fought. James Mac Maurice, on his arrival in Ireland, was joined by the forces of his cousins, sir John of Desmond, and sir James Fitzgerald, his brother, who, with their troops, attacked the English garrison at Tralce, which they dispersed, and slew Henry Davell, who is above mentioned under the name of Davidh, and also Carter, the other commander. Mac Maurice's three ships were taken by captain Courtney, and he himself intending to proceed to Connaught to raise more forces, was in his progress, as above mentioned in the text, attacked by the Burkes of Clanwilliam and Castle Connell, in Limerick, and by Mac I-Brien of Ara, in Tipperary, who were on the side of the queen; and both parties having encountered, had a fierce conflict in the barony of Connello in Limerick. Mac Maurice gained the victory, but he was mortally wounded, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, he slew in the engagement, with his own hand, Theobald Burke, cleaving his head with a single blow; Burke's brothers also fell, and queen Elizabeth, to console sir William Burke for the loss of his sons, settled on him a yearly pension of 200 marks, and created him baron of Castleconnell. The valiant Mac Maurice died in six hours after the engagement, and when he found he was mortally wounded, he made the remarkable request that his friends would, as soon as he died, cut off his head that his body might not be recognised and mutilated by his enemies; it does not appear whether they complied with his singular request, but it is stated by Lodge and others, that his body being found by the English, was hanged upon the market-place of Kilmallock. A further account of the second landing and unsaure of the Spaniards in Kerry, in 1580, is given under that year.

earl, and Owen, the son of Edmond Oge, son of Edmond, son of Torlogh Mac Sheehey, along with a great number of the constables of the Clan Sheehey, and also many of the party of the sons of the earl, were slain. A vast deal of booty, consisting of arms and accoutrements, fell into the hands of the captain's party on that occasion. It was at Aonach Beag that battle was fought, and the captain remained nearly a week after that at Askeaton, during which time the Geraldines daily threatened to give him battle, but however they did not do so. The captain having demolished the monastery of the town proceeded from thence to Adare, where he remained, to bring the neighbouring people under subjection, until the new lord justice, sir William Pelham, the earl of Kildare, and the earl of Ormond, had arrived to relieve him, and they all encamped in Connello. The earl of Desmond did not join them on that occasion, for his estate was completely spoiled, and its inhabitants were awfully plundered, although it had been promised him before that his country should not be spoiled.²

When the earl had joined his kinsmen, the resolution the English came to was, to garrison his towns, viz., Loughgair, Rathmore, Castlemuirisín, Adare, and Kilmallock (all in Limerick), and they themselves returned to their homes. The entire country, however, was not in a tranquil state, from Luachair Deadhaidh (in Kerry), to the river Suir, and from Ceann Febrad (in Limerick), to the Shannon, for there was not a fortress or town, any corn, or dwelling, between those places, to which the sons of the earl had come, that they did not demolish, destroy, burn, and completely consume by fire, lest the English should possess them; and the English, in retaliation against the Geraldines, left not a house or dwelling, a rick, or corn-stack in their course, that they did not destroy after the same manner, so that the country was laid waste between them without corn or dwellings. After this the earl of Desmond, and his kinsmen, with all they could muster together, proceeded to devastate by fire and sword Roche's and Barry's countries in Hy Liathain and Imokilly (in the baronies of Barrymore and Imokilly, county of Cork); they encamped before Eochoille (Youghal), and at length took the town, and immense were its wealth and treasures; the Geraldines seized upon every thing they could lay hold on of its riches, except as much of the gold and silver as the merchants and burgesses had sent away in boats, before the town was taken. Many poor and needy persons

2. Battles of Gortnatibrid and Mainistir Nenay, &c.—In 1579, on the death of James Mac Maurice, as before stated, his cousins, sir John of Desmond, and James Fitzgerald his brother, became the chief commanders of the Irish in Munster. The lord deputy, sir William Drury, marched with his forces to Munster, accompanied by Bagnall, Malby, Wingfield, Fitton, Masterson, and other commanders, and was also joined by the earl of Kildare, the Butlers, lords of Ormond, Mountgarrett, and Dunboyne, and Fitzpatrick, baron of Ossory. On arriving at Kilmallock, the deputy requested the earl of Desmond, and others whose loyalty he suspected, to come to his camp; Desmond came, and was delivered into the custody of the lord marshal, but soon after set at liberty, through fear of his brother, sir John of Desmond, who was encamped with his forces at Slieveogher in Kerry. The deputy proposed to attack sir John of Desmond, who collected his forces from Kerry and from Connello, in Limerick, and advanced to meet the deputy's troops; Desmond posted himself in the castle of Gortantibrid, in the harony of Connello, in Limerick, near a forest called the Blackwood, according to Mac Geoghegan, and both parties having encountered, had a sharp engagement, in which the English forces were defeated, and three hundred of them slain, together with two of their captains, Herbert and Price, and the victory was gained chiefly by means of an ambuscade placed in the wood by John of Desmond.

Soon after fresh forces came from England, under captains Carrew, Bourchier, Dowdall, &c., and sir John Perrott arrived at Cork with six ships to protect the coast. The lord deputy Drury retired to Waterford, where, from the fatigues of his campaign, he soon after died, in September, 1579. Sir Nicholas Malby was appointed marshal of the forces in Munster, and having collected his troops, amounting according to Cox, to more than 1000 men, he marched against sir John of Desmond, who was encamped near Croom, in Limerick, and both parties having encountered, had a severe conflict, in which great numbers were slain on each side; Mac Geoghegan says that Desmond remained master of the field of battle, with the cannon and baggage; and Cox says that the Irish lost 260 men; and, according to other accounts, nearly the same number of the English were slain. This battle was fought, according to the text of the Four Masters, at a place called Aonach Beag, and it is called by various other writers the battle of Monasterney, being fought adjoining the celebrated Cistercian monastery of that name near Croom, in the county of Limerick; and it is stated that the abbot of the monastery was at the engagement on the side of Desmond, and also Father Allen, before mentioned, who was killed in the conflict, and his body was found amongst the slain, with the consecrated banner grasped firmly in his hand. Some of the Irish and Italian soldiers in this engagement took refuge in the abbey, which the English with their cannon afterwards destroyed, and demolished its walls, but some ruins still remaining show its former magnificence. The earl of Desmond, it is said, was a spectator of the battle from a neighbouring hill, but did not join his brother's forces, and retired to his castle of Askeaton. The troops of sir John of Desmond, according to Mac Geoghegan, next marched towards Aherlow, in Tipperary, and defeated in their progress the English garrison of Kilmallock, which had sallied out to attack them. Desmond also defeated ten English battalions at a place called Gort-na-Pisi, or the Field of the Peas; he next made incursions into Ormond, and defeated all the forces of the Butlers, and their English allies, in a fierce conflict at the Hill of Knock-Raffan, in Tipperary, a place situate between Cashel and Cahir, where there is a great mound; and it was celebrated as a residence of some of the kings of Munster in remote ages.

became enriched, and the rich became poor by the spoils of that town. Gloom was cast over the sunshine of that town by the Geraldines, and they demolished its courts and castles, and its stone and wooden buildings, so that it was not inhabitable for a long period after that, and it was at Christmas precisely these affairs took place. The earl of Ormond marched with a powerful force in the same week into the country of the Geraldines, and arrived at Newcastle, and he carried away every thing he laid hold on in the country, both flocks and cattle, and returned back without fight or conflict, because the earl and his kinsmen were at that time in Kerry.

Conall Buighe, the son of Gillpatrick, son of Pierce O'Moore, was slain at Birr, in the territory of Ely, and it was well he was killed, for it was to plunder the town he had gone there.

Oliver Roe, the son of John-na-Beinne, son of John Roe, son of John of the Teeth (Burke), died.

The earl of Clanrickard was still in England this year.

A. D. 1580.

Conor, the son of Donogh, son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh O'Brien, earl of Thomond, who was the first of the race of Cormac Cas who succeeded his father over the portion of Munster belonging to the tribe of Lughaidh Meann, a junior who took and regulated the government of his patrimony from the hands of his senior, according to the rules, laws, and ordinances of the sovereign of England, died in the meridian of his age, having completed forty-five years and a half from his birth to his death, of which he spent twenty-two years and a half in the chief government of his tribe, and in the command of his people, as the following verse certifies :

"Twenty years he had been, and five half years in full,
An earl over the land of Adhar, a champion like Conn was Conor."

That Conor was interred in the monastery of Ennis, and his son Donogh was appointed in his place.

Mac William Burke, i.e. John, the son of Oliver, son of John, a man of generosity and great affluence, who preferred peace to war, and who always aided the sovereign, died ; and Richard of the Iron, the son of Edmond, son of Ulick, assumed the government in place of John, without the permission of the sovereign.

The son of O'Donnell, i. e. Cathbhar, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe, tannist of Tireonnell, a man distinguished for his great donations and hospitality, the patron of the exiles, and of the professors of the schools of the North of Ireland, died on the 15th of October, in his own residence, at Scariff Sholais, and was interred at Donegal.

O'Beirne (of Roseommon), i. e. Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Carbry, son of Malachy, a man eminent in learning, in music, and in the canon law, died, and was buried at Elphin, and his brother Carbry succeeded in his place.

The son of Mac Donogh of Tirerrill (in Sligo), namely, Murrogh, the son of Cathal, son of Owen, a spirited and convivial sportsman, who was fierce to an enemy, but kind to a friend, died.

Teige Riavach, the son of Owen, son of Conor, son of Teige O'Dowd (of Sligo), died.

Donal, the son of Teige, son of Conor O'Brien, died, and was interred in the monastery of Ennis.

Owen, son of Tuathal Balbh O'Gallagher, dean of Raphoe, died on the 22nd day of the month of October.

The son of Mae Geoghegan, namely, Rossa, the son of Conla, son of Conor, son of Laighne, was unkindredly slain by his brother Bryan ; it was surprising how small the inheritance of Kinel Fiacha was then, for Rossa was no more than a plain gentleman ; he was, however, lamented by the greater portion of the men of Ireland. The father of those sons was taken prisoner by the lord justice, for it was rumoured that he was concerned in that fratricide.

James Oge, the son of James, son of John, son of Thomas the earl (of Desmond), in the course of his insurrection made a predatory incursion into Muskerry (in Cork), but Cormac, the son of Teige, son of Cormac Oge, son of Cormac, son of Teige Mae Carthy, lord of the country, collected all his forces together to oppose him that night, and Cormac having been informed that James had passed him into the country, proceeded to a certain place by which he expected James would pass, and having perceived James coming towards him with a prey, he attacked and slew and destroyed the greater portion of his people ; James himself was taken and sent to Cork to be imprisoned, where he remained confined for nearly two months, occupied in preparing himself for death every day, repenting of his sins, and imploring forgiveness for his transgressions. At the end of that time a written order was sent from the lord justice and the council of Dublin to the Mayor of Cork, commanding him to have that noble young man executed, quartered, and cut into pieces, which was accordingly done.¹

James, the son of John Oge, son of John, son of Thomas, the earl (of Desmond), was slain in the same war by the lord of Pobal Brien, and of Carrick-O-Gonnell (in Limerick), namely, Bryan Duv, the son of Mahon, son of Donogh, son of Bryan Duv O'Brien, and that James was a worthy heir to his patrimony.

James, the son of Maurice, son of Gerald, son of Thomas, the earl (of Desmond), was killed in the same war by the shot of a ball at the gates of Youghal.

Edmond, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh Mac Sweeney from Tuatha Toraidhe (the Districts of Tory Island in Donegal), went to take a prey from a party of the insurgents in Glenflesk (in Kerry); O'Donoghoe and a brother's son of the same Edmond, namely, Geoffrey Carrach, the son of Donogh Bacach, overtook Edmond and slew him in a malicious, unfriendly manner, and there was not at that time in Ireland a leader of galloglasses who paid more for wine and to learned men than that Edmond.

Roland, the son of Redmond (Burke), son of Ulick of Knock Tuagh, bishop of Clonfert, died, and the loss of that good man was much lamented in his own country.

O'Sullivan More, i. e. Donal, the son of Donal, died, and his son Owen was appointed his successor.

Donogh, the son of Malachy Mac Gorman, son of Malachy Duv, died.

Sir William Pelham, the lord justice, wrote to England after Christmas in this year, requesting that an admiral, with the queen's fleet supplied with plenty of provisions and large ordnance, should be sent to Ireland, in order to take all their towns which were in possession of the Geraldines. These were Askeaton, Baile-Ui-Gheileacain, and Carraig-an-Phuill (Carrigafoyle on the Shannon). A great army of the men of Meath, of Fingall, and of Leinster, and also of all those who were under their laws, from the Boyne to the Meeting of the three Waters (at Waterford), was collected by the lord justice and the earl of Ormond, to march against the Geraldines about the festival of St. Bridget. The earl of Ormond brought an immense force to join that army, and did not halt until he arrived at Cork. The lord justice proceeded with all his forces to Limerick, and although the weather was very cold

A.D. 1580.

1. Death of sir James of Desmond, &c.—On the 14th of June, 1580, according to Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, the lord justice, sir William Pelham, invaded and devastated Clanauliff, in the county of Cork, and thence marched through Slievegher to Kerry; and on the 15th took a prey of 2000 kine and many sheep, and missed but little of surprising the earl of Desmond, and the Legate, Dr. Saunders. "On the 8th of July the popish lords of Munster," says Cox, "appeared before the lord justice at Limerick, and being charged with correspondence with the rebels, and negligence in prosecuting them, all of them, except the lord Barry, submitted, and promised future loyalty, and were ordered to maintain 2000 men during the war." Soon after, Cormac Mac Teige Mac Carthy was dismissed with favour, and an order to the country to assist him in his attempts against the Desmond forces, because he had promised to do some considerable service, which he very luckily effected, says Cox, for on the 4th of August he took prisoner sir James of Desmond, who had taken a prey from sir Cormac, whereupon his brother, Daniel Mac Teige, assembled what force he could get together, to rescue the prey, and after a sharp conflict between them and the Desmonians, the latter were defeated, and sir James being taken prisoner, was brought to sir Warham St. Leger and captain sir Walter Raleigh, who caused him to be hanged, drawn and quartered, at Cork, and his head and limbs were fixed on the gates of the city. This sir James Fitzgerald was brother of the earl of Desmond, and of sir John of Desmond, and a commander of note in Munster in the war against Elizabeth. As a reward for his services, Cormac Mac Teige Mac Carthy was knighted, and made high sheriff of the county of Cork.

According to Cox, the earl of Ormond dislodged from Adare in Limerick, and marched to Buttevant, in Cork, where, in the month of August, a strange kind of sickness, called afterwards the Gentle Correction, seized the whole army; it took them with pain in the head, and for two or three days they lay senseless, and then recovered, few or none died of it, though, by the violence of the symptoms, it was not expected that many could recover. Ormond divided his forces into two parts, and marched with one half to Castle Island, in Kerry, and the other he sent to Tralee, where all met, and then dividing into three parts, marched to Dingle, "and as they went, they drove the whole country before them," says Cox, "whereby they took a prey of eight thousand cows, besides many garrons, sheep, &c., and slew a great many people, and would have slain more, but that sir William Winter, who was then in the harbour of Ventry with some of her majesty's ships, gave many of them protections." This Winter was vice-admiral of England, and came to cruise about the coast to prevent the Spaniards from landing, if they should come. The lord justice having left sir George Bouchier commander in Munster, with 2820 foot and 395 horse, he rode to Killaloe "where," says Cox, "the unconscionable bishop (Maurice O'Brien), demanded thirty pounds for one night's grazing for 160 horse."

and severe then, he remained there only a week to supply his soldiers with arms and provisions; he proceeded from thence south-westward to Deis Beag (probably Small County in Limerick), and to Moy Maighrigh, and encamped in Connello; he despatched light skirmishing parties to Coill More, to the woods of Claenglass, and the sequestered and waste places, and they gave no mercy to rich or poor that came in their way. It was not surprising to kill those who were able to make resistance, but they also slew the blind and infirm, women, sons, and daughters, the sick, the feeble, and the old; their wealth and properties were carried away to the camp where the lord justice was; great numbers of the English fell by those who were endeavouring to recover their plundered property. The lord justice then determined to march to Kerry, and proceeded to Teamhair Luachra, from thence to Tralee, and to the borders of the mountain of Mis, the daughter of Muireadh, the son of Cairéadh (Slieve Mis mountain in Kerry). The earl of Ormond came from Cork to Kerry to join the lord justice, and immense was the number of men and horses that perished without bloodshed or wounds on that expedition, by the length of their march, and rapidity of their progress, and the scarcity of provisions. It was about that time the queen's fleet appeared on the coast of Ireland, which did not stop until they came to the shore of the clear stream of the Shannon, and cast their anchors in the sea exactly opposite Carrigafoyle.² The lord justice and the earl of Ormond came by land to the same place, and they formed two camps and besieged it by land and sea. Sir Nicholas Malby, with the nobles of the province of Connaught, and a vast number of the English, marched into Thomond for the purpose of preventing any of the enemy, either by land or sea, from attacking the lord justice while engaged in besieging the fortified towns of the Geraldines.

2. Siege of Carrigafoyle.—In 1579, on the death of sir William Drury, sir William Pelham became lord deputy, and having appointed the earl of Ormond governor, and sir Warham St. Leger marshal of Munster, he proceeded in person to Kilkenny, Cashel, and Limerick, to organise Munster against the earl of Desmond, and proceeding through Limerick and Kerry, the English forces plundered and ravaged the territories of the earl of Desmond. The lord deputy besieged the castle of Carrigafoyle, an ancient fortress of the O'Connors, lords of Kerry, but then belonging to the earl of Desmond. This place, called in Irish Carraig-an-Phuill, signifying the Rock of the Chasin, is situated on the small island of Car-

The lord justice ordered the large ordnance which had been sent to him, to be conveyed to land, and he placed five large guns before the Carrig to batter it without reserve; it was stated that the smallest of those was a demi-cannon. They then opened their fire on the castle, and there was not one in the wilds, wastes, or sequestered glens from the Carn of Breas, the son of Ealathan, son of Neid, in the south-west of the province of the sons of Deirgthine to Knock Meadha Siuil in Connaught, that did not hear the noise and report of that uncommon and unusual ordnance. They at length demolished the western half of Carrigafoyle from top to bottom, and the destruction of the guards was simultaneous with the demolition of the castle which was taken by the lord justice, and he remained five nights at the Rock after taking it, and at the end of that time proceeded to Askeaton. When the garrisons of Baile-Ui-Geileachain, and of Askeaton, heard the awful roaring of that extraordinary ordnance, the like of which they never heard before, they began to destroy their castles, and succeeded in demolishing Baile-I-Ghcileachain, but were not able to demolish Askeaton, and, as they could not effect it, they therefore left the gates of the castle open to the lord justice, which was henceforth proclaimed faithful to the queen. The lord justice then proceeded to Limerick, where he remained forty days resting and recruiting himself after his fatigue, while his men and horses were quartered throughout Thomond. He then returned to Askeaton about the following Whitsuntide, and spent a part of the summer in that town, but did not, however, cease from destroying and awfully spoiling by day and night the country of the Geraldines. It was on that expedition he put to death Faltach (Wall) of Dun Maoilin (Dunmoylan, in the parish of Shanagolden, county of Limerick), namely, Ulick, the son of Ulick, son of Ulick, who had been blind rigue, near the mouth of the Shannon, in the county of Kerry; this castle was strongly fortified, and then garrisoned with nineteen Spaniards and fifty Irish, under an Italian engineer named Julio. The lord deputy, while viewing the castle, was nearly killed by a musket shot, but having caused it to be battered with three cannon and two culverins, a breach was made, at which captain Maekworth entered, and, having taken the castle on Palm Sunday, 1580, put 50 of the garrison to the sword, and he executed 6 in the camp; "captain Julio was preserved," says Cox, "two or three days, for certain considerations, but not complying with the lord deputy's wishes, he was hanged."

from his birth to his death, and he also put to death Supple of Kilmochudha, namely, John, and indeed it was not a proper act to have killed him, for he was then upwards of a hundred years of age. Immense and incalculable were the numbers destroyed by the English and the Geraldines on both sides at that time. The lord justice proceeded with his forces into Kerry, and did not halt until he arrived at Dingle-i-Couch; he devastated and plundered a great part of the country of the Geraldines and of Kerry on that occasion, and from thence he came directly through the country to Cork, and from that back to Askeaton, and to Limerick, and he took the nobles of Munster prisoners, except the Geraldines, viz.: Barry More, with the wife and son of Mac Carthy More, the two sons of Fitzmaurice of Kerry, O'Sullivan Beire, Mac Donogh, and the son of Mac Carthy Riavach.

The council of England sent, in the first month of harvest, to Ireland, a new lord justice, namely, lord Arthur Grey, a man greater by title and honour than sir William Pelham, though, however, no Englishman ever came to Ireland, for the period of his government, who was more expert and expeditious in his marches, more distinguished and fortunate, and more successful in his services than that sir William; he went to Dublin to meet the lord justice who had come from England, and having delivered to him the sword of state, he departed for England, after conquering his opponents.

James Eustace, the son of Roland, son of Thomas, demolished his castles, after having embraced the Catholic faith, and rejected the power of the sovereign, and war and strife arose on the coming of the lord justice, Arthur, lord Grey, to Ireland. The O'Cavanaghs, O'Kinsellaghs, O'Byrnes, O'Tooles, and the branch of Ranelagh, and also all those who were not extirpated of the remnant of the people of Offaly and Leix, abetted and joined in alliance James Eustace, so that from the Slaney (in Wexford), to the Shannon, and from the Boyne to the Meeting of the three Waters (at Waterford), was one scene of strife and dissension, and those insurgents before mentioned encamped in the vicinity of Slieve Roe and Glenmalure (in Wicklow).

The lord justice and captain Malby marched with a force to subdue and disperse those formidable spoilers, and when the insurgents received intelligence that those attacking troops were advancing towards them, they retired, to secure themselves, to the rugged hills of Glenmalure. The lord justice selected from among his army a number of captains, the most experienced and distinguished in service, and sent them, at the head of eight or nine companies of soldiers, to range and scour Glenmalure; they were, however, actively encountered without delay by the defending parties of the glen, so that few of those troops returned, being slaughtered and completely destroyed by the Irish forces. In that engagement the following were slain, viz., Peter Carew, Master Muar, i. e. John, and Master Fraus, together with a number of gentlemen who had come over in the lord justice's guard, and on receiving intelligence of this event, the lord justice departed from his camp.³

An Italian fleet of the Pope's people landed in

3. Battle of Glenmalure.—In 1580 Arthur Grey, called lord Grey of Wilton, came to Ireland as lord deputy, and landed at Howth on the 12th of August; he soon after marched into Wicklow, against the Irish forces, who were commanded by Feagh Mac Hugh O'Byrne, captain Fitzgerald, Fitz-Eustace and others, who were in arms against the queen. James Eustace, or Fitz-Eustace, above-mentioned in the text, was viscount of Baltinglass in Wicklow, and of the great family of the Fitz-Eustaces of Kildare, barons of Portlester; he joined the party of the earl of Desmond in the war against Elizabeth, and was a commander of note for several years in Leinster; on the death of the earl of Desmond in 1583, Fitz-Eustace retired to Spain, where he soon after died. The lord deputy Grey's troops, amounting to about 1000 men, were commanded by experienced officers, and having advanced to the Wicklow mountains they found the Irish forces posted in the defiles of Glenmalure. The English foot entered the glens, and the horse scoured the accessible parts of the country and the woods. The Irish, under the commanders above-mentioned, and also in the text, suddenly attacked the English forces in a defile, and cut them almost all to pieces; and according to Mac Geoghegan, 800 of them were slain, but he and others erroneously state that this battle was fought at Glendalough; Cox says, all the English forces were cut off except some few that were saved by their cavalry, and amongst their commanders fell in this fierce conflict, sir Peter Carew, colonel Moor, and captains Audley and Cosby; this captain, Francis Cosby, was one of the English settlers who got a great part of the lands of the O'Moores, in the Queen's county, and was a distinguished commander, and is mentioned by Mac Geoghegan as one of those concerned in the massacre of Mullaghmast; as soon as the English troops entered the valley of Glenmalure they were hemmed in on all sides by the Irish, who fiercely rushed on them with fearful cries, and they were overwhelmed with a shower of darts and arrows by the Irish kerns, and slaughtered by their spears. Lord Grey accompanied by colonel Wingfield, who was ancestor of the lords Powerscourt, and by the earl of Kildare, was posted on a neighbouring hill waiting the event of the conflict; and after the defeat he retreated with the remnant of his forces to Dublin, "covered says Leland, with confusion and dishonour."

Kerry, in the middle of harvest, and they were greater by name than in effect, for their fame was so great at first, that it was supposed that if they should have come to Limerick, Galway or Cork, the gates of those cities should be thrown open to them. The place which they landed at was the island which James Mac Maurice had the year before begun to fortify, namely, Dun-an-Oir, and the cause which induced that fleet to come to Ireland was to aid the Geraldines, when they (the Italians), had received intelligence that they had been put to great extremities in defending the Catholic faith. The earl of Ormond, i. e. Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, collected a force on his own account, and also on behalf of the sovereign (the queen), with which he marched to attack the Italians at Dun-an Oir, and he did not halt until he arrived in Kerry. The brave forces of the Geraldines were assembled there to oppose them, but neither party attacked the other; at length the earl was permitted to proceed, until he arrived on the hill over the fortress, from which he took a view of the deep trenches and the impregnable ramparts which the Italians had raised round the island, and having contemplated in his mind that it would be a fruitless undertaking to attack them in their stronghold, he returned back by the same route he had marched thither, and he was met in Hy Conall Gavra (barony of Connello, in Limerick), by the lord justice, whom the earl could not persuade from going to see Dun-an-Oir, and he proceeded onward by regular marches through Clanmaurice and Kerry, until he arrived in the vicinity of the island, near which, however, he did not bring his camp. A select party of his forces went every day to reconnoitre the island, during which several messages were interchanged on both sides, and friendship was promised between them. Their captains came to the lord justice, for the purpose of entering upon terms of peace with him, upon which the lord justice's people passed onward unawares to the island, and began to kill and slaughter the Italians, so that not one of the seven hundred Italians escaped from destruction on the spot. The lord justice seized on much gold, treasure, and every other valuable property which the Italians had with them, and he afterwards levelled and demolished all the fortifications of the island, that it might not be a rock of defence, or a place of refuge thenceforth for insurgents; and that transaction took place in the month of November. The lord justice then returned back to Limerick, and from thence to the English Pale.⁴

O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan, the son of Bryan, son of

4. Massacre of the Italians and Spaniards.—An account of the landing of a party of Italians and Spaniards at Smerwick, in Kerry, under the command of James Mac Maurice Fitzgerald, has been given in a note under the year 1579; in the latter end of September, 1580, another body of about 800 Italians and Spaniards, under the command of Sebastian de St. Joseph, landed at Smerwick, being sent, says Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, "by the Pope, and king Philip II. of Spain, to propagate the Catholic religion in Ireland;" they built a fort on the small rocky island in the harbour, which they called the Fort del Or, and they fortified and furnished it, having brought with them much money and ammunition, and arms enough to supply four or five thousand men. The earl of Ormond encamped at Tralee, and marched to attack the garrison, some of whom, it is said, retired to the woods of Glanigalt, but afterwards returned to the fort, and by a successful sally forced Ormond to retreat to Rathkeale, where he awaited the arrival of the deputy, lord Arthur Grey, who led 800 men from Dublin, under captains Zouch, Raleigh, Mackworth, Denny, &c., and these forces were joined by some of the troops left in Munster by the lord deputy Pelham; these formed a force far superior to that of the Irish, and their Spanish and Italian allies, besides, admiral Winter was stationed with some ships off the coast to co-operate with the deputy. They invested the fort by land and sea, and the garrison was summoned to surrender; but they made a vigorous sortie, in which they were repulsed, and the next night, Winter having landed the artillery from his ships, and the cannon of Grey being brought forward, and batteries formed, the siege commenced, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, lasted forty days, the place being well provided and bravely defended. The deputy having displayed a flag of truce, a gentleman of the name of Plunkett, who was in the garrison, advised San Joseph, the governor, who was in the garrison, not to enter into any terms, but the governor decided otherwise, and, accompanied by Plunkett as an interpreter, went to the deputy's camp to treat of a capitulation, which was agreed upon, though Plunkett was strongly opposed to it, and also the captain of the Cantabrians and Hercules de Pise; but San Joseph and the soldiers, tired of the siege, and fearing they could not defend the fort much longer, agreed to surrender on conditions of safety sworn to by deputy Grey, according to Mac Geoghegan and others; but Cox and Leland say the garrison surrendered unconditionally on merey, or at discretion. As soon as the garrison surrendered, they were immediately ordered to lay down their arms, and were all cruelly slaughtered, says Mac Geoghegan, by the barbarous English, the governor alone being saved; and Plunkett was mutilated and put to death with great torture; and from this massacre, says Mac Geoghegan, fides Greia, or the faith of Grey, became a proverb by which any act of signal treachery was designated. This massacre took place in November, 1580, and, according to authorities quoted in Curry's Civil Wars, ch. iii. "All the Spaniards and Italians, with the exception of eleven officers, were slaughtered in cold blood, and their bodies cast over the cliffs into the sea, for the fort stood on a mighty rock over the ocean, though the lord deputy had pledged his word and faith for their lives, liberty, goods, and safe conduct into Spain;" all the Irish in the garrison were hanged. Leland, in his History of Ireland (book iv. ch. 2), says: "The garrison, in their distress and terror, fatally surrendered at discretion, but that merey for which they sued was rigidly denied to them. Wingfield was commissioned to disarm them, and when this service was performed, an English company was sent into the fort; the Irish found they were reserved for execution by martial law. The Italian general and some officers were made prisoners of war, but

Owen, having resisted the English in the harvest of this year, Sir Nicholas Malby mustered a force, and marched eastward across the Shannon to attack O'Rourke, who, having sent all his women and people over the mountain of Slieve-an-Iarain (in Leitrim), demolished the castle of Leitrim before the arrival of Sir Nicholas; the castle was rebuilt by Sir Nicholas, and having then put guards and provisions into it, he himself returned back without committing any depredation or slaughter worth notice. O'Rourke laid siege to the castle, and did not permit one of the garrison to go in or out by its gates, so that Sir Nicholas was obliged to come to their relief and take them away.

O'Rourke marched with a force, in the month of November, between the rivers Suck and Shannon, and burned and plundered the woody districts, and a great portion of Hy Maine; he marched a second time with his forces into Hy Maine, in the month of December, and with quick movements he devastated the country, and slew half a company of soldiers of the men of Sir Nicholas Malby at Lis-dalon (in Roscommon); and a party of the O'Connors were along with O'Rourke on that expedition.

The sons of the earl of Clanrickard, namely Ulick and John, were at war with each other, and both were at peace with the English. A number of the gentlemen of Clanrickard were in dire imprisonment, in the keeping of the constable of the town of Loughrea, whose name was Master Jones, and who had the command of the garrison of the town, from the time the earl had been taken prisoner till then. It was a source of great affliction to John Burke that his town, and these prisoners, should be so long in the hands of the English, and he determined in his mind to make an attack by night on the town of Loughrea, which he accordingly did; he took the town, and slew every one in it who was able to make resistance, except alone the constable, to whom he gave quarter, and he then released the prisoners. After John haddone this, he sent his professors and trusty friends to hold a conference with his brother Ulick, requesting him to forsake the English, and that he himself would yield him obedience, as was the duty of a junior to yield submission to his senior, and he promised him to liberate and send him his son, whom he had in imprisonment; he also promised to give him Leitrim, the island of Ballinlough, and the town of Loughrea, as a mark of security. Ulick accepted these presents, and he and his brother joined with one accord against the English; in the first place they proceeded to destroy and demolish the fair-walled castles of Clanrickard, and in the first instance they demolished the castle of Loughrea, the chief family residence of the country; and it is doubtful if they left a castle undemolished from Clonfert of St. Brendan, in the east of Hy Anmchadha (in Galway), to Kilmacduagh, in the north of Kinel Aodha of Eachtge, and from Oran (in Galway), to Cluain-da-dhamh (Cloonaff in Roscommon). After that Donogh, the son of Murrough, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, and Mahon, the son of Torlogh, son of Mahon, son of the bishop O'Brien, joined the sons of the earl in this contention. Mahon was the first who rose in that contest, and who called a gathering of the insurgents of the neighbouring districts, and engaged to plunder and devastate from Burren to Limerick; but in short the greater portion of the people of the entire province of Connaught joined in that commotion, except alone the earl of Thomond, namely Donogh, the son of Conor, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh, son of Donal, son of Conor O'Brien, who was at that time sheriff of the county of Clare.

the garrison was butchered in cold blood, nor is it without pain that we find a service so horrid and detestable committed to Sir Walter Raleigh." Leland says "that Elizabeth expressed the utmost concern and displeasure at this barbarous execution, but such pretences and such professions could not efface the odiousness of this action, and on the Continent it was received with horror." In A.D. 1581, on some rumour of a conspiracy against the government, Lord Grey seized upon John Nugent, one of the barons of the Exchequer, and had him executed, according to Mac Geoghegan; though Leland says "Nugent was a man of singular good life and reputation." Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, and his son-in-law, Christopher Nugent, baron of Delvin, were seized by lord Grey, and committed to the custody of marshal Wingfield, and afterwards sent to the Tower of London. "All persons of English and Irish race now became alarmed," says Leland, "and Grey was represented as a man of blood, who had not only dishonoured his nation and sovereign among foreigners, but alienated the hearts of all the Irish subjects by repeated barbarities." Detested in his government, and severely censured in England, he grew weary of his present charge, and earnestly petitioned to be recalled. "Repeated complaints," says Leland, "were made of the inhuman rigour practised by Grey and his officers, and the queen was assured that he tyrannised with such barbarity, that little was left in Ireland for her majesty to reign over but carcases and ashes."—Leland, book iv. ch. 2. Cox says "Grey was represented at the court of England as a bloody man, that regarded not the lives of the subjects any more than the lives of dogs." The lord deputy Grey was recalled from Ireland in 1582.

O'Byrne (of Wicklow), namely, Dunlang, son of Edmond, died; his kindred were in insurrection against and plundering the English, while their country and estates were in possession of the English, so that no person was nominated in his place.

VIII. Danish Wars in the tenth and eleventh centuries.—In the preceding articles an account has been given of the Danish wars in the ninth and tenth centuries, and in this is continued from p. 488, an account of these wars in the tenth and eleventh centuries.

Battle of Tighgioran.—In A.D. 954, Congalach, monarch of Ireland, led his army to Leinster, plundered that province, and assembled the conventions of the Liffey for the space of three days; he was attacked by the Lagenians and Danes of Dublin, under Aulaf, the son of Godfrey, and a fierce battle was fought between them at Tighgioran, in Leinster, a place probably in Kildare; the forces of king Congalach were defeated with great slaughter, and he himself, with many chiefs of note, were slain.

In A.D. 959, according to Ware, Aulaf, at the head of the Danes of Dublin, sailed to Holyhead, and ravaged the island of Anglesey; and about this time, according to Keating, Roderick, king of Wales, invaded Ireland, and was slain there, but Hanmer says Roderick was killed by the Irish, who invaded Wales. About this time, according to Hanmer, or about A.D. 962, according to Ware, Edgar, king of England, invaded Ireland, and subdued a great part of the country, particularly Dublin, and a charter of king Edgar is quoted by Ware and Ussher, relating to the regulation of ecclesiastical matters in Ireland, but these accounts about king Edgar are considered doubtful by other historians. In A.D. 960, the sons of Aulaf and Lagmann came with their ships to Ireland, and laid waste Conaille, probably in Louth, and also Howth and Inis Míe Neeltain, now Ireland's Eye; and after that Lagmann went to Munster to bring away his brother Oin, and he plundered Inis Doinhle and Hy Liathan, in Cork, and they attacked Lisimore and Cork, and committed great depredations; the men of Hy Liathan and other parts of Cork attacked and defeated them with great slaughter, and 365 of them were slain, so that only the crews of three ships escaped. A great booty was carried off by the son of Aulaf from Ireland's Eye to Britain and the Isle of Mann. In this year a great spoil was taken by Sitrie Cam, or the Crooked, to the sea, as far as Hy Colgan, but he was attacked by Aulaf, with the Danes of Dublin and the Lagenians, and they gained a great victory over Sitrie Cam, who fled in his ships after his people were slaughtered. In A.D. 962, a victory was gained over Aulaf, grandson of Sitrie, at Inis Tiogue, by the men of Ossory, in which many of the Danes were slain, together with Batbar, son of Irai. In A.D. 965, Muiredach, abbot of Kildare, and heir to the throne of Leinster, was slain by Aulaf, lord of the Danes, and Carroll, the son of Lorean, prince of Leinster. In the same year, a great victory was gained over the Danes of Limerick, by Mahon, the son of Cineidi, in which great numbers of them were slaughtered, and their ships burned. In the same year the Danes of Dublin and of Leinster ravaged Bregia. In A.D. 966, Donal O'Neill, monarch of Ireland, marched with his forces to Leinster, and spoiled the country from the river Barrow, in the west, as far as the sea, and took with him immense preys of cattle, and he had various contests, for the space of two months, with the Danes and Lagenians. In A.D. 967, Kells was laid waste by Sitrie, son of Aulaf, lord of the Danes of Dublin, and Murrogh, the son of Finn, king of Leinster; but they were attacked by king Donal O'Neill, who gained a great victory over them. In A.D. 968, Kells was again devastated by Aulaf Cuaran, at the head of the Danes and Lagenians, and he carried off a great prey of cattle, slew a great many people, and gained a victory over the Hy Niall at Ardnulchan. In the same year, Artgal, prince of Ulidia, led his forces against the Danes of Connor, which place he plundered, and slew many of the Danes; and in the same year, Louth and Drumiskin were laid waste by Murtoigh, son of Donal O'Neill, king of Ireland, against the Danes, and he slew many of them; and Monasterboice was also laid waste by king Donal O'Neill, against the Danes, and 350 of them were burned by him in one house.

Battles in Munster.—About this period, namely from 950 to 980, various battles were fought against the Danes of Munster, according to the Annals of the Four Masters and Innisfallen. Cineidi, son of Lorean, who was king of Thomond, from about A.D. 940 to 950, defeated the Danes of Limerick and Waterford in several engagements; Cineide was succeeded as king of Munster by his son Mahon, who reigned for a few years and was slain A.D. 976, and was succeeded, as king of Munster, by his brother, the celebrated Brian Boroimhe; Mahon and his brother Brian also gained many great victories over the Danes. In A.D. 959, Dubhdaboireann, king of Cashel, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, defeated the Danes with great slaughter, at the Rath of Moín More, or the great bog, and was himself slain the same year. In A.D. 961, the Danes of Waterford having come to Lough Gur, in Limerick, were defeated there with great slaughter by Mahon, king of Thomond, and Donogh, the son of Ceallaehan, former king of Cashel.

Battle of Sulcoid.—In A.D. 968, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, O'Halloran and others, the Danes of Limerick, with powerful forces, were defeated in a great battle at Sulcoid by the Daleassians, and other troops of Munster, commanded by Mahon, king of Cashel, and his brother Brian Boru, in which three thousand of the Danes were slain, and the remnant being pursued to Limerick, great numbers of them were slaughtered; the city was sacked and their fortresses burned, and the victors carried off great spoils of gold, silver, and merchandize, clothing, and various valuable articles. The pass of Sulcoid, where this battle was fought, is situated on a plain between Limerick and Cashel, and guarded by great heights on both sides.

In A.D. 969, the Danes of Limerick were expelled from Inis Ubhdain, by Mahon, king of Munster. In A.D. 970, the Danes of Limerick, under the command of Ivar, together with the Martineans of Limerick (tribes of Firbolg descent), and the people of Lagmann were defeated by Mahon and his brother Brian. In A.D. 972, a battle was fought between Maolnuaidh, son of Bran, aided by the Danes and Mahon, in which many were slain. In A.D. 973, Magnus, son of Harold, commander of the Danes, having collected great forces from various parts of Ireland, plundered Inis Catba, now Iniscattery, an island in the Shannon, south of Limerick, where there were a great abbey and many churches, from which he carried off great booty, and many captives. The Four Masters state that Magnus was joined by the people of Lagmann of the Isles (the Orkneys and Hebrides), and Ivar, lord of the Danes of Limerick, was carried off by them, and they sacrilegiously violated the churches of St. Senanus, who was the patron saint of Iniscattery. In A.D. 975, the Danes of Limerick, Cork, and Waterford, were slaughtered in great numbers by Mahon and Brian.

Battle of Inis Cathay.—In A.D. 977, the island of Iniscathay, where the Danes of Limerick had a strong fortress, was attacked and plundered by Brian Boru, and Donal, son of the prince of Coreabaisein, in Clare, and 800 of the Danes, under the command of Ivar, Aulaf and Duibhecan were slain, along with Magnus, the son of Harold, and his two sons. Brian was then in the 50th year of his age, according to the Four Masters. In the same year, Brian plundered the islands towards the north of the Shannon, and all the Danish possessions there, and carried off from them great booty; in the same year also Brian marched with his forces into Hy Figeinte, in Limerick, towards the borders of Kerry, where he fought a battle with Donovan, prince of Hy Figeinte, and Aulaf, king of the Danes of Munster, whose combined forces were defeated, and immense numbers of them, together with Donovan and Aulaf, were slain.

Battle of Bealach Leachta.—In A.D. 978, Brian Boru and his son Murrogh, at the head of the Daleassians, defeated Moalmuadh, the son of Brann, of the race of Eogan More, prince of Desmond, together with his allies, the Danes of Munster, in a great battle, at Bealachleachta, in which 1200 of the Danes, and a great number of the Desmonians were slain, and Moalmuadh himself fell by the hand of Murrogh. The place where this battle

John, the son of the earl of Desmond, was at this time a wandering plunderer and insurgent, and although John, the son of Con O'Neill, and

James, the son of Maurice, son of the earl, were valiant in carrying on war and commotion against the English, yet John was a worthy successor to was fought, according to some accounts, was situated at a mountain called Slieve Caoin, near Fermoy, in Cork, or according to others, at the hill of Knock Ramhra, south of Mallow, while others state that it was near Macroom.

Battle of Fan Mac Connradh.—In A. D. 979, Donal O'Felan, prince of Desies, and the Danes of Waterford, made war against Brian Boru, but their united forces were defeated with great slaughter at a place called Fan Mac Connradh, and Brian pursued them to Waterford, which city he took, and burned their fortresses, and slew Donal O'Felan there. In A. D. 985, the men of Munster and the Danes of Waterford were defeated, with great slaughter, by the Conacians, and Dunlong, the son of Duibhdaboireann, heir apparent of Munster, and Muirgias, the son of Conor, heir apparent of Connaught, fell in the thick of battle.

Battles in Meath and Leinster.—In A. D. 969, Donal O'Neill, monarch of Ireland, being expelled from Meath to Ulster, by the Clan Colman, he soon after led the forces of Tyrone and Tyrconnell, and was joined by some of the men of Meath and Danes of Dublin, and he demolished the fortresses of Meath, and as far as Offaley, to be avenged of the Clan Colman.

Battle of Kilmona.—In A. D. 969, according to the Annals of Ulster and others, Donal, the son of Congalach, former monarch of Ireland, having aspired to the monarchy, leagued with the Danes of Dublin, under Aulaf, and with the Lagenians, against king Donal O'Neill, and a great battle was fought between them at a place called Cill Moná, in which great numbers were slain on both sides, and amongst others fell Ardgár, king of Ulidia, and many chiefs; the place where this battle was fought is now probably Kilmoon, near Ashbourne, in Meath. In the same year, Kells, in Meath, was devastated by the Danes, under Aulaf Cuarán. In A. D. 975, Murtogh, the son of king Donal O'Neill, and Congalach, the two heirs apparent to the crown of Ireland, were slain by the Danes under Aulaf, the son of Sitric.

Battle of Biothlainn.—In A. D. 976, the Danes of Dublin defeated the Lagenians in a great battle at Biothlainn, in Leinster, in which immense numbers were slain, together with Ugaire, king of Leinster, Murtogh, the son of Rian, prince of Hy Kinselagh, and Congalach, prince of Leige. In the same year, the Danes took Donal Claon, king of Leinster, prisoner. In A. D. 977, Kildare was devastated by the Danes.

Battle of Tara.—In A. D. 978, Malachy, king of Meath, who was afterwards the monarch Malachy II., at the head of the forces of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, gained a great victory over the Danes of Dublin, and their allies, the Danes and Norwegians of the Orkneys and Isle of Mann, at Tara. Vast numbers were slaughtered on both sides, and many valiant Irish chiefs fell in the thick of the fight, amongst others Brann, the son of Murtogh, heir to the crown of Leinster, Congalach, prince of Galeng, two chiefs of Fertulach, and Lachtan, lord of Mourne. The Danish forces were commanded by their taniist, Reginald, son of Aulaf, and five thousand of them, together with Reginald himself, Conmaol, son of Gilli-Arri, and many other nobles of Dublin were slain. Aulaf, the Danish king of Dublin, in great grief for the victory gained over his forces at Tara, and the death of his son Reginald, slain in that battle, retired soon after to the monastery of Columkille, at Iona, in the Hebrides, where he died the following year, A. D. 980, in penitence and pilgrimage. He was Aulaf V., and is called by the Annalists Aulaf Cuarán. He was succeeded as Danish king of Dublin by his son Gluniarn. In A. D. 988, Gluniarn was killed by one of his own common people, named Colvan, while intoxicated, and he was succeeded by his brother Sitric III. It has been mentioned by mistake at p. 487, that Sitric III. was killed at the battle of Dundalk, A. D. 944, but that Sitric was not king of the Danes, being only the commander of the Danish forces. It appears the Danish kings of Dublin formed marriage alliances with the Irish kings at this time, for it is stated by Keating and others, that Dunflath, daughter of the celebrated Murkertach Mac Neill, prince of Aileach, was married to Aulaf, and was mother of Gluniarn; and Dunflath, by a former marriage, was likewise the mother of the Irish monarch, Malachy II.; Gormflath, sister of Maolmora, king of Leinster, was second wife of the Danish king Aulaf, and after his death she was married to Brian Boru, as hereafter explained.

Battle of Dublin.—In A. D. 979, king Malachy II. and Eochy, king of Ulidia, marched a powerful army to Dublin, and fought a fierce battle with the Danes for three days and nights. Having vanquished the Danish forces, they liberated Donal Claon, king of Leinster, and Aidire O'Neill, who were kept as hostages by the Danes, and they likewise set at liberty 2000 persons who were kept as hostages or prisoners by the Danes, and they carried off great spoils and riches. All the race of Hy Niall from the Shannon to the sea were exempted by them, for ever, from paying any tributes or hostages to the Danes; and king Malachy issued a noble proclamation, commanding that "all the Irish who were in servitude and bondage with the Danes, would return to their respective countries in gladness and peace;" and the annalists add that the slavery of the Irish was equal to the Babylonian captivity, until Malachy set them free.

In A. D. 981, Kildare was plundered by the Danes of Waterford, under Ivar; and in A. D. 982, king Malachy, joined by the forces of Gluniarn, Danish king of Dublin, who was his maternal brother, gained a great victory over Donal Claon, king of Leinster, and his allies, the Danes of Waterford, under Ivar, and great numbers of them were slain and drowned, together with Giolla Patrick, the son of Ivar, and many other chiefs. In the same year Glendalough was devastated by the Danes of Dublin. In A. D. 985, the Danish forces came to the eastern part of Dalriada, in Antrim, with three ships, but were attacked and defeated, and seven score of them were slain and drowned. In the same year the monastery of St. Columkille, at Iona, in the Hebrides, was laid waste by the Danes on Christmas night, and they slew the abbot and fifteen monks, but in the following year is recorded a great slaughter of the Danes who devastated Iona, and 360 of them were slain, through the miracles of God and St. Columkille. In the same year, the Annals of Ulster record a great battle fought at the Isle of Mann, between the son of Harold and the Danes, in which 1000 men were slain.

Battles at Dublin, &c.—In A. D. 988, king Malachy, with his forces, attacked the Danes, and a great battle was fought between them at Dublin, in which a vast number of the Danes were slain, and he besieged their fortress for the space of twenty days, during which time they had no drink but the sea water; he compelled them to pay him the full tribute he appointed, together with an annual tax of one ounce of gold from each habitation, to be paid on every Christmas eve, for ever. In the same year, Godfrey, son of Harold, lord of the Danes of the isles in Scotland, was slain by the Dalriadians of Ulster, and in this year also Downpatrick was plundered and burned by the Danes. In A. D. 988, Derry was devastated by the Danes, and in the same year the Danish forces and the Lagenians laid waste Meath as far as Lough Ennell, near Mullingar. In A. D. 992, Ardbraccan, Muinebrocain, Donaghpatrick, and other churches in Meath were plundered by the Danes of Dublin, and they carried off great spoils from the country. In this year, Ivar, a Danish chief, was expelled from Dublin, through the intercession of the saints, and in the same year Giolla Cele, the son of Carroll, heir to the crown of Leinster, was slain by the son of Aulaf, the Dane. In A. D. 994, Ivar, a Danish chief, came to Dublin after Sitric, the son of Aulaf, and in this year Donaghpatrick, in Meath, was plundered by the Danes of Dublin, and Murtogh O'Connolly, but God was avenged on them, for they died before the end of a month after their return. Reginald, a Danish chief, was slain by the Lagenians, and Ivar having again fled from Dublin, was succeeded by Sitric. In this year king Malachy attacked and defeated the Danes of Dublin, and carried off from them, by force, two trophies of great value, namely, the golden collar of Tomar, and the sword of Caro-them. On a certain day the forementioned John proceeded to the woods of Aharlo (in Tipperary), in the month of July precisely, with a small force, lus. According to some accounts, Malachy slew in single combat one of the Danish champions, from whose neck he took the Torque or golden collar, which he wore ever after as a trophy of victory. Moore, in one of his Melodies, thus alludes to this circumstance—

"Let Erin remember the days of old Ere her faithless sons betrayed her,
When Malachy wore the collar of gold
Which he won from the proud invader."

In the year 1810, on digging near the earthen ramparts of the ancient palace at Tara, there were accidentally discovered two of the splendid Torques, or golden collars, worn by the kings and chiefs, which are now deposited in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy; they are of the purest gold, and of exquisite workmanship, spiral or twisted, of a circular form, and open on one side. One of these Torques is five feet seven inches in length, and something more than twenty-seven ounces in weight, and the other weighs more than twelve ounces. In A. D. 996, Clonard and Kells, in Meath, were devastated by the Danes. In A. D. 997, king Malachy, with the men of Meath, and Brian Boru, with the men of Munster, led their forces to Dublin, and carried off from the Danes many hostages and great riches. In the same year the Danes plundered Derry, and Ivar, with the Danes, and joined by the Ossorians, devastated Ily Kinsellagh, or Wexford. In A. D. 998, Kildare was plundered by the Danes of Dublin.

Battle of Glenn Mama.—In A. D. 998, the Lagenians having refused to pay the tributes imposed on them by Brian Boru, king of Munster, confederated with the Danes of Dublin, and collected their combined forces under the Danish king, Sitric, Harold, and other chiefs, and the men of Leinster under their king Maolmora Mac Murrough, and other leaders. Brian Boru, with his son Murrough, collected the Dalcassians and other forces of Munster, and aided by the men of Meath, under king Malachy, both armies met and fought a furious battle, in which the Danes and their allies were totally defeated, and, according to Keating and others, no less than five thousand of them were slain, and amongst the Danish chiefs who fell were Harold, the son of Aulaf, and Coilen, the son of Eitigen. The place where this battle was fought, called Glenn Mama, signifying the glen of the mountain pass, was in a valley situated near Dunlavin, on the borders of Wicklow and Dublin. The Four Masters quote, from an ancient bard, a passage on this battle, to the following effect:

"They came to the valley of Mama,
And having no water convenient,
They were forced to drink of the unhealthy pools,
And fought with stones towards the close of the conflict.
That victory was obtained by the kings,
Triumphantly, as far as the northern woods;
Dublin, the beautiful, they burned,
And devastated the plain of Leinster."

After the victory, Brian and Malachy marched to Dublin, where they remained a week, and took from the Danes great quantities of gold, silver, and other spoils, with many captives. They burned the fortress, and expelled the Danish king, Sitric, the son of Aulaf, but it appears the Danes were permitted again to possess Dublin in the following year, on giving hostages and paying tribute to Brian Boru. In 999, Brian led his forces to the plain of Bregia, towards Tara, joined by the Lagenians, the men of south Connaught, and the Danes of Dublin, whose predatory cavalry marched in the front ranks, but king Malachy attacked them, and they were almost all slain, and Brian was forced to retreat without battle or booty.

Battle of the Suck.—In A. D. 999, according to O'Halloran, and others, the Danes were defeated by the men of Connaught, with which it was not expedient to have gone a long distance, for his foot soldiers numbered less than a hundred shields, and he had only thirteen and the Dalcassians, under Brian Boru, and four thousand of them were slain at the river Suck, on the borders of Rosecommon and Galway.

Battles with the Danes in the eleventh century.—In A. D. 1001, Sitric, son of Aulaf, king of the Danes, went with his ships and laid waste Cill Cleithe and Inis Cumseraidh, and carried off many captives. In the same year, Brian Boru, with the men of Munster, joined by the Lagenians and Danes, marched to Athlone and subdued the southern Ily Niall and Conacians, and obtained their hostages, and he afterwards, joined by king Malachy, marched with those forces to Dundalk, to obtain hostages from Hugh O'Neill, king of Ulster, who was heir apparent to the crown of Ireland, and son of the late king, Donal O'Neill. In A. D. 1005, Dublin was burned by the people of southern Bregia.

Battle of Draighnein.—In A. D. 1012, the Danes of Dublin plundered Meath and Termon Feehin, but king Malachy led a great force of the men of Meath into the Danish territories, in Fingall, and burned their possessions as far as the Hill of Howth. Sitric, king of Dublin, and Maolmora, king of Leinster, marched against them, and slew 200 of them, together with Flann, the son of Malachy, and other chiefs. In the same year, Giolla Moehonna, the son of Fogartach, lord of South Bregia, a champion who was the terror of the Danes, died, and it is stated in the Annals of Ulster, by Dr. O'Connor, that he compelled the Danes to draw ploughs and harrows after them, yoked like horses. In this year also a great fleet of the Foreigners came to Munster, and they burned Cork, but God avenged that wicked deed soon after, for Aulaf, the son of Sitric, lord of the Danes, and other chiefs, with many of their men, were slain by the men of Munster. In the same year, the Four Masters record that there was great war between the Danes and Irish, and king Brian led his forces to Ath Carthinn, and for the space of three months attacked the fortresses of the Danes, and obtained victories over them, and Brian erected many fortresses, as those of Kiucora, and others. The Danes and Lagenians made war on Brian, who proceeded with his forces as far as Slieve Marge, in Leix, and he laid waste Leinster as far as Dublin. In A. D. 1013, according to the Annals of Inisfallen, Malachy, king of Meath, having complained to Brian of the devastations of the Danes and Lagenians, Brian, with a great force, marched against them, and plundered Ossory, and his son, Murrough, ravaged Leinster, as far as Glendalough, and the Termon of St. Kevin—took many hostages, and carried off great preys, which he brought to Brian, at Kilmainham, near Dublin, where Brian, with the men of Munster and of Connaught, remained encamped from Lammas to Christmas, without receiving battle from the Danes or Lagenians during that period.

The Battle of Clontarf.—Brian Boroimhe, commonly called Brian Boru, got the surname Boroimhe, or Borumha, which signifies of the Tribute, as the Irish word Boroimhe means tribute of cows or other cattle, and he derived this appellation of Brian of the Tributes, from his having compelled the kings of Leinster and of Tara, and also the Danes, to pay him tributes. Brian was son of Cinneide, king of Thomond, of the tribe of the Dalcassians, and race of Heber. Lorean, king of Munster, died A. D. 942, and Cinneide, son of Lorean, succeeded as king of Thomond, and died A. D. 950; he was succeeded by his son Mahon, a celebrated warrior, who gained many great victories over the Danes of Munster. Mahon was slain A. D. 976, according to the Annals of Inisfallen, and his brother Brian then became king of Munster, over which he ruled with great power and prosperity for a long period. About A. D. 1000, Brian entered into a contest for the sovereignty of Ireland, with the monarch Malachy II. whom he ultimately conquered and deposed in A. D. 1002, and marching his victorious forces to Meath, had himself proclaimed monarch of Ireland, at Tara, the residence of the ancient kings, thus transferring the sceptre from the race of Ily Niall to the House of Heber. According to the Four Masters, Brian was then in the horsemen; the direction he took towards the end of the day was along the clear stream of the Shannon, through Moy Ailbhe (Moyaliffe, in Tippe-

76th year of his age, and he reigned as monarch of Ireland twelve years, to his death at Clontarf, A. D. 1014. A sketch of the life of Brian has been already given at p. 147, in the note on Thomond. Brian, for a period of about forty years, waged incessant war with the Danes and their allies, particularly in Leinster and Munster, and, according to the various annalists and historians, he defeated them in more than forty battles, and having reduced the Danes of Leinster and Munster to subjection, he permitted them to reside in the cities of Dublin, Waterford, Limerick, and Cork, for purposes of commerce, but compelled them to pay him tributes, and it is stated by Keating, O'Halloran, and others, that he levied annually on the Danes of Limerick 365 pipes of red wine, and 150 pipes of wine, yearly, on the Danes of Dublin. The following account of the Battle of Clontarf has been collected from the Annals of Inisfallen, of Ulster, and of the Four Masters; from the histories of Keating, O'Halloran, &c., and from some ancient Irish MSS. in the library of Sir William Betham, and also from the Icelandic Saga in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian, and Celto-Norman Antiquities, and various other sources. Sitric III. Danish king of Dublin, having leagued with his relative, Maolmora Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, to avenge the various defeats and disasters they had sustained in their battles with Brian Boru and king Malachy, and determined, if possible, to acquire the entire sovereignty of Ireland, they, for this purpose, secretly dispatched emissaries to collect and combine all the forces they possibly could, for the invasion of Ireland, amongst the Danes and Norwegians of Northumberland, and of the Orkney Islands, the Hebrides, and Isle of Mann, together with auxiliaries from Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, and also, it is said, from the Normans of France, and some Belgians, with some Britons from Wales and Cornwall. The Annals of Inisfallen state that Danish forces came from all the places above-mentioned, and from all parts of the world where the Danes resided, and the Four Masters mention that all the Foreigners of eastern Europe came against Brian and Malachy. A powerful fleet, with those combined forces of foreigners, arrived at the bay of Dublin on Palm Sunday, the 18th of April, A. D. 1014, under the command of Brodar, the Danish admiral. The entire of these combined foreign forces, together with the Danes of Dublin, and other parts of Ireland, amounted to twelve thousand men, and their Irish allies, the Lagenians, under Maolmora Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, numbered nine thousand, thus making in all 21,000 men, and according to the Annals of Inisfallen, they amounted to seven Cutha or battalions, and each Cuth or battalion, according to the Irish writers, consisted of 3000 men. The forces from Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, were under the command of two princes, named Carolus Knutus and Andreas, sons of Sueno, king of Denmark, and a body of 1000 Norwegian warriors, completely covered with coats of mail, of brass and iron, was commanded by Carolus and Anrud, two sons of Eric, king of Norway. The Northmen, from the Orkneys, Hebrides, Isle of Mann, and Northumberland, were commanded by Sigurd, earl of Orkneys, the son of Lodar, assisted by Brodar, the Danish admiral, Oittir the Black, and other chiefs. The Danes of Dublin and other parts of Ireland, were commanded by Sitric, the Danish king, and two valiant chiefs, named Dolat and Conmaol. Their Irish allies, the Lagenians, were commanded by their king, Maolmora; Boadan, prince of West Leinster; the son of Tuathal, prince of Moy Liffey; the son of Brogarvan, prince of Offaly, and other chiefs. It is stated by Keating and others, that when Maolmora, king of Leinster, found all his foreign allies assembled, he sent a herald to Brian Boru, challenging him to battle on the Plains of Clontarf. This custom prevailed amongst the ancient Irish, of selecting a time and place, according to mutual consent, to decide their contests in a pitched battle. Brian had been some time making preparations to meet this powerful confederacy of foreign and domestic enemies, and having collected his forces, he was some time encamped, as before stated, on the plains of Kilmahnam, near Dublin. The Dalcassians, or troops of Thomond, rary), and he made a prey in Dubhfhed-Ua-Luig-deach (Borrisoleigh) early on the following morning, with which he proceeded directly eastward to Cor-collected from Clare, Limerick, and Tipperary, were commanded by himself in person, and his eldest son Murrough, aided by his five other sons, Teige, Donogh, Donal, Conor, and Flann; Torlogh, the son of Murrough, and grandson of Brian Boru, together with fifteen other valiant young chiefs, nephews and relations of Brian, also fought in this battle. Murrough, the eldest son of Brian, had the chief command, and though beyond the period of middle life, being in the 63d year of his age, yet he displayed uncommon energy, being a man of great bodily strength and distinguished valour, and he slew several of the Danish chieftains in single combat. The Eugenians, or troops of Desmond and Desies, collected from those parts of South Munster, which now form Cork, Kerry and Waterford, were commanded by Cian, or Kian, prince of Desmond, ancestor of the O'Mahonys, who is stated by the Annalists to have exceeded all the men of Erin in stature and beauty. Various other chieftains are mentioned as commanders of the Dalcassians, of the Eugenians, or Desmonians, Desians, &c., as Mothla O'Felan, prince of Desies, or Waterford; Mac Beotach, prince of Kerry Luachra, ancestor of the O'Conors, lords of Kerry; Scanlan, prince of Lough Lein, or Killarney; Hugh, son of Loughlin, prince of Conagh; Donal, prince of Corcahaiscin, in Clare; Hugh the Wounder, prince of Ely; Loinsach, prince of Conall Gahhra, in Limerick; Mac Donagan, prince of Ara, in Tipperary; Cathal, the son of Donnabhain, prince of Carberry, in Cork; Murtogh, prince of Hy Liathain, in Cork; Geibhionach O'Dubhgain, prince of Fermoy, in Cork. The various Munster clans were led to Clontarf by those chiefs and others, the ancestors of the O'Briens, Mac Carthys, O'Mahonys, O'Conors, O'Carrolls, O'Connells, O'Donoghues, O'Donovans, Mac Namaras, O'Felans, O'Keeffes, &c. The Connaught forces who came to the aid of Brian, were commanded by Teige O'Conor, king of Connaught; Maolroona O'Heyne, prince of Aidhne, in Galway, who was brother-in-law of Brian; Teige O'Kelly, prince of Hy Maine, in Galway; O'Flaherty, ancestor of the lords of West Connaught of that name; Murtogh O'Cadhlá, prince of Connamara, and Conor, son of Maolroona, prince of Moylurg, ancestor of the Mac Dermotts of Roscommon; Malachy, king of Meath, came with 1000 men, and according to Keating and O'Halloran, the king of Ulster made an offer of his troops and services, which was declined by Brian, in consequence of some former feuds between them. Flaherty O'Neill was at that time king of Ulster, and though he did not come, some of the Ulster chiefs joined the standard of Brian at Clontarf. O'Carroll, prince of Oirgiall, and Maguire, prince of Fermanagh, who are mentioned as two of the most illustrious of the men of Erin, came with their Ultonian forces, and also Felim O'Neill, a famous warrior, who killed a Danish champion in single combat, and carried off his shield, which was ornamented with silver, and hence he was called Felim of the Silver Shield. Sitric, a prince of Ulster, and a valiant warrior, is mentioned by O'Halloran as having fought on the side of Brian; he was probably some chief of Danish descent, or the name Sitric might have been taken by some Irish chief from intermarriage with the Danes. The Mormaors, or Great Stewards of Lennox and Marr, came with their forces from Scotland to assist the Irish, as hereafter explained.

Brian's entire army is considered to have amounted to about twenty thousand men, and the combined forces of the Danes and their allies amounted to 21,000, thus making in all more than 40,000 men engaged on both sides at Clontarf. The Danish forces all assembled at Clontarf, and were formed into three great divisions; the first, composed of the Danes of Dublin and other parts of Ireland, joined by the 1000 Norwegian warriors clad in coats of mail, was commanded by Sitric, king of Dublin, and the Iarls Dolat, Conmaol, Anrud, and Carolus; the second, composed of the Lagenians, and a battalion of Danes, were under Maolmora, king of Leinster, and his chiefs; and the third body, composed of the foreign auxiliaries from Denmark, from the Orkneys, &c., was under the command of Brodar, the Danish admiral, and Sigurd, earl of Orkneys. Brian's army was likewise formed into catenadh, and to Ikerrin (in Tipperary). The forces of the country in every direction through which he passed, collected in pursuit of him, viz., three divisions, the first composed of the Daleassians, commanded by himself in person, his son Murrogh, and other chiefs; the second body composed of the Conaicians under king Teige O'Connor, and the other chiefs above mentioned; the third division was formed by the Desmonians and Desians, under Kian, and the other chieftains of Desmond. Malachy, king of Meath, with his forces, was appointed to assist the Daleassians in the first division; and the Ultonians co-operated with the Desmonians in the third division, as did likewise the great Stewards of Lennox and Marr. It does not appear there were any Cavalry engaged on either side at Clontarf; the armies of the ancient Irish were chiefly composed of foot forces, and the Kerns or light infantry of those days were armed with spears, javelins, darts, slings, bows and arrows, and they sometimes flung showers of stones when in want of other weapons; they were extremely swift of foot, active in attacking, and rapid in retreating, and made fierce and irregular onsets into the ranks of their opponents. The Galloglasses or heavy infantry, were select men of great strength and stature, armed with swords and battle-axes, and being more steady and disciplined than the Kerns, stood firmly in their ranks, and bore the brunt of battle. The chief weapons of the Danish warriors were the sword, spear, and battle-axe, and they also had bodies of archers and slingers. A great body of the Danish and Norwegian warriors were, as above stated, clad in armour or coats of mail of brass and iron, and wore iron helmets and breast-plates, and they used large round or oval shields made of wood, bound with hoops of iron, and coloured red. The Standards of the Danes, as before described at p. 458, bore the figure of a Raven, which was the chief ensign on their banners. The Standards of the ancient Irish bore representations of various trees and animals, as the yew, the mountain ash, the oak, &c.; of wolf dogs or grey hounds, lions, leopards, deer, &c.; of weapons, as shields, swords, spears, and battle-axes; of musical instruments, as the Harp, Pipes, &c. Accounts of these banners are given in some of the Ossianic poems, and the bards also mention that the ancient warriors used a banner called Gal-Greine, signifying a Sun-Burst or Sun-Beam, and it bore a representation of the Sun and its rays. The banners were of various colours, green, blue, white, and red, but it appears red was a favourite colour, as Ireland is frequently designated Banba-na-m-Brutach Ruadh, that is, Ireland of the Red Banners. In O'Brien's Irish Dictionary at the word Concobar, it is stated that three Lions Rampant were the figures always borne on the banners of Brian Boru in his various battles. A few days before the battle Brian detached his son Donogh at the head of a battalion of the Munster troops into Leinster to lay waste the territory of his enemy Maolmora, but expecting that Donogh would be back in time for the conflict at Clontarf, however, Donogh did not return till the day after the battle, which was considered a great loss. At sun-rise on the morning of Good Friday, the 23rd of April, Brian, at the head of his forces, marched from the camp at Kilmalnam to Clontarf, and made an animating harangue encouraging his men to the encounter against these fierce pirates and Pagans, who had so frequently laid waste the country, and ravaged their towns, cities, and churches, with ruthless fury, and holding a sword in his right hand, and in his left a crucifix, he exhorted them by the symbol of the Cross, and reminding them that the day was the anniversary of Christ's Passion, he assured them of victory. The royal tent being pitched, Brian's standard was advanced, and the Raven-bearing banner of the Danes unfurled, fierce battle cries, and shouts of defiance arose on either side. The Irish bards raised the Rosga-Catha or war-song, and the Scandinavian Skalds recited their battle odes, and animated their champions to the contest. The brazen-tongued war-trumpets were blown with terrific blasts; the warriors rushed to the encounter, and the conflict raged on all sides with surpassing fury; showers of arrows and darts darkened the air, and volleys of stones from the slings whizzed through the ranks; the swords and battle-axes rang on the helmets and coats those of Ely O'Fogarty, of Hy Luigdeach, Pobal Droma and Pobal Purcell (all districts in Tipperary); the people of those territories deemed it a great of mail; the spears were shattered in the shock; shields and bucklers were rent asunder, the champions were cloven down, heroes were hacked and hewed to pieces, and in heaps of carnage lay the slain. The brave Murrogh, son of Brian, led the van, and the various Irish chiefs performed prodigies of valour, and amongst those Torlogh, son of Murrogh, then only in the 16th year of his age, was particularly distinguished for his prowess and deeds of heroism. The battalion of 1000 Northmen in coats of mail, did great execution amongst the Irish during the early part of the battle, but being attacked by Murrogh, at the head of his chosen battalions, those steel-clad champions were cloven down, and hewed through their iron helmets and armour by the heavy battle-axes and strong arms of the dauntless and well disciplined Daleassians, and scarcely one of the foreign warriors escaped to tell the fortunes of that day. Of the Danish commanders, Murrogh slew in single combat Sigurd, earl of Orkneys, whose scull he clove with one blow of his battle-axe; this commander is mentioned by some writers as Sitric, son of Lodar, but this is a mistake, for Sigurd, earl of Orkneys, son of Lodar, was the chieftain slain at Clontarf. The valiant chiefs Carolus and Connaol were also slain by Murrogh; and Anrud, son of the king of Norway, seeing his brother Carolus slain, furiously encountered Murrogh, whose right hand it is said was swollen, and unable to wield the battle-axe from incessant exertion during the day, but with his left hand he seized Anrud, and shaking him out of his coat of mail, he prostrated and pierced him through the body with his sword, but the Norwegian as he fell grasped Murrogh's skian or dagger, and as he stooped over him plunged it in his breast, and gave the heroic Murrogh a mortal wound, of which he died on the following morning. A curious incident is mentioned, that the Irish champions in the heat of battle, in order to quench their thirst, and cool their hands swollen from the violent use of the sword and battle-axe, frequently retired to an adjoining spring, and always returned to the conflict with fresh vigour, which the Danes observing, attacked the guards placed there, and destroyed the fountain; the well is still shown at Clontarf. The combat of Murrogh with Anrud happened in the evening, and the Danish forces were at that time nearly vanquished, and were soon after put to flight in all directions. Brodar, the Danish commander, having fled with some followers into a wood near Brian's tent, perceived that the king was guarded only by a few attendants, and taking advantage of the opportunity, he and his followers rushed into the royal tent; he slew the king with his sword, and at the same time cut down a youth who attended Brian, and valiantly interposed to save the life of his royal master; the aged hero, though taken by surprise, seized his battle-axe, made a brave resistance, and wounded some of his assailants. The assassin, raising his bloody sword aloft exclaimed, "Let it be proclaimed from man to man, that Brian has fallen by the hand of Brodar." The Danish chieftain thus endeavoured to rally his flying forces and renew the contest, but Brian's guards having heard of the king's death, returned and rushed on Brodar and his followers with great fury, cut them to pieces, and having seized Brodar himself, put him to death with excruciating torments. The battle had now raged with great fury from morning till near sunset, but the Foreigners and their allies were discomfited and routed on all sides—their ranks broken—their battalions scattered—their champions cut down—their standard bearers slain, and their Raven-bearing banners trampled in the dust; the remnant of their forces fled from the field in all directions, some to Dublin, and some to their ships; the Irish warriors like a rushing torrent pursued the flying Foreigners, and terrific was the uproar and clamour of the combatants, amidst the clashing of arms, the fierce shouts of the victors, and the wild shrieks of the vanquished. By the Four Masters the conflict is thus designated Cath Coradh Chuana Tairbh, that is, The Battle of Clontarf of the Heroes, and they describe it as "a sanguinary, violent, most fierce, furious, and unparalleled battle, the like of which was not prize for them to find John with so small a force, and they boldly and fiercely attacked him; but, however, the pursuers were defeated, and eighteen fought before that time." The Chronicon Scotorum, says, that "no battle equal to this had been fought in Ireland for many ages." After the Danish forces were put to flight, they were pursued, some to Dublin, and others to their ships at Howth, with dreadful carnage, and great numbers of them were drowned, and some hundreds of the women who accompanied the Danish army were likewise slain and drowned; king Sitric, with the remnant of his Danish forces and their Leinster allies, fled to Dublin. In the well-contested and sanguinary conflict of Clontarf many thousands fell on each side, but the accounts of the numbers slain are different. According to accounts given by Keating, O'Halloran, and others, the Danes and their allies lost about thirteen thousand men; namely, 4000 of the Danes of Dublin and other parts of Ireland; 6000 of the Danes, Norwegians, and other foreign auxiliaries; and 3000 of the men of Leinster. The accounts of the number of Brian's forces slain are also various, some making the number 4000, others 7000, and some state that no less than 11,000 of the Irish were slain. According to the Annals of Ulster 6000 of the Danish forces were slain, but, according to the Annals of Innisfallen, which are considered the best authority on this subject, there were 13,000 of the Danish forces slain, thus mentioned in the Irish "Torchar tri mile deag do Ghallaibh," which, in Dr. O'Connor's edition of the Annals, is by some mistake in the figures, made 3012. From a consideration of the different accounts, it appears that at least 10,000 of the Danish forces, and 3000 of their allies, the Lagenians, both making 13,000, and about 7000 of the Irish, under Brian Boru, &c., fell at Clontarf, the whole thus amounting to 20,000 men slain in that tremendous battle. Maolmora, king of Leinster, with 3000 of his forces, and many of his chiefs, fell in the battle, and almost all the Danish commanders were slain, many of whom have been above mentioned, and together with these also fell Gilla Cuaran, son of Gluniarn, and Duhgall, son of Aulaf, both of whom were heirs presumptive to the kingship of Dublin; Oittir the Black, Suartgar, Grisene, and Aulaf, the son of Lagman, were also slain. On the side of the Irish fell king Brian, and his heroic son Murrogh, together with Torlogh, the son of Murrogh, and Conang, nephew of Brian, one of the heirs to the throne of Munster; and, according to some accounts, two or three other sons of Brian, and many of his nephews and relatives were slain. Many of the chieftains of Munster already mentioned as commanders fell, as O'Felan, prince of Desies; the son of Beatach, prince of Kerry Luachra; Scanlan, prince of Lough Lein; Geibhionach, prince of Fermoy; Donal, prince of Corca Baisgin; Niall O'Quinn, an intimate friend of Brian, and many others. Of the Connaught commanders fell Mulroona O'Heyne, prince of Aidhne, and Teige O'Kelly, prince of Ily Maine, both in Galway. Many other chiefs of the Irish fell whose names are not recorded. It is stated by some of the historians that Malachy, king of Meath, who brought 1000 men to Clontarf, withdrew his forces a short distance from the field, and remained a spectator of the battle, without fighting a blow, which unpatriotic conduct is said to have arisen from resentment against Brian, who had deposed him some years before, and assumed the sovereignty of Ireland, leaving Malachy only king of Meath; but this circumstance is not mentioned by the Four Masters, and Charles O'Connor and others are of a contrary opinion, and consider the account of Malachy's desertion from the cause of his country as a fabrication altogether improbable; therefore it is impossible now to determine this point of historical controversy. It appears from the Four Masters that, towards the end of the battle, Malachy and his men attacked the Danes and Lagenians, and slew great numbers of them, together with Maolmora, king of Leinster, and many of his chiefs, and that Malachy gained a great victory over them from the river Tolka to Duhlin, by the force of fighting, and the strength and valour of warriors. It is stated in the ancient MS. called the Leabhar Oiris, as given by Keating, O'Halloran, and others, that Malachy, king of Meath, being requested by his reof their chiefs, of the heads of clans and towns, were slain in that engagement; and John carried off his prey into the dense and solitary woods of latives, the Clan Colman, to give an account of the battle of Clontarf, described it as follows:—"It is impossible for human language to describe that battle, nor could less than an angel from heaven adequately relate the terrors of that day. We were separated from the combatants, as spectators, at no greater distance than the breadth of a ditch and of a fallow field, the high wind of the spring blowing towards where we stood. Not longer than half an hour after they commenced the conflict could the combatants be distinguished from each other; not even a father or a brother could recognize each other, except by their voices, so closely were they mingled together. When the warriors engaged and grappled in close combat, it was dreadful to behold how their weapons glittered over their heads, in the sun, giving them the appearance of a numerous flock of white seagulls, flying in the air. Our hodies and clothes were all covered over as it were with a red rain of blood, borne from the battle field on the wings of the wind; the swords, spears, and battle-axes of the combatants were so cemented and entangled with clotted blood and locks of hair, that they could with difficulty use them, and it was a long time before they recovered their former brightness. To those who beheld the slaughter, as spectators, the sight was more terrific than to those engaged in the battle, which continued from sunrise until the shades of evening, when the full tide carried the ships away." The following passages from Mac Pherson's Ossian, in his poem on Fingal, may be quoted as descriptive of a fierce battle, similar to that of Clontarf:—"As autumn's dark storms, pouring from two echoing hills, towards each other, approach the heroes. As two deep streams from high rocks meet, mix, and roar on the plains loud, rough and dark in battle met Lochlin and Inisfail; chief mixed his strokes with chief, and man with man—steel clanging sounded on steel—helmets are cleft on high—blood bursts and smokes around—strings murmur on the polished yew—darts rush along the sky—spears fall like the circles of light, which brighten the face of night. As the noise of the troubled ocean, when roll the waves on high—as the last peal of the thunder in heaven, such is the din of battle—as rushes a stream of foam from the dark shady steep of Cromla, when the thunder is travelling above, and dark-hrown night sits on half the hill, so fierce, so vast, so terrible, rushed on the sons of Erin. As roll a thousand waves against the rocks, so Lochlin's host came on; as meets a rock a thousand waves, so Inisfail met Lochlin's spears." The royal tent, and Brian's head-quarters, are traditionally said to have been at the place now pointed out by the name of Conquer Hill, near the sea shore, a short distance beyond the present village of Clontarf, but the battle-field extended widely over the adjoining plains, and the pursuing and retreating parties had fierce conflicts along the shore towards Raheny, Baldoyle, and Howth, on one side, and on the other as far as the river Tolka, and the place now called Ballybough Bridge, towards Dublin. There are on the plains of Clontarf still some remains of large earthen mounds, no doubt the sepulchres of warriors slain there, and ancient weapons, as swords, battle-axes, spear-heads, &c., have been frequently dug up about the neighbourhood of Clontarf. After the battle the remnant of the Danish forces, under Sitric, returned to their garrison in Duhlin; and though the attempt to establish Danish supremacy in Ireland received a death-blow by the victory of Clontarf, yet the Danes continued at Dublin, Waterford, and other places, and held considerable power for more than a century after that time. The day after the battle, Kian, prince of Desmond, came with the remains of the Irish forces, and the wounded, to the camp at Kilmainham, and the same day, namely, Easter Saturday, Donogh, son of Brian Boru, arrived at Kilmainham with his battalions, which had made a successful expedition into Leinster. Many of the Irish chiefs slain at Clontarf were buried in the cemetery of the ancient abbey at Kilmainham, known in modern times by the name of Bully's Acre. The renowned Brian fell in the 88th year of his age, and he has been always justly celebrated as one of the greatest of the Irish kings, eminent for his valour, wisdom, abilities, Bealach More of Moy Dala (on the borders of Tipperary and Queen's county), after victory and slaughter. He was there joined by the sons of

Mac Gillpatrick, and the son of O'Carroll, along with a great number of insurgents and depredators, and all parties proceeded to Slieve Bloom, and patriotism, piety, munificence and patronage of learning and the arts; from the eminence of his character, as a patriot, a hero, and a legislator, he has been called the Irish Alfred, and by the Four Masters he is designated "the Augustus of Western Europe." By his various victories over the Danes, particularly that of Clontarf, gained by his energy, valour, and patriotism, he freed his country from the Danish yoke, but after his death there came no sovereign who could combine the provincial kings, princes, and chiefs, in any national confederacy, or crush their ruinous discord and dissensions, with a powerful hand. The name of Brian has, by Mariannus Scotus, and some of the Irish writers, been enrolled in the catalogue of the saints and martyrs of Ireland. Clontarf has been called the Marathon of Ireland, but it does not appear that any monument has been ever raised to the memory of Brian or the heroes who fell in that battle, or any triumphal column erected to commemorate the victory. Brian, foreseeing the probability of his death at Clontarf, had directed by his will that his remains should be buried at Armagh, the cathedral of which he had endowed with large donations of cattle and gold. On Easter Saturday, the day after the battle, Brian's body was conveyed in solemn procession to the abbey of St. Columbkille at Swords, by the monks of that place, and on Easter Sunday from thence to the monastery of St. Kieran at Duleek; the third day to the abbey of Louth, and on the fourth to Armagh, attended by Maolmuire, archbishop of Armagh, and his clergy in procession; the body was embalmed, and the funeral obsequies continued incessantly for twelve days and nights, with great magnificence and solemnity, and the remains then buried in a stone coffin at the north side of the great altar in the cathedral of Armagh. The bodies of Murrough, son of Brian, and his son Torlogh, together with the heads of Conang, nephew of Brian, and of Mothla O'Felan, prince of Desies, were buried at the same time in the south side of the cathedral. There still remain unpublished many interesting Irish MS. poems and prose compositions on the life and heroic actions of Brian Boru, the Battle of Clontarf, &c., of which accounts are given in O'Reilly's Irish writers. The celebrated Giolla Moduda, abbot of Ardbraecan, an eminent historian, in the twelfth century, in his chronological poem on the Christian Kings of Ireland, given in the first volume of Dr. O'Connor's Rer. Hib. Scrip., has on Brian Boru verses to the following effect:

"A raven of the sea—a rapid torrent,
Was Brian the brave, over Erin of varied fame,
Free from sadness, free from grief, and free from stain,
For twelve years of deserved prosperity;
To Clontarf of the clans of direful deeds,
Contending with the warlike chiefs of Denmark;
Nearly victorious were the Foreigners,
And they slew Brian Boruma."

Mac Liag, who was chief bard to Brian Boru, and of whom an account is given at A. D. 1015, in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, composed a work on Brian's battles, with some poems on his death, and a translation of one of them is given in the Irish Penny Journal for January, 1841, commencing with these two verses—

"O where, Kincora, is Brian the Great,
And where is the beauty that once was thine?
Oh where are the princes and nobles that sat
At the feast in thy halls, and drank the red wine?"

"Oh, where Kincora are thy valorous lords?
Oh, whither, thou Hospitable, are they gone?
Oh, where are the Daleassians of the golden swords?
And where are the warriors that Brian led on?"

Brian is mentioned to have been a man of majestic stature, highly distinguished for his personal prowess, bravery, and feats of arms, in his various battles; his residence, as above mentioned, was at the palace of Kincora, on the banks of the Shannon, near Killaloe, in the county of Clare; the place was called in Irish Ceann Cora, which signifies the Head of the Weir, from one placed there on the Shannon, and there are still to be seen some remains of the great earthen ramparts which surrounded his fortress. Amongst the recollections of Brian Boru it may be mentioned that his Harp is still preserved in the Museum of Trinity College, Dublin. Moore commemorates the glories of Brian in one of his beautiful Melodies, commencing thus:—

"Remember the glories of Brian the brave,
Though the days of the Hero are o'er,
Though lost to Momonia, and cold in his grave,
He returns to Kincora no more,
That star of the field, which so often had poured
Its beam on the battle, is set,
But enough of its glory remains on each sword
To light us to victory yet."

The battle of Clontarf is mentioned by some ancient foreign writers, and Lanigan in his Ecclesiastical History (vol. iii. p. 423), quotes the following passage from the Chronicle of Ademar, a monk of Angoulême in France, who wrote his book in the beginning of the eleventh century, shortly after the period of the battle of Clontarf—"His temporibus Normanni supradieti, quod patres eorum nunquam perperasse ausi sunt, cum innumera classe Hiberniam insulam, quæ Irlanda dicitur, ingressi sunt nna cum uxoribus et liberis et captivis Christianis, quos fecerant sibi servos ut Irlandis extinetis, ipsi pro ipsis inhabitarent opulentissimam terram, quæ xii. civitates, cum amplissimis episcopatibus et unum regem habet, ac propriam linguam, sed Latinas litteras, quam S. Patricius Romanus ad fidem convertit," &c. "In these times the above mentioned Northmen, a thing which their fathers never dared to do, with an innumerable fleet, invaded the island Hibernia, which is called Ireland, accompanied by their wives and children, and the Christian captives whom they had made their slaves, that having exterminated the Irish, they themselves in their stead, should inhabit that most wealthy land, which has 12 cities, with most ample bishopricks and one king, its own language, but the Latin letters, which country St. Patrick the Roman converted to the Christian faith." In Ademar's Chronicle it is further stated, that all the Northmen were slain in Ireland, and that crowds of their women flying from their pursuers, threw themselves into the sea, and, according to Ademar, the battle continued three days.

As already stated, the Mor Maors, or Great Stewards of Lennox and Marr, in Scotland, came with their forces to the aid of the Irish at Clontarf, which circumstance may be thus accounted for—Core, king of Cashel, in the fourth century, of the tribe of the Eugenians of Desmond, having been expelled from the sovereignty of Munster, retired to Albany, or Scotland, where he married the princess Mongfanna, daughter of Feredach, king of the Piets, as stated in O'Flaherty's Ogygia (vol. i. p. 286, and vol. ii. p. 304), by whom he had three sons, who became possessed of extensive territories, and from them were descended the Great Stewards of Lennox and Marr, dignities afterwards held by the royal family of the Stuarts, some of whom were afterwards earls and dukes of Lennox and Richmond. Muredach, High Steward of Lennox, and Donald High Steward of Marr, were slain at Clontarf, fighting on the side of their relatives the Eugenians of Desmond. As already explained in the course of these notes, the ancient Scottish kings, and the royal house of Stuart, were descended from the Irish princes of the race of Carbry Riada, who conquered Scotland from the Piets, in the sixth century; and amongst the Scottish nobility descended from the Milesian Irish, may be mentioned the Campbells, dukes of Argyle, and many other noble families of that name, who, according to the Ogygia and the genealogies of Keating, are shown to have been a branch of the Ithian thither came to them all the people of note of Offaly and of Leix. It was a fit place for plunder where John, the son of James, was, on that mountain, for he slept only on heaps of stones or earth, and drank nothing but the cold water of the limpid stream, from the palms of his hands, or out of his shoes;

race of Munster, of the same descent as the O'Driscolls, powerful chiefs in Cork, and other chiefs in Munster, mentioned in the note on Desmond.

Sigurd, the Norwegian, earl of the Orkney Islands, who fought on the side of the Danes, and was slain at Clontarf, is called in the Saga Sigurd the Big, being a man of great size and strength; he was son of Lodar or Lodver, earl of Orkneys. In the latter end of the ninth century, A. D. 894, the Norwegians, under their Iarls, Sigurd and Thorstein the Red, conquered the Orkneys, Hebrides, and Isle of Mann, together with a great part of the North of Scotland, and they and their descendants, as Iarls or Earls, held those territories for many centuries. Thorfinn, called the Skull-Cleaver, was a powerful earl of the Orkney Isles, in the latter end of the tenth century, about A. D. 990; he and his successor, Sigurd, fought many battles with the Mor Maors, or great Stewards of Moray, and other Scottish chiefs who attempted to recover those countries from the Norwegians. This Sigurd was the earl of Orkneys who came to Clontarf, and his son, Thorfinn, succeeded as earl, and conquered a great part of the North of Scotland; in his time, Shakespear's Macbeth, who was Mor Maor of Moray, and a descendant of the Scottish kings of Irish race, usurped the throne of Scotland, and reigned in the Southern half of the kingdom, while his ally, Thorfinn, ruled over the North. The kings of Norway, and the Norwegian earls, ruled over the Isle of Mann and the Hebrides, down to the middle of the thirteenth century, and to the fifteenth century over the Orkney Islands, and formed alliances with the great Scottish chiefs of the Highlands and Hebrides, as the earls of Moray, the earls of Marr, the earls of Argyle, and the Mac Donalds, lords of the Isles.

Amongst the causes which led to the battle of Clontarf, the Irish historians mention, that Maolmora, king of Leinster, being on a visit at the court of Brian Boru, at Kincora, he one day was present while Murrough, eldest son of Brian, was engaged in a game of chess, and Maolmora having advised his antagonist to make a move, by which Murrough lost the game, he being provoked by the interference of the king of Leinster, who was only a looker-on, sharply remarked, that if Maolmora had given the Danes such good advice at Glen Mama they would not have lost that battle. This observation highly incensed Maolmora, who considered himself insulted, as the loss of the battle of Glen Mama, where he was an ally to the Danes, was attributed to his mismanagement. The king of Leinster immediately quitted Kincora, much enraged, and he leagued with the Danes to be revenged for the insult he had received. It is to be observed that Maolmora, king of Leinster, was brother-in-law of Brian Boru, as the sister of Maolmora, named Gormflaith, was Brian's wife at that time; his first wife was Mora, daughter of Flann O'Heyne, prince of Hy Fiachra Aidhne, in Galway; and it appears that in rather advanced age he married Gormflaith, then a widow, whose first husband had been Aulaf, the Danish king of Dublin, by whom she had a son, Sitric, who commanded the Danes at Clontarf. The death of Gormflaith, or Gormlaith, is recorded in the Four Masters at A. D. 1030, and in a verse quoted, it is said that she made three leaps, the equal of which no woman ever made before, namely, that of Dublin, of Tara, and of Cashel, thus signifying her three elevations, that when the wife of Aulaf the Dane, she was queen of Dublin, and when married to Brian Boru, she was queen of Cashel and of Tara.

The Danish account of the Battle of Clontarf is extremely curious, and given in the Danish under the designation of Brians Bardagi, that is, Brian's Battle, in the Niala Saga of the Icelandic historians, together with a Latin version in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities, from which the following particulars have been taken:—Sitric, son of Aulaf Quaran, became Danish king of Dublin, and Kormloda, who is the same as Gormflaith of the Irish writers, Sitric's mother, and wife of Aulaf, had for her second husband Brian, king of Ireland. According to the

Saga, Kormloda is said to have been the most beautiful of women, but having been repudiated by Brian, she conspired against his life, and endeavoured to persuade her son Sitric to kill Brian, and Sitric was induced to go to Scotland and enter into a league with Sigurd, earl of Orkneys, to make war on Brian, to which Sigurd at length consented, on condition that Sitric's mother, Kormloda, should marry him, and that if Brian was conquered Sigurd himself should become king of Ireland. Sitric, having concluded his league with Sigurd, who agreed to bring all his forces to Dublin by Palm Sunday, returned to Dublin, and his mother, Kormloda, advised him to seek the aid of two famous Danish pirates, Ospak and Brodar, who had a fleet of thirty ships in the Isle of Mann. Brodar was induced to join Sitric by a promise similar to that made to Sigurd, namely, that he would give him his mother, Kormloda, in marriage, on which Brodar agreed to come to Dublin with his forces on Palm Sunday. It is said that Brodar had been some time a Christian, and was promoted as a deacon, but having rejected the Christian faith, he became a blasphemer of God, and returned to the worship of his idols; he was deeply skilled in magic, and admirably conversant with all the arts of war, and determined every thing by the sword; he was a man of immense strength, and great stature, and his copious dark hair was so long that it reached, in flowing locks, down to the belt about his middle. Brodar and Ospak having disagreed, Ospak detached his forces from Brodar, sailed to Ireland, and gave information to Brian of the great league formed against him, on which Brian collected his forces to prepare for battle. Ospak remained in great esteem at the court of Brian, and became a convert to the Christian faith. Sigurd, earl of Orkneys, according to agreement, sailed for Ireland with great forces, accompanied by several Iarls and chiefs, as Flosi, Gilla, Thorstein, Rafne Raudi, or Rafne the Red, &c., and on Palm Sunday the earls came with their entire army to Dublin, where Brodar had already arrived with all his forces, as thus expressed in the Saga, "Iarlinn kom med allan her sinn at Palma degi til Dyflinnar, thar var oc kommin Brodir med allan, her sinn." Brodar, having applied to some magicians to know the result of the battle, got a response, that if it was fought on Friday, Brian would fall, after gaining the victory, but if fought before that day, all those who came against Brian would be slain, hence this oracular response decided Brodar to fight the battle on Friday, as the most favourable day for the Danes. After Brian had arrived with all his forces at Dublin, they were led out near the city, and both sides prepared for battle, but it is stated that Brian was averse to fight on Friday, that day being Good Friday. The Danish forces were commanded by Brodar and Sitric, king of Dublin, on each wing, and the centre by Sigurd, earl of Orkneys, whose mother was Andura, daughter of Kiarval, an Irish king. The names of Brian's commanders are different from those given in the Irish accounts, being generally much changed in the Danish language. Ulfr Hraeda, a famous warrior, who is stated to have been Brian's brother, and was probably the chieftain named Maolroona O'Heyne, brother-in-law of Brian, commanded the right wing of the army opposed to Brodar; Ospak, the Danish chief who had joined Brian, led on the other wing opposed to Sitric; and a famous champion called Kerthialfadr, commanded the centre, and the Standards were carried before him; this chief appears to have been Murkertach, or Murrough, son of Brian Boru. Both armies commenced the battle with great fury, and Brodar broke through the ranks of his opponents, cutting down all those who stood in the front lines, and nothing could withstand or make an impression on him—not even the iron weapons. Ulfr having advanced against Brodar, struck him three tremendous blows which prostrated him, and as soon as he recovered his feet, he fled to an adjoining wood. Kerthialfadr and earl Sigurd contended in fierce combat, and all those who stood in the foremost ranks on either side, were prostrated to the earth, and Kerthialfadr broke through the earl's forces as far as the standards, clove down the his cooking utensils were the long rods of the wood, by which he dressed the flesh meat he took from his enemies. He continued to harass the standard bearer, and having killed several others who took the standard in succession, earl Sigurd commanded the champion called Rafne Raudi, or Rafne the Red, to carry the standard, but Rafne refused, and cried out "Carry the Pest yourself." Aimund the Fair was killed, and soon after earl Sigurd himself was slain, being transfixed with a javelin. The Danish forces were routed and slaughtered on all sides, and king Sitrie himself was put to flight. Rafne the Red, having been pushed into a river (the Tolka), by the pursuers, imagined, it is said, that he saw the torments of the infernal regions, and that demons endeavoured to snatch him away, on which he exclaimed, "O Peter, the Apostle, I, thy dog, will run twice, aye three times to Rome, if thou give me the power;" on saying which he was liberated, and crossed the river. This curious incident may be thus explained, that Rafne being pursued and tumbled into the river Tolka by the Irish, they saved his life on his promising to become a Christian, and make a pilgrimage to Rome. In the meantime Brodar, perceiving Brian's soldiers in pursuit of the flying Danes, and none left to guard the royal tent, rushed forward with some of his followers from their concealment in the wood, and, attacking the king with his sword, slew him, and it is said, cut off his head, together with the hand of an attending page, who had stretched it forth to save the king, and he then cried out—"Let it be proclaimed from man to man that Brian has fallen by Brodar." Immediately on hearing of Brian's death, the soldiers, who were in pursuit of the Danes, returned with Ulfr and Kerthialfadr, and having taken Brodar, they hung him on a tree, and tore out his entrails. It is stated that almost all the Danish forces and their chiefs were slain, and many curious particulars are related in the Saga concerning the battle, amongst others, that Thorstein, one of the Danish chiefs, in his flight stopped to tie the thongs of his shoes, on which he was asked by Kerthialfadr, why he did not run like the rest, he replied "Because I will not be able to reach this evening my own house in Iceland, where I have my household gods;" on saying which his life was saved by the Irish, and they took him under their protection. In seven days after Brian's Battle, Rafne the Red came to Gilla, earl of the Hebrides, and related the death of the earl Sigurd, Brodar, and all the other chiefs, and when asked what had happened his companions, replied that they had all fallen in the battle except Thorstein, who was saved by the Irish. Various visions, portentous appearances, and legends, are related in the Saga respecting the fight of Clontarf, which confirm the tremendous defeat of the Northmen, who long remembered the fatal tale of Brian's Battle. A curious ancient poem from the Icelandic Saga, on the Battle of Clontarf, is given in the Oreades, or History of the Orkney Isles, by the Danish historian Thormodus Torfeus, and also in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities, in Danish and in Latin. In this poem Hilda, the Scandinavian goddess of War and Victory, is represented with her goddesses called Valkyrie, who attended battle fields and conveyed the spirits of the heroes slain to the Hall of Odin, as having been seen on the very day of the battle in Caithness in Scotland, by a man named Darraudar; they were all on horseback, riding full speed towards a hill, into a cavern of which they entered, and on looking through an opening in the rocks, he saw twelve gigantic females working at a sort of loom, and weaving a web, and using as their instruments human heads, mangled limbs, swords, spears, arrows, and other weapons, and singing dreadful incantations, which when they had finished they tore the web of War and Victory into twelve pieces, and each taking her portion, they mounted their black steeds, and rode off with rapid speed, six to the north, and six to the south, holding drawn swords in their hands, and they are represented as having come to the field of Clontarf to animate and protect the heroes of the Northmen in the battle. A passage in this poem relative to the death of Brian, is to the following effect—"On the race of Irar (Erin), such a sorrow will fall as can never be forgotten amongst men." Gray, in his beautiful Ode entitled the Fatal Sisters, has given a spirited paraphrase of this poem, which keeps near the Butlers, and plunder Ossory from that place, and he afterwards made an incursion into Leix, and plundered and burned the monastery of Leix, on original, and the following verses particularly refer to the Battle of Clontarf. The youthful king mentioned in the poem as being saved, was Sitrie, king of Dublin, and the king who was killed was Brian; the dauntless earl who was slain was Sigurd, earl of Orkneys.

"Now the storm begins to lour,
Haste, the loom of Hell prepare,
Iron-sleet of arrowy shower
Hurtles in the darkened air.

"Glittering lances are the loom,
Where the dusky warp we strain,
Weaving many a Soldier's doom,
Orkney's woe, and Randver's bane.

"See the grisly texture grow,
'Tis of human entrails made,
And the weights, that play below,
Each a gasping warrior's head.

"Shafts for shuttles, dipped in gore,
Shoot the trembling cords along,
Sword that once a monarch bore,
Keeps the tissue close and strong.

"Mista, black terrific Maid,
Sangrida and Hilda see,
Join the wayward work to aid,
'Tis the woof of victory.

"Ere the ruddy sun be set,
Spears must shiver, javelins sing,
Blade with clattering buckler meet,
Hauberk crash, and helmet ring.

"Weave the crimson web of war,
Let us go and let us fly,
Where our friends the conflict share,
Where they triumph, where they die.

"As the paths of fate we tread,
Wading through the ensanguined field,
Gondula and Geira, spread
O'er the youthful King your shield.

"We the reins to slaughter give,
Ours to kill, and ours to spare;
Spite of danger, he shall live—
Weave the crimson web of war.

"Sisters, hence with spurs of speed,
Each her thundering falchion wield,
Each hestride her sable steed—
Hurry, hurry to the field.

"Horror covers all the heath,
Clouds of carnage blot the sun,
Sisters, weave the web of death;
Sisters, cease, the work is done.

"Low the dauntless Earl is laid,
Gored with many a gaping wound;
Fate demands a nobler head—
Soon a King shall hite the ground.

"Long his loss shall Erin weep,
Ne'er again his likeness see;
Long her strains in sorrow steep, Strains of Immortality!"

the son of the earl of Ormond, namely, Pierce, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe; he plundered Port Leix (now Portarlinton, in Queen's county), after having slain some of the guards of the town; he took from them accoutrements, armour, horses, arms, and much property, but in short he plundered seven towns in Leix in one day. He then proceeded from one territory to another until he arrived at Glenmalure (in Wicklow), where James Eustace and the sons of Hugh (the O'Byrnes), the son of John, were, by whom he was well received; thither came to him the O'Cavanaghs, O'Kinsellaghs, O'Byrnes, O'Tooles, and the insurgents of the country in general, and it would be too tedious to relate all they had spoiled and plundered on the English of Leinster and Meath. John and James Eustace proceeded, about the Michaelmas following, to meet the Italians who had come to his country before that, from whom he expected relief and assistance; but it did not happen so to them, being all slain and massacred by the lord justice, as we have already stated, before they had reached them.

A. D. 1581.

Torlogh, the son of Donogh, son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, who was upwards of a year in imprisonment with the English, was hanged on the 26th of May.

The son of the earl of Clanrickard, i. e. William Burke, the son of Rickard Saxanach, son of Ulick of the Heads, son of Rickard, son of Ulick of Knock Tuagh, was hanged in Galway on the third day after the execution of Torlogh O'Brien, viz., Torlogh was hanged on Thursday, and William on Saturday. The manner in which this had happened to William was, that having been joined with his kinsmen in the war, and demolishing their towns, as we have before stated, he became sorry for it, and went under the protection of the English at Galway, the month previous to his execution, but he was only deceived by a fictitious story which was conveyed to him, and he was taken prisoner and hanged; all his followers, who surrendered on the same protection, were also hanged.

Forty-five persons were hanged in Dublin, for treasonable crimes.

Barry More, i. e. James, the son of Richard, son of Thomas, son of Edmond, who was imprisoned in Dublin, died; that James was of the real genealogical stock of Barry Roe, and he was a man who suffered in the early part of his life much trouble and affliction; and he had no hope or expectation of even obtaining the title of Barry Roe, but, however, God granted him the chieftainship of Barry Maol, and also of Barry Roe (Barry Maol, or the Bald Barry, and Barry Ruadh, or the Red Barry, were titles borne by two branches of the family of the Barrys, earls of Barrymore, in Cork), and not these alone, but he was nominated chief of Barrymore, after the destruction of those whose rightful inheritance it was to possess that title till that time; his son, David Barry, was afterwards nominated the Barry by the earl of Desmond, and another son of his was, according to law, lord of Barry Roe.

Mac Gillpatrick, i. e. Bryan Oge (Bryan Fitzpatrick, baron of Ossory), the son of Bryan, son of John, son of Fingin, son of Fingin, son of Fingin (a name anglicised Florence), son of Donal, who was also imprisoned in Dublin, died; he was educated from his youth in England, and was versed in the manners and customs of the Court, so that all the Irish wondered at his being kept in confinement till his death; his brother Fingin was appointed in his place, for he had no children but one daughter. Two brothers of that Bryan Oge, namely the two young sons of the daughter of O'Conor Faily, by Mac Gillpatrick, i. e. Bryan, the son of John, were treacherously slain by Donal, son of Theobald O'Mulloy.

O'Carroll, i. e. William Odhar, the son of Ferganaim, son of Mulroona, son of John, who was also confined in Dublin, was liberated by the English and the lord justice, and he repaired back to his patrimony; he was on his way home attacked by some of the young O'Conors of Offaley, who were dissatisfied with his release and deliverance; they therefore put him to the sword, and slew him at once, and left his body exposed to the claws of wolves and ravens; his son, namely, John-an-Fhasaigh, the son of William Odhar, was nominated the O'Carroll.

The lord of Desies (in Waterford), i. e. James, the son of Gerald (Fitzgerald) son of John, son of Gerald More of Desies, son of James, son of Gerald the earl, died.

Mac Donogh (of the county of Cork), i.e. Owen, son of Donogh of the Road, son of Donogh Mac Donogh, died in Limerick, while imprisoned there by the English.

Donal of the County, the son of Teige, son of Cormac Oge, son of Cormac, son of Teige Mac Carthy, tanist of Muskerry, and second in command of the forces, died.

The English and the Geraldines (of Desmond), carried on war and strife against each other, so that they had not a cessation of hostilities, nor a truce of one month from the commencement of their war to this time, and it is impossible to enumerate, reckon, or relate all the evils they committed against each other.

John, the son of James, son of John (Fitzgerald of Desmond), marched with a force in the month of May eastward across the river Suir, and completely plundered the towns on the eastern side of the Suir, viz., Ardmaille, and the monastery of Athantsuil (Ardmayle and Athassell, near Cashel, in Tipperary); he then returned westward across the Suir, with much prey and booty, but being pursued and overtaken by a great and powerful force, he vigorously defended himself against them, with all his might, and finally gave them a defeat, in which upwards of three hundred of them were slain and drowned. After this victory John carried off the prey to the recesses of the woods, where he was in the habit of residing, at Claonglass and Coill More (in the barony of Connello, county of Limerick, on the borders of Kerry).

John, the son of James, proceeded with another force, in the month of June, against Mac Carthy More, and for the space of two or three days continued preying and plundering the country, from Muskerry to Ibh-Rathac (Iveragh, in Kerry), and returned with much prey and booty to Magh-g-Coinchine (Magonihy, in Kerry); the people who beheld them have stated that there never was before so much booty collected in one place.

The earl of Desmond remained encamped at Achaidh-da-Eo, (that is, the Field of the Two Yew Trees, now Aghadoe in Kerry), and at this time a Saxon captain, namely, captain Siuitse (Zouch), was appointed by the queen and the lord justice to govern Desmond and Kerry. That captain, with a cavalry force, proceeded by day and night for the purpose of making an attack on the earl of Desmond's camp; and the time he arrived at the camp was on a Sunday morning. The earl and all those along with him were at that time in a sound sleep and slumber, after having remained in a state of apprehension, and watching the whole night 'till then; the captain put to the sword, and slew every person he found standing in the passages, and did not cease skirmishing and fighting until he arrived at Castlemaine. Among the valiant chiefs slain that day by the captain, in Aghadoe, were Thomas Oge, the only son of Thomas, son of Maurice Duv, son of the earl (of Desmond); Maolmurry, the son of Donogh Bacach, son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh Mac Sweeney, and Teige, the grandson of Dermot, son of Cormac, from Moylaithimh.

The earl of Desmond marched with a force in the end of September, to the great plains about Cashel, and even into Cashel, and his forces carried away an immense deal of all sorts of property, consisting of brass, iron, accoutrements, apparel, riches, and cattle, and they completely plundered these countries. While carrying off the booty they were pursued by very numerous forces from the Third of Clonmel, and from Middlethird, and also by a force from the borders of the Suir, and from Duniasgaidh to Moyliffe. The earl commanded an ambuscade to be formed on the way between him and the pursuing forces, and when he found that their pursuers had passed the place of ambush, he turned on them, and they then began to kill and slaughter them in front and rear, so that their loss in that engagement amounted to upwards of four hundred; and the earl of Desmond, after this victorious slaughter and overthrow, returned to Aherlo with many horses and much booty.

It happened that a large body of bold and merciless soldiers marched from Adare (in Limerick), and having formed themselves into two parties, viz., one by water and the other by land, they scoured Kenry and along the river Mague, in the hope of killing or capturing some of the insurgents; when these two parties met together, in the vicinity of Baile-Ui-Cathlain (Ballycane in the barony of Pobblebrien, county of Limerick), they were met there by David Oge, the son of David (Barry), of the Lake, son of Thomas, son of John, son of Thomas, son of Philip, son of the knight, with his forces, and he commenced to charge and cut them down, and having circumvented them, he left them in gory, decapitated trunks, with their bodies hewed to pieces, so that not many escaped from being slaughtered on that spot by David and his people. When this news reached the captain of that town he mustered the soldiers of Kilmallock, and marched with an active and fierce force to scour Kenry, in the hope of meeting some person or persons on whom they might wreak their vengeance for the slaughter of their people; they proceeded to Ballycahane, which was one of the towns belonging to Purcell, who always aided the crown, from the beginning of the war between the English and the Geraldines, 'till that time; the captain slew seven score and ten (150) of women and children, and of every description of persons that he found both within and outside that town. That David, whom we have already mentioned, by whom the captain's people were slain, a man who suffered much evil and injury in the war of the Geraldines with the English, happened to proceed in December, with a crew of sixteen men, from the borders of Kenry, in a slender narrow skiff, who rowed along the coast of the Shannon, directly north-westward, and landed in Iniscattery, where they remained that night. When Torlogh, the son of Teige, son of Murrogh, son of Teige Roe, son of Torlogh, the son of Mac Mahon, from the territory of east Corcabaiscin (in Clare), received intelligence that David had passed him by, he launched a boat, in the beginning of the night, on the Shannon's blue stream, and he and those who accompanied him proceeded to Iniscattery, where they landed on the banks of the fair island; he then proceeded to the house in which David was, and they instantly set fire to the house, to burn it. David and his party quickly came forth unarmed, and surrendered at the mercy of Mac Mahon's son, who immediately took him and his people prisoners; the son of Mac Mahon returned back that night with his prisoners to Ballymacolman, and on the following day hanged David's people on the next trees to them; the brave hero David was sent to Limerick, where he was immediately executed.

A. D. 1581.

1. Doctor Saunders was an eminent English ecclesiastic who was appointed at Rome as the Pope's legate in Ireland, and came over with James Mac Maurice Fitzgerald, who landed with some forces of Italians and Spaniards at Smerwick in Kerry. Doctor Saunders accompanied the forces of the Geraldines of Desmond, Kilfeacle (in Tipperary), was taken by John, the son of the earl (of Desmond), on the fourth day of Christmas, and he continued to carry away for the space of two days all the brass, iron, accoutrements, treasure, and corn which he found in it to Aharlo, and afterwards demolished the town.

The Receiver of the Geraldines, i. e. Nicholas, the son of William, the son of Nicholas, was slain by the soldiers of Adare.

Doctor Sanduir died in the woods of Claonglass, and he was the supporting pillar of the Catholic faith, and the chief sustaining protection of the Geraldines in the war in which they were engaged, and this was not to be wondered at, for it was with James Mac Maurice he had come to Ireland.¹

The son of O'Sullivan Beire, i. e. Donal, the son of Donal, son of Dermot, son of Donal, son of Donal, son of Dermot Balbh, defeated the people of Carberry (in Cork), in the month of December. The manner in which that happened was this, that captain Zouch having proceeded from Cork, through Carberry, to the monastery of Bantry, sent the sons of Torlogh, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh Mac Sweeny; the son of O'Donovan, and a number of the chiefs of Pobals, and of the gentlemen of Carberry, to plunder the son of O'Sullivan. The forces thus sent by the captain having taken immense spoils and much booty, Donal thought it a great mortification to suffer his property to be carried away, and he himself alive, and he therefore attacked the Irish clans who were about the booty, and it was verified on that day, that it is not by a numerous force a battle is gained, for nearly three hundred of the Carberians were slain by Donal, although his own party did not number much more than fifty men, who were able to fight in that battle.

Patrick and Edmond, the sons of Fitz Maurice of Kerry, namely, Thomas, the son of Edmond, son of Thomas, son of Edmond, made their escape from the king's court, in Limerick, after the council had decreed they should be put to death, but, however, God did not sanction that decree. Those sons were for some time in concealment in but after encountering many fatigues and disappointments, he was seized with a violent disease of which he died, in great distress and destitution, in some retreat in the woods of Claenglais, in the barony of Conello, in the county of Limerick, where, according to Mac Geoghegan, he lay destitute of all relief, being attended in his last moments by Cornelius O'Ryan, titular bishop of Killaloe.

the woods of Clan Cuileain (in Clare), from which they afterwards proceeded into Clanmaurice (in Kerry); they were not long there until their supporters amounted to hundreds of kerns, although they had but a few supporters when they left the prison of Limerick; they spent the remainder of the year plundering and in insurrection.

The coarb of Senan died, namely, Calbhach, the son of Siacus, son of Siacus Mac Cathain (the successor of St. Senanus, abbot of Inis-Cathy, on the Shannon, south-west of Limerick).

John Oge and Con, the sons of John, son of Con Baeach, son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen O'Neill, marched with a force into Brefney O'Reilly; they devastated and plundered every part of Brefney through which they passed. The son of O'Reilly, i. e. Philip, the son of Hugh Connallach, son of Maolmora, son of John, with a large body of the forces of the country, pursued and overtook them carrying off the prey. The Eugenians (O'Neills of Tyrone), were not the better of the battle fought that day for many years, for the O'Reillys recovered the booty from them, and gained the victory, and they took Con, the son of John O'Neill, prisoner; and when John Oge could not be taken by the valiant forces, he was immediately put to the sword, and unfortunately slain; and lamentable was the fate which befel that esteemed man, for there was not of the Milesian race a man to whom that John would not have been a worthy heir.

O'Neill, i. e. Torlogh Luineach, marched with a force to take revenge on the O'Reillys for that battle, and he made a large camp of well-armed warriors in the very centre of Brefney O'Reilly, and began to spoil and completely destroy cattle, corn, and dwellings. O'Reilly then made peace with him, set Con at liberty, without a ransom, and agreed to a reparation to O'Neill for the death of John and his people.

Great dissensions arose between O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe, and his brother's son, namely, Con, the son of Calvach, son of Manus, son of Hugh Oge. Con went in alliance with O'Neill, i. e. Torlogh Luineach, the son of Niall Connallach, son of Art, to war against his kinsman; he complained, and represented to him the old animosities which had formerly existed between the Tirconnallians and Tyronians, and requested O'Neill to come to his aid, with a large force, against O'Donnell. Con's forces consisted of six score cavalry, with three companies of galloglasses, of the tribe of Roderick, of the Mac Sweeneys of Fanat, along with Torlogh, the son of Murrogh, son of John Roe; Nial, the son of Eivir, and Brian, the son of Eivir Mac Sweeney, and many Scots, and O'Neill, with all the forces he could collect. Those combined forces did not halt until they encamped at Kiltuathail, near Raphoe, a town which had been blessed by Colum Kille, and afterwards by Adamnan. When O'Donnell received intelligence of this, he forthwith collected all the forces he could, although he was very ill prepared at the time, being under subjection to the queen of England, and his friends were at variance with him till then, so that he was not prepared for war or battle, but, however, he deemed it a disgrace that an invading force should enter his country without giving them battle, even were he sure of losing his life on the spot. Con O'Donnell was so great in his own opinion, and his thoughts so exalted, that he really believed that if O'Neill, i. e. Torlogh, and O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, were united on one side, he should not hesitate to give them battle, so that he was sure of victory when aided by O'Neill. O'Donnell marched with his forces towards O'Neill's camp with all possible expedition, without halting or stopping to put his men in rank or order. O'Neill began to meditate before they had come up to him, and enquired of the Mac Sweeneys, particularly of Torlogh, the son of Roderick, who were along with him, and of Con (O'Donnell), what was their opinion as to the result of the intended battle of that day. One of them, namely, Torlogh, the son of Roderick, replied, and said "Should those advancing draw their breath, refresh themselves with water, and fall into regular rank and array, they would be sure to defeat us, even were our forces more numerous than theirs; but should they not halt to get into regular order, or quench their thirst, you and we must succeed in defeating them." They advanced in a boisterous manner, looking on the Tyronians with indifference, for the Tirconnallians were always accustomed to maintain their ground, whenever they had encountered them until then. As soon as both parties met, a fierce and desperate engagement ensued between them, and on that occasion the noble adage was verified, viz., that one kinsman is stimulated by another. O'Donnell and his forces were defeated and a great number of his people were slain; among those were Mac Sweeney of Banagh, i. e. Maolmurry, the son of Hugh, and his sons Murrough and Torlogh Meirgeach; Niall Modardha, the son of Niall Oge Mac Sweeney; but in short fifteen of the Mac Sweeneys of Banagh were slain; a great number of the Tuatha, and of those of Fanat, and of the O'Boyles; a great number also of the O'Gallaghers, along with Fergal, the son of Torlogh, son of Tuathal Balbh, and a vast number besides; and Mac Sweeny of Fanat was taken prisoner in that engagement. It was by the curse of the bishop O Firghil (bishop of Raphoe), that the Tirconnallians were defeated, because a party of them violated Kilmacrenan the day previous to that battle, and the bishop prayed that they might not prosper on their expedition; and it was on the 4th of July that defeat was given.

Calvach, the son of Donal, son of Teige, son of Cathal Oge, son of Donal, son of Owen, son of Donal, son of Murrough O'Connor, the only son of O'Connor Sligo, died; he was the more lamented in the country, because the worthy couple from whom this noble youth sprung had no hope or expectation of any other issue; and had he lived, he would, after the death of his father, have been sole heir and successor of the country from Moy Ceidne to Ceis Corran, and from Moy to the boundary of Brefney.²

2. The O'Conors of Sligo.—An account of the O'Conors, the ancient kings of Connaught, who were of the race of the Hy-Briunians, a branch of the Heremonians, has been given in the notes on South Connaught, and many distinguished princes and chiefs of the O'Conors of Connaught have been mentioned in the course of these Annals. They became divided into three great branches, the heads of which were styled the O'Conors Don, the O'Conors Roe, and the O'Conors Sligo. The O'Conors Don, who still retain the title, were the head branch, and the lineal descendants of the ancient kings of Connaught, and many chiefs of them, and of the O'Conors Roe, both located in the county of Roscommon, have been recorded in the Annals. The other branch of the O'Conors settled in Sligo, became powerful, and many of their chiefs have been also mentioned in the course of the Annals. It appears they had extensive possessions in Sligo, and their influence and authority extended over the greater part of the county, according to the above passage in the Annals, wherein it is stated that they exercised authority from Moy Ceidne to Ceis Corran, and from the Moy to the boundary of Brefney; Moy Ceidne, as before explained, was the ancient name of the plain extending near the Atlantic from Ballyshannon in Donegal to Bundrowes in Leitrim, and, according to Charles O'Connor, contained part of Carbury, in Sligo; and Kesh Corran is a mountain near Lough Arrow, in Sligo, towards the Curlew mountains, on the borders of Roscommon; their territory extended also, according to the Annals, from the river Moy, which separates the counties of Sligo and Mayo, to the boundary of Brefney, that is, of Leitrim. The O'Conors for a long period held the castle of Sligo, but generally in subjection to the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell, to whom that castle, and the territory of Carbury in Sligo originally belonged. The following document, which has been translated from an Irish MS. on vellum, in the valuable library of Sir William Betham, gives a very curious and interesting account of the conditions on which the O'Connor Sligo held the castle of that town under O'Donnell, and it illustrates the mode of military tenure under the ancient Irish chiefs. This document is dated in the year 1539, and runs as follows:

"These are the conditions and the agreement on which O'Donnell gives the Bardachd, that is, the wardenship of Sligo, to Teige, the son of Cathal Oge O'Connor, and on which he accepted it, viz., that Teige should be a trusty and faithful officer to O'Donnell on all occasions, against both the English and Irish of the country, and of distant parts, and to be counselled by him in every cause, great and small, both at home and abroad, in church and country (or lay and ecclesiastical), and particularly every time that O'Donnell demands Sligo from the son of Cathal Oge, he is obliged to deliver it to him; that every time O'Donnell proceeds into North Connaught, the son of Cathal Oge is bound to deliver to him the keys of Sligo, and to give him up the town itself (or castle), for the purpose of transacting his affairs in North Connaught, every time he demands it; that should O'Donnell be under apprehension that the English or Saxons might take Sligo, he shall receive it from the son of Cathal Oge, to demolish it (the castle), lest it should be taken possession of by the English, or by any others in opposition to O'Donnell, or the son of Cathal Oge; that Teige is bound to go along with the officers and marshals of O'Donnell, to every part of North Connaught, to enforce the lordship of O'Donnell; that every time O'Donnell sends Buannaghe (i. e. retained soldiers), into North Connaught, Teige is bound to support them, and not that alone, but to enforce their billeting (or quartering) for the soldiers in every other part of North Connaught, and that Teige shall have no other soldiers than those sent to him by O'Donnell, and such as he will permit him to retain; that Teige is bound to send O'Donnell every provincial king who may come to Sligo, and also every chief of a town throughout Sligo to be sent to O'Donnell, and do nothing else but that to which O'Donnell himself shall consent; that Teige shall make neither peace nor war with any person far or near, in church or country, but with O'Donnell's permission, and to be at war with every person whom O'Donnell desires him to be at war with; that O'Donnell shall have the small Tower of Sligo, to give it to whomsoever he himself may please of his own people, for the purpose of transacting in it all his private affairs in North Connaught. Teige gave the Almighty God, in his Divinity and Humanity, as an oath and security for the fulfilment of every thing in this engagement, and pledged himself that God might visit his body with all evils in this world, and to have no mercy on his soul at the point of death, if he did not fulfil this matter to O'Donnell, and to his heirs after him. The security for this covenant on the part of the church is the archbishop of Tuam, who is not to allow the benefit of mass, of communion, of confession, of baptism, of burial in any consecrated grave-yard, or the protection (sanctuary) of church or monastery to be given to Teige, or any person who would join him, should he violate any part of this engagement; and the archbishop is bound, and also every ecclesiastic under his jurisdiction, to extinguish the candles of the cross (that is, to pronounce excommunication), against Teige, and every one who joins him, as often as O'Donnell requires them to do so. The sureties in these conditions on behalf of the professional men of Ireland, are Conor Roe Mac Ward, O'Clery, and Fergal, the son of Donal Roe Mac Ward; and they themselves, and the professional men of Ireland, are bound to satirize Teige, as O'Donnell may require it. The witnesses to this compact are the guardian (i. e. abbot) of Donegal, namely, Roderick Mac Cormac, and the entire of his confraternity, namely, Torlogh O'Connor, John O'Donnell, Bryan Magrath, and William O'Dwyer; also, the archbishop of Tuam (Christopher Bodekine); the bishop O'Gallagher (Edmond O'Gallagher, bishop of Raphoe);

Cathal Oge, the son of Teige, son of Cathal Oge O'Conor, and Maolmora, the son of Maolmurry, son of Owen Mac Sweeny, and Feargan-eagla (this means a man without fear) his brother, together with a great number of the chiefs of the country, were slain in North Connaught by the Scots, who were overrunning the country at the instigation of sir Nicholas Malby. The constable of the Scots was Alexander, the son of Donal Ballach, son of Mac Donnell; and there were not in Ireland at that time two who bore a higher reputation, one as a gentleman, and the other as a constable, than Cathal Oge and Maolmora. On the same day the son of O'Conor Don, namely Hugh, the son of Dermot, son of Carbry, was taken prisoner by the Scots; but they refused to deliver him to the captain, and they afterwards proceeded with him to O'Rourke, and O'Rourke redeemed Hugh from the Scots, and O'Rourke and Hugh were after that in alliance. Alexander, before mentioned, left O'Rourke in the harvest of this year, and went to sir Nicholas (Malby), who received him with great welcome; and in November he was retained throughout Hy Fiachra of the Moy. When O'Conor Sligo, i. e. Donal, the son of Teige, son of Cathal Oge, and the people of sir Nicholas, received intelligence that they (the Scots), were so situated, they attacked them in their beds, and sleeping places, and slew Alexander, together with a vast number of his people; and that slaughter was due to O'Conor, in revenge of the death of his brother Cathal Oge.

The sons of the earl of Clanrickard concluded a peace with the English, in the summer of this year, after their towns had been demolished, and their kinsman hanged; they were granted peace without tax, cess or bondage, and without injury being done to their estate or military forces, while they should be peaceable, on condition, however, that they should pay the queen's rent twice a year; Mahon O'Brien was concerned in the peace of the sons of the earl. Two companies of soldiers were quartered in Thomond, with captain Diring, from November to the festival of St. Patrick.

A. D. 1582.

Margaret, the daughter of Hugh Duv, son of the abbot of Derry (Cuehonaht O'Fingil or O'Freel); and the dean of Derry. The year of our Lord when this indenture was written, in the monastery of Donegal, was 1539, on the 23d day of the month of June, on the Vigil of St. John the Baptist." The following are the signatures of the ecclesiastics who witnessed this document, as written in Latin: "Nos Edmundus, Episcopus Rapotensis interfui tempore premissorum; Ego Abbas Derensis, testis sum omnium premissorum; Ego Frater Rogerus Mac Cormae, Guardianus de Donegal, cum meo conventu fuimus testes premissorum omnium; Ego Shane O'Donnell sum testium premissorum unus; Ego Frater Terrentius O'Conor, testis interfui premis; Ego Decanus Derensis interfui tempore premissa." The professional men signed as follows in Irish: "I Conor Roe, am in these sureties; I O'Clery, am in these sureties; I Fergal Mac Ward, am in these sureties."

In Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, it is stated, "that in the year 1585, in the government of the lord deputy sir John Perrott, O'Conor Sligo, who had formerly taken a Patent for the county of Sligo, at the yearly rent of £100, did covenant that in lieu of this cess he would pay per annum a fine horse, and 100 large fat beeves for three years, and afterwards 130 beeves annually at Michaelmas, at the castle of Athlone; and also that he would at all Hostings bring 20 horse and 60 foot, and maintain them 40 days, and would pay in money £25 per annum, and that in cases of necessity, he should assist the queen with all his forces, and that he should make legal estates to the freeholders, they paying their proportion of the aforesaid contribution; and the queen granted O'Conor all forfeitures for felony or by outlawry, or recognizance, and all waifs, strays, and penalties for bloodshed." Thus it appears that at that period, in the reign of Elizabeth, the O'Conor Sligo had the chief authority in Sligo, and possessed under the crown the lands of Sligo, and was equal in power to an earl over that county.

Besides the O'Conors of Connaught, there were several other great families of the O'Conors, all of different descent, and distinct tribes, as the O'Conors, lords of Kerry; the O'Conors, lords of Coreomroe in Clare; the O'Conors, lords of Offaley; and the O'Conors, chiefs in Derry; accounts of all these different chiefs have been given in the course of the Annals.

The O'Conors of Offaley.—An account of this great family, who were princes and lords of Offaley in Kildare and King's county, and the head of whom was styled the O'Conor Faily, has been given in the notes on Offaley, and other parts of these Annals. Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, gives an account of a contention which arose between two chiefs of the O'Conors of Offaley, and was decided in a remarkable single combat, or trial by wager of battle, in the month of September, 1583. Teige Mac Gillpatrick O'Conor was accused by Conor Mac Cormae O'Conor, before the lords justices and council, of killing and murdering his men, being under protection; Teige answered, that they had, since the protection, confederated with the rebel Cathal O'Conor, and therefore were also rebels, and that he was ready to justify his assertion by combat. Conor accepted the challenge, and the weapons, which were sword and target, being chosen by the defendant, the next day was appointed for the battle, and Patrons were assigned to each of them to introduce them into the Lists; the day being come and the court sitting, the combatants were likewise seated on two stools, one at each end of the inner court of the Castle of Dublin. Most of the military officers were present to render this action the more solemn, and the pleadings being read, the combatants were stripped to their shirts and searched by secretary Fenton, and then each of them took a corporal oath that his quarrel was true, and that he would justify the same with his blood; then at the sound of the trumpets they began to fight with great resolution, but at length Conor Mac Cormae was twice wounded in his leg, and once in his eye, and therefore designed to close with his adversary, but Teige being too strong for him, pummelled him till he loosened his murrion, and then he easily stunned him, and with Conor's own sword cut off his head and presented it to the lords justices, sir Henry Wallop, and Adam Loftus, archbishop of Dublin.

Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv, son of Torlogh of the Wine O'Donnell, the wife of O'Reilly (of Cavan), i. e. of Maolmora, the son of John, son of Cathal, died in the spring of this year; and it is doubtful if there lived in Ireland at that time, of the women of the Gadelian race, a more bountiful woman than that Margaret.

The earl of Clanrickard, i. e. Rickard Saxanach, the son of Ulick of the heads, son of Rickard, son of Ulick of Knock Tuagh, son of Ulick Meadhanach, son of Ulick of the Wine, who had been taken prisoner by the lord justice, sir Henry Sydney, in the year of the Christian era 1576, and had been confined for a year in Dublin after his capture, and had been the remainder of the time till this year imprisoned in London, was seized in the summer of this year with a continued consumptive disease, and his physicians and medical attendants informed him that he was more likely to die than recover from that sickness, and if he had any chance of recovering his health it would be by visiting his native place, and living in the air of his own country; the earl was therefore allowed to return to Ireland on account of his ill health, by permission of the sovereign and council, and a pardon was granted him for his sons, and forgiveness for all the depredations they had hitherto committed. He first landed in Dublin, and then proceeded to Athlone, and from thence to the town of Galway, where he was welcomed with great gladness; he remained there to rest and recruit himself, and his friends and relatives from among the English and Irish came to visit him. When he wished to go visit his people, his territory, and sons, his malady and sickness increased, of which he finally died, in the month of August precisely. His Cluiche Caointeach (the ceremony of funeral-cry practised by the ancient Irish), was performed by his merchant friends in that town, and his corpse was conveyed to be interred with due solemnity in the town of Loughrea. His sons, who were in peace with each other till then, having entered into a dispute and controversy, went before sir Nicholas Malby, the governor of the province of Connaught, and both having proceeded to Dublin, to appear before the high council, peace was made between them on that occasion, on the following terms, viz., Ulick was appointed lord and earl in his father's place, and the barony of Leitrim was conferred on John, and from that time forth their lands, towns, and church livings, were allotted to each, so that they were publicly friends, but privately discontented.

Teige, the son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh O'Brien, died in the month of August, and likewise in the same week as the earl; the deceased was a champion in bravery, and a hero in military achievements; he was for some time tanist of Thomond, until he was expelled along with his brother by Donal; he afterwards went to Spain and France, and from thence to England, where he obtained pardon, and his landed property, except the tanistship alone; he died in the fulness of age, and was buried in the monastery of Ennis.

Donogh, the son of Murrogh, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh O'Brien, came by an ignominious death, viz., was hanged in Thomond by captain Mordant, who was marshal in the country, and by the sheriff, sir George, the son of Thomas Cusack; he had, in the previous year, joined the sons of the earl of Clanrickard, but having repented, he returned on protection; those having found a fault and deficiency in the protection, took Donogh prisoner, and hanged him, as we have before stated, on the 29th of September, on a Friday precisely, at the gate of Limerick; his corpse was conveyed to his native place, and was interred at Ennis.

Donogh, the son of Torlogh, son of Murtogh, son of Mac I-Brien of Ara (in Tipperary), after having been for a long time in opposition to his father, and in league with the earl of Desmond, returned under protection; but he was attacked in an unfriendly manner, and slain by his brother Torlogh.

O'Carroll, i. e. John-an-Bhealaigh, the son of William Odhar, son of Ferganainm, son of Mulroona, son of John, was, with abominable and unprofitable treachery, slain by Mulroona, the son of Teige Caoch, son of Ferganainm; but Mulroona, however, did not long survive that murder, for he himself came by his death in three months after, having been slain by a relative, namely, Calvach, the son of William Odhar, and Calvach himself was nominated to succeed his brother.

The four sons of Roche (of Fermoy, in Cork), namely, the sons of David, son of Maurice, son of David, son of Maurice, were slain by traitors in the month of April; and although they were slain by the same party, it was not on the same day they were killed, for Redmond and Theobald, with a great many of the gentlemen of their people, and of their chief constables, were slain while in pursuit of a prey, which was carried off by the seneschal of Imokilly, and Gillpatrick Condon, in a part of the country where they came in contact with the traitors (Fitzgerald, seneschal of Imokilly, killed twenty-five of the garrison of Lismore). Theobald's wife at that time was Grace, the daughter of Torlogh, son of Murtoth, i. e. the daughter of Mac I-Brien of Ara, and when she beheld her husband with his bones broken in pieces, and in a disfigured condition, while being conveyed towards her, she screamed in a wild frantic manner, and died the same night alongside of her husband, and both were buried together.

The Barry, i. e. David, (Barry, of Barrymore, in Cork), defeated Maurice, the oldest son of Roche, in an engagement; and Maurice made his escape from that conflict after he had lost many of his men and horses.

The seneschal before mentioned (Fitzgerald of Imokilly), and Patrick Condon, about the following November, entered the western part of Roche's country, (Fermoy, in Cork). John and Ulick, the young sons of Roche, and the entire country, rose up against the depredators, and defeated the traitors in the first conflict; they continued to pursue them beyond the boundary of the country, to the vicinity of their strongholds in the forests and woods, where the depredators turned on the two sons of Roche, and slew them, together with all those that were along with them; and though it seldom happens that a slaughter takes place without some one escaping, very few escaped of those who had taken part in that pursuit; nobles, landholders, chiefs of Pobals (people, or clans of districts), and men of worth and consequence of the country, were slain there; the constables of the Mac Sweeneys were also slain there, so that not more than fourteen men of the people of the country, who bore arms, survived that conflict, and Roche and Maurice were obliged to bring a population from other districts to inhabit the country afterwards.

The son of O'Mulloy (of King's county), i. e. Donal, the son of Theobald, was slain, and his death was the less lamented, on account of his having endeavoured to supplant and expel his father, in order that he himself might assume his place.

The son of the earl of Desmond, that is to say, John, the son of James, son of John, son of Thomas, the earl, fell unfortunately by his enemies, which happened exactly after the following manner: John having proceeded with four horsemen to the woods of Aharlo, to hold a conference with Barry More, who was leagued with him in carrying on depredations, crossed Avonmore (the river Blackwater), southward, in the noon of a dark gloomy day, and he was met front to front, and face to face, by captain Zouch, with an armed force, without either being in quest of the other; John was wounded and taken prisoner on the spot, and he had not gone a mile beyond that place when he died. They conveyed him with his face under, across his own horse, to Cork, and on arriving in that town, they cut him into quarters, and his head was sent to Dublin, as a trophy of victory; and were it not that he was opposed to the crown of England, the loss of that good man would have been lamentable, on account of his liberality in bestowing valuable presents and much wealth, and of his feats of arms in leading forces. James, the son of John, son of Gerald, son of Thomas, the earl, who was taken prisoner along with John, the son of the earl, was hanged shortly after, together with his two sons.¹

A. D. 1582.

1. Death of Sir John of Desmond.—In 1581 David Barry, baron of Buttevant and Barrymore in Cork, having opposed the government, captain Walter Raleigh obtained a warrant to seize on Barry's court, and having set forward with his forces, lord Barry set fire to his castle sooner than let it fall into the hands of the English, and at the same time Fitzgerald, seneschal of Imokilly, having attacked Raleigh, defeated his troops and forced him to fly to Cork. David Barry and Fitzgerald of Imokilly having afterwards entered into a contention, sir John of Desmond, in the month of August, proceeded with a force near the Blackwater to reconcile them, but captain Zouch, then governor of Munster, and captain Dowdall, having learned where Desmond was to cross the Blackwater, set out in the night with a strong force from Cork, and having arrived by break of day at Castlelyons, they posted themselves in a wood through which Desmond was to pass, who being thus taken by surprise, fought valiantly, but fell mortally wounded, and died on the way as they carried him to Cork, along with many of his followers who were made prisoners. Desmond's head was cut off and sent to Dublin, where it was fastened to a pole, and put on the top of the castle, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, his body was tied to a gibbet on the gates of Cork, where it remained for three or four years, till it was at length carried into the sea by the wind. This sir John Fitzgerald, called John of Desmond, was a valiant commander, and was brother of the earl of Desmond, and of sir James of Desmond, whose death has been recorded in the Annals at the year 1580.

Catheleen, the daughter of Teige, son of Donal, son of Cormac Ladrach Mac Carthy, the wife of Fitzmaurice of Kerry, died; her funeral proceeded on Loch Lein Linfhiac laigh, and her remains were conveyed from one island to another, through fear of the plunderers, and were interred in the monastery of Airbealach (Irrelagh, or Mucruss Abbey, at the Lakes of Killarney).

Great wind, with constant rain, stormy weather, and excessive dearth, prevailed in those two years successively; this year also was remarkable for large nuts.

A company of foot soldiers, and half a company of cavalry, of captain Zouch's force, were quartered at Ardfert (in Kerry), from the beginning of harvest of the present year; and although they had plenty of provisions and stores from the queen, they did not cease from consuming and wasting the country about them; and the son of the chief of each Pobal (clan), in the country was obliged to be sent to them as a hostage.

Patrick, Edmond, and Robert, the sons of Fitz Maurice (of Kerry), were joined with the Geraldines in the war, since they had left their imprisonment in Limerick till then. On a certain night those proceeded to Ardfert, and on the following morning seized on the booty of the town; Captain Haitsein, the captain of the cavalry, rushed suddenly upon them, without waiting for his soldiers, but he was quickly encountered, and in the first onset was dismounted and dispatched by the sword. The sons of Fitzmaurice returned with their prey, and encamped at the town despite of the soldiers; a gentleman of the Clan Sheehy, who was at that time along with the sons of Fitzmaurice, namely, Murtogh, the son of Edmond, son of Manus, son of Edmond Mac Sheehy, was slain before the door of the monastery of O'Torna (Odorney, in Kerry), by the sons of the bishop of Kerry (James Fitzmaurice, bishop of Ardfert), who were aiding the queen's people on that occasion. Fitzmaurice, (Thomas Fitzmaurice, baron of Lixnaw, and ancestor of the earls of Kerry), who was till then with the greater portion of his estate under law, when he saw his country being completely plundered, and having been informed of the death of the captain by his sons, he at once demolished Leacsnamha, Listuathail, Baille and Baile-an-Bhundenaign (the castles of Lixnaw, Listowel, Beaulieu, and Ballybunnion, in Kerry), and afterwards joined his sons. He was not joined in that insurrection by the inhabitants of Baile-Mac-an-Chaim, or Baile-ui-Chaolaidh, or by the Mac Pierces. Fitzmaurice took his sons with him from the town, and both parties returned back to their woods; but they had scarcely gone when Captain Zouch came to the country, on report of the death of Captain Hatsin, and to relieve his people; when he did not succeed in overtaking them about the town, he hanged the young hostages who were in the hands of his people from the country; he then scoured the woods in search of Fitzmaurice and his sons, and on that occasion he took much prey and booty, and slew many persons; he put the inhabitants who had been along with the captain in that insurrection in possession of Leac-Bebion, which had been vacated by Fitzmaurice and his people. In some time after that, Fitzmaurice brought the earl of Desmond to the country, and having given battle to the people of Ardfert, they slew their captain, lieutenant, and ensign, and a great number along with them. Fitzmaurice suffered much above all others in that war, for his people were exterminated, and his corn, buildings, and dwellings, were destroyed; he had no security in taking refuge in the hollows of trees, or of rocks, or caves of the earth, or in underwoods, for in those recesses he dreaded his enemies might find him. Captain Zouch went to England in the month of August in this year, having left another captain in his place as governor over the people of Munster; this captain took with him all the soldiers that then were in Ardfert to Cork, and from that time there was not a company, or half a company of soldiers to overrun the country, or harass the Geraldines, to the end of this year. Captain Zouch was killed in a conflict in England before he could return to Ireland.

The earl of Desmond was located, from the middle month of harvest of the present year to the end of the year, between Druim Fingin, Aharlo, and Coill-an-Chuigidh, and his sole study and occupation during that time was to harass the Butlers by day and night, in retaliation for all the injury the earl of Ormond had committed on the Geraldines till then. It was the more easy to harass the Butlers, that the earl of Ormond was in England this year, and on that occasion he (Desmond), had his full satisfaction over the estate, for he left the entire country in weeds and waste, from Waterford to Lothra (Loroha, in Tipperary), and from Cnauhchoill to the county of Kilkenny; this was no wonder for those lands to be waste, on account of the frequent depredations committed by the earl in the two Ormonds, the territory of Ara, Ikerrin, and South Ely (all in Tipperary), with its tributary districts, Middlethird, the Third of Clonmel, and on both sides of the river Suir, as far as the gates of Waterford. It is impossible to relate or enumerate half or one third of the desperate encounters, hard contested conflicts, and intrepid onsets, that were carried on by the Geraldines at that time, and it was then it was said that "the lowing of a cow, or the voice of a ploughman, was not heard from Dunkeen (in Kerry), to Cashel of Munster."

The earl of Desmond proceeded, in the summer of this year, to the east of Munster, and the west part of the country of the Butlers. There happened to have been at that time before him in Fiodh-Ard (Fethard, in Tipperary), the two young sons of the earl of Ormond, namely, Edmond-an-Chaladh, and Edward, who were the sons of James, son of Pierce Roe, son of James, son of Edmond, and they were brothers to the then earl of Ormond, namely, Thomas, and those the earl had left over the country to protect it when he was going to England. They had with them in the town at that time an active body of cavalry, and a select and well-appointed company of galloglasses, and giomanachs (light soldiers); they resolutely prepared to attack the insurgents, and advanced to the same field where the earl was; they watched each other without engaging from Fethard to Knock Graffan (in Tipperary, between Cahir and Cashel), where the earl encountered his adversaries, and defeated the Butlers. They left a great number of their cavalry, and all their foot soldiers, at the mercy of their enemies, and disposal of their opponents, so that the hill on which they fought that battle was strewed over with dead bodies by the Geraldines. A lamentable death took place there, namely, Colla, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donal Oge Mac Sweeney, the chief constable of the Butlers. On the other side there fell only Gerald, the son of John Oge, son of Thomas the earl (of Desmond), and his death was much lamented in his own country.

The earl of Desmond made an incursion into Kerry in the harvest of this year, and remained encamped for nearly a week in the upper part of Clanmaurice; his foot soldiers proceeded from that place to seize on a prey in Pobal O'Keeffe (in Cork), but O'Keeffe, with all the neighbouring people in the vicinity, pursued the depredators during a great part of the day through the Largs of Luachair Deadhaidh (the Largs or Slopes, in Kerry, on the borders of Cork), until they came near to the earl's camp. When the earl heard the conflict of the Kerns, and the loud report of the ordnance, he quickly advanced, and defeated O'Keeffe, in the same place; and there were very few of those who came in the pursuit but were slain. O'Keeffe himself, i. e. Art, the son of Donal, son of Art, and his son Art Oge, were taken prisoners, and another son of his, namely, Hugh, was slain; the son of the vicar O'Scully was also taken prisoner there, and was afterwards hanged.

David (Barry) of the Combat, the son of John Oge, son of John, lord of Coillmore, died.

James and Gerald, the sons of the bishop of Kerry (James Fitzmaurice, bishop of Ardfert), that is to say, the sons of James, son of Richard, were slain by the sons of Edmond Mac Sheehy, in revenge of their brother Murtoogh, who had been formerly slain by the sons of the bishop.

Thomas, Gerald, and John Oge (Fitzgerald) the sons of John, son of Edmond, son of Thomas of Claonglass (in Limerick), all died this year a natural death.

Owen, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh Mac Sweeney, constable of Desmond, a meek, mild man, in company and in council, but resolute and determined in conflict and battle, died.

Torlogh Oge, the son of Torlogh, son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh Mac Sweeney, died, and there was none of his tribe in his time who had less fear of meeting any man than he.

Sir Nicholas Malby went to England this year, and returned in the winter of the following year; and during his absence captain Brabazon acted as governor over the province of Connaught. That captain proceeded into Tyrawley, in the spring of this year, and laid waste and plundered the entire country, from one end to the other, marching amongst them from one camp to another; neither the sanctuary of saint or poet, nor wood or sequestered glen, nor town or fortress, were a security against that captain or his people, and he devastated the entire country.

Mac Sweeney of Banagh, i. e. Maolmurry Oge, the son of Maolmurry, son of Hugh, son of Niall Mac Sweeny, and Donal, the son of Murrough, son of Roderick More, son of Donal of the Victories Mac Sweeney, were slain on the 4th day of the month of June, on the banks of Lough Foyle, while engaged in carrying on a correspondence and conference between O'Neill and O'Donnell, who then had two extensive encampments, with great forces, on either side of the lake; the manner in which those lamentable deaths occurred was as follows: A number of strange Scots came from O'Neill's camp, in a boat which was used for ferrying across the narrow strait of Lough Foyle, and being supposed to have come on some other errand, until they arrived at the landing place, to the forepart of the boat in which these two worthy constables were, with a few attendants, who were patiently waiting there to have their conference concluded, they were immediately put to the sword by them (the Scots), who, however, fled themselves, without a wound, or losing a drop of blood.

O'Dogherty, i. e. John, son of Phelim, son of Conor Carrach, lord of Inisowen (in Donegal), died on the 26th of May; had the deceased been a hostage to be ransomed, horses and flocks would have been given for his ransom; his son, John Oge, was appointed in his place, in opposition to Cahir O'Dogherty, and on that account the country was much plundered in its crops, corn, dwellings, and cattle.

2. The Mac Clancys of Leitrim and Clare.—The Mac Clancys of Leitrim were of the Ithian race, a branch of the Milesians of Munster, and there was another clan of the Mac Clancys in Clare who were hereditary Brehons of Thomond under the O'Briens, princes of that territory; many chiefs of the Mac Clancys of Thomond are mentioned in the course of these Annals, but they were of the race of the Dalcassians, and therefore of a different descent from the Mac Clancys of Leitrim. The Mac Clancys, lords of Dartry and Rossclougher in West Breffney, possessed the extensive territory which now forms the barony of Rossclougher, in the county of Leitrim, and was called Mac Clancy's country; they were in former times chiefs of note, and they are designated by O'Dugan as "the mighty Mac Clancys," and many of their chiefs are recorded in the course of these Annals. Their chief castle was called Duncarberry, in Irish Dun-Cairbre, signifying the Fortress of Cairbre, and was so named from Cairbre, Mary, the daughter of Con O'Neill, the wife of Sorley Buighe Mac Donnell, died.

Naghtan, the son of Con, son of Calvach (O'Donnell), was slain on the 5th of September.

Mac Clancy of Dartry, i. e. Cathal Oge², was slain by his own kinsman, Teige Oge.

Theobald and Myler, the sons of Walter Fada (the Tall), son of David, son of Edmond, son of Ulick Burke, went in pursuit of a prey into Tyrawley, at the instigation of Mac William, their father's brother, i. e. Richard of the Iron, and they seized some cows; Rickard Burke, the son of Edmond, son of Ulick of Castlebar (in Mayo), overtook the depredators, and having attacked their forces, a fierce and desperate conflict ensued between them, and Rickard, and the most of those who accompanied him, were slain in that encounter, and the sons of Walter Fada carried off the prey triumphantly.

The son of Mac William Burke, i. e. Rickard Roe, the son of John, son of Oliver, son of John, was slain in the winter of this year by Thomas Wideos, a gentleman of the queen's party, and all persons state that that killing was not fair.

The dean O'Grady, i. e. Donogh Oge, the son of Donogh, son of Donogh, son of Nicholas, a man of great power in church and country, died.

Mac Brody, i. e. Maoilin, the son of Conor, son of Dermot, son of John, chief professor in history to O'Brien (of Thomond), died, and his brother, Giollabrighe, was appointed his successor.

Dermot Ulltach (O'Donlevey of Donegal), the son of John, died.

Mac Conway, i. e. Bryan Dorcha, died on the 13th of June.

one of the sons of king Niall of the Nine Hostages, who had a fortress there in the fifth century, and he gave its name to the adjoining territory of Carbury in Sligo. There are still remaining some ruins of the castle of Duncarberry, situated on a hill near Bundrowes in Leitrim, not far from Lough Melvin on one side, and the Atlantic on the other. In Mac Parlan's Survey of Leitrim it is stated, that this castle was built by Lady Isabel Clancy, in the reign of Elizabeth. The Mac Clancys also had fortresses in several other places, as at Rossclougher, and on the islands of Lough Melvin, &c.; they formed alliances by marriage with the O'Rourkes, princes of West Breffney, and the O'Conors, lords of Sligo, but they and those powerful chieftains were also often at variance and war. The estates of the Mac Clancys were confiscated after the Cromwellian wars, but there are still some respectable families of the name in Rossclougher, and other parts of Leitrim.

A. D. 1583.

Con, the son of Calvach, son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, died on the 13th of March; he was a man highly accomplished, and of great hospitality, a man of mildness and affability, a supporting pillar to the clergy and kerns, a purchaser of poetical compositions, and of laudatory poems, by his own great wealth, a man to whom least evil was ascribed, by fame or by word, of any of the descendants of Niall of the Nine Hostages, so that the Tireconnallians were, on the occasion of the death of Con, like unto a harp without a sound, a ship without a sailor, or a field of corn devoid of produce.

The earl of Ormond, i. e. Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, was governor of the two provinces of Munster this year; and the earl of Desmond became more confirmed in his treason and rebellion, so that he commenced to devastate the country in his neighbourhood, during the winter and spring of this year; his people, however, were so much in dread and fear of the law, and of the sovereign of England, that they began to withdraw from him, even his married wife, children, and friends, so that he had only four persons to attend him in his movements from one cavern of a rock, or the hollow of a tree, to another, throughout the two provinces of Munster, during the summer and harvest of this year. When the beginning of the winter and the long nights came on him, the lawless and rebellious of Munster began to collect about him, and to renew the war, so that it was the will of God that the time had arrived when an end and termination should be put to the war of the Geraldines, which was accomplished in the following manner:—A party of Uibh Muirceartaigh (O'Moriartys), along the river Mang

(in the county of Kerry), of the tribe of Hugh Beandain, got an opportunity of surprising the earl of Desmond, who was in a Fianbhoth (a hut), concealed in the cavern of a rock, in Glen-an-Ginntigh; this party were reconnoitering and surrounding that habitation, in which the earl was, from the beginning of the night 'till towards morning, when they rushed in on him in the cold hut, by the break of day, being on a Tuesday, and the festival day of St. Martin, (11th of November), precisely; the earl was wounded and taken prisoner by them, for he had no persons to fight or make resistance along with him, except one woman and two boys; they had not, however, gone far from the wood, when they instantly belheaded the earl, and had he not been engaged in plundering and rebelling as he was, that earl of Desmond would have been one of the greatest losses in Ireland, namely, Gerald, the son of James, son of John, son of Thomas of Drogheda, son of James, son of Gerald-an-Dana (of the Poetry), son of Maurice, i. e. the first earl of Desmond, son of Thomas-nan-Adadh (of the Apes), son of John Caille, son of Thomas, in whom the Geraldines of Kildare and of Desmond concentrate, who was the son of Maurice, namely, the Friar Minor, son of Gerald, son of Maurice, son of Gerald. The retribution of God in the extermination of the Geraldines was not to be wondered at, as an act of justice on behalf of their sovereign, for to their ancestors had been given, as a land of inheritance, the country from Dun-Caoim (Dunqueen, in Kerry), to the Meeting of the Three Waters (at Waterford), and from Oilean-More-Arda-Neimhead, in Hy Liathain, (Great Island, or Barrymore Island, in the harbour of Cork), to Limerick.¹

Murrough Bacach, the son of Edmond, son of

A. D. 1583.

1. The Earls of Kildare and Desmond.—The following account of the earls of Kildare and Desmond has been collected from Lodge's Peerage, Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, Borlase's Reduction of Ireland, Ware, Wills's Illustrious Irishmen, Campion and Hammer's Chronicles, Mac Geoghegan's Ireland, Smith's Histories of Cork, Kerry, and Waterford, and other sources, and many of these earls are mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters. The Fitzgeralds derive their origin from the Normans of France, and some of their ancestors, from Normandy, settled in Florence, and became dukes of Tuscany. Otho, a descendant of those dukes of Tuscany, came either from Florence or Normandy to England, and was a great baron in the reign of Edward the Confessor, and afterwards appointed Castellan of Windsor, and Warden of the Forests in Berkshire, by William the Conqueror, hence some of the descendants of Otho took the surname de Windsor, and were powerful barons, and from them were descended the de Windsors, earls of Plymouth. Otho, above-mentioned, had a son named Walter, who had a son Gerald, and from him his descendants took the name of Fitzgerald. Gerald got grants of land in Berkshire, from king Henry I., and being a valiant leader, he was sent to Wales, and having reduced the Welsh princes to obedience, he was appointed constable of the castle and governor of the county of Pembroke; he got great grants of lands in Wales, and was married to Nesta, daughter of Rees ap Grifflith, prince of South Wales, by whom he had three sons, Maurice, William, and David. From William Fitzgerald and his sons were descended the family of Gerard, earls of Macclesfield, and the de Carews of Wales and Devonshire, some of whom were earls of Cork, and there were other families of note of the name in Ireland. Raymond le Gros, the celebrated warrior who came to Ireland with Strongbow, was one of the sons of William Fitzgerald; and from Maurice, son of Manus Mac Sheehy, died at Ardfert, shortly after the death of the earl of Desmond, and some say it was through grief for him he died.

Raymond, were descended the great family of the Fitzmaurices, barons of Lixnaw and earls of Kerry; from Hamon le Gros, or le Gras, were descended the Graces of Kilkenny, a family of great note, who were barons of Courtstown, and gave name to Grace's Country in Kilkenny. Maurice Fitzgerald, son of Gerald above-mentioned, came to Ireland with Strongbow, and an account of him has been given at p. 42, in these notes; he was a very valiant commander, and fought many battles with the Irish chiefs, and was for some time one of the chief governors of Ireland, along with Hugh de Lacy, lord of Meath; king Henry II. and Strongbow, conferred on him large grants of lands in Leinster, namely, in Offaly, in Kildare, and in Wexford and Wicklow. Maurice died at Wexford, A. D. 1177, and William, one of his sons, became baron of Naas; his eldest son, Gerald, became baron of Offaly in the reign of king John, and was also chief justice of Ireland; he also got grants of lands in Sligo, and he died at Sligo in A. D. 1205. Gerald was succeeded as baron of Offaly by his son Maurice, who got the lands of Maynooth in the reign of Henry III.; he founded a Dominican monastery at Sligo, and erected a castle there; he also got lands at Youghal, where he founded a Franciscan monastery, in which he died, and was buried, A. D. 1257, having in the latter years of his life taken on him the habit of a Friar Minor, or Franciscan; this Maurice was a valiant commander in the various battles with the Irish chiefs, and also in the wars of Henry III. with the Welsh. His son, Thomas Fitzmaurice Fitzgerald, baron of Offaly, got great estates in Kerry, and was ancestor of the Fitzgeralds of Munster; he died at Youghal in 1260. Maurice, brother of this Thomas, was some time lord justice of Ireland in the reign of Edward I. Thomas Fitzgerald, a grandson of the above-mentioned Thomas, became baron of Offaly, and was appointed captain of all Desmond, and so powerful that he was styled prince and ruler of Munster; he was some time lord justice of Ireland, in the reign of Edward I., and died A. D. 1296, and was buried in the monastery of Youghal; he was surnamed Nappagh, signifying of the Apes, from a remarkable incident that occurred to him when only nine months old, and at nurse in Tralee, in the following manner:—On the news of the death of his father Maurice, who was slain by the Mac Carthys of Desmond, his nurses being much alarmed, ran out of the house, and leaving the child in the cradle, he was seized by a large monkey kept in the house, which, apparently to protect him, carried the child up to the top of the castle, and in some time after brought him down safe, and laid him in the cradle; from this curious circumstance monkeys have been ever since borne in the armorial ensigns of the earls of Kildare. This Thomas was the 7th baron of Offaly, and his son John Fitz-Thomas Fitzgerald, was created earl of Kildare in 1316, by king Edward II., and his second son, Maurice Fitz-Thomas Fitzgerald, was created earl of Desmond in 1329, by king Edward III. The Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare, became one of the most powerful families in the kingdom, and many of them were lords justices, deputies, and chief governors of Ireland, and were eminent military commanders in Ireland, and in the wars of the English kings with the Welsh and Scots, and in the wars of the English in France; several of the family were also knights of Rhodes, and of St. John of Jerusalem. Thomas, the 2d earl of Kildare, was lord justice of Ireland in the reign of Edward II., and Maurice, the 4th earl, was lord justice and custos of Ireland several years in the reign of Edward III. Gerald, the 5th earl, was lord justice in the reign of Henry IV., and Thomas, the 7th earl, was lord deputy several years in the reigns of Henry VI. and Edward IV.; he was also lord chancellor of Ireland, and his son, sir Thomas Fitzgerald, was lord chancellor in the reign of Henry VII. Gerald the 8th earl, was lord deputy of Ireland for many years in the reigns of Edward IV., Richard III., and Henry VII., being under these different kings the chief governor of Ireland for a period of about twenty-five years; he was one of the most distinguished military commanders of his

Geoffrey Carrach, the son of Donogh Bacach, son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh Mac Sweeny, was slain by the Kerns of Inis-Caoin time. Gerald, his son, the 9th earl, was high treasurer, lord justice, and lord deputy of Ireland some years in the reign of Henry VIII.; he was one of the most powerful and popular men in Ireland, but having given his daughters in marriage to O'Connor, lord of Offaly, and O'Carroll, lord of Ely, and formed some other alliances with the Irish chiefs, with whom he was on friendly terms, contrary to the statute of Kilkenny, he was commanded to go to England, and, on various charges of disaffection, imprisoned in the Tower of London, where he died in the year 1534; and his five brothers, together with his son, lord Thomas Fitzgerald, were sent prisoners to the tower, on charges of high treason, and all hanged and beheaded at Tyburn, on the 3d of February, 1536, of which events an account has been given at p. 404, in these Annals, and in the notes annexed on the rebellion of Silken Thomas. A few years after the execution of lord Thomas, who was the 10th earl of Kildare, his brother Gerald became the 11th earl, and his successors hold the title and honours to the present day. James, the 20th earl of Kildare, was created duke of Leinster in 1766, in the reign of George III.; Augustus Frederick Fitzgerald, the present and 3d duke of Leinster, is the 22d earl of Kildare, and 29th baron of Offaly. Thus it appears their high honours and possessions have been maintained by the great family of the Fitzgeralds of Kildare, for more than 600 years, and to this noble house may be applied the remark of Lord Bacon—"It is a reverend thing to see an ancient castle or building not in decay, or to see a fair timber tree sound and perfect; how much more to behold an ancient noble family, which hath stood against the waves and weathers of time." The earls of Kildare had their chief castle and residence, in ancient times, at Maynooth, but they also had several other castles in many parts of Kildare, and they founded and endowed many monasteries in that county, as those of Kildare, Clane, Castledermot, Athy, &c.

The House of Desmond.—As above explained, Maurice Fitz-Thomas Fitzgerald, son of Thomas, baron of Offaly, was, in the year 1329, in the reign of Edward III. created earl of Desmond, and he and his descendants got very extensive possessions in the counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick, and Waterford; Kerry was erected into a County Palatine, and confirmed to the earls of Desmond, to be held of the crown by the service of one knight's fee. The ancient territory of Desmond, or South Munster, as explained in the notes on Desmond at pp. 170, 179, comprised the greater part of the counties of Cork and Kerry, with parts of Tipperary, Limerick, and Waterford. Several of the earls of Desmond were eminent military commanders, and lords deputies of Ireland; Maurice, the 1st earl, attended king Edward III. in his wars with France, and was some time lord justice of Ireland; he died in 1355, and was buried in the Dominican abbey of Tralee. Colin Fitzgerald, a chieftain of the house of Kildare, according to the Scotch Peerage, but of the house of Desmond according to Lodge, went to Scotland in the thirteenth century, and having fought in the army of king Alexander III. with great bravery at the battle of Largs, against the Norwegians, he got a grant of the barony of Kintail, in Rosshire, and the descendants of his son Kenneth took the name of Mac Kenneth, afterwards Mac Kenzie, and became earls of Seaforth, and earls of Cromarty, in Scotland. The great families of the Adairs in Scotland and in Ireland, are also, according to Lodge, a branch of the Fitzgeralds of Desmond. The families of the Fitzgibbons of Cork, Limerick, and Clare, were also branches of the Fitzgeralds of Desmond; other branches of the Fitzgeralds of Desmond became barons of Decies, in Waterford, seneschals of Imokilly, in Cork, knights of Kerry and knights of Glynn, in Limerick. The Fitzgeralds of Desmond had numerous strong castles and fortified towns in Munster, particularly at Youghal, in Cork, at Askeaton and Kilmallock, in Limerick, at Castlemain and Tralee, in Kerry, &c., and some in Tipperary and Waterford; they founded and endowed many monasteries, as those of Askeaton, Adare, Kilmallock, (Iniskeen, a village in the barony of Carberry, county of Cork), of the Tanistship of Hy Carberry, a week before the death of the earl of Desmond, and it was said that the killing of Geoffrey was a forewarning of the death of the earl.

John Oge, the son of John, son of Thomas, the Tralee, Youghal, Dungarvan, &c. Gerald, the 4th earl of Desmond, was governor of the counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick, and Waterford, and lord justice and lord deputy of Ireland, in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II. James, the 7th earl, became very powerful, and was custos of the counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick, and Waterford, in the reign of Henry VI. Thomas, the 8th earl, was lord deputy of Ireland in the reign of Edward IV., but being accused of high treason for alliances and fosterage with the Irish, and other charges, he was attainted in a parliament held at Drogheda, and beheaded in that town on the 15th of February, 1467, by order of the lord deputy, John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, of which an account has been given at p. 280 in these Annals. James, Maurice, and James, the 9th, 10th, and 11th earls of Desmond, were very powerful noblemen, sometimes in high honour with the kings of England, and sometimes in alliance with the Irish chiefs, against the English government. Thomas, James, and John, were the 12th, 13th, and 14th earls, and men of great note. James was the 15th earl, and made some resistance to the government in the reign of Henry VIII., but was afterwards appointed to the office of high treasurer of Ireland, which he held during the reigns of Edward VI. and queen Mary.

The Geraldines of Kildare and Desmond were by far the most powerful and illustrious of the Anglo-Norman families in Ireland, and produced many men eminent for valour and patriotism; they were often in alliance with the Irish chiefs, against the English government, and having adopted the Irish language, manners, and customs, they were charged by the English of having become "Hibernieis ipsis Hiberniores," or more Irish than the Irish themselves. The earls of Kildare formed marriage alliances with the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone, the O'Donnells, princes of Tyreconnell, the O'Conors, lords of Offaly, the O'Moores, lords of Leix, and the O'Carrolls, lords of Ely O'Carroll; and the earls of Desmond became allied by intermarriages with the Mac Carthys, princes of Desmond, and earls of Clancare; the O'Briens, princes and earls of Thomond; the O'Carrolls, lords of Ely O'Carroll; the O'Sullivan, lords of Beara, in Cork; the O'Conors, lords of Kerry, and the O'Conors, lords of Sligo. As by the Act of the Anglo-Irish Parliament, called the Statute of Kilkenny, it was prohibited, under penalties of treason or felony, for any families of English descent to form alliances by marriage or fosterage with the Milesian Irish, these alliances were brought as charges against the houses of Kildare and Desmond, in consequence of which many of them, as above explained, suffered confiscation of their estates, persecution and death. The earls of Desmond were sometimes in alliance, but more frequently at war with their great rivals, the Butlers, earls of Ormond. In A. D. 1565, as related at p. 456, in these Annals, a great battle was fought in Waterford, between Gerald, earl of Desmond, and Thomas, earl of Ormond, in which Desmond, being defeated and taken prisoner, was, as mentioned by Cox, carried on a bier from the field of battle on men's shoulders, and one of the Butlers having insultingly asked him, "Where is the great earl of Desmond now?" he replied with great spirit, "Where should he be but on the necks of the Butlers." Gerald, the 16th earl of Desmond, son of James, the 15th earl, was one of the most powerful subjects in Europe, held the rank of a Prince Palatine, with all the authority of a provincial king, had many strong castles and towns, and his vast possessions extended about one hundred and fifty miles over the counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, comprising about six hundred thousand acres of profitable land, independent of immense tracts of waste lands, so that his entire estates amounted to about one million of acres. He had a vast number of vassals, and could raise at a call a force of 2000 foot and 600 horse, and had besides in his retinue of his own kindred 500 gentlemen of the Fitzgeralds. The earl of Desmond having resisted the Reformation in the reign of Elizabeth, waged war against the English government, and being joined by his brothers and relatives, they became the chief military commanders of the Irish in Munster, in the war against Elizabeth, and for a period of about 15 years of incessant contests and sanguinary conflicts, they maintained their position, but the earl with his brothers and cousins being slain, and many other leaders of the Fitzgeralds imprisoned and exiled, and all their forces dispersed and vanquished, the great Fitzgeralds of Desmond, after having maintained their possessions and power in prosperity and splendour for a period of more than three hundred years, were reduced to utter ruin, and their vast estates being confiscated by the crown, were transferred to new English settlers. Amongst the chiefs of the house of Desmond who were slain in these contests, the following were the most distinguished leaders, sir Maurice Fitzgerald, called Maurice Duv or Black Maurice, brother of James the 15th earl, was killed in the year 1563, in a conflict with the Mac Carthys; his son James, called Mae Maurice or Fitzmaurice, was a noted commander for many years in Munster, and brought over the Italians and Spaniards to Smerwick; he was slain A. D. 1579, as recorded in these Annals at that year, and his body was hanged by the English at Kilmallock. Sir James Fitzgerald, brother of Gerald, earl of Desmond, was in the year 1580 taken prisoner, hanged and quartered by the English at Cork; sir John Fitzgerald, called John of Desmond, brother of sir James, was hanged, quartered, and gibbeted by the English at Cork, in 1581; both these brothers were celebrated commanders for many years in Munster, and an account of them is given in the Annals at the above mentioned years. Gerald, the earl, was himself slain in the year 1583, as above recorded in the Annals. James Fitzgerald, the 17th earl of Desmond, was taken prisoner in 1601, and sent to the Tower of London, where he died in A. D. 1608, as hereafter mentioned. Mac Geoghegan, in his History of Ireland, says—"Such was the end of the illustrious house of the Fitzgeralds of Desmond, the Maccabees of our day, who sacrificed their lives and properties in defence of the Catholic cause." The particulars of the death of the earl Gerald, above mentioned by the Four Masters, were as follows; his forces being defeated and dispersed, and his brothers and kindred slain, he was reduced to the greatest distress, and became a fugitive, with only a few followers, wandering through the woods and wilds of Kerry, concealed in glens and caves to evade his pursuers, being outlawed, and a large reward offered for him dead or alive. The earl in his misfortunes was chiefly supported by one of his faithful followers, Geoffrey Mac Sweeney, a captain of galloglasses, who being slain, the earl was greatly distressed for provisions, and some of his servants took a prey of cattle between Tralee and Castlemaine, from one of the O'Moriarty's, on which Owen O'Moriarty applied to the English governor of Castlemaine, from whom he obtained a party of 7 musketeers and 12 kerns, who pursued the cattle; this party about midnight having discovered a fire in a wood within a few miles of Tralee, they reconnoitred the place, and discovered 5 or 6 persons in a ruined house, and entering it, all the inmates fled except an aged man of venerable appearance, who sat by the fire; one Daniel Kelly, an Irish soldier, attacked the old man, and almost cut off his arm with a blow of his sword, on which he cried out—"Spare me for I am the earl of Desmond," but the base kern, regardless of his entreaties, killed him and cut off his head, which he carried to Cork, to Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, who had it sent to England as a present to the queen, who caused it to be fixed on a pole on London Bridge. This Daniel Kelly who killed the earl, was, says Cox, "a native Irishman who had been bred by the English;" he had for that service a pension of £20 a year from queen Elizabeth, but going to London, he was soon after, for some misdeeds, hanged at Tyburn. The earl was slain on the 11th of November, 1583, as mentioned in the Annals, in a sequestered glen called Glenagintigh, situated in the parish of Ballynac Elligott, between Tralee and Castleisland; his body was concealed by the people to prevent it from falling into the hands of his enemies, earl (of Desmond), died at an advanced age while imprisoned in Limerick, on account of his sons being joined with the earl of Desmond.

and, after a considerable time, privately buried in the small church of Kilnamanagh, at Ardnegrath, near Castleisland. The great earl of Desmond was long remembered in the tales and traditions of the people under the name of Gioroid Iarla, or Gerald the Earl, and in their wild legends represented as not dead, but that he and his warriors were sleeping in a cave in the mountains of Kerry in complete armour, and their steeds standing beside them ready saddled, and that the earl and his champions would sometime arise from their enchanted slumber, and war with the English, as the ancient Welsh believed for ages, that their renowned hero, Arthur, king of Britain, was not dead, but gone with his warriors to Fairy-land, from whence they would one day return to liberate the Kymri from Saxon bondage. James, only son of Gerald the earl, was kept some years a prisoner in the Tower of London, but restored to the earldom by queen Elizabeth for a political object, and, according to Cox and Lodge, he was in the year 1600 sent over to Ireland by the advice of sir Robert Cecil, in hopes he might regain the followers of his family, and bring them under obedience to the crown. When he came to Cork, says Cox, the inhabitants, finding he was a Protestant, refused to entertain him, so that he was fain to intrude himself on the mayor; he then went to Kilmallock, where multitudes flocked to see him and do him duty, but as soon as they saw him go to church on Sunday, they all forsook him and treated him with great contumely; he was the 17th earl, and commonly called the queen's earl of Desmond; he returned to London, where he soon after died in 1601, under suspicion of being poisoned. James Fitz-Thomas Fitzgerald, the son of sir Thomas, and grandson of James, the 15th earl of Desmond, attempting to recover the estates and honours of his ancestors, joined the standard of Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, against the queen, and in 1598 was appointed earl of Desmond by O'Neill, and hence he was called O'Neill's earl of Desmond, in opposition to the queen's earl of Desmond, but as his title was not recognised by the crown, he was designated the Sugan Earl, signifying the Earl of Straw. Cox says the Sугan Earl was the handsomest man of his time, and one of the most potent of the earls of Desmond; he was a valiant commander, and headed a great force for some years in Munster, but being at length defeated, he became a fugitive and outlaw, and a great reward being offered for him dead or alive, he was taken on the 29th of May, 1601, by Fitzgibbon, called the White Knight, while concealed in a cave in the mountain of Slieve Grot in Tipperary, and delivered to Carew, the president of Munster, at Shandon castle, for which service Fitzgibbon received a reward of one thousand pounds. Desmond was secured in irons and sent to Cork, where he was tried and convicted of treason, and in August 1601, transmitted prisoner to London, together with the celebrated chief Florence Mac Carthy, who, says Cox, was the greatest man of the Mac Carthys since the conquest. Desmond and Mac Carthy were both confined in the Tower, where the earl died, A. D. 1603, after an imprisonment of seven years, and was buried in the chapel of the Tower. John Fitz-Thomas, brother of this earl, was also a commander of note in Munster for some years, but fled to Spain in 1603; he was styled earl of Desmond, and died at Barcelona; his son Gerald, also styled count and earl of Desmond, was in the military service of Spain and Austria, and having died in Germany in 1632, thus terminated the illustrious house of Desmond.

Confiscated Lands.—In 1583 an Act of attainder was passed against Gerald, the great earl of Desmond, and his vast estates were confiscated, and no less than 574,623 acres were seized by the crown, together with his many strong castles, and transferred to various new English settlers, who were called Undertakers and Planters. An account of this plantation is given by Cox, and in Smith's Histories of Cork, Kerry, and Waterford. Amongst the conditions on which these grants of lands were given, the Undertakers were not permitted to convey any part of the lands to the mere Irish, and the English settlers were also prohibited to intermarry with the Irish, and none of the Irish were to be maintained in any family. Cox says letters were written to every county in England to encourage younger brothers to become Undertakers in Ireland; the conditions were that the queen was to grant these confiscated lands in fee at 3d. per acre in Limerick and Kerry, and 2d. per acre in Cork and Waterford; to be rent free till March 1590; and to pay but half rent for three years from thence, and no Irish to be permitted to reside on the lands. Of the Desmond estates in Cork and Waterford, sir Walter Raleigh got 40,000 acres, which afterwards passed to the family of Boyle, earls of Cork. The other English Undertakers who got grants of the Desmond estates were the following. In Cork, Arthur Robins 18,000 acres; Fane Beecher 12,000; Hugh Worth 12,000; Arthur Hyde 12,000; sir Warham St. Leger 6,000; Hugh Cuffe 6,000; sir Thomas Norris 6,000; Thomas Say 5,800; sir Richard Beacon 1,600, and Edmond Spenser, the poet, 3,000 acres.

The Roche,² i. e. David, the son of Maurice, son of David, son of Maurice, and his wife Oilen (Ellen), the daughter of James, son of Edmond

In Kerry. Sir William Herbert 13,000 acres; Charles Herbert 4,000; sir Valentine Brown, ancestor to the earls of Kenmare, 6,000; sir Edward Denny 6,000; John Hally 4,000; captain Conway and John Campion 2,000 acres.

In Limerick. Sir George Bourchier 13,000 acres; William Trenchard 12,000; Henry Billingsly 12,000; sir William Courtenay 10,500; Francis Barkly 7,000; Edward Manwaring 3,750; Richard Fitton 3,000; Robert Anslow 2,600; and George Thornton 1,500 acres. In Limerick, Waterford, and Tipperary, sir Edward Fitton got 11,500 acres. In Waterford, sir Christopher Hatton got 10,900 acres, and in Tipperary Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, got 3,000 acres.

2. The Roches of Fermoy.—The family of de la Rupe or Roche, according to the Irish Peerage and Rudiments of Honour, by Francis Nicholls, published in 1727, were maternally descended from Charlemagne, king of France and emperor of the West, and in the remarkable pedigree of the ancestors of this family, it is shewn that they derive their descent from the most illustrious sources, their progenitors being allied, by intermarriages, with the great earls of Flanders, the counts of Bavaria, Alfred, and other Saxon kings of England, the house of Capet in France, William the Conqueror, and other Anglo-Norman kings. The Roches came to Ireland in the reign of Henry II. along with the other Anglo-Norman chiefs, in Strongbow's time; and in the reigns of Richard I. and king John, they got large grants of lands in Cork, in the territory of Fermoy, which from them was called Roche's Country, and they erected a castle, and founded a Cistercian monastery at Fermoy, and they had seats at Castletown Roche, and other places. Alexander, David, John, and Maurice Fitz-John Roche, were in succession barons of Fermoy by tenure, and about A. D. 1300 the lords George and John Roche are mentioned in Lodge's Peerage on the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry, as connected by intermarriage with that family. In the reign of Edward IV., about A. D. 1470, the most noble, potent, and honorable Ulick Roche was created viscount de Rupe and Fermoy; and in Lodge's Peerage, on the de Coureys, barons of Kinsale, David More Roche, viscount of Fermoy, is mentioned about the year 1490. According to the passage above in the Annals, David Roche was, in 1583, viscount of Fermoy, and his pedigree is given as son of Maurice, son of David, son of Maurice, and his wife was Ellen Mac Pierce, of the family of the Fitzmaurices, afterwards earls of Kerry; and Jane, daughter of this David Roche, was married to Patrick Fitzmaurice, baron of Lixnaw, in Kerry. Another David Roche, viscount of Fermoy, lived in the reigns of Charles I. and II., and was a distinguished nobleman in supporting the interests of king Charles in Ireland during the civil wars, and in consequence of his loyalty his extensive estates, estimated to be worth fifty thousand pounds per annum, were confiscated by Cromwell; lord Roche retired with a regiment to France, and died on the Continent. Another David Roche, viscount Fermoy, sat in the parliament of King James II. at Dublin, in 1689, and was a steady adherent to the House of Stuart. The Roches had also the title of barons of Castletelough, and some of them were barons of Tarbert in Limerick.

Mac Piercc, died in the same month, at the end of this year; and there was not of the Fionn-Ghalla (Normans), of Ireland, who ruled over a Triochad-Cead (barony), of an estate, a couple more noble than they were.

After the confiscation of their estates in the Cromwellian and Williamite wars, the Roches of Fermoy retired to the Continent, and some of them were distinguished commanders in the Irish Brigade in France, and also in the service of Spain and Sardinia. There are still many highly respectable families of the Roches in the counties of Cork and Limerick, and accounts of them are given in Smith's History of Cork, in Windele's learned work on Cork, and in Burke's Commoners.

IX. Danish Wars in the eleventh and twelfth centuries.—In the preceding articles, an account has been given of the Danish wars in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, concluding with the battle of Clontarf, and in this is continued, from p. 516, an account of those wars in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, down to the termination of the Danish power, and the invasion of the Anglo-Normans. On the death of Brian Boru, at Clontarf, A. D. 1014, Malachy II. who had been deposed by Brian, and reigned only as king of Meath, resumed the crown, and became again monarch of Ireland, and reigned to his death, A. D. 1022, and during this period he fought several battles with the Danes. In A. D. 1015, king Malachy, with the Hy Niall, and O'Mulduary, prince of Tyconnell, led their forces to Dublin, and burned the fortress and the houses outside the fortress, and afterwards went into Hy Kinsellagh, laid waste the country, and carried off more than 1000 captives, with flocks of cattle, but they were attacked, and a great number of them slain.

Battle of Odbha, &c.—In A. D. 1016, king Malachy defeated the Danish forces, and their allies, the Lagenians, with immense slaughter, at a place called Odbha, in Meath, where several other great battles were fought in ancient times, and is now named Dowth, and situated between Drogheda and Slane. In the same year, according to Inisfallen, Kildare, Glendalough, Clonard, Swords of Columkill, and Arniagh, were burned by Sitric, son of Aulaf, and the Danes of Dublin, but they were attacked by Malachy and O'Neill, and great numbers of them were slain. In A. D. 1017, Brann, son of Maolmora Mac Murogh, king of Leinster, was treacherously taken by Sitric, Danish king of Dublin, who had his eyes put out, of which punishment he soon after died. In A. D. 1018, Kells was plundered by Sitric and the Danes of Dublin, and they carried off immense booty, and many captives, and slew a great number of people, in the midst of the church. In A. D. 1020, the shrine of St. Patrick and his relics, called Finnfoideach, were plundered at Armagh or Downpatrick, by the Danes, and O'Aidith and the people of Lower Iveagh, who also carried off 700 cows.

Battle of Delgany.—In A. D. 1021, Ughaire, king of Leinster, defeated the Danes of Dublin, under Sitric, in a great battle, at Delgne Mogarog, in Hy Briuin Cualann; this battle was fought at Delgany, in Wicklow, and the Danish forces were defeated with great slaughter, and several thousands of them were slain.

Battle of Athboy, &c.—In A. D. 1022, king Malachy gained a great victory over the Danes of Dublin, near Ath Buidhe of Tlachtga, now Athboy, in Meath, in which the Four Masters state that a vast number of them were slain in the evening, at the Yellow-ford. This battle was fought in the beginning of July, and king Malachy died two months after, namely the 4th of the Nones of September, on a Sunday, in the 73d year of his age, at Cro-inis, an island in Lough Annin, now Lough Ennell, near Mullingar. In this year a great naval battle was fought between the Danes of Dublin and Niall Mac Eochada, prince of Ulidia, in which the Danes were defeated with immense slaughter, and great numbers of them made captives and their ships taken from them. In A. D. 1023, the Danes of Dublin led their forces to South Bregia, and as far as Duleek, and they slew Ainbith O'Casey, lord of Saitne, and they treacherously took Donogh O'Mulloy (of King's county), i. e. Theobald, died.

Cormac, the son of Teige, son of Cormac Oge Mac Carthy, lord of Muskerry, a man of good personal figure, and of fair complexion, who pos-

O'Dunn, lord of Bregia, prisoner, and carried him beyond the sea, to the east. In A. D. 1024, the men of Ossory and Leinster led their forces to Talcande, and carried off valuable articles and hostages from the Danes, and they were also defeated at Erlant. In A. D. 1025, Flaherty O'Neill, king of Ulster, led his forces to Bregia, and carried off the hostages of the Irish from the Danes, and in the following year O'Neill came to Meath, with his ally, Malachy, and having attacked the Danes, they carried off hostages from them, and having proceeded on the ice, they laid waste against the Danes Luis Mochta, now Inismott, on the lake of Ballyhoe, in Meath, on the borders of Louth and Monaghan. In this year, also, Raon, heir presumptive to the throne of Tara, defeated the Danes of Dublin in several battles in Meath.

The Battle of Lichblagh.—In A. D. 1027, Sitric, son of Aulaf, Danish king of Dublin, joined by Donogh O'Dunn, prince of Bregia, led a great force to Meath, and proceeded as far as Leic Bladbma, or Leic Blagha, and to Monaigh Iomshlain, where they were attacked by the men of Meath, commanded by Roen O'Melaghlin, prince of Westmeath, and a fierce battle being fought between them, the victory was gained over the Danes and Bregians, and an immense number were slain, together with Donogh O'Dunn, prince of Bregia, and Giolla Uasail, son of Giolla Kevin, lord of Cualann, in Wicklow. The place where this battle was fought called Leic Bladbma, is now known as Lichblagh, in Westmeath, between Castlepollard and Lough Shelin. In another engagement the Danes defeated and slew Roen, prince of Meath, with many of his men.

In 1028, Flanagan O'Kelly, prince of Bregia, and Sitric, son of Aulaf, king of the Danes of Dublin, went on a pilgrimage to Rome. In A. D. 1029, Aulaf, son of Sitric, king of the Danes was taken prisoner by Malon O'Regan, prince of Bregia, who compelled him to pay as a ransom for his liberation 1200 cows, and seven score (140) British horses, together with sixty ounces of gold, and the sword of Carolus, and sixty ounces of silver for throwing off his fetters, and eighty cows as the price of intercession, and four hostages to O'Regan himself, for making peace; and Aulaf was also compelled to give up the hostages of Ireland, both of Leinster and Leath Cuinn, with a full redemption of all hostages. Several of the O'Regans and O'Kellys, princes of Bregia, are mentioned at this time, and they were in contention with each other for that principality. In A. D. 1031, Ardbraccan, in Meath, was plundered by Sitric and the Danes of Dublin, 200 persons were burned in the stone church, and 200 more were carried off captives, together with much cattle. Gluniarn, the son of Sitric, was slain by the people of South Bregia.

Battle of the Boyne, &c.—In A. D. 1032, a victory was gained by Sitric, son of Aulaf, over the Conallians, or men of Louth, and other adjoining parts of Ulster, and 300 of them were slain or made captives; this battle was fought near the mouth of the river Boyne. In 1034, Aulaf, son of Sitric, was slain by the Saxons, in Englund, while on his way to Rome. In 1035, Reginald, grandson of Ivar, lord of the Danes of Waterford, was treacherously slain in Dublin by Sitric; he was succeeded by Commanns, son of Raban, who was slain in 1038, and in the same year Waterford was plundered by Dermot Mac Maolnambo, king of Leinster, and Ivar was slain. In 1035, Ardbraccan was plundered by Sitric, and Swords was plundered and burned, in retaliation, by Conor O'Melaghlin.

In 1037, Skreen and Duleek, in Meath, were plundered by the Danes of Dublin; and in 1038, the island of Raghlin, off the coast of Antrim, was laid waste by the Danes.

Christ Church founded by the Danes.—According to Ware, Sitric III., Danish king of Dublin, having gone on a pilgrimage to Rome in A. D. 1030, died on his way, and was succeeded by his son Aulaf VI., who going on a pilgrimage to Rome, A. D. 1034, was sessed most of white-walled buildings, fair, well-roofed castles, and Coarb's seats (Abbasies), of any of the descendants of Eoghan More, died.

slain in England, and was succeeded by his son, Sitric IV. In A.D. 1038, according to Ware and Lanigan, and the Liber Niger, or Black Book of Trinity Church, Dublin, this Danish king, Sitric, in conjunction with Donatus, an Ostman or Dane, then bishop of Dublin, founded the Cathedral of Christ Church, which Sitric amply endowed, conferring on it the lands of Baldoyle, Raheny, and Portrane, with all their produce, cattle and corn, and the services of the villeins or serfs attached to those lands "cum villanis et vaccis et bladis," and he also gave gold and silver sufficient to build the Cathedral. In A.D. 1035, according to Inisfallen, Sitric having left the government of Dublin, went across the sea, and was succeeded by a chief named Eachmarcach, probably Emeric; and in 1038, Ivar, the son of Harold, succeeded Emeric as Danish king of Dublin. According to Ware, Sitric IV. died A.D. 1042, and was succeeded by Aulaf; this was Aulaf VII.

In A.D. 1045, Ivar, the son of Harold, and the Danes of Dublin attacked the Island of Rathlin, off the coast of Antrim, and slew 300 of the Ultonians. In 1046, Ivar, the son of Harold, was expelled from Dublin by the Danes, and was succeeded as king by Emeric, son of Reginald. About this time, according to the Saga of Snorri, Thorfin, earl of Orkneys, son of earl Sigurd, who had been slain at Clontarf, with powerful forces of Norwegians, made hostile expeditions to the coasts of Ireland, and fought great battles with the Irish Danes at Waterford; this Thorfin ruled over the northern half of Scotland, while his ally Macbeth was king in the south. About this period also, various expeditions of the Irish to Wales are mentioned in the Welsh Chronicles of Caradoc, of Llan-cavan, and in Ware and Hammer. The Irish were allied with the different Welsh princes who were contending for the sovereignty of Wales, and Conan ap Iago, prince of North Wales, was married to Ranulph, daughter of Aulaf, Danish king of Dublin; Conan was expelled from Wales by Griffith ap Lewellyn, who usurped the government, but Conan being joined by his father-in-law Aulaf, they collected their forces from Dublin, and sailed to Wales about A.D. 1045, and having defeated Griffith, took him prisoner, but he was soon after rescued by his own men, and the forces of Aulaf were defeated with great slaughter, and he and Conan fled to their ships and returned to Dublin. In A.D. 1050, Conan collected another force in Ireland, and attempted to recover Wales, but his fleet was destroyed by a storm; various other expeditions of the Irish into Wales, from A.D. 1050 to 1060, are related by Hammer.

In A.D. 1052, Dermot Mac Maolnambo, king of Leinster, led his forces to Fingal, and burned the entire country about Dublin, and he fought a great battle with the Danes at their fortress, where great numbers were slain, and he remained in Dublin until Emeric, son of Reginald, king of the Danes, went beyond the sea, and Dermot then became king over the Danes. Murrough, the son of Maolnambo, soon after was appointed king over the Danes of Dublin, and he and his father were the first Irish kings who assumed authority over the Danes, but from this period, for a century afterwards, these Mac Murroughs, kings of Leinster, were generally styled kings of Dublin. This Murrough Mac Murrough died A.D. 1070, and in 1075 is recorded in the Four Masters the death of Donal Mac Murrough, king of Leinster and of Dublin. In A.D. 1055, Guthorm or Gorm, a Norwegian Iarl, and famous warrior, is mentioned in the Saga of Snorri as having come to Dublin with powerful forces, and entered into alliance with Murchard, an Irish king, who, no doubt, was Murchad or Murrough above mentioned, king of Dublin. Gorm and Murrough with their combined forces and a large fleet sailed to Wales, and, having plundered the country, they took away an immense quantity of silver and other booty, but Murrough having attempted to appropriate all the spoils to himself, Gorm resisted, and they fought a great battle, in which Murrough was defeated. Gorm got such a vast quantity of silver, that he offered up a tenth part of it to St. Olaf, and on his return to Norway had formed out of the silver an image of Christ 7 feet high, which he placed in the church of St. Olaf.

Intestine commotions arose in the country after the death of Cormac, some of the people supporting Callachan, the son of Teige, who claimed to take Godred Crovan.—According to the Chronicles of Mann, in Johnstone's Celto-Norman Antiquities, Godred Crovan, son of Harold the Black, of Iceland, a descendant of the kings of Norway, with a powerful fleet, conquered the Isle of Mann in A.D. 1056, and ruled over the Isle of Mann and the Hebrides. In 1068 he subdued Dublin and a great part of Leinster with powerful forces; at this time Murrough, before mentioned, was king of Dublin, but he appears to have been dispossessed by Godred, and died in A.D. 1070. Godred Crovan died A.D. 1076, in the Island of Ila in the Hebrides, and was succeeded as king of Mann by his son Lagmann, who, after a reign of seven years, set out on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where he died.

Battle of Odhbha.—In A.D. 1072, Dermot Mac Maolnambo, king of Leinster and Leath Mogha, and of the Danes of Dublin, led his forces to Meath against Conor O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, and they fought a fierce battle at Odhbha, now Dowth, between Drogheda and Slane, in which the forces of king Dermot were totally defeated, and many hundreds of the Lagenians and their allies the Danes were slain, and Dermot himself was killed and decapitated. This battle was fought on Tuesday, the 7th of the Ides of February, according to the Four Masters, who quote some verses from one of the ancient bards, in praise of the celebrated and heroic king Dermot, saying, that after his death there was no profit or pleasure, no gladness or peace.

Godfrey Meranagh.—About A.D. 1073, Godfrey Meranagh, who appears to have been a relative of Godred Crovan, king of the Isle of Mann, became Danish king of Dublin; he was Godfrey IV., and he ruled over Dublin many years, but his authority was contested by the O'Briens, kings of Munster. In A.D. 1075, Dublin was taken by Murtoigh O'Brien, prince of Thomond, son of Torloigh O'Brien king of Munster. Murtoigh O'Brien became king over the Danes of Dublin, and he appears to have ruled over them about ten years to A.D. 1085, but Godfrey Meranagh at the same time was acknowledged by the Danes as king of Dublin. A.D. 1088, the people of Iveagh in Munster, in the south of Cork, defeated the Danes of Dublin, Wexford, and Waterford, who had gone with great forces to plunder Cork. About A.D. 1090, Murtoigh O'Brien, king of Munster, who had been king over the Danes of Dublin, again assumed authority over them, and fought some battles with the forces of Godfrey Meranagh; some of these contests are related in the Chronicle of Mann, but the chronology is not correct, as Godfrey is confounded with another king of Mann named Godred, who lived about 50 years after that time.

Battles in Leinster and at Dublin.—In A.D. 1094, Murtoigh O'Brien, king of Munster, with the forces of Munster, Ossory, and Leinster, marched to Dublin, and Donal O'Loughlin, king of Aileach, with the forces of Tyrone and Tircumell, and Donal O'Melaghlin, king of Tara, with the men of Meath, and Donogh O'Eochy, prince of Ulidia, marched to the plain of Leinster, burned Oughterard in Kildare, and gained a great victory over the men of Munster and the Lagenians. Murtoigh O'Brien and the men of Munster, again came to Dublin, and expelled Godfrey Meranagh, the Danish king, having defeated his forces, and it is stated that he had a fleet of 90 ships; Murtoigh O'Brien then appointed his own son Donal, king over the Danes of Dublin. In 1095, the nobility of the Isle of Mann sent an embassy to king Murtoigh O'Brien, requesting he would send one of his family as ruler of the Island; he appointed his nephew Donal, son of Teige O'Brien, as king of Mann, but in consequence of his tyranny, the Manks and Hebridians expelled him from the Island. Godfrey Meranagh died soon after his expulsion from Dublin, and his death is recorded in the Four Masters at A.D. 1095, as having taken place in the awful plague which prevailed over Europe in that year, and it is stated, that one-fourth of the people of Ireland were carried off by that pestilence. Donal O'Brien ruled over the Danes of Dublin for about 24 years, to A.D. 1118, when he became a monk. About A.D. 1096, according to Stanishurst, Hammer, and others, a number of Danes or Ostmen came to Dublin, and obtained either from Mac Murrough, king of possession of the country, on account of his seniority; another party supported Cormac, the son of Dermot, son of Teige, who sought the government of the country on the strength of his father's patent; and the third party supported the young sons of this Cormac, the son of Teige, son of Cor-

Leinster, or from Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster, a district on the north side of the city adjoining the Liffey, which from this colony was called Ostmantown, and in after times Ormantown Green, and comprised districts in St. Michan's and St. Paul's parishes, extending from the Four Courts to the Park, along Stoneybatter, Grangegorman, Prussia-street, Arbour Hill, &c.; which districts in those days were mostly covered with a great oak forest, and it is stated that king William Rufus obtained some of this oak to make the ceiling and roof of Westminster Hall, either from Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, or Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster; and about this time the church of St. Michan's in Dublin, was founded by Michan, an Ostman or Dane.

Battle of Moycoba.—In A. D. 1100, Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster, with great forces, and a powerful fleet of the Danes, invaded Ulster, and proceeded to Easroe, in Tyrconnell, and to Derry, but they were defeated with great slaughter by the son of Mac Loghlin, prince of Aileach, and great numbers of them were slain and drowned. About A. D. 1098, Magnus, king of Norway, also became king of the Orkneys, Hebrides, and Isle of Mann; he made expeditions to the coast of Ireland, and in 1102, came with his forces and a large fleet to Dublin. The men of Ireland marched in great numbers to Dublin to attack Magnus, and his Danes and Norwegians, who had come to ravage Ireland, on which they made peace for one year with the Irish, and king Murtogh O'Brien entered into an alliance with Magnus, and gave his daughter Bebbin in marriage to Sigurd, son of Magnus, with much wealth and great presents, and Sigurd was appointed, by his father, king of the Orkneys, Hebrides, and Isle of Mann. It may be mentioned as a remarkable circumstance, that in the reigns of George II. and III. some of the ladies of the O'Brien family, earls of Thomond, became countesses of Orkneys by intermarriage with the Hamiltons, earls of Orkneys. In A. D. 1103, Magnus, king of Norway, with a great fleet, some say sixteen ships, others sixty, and powerful forces invaded Ireland, for the purpose of making a conquest of the country, and it is stated in the Chronicle of Mann, and by Ware and Hanmer, that Magnus sent his messengers to king Murtogh O'Brien, with a pair of his shoes, commanding him to carry them on his shoulders, in his court, in the presence of the ambassadors, on Christmas day, as a token of his subjection and homage. This insolent message of the Norwegian king raised the Irish to resistance, and Magnus and his forces having overrun a great part of the country, proceeded to Ulster, where they were opposed by the Ultonians, and in a fierce battle fought at Moycoba, near Downpatrick, on St. Bartholomew's day, the 24th of August, 1103, the Norwegians were defeated, and almost all slain, together with king Magnus himself, who, according to some accounts, was buried near Downpatrick, but according to other statements, in the cathedral of that place. An interesting account of the expedition and death of Magnus is given from the Icelandic Saga, in Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian Antiquities, from which the following particulars have been collected:—King Magnus fought many battles with the Irish, but was resisted with great bravery, and at length entered into a truce with the men of Ulster, and prepared his ships to sail to Norway, on condition that the Irish would give him a large supply of cattle, to be killed for the support of his men. The eve of St. Bartholomew's day, the 23d of August, was the time appointed for the Irish to supply the cattle, but not having fulfilled their promise, Magnus, with his forces, disembarked on St. Bartholomew's day, to see about the cattle. The day was calm and beautiful—the sun shining serenely in the heavens; they travelled on over marshes and bogs, making their way on little bridges, constructed of rough hewn poles and pieces of timber, and through dense woods, and having at length reached a hill, from which they had an extensive prospect, they perceived at a distance an immense cloud of dust, such as that produced by a body of horsemen; some said these were the Irish forces coming to attack them, others considered they were messengers coming with the proposed supply of cattle, and on a nearer approach they perceived a great drove of cattle coming on, which the Irish delivered up to the Northmen. It was now about noon-day, and the Northmen prepared to return to their ships, but when they came to the marshes, the Irish, who had formed an ambuscade in an adjoining wood, suddenly rushed with a fierce assault on the foreigners. King Magnus ordered Eyvinder, his chief commander, to sound the trumpet and summon all his men to the royal standard, and his warriors to close their ranks with serried shields until they passed the swamps and came to the plains, where they would be safe. Magnus and his men made their way to an old fort or entrenchment, which they reached with difficulty, and being fiercely pursued by the Irish, the Northmen were slaughtered in great numbers. The king seeing a certain champion, a man from Upland, in Sweden, by name Thorgrim, called on him, saying, "Do you with your cohort cross the rampart, and while so doing we will defend you, and when you have passed it, occupy the opposite hill, and with your skilful archers attack the enemy, until we pass onward." Thorgrim and his followers crossed the foss, but immediately placing their shields on their backs, fled to their ships. The king perceiving their flight, exclaimed—"Is it thus you fly, you coward! I was a fool to prefer you to command instead of Sigurd, the swiftfooted, who would not thus desert me." Magnus fought with great valour, but while defending himself against numbers, he was transfixed by the thrust of a javelin through both thighs, above the knees, but drawing out the weapon with his own hands, he broke it between his feet, exclaiming, "Thus we young warriors can break these twigs; fight on bravely, my men, and fear no danger for me." Soon after, however, the dauntless king received a powerful stroke of a battle-axe on the neck, and fell. On the death of Magnus, the remnant of the Norwegians fled to their ships, but Vidkunner, the son of John, killed the man who had given the mortal blow to Magnus, after he had himself received three severe wounds, but he succeeded in carrying off to the ships the king's sword and the royal standard. An immense number of the Northmen, together with their king, were slain, and also several Iarls, as Swerker, Eyvinder, Ulfr, Dago, and other chiefs, and the remnant fled to their ships along with Sigurd, son of Magnus, earl of Orkneys. King Magnus, who was then about the 40th year of his age, is represented as having been a man of great strength, fine form, and handsome features, and his dress and appearance are described as follows, in the Saga of Snorro:—King Magnus had his head covered with a helmet, and carried on his arm a red shield, on which was impressed the image of a golden lion; he wore in his belt a sword of surpassing sharpness, the name of which was Legbitir, signifying the Limb-cutter; the hilt was of ivory, and the handle ornamented with gold, in a twisted form; in his hand he held a javelin, and over his coat of mail he wore a short silken cloak, of a scarlet colour, in which was interwoven the image of a lion, worked in yellow silk, and all acknowledged that whether viewed at back or front, none could be seen superior to him in strength of body, dignity, and beauty.

In A. D. 1103, the Danes of Dublin were defeated with great slaughter, and Torstan, the son of Erie, Paul, the son of Amund, and many other chiefs were slain. In A. D. 1115, Donal O'Brien and the Danes of Dublin gained a great victory over the Lagenians, in which Donogh O'Maolnambo, prince of Ily Kinsellagh, and Conor O'Conor, prince of Offaly, with many others, were slain.

In A. D. 1118, Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, led his forces to Dublin, and having defeated the Danes, carried off all the hostages they had in their hands, and also Donal O'Melaghlin, son of the king of Tara; and O'Conor then became king over the Danes of Dublin, for about seven years, as successor to Donal O'Brien. In A. D. 1126, Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, marched with his forces to Dublin, and having reduced the Danes and Lagenians to subjection, he appointed his son Conor king of Dublin, but Conor O'Conor was expelled in a year or two after from Dublin. At this time Torlogh O'Conor was king of Con-mac Oge, son of Cormac, son of Teige Mac Carthy, and his mother Judith, the daughter of Pierce-na-Buile, the son of James, son of Edmond Mac Peirce; but notwithstanding all that, Cormac, the son of Teige, son of Dermot, succeeded.

naught, and afterwards became monarch of Ireland, but it appears he was able to exercise only a limited authority over the Danes of Dublin, who had at the same time their own lords, and several of the Norwegian earls of the Orkneys, the Hebrides, and Isle of Mann, became Danish kings of Dublin. In A. D. 1124, according to the Annals of Ulster, Thorfinn, son of Thorkil, king of the Danes of Dublin, died in the prime of life, of a sudden disease; he appears to have been one of the earls of Orkneys. In A. D. 1127, the Danes of Dublin carried off the shrine of St. Columkille, but restored it to its own church in a month afterwards. In A. D. 1130, the precious relics and valuable articles of Clonmacnois were found with the Danes of Limerick, after they had been carried off by a Dane named Giolla Comghain, who was hanged by O'Brien, king of Munster.

Battle of Fennor, &c.—In A. D. 1133, Donogh O'Carroll, prince of Oirgiall, with a great force of the men of Louth and Farney, marched into Fingall, and defeated the Danes with great slaughter at Fionnabhair, and amongst the slain were Reginald, the son of Paul, and many other chiefs. This battle was fought at Fennor, in Meath, near the Boyne, about a mile or two south of Slane. In A. D. 1133, Conor O'Melaghlin, son of the king of Meath, was slain in battle by Donogh Mac Giollamocholmoge, heir presumptive to the kingdom of Leinster, and the Danes of Dublin, but Giollamocholmoge was slain in a month after by the men of Meath, and they burned the stone church of Lusk, full of people and valuable articles, to be revenged on the Fingallians for the death of O'Melaghlin; and Murrough O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, to avenge the loss of his son, laid waste Fingall and eastern Leinster.

Battles at Dublin.—About A. D. 1135, Murrough Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, had great contentions with the Danes of Dublin, over whom he assumed authority, and having exercised great tyranny on them, and exacted large tributes, they, in revenge, according to Camden and others, sent for Godred, king of Mann and the Islands, to rule over them, and he having arrived with his fleet, they received him with great joy, and appointed him king. Mac Murrough collected his forces, encamped at his chief town, Cortchelis (probably Carlow), and detached three thousand of his cavalry, under command of his uterine brother, O'Siblen, who was prince of Offaly, to Dublin, against Godred; they fought a furious battle, in which the Irish were defeated, and O'Siblen himself, with a great number of his forces, were slain. These circumstances are mentioned in the Chronicle of Mann, but their chronology is not correct, and they confound Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, with Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster. This Godred was son of Aulaf, and grandson of Godred Crovan, who had been king of Dublin and of the Isle of Mann, as before mentioned. Godred II. did not long remain king of Dublin, but returned to the Isle of Mann; he was married to Finguala, daughter of Murtogh Mac Loughlin, king of Ulster, and died in 1189, and was buried at Iona; his daughter, Afreca, was married to John de Courcy, earl of Ulster. According to the Chronicles of Hammer, Stanilurst, and Grace, the Danes of Dublin afterwards became apparently reconciled to Mac Murrough as their king, and having invited him to a banquet, they treacherously slew him, about A. D. 1140, and, in contempt, buried his body along with that of a dog; his son, Dermot Mac Murrough, many years after, avenged his death on the Danes, and in conjunction with his Anglo-Norman allies, under Strongbow, &c., took from the Danes the city of Dublin. About this time, according to Hamner, there was a famous warrior named Harold, who was brought up amongst the Danes of Ireland, and was supposed to be a son of Magnus, king of Norway; he collected great forces, went to Norway, and the Norwegians made him their king, but he was soon after slain.

Battle at Waterford.—In A. D. 1137, Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, Conor O'Brien, prince of the Dalcassians, together with the Danes of Dublin and Wexford, brought their forces by sea, with a fleet of 200 ships, and attacked and took Waterford, and they carried off the hostages of Donogh Mac Carthy, of Desies and Waterford. In the same year, Cormac Mac Carthy led his forces against O'Brien and the Danes of Limerick.

Battles in Meath, &c.—In A. D. 1138 the Methians and Laginians, together with the Danes, proceeded to Inismochta, now Inismott, in Meath, on the borders of Louth, at the lake of Ballyhoe, and great numbers of them having crossed over in their boats, and some by swimming in the lake, attacked and plundered the island and its abbey, but the people of the island having sailed in their boats, attacked them, and slew and drowned great numbers of them, and expelled the rest from the island. In A. D. 1140 the Danes of Dublin gained a victory over the Danes of Waterford, and slew the grandson of Tomar. In A. D. 1141, Conor O'Brien, prince of Thomond, led his forces to Dublin, and the Danes received him as their king. In A. D. 1142, Oittir, a lord of the Danes of the Hebrides, came with great forces to Ireland, and took and plundered Kells and Dublin. In A. D. 1146 the Danes of Dublin were defeated with great slaughter by the men of East Meath, and 200 of them were slain, together with Reginald, high steward of Dublin, the son of Thorkil, and another chief named Humphrey. This was Reginald II., Danish king of Dublin, and he was succeeded by Oittir, a Danish lord of the Hebrides, who was killed A. D. 1148 by the sons of Mac Thorkil. In the same year Ceallach O'Kelly, lord of Bregia, was slain by Flaherty O'Casey, and the Danes of Dublin.

Battle in Wales.—About A. D. 1147, according to Ware and Hamner, from the Welsh Chronicles, Owen Gwynneth, prince of Wales, and his brother Cadwallader, having come to Ireland, collected a great force of Irish and Danes from Dublin, under Oittir their king, with a body of Scots called Red Shanks, and they went to Wales, but a peace having been concluded between the two brothers, Oittir and the Irish kept Cadwallader prisoner until he would pay the two thousand marks he had promised for their services, and in lieu of it compelled him to deliver two thousand head of cattle; but prince Owen attacked the Danish forces, slew a great number of them, and recovered the cattle, and the remnant of the Danes returned to Dublin. Gray, in one of his Odes, gives a poem from the Welsh on this subject:

"Owen's praise demands my song,
Owen swift, and Owen strong;
Fairest flower of Roderick's stem,
Gwyneth's shield and Britain's gem.
Big with hosts of mighty name,
Squadrons three against him came,
This the force of Erin hiding,
Side by side, as proudly riding,
On her shadow, long and gay,
Lochlin plows the watery way;
There the Norman sails afar
Catch the winds and join the war;
Black and huge along they sweep,
Burthens of the angry deep.
Dauntless on his native sands
The Dragon-Son of Mona stands;
In glittering arms and glory drest,
High he rears his ruby crest.
There the thundering strokes begin,
There the press, and there the din;
Talymalfra's rocky shore
Echoing to the battle's roar.
Where his glowing eye-balls turn,
Thousand banners round him burn;
Where he points his purple spear,
Hasty, hasty, Rout is there,
Marking with indignant eye,
Fear to stop, and shame to fly.
There Confusion, Terror's child,
Conflict fierce, and Ruin wild,
Agony, that pants for breath,
Despair, and honorable death."

The bishop of Kerry (James Fitz Maurice, bishop of Ardferf), died, namely, James the son of Richard, son of John, and that bishop was a vessel full of wisdom; his origin was of the Clan Peirce, viz., the tribe of Raymond (Raymond le Gros), the son of William (Fitzgerald), son of Gerald, and

In A. D. 1149 Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and the Danes of Dublin, laid waste Duleck, and slew Dermot, son of Manus O'Loghlin, tanist of Aileach, and his body was buried in Armagh. In the same year Donogh O'Carroll, prince of Oirgiall, and O'Loghlin, prince of Aileach, marched their forces to Dublin, and Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, came to their camp, and a peace was established between the Danes and Irish. In A. D. 1150 Torlogh O'Brien, king of Munster, marched with his forces to Dublin, and the Danes came to his camp, and made their submission to him.

Battle at sea on the Coast of Ulster.—In A. D. 1154, Torlogh O'Conor, king of Connaught, with a great fleet and powerful forces, sailed along the coasts of Connaught to Ulster, and laid waste Tircomell and Inisowen; but the people of Tirconnell and Tyrone collected their forces under Murtogh O'Loghlin, prince of Aileach, and hired a Danish fleet from Arrann, Cantyre, the Hebrides, and Isle of Mann, under the command of Mac Seelling, their Admiral, and when they arrived at Inisowen a fierce naval battle was fought between them, which continued from daylight till noon, and a great number of the Conacians were slain, together with their chief commander, Cosnamhaeh O'Dowd, but a great victory was ultimately gained over the foreign fleet, and an immense number of their forces were slain, and their ships taken; Mac Seelling's teeth were all drawn, as a punishment for his having lost the battle. In the same year Murtogh O'Loghlin marched with his forces to Dublin, and the Danes submitted to him as their king, on which he presented them with 1200 cows, as a reward for their services.

In A. D. 1156 Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and the Danes of Dublin, and Donogh O'Melaghlin, with their united forces, laid waste Meath, and took away great spoils and preys of cattle from Ardraccan, Slane, Tailten, Donoghpatrick, &c.; and in the same year a victory was gained in Cuasan, at Lios Luighidh in Ily Laoghlaire in Meath, against Tiarnan O'Rourke and the men of Brefney, by Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, assisted by the Danes of Dublin and the men of Meath, under Donogh O'Melaghlin, and great numbers of the Brefnians and of their chiefs were slain. In A. D. 1157, Murtogh O'Loghlin, king of Ulster, marched with his forces to Leinster, to Desmond, and to Thomond, and compelled their kings and princes to give him hostages and tribute, and having reduced the Daleassians to subjection, he attacked Limerick, which was delivered to him by the Danes, and having expelled Torlogh O'Brien, they accepted O'Loghlin as their king. In A. D. 1160, Brodar, son of Thorkil, king of the Danes of Dublin, was slain in battle by Maolerou Mac Giollasechnaill, and the men of South Bregia. In A. D. 1161 Murtogh O'Loghlin, king of Ulster, having led his forces through Brefney, and to Lieblagh in Westmeath, the Danes of Dublin, and the Lagenians, with their king, Dermot Mac Murrough, came to his camp, and made their submission. In the same year, Donal Cavenagh Mac Morrough, and the men of Ily Kinsellagh, defeated the Danes of Wexford with great slaughter. In A. D. 1162, Murtogh O'Loghlin, king of Ulster, at the head of the Northern Irish, the men of Meath, and some Conacians, laid waste Fingall, and marched to Dublin against the Danes, but peace was soon afterwards made between the Danes and the Irish, and 140 ounces of gold were given by the Danes to O'Loghlin, and 100 ounces of gold were given to Roderick O'Conor, king of Connaught, by Dermot O'Melaghlin, as a tribute for Westmeath.

Battle in Scotland.—In A. D. 1164, according to Innisfallen, the Danes of Dublin were slaughtered in great numbers by the men of Scotland, and Sorley, the son of Giollabrigbhe, king of the Hebrides, and of Cantyre, together with his son, Giollabrigbhe, were slain.

In A. D. 1166, Roderick O'Conor, king of Connaught, and monarch of Ireland, marched with his forces, consisting of the Conacians, the men of Meath and of Teflia, to Dublin, and was received there as king, with greater honour and dignity than any king of Ireland ever had been before; and he presented the Danes with four thousand oxen, as a reward for their service and submission to him; the Danes, on that occasion, proceeded with their forces, along with king Roderick, as far as Drogheda, where Donogh O'Carroll and the chiefs of Oirgiall came to his camp, and gave him hostages. In the same year, Tiarnan O'Rourke, with the men of Brefney, and Dermot O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, with the men of Meath, the Danes of Dublin, and some of the Lagenians, marched to Ily Kinsellagh, and they expelled Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, beyond the sea, and destroyed his fortress at Ferns, in revenge of the carrying off of the wife of O'Rourke. In A. D. 1167, Roderick O'Conor assembled a great national convention of the princes, bishops, clergy, and people of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, at Athboy, in Meath, which was attended by thirteen thousand horsemen, and amongst those Reginald, the son of Reginald, lord of the Danes of Dublin, came with one thousand horsemen. In A. D. 1169, Dermot O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, of Offaly, of Offelan, and of the Danes of Dublin, was slain by Donal O'Melaghlin, and the men of Bregia.

English Invasion.—Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, in consequence of his abduction of Dervorgilla, daughter of Murtogh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, and wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, and his having committed various other acts of violence, was attacked by the forces of king Roderick O'Conor and of O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, and being defeated, was forced to fly from Ireland, in A. D. 1166; having gone to England, he sought the aid of king Henry II., and having obtained some forces, he returned in A. D. 1167, according to the Four Masters, with an army of Foreigners from England, and fought some battles in Wexford and Carlow with the forces of king Roderick O'Conor and Tiarnan O'Rourke, and it is stated that in one of these battles, Griffin, or Griffith, son of the king of Wales, one of the most famous warriors of the British Islands, was slain on the side of Mac Murrough. In A. D. 1169, according to the Four Masters, a fleet of the Flemish, or people of Flanders, came from England to the assistance of Dermot Mac Murrough, and sixty of them were covered with coats of mail. Roderick O'Conor and Tiarnan O'Rourke, aided by the men of Meath and the Danes of Dublin, had some conflicts in Leinster with Mac Murrough and his foreign allies, and they compelled him to give his son as a hostage to O'Conor. In A. D. 1169, according to some accounts, or 1170, according to others, Richard de Clare, earl of Pembroke, commonly called Strongbow, collected his forces in Wales, and came to the assistance of Dermot Mac Murrough, who, in the year 1170, gave his daughter Eva in marriage to Strongbow, at Waterford, with the reversion of the kingdom of Leinster. King Dermot also obtained the assistance of various other Anglo-Norman chiefs of Wales, as Robert Fitzstephen, Maurice Fitzgerald, Myler Fitz-Henry, Hervey de Montmorency, Maurice Prendergast, David de Barry, &c., and these, with their forces, amounting to about 500 men, knights, archers, &c., according to Hammer, landed in three ships at the Bay of Baunow, or Bag-and-Bun, in the county of Wexford, in May, 1169. According to the Annals of Innisfallen, Maurice Fitzgerald had a force of ten Knights, thirty Esquires, and 1000 Archers, thus amounting in all to 1040 men, which is more than twice the number stated by Hammer and others. King Dermot, who was then at Ferns, joined them with a force of 500 picked men, and these combined troops attacked the town of Wexford, which was bravely defended by the Danish and Irish inhabitants for three days, but was at length taken. Dermot having collected a powerful army, amounting to 3000 men, according to the account of Maurice Regan, king Dermot's secretary, as given in Harris's Hibernica, marched, together with his English allies, against Donal Mac Gillpatrick, prince of Ossory, whose forces he defeated, after great slaughter on both sides, and Dermot ravaged various parts of Leinster. In 1170, on the first of May, Raymond le Gros, and other Anglo-Norman leaders, landed at the Rock of Dundonnell, or Dundrone, in Wexford, a few miles from that William, the son of Gerald, whom we have mentioned, was brother of Maurice (Fitzgerald), who came in the first invasion, from the king of England into Ireland, to aid Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and from him (William), are descended most of the Geraldines of Clan Maurice (the Fitz Maurices, earls of Kerry).

O'Keeffe (of Cork, see note on Desmond), i. e. Art, the son of Donal, son of Art, son of Owen, a distinguished man, was killed; and his son Art Oge was appointed his successor.

The son of Mac Auliffe (of Cork), namely, Donogh Baun, the son of Malachy, son of Dermot, son of Malachy, and his brother's son Teige, the son of Conor, fell by each other.

John Carrach, the son of William, son of Theobald Burke, an heir to a property along the river Suir (in Tipperary), who continued in treason till this time, came in on protection; after the death of the earl of Desmond, he went in pursuit of prey into the country of the Geraldines, and did not halt till he arrived at Adare (in Limerick), where he collected all the cattle of the town; the guards of the town rose out to attack the plunderers; John with his small party of horsemen, having turned on the guards, was struck on the head with a sure aim by the shot of a ball through his helmet, so that he was thrown from his horse; his party, however, carried off the prey, but left John behind them; he was afterwards brought to Limerick, where he was hanged by the commissioners of Limerick.

Mac Teige, of Ormond, (in Tipperary), i. e. Conor-an-Chuain (of the harbour), the son of Teige, grandson of Mahon Duim O'Kennedy, died; he was a skilful, comfortable, and domestic man, without reproach through life; Philip, the son of Dermot Rarofaladh O'Kennedy, was nominated the Mac Teige.

The son of Mac Coghlan, i. e. Gerald, the son of John, son of Art, son of Cormac, an intelligent young man, was, on his first assumption of chivalry, slain by the son of O'Kennedy Fionn, namely, by Murrough, the son of Bryan, son of Donal.

The countess do Roiste (de Roche), namely, Eveleen, the daughter of Maurice, son of David de Roche, the wife of the earl of Thomond, i. e. of Donogh, the son of Conor O'Brien, died in the summer of this year at Clonroad, and was buried in the monastery of Ennis.

Onora, the daughter of Donal, son of Conor, son

Waterford, near the river Suir, with a force, it is said, of about 130 knights and archers, and being joined by the Anglo-Normans of Wexford under Hervey de Montmorency, they attacked Waterford, which was defended by the Danish and Irish inhabitants, who were defeated, it is said, chiefly by stratagem of the English, who had collected together a great number of cows, which they drove furiously against the approaching troops, who were discomfited with great loss, and amongst the slain was O'Ryan, lord of Idrone, in Carlow. Amongst the prisoners were seventy of the principal citizens of Waterford, whose limbs were first broken by the English, and their bodies then cast over the rocks into the sea. In 1170, on the 23d of August, the eve of St. Bartholomew's day, Strongbow landed at Waterford with a force of 1500 men, according to some accounts, but the Annals of Inisfallen say 200 knights, and 2000 archers. These forces consisted of knights, archers, and cavalry, called men-at-arms, who were all covered with armour, helmets, coats of mail, &c. These were joined by the troops of Raymond le Gros, and on the next day they attacked and took Waterford, which was then governed by two Danish chiefs, named Reginald and Smorth, who defended the city with their Danish forces, aided by the Irish, under Malachy O'Felan, prince of Desies. The Anglo-Normans were twice repulsed, but took the city on the 25th of August, and it is stated that 700 of the Danes and Irish were slain, and amongst the prisoners were Reginald, the Danish king, and Malachy O'Felan, prince of Desies, both of whom they condemned to death, but O'Felan's life was saved through the intercession of Dermot Mac Murrough, who according to previous agreement arrived on that day at Waterford, and gave his daughter, Eva, in marriage to Strongbow, with the inheritance of the kingdom of Leinster, as his successor. In A. D. 1170, according to Inisfallen, Dermot Mac Carthy, king of Desmond, on receiving intelligence of the taking of Waterford, marched with his forces, and the chiefs of Desmond, to attack the English, and they fought a fierce battle at Waterford, in which great numbers fell on both sides, and amongst the slain on the side of the Irish were, Cathal O'Donoghoe, lord of Lough Lein, Artgal O'Riordan, Ivor Mac Cathail, Coillen O'Cullen, Donogh O'Mahony, and Mac Con O'Driscoll, with many others. It is further stated that Mac Carthy defeated them in three battles. On the 18th of October, A. D. 1171, not 1172, as erroneously stated by several historians, king Henry II. landed at Waterford with a fleet of 400 sail, according to Littleton, but only 240 ships according to others, and a force of 4000 cavalry, or men-at-arms, and 500 knights; he was attended by Strongbow, Hugh de Lacy, afterwards lord of Meath, William Fitz-Adelm de Burgo, ancestor of the Burkes, lords of Connaught and earls of Mayo and Clanrickard, together with several other Anglo-Norman barons. King Henry having received the submission and homage of Dermot Mac Carthy, king of Desmond, Donal O'Brien, king of Thomond, and other princes of Munster and of Leinster, proceeded to Dublin; an account of king Henry's progress in Ireland, and other matters connected with the English invasion, has been given at p. 197, in the notes on Ormond and Desies. The following is the last notice connected with the Danes in Munster:—In A. D. 1174, the forces of Strongbow and Raymond le Gros having plundered many parts of Waterford and Cork, dispatched the booty by sea, to Waterford, under the command of Adam de Hereford; the Danes of Cork equipped thirty-five vessels, and attacked the English fleet near Dungarvan, but after a severe engagement they lost the victory, chiefly through the valour of Philip Welsh, who boarded the admiral's ship, and killed Gilbert, the son of Turgesius, the Danish commander. In A. D. 1177, king Henry II. granted to Robert Fitz-Stephen and Milo de Cogan, for the service of sixty knights, to himself and his son John, and their heirs, the entire kingdom of Cork and Desmond, with the exception of the city of Cork and the adjoining cantreds, which belonged to the Ostmen or Danes of that city, which the king resolved to hold in his own hands.

Dublin taken by the Anglo-Normans.—In A. D. 1170, Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and his English allies, of Torlogh O'Brien, who had been wife of O'Conor Kerry, i. e. of Conor, died, and was buried on Inis Cathaigh (Iniseatry, an island in the mouth of the Shannon, in the county Clare, opposite Kerry).

The people of sir Nicholas Malby, and the sons of the earl of Clanrickard, namely, Ulick and John, marched with a very great force into Iochtar Tire (the Lower Country), and Umhall of O'Malley, (barony of Burrishoole, in Mayo), and immense was the booty they seized on that expedition; they burned and completely plundered Cathair-na-Mart (the Stone fortress of the Oxen, now Westport in Mayo), on that occasion.

The son of the earl of Clanrickard, i. e. John Burke, the son of Rickard Saxanaeh, son of Ulick of the Heads, son of Rickard, son of Ulick of Knoek Tuagh, was unkindredly slain by his brother, Ulick Burke, in a nocturnal attack. Alas! how woeful it was that a brother should be induced to kill his brother on account of the partition of a territory, for all are mortal in the hour of this life; it was lamentable that Ulick had not pondered in his mind the saying "Gur bo maol guala gan brathair," that is, that a shoulder is bare (unprotected), without a brother, and that a person alone is not a host; to that, however, he paid no regard, but pierced his body and speared his side, so that he left him dead on the spot; and it was with difficulty persons could be found to convey him to Athenry, where the beloved man was buried. The death of that man was a source of heartfelt sorrow to the people of his own country, on account of his distinguished good sense, personal figure, lineage, hospitality, nobleness, and good actions.

Mac William Burke, i. e. Richard of the Iron, the son of David, son of Edmond, son of Ulick, a man noted for depredations, conflicts, marches, and valorous deeds, who often forced the dangerous pass against his enemies, and who was also often defeated, died; and Richard, the son of Oliver, son of John, was appointed his successor.

O'Reilly, i. e. Hugh Conallach, the son of Maol-mora, son of John, son of Cathal, a person who spent his period of government without opposition, and his time without misfortune, and who kept Brefney without being endangered by the attacks of his English and Irish neighbours while he lived, died, and was buried in the monastery of Cavan; and his wife Isabel (Isabella) Barnwell, died, at the same time along with him. The son of that having resolved to take Dublin, marched with their combined forces from Waterford, Wexford, and Ferns, according to Giraldus Cambrensis, through the mountains of Glendalough in Wicklow. According to the account of Maurice Regan, published in Harris's Hibernica, their forces were as follows: Milo de Cogan commanded the vanguard at the head of 700 men, and Raymond le Gros followed next with 800; in the rear was earl Strongbow with 3000 men, thus making 4,500 of the Anglo-Normans or English. Dermot Mac Murrough had 1000 Irish of chosen men, and his son, Donal Cavenagh, had another large body of Irish, more than 1000, their entire army thus amounting to about 7000 men, well armed and disciplined. King Roderick O'Conor, with Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, and Murtoigh O'Carroll, prince of Orgiall, led a powerful army against the Lagenians and their English allies, and having encamped at Clondalkin, they remained there prepared for battle for three days, but, according to the Four Masters, an accidental fire happened in Dublin at the time, and the Danes who defended the fortress, having deceived the Conacians and Ulster forces, king Roderick retired without defending the city or giving battle to the invaders who advanced against Dublin; Strongbow and Dermot encamped at some distance, but Milo de Cogan came close to the walls. Strongbow and Dermot sent Maurice Regan as a herald to summon the city to surrender, and to demand 30 hostages. Aseulph Mac Thorkil, then the Danish king of Dublin, prepared his forces to defend the city, but fearing the issue of a siege, promised to deliver up the city and the hostages; in the mean time Laurence O'Toole, then archbishop of Dublin, went to the English camp to intercede for the inhabitants with Dermot Mac Murrough, who was much incensed against them, the Danes having some years before ignominiously put to death his father, Murrough, king of Leinster, and buried his body in derision, with that of a dog. The time of parley having passed while they were disputing about the hostages, Milo de Cogan and Raymond le Gros led their troops suddenly and treacherously against an undefended point of the walls, and having entered the city by assault, they massacred great numbers of the inhabitants in the midst of their fortress. This event took place, according to Maurice Regan, on the festival of St. Matthew the Apostle, namely, the 21st of September, A. D. 1170, and Dermot Mac Murrough and earl Strongbow having entered Dublin, seized there great abundance of provisions, of wealth, of gold and silver, and other valuable articles; after a few days stay in Dublin, king Dermot returned to Ferns, where he died in the course of the same year. Milo de Cogan was appointed the first English governor of Dublin, and Strongbow having proceeded with his forces to Meath and the borders of Brefney, plundered and burned Clonard, Kells, Taitlen, Slane, Kilsuire, and other churches, and carried off many captives, and great spoils and preys of cattle to their camp. It appears that at this period there was no co-operation between king Roderick O'Conor and the Danes of Dublin, hence Roderick retired with his forces without defending the city. On the taking of Dublin, the Danish king Aseulph Mac Thorkil, with many of the wealthy citizens, fled to their ships in the Liffey, and sailed to the Isle of Mann and Orkneys with their treasures and valuable effects. Aseulph, determined to attempt the recovery of Dublin, collected a great force of Danes and Norwegians from the Orkneys, Hebrides, and Isle of Mann, and, about Whitsuntide, A. D. 1171, landed at Dublin with a fleet of 60 ships and 10,000 men, according to Regan; one of their chief commanders was a famous Norwegian warrior of immense strength, and gigantic stature; he is called by some John le Dene, and by others John Wode, signifying John the Mad or furious. The Danish champions are thus described by Hammer from Cambrensis:—"They were all mighty men of war, and well appointed after the Danish manner, being harnessed with good Brigandines, Jacks, and coats of mail; their shields, bucklers, and targets were round and coloured red, and bound about with iron, and as they seemed in arms, so were they no less in mind, iron-strong and mighty." The garrison of Dublin was commanded by Miles and Richard de Cogan, and they were assisted by an Irish prince named Giollamocholmoge, who lived

O'Reilly, namely John Roe, was endeavouring to assume the government of the country, through the influence of the English, in opposition to Edmond, the son of Maolmora, who was the senior according to the custom of the Irish, and the result was that the country and lordship were divided between the tribe of Maolmora.

The son of O'Connor Sligo, i. e. Cahir, the son of Teige Oge, son of Teige, son of Hugh, was treacherously slain by a party of the O'Harts.

The son of O'Connor Don, i. e. Torlogh, the son of Dermot, son of Carbry, son of Owen Caoch, son of Felim Geangcach, died.

Teige Oge, the son of Teige O'Rourke, died in imprisonment with O'Rourke, namely, Bryan, the son of Bryan, son of Owen.

Oilen-na-dTuath, i. e. Port-an-Oilein (now probably Inishdooy, or Owey, off the north western coast of Donegal), was taken by Mac Sweeney of the Districts i. e. Owen Oge, the son of Owen Oge, son of Owen, son of Donal, from the sons of Donal, the son of Donogh, and the sons of Donal were slain there.

The town of O'Neill, i. e. of Torlogh Luinech, namely, Strathban (Strabane, county of Tyrone), was burned by O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Manus; and he did great damages to O'Neill besides plundering the town, for it was on that occasion O'Coinne (O'Quinn), and the son of Mac Hugh, together with many others, were slain by O'Donnell.

Donogh, the son of the Calvach O'Donnell, was killed by the crew of a Scottish fleet.

Bryan, the son of Donogh, son of Cuchonacht, son of Cuchonacht Maguire, a man who bore a good name for nobleness and hospitality, died.

Great depredations were committed on Sorley Buighe, the son of Mac Donnell (of Antrim), by Hugh, the son of Felim Bacach O'Neill, by Mac Quillan, and the English; Sorley Buighe, and his kinsmen, went in pursuit of the preys, and defeated all those before them, and took the preys from them; Hugh, the son of Felim Bacach, was slain on that occasion, together with one or two companies of the English, and the rest of them fled without prey or victory.

Torlogh, the son of Donal O'Brien, and John Roe, the son of Hugh Conallach, son of Maolmora O'Reilly (of Cavan), went to England, and were installed in the degrees of knighthood on one day, in the summer of this year, in the presence of queen Elizabeth.

Donogh, the son of O'Boyle, i. e. Torlogh, was killed by the O'Malleys, at Iniscaoil.

near Dublin. John le Dene, at the head of his Norwegians, gave a furious assault at the east gate, afterwards called Dames-Gate, from the ancient church of St. Mary les Dames, which was situated there near the castle. The place was vigorously defended by Miles de Cogan, and after great numbers were slain on both sides, de Cogan was repulsed; in the meantime Richard de Cogan rapidly rushed out at the south gate with his cavalry and charged the Danish forces in the rear, who were defeated with great slaughter, and then fled to their ships. John the Furious, scorning to fly, fought with amazing valour, and slew great numbers with his own hand; amongst his feats it is recorded by Regan and others, that with a single blow of his battle-axe he cut off the thigh of an English horseman, so that the limb fell to the ground on one side, and the body on the other, but the heroic John at length overcome by numbers was slain by Miles de Cogan and Walter de Riddlesford. These events took place in the month of June, A. D. 1171, and it is stated by Regan and others, that 2000 of the Danish forces were slain in the attack on Dublin, and but few of the English; but the Four Masters state that great numbers were slain on both sides, and it is probable, therefore, that at least 1000 of the English fell in the engagement. It appears the Anglo-Normans or English were superior to the Danish forces in discipline, though not in valour, and gained their victories chiefly through the strength of their cavalry who were covered with armour, and called Men-at-Arms, while the Danes had no horse troops to contend against them. Asculph attempting to escape to his ships was taken prisoner and brought back to Dublin, where refusing to pay a ransom for his life, and uttering some threats of defiance against the English, with more bravery than prudence as he was in their power, he was by order of Miles de Cogan hanged and beheaded on the strand in sight of his own men, on board their ships. Thus fell Asculph Mac Thorkil, the last Danish king of Dublin, and with him terminated the rule of the Northmen, after they had maintained their position in Dublin for about 330 years from the time of Turgesius, and their power passed to the Anglo-Normans.

In the course of the year 1171, some time after the capture of Dublin and the death of Mac Thorkil, king Roderick O'Connor with Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, Murrough O'Carroll, prince of Oirgiall, and Mac Dunlevey, prince of Ulidia, collected a great army to attack and take Dublin from the English; Roderick was joined, according to Regan and others, by some of the princes of Munster and Leinster, and it is said that their combined forces amounted to 30,000 men. Roderick encamped at Castleknock, and had part of his forces at Finglas; O'Rourke, O'Carroll, and Mac Dunlevey, were stationed at Clontarf; Donal O'Brien, king of Thomond, encamped at Kilmalinham, and Murrough, prince of Hy Kinsellagh, with the Lagenians, were located at Dalkey. Godred, king of the Isle of Mann, was also in alliance with Roderick, and came to Dublin with his forces and a fleet of 30 ships, which guarded the harbour; these combined forces besieged Dublin, according to some accounts, for two months, and the Four Masters state, that they fought with the English garrison many engagements for the space of a fortnight. The city was defended by a strong garrison under earl Strongbow, Raymond le Gros, Maurice Fitzgerald, Miles and Richard de Cogan, Myler Fitz-Henry, Maurice Prendergast, Robert de Quincy, standard-bearer of Leinster, Walter de Riddlesford, &c.; and they had also a large force of Irish allies from Leinster under Donal Cavenagh, son of the late king Dermot Mac Murrough, together with two chiefs from Wicklow named Mac Geley and Auliff O'Carvy. The garrison being hard pressed by the besiegers, and in great want of provisions, held a council and came to a resolution, according to the advice of Strongbow, as stated by Regan, of sending the archbishop Laurence O'Toole to king Roderick's camp with a proposal that if Roderick Fearfeadha, the son of Torlogh Meirgeach Mac Sweeney, died in the town of Mac Sweeney, of Banagh (in Donegal).

O'Neill, i. e. Torlogh Luineach, was at Strabane with a great party of the English along with him, and they were contemplating and threatening to go to plunder Tirconnell, in retaliation for the burning of Strabane before that time. When O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Manus, received intelligence of that affair, he quickly collected his forces to oppose them, and immediately marched to Druim Lighéan (Dromlín, near Lifford, in Donegal), where he encamped, in the month of June, precisely. A troop of O'Neill's cavalry often came to carry on skirmishes and attacks against O'Donnell's cavalry, which were promptly resisted by O'Donnell's people, so that some fell between them each day. It happened on a certain occasion that all the select cavalry forces of O'Neill marched with vigour and boasting, and with scorn and contempt, against the Tirconnallians, and did not halt in their career until they crossed the river Finn, and through Port-na-d-Tri-Namhad, and to the vicinity of O'Donnell's camp. The people of O'Donnell were at that time somewhat dismayed, but, however, they at once prepared to meet those troops, and they made a charge on them; a fierce and violent conflict and onset ensued, which lasted for a long time, but O'Neill's cavalry were at length put to flight towards the Finn, across which they had come, and were closely pressed in the pursuit, without relaxation, surrounded and circumvented, so that they were not able to gain the ford, and were, therefore, obliged to face the river before them, where they all rushed; great numbers of O'Neill's people were slain and drowned on that occasion, among whom were O'Gormley, i. e. Cormac; Mac Hugh, and Maolmurry, the son of Dermot, son of Mahon, son of Tuathal O'Clery, the most prized hostage of O'Neill and of the Tyrionians; for his father, and O'Neill himself, were born of the same mother, and all O'Neill's wealth was under his controul, on account of his relationship to him; and he (O'Neill), would not have hesitated to give three times the usual amount of all sorts of wealth for his ransom, if he could be redeemed; he was wounded and drowned by O'Donnell's people, who were greatly rejoiced and gratified at his having fallen by them.

raised the siege, Strongbow would consent to hold Leinster in subjection to him, but Roderick refused these terms, and insisted that the English should evacuate Dublin, Waterford, Wexford, and all the castles and forts held by them, and depart from Ireland. Archbishop O'Toole, with great ardour and patriotism, advised and excited king Roderick and the Irish chiefs to expel the English, and he afterwards even joined the Irish forces. Strongbow and his chiefs would not consent to the conditions proposed by king Roderick, and resolved to defend Dublin to the last extremity; having laid their plans, they prepared for a sudden sally against the camp of Roderick, and early in the morning led their best troops, consisting of knights, men-at-arms, and archers, commanded by Strongbow, Raymond le Gros, Maurice Fitzgerald, Miles and Richard Cogan, &c., towards Pinglas, where part of king Roderick's forces were encamped, and the rest at Castleknock. The Anglo-Normans surprised the camp, the Irish being unprepared for any attack, and king Roderick himself it is said was nearly taken prisoner, being at the time preparing to take a bath. After the Irish were dispersed, the Anglo-Normans plundered the camp, where they found great abundance of provisions, and they returned with much booty in triumph to Dublin. The Four Masters give a different and more probable account of this affair, and state that king Roderick, with the cavalry of Brefney and Orgiall, went to carry off and burn the corn of the English, and that while absent on this expedition, earl Strongbow and his forces surprised and took the camp of the northern Irish, and slew great numbers of them. The other Irish chiefs encamped at Kilmainham and Dalkey, it appears withdrew their forces without fighting a blow, but the Irish kings and chiefs never acted with any cordial unanimity or concert, being always influenced by mutual jealousies, and their councils full of dissension and discord. Besides the Irish troops were very undisciplined, and though equal to the Danes and Anglo-Normans in valour, they were often defeated, and the invaders appear to have had better disciplined forces, particularly the Anglo-Normans, whose knights, cavalry, and archers, were all completely armed and covered with armour. The Irish under king Roderick being thus defeated, his ally Godred retired with his ships to the Isle of Mann. In A. D. 1171, another attempt was made to recover Dublin by Tiarnan O'Rourke at the head of the men of Brefney and Orgiall, who fought some conflicts against the Anglo-Normans under Miles de Cogan, but after great numbers had fallen on both sides the Irish were defeated, and Hugh, son of Tiarnan O'Rourke, tanist of Brefney, O'Quinn, and other chiefs were slain. In A. D. 1172, Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, was treacherously slain by the English at a conference near Athboy, with Hugh de Laey, lord of Meath, and his head was cut off and placed over the castle gate of Dublin, and his body gibbeted with the feet upwards, at the north gate of the city, according to the annalists, "a most woful spectacle to the Irish."

Destruction of men and property during the Danish wars.—In the preceding articles a full account has been given of the various Danish invasions and wars, which continued, it appears, from the latter end of the eighth, to beyond the middle of the twelfth century, comprising a period of 377 years, from their first invasion in A. D. 794, to the taking of Dublin by the Anglo-Normans, and the death of Aseulph Mac Thorkil in A. D. 1171. The Northmen or Danes and Norwegians were a very warlike and valiant people, and at the same time very politic and crafty, and though not superior to the Irish in valour, they appear to have generally overmatched them in policy. It has been shewn in the preceding accounts that the Danes and Norwegians held the cities of Dublin, Wexford, Waterford, Limerick, and Cork, and had powerful fleets at these harbours, and on the great lakes and bays throughout Ireland, as Loughs Neagh, Belfast, Strangford, Foyle, Swilly, and Erne, in Ulster; Lough Corrib, the Bay of Galway, &c. in Connaught; Lough Ree on the Shannon, in Meath; Lough Derg, and the bay of Limerick, on the Shannon, in Munster, and also at

A. D. 1584.

ERALD, the son and heir of the earl of Kildare, died in England.

Sir Nicholas Malby, governor of the province of Connaught, died in Athlone about Shrovetide; he was a man learned in languages and in the tongues of the islands of western Europe, a valiant and battle-triumphant man, throughout Ireland, Scotland, and France, in the service of his sovereign, and that the bays of Cork, Waterford, Wexford, Dublin, Drogheda, and Dundalk. They had also numerous strong fortresses in the cities and towns along the sea coasts, and near the great lakes, and issuing forth from their ships and strongholds, they repeatedly ravaged the entire country, plundering, laying waste, and burning the abbeys, churches, colleges, and towns, carrying away or destroying the crops, corn, and cattle, committing many massacres on the monks, clergy, and people, and carrying off many thousands into captivity, dispersing the Bards, Brachons, and learned men, burning their books, and destroying various works of art, the entire of Ireland thus presenting, during their time, a continued scene of rapine and slaughter. The amount of property destroyed during the devastations of these ruthless robbers, for many centuries, must have been enormous, and the inroads of these fierce and semi-barbarous invaders reduced the country to a complete state of anarchy, and retarded all civilization. In the various battles which have been described, accounts are given of four of the monarchs of Ireland, about twenty of the provincial kings, and a vast number of princes and chiefs, who were slain; and also of about ten of the Danish kings, and an immense number of their earls and chiefs, who were killed. In the incessant warfare and sanguinary contests with the Northmen throughout all parts of the country, for a period of 377 years, it is probable that in the almost innumerable fierce battles, conflicts, and massacres recorded by the historians, and in many other engagements, the accounts of which are lost, there fell three hundred thousand of the invaders, and two hundred thousand of the Irish, making in all half a million of men slain in Ireland during the Danish wars.

The Danish Kings of Dublin.—In the preceding articles on the Danish wars, an account has been given of the various kings and Iarls who ruled over the Northmen, or Danes and Norwegians in Dublin; and in the notes, from p. 481 to 487, and also pp. 508, 509, 535, an account has been given of the Danish kings and lords of Waterford and Limerick. This is the first attempt to give a full catalogue and accurate chronology of the Danish kings of Dublin. Ware has given an account of them, but it is very imperfect, many of them being altogether omitted, while it is difficult to distinguish between the different kings of the same name, there being mentioned three or four Aulafs, three or four Sitrics, and several Godfreys, but no distinction made, such as Aulaf I. and II., Sitric I. and II., and so on. In the present catalogue, partly collected from Ware, but chiefly from the Annals of the Four Masters, of Ulster, and of Innisfallen, and also from the ancient histories of Denmark, and Norway, and from Johnstone's Celto-Scandinavian and Celto-was a profitable service for him, for he received a suitable good payment from the queen, viz., the constablership of the town of Athlone, the governorship of the province of Connaught for seven years before his death, with Roscommon and Beal-Atha-na-Sluaigheadh (Ballinasloe, in Galway), in perpetuity to himself and his heirs, in succession; but, however, it was from the sons of the earl of Clanrickard he first procured Ballinasloe. Captain Brabazon succeeded in the place of Sir Nicholas, until the arrival of Sir Richard Bingham in Ireland, as high commissioner of the province of Connaught, in the month of June of the following summer.

Torlogh, the son of Anthony, son of Malachy O'Loghlin, (lord of Burren, in Clare), was taken prisoner in the beginning of the month of March of this year, on Muic-Inis (Hog Island), by Torlogh, the son of Donal O'Brien, and he was after-

Norman Antiquities, and the Chronicle of the Kings of the Isle of Mann, and of the Norwegian Earls of the Orkney Islands, the number of Danish kings of Dublin of each name is given, and chronologically arranged, and accounts are also given of the Irish kings who occasionally ruled over the Northmen in Dublin, as the Mac Murroughs, kings of Leinster, the O'Briens, kings of Munster, and the O'Conors, kings of Connaught. The Danish kings ruled over the city of Dublin, and a considerable part of the country called Fingall, extending along the sea-coast between Dublin and Drogheda, as far as Balbriggan, and comprising the greater part of the baronies of Coolock, Nethercross, and Balrothery, and they also possessed the places along the coast south of the Liffey, in the county of Dublin, with some parts of Wicklow, and they had fortresses at Dunleary, Dalkey, Bray, and Delgany; they also had a fortress at Clondalkin, and appear to have extended their power into Kildare, as far as Athy. The Irish kings frequently reduced the Danes of Dublin to subjection, and often had opportunities of altogether expelling them from the country, but it does not appear they were anxious to do so, but rather permitted them to reside in Dublin for purposes of commerce, and they often obtained tributes from them, and many of the kings of Meath and Leinster formed alliances and intermarriages with the Danish kings of Dublin; and it may be observed that many of the Irish chiefs, adopted Danish names, such as Aulaf, Sitric, Ivar, Godfrey, Reginald or Ranall, Lochlin, &c., as they afterwards took the English names of Henry, William, Edward, Edmund, Richard, Charles, George, &c. The kings of the Danes or Northmen in Dublin were mostly Norwegians, and many of them were also kings over the Danes and Norwegians of Northumbria, the Isle of Mann, the Hebrides, and Orkney Islands. As shewn in the notes at p. 467, the Northmen first took possession of Dublin, A. D. 836, and Asculph Mac Thorkil, the last Danish king of Dublin, was slain A. D. 1171; thus they ruled over Dublin for 335 years, as appears from the following chronological catalogue of their kings:

1. Turgesius, a Norwegian, ruled over Dublin about 10 years, from A. D. 836 to 846, when he was slain by Malachy, king of Meath—(see note p. 467).
2. Aulaf I., a Norwegian prince, became king of Dublin 17 years, from 853 to 870, when he died at Dublin.
3. Icar I., lord of the Danes of Limerick, and brother of Aulaf, succeeded as king of Dublin for 2 years, and died in 872.
4. Ostin, son of Aulaf, succeeded as king of Dublin for 3 years, and was treacherously slain in 875 by some of his own people.

wards put to death by captain Brabazon, at the following summer sessions in Ennis.

The son of Mac Namara of the western part of

5. Godfrey, or Godefrid I., son of Ivar, succeeded for 13 years, and was slain in 888, by the contrivance of his brother Sitric.

6. Sitric I., son of Ivar and brother of Godfrey, succeeded 4 years, and was slain by the Danish people in 892.

7. Geoffrey Merle, a Danish lord of Dublin in 892, had great contentions with Sitric, and they divided the city between them, Sitric ruling over one half, and Geoffrey over the other.

8. Aulaf II., son of Ivar, and brother of Sitric, succeeded about one year, and was slain in 893, in a battle in Ulster with the men of Tircennell.

9. Thorhild, son of Harold Harfager, king of Norway, became king of the Northmen in Dublin, about 3 years, from 903 to 906, when he was slain by the Irish (see note p. 481).

10. Aulaf III., called Aulaf the Fair in the Icelandic Saga, a son or grandson of Harold Harfager, king of Norway, became king of the Northmen in Dublin for two or three years, but was slain in battle with the Irish about A.D. 909.

11. Reginald I. succeeded as king of Dublin A.D. 910; he was son of Hingvar or Ivar, the Danish king of Northumbria, and this Ivar was son of Ragnar Lodbrog, the famous king of Denmark, of whose exploits an account has been given at pp. 460, 462, in these notes.

12. Barith, or Burredo, the son of Oittir, a Norwegian chieftain of the Isle of Mann, became, along with Reginald, joint ruler over the Northmen of Dublin, but in A.D. 913, having contended for the supremacy, they fought a fierce naval battle at the Isle of Mann, in which the forces of Barredo were totally defeated, and himself slain. Reginald ruled about 10 years, and died at Dublin, A.D. 921.

13. Sitric II., brother of Reginald, and son of Ivar, Danish king of Northumbria, succeeded as king over the Northmen of Dublin, and was at the same time Danish king of Northumbria. Sitric was a powerful prince, and was married to a sister of Athelstan, king of England; he is called by the Four Masters Sitric Gale, that is Sitric the Valiant, and he commanded in the great battle near Dublin, A.D. 917, in which the Irish were defeated, and the monarch, Niall Glundubh, was slain. Sitric ruled over Dublin about 5 years, and died A.D. 926.

14. Godfrey II., son of Sitric II., succeeded as Danish king of Dublin, and also of Northumbria; he ruled over Dublin 6 years, to his death, A.D. 932, and is called by the annalists "the most cruel king of the Northmen."

15. Aulaf IV., son of Godfrey II. succeeded; he was called Aulaf the Red, and Aulaf of Brunanburgh, having fought that great battle against the Anglo-Saxons, as described in the notes at p. 483; Aulaf was married to a daughter of Constantine, king of Scotland; he was a very valiant warrior, and ruled over Dublin about 11 years, to his death, A.D. 943, and he was some time Danish king of Northumbria.

16. Blacar, brother of Aulaf IV., succeeded, and having ruled over Dublin about 3 years, was slain in a great battle with the Irish, near Dublin, A.D. 946.

17. Godfrey III., son of Sitric, and grandson of Sitric II., succeeded 5 years, and was slain in battle with the Irish in 951. This Godfrey and many of his people were converted to the Christian faith, and he was the first Christian king of the Danes of Dublin.

18. Aulaf V., brother of Godfrey III., succeeded, and ruled over the Danes of Dublin 30 years; in A.D. 981, he retired to the abbey of St. Columbkille, at Iona, in the Hebrides, where he soon after died in penitence and pilgrimage. He was a powerful and valiant prince, and is often mentioned by the Irish writers, under the name of Aulaf Cuaran, and he was called by the Danish writers, Aulaf Quaran; he was married to Gormflaith, sister of Maolmora Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and this Gormflaith, called by the Danish writers Kornlodra, was, after the death of Aulaf, married to Brian Boru.

Clan-Cuilein (in Clare), namely, Donogh, the son of Teige, son of Cumeadha, son of Cumara, son of John, died; he was a man most dreaded by his

19. Gluniarn, son of Aulaf V., succeeded 7 years, and was slain, A.D. 988, by one of his own people; he was called by the Irish Glun-Iarain, which signifies Iron-knee, probably from his wearing iron armour on his limbs.

20. Sitric III., brother of Gluniarn, and son of Aulaf V. and Gormflaith, succeeded as king of Dublin 40 years, to A.D. 1028, when, having set out on a pilgrimage to Rome, he died on his way. He is called by the Danish writers Sitric of the Silken Beard, and he was also called Sitric of Clontarf, having commanded in that celebrated battle, and conspired with his mother, Gormflaith, and her brother, Maolmora Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, to dethrone Brian Boru, who had been married to Gormflaith after the death of Aulaf.

21. Aulaf VI., son of Sitric III., succeeded as king of Dublin about 6 years, and having, in the year 1034, set out on a pilgrimage to Rome, was slain in England.

22. Sitric IV., son of Aulaf VI., succeeded 7 years; in 1038 he founded the Cathedral of Christ Church, in Dublin, and died A.D. 1042.

23. Aulaf VII., son of Aulaf VI., succeeded about 2 or 3 years to A.D. 1045.

24. Ivar II., son of Harold, is mentioned in the Annals at this time as king of Dublin.

25. Emeric, called by the Irish writers Eaehunarcach, son of Reginald, was also king of the Danes of Dublin for some years at this time. The period of Ivar II. and Emeric, was from about A.D. 1045 to 1060, but they were partly in subjection to the Mac Murroughs, kings of Leinster.

26. Murrough Mac Murrough, son of Dermot Mac Maolnambo, king of Leinster, and his father, assumed at this time authority over the Danes, and were the first Irish kings over the Danes of Dublin. The Mac Murroughs partly ruled over the Danes of Dublin for about 20 years, and Murrough Mac Murrough died at Dublin in 1070.

27. Godred Crovan, king of the Isle of Mann and the Hebrides, and son of Harold the Black of Iceland, a descendant of the kings of Norway, in the year 1068 took Dublin, and conquered part of Leinster, and he ruled as king of Dublin about 8 years, from 1068 to 1076; he chiefly resided in the Isle of Mann, and died in 1076, at the Island of Ila, in the Hebrides.

28. Donal Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, assumed authority for a few years over the Danes, and was styled king of Dublin; he died in 1075.

29. Murtogh O'Brien, prince of Thomond, son of Torlogh O'Brien, king of Munster, was appointed by his father king of Dublin, and he ruled over the Danes for about 10 years, to A.D. 1085.

30. Godfrey Merenagh, who was Godfrey IV., and a relative of Godred Crovan, king of Dublin, on the death of Godred in 1076 was appointed by the Danes of Dublin as their king, and he ruled over them for about 18 years to A.D. 1094, but his authority was much diminished by Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and O'Brien, king of Munster, who assumed power over the Danes, and called themselves kings of Dublin. In A.D. 1094, Murtogh O'Brien, king of Munster, expelled from Dublin Godfrey Merenagh, who soon after died, and he appointed his own son Donal as king of Dublin.

31. Donal O'Brien ruled as king over Dublin for about 24 years, from 1094 to 1118, when he became a monk and retired to the monastery of Lismore, where he died A.D. 1135, at a very advanced age.

32. Torlogh O'Conor, son of Roderick, king of Connaught, reduced the Danes of Dublin to subjection, and ruled over them nominally as king for 7 years from 1118 to 1125.

33. Conor O'Conor.—In 1126 Torlogh O'Conor marched to Dublin and appointed his son Conor as king over the Danes, but he ruled there only about one year, as the Danes revolted and deposed him in 1127.

enemies in the field of action, of any other of all the Clan Cuilein.

Roderick Carrach, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh son of Torlogh Mac Sweeny, was put to death in Cork.

A general peace was proclaimed all over Ireland,

34. Thorfinn, son of Thorkil or Torcal, a Norwegian earl of the Orkneys, was at this time about 6 years acknowledged as their king by the Danes of Dublin, to his death in 1124, but his authority was to a great extent superseded by the O'Conors, kings of Connaught.

35. Murrogh Mac Murrogh, king of Leinster, about A. D. 1128, assumed the authority of king over the Danes of Dublin, but having ruled tyrannically, they sent for Godred, king of Mann, son of Aulaf, and grandson of Godred Crovan, who in 1134 came to Dublin with great forces and defeated Mac Murrogh.

36. Godred II., was only about a year or two king of Dublin, and returned to the Isle of Mann; Mac Murrogh again succeeded but was treacherously slain by the Danes of Dublin about A. D. 1136, after he had ruled over them for about 7 years; he was father of Dermot Mac Murrogh, king of Leinster, who brought over the English.

37. Conor O'Brien, king of Munster, having marched to Dublin in 1141, reduced the Danes to subjection, and ruled as king over them for about 2 years.

38. Reginald II., son of Thorkil, and brother of Thorfinn, ruled partly as Danish king of Dublin for 10 years, from A. D. 1136 to 1146, when he was slain in battle by the men of Meath.

39. Ottir, a Danish earl of the Hebrides, became king of Dublin for about 2 years, from 1146 to 1148, when he was slain by the sons of Mac Thorkil.

40. Brodar, brother of Reginald II., became Danish king of Dublin about 10 years, from 1150 to 1160, when he was slain in battle by the men of South Bregia in Fingal.

41. Dermot Mac Murrogh, king of Leinster, assumed authority over the Danes of Dublin at different times, from A. D. 1150 to 1160.

42. Torlogh O'Brien, king of Munster, came to Dublin in 1150, and the Danes received him as king for about a year or two.

43. Murtogh O'Loughlin, king of Ulster, marched with his forces to Dublin in 1154, and assumed the authority of king over the Danes for a few years, and he gave them as a reward for their services 1200 cows.

44. Roderick O'Conor, king of Connaught and monarch of Ireland, marched to Dublin in 1166, and was acknowledged as king by the Danes, and received with greater honours than any of their kings ever had been before, and for their military services king Roderick gave them, as a reward, four thousand oxen.

45. Dermot O'Melaghlin, king of Meath, about 1167 became king of Dublin, and died in 1169, having ruled two years over the Danes.

46. Asculph Mac Thorkil, son of Reginald II., nephew of Brodar, and grandson of Thorkil, hence called Mac Thorkil, or Mac Torcal, a descendant of the Norwegian earls of Orkneys, was acknowledged as king of Dublin, by the Danes, for about 10 years, from A. D. 1161 to 1171, but he was partly in subjection to the Irish kings above-mentioned. Reginald, another Danish lord, was in authority in Dublin at this time, and in 1167 attended with one thousand horsemen at the great national convention assembled at Athboy by king Roderick O'Conor. In 1170, Dublin was taken by the Anglo-Normans, under Strongbow and Dermot Mac Murrogh, king of Leinster, and in 1171, Asculph Mac Thorkil, the last Danish king of Dublin, in attempting to recover the city, was slain by the Anglo-Normans.

The Danish Bishops.—There were many Danish bishops in the sees of Dublin, Limerick, Waterford, and Cork, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and it is remarkable that those Danish bishops all went for consecration to Canterbury, and promised canonical obedience to the archbishops of that see, while all the Irish bishops were under the jurisdiction of the see of Armagh, and were consecrated mostly in Ireland, but many also at Rome. The jurisdiction of the Danish bishops did not extend over each diocese as at present constituted, but was confined to the cities of Dublin, Limerick, Waterford, and Cork, and some small parts of the adjoining territory. The following account is taken from Ware's Bishops by Harris, Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History, D'Alton's Archbishops of Dublin, &c.

In Dublin, the following were the Danish bishops:—Donatus was the first bishop of the Danes of Dublin, from A. D. 1038, to his death in 1074, and he, by the aid of Sitric, the Danish king of Dublin, founded the Cathedral of Christ Church. Patrick, a Danish bishop, succeeded from 1074 to 1084, when he was drowned on his passage to England. Donatus O'Haingly, an Ostman, according to Ware, studied in Ireland, and became a Benedictine monk of Canterbury; he was appointed bishop of Dublin, and sat from 1085 to his death in 1095. The three fore-mentioned bishops were all consecrated by Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, and it appears as this bishop O'Haingly was a Dane, that some of the Danish families at this time took Irish surnames, and many of them prefixed O' and Mac to their names. Samuel O'Haingly, nephew of Donatus, a native of Ireland, and a Benedictine monk of the abbey of St. Alban's, in England, was consecrated by Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, as bishop of Dublin, over which he presided from 1095 to his death in 1121. Gregory, who was the first archbishop of Dublin, was an Ostman, and consecrated at Lambeth, by Ralph, archbishop of Canterbury. Gregory presided over the see of Dublin forty years, from 1121 to his death in 1161; he was the last Danish bishop of Dublin, and was succeeded by the celebrated St. Laurence O'Toole.

In Waterford, Malchus, a Dane, who had been a Benedictine monk, of Winchester, was consecrated by Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, as bishop of Waterford, where he sat from 1096 to 1110, and founded the cathedral church of the Trinity of that city. Melisa O'Hanmire, Danish bishop of Waterford, died A. D. 1136. Tostius, an Ostman, was bishop of Waterford in 1152.

In Limerick, Gille, or Gilbert, supposed to be an Ostman, was bishop of Limerick from A. D. 1110 to 1140, and was also Apostolic Legate of Ireland. Patrick succeeded as Danish bishop of Limerick, and was consecrated by Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury. Harold, a Dane, succeeded as bishop of Limerick, and died in 1151. Torgesius, a Dane, succeeded, and Briccius, another Dane, was after him bishop of Limerick; and in 1179, attended the Council of Lateran.

In Cork, Gregory and Reginald, considered to be Danes, were bishops from about A. D. 1170 to 1190.

Danish Families.—Many families of Danish origin took Irish surnames, prefixing O and Mac, so that their descent cannot now be ascertained, and several of their chiefs took Irish Christian names, particularly that of Patrick, in honour of the patron saint of Ireland. The Danes and Norwegians being in possession of Dublin, and some other parts of the country, and having maintained their colonies there for more than 300 years, there is, consequently, much of the Danish blood in the counties of Dublin and Meath, particularly in Fingall, and there are many families of Danish descent mixed by intermarriages with the old Milesian Irish. The Plunkets, earls of Fingall, and harons of Louth and Dunsany, are of Danish descent; the name is very numerous and there are still many respectable families of the Plunketts in the counties of Dublin, Meath, Louth, Longford, and Cavan. The Palmers, Sweetmans, Gilberts, Cruises, Dowdalls, and Everards, of Dublin and Meath; the Dromgooles and Blackers of Louth, and the Betaghs of Moynalty, in Meath, all families of note in former times were of Danish descent; the Fagans or O'Fagans, formerly a family of note at Feltrim, in Fingall, are said to have been of Danish descent, but others consider the O'Fagans were Irish, and the name is still numerous in Dublin, Meath, and Westmeath. In Cork, the Coppingers, Goulds, Galways, Skiddys, and Terrys, all families of note, and many of them in former times lord mayors of that city, were of Danish descent. The Harolds, Godfreys, Stacks, and Trants, families in Limerick and Kerry, are also con-and particularly in the two provinces of Munster, after the beheading of the earl of Desmond, as we have before stated. It resulted from that proclamation, that people from the neighbouring districts flocked in to reside in Connello, Kerry, and in the county of Limerick, and there was not a man who bore arms of the race of Maurice Fitzgerald in Ireland, who had been engaged in plunder and insurrection, that did not come under the law, except alone Maurice, the son of John Oge, son of John, son of Thomas the earl (of Desmond), and he even came under peace, on the word of the earl of Ormond, and having after that separated from his people, he fled, accompanied by five persons, across the Shannon of blue streams, northward through Thomond, and from one territory to another, until he arrived in the Routes of Mac Quillan (in Antrim), with Sorley Buighe, the son of Mac Donnell; from thence he went to Scotland, and afterwards to Spain, where he died in the course of time.

A new lord justice, namely, Sir John Perrott, arrived in Ireland on the 21st of June; and there came along with him Sir John Norris, as president over the two provinces of Munster, and Sir Richard Bingham, as governor over the province of Connaught. The lord justice did not spend a month entirely in Dublin when he proceeded to Athlone, and from thence to Galway, to which town the nobles of Connaught had come to meet him, and to welcome and acknowledge him as their governor and commander from the sovereign. After the lord justice had remained for some time in Galway he prepared to go to Limerick and he remained the first night after leaving Galway in Kilmacduagh; on the second night he arrived at Cuinche in Clan Cuilein (Quinn, in the barony of Bunratty county of Clare); the nobles of the county of Clare received him there, such of them as had not gone to him to Galway; the sheriff of the county was also there, namely Cruise, and the sheriff had at that time imprisoned Donogh Beag, the son of Teige, son of Donogh O'Brien, the high traitor and ringleader of the despoilers of the province of Connaught before that time;

sidered to be of Danish origin. It is traditionally stated that great numbers of the Northmen were red-haired, particularly the Norwegians, who generally had fair or redish hair, and florid complexions, and to the present time, red-haired persons in Ireland are considered by the common people to be of Danish origin.

Danish Remains.—The Northmen erected many fortresses and strongholds for their defence in Ireland, one of which of stone, namely Reginald's Tower, still remains at Waterford, and they are considered to have constructed many of those circular earthen ramparts commonly called Forts, or Danish Rathes, but though they may have constructed many of those raths, most of them throughout Ireland were erected by the ancient Irish themselves, as fortresses and habitations, many centuries before the Danes came to Ireland. The sepulchral Mounds, commonly called Moats, have been attributed to the Danes, but these earth works were chiefly constructed by the Irish as sepulchres for kings and warriors in the Pagan times. Ledwich, and some other antiquarians, have absurdly attributed the erection of almost all the ancient stone buildings in Ireland before the English invasion to the Danes, and amongst other structures they have maintained the absurd theory that the Danes built the Round Towers, and many of the old stone churches, but instead of building, the Danes more probably destroyed many of the Towers, and they demolished many hundreds of the churches; but after their conversion to Christianity they built a few churches, amongst others Christ Church and St. Michan's, in Dublin, and some in Waterford, Limerick, and Cork. Some of the ancient weapons of bronze and iron, bronze pots, and other culinary utensils, war trumpets, &c. found in bogs, lakes, and other places, are supposed by some to be Danish remains, but it is much more probable that they were mostly Irish; some of them, no doubt, may have been Danish, but it is very difficult now to determine whether those remains are Danish or Irish antiquities. The Danes are traditionally said to have brewed a kind of strong beer, and to have used the tops of the heath as one of the ingredients, probably as a substitute for hops.

Danish Coins.—There are to be found in various museums, and in the cabinets of the curious, numerous coins considered to have been struck by the Danish kings of Dublin, in the tenth and eleventh centuries, and accounts of them are given in Simon's work on Irish Coins, by Mr. Lindsay of Cork, and Dr. Aquila Smith of Dublin. Some of those coins are inscribed with the names of Sitric, Ivar, and Aulaf, Danish kings of Dublin; they are all of silver, about the size of a sixpence, and were silver pennies, and most of them being marked with a cross, were coined, it appears, after the Danes were converted to Christianity. There is a collection of these Danish coins in the Royal Irish Academy, and also in the possession of Dr. Aquila Smith; Thomas L. Cooke, Esq. of Parsonstown, in the King's county, has also a large collection of coins, ancient and modern, of various nations, amongst which are many coins of the Danish kings of Dublin.

Amongst the notices of the Northmen it may be mentioned, that in the tenth and eleventh centuries they carried off to Norway and Denmark a vast number of Irish MSS. and ancient records, many of which are said to have been preserved in the Royal Library at Copenhagen.

The Danish Wars are now completed, and the account of them should be read as an Introduction to this part of the Annals of the Four Masters, which would be otherwise incomplete until the first part is published, in the course of some time. As the Danish wars end where the Anglo-Norman wars commence, therefore the history of the Anglo-Norman, or English period, may be considered as a continuation of the Danish period, hence the necessity that arose of introducing into those annotations an account of the Danish affairs, for the Anglo-Norman invasion, and the chain of events which preceded it, could not be satisfactorily explained without giving an account of the Danes and Norwegians, the ancestors of the Normans of France, and of the Anglo-Normans, who were in fact Danes and Norwegians under a new name, who conquered England, and make a most remarkable figure in the history of Ireland. The accounts of the Danish wars have been accurately collected from the Annals of the Four Masters, of Inisfallen, Ulster, &c. and from various other works already quoted; and as the history of these important events has never before been published, it will be found extremely interesting to the general reader, and the materials will prove of great value to the historian.

 ERRATUM.—At p. 530, on the Geraldines, for Hibernicis read Hibernis, a mistake being made by the printer.

his ill fate attended him, for he was executed on a cart (or scaffold), and his bones were dislocated and smashed in pieces with the back of a weighty thick large axe, and his body, completely broken and half dead, was tied with hard tough hempen ropes, and placed on the top of the Cloccas (belfry), of Quinn (the church of Quinn), under the feet of the birds and fowls of the air, in order that it might be a warning and example to evil doers to see him in that state. The lord justice proceeded on the following day to Limerick, and resolved to spoil and chastise a great number of gentlemen about Limerick, until dispatches overtook him informing him that a Scottish fleet had landed, in the north of Ireland, at the invitation of Sorley Buighe, the son of Mac Donnell, and were plundering and devastating the country about them; and the cause for which they had come was, that Sorley Buighe, who was in possession of the Routes, (in Antrim), for thirty years before that time, received intelligence that the council of England laid an injunction and command on that new lord justice, to confer the Routes on its own rightful inheritors, and to expel Sorley to his own paternal stock in Scotland; and not that alone, but that he would not suffer any foreigners to make settlements in Ireland while he should be in the service of the sovereign. As to the lord justice, he left Limerick with all despatch, and commanded that all men fit for service, from the Boyne to Beirre (Bear, in the county of Cork), should meet him, at the expiration of twenty-four days from that, at Drogheda. These commands were obeyed by the men of Munster, Meath, and Leinster, for they came numerous, and fully equipped, to that place, and they all marched for Ulster. When Sorley received intelligence that the forces of Ireland were marching towards him, he left the Routes, and carried off with him his herds of cattle, his women, and his people, to Gleann-Chon-Cadh-an (Glenconkene in Derry), and left neither herding nor watching in the country, or guarding of any town in the Routes, except alone Dunlis (Dunluce castle); and although that was the stronghold of the province, it was taken by the lord justice in two days and nights after he had laid siege to it, and he put the queen's guards into it. After the lord justice had been ten days in the Routes, he left thirteen Banna (bands or companies) quartered in Ulster against Sorley, and he himself returned to Dublin, and disbanded the men of Ireland, and sent them to their homes.

Contentions arose in West Connaught between the tribe of Owen O'Flaherty and the tribe of Murrogh, the son of Bryan Nanoinscach O'Flaherty, and the cause of that dispute was, that the tribe of Owen, namely, the O'Flaherty, i. e. Teige, the son of Teige-Nabuile, son of Murrogh, son of Owen, and the sons of Donal Anchogaidh (of the War), the son of the Giolladuv, son of Murrogh, son of Owen, took the island of Baile-na-Hinnse (in Galway), from Teige, the son of Murrogh-na-dTuagh (of the Battle-axes), son of Teige, son of Murrogh O'Flaherty; for the tribe of Owen maintained that that island was theirs by right, and that it was by trespass against them that Teige was keeping and maintaining it, but whoever was in the right, Teige made an attack on them, after their taking it, and did not leave the least head of cattle on the portion of their country that he overran, that he did not slaughter or carry off with him; they also did great damage to Teige, though they were not equal in power. That Teige, the son of Murrogh, happened one time to go with the crew of a boat on a nocturnal attack, in the month of June, in pursuit of the tribe of Owen O'Flaherty, to Aran (the Island of Aran, off the coast of Galway), and Teige overtook them early in the morning, entirely unprepared, and between asleep and awake, on each side of the very stem of the ship, and unfriendly was the appearance he exhibited to them on that shore, and the island was not worth all the evil that had been done on that day concerning it, for there was slain there Murrogh, the son of Edmond Oge, son of Edmond Mac Hugh, the chief man of Leitir Meallain (Lettermullen, an island off the coast of Galway, in the parish of Killinan), who had joined the tribe of Owen O'Flaherty; there were also slain there the son of the seneschal of Clan Maurice (in Mayo), who was along with them on the same plundering expedition, and the son of O'Flaherty himself, i. e. of Teige, namely, Murrogh Sallach; a great number of the people of the tribe of Owen O'Flaherty were also slain, besides those chiefs; and they continued after that manner fighting with each other until peace was established between them by the English, in the following harvest, and the island was given to the tribe of Owen O'Flaherty.

Murtogh Garv, the son of Bryan, son of Teige O'Brien, died in the first month of harvest, at Craig Corcraín; he was a sensible unassuming young man, who got no reproach, blemish, insult, or abuse, from his birth till his death, and was buried in the monastery of Ennis.

The Cosnamhach, son of Perigrine, son of Dermot, son of Teige Cam O'Clery, a man of respect and affluence, kept an excellent house of hospitality for some time in Thomond, and also for some time in Tirconnell, until he died at Fuarchosach in Tirconnell, in the Lent of this year, and was buried, under the protection of God and St. Bernard, with the monks, in the monastery of Easroc (the Cistercian monastery of Ballyshannon, in Donegal.)

A. D. 1585.

The earl of Kildare, namely, Gerald, the son of Gerald, son of Gerald, son of Thomas, son of John Cam, died in England; that earl had been five years under an arrest, kept from his patrimonial estate, until he died at that time; Henry his son was nominated his successor by the English council, and was permitted to return to his patrimonial inheritance.

Mac William Burke,¹ i.e. Richard, the son of Oliver, son of John, died, and none was appointed in his place but the blind abbot, who considered himself his successor, despite of the English.

Gormley, the daughter of O'Rourke, namely, the daughter of Bryan Ballach, son of Owen, son of Tiarnan, son of Teige O'Rourke, a woman who was connected with her equals as husbands; a prosperous, kind hearted woman, who did not incur the provocation or expression of reproof by ecclesiastics or professional men, nor any other reproach regarding her hospitality or her soul, died.

Bryan, the son of Teige, son of Bryan, son of Owen O'Rourke, marched with a force into Dartry of Mac Clancy (in Leitrim), in the very beginning of the month of January, and he sent forth scouring parties into the fastnesses of Dartry, to collect preys; and they procured immense booty. Mac Clancy, with a powerful force of Scots and Irish, overtook him, and Bryan continued a defensive retreat, during which skirmishing conflicts were carried on between them until they came in collision with each other at Beanna-Bo, in Brefneý (Benbo mountain, parish of Drumlease, in Leitrim). When the men of Brefneý and the people of O'Rourke heard that Bryan had gone into Dartry, they collected to meet him in a certain narrow pass, by which they expected his coming towards them, and found him slowly advancing,

A. D. 1585.

1. Mac William Burke and Grace O'Malley.—As explained at p. 132, in the note on South Connaught, the great Anglo-Norman families of de Burgo or Burke, sometimes written Bourke, and by others de Burgh, were descended from William Fitz-Adelm de Burgo, who came to Ireland in the time of Strongbow. They were descended from a half brother of William the Conqueror, and were earls of Cornwall and earls of Kent in England. The descendants of William Fitz-Adelm got extensive possessions in Ireland, and became lords of Connaught and earls of Ulster. In the 14th century, according to Lodge's Peerage on the earls of Clanrickard and Mayo, the Burkes of Connaught became divided into two great branches, one in Galway and the other in Mayo; the head of the Galway branch was called Mac William Eighter, and was ancestor of the earls of Clanrickard, and the head of the Mayo branch was called Mac William Oughter, and was ancestor of the earls of Mayo, but it appears Lodge translated the Irish word Uachtar, which signifies Upper, into Eighter, and the word Iochtar, which signifies Lower, into Oughter. They adopted the Irish language, laws, manners, and customs, and hence they took the surname Mac William from their ancestor William de Burgo, and several of them were styled the Lords Mac William, under the laws of Tanistry. Some branches of the Burkes of Connaught took the surnames Mac Phillin or Mac Phillips, others that of Mac Hugo, Mac Hoberd, Mac David, Mac Gilhon, and Mac Scoinin or Jennings. Many chiefs, lords, and earls of the Burkes of Connaught are mentioned in the course of these Annals, and they make a remarkable figure in Irish history. The ancient titles of the Burkes were lords of Connaught, and earls of Ulster, and they afterwards became earls and marquesses of Clanrickard, viscounts of Galway, earls and viscounts of Mayo, viscounts of Clanmorris, in Mayo, barons of Naas in Kildare, barons of Dunkellin and of Leitrim in Galway, and barons of Brittas; branches of the Burkes got extensive possessions in Tipperary and Limerick, and from them the baronies of Clanwilliam in Tipperary and Limerick took their name, and some of them were created barons of Castleconnell in Limerick. The Burkes formed powerful families and had extensive possessions, and the name is still very numerous in Connaught and in Munster, and is to be found in all parts of Ireland; they were one of the three greatest of the Anglo-Norman families in Ireland, these being the Fitzgeralds of Kildare and Desmond; the Butlers of Ormond, and the Burkes of Connaught. The Burke above mentioned in the Annals, was, according to Lodge, called by the Irish, Risdeard-an-Iarain or Richard of the Iron, and he is also mentioned in the Annals at A. D. 1583, and was sir Richard Burke, ancestor of the earls of Mayo; he was a military commander in Connaught on the side of the English, in the reign of Elizabeth, and a man of note in his time. As mentioned by Lodge, the lord deputy, sir Henry Sydney, in his despatches on the state of affairs in Connaught in 1576, says, that Mac William Oughter came to him, and that he could speak Latin very well, but not English, and Sydney states, that he ruled over a territory three times in extent of the lands of the earls of Clanrickard. Mac William Oughter here mentioned, ruled over a great part of Mayo, and the earl of Clanrickard possessed a considerable portion of Galway, or the territory called Clanrickard, which got its name from Rickard or Richard de Burgo, one of their ancestors, and comprised, according to Ware and others, the baronies of Clare, heavy laden, and bearing the oppressive attacks of his enemies ; and although by right his own followers should aid him, they did not do so, but rather gave their full support to his enemies, and the valiant hero being attacked on both sides, the brave man was met by shouts before and behind him, and was completely surrounded on all sides, so that he could not move a step forward or backward. Many were slain around him in that conflict, and a company of galloglasses of the Mac Sheeheys who were along with Bryan on that day were cut down, and they were the remnant and residue of the galloglasses of the Geraldines who were bartering their services from one country to another after the extermination of the noblemen by whom they had been hitherto employed, and their attack would have been irresistible were it not that they were outnumbered and overpowered by their opponents. The men of Brefney and the people of O'Rourke gave quarter to Bryan, on the point of danger, and they carried him off under their protection to guard him, and the resolution they came to on the third day was to kill him in a treacherous and malicious manner, after he had been under their clemency and protection, and O'Rourke was censured for being implicated in that bad deed.

Edmond Dorcha, the son of Donal, son of Murrough, son of Roderick More, and Torlogh, the son of Edmond Oge, son of Edmond, son of Torlogh Mac Sheehey, were both put to death in Dublin.

A great quantity of rain fell in this year, so that the greater portion of the corn of Ireland was destroyed.

Dermod, the son of Donal Mac Congail, (Mac Connell), died on the 14th of June.

A proclamation for a Parliament was issued to the men of Ireland, commanding their chiefs to attend in Dublin precisely in May, for most of the men of Ireland were obedient to their sovereign,

Dunkellin, Loughrea, Kiltartan, Athenry, and Leitrim, in the county of Galway. Amongst other chiefs who attended along with Mac William Burke, Sydney says, "O'Malley came likewise, who is an original Irishman, strong in galleys and seamen." This sir Richard Burke was married to Grace O'Malley, daughter of Owen O'Malley, chief of Umaile, now the baronies of Burrishoole and Murrisk, in the county of Mayo, over which territory the O'Malleys were the ancient chiefs and celebrated mariners. Grace O'Malley, called in Irish Graine-ni-Mhaile, commonly pronounced Granu Weal, is celebrated in Irish history ; she was first married to O'Flaherty, chief of West Connaught, and secondly to sir Richard Burke, by whom she had a son Theobald, who was a commander of note on the side of the English in Connaught, in the reign of Elizabeth ; he was called sir Theobald Burke, and was created viscount of Mayo by Charles I. In the Anthologia Hibernica for 1793 and 1794, an account is given of Grace O'Malley ; her father, Owen O'Malley, was a noted chief, and had a small fleet with which he made many expeditions, partly for commercial purposes, but chiefly in piracy. Grace in her youth frequently accompanied her father on these expeditions, and after his death, her brother being a minor, she took upon herself the command of her galleys, and made with her crews many bold expeditions ; her chief rendezvous was at Clare Island off the coast of Mayo, where she kept her large vessels moored, and had a fortress, but she had her small craft at Carrigahooly castle, which was her chief residence and stronghold, and there was a hole to be seen in the ruined walls through which a cable was run from one of her ships, for the purpose of communicating an alarm to her apartment on any sudden danger. It is said that her piracies became so frequent that she was proclaimed, and £500 offered as a reward for her apprehension, and troops were sent from Galway to take the castle of Carrigahooly, but after a siege of more than a fortnight they were forced to retire, being defeated by the valour of Grace and her men. Lodge says that Grace O'Malley was a lady much renowned by the natives of Connaught, who relate many adventures and remarkable actions which she performed on the sea with great courage and undaunted spirit. These exploits were performed by Grace before and after her marriage with O'Flaherty, but after his death and her marriage with sir Richard Burke, she became reconciled to the government, and with her followers assisted the English forces in Connaught, and for her services it is said that queen Elizabeth wrote her a letter of invitation to the court, in consequence of which Grace, with some of her galleys, set sail for London about the year 1575, and she was received at court with great honours by the queen, who offered to create her a countess, which honour Grace declined, answering with great spirit and dignity, that both of them being Princesses they were equal in rank, and they could, therefore, confer no honours on each other, but Grace said her majesty might confer any title she pleased on her young son, a child which was born on ship-board during her voyage to England, and it is said the queen knighted the child, who was called by the Irish Tioboid-na-Lung, signifying Theobald of the ships, from the circumstance of his being born on ship-board, and this sir Theobald Burke was created viscount of Mayo by Charles I. On her return from England a curious circumstance is mentioned to have taken place on her landing at Howth for some provisions ; on proceeding to the castle she found the gates closed, the family being at dinner ; Grace was indignant at this dereliction of Irish hospitality, and happening to see a little boy, with an attendant, near the sea shore, she enquired whose child it was, and being answered he was the young heir of Howth, she had him carried off by her men to the ships, and conveyed him to Connaught, and it is said she would not consent to restore the young heir till his father, lord Howth, had entered into a stipulation that the gates of his castle should never be closed at dinner time : hence it is said, that ever since the gates are left open when the family go to dinner. The abduction of the young heir of St. Lawrence by Grace O'Malley is said to be represented in one of the paintings at Howth castle. Grace endowed a monastery on Clare Island off the coast of Mayo, where she was buried, and it is said some remains of her monument are still to be seen there. Grace O'Malley has been long famous as an Irish heroine in the traditions of the people, and her name is still remembered in song ; in various poetical compositions, both in English and Irish, her name is celebrated, and in these songs Ireland is generally personified under the designation of Granu Weal. Many of these poetical productions have obtained great popular celebrity, and it is stated in the Anthologia Hibernica, that in the year 1753, during the political contests in the duke of Dorset's administration in Ireland, a very popular song was composed, partly in Irish and partly in English, to the old air of Granu Weal ; and another very popular song to the same air was composed by the celebrated Jacobite Munster Bard, Shane Clarach Mac Donnell.

so that they all came to meet each other in Dublin at that command. Thither came the chiefs of Tirconnell and Tyrone, namely, O'Neill (prince of Tyrone), i. e. Torlogh Luineach, the son of Niall Conallach, son of Art, son of Conn, son of Henry, son of Owen; and Hugh, the son of Ferdorcha, son of Conn Bacach, son of Conn, son of Henry, son of Owen, namely, the young baron O'Neill, who was nominated earl of Tyrone at that Parliament; and O'Donnell (prince of Tirconnell), i. e. Hugh, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv, son of Torlogh of the Wine; Maguire (prince of Fermanagh), i. e. Cuchonacht, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, son of Thomas; O'Dogherty (lord of Inisowen, in Donegal), i. e. John Oge, the son of John, son of Felim, son of Conor Carrach; O'Boyle (chief of Boylagh in Donegal), i. e. Torlogh, the son of Niall, son of Torlogh Oge, son of Torlogh More; and O'Gallagher (a chief in Tirhugh in Donegal), i. e. John, the son of Tuathal, son of John, son of Roderick, son of Hugh. To this convention went Mac Mahon (prince of Oirgiall, in the counties of Louth and Monaghan), namely, Rossa, the son of Art, son of Bryan-na-moicheirghe (of the Early Rising), son of Redmond, son of Glaisne; O'Kane (lord of Oireacht-I-Chathain, or O'Kane's country, in the county of Derry), namely Roderick, the son of Manus, son of Donogh the Hospitable, son of John, son of Avney; Conn, the son of Niall Oge, son of Niall, son of Conn, son of Hugh Buighe, of the O'Neills of Clannaboy (O'Neill, lord of Clannaboy, in the counties of Down and Antrim); Mac Genis (lord of Iveagh, in the county of Down), namely, Hugh, the son of Donal Oge, son of Donal Ciar (of the Dark Brown Hair). Thither went the chiefs of Gairblthrian (the Rough districts), of Connaught, namely, O'Rourke (prince of West Brefney, or the county of Leitrim), i. e. Bryan, the son of Bryan, son of Owen O'Rourke; O'Reilly (prince of East Brefney, or the county of Cavan), i. e. Sean Ruadh (John Roe, or the Red-haired), the son of Hugh Conallach, son of Maolmora, son of John, son of Cathal; and also his father's brother, namely, Edmond, the son of Maolmora, both of whom were in contention with each other about the lordship of the country; also the O'Ferralls, (anciently princes and lords of Annaly, or the county of Longford), of both sides, namely, O'Ferrall Baun (the Fair), i. e. William, the son of Donal, son of Cormac; O'Ferrall Buidhe (the Yellow), i. e. Fachtna, the son of Bryan, son of Roderick, son of Cathal. Thither went the Siol Murray (the O'Conors of Roscommon), with the chiefs of their tribes, namely, the son of O'Conor Don, i. e. Hugh, the son of Dermot, son of Carbry, son of Owen Caoch, son of Felim Geangach; O'Conor Roe, i. e. Teige Oge, the son of Teige Buighe, son of Cathal Roe; O'Conor Sligo, i. e. Donal, the son of Teige, son of Cathal Oge, son of Donal, son of Owen, son of Donal, son of Murtoigh; the deputy of Mac Dermott, of Moylurg (prince of Moylurg, or the barony of Boyle, in Roscommon), namely, Bryan, the son of Roderick, son of Teige, son of Roderick Oge (Mac Dermott), for Mac Dermott himself, i. e. Teige, the son of Owen, was an old man far advanced in age; O'Beirne (chief of Hy Briuin of the Shannon, in the county of Roscommon), namely, Carbry, the son of Teige, son of Carbry, son of Malachy. Thither went Teige, the son of William, son of Teige Duv O'Kelly, (prince of Hy Maine, in Galway, and Roscommon); O'Madden (lord of Siol Anmcha in Galway, now the barony of Longford, and the parish of Lusmogh, in King's county), namely, Donal, the son of John, son of Breasal. Thither went the earl of Clanrickard (in the county of Galway), namely, Ulick, (Burke), the son of Rickard, son of Ulick of the Heads; and the two sons of the Giolla Duv O'Shaughnessy (chief of Kinel Aodha and Gort in the county of Galway), namely, John and Dermot. No one of note went thither from the western territory of the province of Connaught, except Murrogh-na-Dtuagh (of the Battle-axes), the son of Teige, son of Murrogh, son of Roderick O'Flaherty. Thither went the earl of Thomond, namely, Donogh, the son of Conor, son of Donogh, son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, and Sir Torlogh, the son of Donal, son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, having been elected a knight of Parliament for the county of Clare. There went thither Torlogh, the son of Teige, son of Conor O'Brien, and the lord of the western part of Clan Cuilein (in the county of Clare), namely, Mac Namara, i. e. John, the son of Teige; and Boetius, the son of Hugh, son of Boetius

Mac Clancy, the second knight of Parliament from the same county. Thither went the son of O'Loghlin of Burren (lord of Burren, in the county of Clare), namely, Rossa, the son of Anthony, son of Malachy, son of Roderick, son of Ana; Mac I-Brien of Ara (in Tipperary), namely, Murtoth, bishop of Killaloe, the son of Torloagh, son of Murtoth, son of Donal, son of Teige; O'Carroll (anciently prince of Ely O'Carroll, in Tipperary and King's county), namely, the Calvach, son of William Odhar, son of Ferganainm, son of Maolroona, son of John; Mac Coghlan (lord of Dealbhna Eathra, or barony of Garrycastle, in King's county), namely, John, the son of Art, son of Cormac; O'Dwyer of Coill-na-Manach (lord of Kilnamanagh, in Tipperary), namely, Philip, the son of Anthony. Thither went the son of O'Brien of Cuanagh (lord of the barony of Coonagh, county of Limerick), namely, Murtoth, the son of Torloagh, son of Murtoth; the lord of Carrigogonell and of Fasaigh Luimnigh (districts adjoining Limerick, in the barony of Pubblebrien), namely, Bryan Duv, the son of Donogh, son of Mahon, son of Donogh, son of Bryan Duv O'Brien; Conor-na-moinge (of the Long Hair), the son of William Caoch, son of Dermot O'Mulrian, lord of Uaithne O'Maoilriain (O'Ryan, lord of the baronies of Ownney and Ownneybeg, in Tipperary and Limerick). Some of the chiefs of the race of Eogan Mor (the Eugenians of Desmond, descended from Eogan Mor, or Eugene the Great, king of Munster in the second century), and of their subordinate chiefs, went to that Parliament, namely, Mac Carthy More (in ancient times prince of Desmond, in Cork and Kerry), i. e. Donal, the son of Donal, son of Cormac Ladrach (the Hasty); Mac Carthy Cairbreach (lord of Carberry, in the county of Cork), namely, Owen, the son of Donal, son of Fingin (Florence), son of Donal, son of Dermot-an-Dunaidh (of the Fortress); and the sons of his two brothers, namely, Donal, the son of Cormac-na-Haine, and Fingin, the son of Donogh. Thither also went the two who were in contention with each other about the lordship of Duithche Ealla (the Mac Donoghs, a branch of the Mac Carthys, who were lords of the barony of Duhallo, county of Cork), namely, Dermot, the son of Owen, son of Donogh-an-Bhothair (of the Road), son of Owen Mac Donogh, and Donogh son of Cormac Oge, son of Cormac Mac Donogh. Thither also went OSullivan Beire (O'Sullivan, in ancient times prince of Beara, now the baronies of Bear and Bantry, in Cork), namely, Owen, the son of Dermot, son of Donal, son of Donogh, son of Dermot Balbh (the Stammerer); O'Sullivan More (lord of Dunkerron, in Kerry), i. e. Owen, the son of Donal, son of Donal-na-Sgreadaighe; O'Mahony of Fuinn Iartharach (or the Western District, in the barony of Iveragh, county of Kerry), namely, Conor, the son of Conor Finn Oge, (young Conor the Fair), son of Conor Finn, son of Conor O'Mahony; and O'Driscoll More (lord of Baltimore, in the county of Cork), namely, Fingin (Florence), the son of Conor, son of Fingin, son of Conor. Thither went Mac Gillpatrick of Ossory (Fitzpatrick, in ancient times prince of Ossory, in Kilkenny, and Queen's county, afterwards barons and earls of Upper Ossory), namely, Fingin, the son of Bryan, son of Fingin; Mac Eochagain (Mac Geoghegan, in ancient times prince and lord of Kinel Fiacha, comprising the barony of Moycashel, with parts of Rathconrath, and Fertullagh, in Westmeath), namely, Conla, the son of Conor, son of Laighne; O'Mulloy (lord of Fercall, in King's county), namely, Conall, the son of Cahir. It is not recorded that any one of note went to that Parliament of the race of Laoighseach Leandmore, the son of Conall Kearnach (the O'Moores, princes of Leix, in the Queen's county, and partly in Kildare); of the race of Rossa Failge, the son of Cahir More, from Hy Failge (the O'Conors, princes of Offaly in the King's county, and some adjoining parts of Kildare and Queen's county); nor either of the race of Daire Barrach, the son of Cahir More, namely, of the O'Cavenaghs (Mac Murroghs, or O'Cavenaghs, ancient princes and lords of Leinster, in Wexford and Carlow); O'Byrnes, O'Tooles (of Wicklow and Kildare); O'Dunn, (of the barony of Tinnehinch, in Queen's county); or O'Dempsey (lord of Clanmalire, in the King's and Queen's counties, and partly in Kildare), on that occasion. But, however, there came to that Parliament the senior representative of the tribe of Ragnall (the Ranelagh branch of the O'Byrnes of Wicklow), namely, Fiacha Mac Hugh (O'Byrne), the son of John, son of Donal Glass of Glenmalure. These nobles all assembled in Dublin, where they remained for a considerable time; the Parliament, however, not being terminated this year, they afterwards returned to their homes².

2. The Irish Parliaments and Peerage.—An account of the Conventions of Tara, and of the great legislative assemblies held in other parts of Ireland, constituting the Parliaments of the ancient Irish, has been given at p. 297, in the notes on Meath and Bregia; and at p. 318 an account has also been given of the Irish, or rather Anglo-Irish, Parliaments of the Pale, which, in early times, were attended only by the great Anglo-Irish lords of English descent, as earls, barons, archbishops, bishops, and mitred abbots, who assembled to make laws and regulations for the English of the Pale, and such of the Irish in those territories as were under the English government; but the great majority of the Irish princes and chiefs did not acknowledge the English authority, and regulated their own affairs according to the ancient Irish laws of Brehonism and Tanistry, down to the end of the reign of Elizabeth; but in the beginning of the 17th century, in the reign of James I., the laws of Tanistry were abolished by act of parliament. At an early period many of the Anglo-Irish lords adopted the Irish laws and customs, but all those of English descent were prohibited, under penalties of treason, felony, &c., to use the Irish customs or laws of Tanistry, by the act called the Statute of Kilkenny, passed in A. D. 1367, in the reign of Edward III. In Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, and in the Tracts of sir John Davis, who was attorney-general to James I. in Ireland, accounts are given of various great Councils or Parliaments, convened in Ireland at an early period by the different Lords Lieutenant and Deputies, and held in the various towns of the English Pale, or such places as were in possession of the English, as Dublin, Drogheda, Trim, Kildare, Naas, Castledermot, Carlow, Kilkenny, Cashel, Limerick, Waterford, and Wexford. These Parliaments, it appears, were confined to Meath, Leinster, and Munster, as the English authority was not sufficiently established in Ulster and Connaught. In A. D. 1172, king Henry II. held a great Council or Parliament at Lismore, in Waterford, and also convened a Council of bishops and clergy at Cashel. In the reign of king John some Councils, called Parliaments, were held; and in 1264, in the reign of king Henry III., a Parliament was held at Kilkenny. In 1295, in the reign of Edward I. John Wogan, lord justice, convened a Parliament at Dublin, which was attended by 27 of the Anglo-Irish barons, whose names are given by Cox, as the Fitzgeralds, Burkes, Butlers, Barrys, Roches, le Poyers, Pureells, de Vernons, de Laeys, de Carews, Stauntons, and Berminghams. In 1302 a great Parliament was held in Dublin, attended, according to Cox, by 156 of the barons, bishops, mitred abbots, &c. In the reign of Edward II., A. D. 1309, a Parliament was held in Kilkenny, under sir John Wogan, lord justice, and Cox considers this was the first regular Parliament assembled in Ireland; and another Parliament was held in 1310 at Kildare. In 1315, on the invasion of Ireland by the Scots under Edward Bruce, a great Parliament was convened in Dublin by the lord justice, sir Edmond Butler, to enact measures for opposing the progress of Bruce; and, according to Cox, it was attended by almost all the nobility of English descent, with the four archbishops, ten bishops, &c., and likewise by some of the Irish lords, as O'Neill of Tyrone, O'Donnell of Tirconnell, and O'Hanlon, lord of Orior, in Armagh. This is the first time any of the Irish chiefs are mentioned to have attended the Parliaments; and, according to lord Mountmorres, in his history of the Irish Parliament, and sir John Davis, this was the first Parliament regularly assembled in Ireland. Sir John Davis, in his Tracts, p. 306, says that, "before the reign of Henry VIII., no persons were permitted to attend Parliaments but the English of blood, or English of birth, for the mere Irish, in those days, were never admitted, and the state did not hold them fit to be trusted with the counsel of the realm; and as for the bishops and archbishops, such as were resident in the mere Irish counties, and did not acknowledge the king to be their patron, were never summoned to any Parliament." Sir John Davis is not quite correct in this statement, for some of the Irish chiefs occasionally attended the Parliaments, as before stated, though seldom, but in the reigns of Henry VIII., Mary, and Eliza-

The governor of the province of Connaught (sir Richard Bingham), with a number of honorable men, and of the council of Dublin, proceeded into beth, several of the Irish princes and chiefs having made their submission to the crown, received peerages, and attended the Parliaments. In 1316, Cox says the Irish or Anglo-Irish petitioned for an annual Parliament, and Davis says, that in the reigns of Henry VI. and Edward IV. Parliaments were held almost every year, and sometimes two or three Parliaments were summoned in the compass of a year, which was such a trouble and charge, that a special law was made that there should be but one Parliament held in a year. According to Cox, there were grand and petty Parliaments held, the former being the regular Parliaments, where the three estates were assembled, while the latter were only Councils occasionally called, and attended only by a few, such as the chief officers of the government, &c., but the grand Parliaments were attended by the lords spiritual and temporal, the knights, citizens, and burgesses. In early times it appears that the representatives, both nobility and commons, sat all together in one assembly, but either in the reign of Henry VIII. or Elizabeth, they had two separate houses, the barons and Bishops sitting in the House of Lords, and the knights, citizens, and burgesses in the House of Commons, as representatives of counties, cities and boroughs, or corporations; there was also a third place of meeting for the clergy called the House of Convocation; besides the bishops, the mitred abbots and priors also sat as spiritual peers; and the archdeacons, deans, and proctors also attended Parliament. In the note on the suppression of monasteries, at p. 407, an account has been given of the 24 mitred abbots and priors who sat as spiritual peers in the Irish Parliament. In 1317, the lord deputy, Roger Mortimer, assembled a Parliament at Kilmaham, and in the reign of Edward III., various Parliaments were held at Dublin and Kilkenny, as mentioned by Cox and Davis. In 1367, in the reign of Edward III., the lord lieutenant, Lionel, duke of Clarence, held the celebrated Parliament at Kilkenny, which was attended by almost all the Anglo-Irish barons, earls, archbishops, bishops, and mitred abbots, and in which were passed the acts called the Statute of Kilkenny, enacting very severe penal laws against the Irish and Anglo-Irish, prohibiting all persons of English descent, under penalties of treason, felony, imprisonment, forfeiture of lands and goods, &c., from entering into intermarriages, fosterage, or other alliances with the native Irish. The Anglo-Irish were also prohibited from using the laws of Tanistry, or Brehonism, or adopting the Irish language, dress, manners, or customs, or to permit the Irish to pasture their cattle on their lands, or to promote Irish ecclesiastics to any benefice, or to appoint them bishops, or abbots, &c., or to entertain any Irish minstrels or Bards. In 1369 sir William de Windor, lord deputy, held a Parliament at Kilkenny, and another at Baldoyle, near Dublin, and at this time, according to Cox, the price of a cow was about 10 groats, or 3s. 4d., and the pay of a soldier was 2d. a day, whereof he paid a penny for his victuals. In 1394 and 1399, king Richard II., when in Ireland, held great Councils or Parliaments at Dublin. In the reigns of Henry IV., V. and VI., Edward IV., Richard III., and Henry VII., many Parliaments were held at Dublin, Drogheda, Trim, Kildare, Kilkenny, and other chief towns and cities of the English Pale. In A. D. 1494, in the reign of Henry VII., a great Parliament was held at Drogheda by the lord deputy, sir Edward Poyning, in which was passed the Act called Poyning's Law, which rendered the Irish Parliament completely subordinate to the Parliament of England, and no Act could be passed into a law in the Irish Parliaments until first submitted for assent to the king and council of England. The Irish Parliament was, to a great extent, independent of the Parliament of England till the passing of Poyning's Law, which continued in force for a period of 288 years, namely, to 1782, when the Independence of the Irish Parliament was obtained by the Irish Volunteers, under the earl of Charlemont, the duke of Leinster, Grattan, Flood, and other eminent men, but after a period of eighteen years the Irish Parliament was extinguished, and became merged in that of Great Britain in 1800, by the Act of Union. In A. D. 1525, in the reign of the province of Connaught, and they in the first place came to hold a session in the monastery of Ennis, in the county of Clare, in which they enacted extraordinary decrees, viz., ten shillings were decreed for the queen out of every quarter (120 acres), both of lay and ecclesiastical lands in

Henry VIII., a Parliament was convened in Dublin by the lord deputy, Gerald Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, which is mentioned in these Annals, and it was attended by the O'Neill, namely, Conn, and the O'Donnell, namely, Hugh, and many others of the Irish chiefs. In A. D. 1537, a great Parliament was held at Dublin, Kilkenny, Limerick, and Cashel, by different adjournments under the lord deputy, Leonard Grey, in which an Act of Attainder was passed against the earl of Kildare, and others of the Geraldines, and also an Act to abolish the Pope's authority in Ireland, and to appoint Henry VIII. supreme Head of the Church, to grant to the king the lands and revenues of the religious houses, and to suppress the abbeys and monasteries. In 1541, a great Parliament was assembled in Dublin by the lord deputy, sir Anthony St. Leger, in which the title of King of Ireland was conferred on Henry VIII., and his successors, the kings of England being until that time only styled Lords of Ireland; in this Parliament the abbeys and all religious houses were suppressed, and their revenues placed at the king's disposal. This Parliament was attended by almost all the earls, barons, and bishops, of English descent, and also by many of the Irish chiefs, amongst others Bryan Mac Gillpatrick, who had been created baron of Upper Ossory, and took the name of Fitzpatrick; O'Moore, lord of Leix; O'Cavanagh of Carlow; Donogh O'Brien of Thomond, and several others. Amongst those who attended, the Great O'Reilly is mentioned in the state papers, in the dispatch of St. Leger, and he recommends the king "to create O'Reilly viscount of Cavan, because he was a man of great power in his own country;" it is not, however, certain if O'Reilly was created a peer, but it is traditionally said that some of the O'Reillys were barons or earls of Cavan. Maolmora, or Miles O'Reilly, prince of East Brehney, or Cavan, was the person who attended this Parliament, and St. Leger mentions in his dispatch that O'Reilly appeared in a splendid dress, which had been sent him as a present by his majesty. Cox mentions a curious circumstance, that the Irish chiefs and lords who attended Perrott's Parliament in 1585, were obliged to wear robes in the English fashion, but it appears they had a great aversion to use the English dress, as they esteemed it a mark of subjection, but the better to reconcile them to it, the lord deputy bestowed robes on several of them, amongst others, on Torlogh Luineach O'Neill, prince of Tyrone, but Cox says, "the Irish noblemen embraced the dresses like fetters, so that O'Neill desired the deputy to make his chaplain walk the streets along with him in Trowsers, for then, said he, the boys will laugh at him as well as at me." In A. D. 1560, in the reign of Elizabeth, a Parliament was held in Dublin by the lord deputy, the earl of Sussex, chiefly to promote the Reformation. In A. D. 1569, the lord deputy, sir Henry Sydney, held a great Parliament in Dublin for the same purpose, and also to extinguish the name and power of O'Neill, and confiscate the greater part of Ulster to the crown. In 1585 was held the great Parliament above mentioned in the Annals, and in 1613, in the reign of James I., the lord deputy, sir Arthur Chichester, convened, in Dublin, one of the greatest Parliaments that ever met in Ireland till that time, which was attended by the nobility and men of rank of English descent, and also by the representatives of many of the great Milesian families. In the account of Perrott's Parliament, as above in the Annals, it is to be observed that the passages inserted in parenthesis are not in the Four Masters, but are all additions to the text, explanatory of the territories and rank of the various Irish princes and chiefs who attended this Parliament, as by these additions the text is more easily and conveniently explained for the reader than by a great number of small notes, which would otherwise be necessary. Full accounts of the titles and territories of all the Irish princes, lords, and chiefs, have been given in the course of the topographical annotations appended to these Annals. Perrott's Parliament was convened, according to Davis, chiefly to pass Acts of Attainder against the earl of Desmond; Fitz-Eustace, viscount of Baltinglass, and their adherents, who had joined in the war against Elizabeth, and to confiscate their extensive estates. Cox gives an account of the Acts passed in this Parliament, and amongst others, he says there was an Act against witchcraft and sorcery. This Parliament was the greatest that till then had assembled in Ireland, and Taaffe remarks that it was the most independent and respectable that ever met in Ireland since the Conventions of Tara. According to Cox and Lodge, the following noblemen sat in the House of Peers, in this Parliament:—Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare; Butler, earl of Ormond; Burke, earl of Clanricard; Preston, viscount of Gormanstown; Barry, viscount of Buttevant, ancestor of the earls of Barrymore; Roche, viscount of Fermoy; Butler, viscount of Mountgarrett; Butler, baron of Dunboyne; Butler, baron of Cahir; Burke, baron of Castleconnell; Birmingham, baron of Athenry; de Courcy, baron of Kinsale; Fitzmaurice, baron of Lixnaw, ancestor of the earls of Kerry; le Poer, baron of Curraghmore, in Waterford; St. Lawrence, baron of Howth; Plunkett, baron of Killeen, ancestor of the earls of Fingall; Plunkett, baron of Dunsany; Plunkett, baron of Louth; Fleming, baron of Slane; Barnwall, baron of Trimlestown; and Nugent, baron of Delvin; of the Irish, the following—O'Neill, earl of Tyrone; O'Brien, earl of Thomond; Mac Carthy, earl of Clancare; O'Brien, baron of Inchiquin, and Fitzpatrick, baron of Upper Ossory. According to Cox, twenty bishops attended, and the four archbishops, who were the following: John Long, archbishop of Armagh; Adam Loftus, archbishop of Dublin; Miler Magrath, archbishop of Cashel; and William Lally, or O'Mulally, archbishop of Tuam. The Anglo-Irish representatives of counties and of 30 cities, and boroughs, were mostly from Meath, Leinster and Munster; and the chiefs of the old Irish race who attended were mostly from Ulster, Connaught, and Munster, but many also from Meath and Leinster. The members of the great Anglo-Irish families of the Pale who attended Perrott's Parliament, as representatives for counties, cities, &c., were the Bellevues, Barnwalls, Burnells, Netervilles, Nugents, de Gernons, Taylors, Tyrrells, Flemings, Dowdalls, &c., of Dublin, Meath, and Louth; the Talbots, Trants, Whites, Walshes, Sarsfields, Butlers, Brabazons, le Poers, Sherlocks, &c., in Leinster and Munster; and the Browns, Dillons, Lynches, &c., in Connaught.

The Milesian Peerage.—As above stated, several of the Irish princes and peers who attended Perrott's Parliament, sat in the House of Lords, holding the rank of earls and barons, but most of the Irish chiefs were representatives of counties and districts, and sat in the House of Commons, holding the rank of knights. In the old Irish Pentarchy, the monarch or supreme sovereign was styled Ard-Righ, signifying the High-King, and each of the five provincial kings of Meath, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster, and Munster, was called Righ or king. A prince was also generally designated Righ, as holding a rank next to that of the provincial kings, and some of these princes had in their own territories all the power and authority of kings. These principalities varied in extent, some containing a territory equal to at least two or three baronies in modern times; others as large as a county, and some comprised a territory equal in extent to two or three counties. The chief of these princes were the O'Neills, kings of Ulster, and princes of Tir-Eogain, lords of Clannaboy, &c., in the counties of Tyrone and Derry, with parts of Donegal, Down, and Antrim; the O'Donnells, princes of Tircconnell in Donegal, with part of Sligo; the O'Carrolls, princes of Oirgiall, in Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh; and the Mac Mahons, afterwards princes of Oirgiall, and lords of Monaghan; the Mac Dunlevys, princes of Ulidia in Down and Antrim; the Maguires, princes of Fermanagh; the O'Reillys, princes of East Brehney or Cavan, and the O'Rourkes, princes of West Brehney or Leitrim. The O'Conors, kings and princes of Connaught in Roscommon, Galway, and Sligo; the Mac Dermotts, marshals of Connaught, and princes of Moylurg in Roscommon, with parts of Sligo and Mayo, and in modern times styled the country, except the liberties, which they themselves consented to confer on the gentlemen of the country; and five shillings to the lord of Thomond in succession to the queen's rent, out of every quarter of land profitable and unprofitable, in the entire country, except alone the liberties and church lands. They took the Triocha Cead Kinel Fearmaic (barony of Inchiquin), from the lord of Thomond, which was a rental land with his ancestors ever 'till then, and they gave the lordship of that Triochad Cead (barony) to the baron of Inchiquin, namely, to Murrogh, the son of Murrogh, son of Dermot O'Brien; they also ordained and decreed, in like manner, that the rents and the court of Corcomroe should be given to Torglogh, the son of Donal, son of Conor O'Brien, in succession to his father, to whom that country had been originally given from the lordship of princes of Coolavin in Sligo; the O'Kellys, princes of Hy Maíne in Galway and Rosecommon; the O'Dowds, princes of Hy Fiachra in Sligo and Mayo; the O'Heynes, princes of Hy Fiachra Aidhne in Galway. The O'Melaghins, kings of Meath, princes of Tara, of Bregia, and of Clan Colman in Meath and Westmeath; the Mae Geoghegans, princes of Kinel Fiachra in Westmeath; the O'Ferralls, princes of Annaly or Longford. The O'Conors, princes of Offaley in King's and Queen's counties, and Kildare; the O'Moores, princes of Leix, in Queen's county and Kildare; the O'Carrolls, princes of Ely O'Carroll, in King's county and Tipperary; the Mae Gillpatrickes or Fitzpatrickes, princes of Ossory in Kilkenny and Queen's county. The Mac Murroghs, kings of Leinster, and princes of Hy Kinsellagh in Wexford, Carlow, &c.; the O'Tooles, princes of Imaile in Wicklow and Kildare. The O'Fellans, princes of Desies in Waterford and Tipperary; the O'Briens, kings of Munster, and princes of Thomond in Clare, Limerick, and Tipperary; the Mae Namaras, princes of Clan Cuilein in Clare, and marshals of Thomond. The Mae Carthys, kings and princes of Desmond in Cork and Kerry, and some of their ancestors kings of Cashel; the O'Conors, princes of Kerry; the O'Donoghues, princes of Lough Lein, and the O'Sullivans, styled princes of Beire or Beara in Cork, and lords of Dunkerron in Kerry. These princes held a rank equal to the princes, dukes, marquesses, and earls of England and other countries, and there were several other great chiefs sometimes styled princes in ancient times, but some of them should more correctly be called lords. The second class of the old Irish aristocracy may be designated Lords, the term Tighearna, or Tiarna, signifying a Lord. There were in Ireland of these lords about 200, each possessing a territory equivalent to a barony or sometimes two baronies, and they held a rank equal to barons. The third class of the Irish aristocracy were denominated chiefs, the term in Irish being Taoiseach, and of these chiefs there were 600 or more in Ireland, all heads of clans, and each possessing a district equal in extent to about a parish or sometimes two parishes or more, and varying on an average from ten thousand to thirty thousand acres; and these chiefs held a rank similar to that of the principal landed gentry of the country in modern times. All these lords and chiefs were subordinate and tributary to the princes, as the princes themselves were subordinate and tributary to the provincial kings, and the kings subject and tributary to the supreme monarch. The term Flaith was also sometimes applied to princes, lords, and chiefs, but mostly to military commanders and warriors. The term Tanaiste or Tanist was applied to the successor elect of a prince, lord, or chief, and Rioghdamhna or Roydamna, was the designation of an heir apparent or presumptive to any of the five provincial kingdoms, or to the monarchy.

Thomond by the earl of Thomond, namely, by Conor, the son of Donogh O'Brien; they deprived every chief of a Pobal (a district or clanship), and every lord of a Triochad Cead (barony) throughout the country, of their rents and titles (under the laws of tanistry), except John Mac Namara, lord of the western part of Clan Cuilein, who did not put his hand to that composition which they decreed; they made the same composition in the county of Galway, in the county of Roscommon, in the county of Mayo, and in the county of Sligo.³

O'Conor Don, i. e. Dermot, the son of Carbry, son of Owen Caoch, died in Ballintober of St. Bridget (in Roscommon), at an advanced age, on the 16th of September, and was interred in the tomb of his ancestors at Roscommon.

The following are the Milesian princes, lords, and chiefs on whom peerages have been conferred by the sovereigns of England. The O'Neills, earls of Tyrone, and barons of Dungannon, and, in modern times, viscounts and earls O'Neill in Antrim; the O'Donnells, earls of Tireonnell; the Mae Donnells, earls of Antrim, who were Scots of Irish descent; the Maguires, harons of Enniskillen; the O'Reillys, viscounts of Cavan (?); the Magenisses, viscounts of Iveagh, in the county of Down. The O'Haras, barons of Tyrawley and Kilmaine in Mayo; the O'Dalys, barons of Dunsandle in Galway. The O'Malones, harons of Sunderlin in Westmeath; the O'Sionaechs or Foxes, barons of Kileoursey in King's county and Westmeath; the O'Carrolls, barons of Ely in King's county and Tipperary. The Mae Murroghs of Carlow, harons of Balian; the Mac Gillpatrickes or Fitzpatrickes, barons of Gouran in Kilkenny, and earls of Upper Ossory, in the Queen's county; the O'Dempseys, viscounts of Clanmalire, and barons of Philipstown in the King's and Queen's counties. The O'Briens of Clare and Limerick, earls and marquesses of Thomond, earls of Inchiquin, viscounts of Clare, &c. The Mac Carthys of Cork and Kerry, earls of Clancare and Clancarthy, and viscounts of Muskerry and Mountcashel; the O'Callaghans of Cork and Tipperary, viscounts of Lismore in Waterford; the O'Quinns of Clare, barons of Adare, and earls of Dunraven in Limerick, and the O'Gradys of Clare and Limerick, viscounts of Guillamore. An account of all the Irish princes, lords, and chiefs, and the territories possessed by each, has been given in the topographical annotations in the course of these Annals, and their territories can be all ascertained on reference to the Index and Map appended to this work.

3. State of Connaught and Thomond in 1585.—According to Cox in his Hibernia Anglicana, the lord deputy, sir John Perrott, issued a commission to sir Ricbard Bingham, governor of Connaught, and 20 other gentlemen, authorising them to compound between the Queen and the Subject, and between the Lord and Tenant, for cess, cuttings, and other uncertain exactions, and to bring the inhabitants of Connaught and Thomond (county of Clare), to a composition of paying 10 shillings per annum for every quarter of land containing 120 acres, besides a certain number of soldiers amongst them on every Rising out or Hosting; they proceeded by inquisition by a jury to find out the number of ploughlands, and the county of Mayo was found to contain 1448 quarters of land, and paid £600 per annum, and contributed 200 foot and 40 horse at their own charge, when required, and 50 foot and 15 horse in such manner as the peers and English bishops ought to do, and this was done by indenture, whereby they voluntarily renounced the Irish captainships, styles, and titles, and abolished the Irish Gavelkind and Tanistry, and agreed to hold their lands by Pa-

A. D. 1586.

SESSION (or As-sizes), was held by Sir Richard Bingham, and by the council of the province of Connaught, at Galway, in the month of January, and seventy men and women were put to death at that session, amongst whom were Donal, the son of Murtogh Garv, son of Bryan, son of Teige O'Brien, and the son of O'Hara Buighe, i. e. Bryan, the son of Kian, son of Oilíoll, from Gallen of Connaught (Gallen, in Mayo), together with a number of gentlemen besides.

tent, according to law, and they likewise did so in the rest of Connaught. The whole province of Connaught was found to contain 8169 quarters of land, whereof 2339 being exempted, there remained 6836 liable to annual rent of £3418, and to contribute 1054 foot, 224 horse, to the general Hostings in Connaught, and 332 foot and 88 horse at any time for forty days, any where in Ireland. Thomond for 1259 ploughlands agreed to pay £5430 10s. per annum, and to find 200 foot and 40 horse armed, at all Hostings in Thomond, and 15 horse and 50 foot at all general Hostings, and that all Irish titles and tenures should be abolished.

X. The Kingdom of Ulster.—In the articles on Ulster in these annotations, at pp. 337, 361, 388, 412, 436, the ancient history of that province has been given from the earliest times to the eighth century, and in the articles at pp. 457, 481, 508, 532, on the Danish wars, the various battles with the Danes in Ulster, as well as other parts of Ireland, from the 8th to the 12th century, are recorded.

The Irish Kings from the 8th century to the English Invasion.—As an account of the Irish monarchs during this period is intimately connected with the history of Ulster, the following catalogue of them, and a view of the chief events in the different reigns, will be necessary. The chronology followed is that of O'Flaherty's Ogygia, which, it is to be observed, sometimes differs 2 or 3 years from that of the Four Masters. The latinised names of these kings is given from the Ogygia, and from Dr. O'Connor's Annals of the Four Masters. The monarchs of Ireland during this period were mostly all of the Hy Níall race, descendants of Níall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Ireland in the beginning of the 5th century.

Congal or Congallus II., surnamed Cinn Maghair, from a place so called in Donegal, was a prince of the Connallian race, or O'Donnell branch of the North Hy Níall, and reigned 7 years, from A. D. 704 to 711.

Fergal or Fergallus, a prince of the Eugénian race, that is, of the O'Neill or Tyrone branch of the North Hy Níall, succeeded as monarch, and, after a reign of 11 years, was slain A. D. 722, in the great battle of Allen in Kildare, as described at p. 221 in these notes.

Fogartach, a prince of the race of Clan Colman, or Meath branch

The same governor, Sir Richard (Bingham), laid siege to Cluan Dubhain (Clan Owen castle in Clare); the person who was in that castle was Mahon, the son of Torlogh, son of Mahon, son of Torlogh, son of Mahon O'Brien, from whom the tribe of Mahon are called. A certain number of the governor's people were left there, who continued to besiege the castle for three weeks, and on the 22nd day of the same month, set about actively and perseveringly to take the castle; Mahon was then on the battlements of the castle, hurling down stones and rocks on the people who were at the base of it, applying engines and machinery to it; and it happened to him, that, being directly aimed at with the shot of a ball, he was killed on the spot. After Mahon had been killed, the guards delivered up the castle, and although they expected quarter, they did not obtain it; and the western part of the castle was pulled down from the top to the bottom. That exploit exalted the fame and honour of Sir Richard Bingham, for there was not of the Hy Níall, called the South Hy Níall, after a reign of 1 year, was slain in battle by Cionaoth, son of Iorgalach.

Cionaoth, anglicised Kinneth, and latinised Kinethus, a prince of the South Hy Níall, reigned 3 years; his forces were defeated, and himself slain, by his successor Flahertach, A. D. 727, in a great battle at Drom Coreain.

Flahertach, a prince of the Tirconnell or O'Donnell branch of the Hy Níall, after a reign of 7 years, resigned the sceptre in A. D. 734, and retired to the monastery of Armagh, where he died A. D. 760.

Aodh Allan or Ollan, latinised Aidus or Aedus Allanus, and anglicised Hugh Allan, son of king Fergal of the Tyrone Hy Níall, succeeded, and after a reign of 9 years was slain A. D. 743, by his successor Donal, in a great battle fought at Magh Seir, near Kells in Meath.

Donal III., of the race of Clan Colman, reigned 20 years, and died A. D. 763, and, according to the Four Masters, was buried in the monastery of Dermagh, now Durrow in the King's county.

Níall II., surnamed Frasach, which signifies of the Showers, was so called from some remarkable showers recorded to have fallen in his reign, some of which it is said resembled blood; his name has hence been latinised Níallus Nimbosus, and Níallus pluviarum. He was one of the sons of king Fergal, and brother of king Hugh Allan; after a reign of 7 years, Níall of the Showers resigned the crown in A. D. 770, and retired to the monastery of Iona, where he became a monk, and died A. D. 778. Several of the kings of the race of Hy Níall are recorded to have retired in these ages to the monastery of Iona in the Hebrides, which had been founded in the 6th century by their countryman and relative the celebrated St. Columkille, who was of the race of the Connallians, or Tirconnell branch of the Hy Níall. The Irish kings, according to Buchanan, were buried at Iona, in a sepulchre termed Tumulus Regum Hibernia, or the Tomb of the Kings of Ireland.

Donogh or Donchadus, son of king Donal III., of the race of Clan Colman, succeeded, and reigned 27 years, to his death A. D. 797, in the 64th year of his age.

Aodh Oirdnidhe, son of king Níall Frasach, succeeded, and after a reign of 22 years, died A. D. 819. In his reign the Northmen or Danes and Norwegians frequently invaded Ireland, and he defeated them in many battles.

on dry land in Ireland a stronger or more impregnable castle than Cluain Dubhain. The governor afterwards marched against Caslen-na-Caillighe in Concovar or Conor, son of king Donogh, of the race of Clan Colman, succeeded 14 years, and died A. D. 833; he also fought many battles with the Danes.

Niall III., surnamed Caille or Cailne, son of king Hugh Oirnidhe, of the Tyrone branch of the Ily Niall, succeeded as monarch 13 years, to his death in A. D. 846; he was drowned in the river Calne or Callan, near Armagh, from which it is said was derived his surname Cailne. Niall was a valiant prince, and defeated the Danish forces in many battles.

Maolseachlin or Malachy I., a prince of the house of Clan Colman, king of Meath, grandson of king Donogh, and nephew of king Concovar, succeeded Niall as monarch, and after a reign of about 16 years, died A. D. 863, on Tuesday the 30th of November, and was buried in the cathedral of Clonmacnois. Malachy was a valiant prince, he defeated the Northmen in many battles, and put to death their famous king, Turgesius.

Aodh Finnliath, the son of king Niall Caille, succeeded, and after a reign of 16 years, according to Ogygia, died on Friday the 12th of December, A. D. 879. He was married to Malmara, daughter of Kinneth Mae Alpin, the celebrated king of Scotland, by whom he had a son named Niall Glundubh, who was afterwards monarch of Ireland, and from him the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone, and kings of Ulster, took their name. Hugh was surnamed Finnliath, from the colour of his hair, signifying white or grey-haired; he died at Druiminesclain in Criche Conaille, now Droimiskin in Louth, where there was in ancient times a great monastery.

Flann Sionna, son of king Malachy of the House of Clan Colman, succeeded, and after a reign of 37 years, died at Tailtean in Meath, on Saturday, the 24th of May, A. D. 916, in the 68th year of his age. Flann is highly praised by the annalists for the beauty of his person, and great valour; he fought many battles during his time with the Danes and with the provincial kings, as recorded by the historians.

Niall IV., surnamed Glundubh, the son of king Hugh Finnliath, of the Eugenian or O'Neill branch of the Ily Niall, succeeded, and, after a reign of 3 years, this valiant prince was slain on Wednesday, the 17th of October, A. D. 919, in a great battle with the Danes near Dublin. From this king Niall the chiefs his descendants took the name of O'Neill.

Donogh II., the son of king Flann, of the House of Clan Colman, succeeded 25 years, to his death, A. D. 944. During the reign of Donogh many fierce battles were fought with the Danes.

Congalach or Congal III., of the Meath Ily Niall, succeeded 12 years; he was a valiant warrior, and defeated the Danes in many battles, but was at length slain, A. D. 956, in a great battle with these invaders, as before recorded in the account of the Danish Wars.

Donal O'Neill, son of the famous warrior, Murkertach Mae Neill, and grandson of king Niall Glundubh, succeeded, and reigned 24 years, to his death, A. D. 980, at Armagh, whither he had retired in penitence. Donal O'Neill was distinguished for his valour, and during his time fought many battles with the Danes, and against the provincial kings.

Malachy II., grandson of king Donogh II., of the House of Clan Colman, succeeded, and after a reign of 22 years, was deposed A. D. 1002, by Brian Boromhe, king of Munster, who became monarch of Ireland.

Brian Boromhe, that is Brian of the Tributes, commonly called Brian Boru, and latinised Brianus Boromeus, and Boruma. Brian Boru, king of Munster, of the tribe of the Dalcassians of Thomond, and race of Heber, was one of the most renowned of the Irish kings; after having traversed with his victorious forces all parts of Ireland, and reduced the provincial kings and princes to subjection, and compelled them to do him homage, and give him hostages and tributes, he finally, after various contests, subdued the monarch, Malachy II., and having deposed him in A. D. 1002, assumed the crown of Ireland, and marching with his victorious

Lough Masg (Hag's Castle, in Lough Mask, county of Mayo), which castle was the stronghold of the province of Connaught; the persons who were troops to Tara, had himself proclaimed monarch on the Rath of the ancient kings. When Brian threatened the throne of Malachy, the latter applied for aid to the Eugenians of Ulster, but their king, Hugh O'Neill of Tyrone, indignant at the exclusion of his own House, refused to give Malachy any assistance, and thus replied—"When the race of Eogan were kings of Ireland they maintained the crown against all competitors; if the Clan Colman are not able to sustain the sceptre of Tara let them resign." By the abdication of Malachy, and the accession of Brian, the sceptre passed from the Heremonians to the race of Heber, after the royal line of Ily Niall, descended from king Niall of the Hostages, had, with the exception of two kings of the House of Ily Fiachra, namely, Dathi and Oilioll, in the 5th century, ruled over Ireland, to the number of about fifty kings, from the 5th to the 11th century, for a period of 600 years. Brian Boru, after a reign of 12 years, was slain at the battle of Clontarf, in A. D. 1014, as described at p. 510 in these notes.

Malachy II.—On the death of Brian Boru, Malachy II., who was then king of Meath, resumed the monarchy, and reigned 8 years and a few months, making his reign altogether about 30 years; he fought several battles with the Danes and provincial kings, and having retired to the abbey on the island of Inisero, on Lough Annin, now Lough Ennell, near Mullingar, adjoining which was his palace of Dun-na-Sciath, or the Fortress of the Shields, he died in A. D. 1022, on Sunday, the 4th of the Nones of September, in the 73d year of his age. After the death of Malachy there was no monarch elected for a long time, and according to O'Flaherty and others, there was an Interregnum of 70 years, but Ware and others make it only 20 years; during this period several of the provincial kings exercised, to a great extent, the authority of monarchs, but their rights were disputed, and the kingdom fell into great disorder and anarchy, there being no legitimate king generally acknowledged as monarch, and many competitors contested the crown. Those kings who were not generally acknowledged were designated Righe go Freasabhra, that is, kings with opposition, while the acknowledged monarchs were styled Lain-Righe, or Full Kings.

Cuan O'Lochain.—On the death of Malachy in 1022, the Ily Niall elected, under the title of Protector, or Regent of the Kingdom, Cuan O'Lochain, the celebrated chief Bard and Antiquary of Ireland at that time, and a man highly distinguished for his great abilities and virtues; after having ruled about 2 years, he was slain A. D. 1024, in Teflia, or Westmeath. Corcran Cleireach, or Corcran the Clerick, who was abbot of Inis Caltra, an abbey on that island, in Lough Derg, on the Shannon, in Clare, and who was styled Primate of the Irish Anachorites, and the most eminent ecclesiastic of western Europe, was appointed as co-regent of the kingdom, along with Cuan O'Lochain; Corcran died A. D. 1040, at the monastery of Lismore, in Waterford.

Dermod Mac Maolnambo, of the race of the Cahirians, king of Leinster, was a powerful and warlike prince at this period; he was married to Dervorgilla, a daughter of Donogh O'Brien, king of Munster, and having reduced to subjection the kings of Munster, Connaught, and Meath, and likewise the Danes of Dublin, he became king of the southern half of Ireland, and was likewise generally acknowledged as monarch for a period of about 30 years, from A. D. 1042 to 1072, when he was slain in a great battle fought at Odbha, or Dowth, in Meath, between Drogheda and Slane, as before mentioned under the Danish wars. In the Welsh Chronicle of Caradoc of Llanearvan, king Dermod is mentioned as follows—"Dermotum optimum et dignissimum principem qui unquam in Hibernia regnavit," "Dermod was the best and worthiest prince that ever reigned in Ireland."

The O'Briens, Kings of Munster.—On the death of Brian Boru, his sons, Donogh and Teige O'Brien, contended for the crown of Munster, but at length, by the mediation of the clergy, were reconciled, and agreed to rule conjointly over that province, which they did till A. D. 1023, when new disorders having arisen between guarding it at that time were Richard Burke, commonly called Deamhan-an-Chorrain, who was the son of Rickard, son of Richard, son of William, son of

Edmond, son of Rickard Ui Cuairsgi, and Walter, the son of Edmond, son of Ulick, son of Edmond, son of Rickard Ui Cuairsgi, who had gone into them, Teige was slain, and Donogh became sole king of Munster; he carried on contests with the kings of Leinster, Meath, and Connaught, and partly reduced them to subjection, and becoming very powerful, was for some years acknowledged king of Leath Mogha, or Leinster and Munster. Torlogh O'Brien, son of the deceased Teige, and nephew of Donogh, a very valiant prince, being supported by the kings of Leinster and Connaught, aspired to the throne of Munster, and after many fierce contests between himself and his uncle, Donogh was finally victorious, and in A. D. 1063, Donogh abdicated the throne of Munster, after a reign of 49 years, and retired on a pilgrimage to Rome, and took a religious habit in the monastery of St. Stephen, where he died in a few years after, in the 88th year of his age.

Torlogh O'Brien, grandson of Brian Boru, on the abdication of his uncle Donogh, as before stated, became king of Munster in 1064, and on the death of Dermot Mac Maolnambo, in 1072, he was acknowledged as titular monarch, being then the most powerful of the provincial kings, and having collected his forces, and traversed various parts of the kingdom, and received homage and hostages from the kings and princes of Leinster, Meath, and Connaught, and likewise from Godfrey, Danish king of Dublin, whom he defeated, and appointed his son, Murtoth O'Brien, king over the Danes. Turlogh made incursions into Ulster, but his forces were defeated by the O'Neills, and that province did not acknowledge his authority. After a reign of 14 years as monarch, and 22 years as king of Munster, Torlogh died at his palace in Kincora, in Clare, in July, 1086, in the 77th year of his age, and was buried in the cathedral of Killaloe, according to the Annals of Inisfallen. Torlogh is celebrated as a wise, just, pious, and valiant prince; a letter addressed to him by Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, commences as follows—"Magnifico Regi Hiberniæ Tordelvacho," "To Torlogh the magnificent king of Ireland," and another by Pope Gregory VII., commences thus—"Gregorius Episcopus servus servorum Dei, Tordelvaco inclyto Regi Hiberniæ." "Gregory the Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to Torlogh the illustrious King of Ireland."

Murtoth O'Brien.—On the death of Torlogh, the kingdom of Munster was divided among his three sons, Teige, Murtoth, and Dermot, but Teige the eldest, dying soon after, and Dermot being banished into Connaught, Murtoth became king of Munster. He led his forces through Leinster and Meath, and reduced their kings to subjection, and likewise the Danes, and appointed his son Donal as king of Dublin and Fingall. Murtoth thus became king of Leinster, Munster, and Meath, and had frequent and fierce contests for the monarchy with Donal Mac Loughlin, king of Ulster; he made hostile incursions into Ulster, and Donal Mac Loughlin, in his turn, joined by the troops of Roderick O'Conor, king of Connaught, marched to Munster with powerful forces, defeated the Memonians, burned Limerick, and likewise the palace of Kincora, the celebrated seat of the kings of Munster, which, in A. D. 1088, he demolished to the ground. Murtoth O'Brien soon after laid waste Leinster and Connaught, and proceeded with a powerful force to Ulster, but in A. D. 1090, he and Mac Loughlin held a convention on the banks of Lough Neagh, and having amicably arranged their disputes, it was mutually agreed upon that Murtoth O'Brien should be king of Leath Mogha, or Leinster and Munster, and Donal Mac Loughlin king of Leath Cuinn, or Meath, Ulster and Connaught. These two great rivals soon after renewed their fierce contests, and in 1094, O'Brien again invaded Leinster and Meath, defeated the forces of the Methians, and slew their king, Donal O'Melaghlin. In the year 1099, O'Brien marched into Ulster with an immense force, and was met near Slieve Fuadh, or the Few's Mountains, in Armagh, by Mac Loughlin, at the head of the Ultonians. Both armies being on the point of engaging in fierce conflict, were fortunately prevented by the archbishops of Armagh and Cashel, who, with their clergy, interposed between the enraged opponents, and succeeded in making peace. In the year 1100 war recommenced between the kings, and O'Brien having led a powerful force of the men of Munster, Leinster, Meath, and Connaught, to Ulster, marched to Easroe, or Ballyshaunon, and thence to Inisowen and Donegal, in A. D. 1101, and having taken the famous fortress of Aileach, the ancient residence of the kings of Ulster, he demolished it to its foundations, in retaliation for the destruction of Kincora. In A. D. 1103, O'Brien mustered a great army, and marched against Ulster, but was defeated by Mac Loughlin and the Ultonians with great slaughter on the plains of Moy Coba in Dalaradia, near Downpatrick. In this manner these rival kings, during their fierce contests of more than 20 years, repeatedly ravaged the various provinces of Ireland. The reign of Murtoth O'Brien is remarkable for some great regulations made in the church. In A. D. 1001, Murtoth convened a great assembly of the chiefs, hishops, and clergy of Munster at Cashel, and solemnly made a donation to the church in honour of God and St. Patrick, of the city of Cashel, the ancient seat and patrimony of the kings of Munster, and in the year 1111, a great national synod, or council of bishops, clergy, chiefs, &c., was convened by king Murtoth, at Uisneach in Westmeath. After he had reigned over Munster, and a great part of Ireland for 30 years, he resigned the kingdom of Munster to his brother Dermot, in 1116, and retired to the monastery of Lismore, where he died in 1119, at an advanced age, and was buried with great pomp in the cathedral of Killaloe.

Donal Mac Loughlin.—As already explained in the account of the race of Hy Niall, a branch of the O'Neills, kings of Ulster, took the name of Mac Loughlin, the first prince of that name being Donal, the son of Ardgall, son of Loughlin O'Neill, from whom they took the surname Mac Loughlin, and some of them also were called O'Loughlin. This Donal Mac Loughlin, a prince of great abilities and valour, was head of the North Hy Niall, and had the titles of prince of Aileach and king of Ulster, and became king of Leath Cuinn. His contests for the monarchy with Murtoth O'Brien, king of Munster, have been above related, and, on the death of O'Brien, he was acknowledged monarch of Ireland; he retired to the monastery of Columkille at Derry, where he died on the 9th of February, A. D. 1121, in the 73rd year of his age, the 11th of his reign as king of Ulster, and 7th as monarch of Ireland. He is extolled by the annalists for his great valour, fine person, wisdom, munificence, and charity.

Torlogh O'Conor.—After the death of Donal Mac Loughlin, there was an interregnum of 15 years, during which there were several competitors for the crown. On the abdication of Murtoth O'Brien, in A. D. 1116, as above stated, his brother Dermot became king of Munster, and in A. D. 1120, Conor O'Brien, son of Dermot, succeeded his father as king of that province, and having extended his power likewise over Leinster, was styled king of Leath Mogha. Torlogh, son of Roderick O'Conor, king of Connaught, succeeded his brother Donal as king of that province in A. D. 1106, and being a very warlike, politic, and valiant prince, extended his power not only over Connaught, but over parts of Ulster and Meath, and was acknowledged as king of Leath Cuinn. He had various contests with Dermot O'Brien, and his successor Conor O'Brien, kings of Munster, and having finally reduced the kings and princes of Munster, Leinster, Meath, and Ulster, to subjection after long contests and many fierce battles, he was acknowledged as monarch of Ireland in the year 1136. Amongst the great battles he fought with the O'Briens, kings of Munster, may be mentioned that of Moin Mor, near the river Blackwater in Cork, in which the troops of the Dalcassians of Thomond, under king Torlogh O'Brien, were totally defeated, and upwards of seven thousand of them slain in A. D. 1151, as described at p. 149 in the notes to these Annals. The day after that battle Torlogh O'Conor marched with his victorious forces to Limerick, and Torlogh O'Brien submitted, gave him hostages, and did him homage, and was likewise obliged to pay for his liberty a ransom of 200 ounces of gold, with many precious articles, amongst others the Horn of Brian Boru. O'Brien retired in exile to Ulster, where he was honourably received by Murtoth Mac Loughlin, king of that that castle to avoid the session, and to protect their persons. The governor laid siege to the castle, and sent the crews of four or five boats of the best men in the camp, at mid-day, to attack the castle, but it was of no avail to them, for some of their people were slain, and they left after them one of province, who in A. D. 1152, collected the forces of Ulster, and marched into Meath, where they were attacked by the troops of king Torlogh O'Conor, and a fierce battle was fought at Fordruim, in which O'Conor's forces were defeated with great slaughter, and many of the Connaught chiefs fell on the field of battle. After this victory Mac Loughlin restored Torlogh O'Brien to the throne of Munster. Torlogh O'Conor having reigned king of Connaught 50 years, and 20 years as monarch of Ireland, died at Dunmore in Galway, A. D. 1156, in the 68th year of his age, and was buried with great honours and solemnity in the cathedral of St. Kieran at Clonmacnois. He is designated by the historians the Augustus of Western Europe, and highly praised for his valour, wisdom, munificence, and piety, and the annalists enumerate various costly gifts and valuable articles, great quantities of gold and silver, goblets, chalices, vases, gems, &c., which he bequeathed to Clonmacnois and other churches. The reign of Torlogh O'Conor is remarkable for the great synod or council of the Irish church held in A. D. 1152, at Kells in Meath, which was attended by the Pope's Legate, cardinal John Paparo, together with 3000 ecclesiastics, bishops, monks, and clergy, at which the four archbishops' sees of Ireland were established, and many other regulations made with respect to the church.

Murtogh Mac Loughlin or O'Loughlin, grand-nephew of Donal, former monarch of Ireland, was then a powerful prince, and carried on contests with king Torlogh O'Conor for the monarchy, and on the death of Torlogh, was acknowledged as monarch of Ireland by all the provincial kings except Roderick O'Conor, king of Connaught, the son of Torlogh, who carried on contests with Mac Loughlin, and many battles were fought between them. Murtogh Mac Loughlin had various contests with Eochy Mac Dunlevey, prince of Ulidia, and, in the course of their conflicts, Eochy was taken prisoner, and his eyes were put out by order of Murtogh, in violation of their treaty of peace, to avenge which outrage Donogh O'Carroll, prince of Oirgiall, joined by the men of Brefney and the Ulidians, marched at the head of nine thousand men into Tyrone. King Murtogh having in the meantime collected his forces, both armies met, and in A. D. 1166, fought a fierce battle at Litterluin, near Lough Neagh, on the borders of Tyrone, in which the monarch's forces were defeated, and himself slain, together with many of his chiefs, and an immense number of common soldiers. King Murtogh Mac Loughlin thus fell in the 10th year of his reign; he was a valiant prince, and is styled by the annalists the Thunderbolt of War, and the Hector of Western Europe, victor in every battle he ever fought, but this alone, when, forgetting his solemn vows, he fell a sacrifice to justice. King Murtogh was a munificent benefactor to the church, and in his time A. D. 1157, was held at Mellifont in Louth, a great synod of bishops, clergy, princes, and chiefs, convened at the consecration of that celebrated Cistercian monastery, on which occasion king Murtogh gave the monks extensive grants of land, together with 140 oxen, and 60 ounces of gold; Donogh O'Carroll, prince of Oirgiall, also gave 60 ounces of gold, and 60 ounces more were presented by Dervorgilla, the wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, and daughter of Murtogh O'Melaghlin, king of Meath; she also gave a golden chalice for the altar of the Virgin, and silver chalices, rich vestments, and various ornaments for each of the nine altars of the great church. This Dervorgilla, called the Irish Helen, was the princess so celebrated in Irish history, whose abduction from her husband by Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, led to the Anglo-Norman invasion under Strongbow and his followers; the death of Dervorgilla is recorded at A. D. 1193, in these Annals, in the 85th year of her age; she spent the latter part of her life in penitence in one of the monasteries of Drogheda, and was buried at Mellifont.

Roderick O'Conor, king of Connaught, son of king Torlogh, succeeded as monarch of Ireland, A. D. 1166, on the death of Murtogh Mac Loughlin; he had several contests with the O'Neills, kings of Ulster, with the O'Briens, kings of Thomond, the Mac Carthys, princes of Desmond, and Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, all of whom refused to acknowledge his authority; but having finally reduced them to submission, and having also marched to Dublin he reduced the Danes to subjection, and was then generally acknowledged as monarch. In A. D. 1167, king Roderick assembled a great national convention near Athboy, in Meath, which was attended by many of the princes and chiefs of Meath, Ulster, and Connaught, together with many bishops and clergy, and an immense number of the people; according to the Four Masters, no less than thirteen thousand horsemen attended this assembly, of which an account has been given at p. 298 in these notes. In A. D. 1168, king Roderick revived the celebrated assembly which had been held for many ages in ancient times at Tailtean, in Meath. The abduction of Dervorgilla, wife of Tiarnan O'Rourke, prince of Brefney, by Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, took place about A. D. 1166, though that event is erroneously placed ten years sooner by some modern historians; this event led to the Anglo-Norman invasion, under Strongbow and his followers, in the years 1169, 1170, and under king Henry II., in 1171 and 1172. An account of the contests of Roderick O'Conor, with Dermot Mac Murrough, king of Leinster, and his Anglo-Norman allies, is given in the various histories of Ireland, and the chief occurrences at the English invasion have been mentioned from p. 1 to 40, and also at pp. 196, 197, in these Annals, and in the annotations. Roderick O'Conor, the last Milesian monarch of Ireland, after various contests with the Anglo-Norman or English invaders, abdicated the throne A. D. 1184, in the 18th year of his reign, and retired to the monastery of Cong, in Mayo, where, after a religious seclusion of 14 years, he died A. D. 1198, according to the Ogygia, on Sunday, the 27th of November, in the 82nd year of his age, and was buried at the north side of the great altar, in the cathedral of St. Kieran at Clonmacnois. In nine years after his remains were exhumed, and placed in a stone coffin, as recorded at the year 1207 in these Annals.

Fall of the Monarchy.—The disorganization and anarchy in church and state, and the derangement both of civil and ecclesiastical authority, produced by the sanguinary and destructive Danish wars, incessantly continued for more than three centuries, together with the fierce and interminable feuds, discords, and ruinous contests of the kings, princes, and chiefs, amongst themselves, inevitably paved the way for the downfall of the Irish monarchy. The contests of the Irish Kings were as fierce, and far longer protracted, than those of the rival Houses of York and Lancaster for the crown of England. During those contests, continued incessantly through the 11th and 12th centuries, from the deposition of the monarch Malachy II., by Brian Boru, in the year 1002, to the reign of Roderick O'Conor and the English invasion in 1172, a period of 170 years, it is probable that, in the innumerable conflicts and battles, not less than one hundred and fifty thousand men were slain. But, the middle ages were times of tumult, anarchy, and violence, over the various nations of Europe, as well as Ireland, and the contests of the kings of the Irish Pentarchy were not more fierce, barbarous, and bloody, than the feuds of the Anglo-Saxon kings of the Heptarchy, as is abundantly evident from Turner's History of the Anglo-Saxons, from which a single passage may afford a striking specimen, in the reign of Ethelred, in the ninth century:—"Of all the Anglo-Saxon governments, the kingdom of Northumbria had been always the most perturbed; usurper murdering usurper, is the pervading incident. A crowd of ghastly monarchs pass swiftly along the page of history, as we gaze, and scarcely has the sword of the assassin been cleansed from its horrid pollution, before its point is turned upon its master, and he is carried to the sepulchre which he had just closed upon another. In this manner, during the last century and a half, no fewer than 17 sceptred chiefs hurled each other from their joyless thrones, and the deaths of the greatest number were accompanied by hecatombs of their friends." The learned Charles O'Conor, in his Dissertations on the History of Ireland, makes the following reflections on the fall of the mo-their boats; and the other party returned to the camp in a drowning condition. After those had departed, the resolution the Burkes came to was, not to continue guarding any castle against the sovereign of England, and two boats full of women and children proceeded to the other side of the narchy:—"Since the death of Malachy II. this nation was falling into a state of political reprobation; each province set up for itself, the monarchy grew indifferent, and the monarch hateful to the majority of the chieftains. When Roderick mounted the throne, their measure of iniquity was full; he laboured to unite all parties, for common defence, against a desperate provincial tyrant (Dermod Mac Murrough, king of Leinster), and his foreign allies, but the Oligarchs of the time were rather unanimous in rejecting their king, than the common enemy; they loved their country only in the second place; domestic animosities and personal revenge were uppermost, and to the gratification of these passions they sacrificed every consideration, favourable to their native country, or useful to their own common safety. What ensued was very natural, although, on a superficial view, it appears extremely surprising. The majority of the chieftains delivered up the nation as a prey to a handful of foreign freebooters, and deserted the reigning prince, under whose standard they could have easily preserved their liberties." Such are the judicious remarks of O'Connor, but still it may be observed, that the fall of the Milesian monarchy, in the 12th century, was not so sudden or surprising as that of England in the 11th century, under the Saxons, who were subdued, with Harold their king, in one battle at Hastings, and the Anglo-Saxon sceptre transferred to the Normans under William the Conqueror in a single day, while the Anglo-Norman kings and warlike barons, the descendants of the Normans of France, who so quickly made a complete conquest of England, could only effect a partial subjugation of Ireland, after fierce contests of many centuries. Of the contests of the Irish kings and chiefs amongst themselves, for many centuries, abundant accounts are given in the course of these Annals, and these contests were continued even with greater violence and fury after the English invasion, which added fresh elements of discord. It appears that the great Anglo-Norman families, as the Fitzgeralds, Butlers, Burkes, &c., carried on almost as fierce contests amongst themselves as the Irish chiefs; and Cox, speaking of those dissensions, both of the English and Irish, amongst themselves and against each other, in the 13th century, says—"That it appeared as if some malignant star had influenced all the inhabitants of Ireland to contention." In the various articles in preceding notes on the Danish wars, it has been shown that those contests were continued more than 300 years; and the wars of the Anglo-Normans and English in Ireland were continued incessantly for 500 years, thus, for more than eight centuries, violent wars were carried on, with enormous destruction of property, cattle, corn, &c., burning of churches, cities, and towns, and innumerable fierce contests, furious battles, conflicts, and massacres, took place, so that the history of Ireland, during a period of more than 800 years, through which the people fought against foreign foes, presents a continued scene of rapine and slaughter.

The Anglo-Normans in Ulster.—At the commencement of these Annals, an account is given of Strongbow and his followers, and their progress in various parts of Ireland. John de Courcy, and his forces, first attacked Ulster, of which territory he got a grant from King Henry II. of as much as he could conquer. Sir John de Courcy was descended from the Dukes of Lorraine, in France, and his ancestor came to England with William the Conqueror; he was the most renowned leader of the Anglo-Normans in Ireland, a man of immense bodily strength, gigantic stature, and indomitable valour. Holinshed says, "de Courcy was mighty of limb, and strong of sinews, very tall, and broad in proportion, a most warlike soldier, the first in the field, and the foremost in the fight, a noble and right valiant warrior." Campion, in his Chronicle, says, "John de Courcy was a warrior of noble courage, and in pitch of body like a giant." Holinshed and others state that he rode on a white horse, and had three eagles painted on his standards, in order to fulfil a prophecy made by Merlin the Welsh enchanter, that a knight riding on a white horse, and bearing birds on his shield, would be the first of the English who, with force of arms, would enter and conquer Ulster. De Courcy was accompanied to Ireland by his valiant brother-in-law Almeric de Tristram, or St. Laurence, ancestor of the earls of Howth; soon after their landing at Howth, in A.D. 1177, they marched with their forces to Ulster, and were accompanied by Roger le Poer, and other chiefs. De Courcy and his forces carried on fierce contests for many years with the northern princes and chiefs, as the O'Carrolls, Mac Mahons, and O'Hanlons of Louth, Monaghan and Armagh; the Mac Dunleveys, O'Flinns, Magennises, and Mac Cartans, in Down and Antrim; the O'Neills and O'Loughlins of Tyrone; the O'Kanes of Derry, and the O'Donnells of Donegal; but at length de Courcy and his followers succeeded in conquering part of the country, and made settlements in Oirgiall, or Louth, Monaghan and Armagh, and in Ulidia or Dalaradia, in parts of Down and Antrim. Many of de Courcy's battles with the Irish chiefs in Ulster, for a period of more than 20 years, are recorded in these Annals, and some also in Hanmer's Chronicle, of which the following were the most remarkable.

Battle at Downpatrick.—Hanmer, in his Chronicle, relates two of de Courcy's battles fought at Downpatrick with Mac Dunlevey, or O'Dunlevey, whom he and Cox erroneously call O'Donnell. The chief commanders of the English in these battles were de Courcy, sir Armoric de St. Laurence, and his son, sir Nicholas, Roger le Poer, and Geoffrey de Montgomery, the standard bearer; their forces consisted of cavalry called men-at-arms, who were covered with armour, and armed with spears, swords, &c., and archers, some of whom were mounted on horses, and others on foot. The Irish galloglasses, or heavy infantry, were armed with swords and battle-axes, and the Kerns, or light foot, with spears, darts, slings, &c.; they were commanded chiefly by Mac Dunlevey and Conor O'Loughlin. The battle was fierce and long continued, and the slaughter great on both sides, and, amongst the English, Lionel St. Laurence and other leaders were slain; but Hanmer says the Irish were at length defeated. This battle was fought in A.D. 1177, and, according to the Four Masters, in the same year John de Courcy plundered Downpatrick, and erected a castle there, and he had many conflicts with the Irish chiefs, several of whom were slain, namely, of the Mac Dunleveys, O'Donnells, O'Carrolls, &c., and of the O'Flahertys, who appear to have been a branch of the O'Neills, and, therefore, different from the O'Flahertys of Connaught.

Battle of Glenrighe.—In A.D. 1178, John de Courcy, with his foreigners, marched to Machaire Conaill, or the Plain of Louth, which they plundered, and encamped at Glenrighe, or the vale of the Newry river, on the borders of Louth and Down; but they were attacked by the Irish forces, under Murrough O'Carroll, prince of Oirgiall, and Cu-uladh Mac Dunlevey, prince of Ulidia; the English were defeated, and 450 of them slain, and of the Irish 150 fell on the field of battle. Shortly after, de Courcy's forces were defeated with great slaughter by the Irish, under Cumidhe O'Flinn, lord of Hy Tuirtre, a territory near Lough Neagh, on the borders of Down and Antrim; de Courcy himself with difficulty escaped from the battle, and fled to Dublin, covered with wounds. These battles, and many others fought by de Courcy, in Ulster and Connaught, are recorded by the Four Masters.

Battle of Farney.—The circumstances mentioned by Hanmer are as follows:—De Courcy having erected many castles in Ulster, amongst others, two in Farney, he gave the guarding of them to Mac Mahon, chief of Farney in Monaghan, who entered into alliance with him, but about A.D. 1180 Mac Mahon demolished the castles; de Courcy, on hearing this, demanded why he dared to do so, on which Mac Mahon replied he had not promised to hold stones for him, but land, and that it was contrary to his nature to couch himself within cold stones, and that he would much rather live in the warm woods. This contemptuous reply enraged de Courcy, and having mustered his forces he preyed and plundered Mac Mahon's country; the immense prey of cattle which he drove off was divided into three parts, and when proceeding with them they covered a distance of three miles. Mac lake opposite the camp. The governor afterwards demolished the castle, and it was in that camp he hanged the son of Mac William Burke, namely,

Mahon collected his forces, and they attacked the English with great fury, and such loud shouts as made the woods ring; the cows frightened ran furiously on the drivers, and broke through the ranks, overturning men and horses, and great numbers of the English were trodden to death by the cattle, and many hundreds of them slain by the Irish. De Courcy, and sir Arnoric de St. Laurence, attacked Mac Mahon's men, and rescued Roger le Poer, who had been taken prisoner; the Irish, having rallied their forces, came again to the contest with terrific shouts, and were commanded by Art Buighe Mac Mahon; the English being environed with woods, bogs, and marshes, great numbers of them were slain, and many also of the Irish fell, amongst others Mac Mahon the chief. The contest continued a great part of the day, and night coming on, de Courcy entrenched himself in an old fortress; the Irish remained within about half a mile of him, and made great fires in the woods during the night. The conflict was renewed the next day and great numbers slain on both sides; according to some accounts the English were victorious, but other accounts state that they were defeated, and de Courcy forced to fly with a remnant of his forces, and pursued for a distance of 30 miles from the field of battle.

Battle of Lurgan.—About A. D. 1180, de Courcy having sent to England for some munitions of war, a vessel arrived, which was driven into a creek in Oriel or Louth, called Torshead, but O'Hanlon, a chief of Armagh, and others, took the ship, and having put the mariners to death, seized all the cargo; de Courcy then marched his forces from Downpatrick to Newry, while O'Hanlon and the Irish mustered their men, and encamped south of Dundalk, and north of the river Dondygon. De Courcy, Arnoric de St. Laurence, and Roger le Poer, came with the English forces to within half a mile of the Irish camp, and having advanced to the attack, a fierce conflict ensued at the river; de Courcy being directed by a Friar to a ford, the English passed over, and the fight was continued at a broad part of the water, about a mile from Lurgan, on the south side from Dunnalk. Both parties fought with determined bravery, the Irish being commanded by O'Hanlon, and other chiefs; de Courcy displayed great valour, wielding his two handed sword, with which he cut down many champions; sir Arnoric de St. Laurence, and his son sir Nicholas, also fought with great bravery. After a long contest, de Courcy was sorely wounded, and, according to Hammer, the slaughter on both sides was immense, "few of the Irish, and fewer of the English, being left alive." After the battle, the Irish forces retired to the Fews, in Armagh, and the English to Dundalk.

De Courcy and his followers succeeded in making many settlements in Ulster, in the counties of Louth, Monaghan, Armagh, Down, and Antrim, and he erected several castles in Ulster, and had his chief castle and residence at Downpatrick; he was created by Henry II. earl of Ulster, and lord of Connaught, and was one of the chief governors of Ireland in 1179; he was married to Afreca, daughter of Godred, king of the Isle of Mann, and from him were descended the de Courcys, barons of Kinsale, in Cork. De Courcy had various contests with his powerful rivals the de Lacys, lords of Meath, and sir Hugh de Lacy charged de Courcy with disaffection, and with having refused to do homage to king John, on which the king commanded de Lacy to take him prisoner; and in the year 1203, while de Courcy was performing his devotions, on Good Friday, at the church of Downpatrick, he was attacked unawares and unarmed by de Lacy's men, on which the valiant warrior, having no weapon at hand, seized the shaft of a wooden cross, with which he slew thirteen of de Lacy's men; but being overpowered by numbers, he was at length made prisoner, sent to England, and confined in the Tower; but being liberated after some time, he went to France, where he died about the year 1210; his extensive estates and honours were conferred by king John on Hugh de Lacy, of which an account is given in Lodge's Peerage on the Barons of Kinsale.

Grant of Ulster to Hugh de Lacy.—By the following docu-

Rickard Oge, commonly called Fal-fa-Eirin (the Fence of Ireland), who was the son of Rickard, son of John of the Termon; his other brother had ment taken from the Patent Rolls in the Tower of London, which has been obtained from the Library of Sir William Betham, and not hitherto published, it is shown that king John, in the year 1204, gave a grant of Ulster to Hugh de Lacy the younger, who was son of the first Hugh de Lacy, lord of Meath, and de Lacy was to possess Ulster and its earldom as fully as held by de Courcy the day he was taken prisoner, except the lands of the Cross or church lands, bishopricks, and abbeyes, and the king gave charge to the lord justice, Myler Fitz-Henry, to defend and preserve de Lacy's lands as he would the demesnes of the crown.

"Concessio terræ de Ultonia Hugoni de Lacy (per gladium), salvis tamen Regi Crociis de terra illa."

"Rex, &c., Meilero filio Henrici (Myler Fitz-Henry), et Baronibus Hiberniæ, &c. Sciatis quod dedimus et concessimus Hugoni de Lacy pro homagio et servitio suo terram de Ultonia cum pertinentiis suis, habendum et tenendum sicut Johannes de Courcy eam tenuit die qua idem Hugo eum in campo seisivit, vel die proximo precedente, salvis tamen nobis Crociis de terra illa; et sciatis quod retinimus nobiscum predictum Hugonem ipsumque nobiscum ducimus in servitio nostro. Et ideo vobis mandamus quod terram suam et omnia sua custodiatis maneat et defendatis sicut nostra dominia. Teste meipso apud Windlesor, 2do die Maii, A. D. 1204."

After the attainder of the de Lacys in the 13th century, Walter de Burgo, lord of Connaught, succeeded to the lands and earldom of Ulster, in right of his wife, who was daughter of sir Hugh de Lacy, and the earldom of Ulster afterwards passed by intermarriage with a daughter of Walter de Burgo, to Lionel, duke of Clarence, son of king Edward III.; next to the Mortimers, earls of March in England, and lords of Meath, and lastly the earldom of Ulster came into the possession of the royal family of England, and, in modern times, the dukes of York are earls of Ulster.

In the notes on Oirgiall, Ulidia, Dalaradia, Dalriada, Tir-Eogain, Brefney, and Fermanagh, an account has been given of the chief families of Anglo-Normans who made settlements in Ulster under John de Courcy and his followers, and of the English settlers in general from the 12th to the 17th century. In the course of these Annals ample accounts are given of the incessant wars waged with those British settlers, and with the English of the Pale, by the great northern chiefs, the O'Neills of Tyrone, the O'Donnells of Donegal, the Maguires of Fermanagh, the Mac Mahons of Monaghan, the O'Reillys of Cavan, &c.; these wars were incessantly continued for a period of 500 years, and vast numbers were slain on both sides. The Mac Donnells of the Hebrides, styled lords of the Isles, a celebrated Scottish clan, originally of Irish descent, frequently came to Ulster with powerful forces of Scots from the 12th to the 16th century, and made settlements in Antrim; the head chiefs of the Mac Donnells in after times became earls of Antrim. These Mac Donnells and the Mac Sheehys, who were also a Scottish clan of Irish descent, make a remarkable figure in the history of Ulster during the 16th century, as famous military commanders, and galloglasses, and generally fought in alliance with the Irish against the English, but very often there were fierce contests between them and the Irish chiefs. The Mac Quillans, another powerful clan in Antrim, also make a considerable figure in the history of Ulster for a long time, and had many contests with the Mac Donnells, by whom they were finally vanquished in the 16th century.

The Invasion of Bruce.—In the beginning of the 14th century O'Neill, prince of Tyrone, and several other Irish princes and chiefs, in order to make a more effectual effort to shake off the English yoke, invited the renowned Robert Bruce, king of Scotland, to assume the sovereignty of Ireland, or send them some prince of his family, as they considered the House of Bruce had a claim to the crown of Ireland, being descended from the old Scottish kings who were of Irish Milesian race. In consequence of this invitation, king Robert sent his brother Edward Bruce to Ireland, and he landed at Oldfleet, in the bay of Larne, on the coast of been put to death before that for his crimes, namely Thomas Roe, who had Caislen-ne-Nenuige on Fionnloch-Ceara (Lough Carra, in the barony of Kilmain, county of Mayo), and that castle had to be given up to the governor, who demolished it as he had similarly demolished the other castles, Antrim, on the 25th of May, A. D. 1315, with a fleet of 300 sail and 600 Scots, and being joined by the Irish chiefs of Ulster, he took from the English various castles and garrisons, as Carrickfergus, Coleraine, Carlingford, Dundalk, &c., and was crowned as king of Ireland near Dundalk. He made a victorious progress through the English Pale, with his Scottish forces and Irish allies, took the towns of the English, and plundered and laid waste their territories. During his career in Ireland for about three years and a half, he traversed all the provinces, and is said to have defeated the English forces in 18 battles, but his followers were at length mostly cut off by a dreadful famine. An account of Bruce's progress in Ireland has been given at p. 111 in these Annals; his forces were finally defeated and himself slain in a great battle at Faughart near Dundalk, by the English of the Pale, under the command of sir John Bermingham, who for this signal service was created earl of Louth by king Edward III. The battle of Faughart and death of Bruce took place on St. Calixtus's day, namely Saturday the 14th of October, A. D. 1318, not on the 28th of May, as erroneously stated in Lodge's Peerage, and quoted at p. 111 in these notes, which mistake the reader will please to correct.

The Wars of Elizabeth.—In the latter end of the 16th century, from 1560 to 1600, the wars of the Irish princes and chiefs against queen Elizabeth, form the most remarkable events in the Anglo-Irish history. These wars were incessantly continued for a period of about forty years, chiefly in Ulster, during which time the Northern Irish, under the O'Neills, O'Donnells, O'Reillys, Maguires, &c., fought many fierce battles against the English forces, of which copious accounts are given in the course of these Annals.

The Plantation of Ulster.—In consequence of the adherence of the Irish chiefs to Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, in the war against Elizabeth, six entire counties in Ulster, namely, Armagh, Tyrone, Derry, Donegal, Fermanagh, and Cavan, were confiscated, and seized by the crown in the reign of James I., in the beginning of the 17th century, from A. D. 1610 to 1620. These territories were transferred from the Irish chiefs and clans to various British colonies; some were English, but most of them were Scottish settlers. They were denominated Undertakers and Planters, hence this project was called the Plantation of Ulster. Accounts of these colonies and undertakers are given in Pymar's Survey of Ulster, in Harris's Hibernica, in the Historical Tracts of sir John Davis, and in Cox's Hibernia Anglicana. An account of the Plantation of Ulster has been also given in these Annals, in the topographical notes on Oirgiall, Tir-Eogain, Tirconnell, Brefney, and Fermanagh.

The Insurrection of 1641, and the Cromwellian Wars.—In consequence of the confiscation of the possessions of the old Irish chiefs in Ulster, and the transfer of their lands to British settlers, they formed a powerful confederacy for the recovery of their territories, and a tremendous insurrection took place on the 23d of October, 1641, which raged incessantly for a period of about seven years, mixed up with the Civil War in Ireland, between the English Parliamentary forces and the adherents of Charles I., and followed by the Cromwellian Wars, for a period of about three years, from 1649 to 1652. The great leaders of the Irish in these events in Ulster were, sir Pbelim, and the celebrated Owen Roe O'Neill, the O'Reillys of Cavan, the Maguires of Fermanagh, the Mac Mahons of Monaghan, &c., and accounts of these wars are given in Cox, Leland, Temple, Borlase, Warner, Carte, Curry, Mac Geoghegan, &c.

Numbers slain in the Wars of Ulster.—In the several articles on the ancient history of Ulster in the course of these notes, an estimate may be formed of the numbers slain from data afforded by the accounts of the various wars and battles. In the wars of the Irish chiefs and chiefs amongst themselves, and various battles with foreign invaders, from the first to the eighth century, a period of 700 years, it is probable that about 240,000 men were slain. In the Danish wars, from the latter end of the 8th, to the 12th century, a period of more than 300 years, there were slain in Ulster about 100,000 men on both sides. In the wars with the Anglo-Normans, from the 12th to the 14th century, about 50,000 were slain; and in the battles during the invasion of Edward Bruce, about 30,000 fell by the sword and famine; in the subsequent wars with the English, down to the reign of Elizabeth, for a period of about 240 years, the number of slain may be estimated at about 80,000. In the wars of Elizabeth, for a period of 40 years, there could not have been less than 100,000 men slain on both sides in Ulster. In the insurrection of 1641, to 1649, and the subsequent Cromwellian wars, from 1649 to 1652, in the many fierce battles, conflicts, and massacres, including the massacre by Cromwell at Drogheda, which town was in ancient Ulster, there were at least 100,000 men slain on both sides; and lastly, in the war of the Revolution, from 1689 to 1691, in the various battles, sieges &c., in Ulster, there were probably about 30,000 slain on both sides. From these calculations it appears that from the 1st to the 18th century, there were about 700,000 men slain in the various wars in Ulster.

Eruption of Lakes and Earthquakes.—In the article on Ulster, at p. 338, an account has been given of the sudden eruption, in very remote times, of many great lakes in that province, as Loughs Neagh, Erne, &c.; and these phenomena are considered to have arisen from volcanic action, or earthquakes, and it may be observed that basaltic strata abound in various parts of Antrim, particularly on the sea coast, in that stupendous production of nature called the Giants' Causeway, which resembles some vast work of art, and consists of an immense number of basaltic columns, now admitted to be of volcanic origin; and some basaltic columns are also found along the shores of Lough Neagh. In Seward's Topography, at the article Knocklade, an account is given of a volcanic eruption and earthquake which took place on the hill of Knocklade, near Ballycastle, in the county of Antrim, in May, 1788; this remarkable phenomenon was preceded by a noise resembling a continued crash of thunder, and a column of fire and smoke burst forth, and ascended about 60 yards into the air, followed by a shower of ashes and stones, which extended a quarter of a mile round the hill; in about 46 minutes after the first shock, a stream of lava poured out, and rushed in a sheet of liquid fire, about 60 yards in breadth, down the fields, until it entered the adjoining village of Ballyowen, where it involved the houses and their unfortunate inhabitants in conflagration and ruin, none having escaped but one man, his wife, and two children; after the lava had continued to flow 39 hours, it then totally ceased.

History of Ireland.—In the various articles on Ulster, in these notes, in the course of the Annals, not more than an outline of the history of Ulster could be given, embracing a short account of the chief events, and referring to various sources for further information, the object being to give data for a provincial history to future writers. One of the best modes, probably, of illustrating Irish history, would be to give separate histories of the five ancient kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster, and Munster, as these five kingdoms, constituting the Irish Pentarchy, were distinct in their government, each having its own kings, laws, customs, regulations, and separate interests, under the old monarchy, down to the invasion of the English in the latter end of the 12th century, and even to the end of the 16th century, when a complete breaking up of the Irish princes, chiefs, and clans, took place in the reign of Elizabeth, the five kingdoms of the ancient Pentarchy were recognised by the Milesian Irish, and representatives still remained of the old kings, princes, and chiefs, who were looked upon by the people as their legitimate rulers. From these considerations, it appears that five distinct histories of the kingdoms of the Irish Pentarchy would probably be the best plan to illustrate and make intelligible the History of Ireland; these provincial histories would be most important and valuable works, if ably executed, giving the history of each province, and the events from the earliest era, Pagan and Christian, Irish, Danish, and English, military and after Riecard, the son of Thomas, had been put to death. It was at the same time that the governor hanged the two sons of Walter Fada (the Tall), the son of David, son of Edmond, son of Ulick Burke, whose names were Theobald and Myler. A great number of the people of the province of Connaught united with those Burkes, and joined them in their treason, after the festival of St. John, of this year; amongst these were the Clan Donnell galloglasses (Mae Donnells), and the Seaigh of West Connaught (the Joyces of Connemara); those sent their moveable properties, their women and people, into the strongholds and recesses of the country; the governor having gone to Ballinrobe to attack them, sent seven or eight companies through West Connaught in pursuit of the insurgents, and when they did not succeed in taking the despoilers, they plundered Muintir Murehadha-na-dTuagh (the tribe-name of the O'Flahertys of West Connaught, in Galway), and the people of the tribe of Owen O'Flaherty, who, as they themselves considered, were then under the law. Those (the English), slew women, the common inhabitants, and helpless people; they hanged Theobald O'Tuathalain, a supporter of the indigent, and a man who kept a house of hospitality; they also took prisoner Owen, the son of Donal-an-Chogaidh (of the War), the son of Gilladuff, son of Murrough, son of Owen O'Flaherty, and after taking him they put him to death, and they then returned back to the governor with much prey and booty.

A Scottish fleet landed at Inisowen, on the estate of O'Dogherty, in the north-eastern angle of Tیرهonnell; the chief commanders and head constables of that fleet were the two sons of James, the son of Alexander, son of John Cathanaeh, the son of Mae Donnell, namely Donal Gorm and Alexander, and Gillespuie, the son of Dongall, son of Donogh Cam, son of Gillespuie Mae Cailin, together with several other chiefs besides, and their fame and renown were greater than they actually deserved. They formed camps abounding with provisions in the country on which they landed, and the idle persons, and those who attended on festival occasions, and useless strollers of the neighbouring districts, were in the habit of visiting them at that place, and they left no property, either of corn or cattle, after them in Inisowen on that occasion. They afterwards proceeded along the Finn and Modharn (the rivers Finn and Mourne in Donegal), ecclesiastical, civil and political, literary and scientific, arts, antiquities, laws, &c. with catalogues and lives of the provincial kings, princes, and distinguished chiefs, and of archbishops, bishops, and eminent ecclesiastics, &c. For such works there are abundant materials in the ancient annals, as those of the Four Masters, of Ulster, Inisfallen, &c., and in various Irish MSS. now in progress of publication. After the Provincial Histories, a series of County Histories, and separate Ecclesiastical Histories of each Diocese, would, if well executed, be most important works, and are much wanted. These Provincial, County, and Diocesan Histories, would furnish materials for a full and general History of Ireland, which is yet to be written, all those hitherto published being miserably defective. The History of Ireland must be written by impartial Irishmen, if Milesians so much the better, for every people should be the writers of their own history, and the writers must know their native language, and be good Irish scholars, otherwise it is a farce to attempt to write the ancient history of Ireland. It must be written free from party views, and anti-Irish prejudices, on the one hand, and on the other it must avoid excessive eulogies of the ancient Irish, and exaggerations of their former greatness. No full or fair history of Ireland has been yet written; one set of our historians are extravagantly anti-Irish and bigotted, distorting and falsifying every event in modern times, and representing our ancient annals, civil, military, and ecclesiastical, as fables, fictions, and legends, while, on the other hand, most of our native historians endeavour to give an undue importance to the history of the Irish people, and exaggerate the greatness of their country in other days, which is very injudicious, for as Ireland had in early ages attained considerable civilization, and eminence in the arts, and was particularly distinguished in her religious and literary fame, therefore, the real rank the country held amongst the European nations, in early times, should be shown, and requires no exaggerated embellishments. Of all our annalists, the Four Masters are undoubtedly the most impartial, and in the extensive range of events which they record, they give faithful representations of affairs, as far as they go, showing the vices as well as virtues of their countrymen, and give a fair view of things; but their narrative is too concise, and a more full account of events must be collected from numerous other sources. Though many of our historians are excessively anti-Irish, and others too Irish, yet they all contain immense and important information, and a vast mass of valuable materials, which could be made available for a History of Ireland, if selected, arranged, and compiled with judgement. All the histories hitherto written are extremely defective, none of them containing a sixth part of the history of Ireland, and what they do contain is full of mistakes and misrepresentations. From the numerous works on Irish history already published, and from the various works, annals, &c., now in progress of publication, ample materials could be collected for a full and general history of Ireland, but four large quarto volumes would be required for the purpose, two volumes for the antiquities, arts, military, civil, and political history, and two more for the ecclesiastical, literary, and legal history. In order to execute such a great work, it would be necessary that the undertaking should receive the most extensive public patronage and national support; no one man could ever accomplish such a task, and it would be required to employ, in its execution, at least four of the ablest men who could be got in different departments, such as a profound Irish historian, who was at the same time a topographer and antiquary, and also had an extensive knowledge of the ancient history of various nations; secondly, a learned ecclesiastical historian; thirdly, an able Irish scholar, who must have a thorough knowledge of the history and ancient topography of Ireland; and fourthly, a first-rate classic scholar, writer, and critic. Such a work could not be adequately accomplished except at great cost; but if well executed, the pecuniary outlay would be fully repaid, after some time, by the sale of the work, and it would ultimately produce ample remuneration.

to Termon Magrath (parish of Templecarne, in the baronies of Tirhugh, and Lurg, in Donegal and Fermanagh), to Tuath Luirg (barony of Lurg, in Fermanagh), and to Miodhbulg, (in the barony of Tirhugh, in Donegal), until they arrived at the very borders of the Erne. When the forementioned Burkes, who were engaged in the plundering and insurrection, namely, Richard Burke, the son of Deamhan-an-Chorrain; the sons of Edmond Burke, and the Clan Donnell galloglasses, received intelligence about the Scots, they quickly sent messengers inviting them to come to them, and stated that they would obtain great booty, and as much estate as they would require in the province of Connaught, if they themselves could defend it against the people of the sovereign. The Scots proceeded across the Erne with those guides, and having arrived on the first night between Dubh and Drobhais (the rivers Duff and Drowis, on the borders of Sligo and Leitrim), they commenced spoiling Dartry and Carbury, and were joined there by Richard (Burke), and the sons of Edmond. The governor (sir Richard Bingham), proceeded to Sligo to oppose them, and the Scots having departed from that district, proceeded southward of Dartry, along Beanna Bo (Benbo Hill, near Drumlease), in Brefney, and remained three nights in Dromahaire; from thence they proceeded to Braid-Sliabh (Bracrieve mountain, in the barony of Tirerrill, county of Sligo, on the borders of Leitrim and Roscommon), and did not halt till they arrived at Cill-Ronain, (parish of Kilronan, barony of Boyle, county of Roscommon), at which place they arrived on the borders of Brefney, Moylurg, and Hy nOilella (Leitrim, and the baronies of Boyle and Tirerrill, in Roscommon and Sligo). The governor came from the west to Belan-Atha-fada in Tirerill (Ballinafad, north of the Curlew mountains, a village on the road from Boyle to Sligo), and both parties remained in those places for a fortnight, without either attacking the other. The Scots prepared to depart in the beginning of a wet and very dark night, and they proceeded in a north-westerly direction through Tirerrill, to cross the bridge of Cul-Maoile (Collooney); there were three companies of the governor's people guarding the bridge that night, and the Scots having encountered them, a fierce conflict ensued between them, but the Scots, however, were obliged to abandon the bridge, and cross the ford on the west side of it; they went that night to Sliabh-Gamh (Ox mountain, in the barony of Lieny, county of Sligo), and on the following day to Ard-na-Riagh (Ardnaree at Ballina). The governor departed from Ballinafad in another direction from them, on the following day, as if he were not actually in pursuit of them, and continued through Connaught for fifteen days collecting as much forces as he could, during which time he had spies and reconnoiterers out after the Scots; when he had collected the requisite forces, he marched from the monastery of Beand Fhada in Luighne of Connaught (now Banada, a village in the parish of Kilmacteige, barony of Lieny, county of Sligo, where there was an ancient monastery), in the beginning of a very dark night in harvest, and did not halt, either day or night, until he arrived, in the mid-day on the morrow, at Ardnaree¹, without warning or notice being given to the Scots. The manner in which those were before him was in their sleeping places, without fear, and unguarded, just as if the strange country into which they had come was their own, without opposition. The first thing by which they were roused from their deep slumber was the cry of their sentinels, who were attacked by the governor's people throughout the town; the Scots then quickly arranged themselves in order as well as they possibly could, to combat with the governor's people; that, however, was no benefit to them, for they had no more than dis-

A. D. 1586.

1. Battle of Ardnaree.—In 1586, according to Cox, the Burkes of Mayo collected their forces, and were joined by two thousand Scottish auxiliaries, who had landed in Ulster; with these combined forces, amounting to about 3000 men, they endeavoured to expel the English out of Connaught, and the Scots having marched forward, they crossed the river Erne, near Ballyshannon; they were followed by the earl of Clanrickard and sir Richard Bingham, with the English forces, and having marched to Sligo, the Irish returned through Leitrim, and over the Curlew mountains, through Roscommon, towards Mayo. Bingham pursued them, and having marched through Roscommon, came up with them, and appears to have taken the Scotch and Irish by surprise, being quite unprepared for battle; the forces on both sides encamped and fought a severe engagement at Ard-na-Riagh, or Ardnaree, on the banks of the river Moy, in the county of Sligo, adjoining Ballina, in Mayo. The Irish and Scots were defeated, and 2000 of them slain. Sir Richard Bingham, the earl of Clanrickard, Bermingham, and O'Kelly, according to Cox, soon after marched with their combined forces, and having attacked and defeated the Burkes of Mayo, they took from their country a prey of four thousand cows, of which they divided three thousand amongst their men.

charged the first volley of their darts, when they were most precipitately routed towards the river which was in front of them, namely, the agreeable murmuring Moy; men were prostrated while they were making for the river, and when they arrived at it they did not stop there, but immediately plunged into its depth, for they preferred being drowned, rather than slain by the governor's people; but, however, to be brief, nearly two thousand of them were slain at that time. The sons of Edmond Burke were not in that battle, for they had gone the day before that defeat in search of prey for the Scots, and having heard those tidings, they separated asunder, and the sons of Edmond Burke remained in the fastnesses of their own estate. Those of the Ultonians that escaped, and of the Scots that were along with them, proceeded to pass into Ulster, and the greater portion of these even were either hanged or killed in every country through which they passed before they had crossed the Erne. The father of the forementioned sons, namely Edmond, the son of Ulick, son of Edmond, son of Riekard Ui-Chuairsge, was hanged by the governor after that defeat; the condition in which he was, aged, feeble, and unable to walk or move, obliged them to carry him on a bier in conveying him to the gallows.

Hugh, the son of Owen, son of Donal, son of Owen, son of Donal of the Victories (Mae Sweeny), the chief constable of Clanrickard, died; and the person who then died was a hero in stature, and a champion in bravery.

Alexander, the son of Sorley Buighe, son of Alexander, son of John Cathanaeh, the son of Mac Donnell of Scotland, who was brother of the Inghean Dubh (the Dark haired daughter), the wife of O'Donnell, and mother of Hugh Roe, son of Hugh, son of Manus, was slain by captain Merryman, and by Hugh, son of the dean O'Gallagher, in the month of May precisely.²

A session was held in Galway, in the month of December of this year, at which many men and women were put to death, and Edmond Oge, the son of Edmond, son of Manus Mae Sheehy, and eight of the mercenary soldiers of the Geraldines, were put to death along with him, it having been discovered that they had been with the Scots who were slain at Ardnaree.

Con, the son of Art Oge, son of Niall son of Art, son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen (O'Neill), having gone on a predatory expedition into the territory of Maguire, from Lough Erne eastward, the son of Maguire, i. e. Hugh, the son of Cuchonaecht, son of Cuchonaecht, with a small party of cavalry, overtook Con, and a fierce conflict took place between them at Beal-Atha-Sain-redhaigh, and Con, along with the greater part of his people, was slain by the son of Maguire, who brought back the prey to the people from whom it had been taken. Felim Duv, the son of Art, son of Con O'Neill, an accomplished man of the territory of the tribe of Art, and his son, were slain by Hugh, the son of Maguire.

Mae Sweeney of Banagh (in Donegal), namely Bryan Oge, the son of Maolmurry, was slain on the 18th of May, by Niall Meirgeach, the son of Maolmurry, son of Hugh.

Wet weather, unproductive corn, and a great deal of nuts in this year.

The Parliament of Dublin was concluded this year, and, above all things that were enacted in it, the heirship of the earldom of Kildare was ratified by the crown of England.

Owen Ultach (O'Dunlevey), the son of Donogh, namely, the Doctor, died, and that Owen was a doctor in learning, for he was the most accomplished of the medical doctors of Ireland in the time he lived.

The official Mac Congail (Mac Connell), namely, Owen Ballaeh, died on the festival day of St Bridget precisely.

Cormae, the son of Donal Mac Connell, died on the 17th of March.

Five hundred Irishmen left Ireland to aid the

2. Death of Alexander Mac Donnell.—In A. D. 1586, Alexander Mac Donnell, chief commander of the Scots in Ulster, having proceeded with his forces to attack Strabane, in Tyrone, the English, under the command of captains Stafford and Merriman, marched thither to oppose them, and both parties having encountered, Mac Donnell sent a challenge to Merriman, the English commander, to decide the battle by single combat. The English captain pretended to accept the challenge, but, according to Cox and Mae Geoghegan, in order to secure the victory, he employed a galloglass, who took the name of Merriman, and fought with Mac Donnell; after a fierce combat, in which Mac Donnell was wounded, Merriman's champion was at length slain, on which captain Merriman himself, perceiving Mac Donnell to be exhausted from his encounter with the swordsman, entered the lists sword in hand. Mac Donnell bravely fought for some time against his fresh antagonist, but being weakened by his former wound, he was at length slain, and his head being cut off, was sent to Dublin, placed on a pole, and exposed to public view.

queen of England in the war of Flanders, and although the most of them were lost in that country, their fame and renown spread throughout Europe as being distinguished for valour and bravery.

A. D. 1587

The son of O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Hugh, son of Manus, was taken prisoner by the English, and the manner in which that capture occurred was thus: The English, along with the lord justice Sir John Perrott, and the council in general, became greatly afraid of the earl O'Neill, i. e. Hugh, the son of Feardorcha, although he had been submissive to them, through the intrigues and complaints of O'Neill, namely, Torlogh Luineach, the son of Niall Conallach, who was also in contention with him; and on account of Siobhan (Judith), the daughter of O'Donnell, namely, of Hugh, the son of Manus, who was the spouse of the earl of Tyrone. At one time, however, the fame and renown of the forementioned youth, namely Hugh Roe, the son of Hugh, spread throughout the five provinces of Ireland, even before he had arrived at the age of manhood, as being distinguished for wisdom, intellect, personal figure, and noble deeds; and all persons in general said that he was truly a prodigy, and that, should he be allowed to arrive at the age of maturity, the disturbance of the whole island of Ireland would arise through him, and through the earl of Tyrone, should they be engaged on the one side, and that they would carry the sway, being in alliance with each other as we have before stated; so that it was for these reasons the lord justice and the English of Dublin determined in their council what kind of plot they should adopt respecting that circumstance which they dreaded, and the resolution they came to was to fit out in Dublin a ship, with its crew, and a cargo of wine and spirituous liquors, and to send it by the left-hand side of Ireland north eastward, as if it were they went on traffic, and to take port in some harbour on the coasts of Tirconnell. The ship afterwards came with a fair wind from the west, without delay or impediment, until it arrived in the old harbour of Suilidh (Lough Swilly, in Donegal), exactly opposite Rath Maolain (Rathmullen), a town which had been formerly founded on the sea shore by

Mac Sweeney of Fanat, the hereditary marshal to the lord of Tirconnell. This ship having been moored there by her anchors, a party of the crew came to land in a small boat, under the appearance of traffic, and a semblance of peace and amity, and they began to spy and observe, and to sell and bargain with the people who were sent to them, and they stated that they had wine and strong drink with them in their ship; and when Mac Sweeney and his people received intelligence of this, they commenced buying and drinking the wine until they were intoxicated. When the people of the adjoining district heard of that ship, they flocked from all quarters to it. The forementioned Hugh Roe, who was then in his career of careless simplicity, and on his youthful visit and amusement, happened then to be in the neighbourhood, and the unthinking playfellows who were along with him prevailed on him to go to that place; his imprudence indeed was excusable at that time, for he had not then completed his fifteenth year, and there was none of his experienced counsellors, of his tutors, or of his professors along with him, to direct him in his proceedings, or offer him advice. When the spies heard that he had come to the town, they immediately returned back to their ship; this was perceived by Mac Sweeney, and the chiefs in general, and they sent servants and attendants for some wine to the ship for the guest who had arrived; the merchants said that they had no more wine with them than what was necessary for the crew; and that they would let no more from them to land for any person; but, however, that if a few chiefs would come to them to their ship, they should get as much wine and strong drink as they required. When this information was communicated to Mac Sweeney, he was ashamed of himself, so that the resolution he came to was to bring Hugh along with him to the ship, and having decided on that resolution, they went into a small boat which was at the verge of the strand, and they rowed it over to the ship; having been welcomed, they were conveyed down to a cabin in the middle of the ship, without delay or ceremony, and they were served and administered to until they were cheerful and merry; while they were regaled there, the hatch-door was closed behind them, and their arms having been stolen from them, the young son, Hugh Roe, was made a prisoner on that occasion. The report of that capture having spread throughout the country in general, they flocked from all parts to the harbour, to see if they could devise any stratagem against those who had committed that treachery, but that was impossible, for they were in the depth of the harbour, after having weighed their anchor, and they had neither ships nor boats at their command to be revenged of them. Mac Sweeny of the Districts, in common with all others came to the shore; he was foster-father to that Hugh, and he proffered other hostages and sureties in lieu of him, but it was of no avail to him, for there was not a hostage in the province of Ulster they would take in his stead. With respect to the ship, and the crew which were in it, when they had procured the most desirable to them of the inhabitants of the country, they sailed with a full tide until they arrived at the sea, and continued the course of passage by which they had come, and landed in the harbour of Dublin. His arrival after that manner was immediately known all over the city, and the lord justice and the council were delighted at his having come, although indeed it was not for love of him, and they commanded to have him brought before them; having been accordingly brought, they discoursed and conversed with him, scrutinizing and eliciting all the knowledge of him they could for a long time; they at length, however, ordered him to be put in a strong stone castle which was in the city, where a great number of the noble sons of the Milesians were in chains and captivity, as well as some of the Fionn Ghaill (Normans or English), whose chief subject of conversation both by day and night was complaining to each other of their injuries and troubles, and treating of the persecutions carried on against the noble and highborn sons of Ireland in general.¹

The son of Mac Namara, of the western part of Clan Cuilein, (barony of Bunratty in Clare), namely, Cumeadha, the son of John, son of Teige, son of Cumeadha, son of Cumara, son of John, died;

the wife of that Cumeadha, namely, the daughter of Edmond, the son of James Mac Pierce, died.

A. D. 1588.

Mac Sweeny of Banagh, namely, Niall Meirgeach, the son of Maolmurry, son of Hugh, son of Niall, was slain by Donogh, the son of Maolmurry Meirgeach, son of Maolmurry, son of Niall, at Doirinis, on the festival of St Bridget precisely. The manner in which that happened was, that after Bryan Oge had been slain, as we have before stated, by Niall Meirgeach, Donogh and his followers were expelled into Connaught by Niall also, and having been for some time joined with the English, and for some time with O'Neill, he, after a long distant period, made an attack on Niall Meirgeach, which Niall did not expect, for he hoped that Donogh would not return to the country while he should live in it; after Donogh had been for three nights in the recesses and sequestered places of the country, he received intelligence that Mac Sweeny was in the lower part of Boylagh, and he sent spies to reconnoitre him, and they brought back word to Donogh that he would come up across the strand on the morrow; he, with all his forces, were prepared to attack him, so that where they encountered each other was at the forementioned Doirinis (in Donegal), and a fierce conflict having ensued between them, Mac Sweeny, with a great number of his followers and of the Clan Sweeny of Munster, were slain there; Mac Sweeny was beheaded, and his head was sent to Dublin; Donogh was then nominated the Mac Sweeny. John Modardha, son of Hugh, son of Niall Oge Mac Sweeny, was killed by a party of the followers of Mac Sweeny, namely Donogh.

Hugh, the son of Niall Roe, son of Torlogh Bearnach O'Boyle, tanist of Boylagh (in Donegal), died.

Donal, the son of Niall Roe, son of Niall O'Boyle, and his son, were slain by Teige Oge, the son of

A. D. 1587.

1. The capture of Red Hugh O'Donnell.—This circumstance is mentioned as follows by Cox and Mac Geoghegan: the lord deputy sent a merchant vessel, under the command of a person named John Bingham, who had on board fifty armed men, and a cargo of wine and other merchandize; having sailed to the coast of Donegal, as above mentioned in the text, they cast anchor in Lough Swilly, and having decoyed on board young Hugh O'Donnell and some other chiefs, they treacherously made them prisoners, and carried them off to Dublin. After being incarcerated for more than three years in the Castle of Dublin, O'Donnell made his escape, but was soon after retaken in Wicklow, and again imprisoned in the Castle, from which he finally escaped, in about a year after, of which circumstances a full account is given at the years 1590 and 1592, in these Annals.

Teige, son of Torlogh O'Boyle, on Traigh Sain-readhaigh, in Trian Iochtar, precisely in harvest.

Calvach Oge, the son of Con, son of Calvach O'Donnell, was slain by a party of the people of Donal, the son of Hugh, son of Manus O'Donnell, namely, by Manus Oge O'Sraithein, near the river Finn.

Maolmurry, the son of Edmond, son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh Mac Sweeny, was slain by Niall Garv, the son of Con, son of Calvach O'Donnell.

The earl of Tyrone, namely, Hugh, the son of Ferdorcha, son of Con Bacach, son of Con, mustered a very great force to march against O'Neill, i. e. Torlogh, and the earl did not halt until he came, with his forces, across the rivers Mourne and Derg, and halted at Carraig Leth (in Tyrone). O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Manus, came to join the earl, his relative by marriage, with a number of his forces, but, however, he did not come fully prepared. O'Neill, i. e. Torlogh, collected and mustered a great force in opposition to the earl and O'Donnell; those who joined O'Neill were Art Oge, his son, with numerous retained troops; William Mussten (captain Mostin), the son of Robert, with a company of soldiers, and a party of the Clan Sweeny of Munster, with Murrough-na-Mart (of the Oxen), the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, and many others besides; Niall Garv, and Hugh Mac-an Deaganaigh O'Gallagher, commonly called at that time Hugh, the son of the Calvach O'Donnell, with the entire tribe of Calvach, and with their followers, were joined and united with O'Neill, and where they were was at Caislen-na-Finne (Castlefin, in the barony of Raphoe, county of Donegal). Some of his people were entreating Hugh to make a nocturnal attack on the earl, for the earl was preying and plundering the country between those rivers, namely the Finn and Mourne; through pride and magnanimity he did not consider that honourable, and said he surely would not attack an earl in the darkness of night, but that in the full clearness of the light of day he would fight a fierce battle with him; this he fulfilled, for he attacked the earl on the morrow, and defeated him, and an earl lost many people, together with horses and much property in general, which event took place on the 1st of May.

Mac Geoghegan, lord of Kinel Fiacha (in Westmeath), namely, Conla, the son of Conor, son of Laigne, son of Conla, son of Hugh, died, and there was not since the times of old a man of the race of Fiacha, the son of Niall (Niall of the Nine Hostages), who was more lamented than he; and his son Bryan, and Niall the son of Rossa, were in contention with one another about the lordship of the country.

Owen Manntach, the son of Edmond, son of Flann, son of Conor O'Heyne, lord of Hy Fiachra Aidhne (in Galway), died, and his son, Hugh Buighe, was appointed his successor; the tanist of the same country died, namely, Torlogh, the son of Roderick, at Doire-Ui-Eidhin.

A large fleet consisting of eight score ships (160), came on the sea from the king of Spain this year, and some say it was their intention to take harbour, and land on the coasts of England, should they obtain an opportunity; but in that they did not succeed, for the queen's fleet encountered them at sea, and took four of their ships, and the rest of the fleet was scattered and dispersed along the coasts of the neighbouring countries, viz., on the eastern side of England, on the north eastern shores of Scotland, and on the north western coast of Ireland; a great number of the Spaniards were drowned in those quarters, their ships having been completely wrecked, and the smaller portion of them returned to Spain, and some assert that nine thousand of them were lost on that occasion.¹

The lord justice of Ireland, namely, Sir John

A. D. 1588,

1. The Spanish Armada.—In 1588 Philip II., King of Spain, who had been married to Mary, queen of England, irritated at the assistance given by queen Elizabeth to the States of the Netherlands, in their revolt against Spain, prepared a powerful naval armament for the invasion of England; this immense fleet was called the Invincible Armada, and consisted of 130 or 140 vessels, 65 of which were of great size, and called Galleons. The soldiers, marines, and officers on board this fleet, amounted to about thirty thousand men, and they had on board 2,431 pieces of artillery, and vast treasures. This immense Armament, commanded by the Duke de Medina Sidonia, sailed from Lisbon, in the latter end of May, but was soon after dispersed by a violent storm near Corunna; the fleet, being refitted, again set sail for England, and having arrived off Calais and Dunkirk, in August, they had some engagements with the English and Dutch fleets, but the Spaniards were defeated, and having met many disasters, they resolved to return to Spain by the northern seas, and sailed round the Orkney Islands, where the fleet was overtaken by dreadful storms; many of their vessels were wrecked, and some driven far northwards, and dashed to pieces on the rocks of Norway. About 30 of their ships were driven to the shores of Ireland, in August and Septem-

Perrott, went to England, and Sir William Fitzwilliam, having come to Ireland, succeeded him as lord justice.

O'Deadhath (O'Dea), i.e. Mahon, the son of Loughlin, son of Roderick, son of Murrough, son of Mahon Buighe, lord of Kineal Fearmaic (barony of Inehiquin, county of Clare), died.

William, the son of Donal, son of Awlave, i.e. the doctor, son of Donogh O'Niallain (O'Neillan), was slain at the door of Mainistir Innsi by the sons of O'Griobhtha, namely, the sons of John, son of John, son of Teige, son of Loughlin.

The lord justice of Ireland, Sir William Fitzwilliam; the governor of the two provinces of Connaught, Sir Richard Bionggam (Bingham), and the president of the two provinces of Munster, Sir Thomas Norris, joined by the most of the men of Ireland except those of the province of Ulster, marched, with a great army, against O'Rourke and Mac Sweeney of the Districts, who made friendship and alliance with a portion of the men of the Spanish fleet we have before mentioned. Those forces (the English) spoiled every thing they found before them not belonging to the queen's people, from the river Suck to Drowis (at Bundrowis, in Leitrim), and from Drowis to the river Finn (in Donegal); but, however, they neither took nor endangered O'Rourke or Mac Sweeney on that occasion. It was on that expedition that O'Dogherty, namely, John Oge, the son of John, son of Felim, son of Conor Carrach, and O'Gallagher i.e. Sir John, the son of Tuathal Balbh, were taken prisoners; the lord justice went to Dublin, and the men of Ireland returned to their homes.

Hugh Mac-an-Deaganaigh O'Gallagher, commonly called Hugh, the son of the Calvaeh O'Donnell, was put to death by the Inghean Dubh, the daughter of James Mac Donnell, the wife of O'Donnell, i.e. Hugh, the son of Manus; the manner in which she effected that killing was as follows: Hugh was in alliance with the faithful tribe of the Calvaeh O'Donnell, and they were all conjointly in alliance with O'Neill, namely, Torlogh Luineach, who was in contention with O'Donnell, as well as with her relative by marriage, the earl O'Neill, i.e. Hugh, the son of Ferdorcha; moreover, her dear brother Alexander had been slain on a former occasion by Hugh Mac-an-Deaganaigh, as we have before stated; she had many other causes of enmity towards him besides that, and it was a heart-sickness and a sorrow of mind to her not to be revenged of him for his pride and arrogance; she complained of her troubles and injury to the Scottish soldiers, who were both in their service and pay, and in attendance on her in all places, so that they promised her they would be prepared, at her command, to avenge their enmity on their enemies whenever they should fall in with them. It happened unfortunately for Hugh to come with arrogant boasting and haughty pride, without considering of his treachery or criminality, to where she was in Moy Gaibhlin (in Donegal); when he had come to the place, she spoke to her friends the Scots, and told and entreated them to fulfil what they had promised; this was performed for her, for they attacked the place in which Hugh was, shooting at him with arrows and balls, until they left him dead on the spot, and there were also slain along with him the most endeared to him of his faithful people.

The son of Mac Namara of the eastern part of Clan Cuilein (barony of Tullagh, county of Clare), namely Teige, the son of Donal Riavach, son of Cumeadha, son of Donogh, son of Roderick, was ber, and 17 of them, which contained 5,394 men, were wrecked on the coasts of Ulster and Connaught, about the counties of Antrim, Donegal, Sligo, Mayo and Galway. According to Smith, in his History of Kerry, 2 of them, containing 600 men, were wrecked near the mouth of the Shannon, and 3 more, with about 800 men, were wrecked near the bays of Tralee and Dingle, on the coast of Kerry. Great numbers of the shipwrecked soldiers, in various places, were taken prisoners, and about 300 of them inhumanly put to death, being hanged and beheaded by order of the lord deputy sir Wm. Fitzwilliam. As the Spanish vessels contained much treasure, some of which fell into the hands of the natives of the country, it was claimed as the queen's prerogative, and the lord deputy Fitzwilliam, says Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, "wishing to have a finger in the pie" went to Ulster in November to look after it, to the great charge of the queen and the country; but it appears he did not succeed in getting much of the expected plunder, whereupon, says Cox, he grew so much enraged, that he imprisoned Sir Owen O'Toole, and O'Dogherty of Donegal, both of whom were well affected to the state; the former he kept in prison during his time, and the other he detained two years, until he was forced to purchase his discharge. Some of the Spaniards who were shipwrecked entered into the service of Hugh O'Neill, and it is stated by Cox and Mac Geoghegan, that one thousand of the Spaniards, under Antonio de Leva, were hospitably received and relieved by O'Rourke, lord of Leitrim; but Bingham, the governor of Connaught, and others of the queen's officers, endeavoured to compel him to give up their protection; however, O'Rourke, and Mac Sweeney of Donegal, bravely defended the Spaniards, and would not surrender them, and the Spaniards having embarked to return to their own country, the ship foundered, and they were all drowned, in sight of the harbour, off the coast of Sligo.

hanged in Galway. The son of O'Connor Roe (of Roscommon), namely, the son of Teige Oge, son of Teige Buighe, son of Cathal Roe, was also hanged in Galway.

O'Kennedy Fionn (the Fair), namely, Bryan, the son of Donal, son of Donogh, died; Anthony, the son of Donogh Oge, son of Hugh, son of Awlave, and the Giolla Dubh, son of Dermot, son of Hugh, son of Roderick O'Kennedy (in Ormond) were in contention and strife with each other about the lordship, so that the manner in which they made peace was to divide the lordship in two between them, and confer the title on Anthony.

A. D. 1589.

Maguire, i. e. Cuchonacht, the son of Cuchonacht, namely, the coarb, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, son of Thomas, died on the 17th of June; he was a lord in conferring presents on ecclesiastics, professors, learned men and poets, and distinguished for his profound learning in Latin and Irish. After the death of Maguire, namely Cuchonacht, Conor Roe, the son of Conor Maguire, considered that the lordship of the country belonged to him, in regard to seniority, but the other party were of opinion that the son of Maguire, i. e. Hugh, should be the lord after his father, so that they were in contention with each other in that manner. Hugh sent messengers to his kinsman Donal, the son of Hugh, son of Manus O'Donnell, although they had disputed before that time, entreating him to come to his aid and relief, as was customary with his ancestors, to assist the tribe of Philip, the son of Thomas Maguire. There was not of the Tirconnallians at that time a person whose aid was more thought of than that of Donal, for he was of great strength, and a leader of a battalion; and it was not heard that he had ever turned his back to his enemy in any country. The commands of those messengers were not slowly attended to by Donal, for he immediately mustered all his forces within his controul, and he sent back the messengers to Hugh, to desire him to meet them at Sciath-Gabhra-an-tSainridh (Lisnaskea, near Enniskillen, where the Maguires were inaugurated as lords of Fermanagh), as expeditiously as he could; he himself proceeded, without delay or halting, through Tuath-Luirg (barony of Lurg, in Fermanagh), along the margin of Lough Erne, until he arrived at the forementioned place. Conor Roe, with the chiefs of the upper part of Fermanagh, came the previous day to the same place, and left his notification there, i. e. Leathas (documents), in order that the title of lord might be conferred on him on the morrow. Hugh came to that appointed place, and found Donal O'Donnell before him; when Donal received intelligence that it was Conor who left the notification which we have before mentioned, he said that would profit him nothing, and that Hugh should be his father's successor, so that it was then at once his title of Flaith (prince or chief), was conferred on Hugh Maguire by Donal O'Donnell and the chiefs of his country.

Mac Mahon, i. e. Rossa, the son of Art, son of Bryan-na-Moicheirghe, son of Redmond, son of Glaisne, died; Bryan, the son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh, son of John Buighe, lord of Dartry of Oirgiall; Eiver, the son of Cu-uladh, lord of Farney, and the brother of the deceased, namely, Hugh Roe, were in contention with each other about the lordship of the country.¹

A. D. 1589.

2. Death of Mac Mahon. In 1588, according to Cox, Fynes Morrison, and Mac Geoghegan, Mac Mahon, that is Ross above-mentioned in the text, lord of Monaghan, died, who in his lifetime had surrendered into the queen's hands his territory, held under the Irish law of Tanistry, and received a re-grant of it under the broad seal of England to him and his heirs male, and for default of such to his brother Hugh Roe Mac Mahon; but Ross, dying without heirs male, his brother, Hugh Roe, came up to the council at Dublin, that he might be settled in his inheritance, hoping to be countenanced and cherished as her majesty's patentee, but he found that he could not be admitted 'till he had promised to give 600 cows, for "such" says Morrison, "and no other, are the Irish bribes." Mac Mahon, however, was imprisoned, but in a few days enlarged, with the promise that the lord deputy, sir William Fitzwilliam, would himself go to settle him in his county of Monaghan, whither his lordship took his journey shortly after, in company with Mac Mahon. "At their first arrival" says Morrison, "the gentleman was clapt in bolts, and within two days after indicted, arraigned, and executed, at his own house, all done by such officers as the lord deputy brought with him for that purpose; he was found guilty by a jury of soldiers, but no gentlemen or freeholders, and of them four English soldiers were suffered to go and come at pleasure, but the others, being Irish Kerns, were kept straight and starved 'till they found him guilty." The cause, it is said, for which he was condemned was, that about two years before he pretended a rent was due to him out of Ferney (Farney, in Monaghan), and upon that pretence he levied forces, marched into Ferney, and made a distress for the same. Mac Mahon's territory was divided between the marshal, sir Henry Bagnall, and captain Henslow, who was made seneschal of the county, and got Mac Mahon's chief house; four also of the Mac Mahons got some Elenor, the daughter of the earl of Desmond, i. e. of James, the son of John, son of Thomas, son of James, son of Gerald, who had been the wife of O'Rourke, and the wife of the son of the earl of Ormond, namely, of Edward, the son of James, son of Pierce Roe, son of James, son of Edmond, died.

The countess of the county of Clare, namely, Una, the daughter of Torlogh, the son of Murtogh, son of Donal, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Murrough-na-Raithnighe (O'Brien), the wife of the earl of Thomond, i. e. of Conor, the son of Donogh, son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, died in Great Clare.

Donal Mac Congail (or Mac Connell, called Donat Magonail in Ware), bishop of Raphoe, died on the 29th of September.

Torlogh, the son of Teige, son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige O'Brien, of Bel-Atha-an-Chomhraic (in Clare), died; and the person who there died was much lamented.

Teige-an-Dunaidh, the son of Donogh, son of Murtogh, son of Donogh, son of Murtogh, son of the Ballach, the senior representative of Tuath-na-Fearna, i. e. of Corcabaiscinn (Mac Mahon of Clare), and of the tribe of the Ballach, died; there did not exist in his time so valiant a man in his neighbourhood.

Cormac, the son of Teige, son of Dermot, son of Cormac (Mac Carthy of Cork), of Moy Laithimh, died.

Manus, the son of Con, son of Calvach, son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv O'Donnell, was killed near the river Finn, on the 20th of September, by John, the son of Manus Oge, son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv O'Donnell.

of the lands, under a yearly rent to the queen, and each of them had to pay for their shares large bribes to the deputy Fitzwilliam, according to Cox, of which they made a complaint to the council of England. Morrison says, that on Mae Mahon's execution, hearthburnings and loathings of the English government began to grow in the northern lords, and they shunned as much as they could to admit any sheriffs or any English to live among them, fearing similar practices; and he also states that Eivir Mac Colla Mac Mahon offered the lord deputy Fitzwilliam seven thousand cows to make him elief of Monaghan. Cox says, that from henceforward the Irish loathed sheriffs, as fearing that in time they might all follow the fate of Mae Mahon, and, therefore, in the great treaty near Dundalk, in January, 1595, they all desired to be exempted from garrisons, sheriffs, and other officers.

Maguire of Fermanagh.—About this period, or a few years after, Hugh Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, on learning that a sheriff was to be sent into his county, desired of the lord deputy Fitz-

Donal, the son of Owen of the Lake Mac Sweeny, the constable of Muskerry (in Cork), died; the deceased was a man of good surety, and kept an open house of hospitality, and was generally praised by the English and Irish.

The Lower Burkes, from Tyrawly westward (in Mayo), went on their guard, after having refused to be under the controul of the governor sir Richard Bingham. Master Brown, with a great number of English and Irish soldiers, proceeded by command of the governor across Bealach-an-Diotruibhe westward, to attack those Burkes; the Burkes made an attack upon them, and when Master Brown came to a close engagement, his soldiers were defeated, and he himself was beheaded, together with Donal O'Daly, a gentleman who had the command of some of the soldiers; and Redmond Oge, the son of Redmond, son of John Burke-na-Beinnue, and also a great number of the soldiers along with them. The power and pride of the Burkes increased through that victory, and they became more violent in their insurrection on account of it; the tribe of Oliver, the son of John Burke of Tyrawly, went in alliance with them, and the O'Dowds of Tireragh of the Moy; they were joined by all the Clan Donnell galloglasses; by Murrough of the Battle-axes, son of Teige, son of Murrough O'Flaherty, together with the O'Flahertys and Joyces; so that there was not one of note from the western point of Erris (in Mayo), to Traigh Eothuile (near Ballysadare in Sligo), to Machaire Luighne, to Corran (both in Sligo), and to the Plain of Connaught (in Roscommon), that did not unite in opposition to the governor (Bingham). Those insurgents continued to devastate the province of Connaught by day and by night, during the spring.

william to let him know his Eric, that he might levy the fine on his people, for that they would certainly kill the sheriff. But it appears, from Cox and Mae Geoghegan, that a sheriff was afterwards sent into Maguire's county, though Maguire alleged that he had paid 300 beeves to the lord deputy, Fitzwilliam, as a bribe to free Fermanagh from a sheriff during his time, but that, nevertheless, one captain Willis was appointed sheriff, and he kept 200 followers, soldiers, idle women and boys, who preyed and plundered the entire country. Maguire rose up in arms, routed them, and drove them all into a church, where, says Cox, he would have murdered them, but for the earl of Tyrone (Hugh O'Neill), who got their lives spared on condition that they should depart from the country. When Maguire expelled the sheriff and his followers, the lord deputy, says Morrison, sent the queen's forces to Fermanagh, took the castle of Enniskillen from Maguire, and proclaimed him a traitor.

It was at that time that two sons of Murrogh of the Battle-axes O'Flaherty, namely, Teige and Urun, and a brother's son of Murrogh, i. e. Donal, the son of Roderick O'Flaherty, went on a hostile expedition to the borders of Conmaicne and Machaire Riavach (in Galway), on Easter night precisely; there were two or three hundred Diolmuineachs (hired soldiers), on that expedition, and they began to seize on much plunder and booty throughout the country, in the early part of Easter Sunday, and the people of the country in all directions went in pursuit of them. On the night previous to that one or two companies of soldiers came privately and unperceived to guard the country, and having heard the loud report of the ordnance, and the clamour of the armed forces, on the following day they proceeded to a narrow pass, which could not be easily taken or avoided, where they lay in ambush for the Irish forces; they found Teige O'Flaherty advancing towards them, in the front of the force, and his people in close rank about him; the soldiers having fired volleys of balls at the van of the Irish force, Teige O'Flaherty, together with Urun O'Flaherty, Teige Oge, the son of Teige O'Flaherty, and a great number of his supporters of the chiefs of Joyce's Country, and of the Clan Donogh, who were about him, were killed by that discharge, and such of the Irish forces as were not slain by the first volley, returned, without running or being alarmed, and were not followed beyond that place. Edmond, the son of Murrogh of the Battle-axes O'Flaherty, who was imprisoned in Galway, was hanged in three days after Teige had been killed; and if those sons of Murrogh of the Battle-axes O'Flaherty had not fallen, in consequence of their plundering and insurrection against the sovereign of England, their death after that manner would have been a great loss.

Dermod Oge, the son of Dermod, son of Denis, son of Dermod, son of Conor, i. e. the bishop of Limerick (Cornelius O'Dea, bishop of Limerick from A. D. 1400 to 1426, see Ware's Bishops), son of Murrogh-an-Dana O'Dea, died, and was buried in Disert-Tola (Dysert O'Dea, in the barony of Inchiquin, county of Clare), at his own town in Triothead Cead Kinel Fermaic, in the south of Dalgais.

A. D. 1590

The Burcaigh Iochtaracha (the Lower Burkes or the Burkes of Mayo), and the Clan Donnell galloglasses, mustered and collected all the people they could, as we have before mentioned, in the harvest, and in the winter of this year, so that there was not one of note from Corrsliabh-na-Seaghsa (the Curlew mountains, on the borders of Roscommon and Sligo), to the western point of Iorras, and of Umhal (the baronies of Erris, Burishoole, and Murrisk, in Mayo), that did not join in that alliance.

The governor, Sir Richard Bingham, and the earl of Thomond, namely, Donogh, the son of Conor, son of Donogh O'Brien, marched with all their forces, in the first month of this year, i. e. the month of January, to attack the Burkes, and they formed a numerous and clamorous camp of Kerns at Cunga (Cong, in Mayo). The Burkes were encamped opposite them on the western side, and conferences were held between them, during a fortnight, but they could not be pacified during that time. At the end of that period the governor and the earl proceeded, with ten or twelve companies, to go across Beilgibh inwards, to visit Trawley and Erris; the Burkes marched in a parallel direction with them, and contemplated to encounter them at Bearnagh-na-Gaoithe (the Windy Gap, in the parish of Addergoole, barony of Trawley, county of Mayo); but, however, they did not do so, and the pass was let free to the governor and the earl; it was on that expedition that the foot, out from the joint, was taken off Mac William Burke. The governor returned back to Cong, and he himself, the Burkes, and Clan Donnell, made peace with each other; and they delivered their hostages into the hands of the governor, and the governor went to the town of Athlone, and the men of Connaught returned to their homes.

The governor marched with a very great force, in the month of March, to attack O'Rourke; that army was so great, that the governor sent an immense number of his captains, and of his companies, to Slieve Cairpre, at the upper end of Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), and another portion of the officers of his army proceeded to the bridge of Sligo, on the western side, towards Brefney, and those forces began to burn and devastate, to kill, and destroy all before them in the country in general, until they met each other. O'Rourke was expelled on that expedition, and he received neither shelter nor protection until he arrived in the Tuatha to Mac Sweeney-na-d'Tuath (of the Districts, in Donegal), namely Owen Oge, the son of Owen, son of Owen, son of Donal, and he remained with him to the end of this year; and such of his people as did not go into banishment came in and submitted to the governor. Donal, the son of Teige, son of Bryan O'Rourke, and Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Gall-da, were aiding the English to expel and banish O'Rourke. The country, both waste and inhabited, was under the controul of the governor, to the following festival of St. Michael, until Tiarnan Baun, the son of Bryan, son of Owen O'Rourke, and Bryan Oge-na-Samthach, the son of that O'Rourke, who had been expelled, came to the country about Michaelmas; these, and the tribes of Brefney and Muintir Eoluis (the Mac Rannalls of Leitrim), and the O'Rourkes, who were before them in the country, went in opposition to the governor, and they continued spoiling all that was under the power of the English, in every direction they went, to the end of this year. A great fortress, the like of which had not been constructed for a long time, was made by the governor, between Loch-Cc and Loch-Arbhach (Loch Kea, in Roscommon, and Loch Arrow in Sligo).

The son of O'Neill, i. e. Hugh Geimhleach, the son of John Dongaileach, son of Con Bacach, son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, was hanged by the earl of Tyrone, namely, by Hugh, the son of Feardoreha, son of Con Bacach; there was not a man of his age for a long time, of the race of Eogan, son of Niall, who was more lamented than that Hugh.

The son of O'Donnell, i. e. Donal, the son of Hugh, son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv, son of Torlogh of the Wine, began to supersede his father, after he had become feeble and helpless, and after his other son had been imprisoned in Dublin, so that Donal brought all those from the mountain westward, in Tirconnell, under his power and controul, viz. from Barnus to Drowis (from Barnusmore mountain to Bundrowes, in Leitrim), the people of Boylagh and Banagh (the O'Boyles of Boylagh, and Mac Sweeneys of Banagh). It was a great tribulation and a torment of mind to the daughter of James Mac Donnell, that Donal should have made that declaration, lest he might assume the government of Tirconnell in opposition to her son, Hugh Roe, who was then imprisoned in Dublin, whenever God might allow him to return from his incarceration, so that it was on that account she mustered all those of the Tirconnallians who were faithfully obedient to her, namely O'Dogherty and his forces; Mac Sweeney of the Districts, i. e. Owen Oge, with his force; Mac Sweeney Fanat and his forces, together with a great number of the Scots. When Donal O'Donnell received intelligence of those forces being mustered to march against him, he collected his force to meet them; those who joined with him were Mac Sweeney of Banagh, namely Donogh, the son of Maolmurry, and a party of the Clan Sweeney of Munster, together with the three sons of Owen, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, son of Torlogh, (Mac Sweeney), with their forces, and O'Boyle, i. e. Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Torlogh, with all his forces. The place where the son of O'Donnell happened to be was in the west of Tir Boghaine (Banagh), on the eastern side of Gleann. C. C. (Glencolumkille, in the barony of Banagh), with those chiefs along with him. The other party did not halt until they came to oppose them at that place, and a fierce battle was fought between them; the Scots shot forth a shower of arrows from their flexible bows, with which an immense number was pierced and wounded by them, on the 14th of September, and of those was the son of O'Donnell himself, by which he was disabled from using arms or fighting, so that he was slain there at Doire Leathan (Derrylaghan), near the harbour of Teiliond (Telen Harbour, in Donegal). Seldom ever, before that time, had his enemies been victorious, although the persons by whom he was slain had not been actually his enemies until they encountered on that occasion; and although that Donal was not the rightful heir to the patrimony, it would be no dishonour for Tirconnell to appoint him over it, had it been ceded to him. There were slain in that conflict, along with Donal, those three sons of Owen, the son of Maolmurry, son of Donogh, together with two hundred on the side of Donal.

Walter Ciotach Burke, the son of John, son of Oliver, died, after having made peace with the English.

Mac Coghlan (of King's county), i. e. John, the son of Art, son of Cormac, died; and there was not a man of his estate, of the race of Cormac Cas, whose mansions, castles, and good dwelling houses, were better arranged, or more comfortable than his; and his son, John Oge, was appointed his successor.

Maolroona, the son of Calvach, son of Donogh, son of John O'Carroll, died.

Fitz-Maurice of Kerry,¹ i. e. Thomas, the son of Edmond, son of Thomas, son of Edmond, died; he was the best purchaser of wine, horses, and goods, of any man of his rank and patrimony in the most part of Leath-Mogha at that time; and Patrick, his heir, was then in imprisonment in Dublin.

O'Loghlin (of Burren, in Clare), i. e. Anthony, the son of Malachy, son of Roderick, son of Ana, died; and his son Rossa, and his grandson Anthony, were in contention with each other about succeeding him.

Sorley Buighe, the son of Alexander, son of John Cathanach Mac Donnell, died.²

A. D. 1590.

1. Fitzmaurice of Kerry.—An account has been given at pp. 180, 528 of the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry, who were descended from Raymond le Gros, the celebrated Anglo-Norman warrior who came to Ireland with Strongbow. Thomas Fitzmaurice, above mentioned, according to Lodge's Peerage, was son of Edmond, the 10th baron of Lixnaw, in Kerry, by Una, or Winnifred, daughter of Teige or Torlogh Mac Mahon, lord of Corcahascui in Clare. After several of his brothers and relatives had been barons, he succeeded as the 16th lord of Lixnaw. When a young man he served at Milan, and other parts of Italy, under the emperors of Germany; on the death of his brother Gerald, the 15th baron, another Gerald Fitzmaurice, supposed to be the next heir male, took possession of the lordship, and held it about a year, when Joan Harman, who had been nurse to the lord Thomas, though then very old, resolved to go in search of him, and, accompanied by her daughter, took ship at Dingle, sailed to France, and, proceeding to Milan, she acquainted lord Thomas of her errand, and died on her return home. Lord Thomas came to Ireland, and after some opposition, succeeded to his title and estates in 1552, and was styled lord of Kerry, and captain of his nation. In 1581, he for some time was joined with Gerald, earl of Desmond, in the war against Elizabeth, but afterwards became reconciled to the government; he died at Lixnaw, on the 16th of December, 1590, in the 80th year of his age, and was buried in the tomb of bishop Philip Stack, in the cathedral of Ardfer, as governor John Zouch, who then kept a garrison in the abbey, refused him burial in the tomb of his ancestors. This Thomas Fitzmaurice was a man of great valour and accomplishments, and, according to Lodge, he was the handsomest man of that age, and of such great strength, that not three men could be found in Kerry able to bend his bow. His son, Patrick Fitzmaurice, by a daughter of James, earl of Desmond, succeeded as baron of Lixnaw, and joined the Munster chiefs in the war against Elizabeth; he died in 1600, and was succeeded by his son Thomas, by Jane, daughter of David Roche, lord of Fermoy. This Thomas, baron of Lixnaw, and lord of Kerry, was a commander of note in Munster in the war against Elizabeth, and joined the forces of Red Hugh O'Donnell, who came to assist the Spaniards at the siege of Kinsale.

2. The Mac Donnells of Antrim.—An account has been given at pp. 22, 417, in these notes, of the Mac Donnells of Antrim and the Hebrides, who were originally descended from the Irish race in Ulster, called Clan Colla; some of their ancestors, of the tribe of Clan Colla, having gone from Ulster in remote times, settled in Scotland, chiefly in Argyle, and the Hebrides, and, according to Lodge's Peerage on the Mac Donnells earls of Antrim, they became the most numerous and powerful clan in the Highlands of Scotland, where they were generally called Mac Donalds. In the reign of Malcolm IV., king of Scotland, in the 12th century, Somerled, Samhairle, or Sorley Mac Donnell, was Thane of Argyle, and his descendants were styled lords of the Isles or Hebrides, and lords of Cantyre, and were allied by intermarriages with the Norwegian earls of the Orkneys, Hebrides, and Isle of Man. The Mac Donnells continued for many centuries to make a conspicuous figure in the history of Scotland, as one of the most valiant and powerful clans in that country. Some chiefs of these Mac Donnells came to Ireland, in the beginning of the 13th century; the first of them mentioned in these Annals being the sons of Randal, son of Somerled, the Thane of Argyle above mentioned, and they, accompanied by Thomas Mac Uchtry, a chief from Galloway, came, in A. D. 1211, with 76 ships and powerful forces, to Derry; they plundered several parts of Derry and Donegal, and fresh forces of these Scots having arrived at various periods, they made some settlements in Antrim, and continued their piratical expeditions along the coasts of Ulster. The Mac Donnells settled chiefly in those districts called the Routes and Glynnnes, in the territory of ancient Dalriada, in Antrim, and they had their chief fortress at Dunluce. They became very powerful, and formed alliances by marriage with the Irish princes and chiefs of Ulster, as the O'Neills of Tyrone and Clannaboy, the O'Donnells of Donegal, the O'Kanes of Derry, the Mac Mahons of Monaghan, &c. The Mac Donnells carried on long and fierce contests with the Mac Quillans, powerful chiefs in Antrim, whom they at length totally vanquished in the 16th century, and seized on their lands, and their chief fortress of Dunseverick, near the Giant's Causeway. Many distinguished chieftains of the Mac Donnells are mentioned in the course of these Annals; they were celebrated commanders of galloglasses in Ulster and Connaught, and make a remarkable figure in Irish history, in the various wars and battles, from the 13th to the 17th century, and particularly in the reign of Elizabeth; they are sometimes called Clan Donnells, and by some of the English writers Mac Connells. The Mac Alustrums, or Mac Allisters, of Scotland and Ireland, were a branch of the Mac Donnells, and took their name from one of their chiefs named Alastrum, or Alexander; and as the name Sandy, or Saunders, is a contraction of Alexander, some of them have anglicised their names to Sanderson. The Mac Sheehys, according to Lodge, were also a branch of the Mac Donnells, who came from Scotland to Ireland, and they also were celebrated commanders of galloglasses, particularly in Munster, under the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond. The Mac Donnells generally fought in alliance with the Irish, as the O'Neills, O'Donnells, &c., and also along with the Burkes of Connaught, against the English, but very frequently there were fierce contests between the Mac Donnells and the Irish chiefs. The Sorley Buighe, above mentioned, was son of Alexander Mac Donnell, by a daughter of O'Kane, and Sorley makes a remarkable figure in Ulster for a period of about 20 years; he was mostly joined with the Irish chiefs in the war against Elizabeth, but he afterwards became reconciled to the government, and his son, sir Randal, was created earl of Antrim by king James I., and that title has been since held by the family of Mac Donnell. The following passage is taken from a document which has been kindly furnished by W. D. Ferguson, Esq., barrister, Dublin, a learned gentleman; it is entitled A Discourse made by Mr. Tremayne, in the reign of king James I., touching grants of lands made by queen Elizabeth to the Scots of the Glynnnes and Routes in Antrim:—"It is to be thought a very dangerous matter, for if it be granted that of all the access of the Scots is the head and maintenance of rebellion in that realm, what can be more perilous than to plant them in that place along the sea coast that is most apt and the very receptacle to receive them thither. If, therefore, they must needs be placed there, it were good they were divided of sundry septs, and not too much granted to any one; that there were many freeholders and strait covenants devised against the receiving of any number of Scots into that territory."

Owen Mac Andeaganaigh (a family name anglicised to Dean), died.

Hugh Roe O'Donnell, having been incarcerated in Dublin for three years and three months, was greatly grieved in mind at being in cruel captivity after that manner; and it was not on his own account, but on account of the dire bondage in which his country and native land, his friends and relatives, were placed, in every quarter throughout Ireland; he was also meditating in his mind on what means of escape he could find, but that was not an easy matter for him, for he was put every night into a gloomy cell in the castle, to be secured until the following morning. That castle was so situated, that it was completely surrounded with a broad and very deep trench full of water, over which was a narrow wooden bridge, directly before the door of the fortress, and a stern party of the English inside and outside about the door, strictly guarding it, so that none could go in or come out without permission; but, however, there is no guarding that an advantage may not be ultimately obtained of it. Hugh, with a number of his companions, were, in the end of winter precisely, in the beginning of night, together, before they had been put into the strong cells in which they were every night, and they took with them a very long rope, to the window which was accessible to them, by which the fugitives descended, until they alighted on the bridge which was before the door of the fortress. There was a thick iron chain attached to the door, for persons to pull it out to them in shutting it, and they thrust a strong piece of wood, as thick as filled the hand, through the chain to prevent them from coming out of the fortress, to pursue them suddenly. There was a young man of Hugh's faithful people in waiting for their escape, who met them when they came out, and had two well tempered swords under his garment, which he delivered into the hands of Hugh, who gave one of these swords to a brave warrior of the Lagenians, Art Cavenagh, who was near, and he was experienced in battle, and a subdner in conflict. As to the guards, they did not at the time notice the escape, but when they discovered it, they immediately rushed as fast as they possibly could to the door of the castle, for they hoped to encounter them in conflict; after they had come to the door, they found it impossible to open it, so that they began to call to them the people who lived in the houses opposite the door on the other side of the street, and when those came at that call, they took out the piece of wood which was in the chain, and let open the door to the people of the castle, who, along with a great party of the citizens, went in pursuit of those persons who had escaped from them; but that was of no avail to them, for they had been outside the walls of the town before they were missed, as the gates of the regal city were open to them at that time, and they had arrived at the foot of the mountain which lay before them, viz., the Slieve Roe (the Red Mountain, on the borders of Dublin and Wicklow); fear did not permit them to proceed on the common road, and they did not stop in their course until they crossed the forementioned Slieve Roe, after a fatiguing journey and flight. As they were wearied and tired, they proceeded to a thick sequestered wood, which lay before them, in which they remained till morning, when they prepared to depart, for they did not think it safe to stop in the wood, as they were in dread of being pursued; but, however, Hugh was not able to proceed with his companions, for his fair and tender feet were torn by the furze of the mountain, as his shoes had fallen off, after they were completely ripped by the wet, which they did not receive till then. It was great grief to his companions that they could not bring him any further with them, and they bade him farewell, and left their blessings with him. He sent his servant to a certain gentleman of the clans of the province of Leinster, who lived in a castle in the neighbourhood, to try if he would defend or protect him; his name was Felim O'Toole, and he was a friend of Hugh previous to that, as he thought, for he had gone to visit him at one time in the prison in which he was in Dublin, and they respectively confirmed their friendship with each other. The messenger proceeded to Felim's place, and related to him the cause of his coming, and he received him in a friendly manner, and promised he would do every good in his power for Hugh; but, however, his friends and relatives did not recommend him to conceal him, being in dread of the punishment of the English. It was afterwards discovered by those who had gone in pursuit of him, as we have before stated, that he was in the wood, and those pursuers having heard that, went in pursuit of him with their troops. As Felim was sure that he would be found, the resolution that he and his kinsmen came to was, that they themselves should take him prisoner, and bring him back to the council in the city; they accordingly did so, and when they came to Dublin, the council were rejoiced at their coming to them, and they considered it of little avail and consequence that the other hostages and prisoners had escaped from them; he was put into the same prison again, and iron fetters were bound on him as tightly as possible, and they watched and guarded him as closely as they could. His escape, after that manner, and his recapture, was generally heard of throughout the entire land of Ireland, and a great gloom came over the Irish on account of that event (See notes at A. D. 1587 and 1592).

A. D. 1591.

O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan-na-Murtha, the son of Bryan Ballach, son of Owen, son of Tiarnan, son of Teige, son of Tiarnan More, had been expelled, as before stated, into Tirconnell, to the Tuatha, (Districts), where he remained upwards of a year with Mac Sweeny, i. e. Owen Oge. He went after that to Scotland, in the hope of receiving protection or relief from the king of Scotland; a party of the queen's people, having taken him, conveyed him to England, and to London, where he remained imprisoned for some time till the following November Term; having been tried by law, he was condemned to death, and was hanged beheaded, and quartered. The death of that Bryan was one of the greatest losses the Irish sustained, for there had not lived of his family for a long time a person more eminent for bounty, good hospitality, excellence, giving rewards for laudatory poems, liberality, conviviality, mildness, circumspection, maintaining the field of battle, defending his patrimony, and protecting strangers, till his death on that occasion.¹

Murrough, the son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh O'Brien, died at Cathair Mionain, on the 25th of February, and was buried at Kilfenora (in Clare).

Margaret, the daughter of Donal, the son of Conor, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh O'Brien, the wife of Torlogh, the son of Bryan, son of Donogh Mac Mahon, died at Kill-Mec-Dubhain (Kilmacduane, in Clare), and was buried on Iniscathaidh (Inniscattery Island, near the mouth of the Shannon); and her sister Aine, the wife of Torlogh Roc, the son of Teige, son of Murrough, son of Teige Roe Mac Mahon, died.

A. D. 1591.

1. Death of O'Rourke.—The above mentioned Bryan O'Rourke, lord of West Brefney or Leitrim, was called by the Irish Brian-na-Murtha, signifying Bryan of the Bulwarks, from some fortresses he had erected during his battles with the English. He was a celebrated chieftain, distinguished for his fine person, valour, munificence, and hospitality; during a period of many years he maintained his independence, and fought various battles with the English forces, under sir Nicholas Malby and sir Richard Bingham, governors of Connaught. He was particularly remarkable in his protection of the Spaniards, who had been wrecked in the Armada, as before mentioned, at the year 1588, and this drew on him the vengeance of the governor, Bingham, who made many charges of impeachment against him, amongst others that he had caused the picture of queen Elizabeth to be tied to a horse's tail, and dragged in derision through his territory. After many conflicts with the English under Bingham, who was assisted by the earl of Clanrickard, O'Rourke's forces, and those of his ally Mac Sweeney of Donegal, were at length defeated, and, unable to maintain his position, O'Rourke went to Scotland, with the hope of raising some auxiliaries to recover his territory; but king James VI., afterwards James I. of England, who then appeared to be on friendly terms with the Irish, in violation of the rights of hospitality, says Mac Geoghegan, ordered O'Rourke to be seized, and had him sent a prisoner to England, to conciliate the favour of queen Elizabeth. O'Rourke, after being confined for some time in the Tower, was tried at Westminster, in 1591, and being condemned for treason, he was hanged and beheaded at Tyburn, displaying at his execution the most undaunted courage, firmness, and magnanimity. Bryan O'Rourke was the last prince of Brefney, for though other chiefs of note came after him, none of them was able to exercise power and authority as in ancient times; he lived at his castle of Dromahaire, in a style of great munificence, and hospitality, and his memory was long celebrated by the Irish Bards. Many distinguished chiefs of the O'Rourkes, princes and lords of West Brefney, or Leitrim, are mentioned in the course of these Annals. Teige O'Rourke, son of the above Bryan, was a commander of note in the war against Elizabeth, and, in 1599, fought with great bravery in conjunction with Red Hugh O'Donnell, and other chiefs, at the battle of the Curlew Mountains, in Roscommon, where the English forces were defeated with great loss, and their commander, sir Conyers Clifford, slain. Teige died about the year 1606, and was succeeded by his son Bryan, who, about the year 1615, being summoned to appear before the privy council at Hampton Court, the duke of Buckingham required him to submit to the plantation of his estates, that is to have them colonised by British settlers; O'Rourke refused to do so, on which he was sent to the Tower, where he was confined upwards of 30 years, during which time his estates were confiscated, and transferred to British settlers; Villiers, duke of Buckingham, and the Scottish family of Hamilton, got the principal part of O'Rourke's lands. In the great insurrection of 1641, sir Owen O'Rourke, attempting to recover the estates of his ancestors, had many engagements with the English settlers, and seized several of their castles; but by the Cromwellian confiscations, the ancient race of O'Rourke lost the remaining portion of the lands of their ancestors. At p. 76, in the note on Brefney, an account has been given of several of the Counts O'Rourke, distinguished in the military service of France, Austria, Russia and Poland.

Donogh, the son of Murrough Roe, son of Bryan, son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan of the Battle of Nenagh, died on the 8th of February.

William Burke, the son of John, son of Oliver, son of John, was killed by a gentleman of his own adherents, namely, by Alexander, the son of Hugh Buighe Mac Donnell.

The son of Mac William Burke, namely, Walter of the Blows, the son of Rickard, son of John of the Termon, son of Myler, was killed in a nocturnal attack by a party of his own near relatives and kindred, aided by some of the Clan Donnells.

O'Boyle, i. e. Torlogh Roe, the son of Niall, son of Torlogh, the most eminent of any that lived of his tribe for a long time, the supporting pillar of learned men and strangers, a man who increased the lands of the church and professors, the Guaire of his tribe in generosity and hospitality, the maintainer of the indigent and helpless, died in his own fortress, about the festival of St. Bridget, and was buried with solemnity at Donegal, in the burial place of his ancestors.

A. D. 1592.

O'Connor Roe, i. e. Teige Oge, the son of Teige Buighe, son of Cathal Roe, was hanged at the session of Roscommon, in the month of January, on account of the crimes of his sons, who were engaged in plundering and insurrection against the crown of England; and he was at that time in an aged, feeble, and blind condition, although he got his death after that manner.

Mac Dermott of Moylurg, namely Bryan, the son of Roderick, son of Teige, son of Dermod, died in the month of November, and the death of that man was the more to be lamented, as there was not the like of him of the Clan Maolroona (the tribe-name of the Mac Dermotts, princes of Moylurg, in Roscommon), to assume the government as his successor.

Mac Namara Riavach, lord of the eastern part of Clan Cuilein, namely, Donal Riavach, the son of Cúmeadhá, son of Donogh, son of Roderick, son of Mae Conchean More, died on the 11th of February; and he was a warlike, commanding, bountiful, humane man.

A gentleman of Siol Aodha (the tribe name of the Mac Namaras of Clare), died in the same month, namely, John-na-nGeimhleadh (of the Chains), Mac Namara, the son of Mahon, son of Hugh.

More, the daughter of Donogh, the son of John, son of Maolroona-na-Fesoige (of the Beard), son of Teige O'Carroll, the wife of Mae I-Brien of Ara (in Tipperary), died; she was a woman who spent her time well, and departed the world without reproach or rebuke.

Cathaleen, the daughter of Donal, the son of Fingin, son of Dermod-an-Dunaidh Mae Carthy, the wife of Teige, the son of Cormac Oge, son of Cormac, son of Teige Mae Carthy, a sensible, pious, charitable and hospitable woman, died after having gained the victory over the world and the devil.

The son of O'Meagher, i. e. John of the Glen, the son of Thomas, died.

All the Burkes in alliance with Mac William, and their adherents, went on their guard, and the governor, Sir Richard Bingham, having received intelligence of it, he proceeded into the county of Mayo, so that all the castles of the country, both perfect and dismantled, were under his controul, viz., Dun-na-Mona (Dunnamone, in the barony of Carra), Cuil-na-gCaisiol (in the barony of Kilmaine), An-Ghaoisideacht (in Carra), and Cluain-in. The Burkes attacked the governor at Cuil-na-gCaisiol, but they, on their return, sustained more loss than the governor. The governor after that sent large forces of companies of English and Irish in search of those Burkes, who were in insurrection and plundering, along the rugged-topped hills, and the bushy, close, and intricate woods; they had not been long in that search, when they returned to the governor with great booty, and a capture of prisoners, of women and men, and of a great number of cows and horses. The Burkes, after that, came and surrendered to the governor, excepting Mae-Deamhain-an-Chorrain, namely, Richard, the son of Rickard. The governor took possession of all the castles of the country for himself, by authority of the sovereign, and he left John Bingham, and companies of his own to guard them.

Red Hugh, the son of Hugh, son of Manus O'Donnell, remained in imprisonment and in chains in Dublin, after his former escape, till the winter of this year. He and his fellow prisoners,

Henry and Art, the sons of O'Neill, i. e. of John, having been together in the early part of the night, got an opportunity of the guards before they had been brought to the dining-room, and having taken off their fetters, they afterwards went to the privy, having with them a very long rope, by which the fugitives descended through the privy, until they reached the deep trench which surrounded the castle; they afterwards gained the opposite side, and mounted the side of the trench. There was a trusty servant, who was in the habit of visiting them, to whom they disclosed their intention, and he met them at that time to direct them; they then proceeded through the streets of the city indiscriminately with others, and no one took notice of them more than of any other persons, for the people of the town did not stop to make their acquaintance that time, and the gates of the city were open. They afterwards passed through every intricate and difficult place, until they arrived on the open plain of Slieve Roe (the Red Mountain, on the borders of Dublin and Wicklow), by which Hugh, in his first escape, had passed. The darkness of the night, and the swiftness of their flight, through dread of being pursued, separated the oldest of them from the others, namely, Henry O'Neill. Hugh was the youngest of them in age, although he was not so in noble deeds. They were much grieved at Henry's separation from them, but, however, they continued their progress, led on by their own man. The night was dropping snow, so that it was not easy for them to walk, for they were without clothes, or outside coats, having left their upper garments in the privy through which they had come. Art (O'Neill), became more exhausted by the hasty journey than Hugh, for it was a long time since he had been incarcerated, and he became very corpulent from the length of his residence in the prison; it was not so with Hugh, he did not exceed the age of boyhood, neither did he cease in growth, or become corpulent, and his pace and progress were quick and active. When he perceived that Art became exhausted, and that his pace was slow and tardy, he requested him to put his hand on his own shoulder, and the other hand on the shoulder of the servant, and they proceeded in that manner until they crossed the Red mountain; after which they were fatigued, and wearied, and they could not bring Art farther with them; and since they could not convey him with them, they stopped there, and stayed under the shelter of a high projecting rock, which stood before them. Having remained there, they sent the servant with word to Glenmalur (in Wicklow), where dwelt Fiacha Mac Hugh (O'Byrne), who was then at war with the English; that glen was an impregnable stronghold, and a great number of the prisoners of Dublin, when they made their escape, were in the habit of proceeding to that glen, for they considered themselves secure there until they returned to their countries. When the servant arrived at the place of Fiacha, he related to him his message, and the condition he left the persons in, who had fled from the city, and that they would not be overtaken alive unless they came to relieve them at once. Fiacha immediately commanded a number of his friends whom he could rely on to go to them, one man bearing food, another ale and mead. They accordingly proceeded, and arrived at the place where the men were; but, alas, unhappy and uncomfortable were they on their arrival, for the manner in which they were was that their bodies were covered, as it were, in beds of white hail-stone, like blankets, which were frozen about them, and congealed their thin light dresses, and their thin shirts of fine linen, to their skins and their moistened shoes and leathern coverings to their legs and feet, so that they appeared to the people who came as if they were not actually human beings, having been completely covered with the snow, for they found no life in their members, but they were as if dead; they took them up from where they lay, and requested them to take some of the food and ale, but they were not able to do so, for every drink they took they cast it up immediately, so that Art at length died, and was buried in that place. As to Hugh, he afterwards took some of the mead, and his faculties were restored after drinking it, except the use of his feet alone, for they became dead members, without feeling, having been swelled and blistered by the frost and snow. The men then carried him to the glen which we have mentioned, and he remained in a private house, in the hidden recesses of a wood, under cure, until a messenger came privately to inquire after him from his brother-in-law, the earl O'Neill. After the messenger had come to him, he prepared to depart, and it was difficult for him to go on that journey, for his feet could not be cured, so that another person should raise him on his horse, and take him between his two hands again when alighting. Fiacha sent a large troop of horse with him by night, until he should cross the river Liffey, to defend him against the guards who were looking out for him; for the English of Dublin received intelligence that Hugh was in Glenmalur, so that it was therefore they placed sentinels at the shallow fords of the river, to prevent Hugh and the prisoners who had fled along with him from crossing thence into the province of Ulster. The men who were along with Hugh were obliged to cross a difficult deep ford on the river Liffey, near the city of Dublin, which they passed unnoticed by the English, until they arrived on the plain of the fortress. He was accompanied by the persons who had on a former occasion forsaken him after his first escape, namely, Felim O'Toole and his brother, in conjunction with the troops who were escorting him to that place, and they ratified their good faith and friendship with each other; after bidding him farewell, and giving him their blessing, they then parted with him there. As to Hugh O'Donnell, he had none along with him but the one young man of the people of Hugh O'Neill who went for him to the celebrated glen, and who spoke the language of the foreigners (the English), and who was also in the habit of accompanying the earl, i. e. Hugh O'Neill, whenever he went among the English, so that he knew, and was familiar with every place through which they passed. They proceeded on their two very swift steeds, along the direct course of the roads of Meath, until they arrived on the banks of the Boyne, before morning, a short distance to the west of Drogheda; but they were in dread to go to that city, so that what they did was, to go along the bank of the river to a place where a poor fisherman usually waited, and who had a small ferrying Curach (Cot, or small boat); Hugh having gone into the Curach, the ferryman left him on the opposite bank, after he had given him his full payment; Hugh's servant having returned, took the horses with him through the city, and brought them to Hugh, on the other side of the river. They then mounted their horses, and proceeded until they were two miles from the river, where they saw a thick bushy grove before them, on the way in which they went, surrounded by a very great foss, as if it were a strongly fenced garden; there was a fine residence belonging to an excellent gentleman of the English near the wood, and he was a trusty friend of Hugh O'Neill. When they had arrived at the ramparts, they left their horses, and went into the wood within the foss, for Hugh's faithful guide was well acquainted with that place; having left Hugh there, he went into the fortress, and was well received; having obtained a private apartment for Hugh O'Donnell, he brought him with him, and he was served and entertained to his satisfaction. They remained there until the night of the following day, and their horses having been got ready for them in the beginning of the night, they proceeded across Sliabh Breagh and through Machaire Conaill (both in the county of Louth), until they arrived at Traigh-Baile-Mic-Buain (Dundalk), before morning; as the gates of the town were opened in the morning early, they resolved to pass through it, and they proceeded through it on their horses until they arrived at the other side; and they were cheerful and rejoiced for having got over all the dangers which lay before them 'till then. They then proceeded to the Fiodh (the Wood), where lived Torlogh, the son of Henry, son of Felim Roe O'Neill, to rest themselves, and there they were secure, for Torlogh was a friend and connexion of his, and he and the earl O'Neill were born of the same mother; they remained there 'till the following day, and then proceeded across Slieve Fuaid (the Few Mountains, in Armagh), and arrived at Armagh, where they remained privately that night; they went on the following day to Dungannon, where the earl, Hugh O'Neill, lived, and he was rejoiced at their arrival, and they were led to a retired apartment, without the knowledge of any excepting a few of his trusty people who were attending them, and Hugh remained there for the space of four nights, recovering himself from the fatigue of his journey and troubles, after which he prepared to depart, and took leave of the earl, who sent a troop of horse with him until he arrived at the eastern side of Lough Erne. The lord of the country was a friend of his, and a kinsman by the mother's side, namely, Hugh Maguire, for Nualadh, the daughter of Manus O'Donnell, was his mother. Maguire was rejoiced at his coming, and a boat having been brought to them, into which they went, they then rowed from thence until they arrived at a narrow creek of the lake, where they landed. A number of his faithful people having gone to meet him, they conveyed him to the castle of Ath-Seanaigh (Ballyshannon), in which were the guards of O'Donnell, his father; he remained there until all those in their neighbourhood in the country came thither to pay their respects to him. His faithful people were rejoiced at the arrival of the heir to the chieftancy, and although they owed him sincere affection on account of his family, they had motives which made him no less welcome to them, for the country up to that time had been plundered a hundred times over between the English and the Irish.¹ There were two distinguished captains, namely, captain Willis and captain Conwell, who had previous to this time come from Connaught, with two hundred soldiers, who were spoiling and plundering the country in general, so that Tirconnell, from the mountain westward, was under their control, except the castle of Ballyshannon, and the castle of Donegal, in which O'Donnell, with a few people, resided, against which, however, they could effect nothing, neither was it in their power to take it, by which they might spoil the country. The place where the English took up their quarters and residence was, in the monastery of the friars at Donegal, after those of its orders and ecclesiastics had retired to the wilds and sequestered places of the country, having fled from it through fear of being slain and destroyed. After they had been for some time in the monastery, with the few forces we have mentioned, a party of them went to the borders of the harbour, two thousand paces west of Donegal, to the town of O'Boyle, for they considered themselves secure there, as they had the hostages of the country under their controul. They were in the habit of going in twos and threes to carry off property and cattle, treasure, and booty, from all the neighbouring districts of the country, to their place in that town; they were also sending for additional troops and forces, in order that they might march across Barnus More, to prey and plunder the country on the eastern side of the mountain, as they had done in the quarter in which they were. As to Hugh O'Donnell, after he had called on his country to oppose them, when he heard of the great oppression exercised over the Tirconnallians, and the spoiling and desecrating of the monastery, he did not, however, wait their gathering, but proceeded to Donegal, in the immediate vicinity of the English; the country did not delay in coming at his call in twos and in companies, as expeditiously as they could, inasmuch as every person esteemed him. He then sent messages to the English, desiring them not to remain or dwell any longer in the church, to destroy it, and that he would not prevent them to depart in any way they pleased, except alone that they should leave after them all the plunder and property they had belonging to the country. They were so much in dread and terrified, that they did so accordingly as they were ordered, and they were thankful for escaping with their lives; and they again returned into the province of Connaught, and the friars afterwards came to the monastery. Hugh O'Donnell returned again to Ballyshannon, and procured doctors to cure his feet, but they could not cure him until he lost his toes, and he was not perfectly well to the end of the year; he was laid up in that manner with the sores of his feet, from the festival of St. Bridget to the month of April. When that oppressive period of melancholy time terminated, he considered it too long he had been confined by his ailment, and he called for the mustering and assembling of all those who were obedient to his father on the eastern side of the magnificent mountain, viz., Barnus More of Tir-Hugh, and he also mustered those on the western side of the same mountain, namely, O'Boyle and Mac Sweeney of Banagh; he was also joined by O'Donnell, his father, i.e. Hugh, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, accompanied by his spouse, namely, the daughter of James Mac Donnell, his mother. The appointed place where these chiefs

A. D. 1592.

1. The escape of O'Donnell.—An account of the capture of Red Hugh O'Donnell has been given at the year 1587, and of his escape and recapture at the year 1590; his final escape took place as above related, and Cox states that four considerable prisoners escaped out of the castle of Dublin about December, not without the privity of a great man, who was well bribed; and Leland mentions that the lord deputy Fitz-William favoured the escape of the prisoners. Cox states that, together with Red Hugh O'Donnell, two sons of Shane O'Neill made their escape, and also Philip O'Reilly, who was one of the chiefs of Cavan. Mac Geoghagan mentions that Fiach Mac Hugh O'Byrne of Wicklow, and Edward Eustace of Baltinglass, chiefly contributed to their escape.

met was at Cill-Mic-Nenain (Kilmakrennan, in Donegal), and it was there O'Donnell was usually inaugurated in the lordship over the Tirconnallians;

XI. The Bards and Brehons.—As many Bards and Brehons have been mentioned in the course of these Annals, it will be necessary to give some account of them. Bards and poets flourished in every country, from the earliest ages, and Homer, Pindar, and Anacreon, amongst the Greeks, were designated Bards, their chief themes being love and war, but the term Bard was more particularly applied to the poets of the Celtic Nations, as the Gauls, Britons, Irish, &c., though some of the Teutonic Nations, as the Germans, Saxons, and Scandinavians, also had their Bards. The office of the Bard was chiefly to compose war songs and poems in praise of men distinguished for their valour, patriotism, hospitality and other virtues, and to satirize bad men, and denounce their vices. The Roman poet Lucan thus describes the office of the Bard:—

“Vos quoque, qui fortes animas belloque pereptas
Laudibus in longum vates dimittitis ævum, Plurima securi fudistis carmina Bardi.”

Thus translated by Rowe:—

“You too, ye Bards! whom sacred raptures fire,
To chaunt your heroes to your country's lyre;
Who consecrate, in your immortal strain,
Brave patriot souls in righteous battle slain.”

Tacitus, in his Germania, gives an interesting account of the Bards of the German nations, and says, that by the recital of their battle songs, which he calls Barditus, they greatly excited the valour of their warriors, the songs being recited with furious vociferation, and a wild chorus, interrupted at intervals by the application of their bucklers to their mouths, which made the sound burst out with redoubled force. The Bards of the Scandinavians, called Skalds, were highly celebrated amongst the northern nations, Danes, Swedes, and Norwegians; and an account of them has been given at p. 459 in these notes. Amongst the Gauls the Bards were highly honoured, and accounts of them are given by Diodorus Siculus, and Strabo, who designate them Bardoï in the Greek. The Bards were highly celebrated amongst the ancient Britons, particularly in Wales; and in the works of Warton, Gray, Jones, Pennant, Evans, Owen, Davies, &c., and in Turner's Anglo-Saxons, copious accounts are given of the great Cambrian Bards, Aneurin, Taliessin, Myrddin, Meigant, Modred, Golyzan, Llywarch, Llewellyn, Hoel, &c., who sung the praises of the renowned Arthur, king of Britain, and other heroes, as Ossian, the Irish Orpheus, did the mighty deeds and fame of the Fenian warriors of Ireland at an earlier time. In Ireland the Bards were a famous order from the earliest ages amongst the Milesians, and Amergin, one of the sons of Milesius, was appointed chief Bard of the kingdom; in subsequent times, many even of the kings and princes composed poems, and attained the high honour of being enrolled amongst the Bards. In the institutions of the country the Bards held a rank equal to the princes and chief nobility; the Bards and Brehons were permitted to wear six colours in their garments, the kings wearing seven, while military commanders and various other public officers, according to their rank and dignities, wore only five, four, three, and two colours, and the common people were allowed to wear only one colour. The Bards and Brehons assisted at the inauguration of kings and princes, and had some of the highest seats appropriated to them at the banquet. The Bards attended on battle-fields, recited their war songs, and animated the champions to the contest, and they recorded the heroic actions of the warriors who fell in the conflict. They were held in high esteem, had many privileges, and extensive lands were allotted to their own use. In Sir John Davis's account of Fermanagh, in the reign of James I., he says the lands of that county were made into three great divisions, one part being the Mensal land of Maguire, another the Termons, or church lands, and the third division belonged to the chronicleers, rhymers and galloglasses. The O'Clerys, who were hereditary historians and Bards to the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell, had extensive lands, and the

to which place he likewise came. Hugh O'Donnell was accompanied thither by Mac Sweeny of Fanat, namely, Donal, the son of Torlogh, son of ruins of their castle still remain at Kilbarron, near Ballyshannon in Donegal, on the shore of the Atlantic. The word Bard is also in the Irish Bard; Ollamh, pronounced Ollav, was the name applied by the Irish to a professor, a sage, a learned man, or poet, and Ard Ollamh or High Poet, was, according to O'Brien, the designation of the chief Bard to the king, or Poet Laureate. The name Ollamh re-Dan was applied to designate a poet or professor of poetry, as the word Dan signifies a poem; the term Ollamh-re-Seanchas was applied to the chroniclers, and historians, the word Seanchas signifying a history or genealogy. The term Seanchuidhe, derived from Sean, old, was also applied to historians, antiquaries, and genealogists, hence the name was anglicised Senachies; File, in the plural Filidhe, anglicised Filea and Fileas, were also names applied to poets or Bards. The Bards became a numerous body in Ireland, at a very early period, and from their undue power in the state excited the jealousy and enmity of some of the kings and princes. In the reign of the monarch Conaire I., about the commencement of the Christian era, the Bards were proscribed and expelled from Munster and Leinster, and fled to Ulster, where they found refuge, and were protected and patronised by Concovar Mne Nessa, the celebrated king of Emania, of which event an account is given in the Dissertations of the learned Charles O'Connor. In the latter end of the sixth century, a remarkable contention arose between the Bards and Aodh, or Hugh, son of Aimmireach, monarch of Ireland, who resolved to suppress their order, which had become too powerful and dangerous to the state, and at this time, according to Keating, they were one thousand in number. A great national convention, as described at p. 439, in these notes, was held A. D. 590 at Dromceat in Derry, to regulate the disputes between the monarch and the Bards, to which assembly St. Columkille came from Iona in the Hebrides, and having advocated the cause of the Bards, he adjusted the contention, thus preventing the order from being abolished, and advising their continuance, under proper regulations, as an important national institution. In the beginning of the 17th century, a remarkable literary contention arose between the Bards of Leath-Cuin, or Meath, Ulster and Connaught, and those of Leath-Moghla, or Leinster and Munster, of which a full and very interesting account is given at the year 1600, in O'Reilly's Irish Writers. This curious collection of poems is entitled Iomarbhaidh-na-n-Eigeas, or the Contention of the Learned; there are copies of it in various libraries, and it would form an interesting work if translated and published. The Bards of Ireland were for many centuries proscribed and persecuted, and great numbers of them put to death by the English government, and many penalties were enacted against them by the parliaments, as in the statute of Kilkenny, &c. Bardism and Brehonism, like many other offices in Ireland, were hereditary in certain families, each of the kings, princes and chiefs having his own Bards and Brehons. Accounts of the chief Bards from the earliest ages, are to be found in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, and throughout the Annals of the Four Masters, a great number of eminent Bards, historians and Brehons have been recorded. The following were the chief Bardic families in Ireland, and many of them were eminent historians:—The O'Clerys of Donegal, the celebrated authors of the Annals of the Four Masters, were hereditary Bards and historians to the O'Donnells. The Mac Wards were also distinguished Bards and historians in Donegal and Tyrone to the O'Donnells and O'Neills. The Mac Connidhes, anglicised Mac Conways and Mac Conveys, and the O'Gnives, were Bards to the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone and lords of Clanaboy. The O'Hoseys were Bards to the Maguires of Fermanagh, and the Mac Mahons of Monaghan. The O'Donnells were poets in Tyrone and Monaghan. The O'Dalys, O'Mulligans, and O'Farrells of Cavan, were Bards and historians to the O'Reillys. The O'Cuircens were Bards and historiographers of Brefney, under the O'Rourkes. The O'Maolconrys or O'Conroys, were the hereditary Bards and historians to the O'Conors, kings of Connaught. The Mac Fibrises were famous Bards and historians in North Roderick, and Mac Sweeny of the Districts, i. e. Owen Oge, the son of Owen; there were some discontented persons of the Tirconnallians who Connaught. The O'Duigenans of Kilronan, were Bards and historians to the Mac Dermotts of Roscommon, and Mac Donoghs of Sligo. The O'Dugans were Bards and historians to the O'Kellys of Galway and Roscommon. The O'Dalys were celebrated Bardic families in Connaught, Meath, Leinster and Munster. The O'Higgins and O'CoFFEys were eminent Bards in Westmeath and in Connaught. The O'Dunns, O'Dalys, and Mac Keoghs, were the chief Bards and historians of Leinster, under the Mac Murroghs, kings of Leinster, and to various princes and chiefs in that province. The Mac Craibhs, O'Dalys, O'Dineens, and O'Keefes, were the chief poets in Desmond, to the Mac Carthys, O'Donoghues, O'Sullivan, and other great families, and to the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond. The Mac Craibhs, Mac Bruodins, Mac Curtins, and Mac Gowans, were the Bards and historians of Thomond, to the O'Briens, Mac Namaras, Mac Mahons, O'Loghlins, and other great families of Clare and Limerick.

In Music the ancient Irish were highly celebrated, and it is stated in Hammer's Chronicle, p. 197, that in the latter end of the eleventh century, about A.D. 1098, Griffith ap Conan, prince of Wales, who had resided a long time in Ireland, brought over with him to Wales "divers cunning musicians, who devised in manner all the instrumental music upon the Harp and Crowth that is there used, and made laws of minstrelsy to retain the musicians in due order;" thus it appears that the famous Welsh Bards were indebted for their knowledge of the harp chiefly to the Irish. Giraldus Cambrensis, a Welshman, and a learned ecclesiastic, who came to Ireland with the English in the latter end of the 12th century, in the reign of king John, extols the skill of the Irish in music, and says, in a passage too long to be here quoted, that in his time they excelled in music and minstrelsy all the European nations. The Irish, in former ages, were the most famous harpers in Europe, and continued eminent in the art even down to modern times. Torlogh O'Carolan, the last and greatest of the Irish Bards, a celebrated harper and composer, died in the year 1738, in the 68th year of his age, at Alderford, in Roscommon, the residence of his great patron Mac Dermott Roe, and was buried in the old church of Kilronan. There were many other eminent Bards, Harpers, and musical composers in Ireland, in the 18th century, as Cormac Comman, Thomas O'Connell, and his brother William, Roger and Echlin O'Kane, Cahir Mac Cabe, Miles O'Reilly, Charles Fanning, Edward Mac Dermott Roe, Hugh Higgin, Patrick Kerr, Patrick Moyne, Arthur O'Neill, and others, all in Ulster and Connaught. In Meath and Leinster, O'Carroll, Cruise, Murphy, and Empson, were distinguished harpers, and Shane Clarach Mac Donnell, in Munster, was an eminent Bard. Interesting accounts of the Irish minstrels and Bards are given in the works of Walker, Beauford, Miss Brooke, Ledwich, Bunting, Hardiman, &c.

The Brehons.—Bardism and Brehonism, as well as Druidism, the religious system of the Celtic nations, Gauls, Britons and Irish, prevailed in Ireland from the earliest ages. After the introduction of Christianity, the Druids or Pagan priests became extinct, but the Bards and Brehons continued in the Christian as well as in the Pagan times. It appears probable that Brehonism was the Law system of the other Celtic nations, and that it prevailed amongst the Gauls and Britons, who were Celts, as well as amongst the Irish. In Cæsar's Commentaries it is stated that amongst the Edui, one of the nations of Gaul, the title of the chief magistrate or judge was Vergobretus, and that he was annually chosen, and had the power of life and death. The term Brehon, in Irish Breith-camh, signifies a judge, and O'Brien, in the preface to his Irish Dictionary, showing the analogy between the Irish language and that of the Gauls, both of which were Celtic tongues, considers that the term which Cæsar latinised Vergobretus, was in the Gaulish or Celtic Fear-go-Breith, signifying the Man of Judgement, or a Judge, and it has the same signification in the Irish from Fear, a man, go, of or with, and Breith, judgment, therefore it appears the Vergobretus was the chief Brehon of Gaul. The Brehons were the judges and professors of the law, and in ancient times delivered their judgments, and proclaimed the laws to the chiefs and people assembled on the hills and raths on public occasions, as at the Conventions of Tara, and other great assemblies. In the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor, and in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, accounts are given of many famous Brehons and chief judges who flourished from the first to the eighth century, as Sean, Moran, Modan, Conla, Fithil, Fachtna, Sencha, the three brothers named Burachans or O'Burechans, &c.; these eminent men formed and perfected a great code of laws, which, from their spirit of equity, were designated Breithe Neimhidh, signifying Celestial Judgments. The most renowned of these Brehons for the justice of his judgments was Moran, son of Cairbre-Ceann-Cait, king of Ireland in the first century, and he is represented in his office of chief judge of the kingdom, as wearing on his neck a golden ornament called Iodhan Morain, or Moran's collar, which is described in Vallancy's Collectanea, and it was fancifully said to press closely on the neck of the wearer, and almost choke him, if he attempted to pronounce an unjust judgment. The Brehons, like the Bards, presided at the inauguration of kings, princes, and chiefs, and, as the judges and expounders of the laws, had great power and privileges in the State, and extensive lands were allotted for their own use. Each of the Irish princes and chiefs of note had his own Brehons, and the office, like that of the Bards, as before-mentioned, was hereditary in certain families. Many celebrated Brehons are recorded in the course of those Annals, and amongst the chief Brehon families were the following: The Mac Egans, hereditary Brehons in Connaught, in Leinster, and in Ormond, The O'Dorans, Brehons to the Mac Murroghs, kings of Leinster; the Mac Clancys of Clare, Brehons to the O'Briens, kings of Thomond, to the Fitzgeralds, earls of Desmond, and other great families in Munster. The O'Hagans of Tullaghogue, in Tyrone, Brehons to the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone. The O'Breslins of Donegal, Brehons to the O'Donnells, and to the Maguires, lords of Fermanagh. In the Tracts of Sir John Davis an interesting account is given of O'Breslin, the Brehon to Maguire; Sir John, who was attorney-general to king James I., having proceeded to various parts of Ulster about the year 1607, together with the judges and chancellor, to hold assizes, on coming to Fermanagh they required to know the tenure by which Maguire held his lands, and having sent for the Brehon O'Breslin, who was a very feeble old man, he came to the camp, and the judges having demanded his Roll, he at first refused to shew it, but at length, on the lord chancellor taking an oath that he would return it safe, the old Brehon drew the roll out of his bosom, and gave it to the chancellor. The Irish MS. was well written, and, having been translated for the judges, it was found to contain an account of the rents and tributes paid to Maguire, which consisted of cattle, corn, provisions, hogs, meal, butter, &c.; but Davis says he lost the copy of the roll at Dublin.

The Irish Pentarchy and Laws of Tanistry.—The system of Brehon Laws relating to the tenure of lands, election of chiefs, and other regulations, was termed Tanistry; the word in Irish is Tanaisteacht, and, according to O'Brien, is derived from the Irish or Celtic Tan, a Territory, or, according to others, from Tanaiste, the second in command or seniority. O'Brien and others derive many names of countries terminating in tan, from the Celtic, as Britan or Britain; Aquitain in Gaul; Lusitan or Lusitania, the ancient name of Portugal; Mauritan or Mauritania, the land of the Moors; Arabistan, the land of the Arabs; Turkistan, or the land of the Turks; Kurdistan, or the land of the Kurds; Farsistan, Luristan, &c., in Persia; Caffristan, and Afghanistan, or the land of the Caffres and Afghans; Hindoostan, or the land of the Hindoos, &c. A great affinity between the Celtic and Sanscrit languages has been shown by many etymologists, and the word Sanscrit itself has by some been derived from the Celtic Seanscriobhtha, which signifies old writings, and has the same signification in the Irish; and the name is considered to have originated from the Sanscrit being one of the most ancient of languages. Tanist, in Irish Tanaiste, was the term applied to the successor elect, or heir apparent of a Manus, son of Hugh Duv; O'Doherty, namely, John Oge, the son of John, son of Felim, son of Conor Carraeh, chief of the Trioehad Ced (barony), of Inis Owen, and a number of the Mae Sweenys who had left their own country, and dwelt along the banks of Lough Foyle; and they were leaders prince, lord, or chief, this successor or Tanist being elected during the lifetime of the lord or chief, and succeeded immediately on his death. The word according to some, may be derived from Tanaiste, signifying a second in command, or, according to others, from Tan, a territory, or Tanas, a dominion or lordship; and it is considered that the Anglo-Saxon term Thane, which meant a lord, was derived from the same source. Rioghdamhna.—With respect to the provincial kings and monarchs, the heir apparent, or presumptive, was styled Rioghdamhna, a name derived from Righ, a king, and damhna a material, hence Roydamna signified a person fit or eligible to be a king. Righ, or king, was the term applied to each of the five provincial kings of Meath, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster and Munster; and Ard-Righ or High King was the designation of the monarch, or supreme sovereign. This epithet Righ was also applied to a prince, and of these princes there were in Ireland about 30, of whom an account has been given at p. 551; and each of their principalities comprised a territory, varying in extent from 2 or 3 baronies to a county, and sometimes 2 or 3 counties. These princes composed the first class of the Irish nobility, and held a rank equal to that of Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, and Earls, in England and other countries. Tiarna or Tighearna.—The second class of the Milesian nobility may be designated lords, the term in Irish being Tiarna, or Tighearna, which O'Brien derives from Tir, a country or territory, hence signifying the possessor of a territory; each of these lords possessed a territory equal in extent to a harony, or sometimes two baronies, and held a rank equal to that of barons, and there were about 200 of them in Ireland. Taoiseach or Toiseach. The third class of the old Irish aristocracy were called chiefs, and the term in Irish was Taoiseach, derived from Tus, first or foremost, hence signifying the chief leader or head man of the clan; these chiefs held each of them a territory, varying in extent from a parish to two parishes, or more, or sometimes half a barony, and comprising from about ten to thirty thousand acres. These chiefs were in number 600 or more, all heads of clans, possessed considerable power in the state, and held a rank equal to that of the principal gentry and great landed proprietors of modern times, and might be considered of the same rank as knights and representatives for counties. The terms Tiarna, Flaith, and Triath, were also often applied by the Irish writers to designate princes, lords, and chiefs of note. Ceann, pronounced Kan, signified a head chief or leader, and in the Eastern languages the term Khan, applied to head chiefs, is probably derived from the Celtic. Bruighaidhe, derived from Bruighe, which signifies a farm, or land, was the name applied to the head farmers, who held large farms under the chiefs, and these farmers were very numerous and wealthy, possessing great flocks, much cattle and corn, &c.

Election of Kings, Princes, and Chiefs.—Under the laws of Tanistry the kings, princes, lords, and chiefs, were elective, and it appears that the elective system, and government by chiefs and clans, prevailed amongst all the Celtic nations, as the Gauls, Britons, Irish, &c., while the principle of hereditary succession, and law of primogeniture prevailed amongst the Teutonic nations, as the Germans, Franks, Saxons, Scandinavians, &c.; and on the death of their kings and nobles, the eldest son or heir generally succeeded, and thus preserving the crown, and honours of nobility, in one direct line, gave greater permanency to their institutions. Some of the Slavonic nations, as, for instance, the Poles, adopted, like the Celts, the elective principle in the choice of their kings, which led to ruinous contests for the crown on the death of each sovereign, and ultimately caused the downfall of Poland. Ireland, as before stated, was divided into five kingdoms, and each of the kings of this Pentarchy was considered eligible to the crown, and to become Ard-righ, or monarch, and though the throne was occupied exclusively for a period of 600 years, from the 5th to the 11th century, by the different branches of the race of Hy Niall, namely, the ancestors of the O'Neills and O'Donnells of Ulster, and of the O'Melaghlines of Meath, who agreed to an alternate succession amongst themselves, yet, not fulfilling these terms, they had many fierce contests for the monarchy. The five royal families afterwards acknowledged as heirs to the throne were the O'Neills, kings of Ulster, the O'Melaghlines, kings of Meath, the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, the O'Briens, kings of Munster, and the Mac Murroghs, kings of Leinster. All these provincial kings, during the 11th and 12th centuries, as before explained, carried on fierce contests for the crown, which were continued even long after the English invasion. On the death of a king, prince, or chief, his son sometimes succeeded, provided he was of age, for minors were not eligible, but in general a brother, uncle, or some other senior head of the family or clan, or sometimes a nephew, was chosen, and not the son of the deceased; the legitimate successor was often set aside by other competitors, and the candidate who had most influence, popularity, or military force to support him, carried his election by strong hand, and assumed authority by right of the sword. The law of alternate succession amongst the different chiefs of a clan was often adopted, each taking the lordship in turn, but when this peaceable compact was not fulfilled, the country was laid waste by contending princes and chiefs, and two rulers were often elected in opposition to each other, by the Irish themselves, and a rival candidate was frequently set up and supported by the influence of the English. These circumstances led to endless anarchy, confusion, and conflicts, throughout the country, and the kings, princes and chiefs, being almost always in contention with each other as to their election, the entire country presented a scene of incessant discord. The election and inauguration of kings, princes and chiefs, took place in the open air, on hills, Rathes, and remarkable localities, at great assemblies, attended by the chiefs, clans, Clergy, Bards, and Brehons. The senior and worthiest candidate, when there was no contest, was generally preferred, and the Tanist, or Roydamna, peaceably succeeded, unless disqualified by age, infirmity, or some moral or physical defect; in the choice of their kings the Irish were very exact, for the candidate, if lame, blind of an eye, or labouring under any other particular physical defect, was rejected. Eric.—Under the Brehon laws, various crimes were compounded for by a fine termed Eric, and this mostly consisted of cattle reckoned by Cumhals, each Cumhal being three cows, and these *Eric*s varied from 3 to 300, and sometimes even a thousand cows, or more, exacted as an Eric for homicides, robberies, and other crimes. The practice of paying only a certain fine for murder, manslaughter, and other crimes, also prevailed amongst various ancient nations, as the Greeks, Romans, Gauls, Germans, Franks, Saxons, and ancient Britons, as well as amongst the Irish; and it appears that criminals did not always get off on paying an Eric, for instances are recorded in various parts of these Annals of malefactors being mutilated, hanged, and beheaded by order of the Irish chiefs, for murders, sacrilege, and other crimes.

Gavelkind and ancient Tenures.—This term, according to Coke, originated from the words Gave-all-kinde, but in the Celtic, or Irish, according to O'Brien, it is Gabhail-Cine, pronounced Gaval-kine, and appears to be derived from Gabhail, a taking, or share, and cine, a kindred or tribe, thus signifying the share of a kindred. This ancient tenure, by which lands were equally divided amongst the different members of a family, prevailed amongst the Celts in Britain and in Ireland, and was also adopted amongst the Anglo-Saxons, and is still continued in Kent. The English Gavelkind differed from the Irish, for in Ireland the lands were divided only amongst the sons of a family, and the illegitimate as well as legitimate got a share, while all the females were excluded, and got no lands but a dowry, or marriage portion, in cattle, goods, money, &c. On the deficiency of sons, the lands of the Irish chiefs were gavelled amongst the males next of kin, but the chiefs themselves, and the Tanists, had certain Mensal lands, which were hereditary, and appropriated for their support, and were never subject to Gavelkind. With regard to the rights of property, the tribe or clan had an allodial and original right to the tribe lands, and could not be deprived of them; but different persons held them by turns, and paid tribute or rents to in battle to Calvach O'Donnell and to his tribe after him; there were also great numbers of the O'Gallaghers, who did not come there, through enmity and malice like the others. O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh, the son of Manus, and those chiefs who came to meet him, held a council, and the resolution the chief. Sir John Davis states, in his Tracts, "that by the law of Tanistry the chieftains of every country, and the chief of every sept, had no hereditary estate in their lands, but merely held them for life, and that the inheritance rested in no man; and when the chieftains died, their sons, or next heirs, did not succeed them, but their Tanists, who were elective, and mostly purchased their election by strong hand; when any one of the sept or tribe died, his portion was not divided among his sons, but the chief of the sept made a new partition of all the lands belonging to the sept, and gave every one a share according to his seniority." Davis ascribes the violent contentions of the Irish chiefs to this uncertainty of tenure, and the constant changes and partition of lands. In Ware's Antiquities an account is given of the laws of Tanistry, and the following instance affords an illustration of the mode of tenure. The chiefs mentioned were the O'Callaghans of Cork, who had extensive possessions in that county, and an account of them has been already given in the note on Desmond. By an Inquisition taken at Mallow, on the 25th of October, 1594, before sir Thomas Norris, Vice-President of Munster, William Saxey, and James Gould, Esqrs., chief and second justices of the said province, under a commission from the lord deputy and council, it was found, among other things, "that Conoghor (Conor, or Cornelius), O'Callaghan, alias the O'Callaghan, was and is seized of several large territories in the Inquisition recited, in his Demesne, as lord and chieftain of Poble-Callaghan, by the Irish custom time out of mind used; that as O'Callaghan, aforesaid, is Lord of the said country, so there is a Tanist, by the custom of the said country, who is Teige O'Callaghan, and the said Teige is seized as Tanist by the said custom of several Plough-lands in the Inquisition mentioned; which also finds that the custom is, further, that every kinsman of the O'Callaghan had a parcel of land to live upon, and yet that no Estate passed thereby, but that the Lord, who was then Conor O'Callaghan, and the O'Callaghan for the time being, by custom time out of mind, may remove the said kinsman to other lands; and the Inquisition further finds that O'Callaghan, the son of Dermot, Torlogh O'Callaghan, Teige Mac Cahir O'Callaghan, Donogh Mac Thomas O'Callaghan, Conor Genkagh O'Callaghan, Dermot Baue O'Callaghan, and Shane Mac Teige O'Callaghan, were seized of several Plough-lands according to the said custom, subject nevertheless to certain seigniories and duties, payable to the O'Callaghan, and that they were removable by him to other lands at his pleasure." From this it appears that those who held lands under the tenure of Tanistry were a sort of tenants at will; but if the chief removed any of them, he was bound to provide for them other lands on the tribe territory, which must always continue in possession of the clan. Many of the great Anglo-Irish families, particularly the Fitzgeralds of Munster, and the Burkes of Connaught, adopted the Irish language, manners, and customs, and the laws of Tanistry; but by the Statute of Kilkenny and other Acts, such practices were punished as treason or felony. The laws of Tanistry and Gavelkind, notwithstanding many penal enactments, continued to be used in Ireland down to the reign of James I., when they were abolished by Act of Parliament. It may be stated that the Eric, or fine for homicide, &c., under the Brehon laws, was paid to the father, brother, wife, or other relatives of the person killed or injured; and, according to Ware, the Brehon had for his fee the eleventh part of the fine. Amongst the Anglo-Saxons, by the laws of king Athelstan, according to Blackstone, a fine denominated Weregild was paid for homicide, and this fine varied according to the rank of the person slain, from a king to a peasant. The Weregild for killing a Coerl, that is a churl or peasant, was 266 Thrysmas, and even the killing of a king might be compounded for by a fine of thirty thousand Thrysmas, each Thryma being equal to about a shilling in modern times; the Weregild for a subject was paid to the relatives of the person slain, but that for the death of a king was payable, one half to the public, and the other to the royal family. It appears the Brehon laws, though very defective in many points, were founded in a spirit of mildness and equity, and might prove advantageous if properly administered. The learned Charles O'Connor, in his Dissertations, says of the laws administered in Ireland during the English period, "during these times of desolation, from Henry II. to Elizabeth, the manners, customs, and condition of the Irish proceeded from bad to worse; their own ancient laws were for the most part useless, hurtful, or impracticable, and they were thrown out of the protection of those of England. Political art, feeble in planning, and lazy in executing the good of society, is generally successful in undertakings for its destruction. The whole of this art, for 350 years, in this kingdom, was exhausted in schemes for oppressing the natives, without remorse or mercy." Sir John Davis in his Tracts, p. 227, says "there is no nation of people under the sun that doth love equal and impartial justice better than the Irish, or will rest better satisfied with the execution thereof, although it be against themselves, so as they may have the protection and benefit of the law when upon just cause they do desire it." Lord Coke says in his Institutes, Book IV., 349, "I have been informed by many of those that have judicial places in Ireland, and know partly by my own knowledge, that there is no nation of the Christian world that are greater lovers of justice than the Irish, which virtue must of course be accompanied by many others."

Hereditary officers.—It has been shown that the office of Bards and Brehons was hereditary in certain families, and so were various other offices, as those of physicians, military commanders, standard-bearers, &c., thus, for instance, the O'Fickeys and O'Callaghans were hereditary physicians in Munster; the O'Cassids were the physicians of the Maguires, lords of Fermanagh; the O'Dunleveys were physicians in Donegal, and the O'Shields in Westmeath. The O'Hanlons, chiefs in Armagh, were hereditary standard-bearers to the kings of Ulster. The Mac Sweeneys of Donegal; the Mac Donnells and Mac Sheehys of Antrim, and the Mac Cabes of Breffney, or Cavan, were all famous commanders of galloglasses in Ulster, under the O'Neills, O'Donnells, O'Reillys, Maguires, &c.; and all these fighting tribes were men of great strength and valour, and were also often employed as galloglasses under the Burkes of Connaught, the Fitzgeralds, earls of Kildare and Desmond, in Leinster and Munster, and under the O'Briens, Mac Carthys, and other great families in Munster. The Mac Dermotts, lords of Moylurg, in Roscommon, were hereditary marshals of Connaught, and the Mac Namaras of Clare were marshals of Thomond. The O'Malleys of Mayo, and the O'Flahertys of Galway, were admirals of Connaught; and the O'Briens of Aran, in Galway, were admirals on that coast; the O'Falveys and O'Driscolls were admirals of Desmond. The O'Keeffes, O'Riordans, O'Sullivan, and O'Mahonys, of Cork and Kerry, were also military commanders of note in Munster. The O'Moores, lords of Leix, were in ancient times the marshals and chief military commanders of Leinster; the O'Molloys, of King's county, were standard-bearers of Leinster; and the Mac Geoghegans were marshals of Meath. The preceding account of Brehonism and Tanistry has been collected from the Essay on the Brehon Laws, by Edward O'Reilly, the Annals of the Four Masters, the Works of Ware and Vallancy, Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, the Tracts of sir John Davis, Spenser's View of Ireland, O'Flaherty's Ogygia, the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor, and other sources. It may be mentioned that there are still preserved, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, large collections of Irish manuscripts on the Brehon Laws, and there is a valuable glossary on these laws contained in the ancient work called the Book of Ballymote.

Ancient Literature of Ulster and Meath.—In the course of these notes, at pp. 100, 133, some account has been given of the ancient literature of Connaught; and at pp. 155, 181, 203, of the ancient literature of Munster. The chief accounts of ancient Irish literature are given in Ware's Works, by Walter Harris; in Bishop Nicholson's Irish Historical Library; in Doctor O'Connor's Reminiscences of the Irish Manuscripts, and in his Catalogue of the Irish Manuscripts, in the Duke of Buckingham's library at Stowe; in that O'Donnell came to, as he was aware of his infirmity and great age, was to give the lordship to his son, and to nominate him the O'Donnell, which resolution was approved of by all in general, and which was accordingly done, for O'Firghil the Airchindeach (Archdeacon), was sent for, who inaugu-

O'Reilly's Irish Writers; in the Works of Ussher, and in Lanigan's and Brennan's Ecclesiastical Histories; some accounts of distinguished Irish writers are also given in various Biographical Dictionaries. There are still existing vast collections of ancient and valuable Irish MSS. in various libraries in Ireland, as those of Trinity College, Dublin, and of the Royal Irish Academy; also in many private libraries, particularly in that of Sir William Betham. In various libraries in England there are great collections of Irish MSS., as in those of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, of the British Museum, and of Lambeth in London, and in the library of the Duke of Buckingham, at Stowe, there is an immense and most valuable collection. In the libraries on the Continent there are also collections of Irish MSS., particularly at Rome, Paris, and Louvain, and in the libraries of Spain and Portugal, and it is said that there were Irish MSS. in the Royal Library at Copenhagen, which were carried off by the Danes from Ireland, in the 10th and 11th centuries. A vast number of Irish MSS. were destroyed, particularly during the wars of Elizabeth and Cromwell; Webb, in his Analysis of the Antiquities of Ireland, says, "it was, 'till the time of James I., the object of government to discover and destroy all remains of the literature of the Irish, in order the more fully to eradicate from their minds every trace of their ancient independence."

In the Pagan times, many works of note are recorded, and, according to Charles O'Connor, it is stated by Duaid Mae Firis, the learned antiquary of Leacan, that St. Patrick burned no less than 180 volumes of the Books of the Druids at Tara. As Tara was in the early ages the seat of the Irish monarchy, there were many of the chief Bards consequently connected with Meath, and an account of various eminent Bards who flourished in Meath and Ulster in the Pagan times, is given in O'Reilly's Writers. The most celebrated of these were Adhna, Athairne, Forehern, Ferecirtne, and Neide, all of whom flourished about the beginning of the Christian era, at the Court of Emania, under Concovar Mae Neasa, the celebrated king of Ulster. Oisín, or Ossinn, in the third century, was one of the most celebrated of the Irish Bards, and many poems attributed to him are still extant; some of the Ossianic poems have been translated, but many remain in manuscript, and it is to be observed, that they are very different from Ossian's Poems published by Mac Pherson, who claimed the Irish Bard as a native of Scotland; but Mac Pherson's Ossianic Poems, though containing much poetical beauty, are chiefly fictions of his own.

The Psalter of Tara was a record of the chief events in Ireland, from the most remote times, compiled by order of the illustrious king Cormac, in the 3rd century, and from this was chiefly composed, in the latter end of the 9th century, by Cormac Mac Culenan, archbishop of Cashel, the great work called the Psalter of Cashel, of which an account has been given at p. 204 in these notes.

Bards. Amongst the most eminent Bards mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, in Meath and Ulster, from the 5th to the 12th century, are the following, of whose works he gives copious accounts: Torna Eigeas, or Torna the Learned, chief Bard to king Niall of the Nine Hostages in the 5th century; Eochaidh Eigeas, called also Dallan Forgaill, and Amergin, in the 6th century; Maolmura of Fathian, and Flaun Mae Lonan, in the 9th century; this Flaun Mae Lonan was called "the Virgil of the Milesian race." In the 10th century flourished Cormac mac Eigens; Cinaoth O'Hnrtiginn, and Eochy O'Flinn, who were chief Bards and historians in Meath and Ulster, and are reckoned amongst the most famous of the ancient historians. In the 11th century Erard Mae Coisi; Cuan O'Lochain; Colman O'Seasnain; Flaun of Monasterbooyce, and Giolla Caomhain, were famous poets and historians in Meath and Ulster; and in the 12th century Giolla Moduda O'Cassidy, abbot of Ardbraccan in Meath, and a native of Fermanagh, educated in Devenish, was a celebrated poet and historian, and wrote a valuable chronological poem on the Christian kings of Ireland, which is given in the 1st volume of O'Connor's Rev. Lib. Scriptores.

There are many of the works of all those Bards and historians extant, and they are enumerated in O'Reilly's Irish Writers. In ancient times there were, in the kingdoms of Meath and Ulster, now constituting the Archdiocese of Armagh, many celebrated colleges and monasteries, seats of learning and religion, as those of Clonmacnois, Clonard, Fore, Trin, Ardbraccan, Kells, and Slane, in Meath; Drogheda and Monasterbooyce, in Louth; Armagh and Downpatrick; Bangor and Newry, in Down; the abbey of Derry and Donegal; Clogher, in Tyrone; Clones, in Monaghan; Devenish, in Fermanagh, and Dromlane in Cavan.

The Book of Rights, called in Irish Leabhar-na-gCeart, was first written in the 5th century by St. Beinín, or Benignus, the successor of St. Patrick, as archbishop of Armagh; but the work was afterwards enlarged, with many additions made by other writers to the 12th century. It gives an account of the Rights, Revenues, and Tributes, of the monarchs, provincial kings and princes; parts of this work have been translated and published in Vallanney's Collectanea; but if the whole was published, with the necessary annotations, it would form a very valuable record of ancient laws and regulations in Ireland. Copies of it are in the libraries of Trinity College, and of the Royal Irish Academy, and also in the library of Sir William Betham; and a translation of it into English has been made by the translator of these Annals.

Books of Prophecies.—There are still extant various ancient Irish MSS. containing prophecies, some in metre and others in prose; they were composed by St. Cailín, bishop of Down, or Abbot of Fenagh, and Bee Mae De of Oirgiall, in the 5th century; by St. Columkille in the 6th, and by SS. Bracean and Ultan, abbots of Ardbraccan, in the 7th century. Another celebrated prophet, St. Moling, bishop of Ferns, flourished in the 7th century; accounts of all these saints and prophets, and their works, are given in O'Reilly's Writers, and in Lanigan.

The Books of Armagh and Kells.—The Book of Armagh, a MSS. of the 7th century, on vellum, in Irish and Latin, contains a Life of St. Patrick, and his Confession, or a sketch of his Life written by himself; also a Life of St. Martin of Tours; a copy of the Gospels, and other matters. This Book is mentioned by St. Bernard, in his Life of St. Malachy, archbishop of Armagh; it was, as a precious relic, preserved for ages in a silver shrine, which was lost; and in modern times it was contained in a case of leather, of elegant workmanship. This venerable Book was kept for many centuries in the family of Mae Moyre, near Armagh, who were specially appointed for its stewardship; but, about the year 1680, it was taken to London by Florence Mae Moyre, who being in great poverty, sold it for £5 to a Mr. Brownlow, and it is still in the possession of the Rev. Mr. Brownlow of Dublin. An account of the Book of Armagh is given by Ware, Ussher, and Dr. O'Connor, and copious extracts from it have been translated and published in that learned work, the Irish Antiquarian Researches, by Sir William Betham. The Book of Kells, considered to have been written by St. Columkille, in the 6th century, was preserved for many ages at the Columbian monastery of Kells, in Meath, and is now in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. It contains a manuscript of the four gospels, and is illuminated with decorations of surpassing beauty.

St. Columkille, abbot of Iona, in the Hebrides, and apostle of the Scots and Picts, in the latter end of the 6th century, and SS. Adamnan and Cumuian, abbots of Iona in the latter end of the 7th century, all natives of Tiroconnell, or Donegal, and of the race of Hy Niall, were amongst the most eminent and learned ecclesiastics in Europe in those ages, and accounts of their works are given by Lanigan and O'Reilly. Probus, a learned lecturer of Slane, wrote a life of St. Patrick in the 10th century, which is given by Colgan; and in the 12th century, Jocelin, a learned monk of Furness, in Lancashire, wrote a life of St. Patrick, under the patronage of Thomas O'Connor, archbishop of Armagh. In the 11th and 12th centuries, several of the archbishops of Armagh, as Dubhdalethe, Celsus, Gelasius, St. Malachy, &c., were eminent for learning and rated Hugh Roe in the government of the territory by command and with the blessing of his father, and having performed the ceremony of the title as sanctity, and accounts of their works are given by Ware, Ussher, and Lanigan.

The Book of Dinseanchus was originally composed in the 6th century, by Amergin, chief bard to the monarch Dermot, at Tara; but many additions have been made to it by later writers. This celebrated work gives an account of noted places, as Fortresses, Rathes, Cities, Plains, Mountains, Lakes, Rivers, &c., and of the origin of their names, and contains much interesting information on ancient Irish history and topography. Copies of it are in various libraries, and a copy of the original, contained in a vellum MS. of the 9th century, is in the library of Sir William Betham.

The Annals of Tighearnach, compiled in the 11th century by Tighearnach, abbot of Clonmacnois, whose death is recorded in the Four Masters, and in O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at A.D. 1088; he was one of the most learned men of that age, and his Annals are considered as one of the most authentic works on ancient Irish history; they contain the history of Ireland from the reign of Kimboath, king of Emania and monarch of Ireland, who flourished about 350 years before the Christian era, down to the death of the author, in the 11th century; and, according to O'Reilly, they were continued to the 16th century by Augustin Mac Gradian, or Mac Craith, a monk of the abbey of All Saints, on Lough Ree, in the river Shannon, and county of Longford. O'Reilly says there is a copy of these Annals in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. The Annals of Tighearnach are partly in Irish, and partly in Latin, and have been published in Latin by Dr. O'Connor, in the Rerum Hib. Scriptores; but if these Annals were translated into English, and published with proper annotations, they would form one of the most valuable works on ancient Irish history. The Cronicon Scotorum, an ancient work, composed at Clonmacnois, written in Irish and continued to 1150, contains much information on the ancient history of Ireland; there is a copy of it in the possession of Mr. Geraghty, the publisher of these Annals, and another in the library of Sir William Betham.

Marianus Scotus, the cotemporary of Tighearnach, was a monk at Clonmacnois and Clonard, but having left Ireland about A. D. 1056, and going to Germany, spent many years at the monasteries and colleges of Cologne and Fulda, and lastly at Mentz, where he died, A. D. 1086. He is admitted to have been one of the most learned men in Europe in the middle ages, and particularly eminent as a Chronographer and Antiquary. His works were published at Basil, in 1559, and there is a copy of his celebrated Chronicle in the British Museum.

Johannes Duns Scotus, a native of Down, and hence surnamed Dunensis, signifying of Down, which was contracted into Duns, was born near Downpatrick, in the latter end of the 13th century, A. D. 1274. He displayed, from his youth, vast abilities, and being educated for some time at the schools of Ireland, he went to England, and entered Merton College in Oxford; he became a Franciscan friar, and was a lecturer at Oxford, and afterwards at Paris, on Theology, Philosophy, &c., and from his great abilities, and acuteness of intellect, he was denominated The subtle Doctor. In Theology, Metaphysics, and Philosophy, he was scarcely equalled by any man in Europe, and he, and his great rival as a Theologian, the renowned St. Thomas Aquinas, divided the literary and religious world into two great sects, the followers of one being designated Thomists, and of the other Scotists. The illustrious Duns Scotus died at Cologne, A. D. 1308, at the early age of 34, but left to posterity an imperishable name. His vast works were, in 1639, published at Lyons, in 12 volumes folio, edited by the celebrated Irish writer Luke Wadding, a native of Waterford, whose Life of Scotus is given in his great work, the History of the Franciscans. From his great fame, Duns Scotus has been claimed by some writers as a native of Scotland, by others as an Englishman, and it may also be observed that Johannes Scotus Erigena, an Irishman, and one of the most learned and celebrated men in Europe in the 9th century, and Marianus Scotus above mentioned, have been all absurdly claimed by Dempster and other Scotch writers, by law established, he nominated him the O'Donnell, on the 3rd of May. O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, did not allow that small force which he had as natives of Scotland, for which they had no grounds but the surname Scotus; but the Irish in ancient times, as before explained were called Seoti, or Scots, and Ireland was named Scotia.

The Annals of Ulster were compiled, in the 15th century, by Cathal or Charles Maguire, a native of Fermanagh, an eminent and learned ecclesiastic, who was dean of Clogher, a canon of Armagh, &c., and whose death is recorded at the year 1498, and p. 336, in these Annals, with some account of his work, and an eloquent eulogium on his learning and virtues. These Annals, after the death of the Author, were continued to 1541 by Roderick O'Cassidy, archdeacon of Clogher. The Annals of Ulster are written, partly in Irish, and partly in Latin, and contain the history of Ireland from the 1st to the 16th century, and are considered very authentic, giving a concise account of the various events. There are copies of these Annals in several libraries in England, and in Dublin, and they have been published in Latin, from the 5th to the 12th century, namely, from A. D. 431, to A. D. 1131, in Dr. O'Connor's Rer. Hib. Scriptores; but if these Annals were translated into English, and published with the necessary annotations, they would form a very valuable contribution to Irish history.

The Books of Ulster and of Oirgiall, copies of which are contained in the Books of Lecan and Ballymote, give an account of the ancient history of Ulster, its kings, princes, chiefs and clans, and contain much important information, and should be translated and published.

The Annals of the Four Masters, of which a full account has been given in the Introduction to this publication, were compiled chiefly by the celebrated O'Clerys of Donegal, and are one of the most important works ever written on Irish history; they comprise the Annals of Ireland from the earliest ages to the 17th century.

The Book of Invasions, called also the Book of Conquests, in Irish named Leabhar Gabhala, of which an account is given in O'Reilly's Writers, at A. D. 1632, was chiefly compiled by the O'Clerys of Donegal, in the beginning of the 17th century, at the monastery of Lisgoole, in Fermanagh, under the patronage of Bryan Roe Maguire, first baron of Enniskillen. This book was compiled from numerous ancient records, and the works of the Bards &c., and gives an account of all the ancient colonies that peopled Ireland, and made conquests in the country, as the Partholians, Nemedians, Fomorians, Firbolg or Belgians, Danans, Milesians, and Danes. This great work contains vast information on Irish history and antiquities, and there are copies of it, according to O'Reilly, in Trinity College, and other libraries in Dublin, and there is also one in the library of Sir William Betham. If the Book of Invasions was translated and published, with the necessary annotations, it would form an extremely interesting work on ancient Irish history.

The Book of Clonmacnois, compiled in the 17th century by Conla Mac Geoghegan, a learned writer, a native of Westmeath, who dates the work on the last day of June, 1627. It was compiled from various ancient annals, and contains an abstract of the history of Ireland, from the earliest times down to the middle of the 15th century, ending at A. D. 1466. It is written in English, being a translation from ancient MSS., but has never been printed, though containing much important information on Irish history. There are copies of it in Trinity College, and other libraries in Dublin, and one in the possession of Mr. Geraghty, the publisher of these Annals.

Colgan's Lives of the Irish Saints.—John Colgan, a native of Donegal, became a Franciscan friar, and lecturer on Theology, in the Irish monastery called the College of St. Anthony, at Louvain, where he died in A. D. 1658. He was a man of vast learning, particularly on Irish ecclesiastical history and antiquities, and after intense application and study, for a period of about 30 years, he with immense labour and indefatigable industry compiled in several folio volumes in Latin, the Lives of the Irish saints. He published at Louvain, in 1645, in one large volume folio, part of this there collected to disperse, until he marched them, both horse and foot, into the borders of the territory of the race of Owen, the son of Niall (Tyrone);

no notice or warning was sent to them, for they did not think that he was restored to a state of efficiency from the confinement in which he had been, neither work, entitled "Acta Sanctorum Veteris et Majoris Scotiae seu Hiberniae," containing the Acts of the Irish Saints for January, February, and March. In 1647 he published, at Louvain, in another large folio, the Lives of SS. Patrick, Bridget, and Columkille, the three great tutelar Saints of Ireland, which work he styled Trias Thaumaturga, and he dedicated it to Hugh O'Reilly, archbishop of Armagh. Several other volumes of Colgan's MSS., unpublished, on the Lives of the Irish Saints, are said to remain still at Louvain. Colgan's works contain vast information on Irish history, Antiquities, and Topography, but they are so rare, that when they occasionally turn up at book sales, they cost 20 guineas or more, and it would be a great desideratum to have them translated into English, and published with proper annotations. An account of Colgan and his works is given in Brennan's Ecclesiastical History.

Hugh Ward, a native of Donegal, went to Spain, and studied at Salamanca; he became a Franciscan friar, and learned lecturer in Divinity, at the Irish College in Louvain, where he died in 1635. He was, like Colgan, a man of vast learning and industry; he collected an immense number of ancient Irish MSS., of which Colgan made use when compiling the Lives of the Irish Saints. Ward wrote many works on Irish ecclesiastical history and antiquities, mentioned by Brennan, amongst others, a Life of St. Rumoldus, who was bishop of Dublin, and afterwards bishop of Mechlin, in the Netherlands, in the eighth century. Many eminent writers, poets, historians, &c. of the O'Clerys, and Mac Wards of Donegal, in the 16th and 17th centuries, are mentioned in O'Reilly's Irish Writers.

Many of the Catholic archbishops of Armagh, from the 14th to the 18th century, were eminent and learned men, of whom the following may be mentioned: Richard Fitzralph, who died in 1360, is said to have got the Bible translated into Irish. The Primate Octavian de Palatio, a Florentine, who died in 1513, was a man of great learning. George Dowdall, who died in 1558, wrote a Life of John de Courcy, and other works. Richard Creagh, who died in 1585, wrote several works on Irish ecclesiastical history, Lives of saints, &c. Peter Lomhard, who died in 1625, wrote a learned work on Irish history, entitled "de Regno Hiberniae Sanctorum Insula." Hugh Mac Cagwell, who died in 1626, wrote many learned works on Theology. The Primate, Oliver Plunket, who was put to death in London, in 1681, wrote a poem in the Irish language, celebrating Teamhair na Riogh, or Tara of the kings.

Jus Primatiale Armacanum, a work maintaining the authority of the See of Armagh, as the seat of the Primacy, over that of Dublin, was written and published in 1728, by Hugh Mac Mahon, archbishop of Armagh, who died in 1737. This learned and celebrated work decided, in favour of Armagh, the controversy which had been carried on for many centuries, between the Sees of Dublin and Armagh, respecting the Primacy. Michael O'Reilly, Primate of Armagh, who died at Drogheda about A. D. 1758, published an Irish Catechism, which is in high estimation. Accounts of all these writers are given in Ware, in Stuart's Armagh, O'Reilly's Irish Writers, and Brennan's Ecclesiastical History.

Patrick Fleming, a relative of the lords of Slane, who died about A. D. 1623, wrote a Life of St. Columbanus and other works.

The Ecclesiastical Annals of Ireland, a valuable work, written in Latin, was published at Rome in 1690, by Francis Porter, a native of Meath, a Franciscan, who died at Rome in 1702; he was a man of great learning, and published many other important works mentioned by Brennan.

Irish Dictionaries, &c.—In the year 1662 is mentioned, in O'Reilly's Writers, Richard Plunket, a Franciscan friar of Trim in Meath, who wrote a Latin and Irish dictionary, of which there are copies in Marsh's library, and in Trinity College, Dublin. Teige O'Neaghtan or Norton, a native of Meath, mentioned by O'Reilly in 1742, wrote an English-Irish dictionary, which is in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, and also many poems. John O'Neaghtan, a native of Meath, a famous Irish poet, is mentioned by O'Reilly in the year 1715, and he enumerates his compositions. James Mac Cuairt, a celebrated Bard in Ulster, is mentioned by O'Reilly in the year 1712, and he enumerates a great many of his compositions in Irish, particularly a poem on the Battle of Aughrim. Many poets of the O'Reillys, Mac Bradys, O'Clerys, O'Farrells, and Mac Cebes, in the county of Cavan, are mentioned by O'Reilly in the 18th century. Hugh O'Reilly, of the county of Cavan, an eminent lawyer in the reign of king James II., wrote an excellent compendium on the history of Ireland, and the wars of Elizabeth and Cromwell.

Irish Catechisms.—The Rev. Francis O'Molloy a native of Meath, a Franciscan and lecturer in the College of St. Isidore at Rome, published in that city, in the year 1676, an Irish catechism, which is highly esteemed, and entitled Lochran-na-gCreideamhach, i. e. Lucerna Fidelium, or the Lamp of the Faithful; he also published a good Irish grammar. Bonaventure O'Hosey, a native of Fermanagh, wrote an excellent Irish catechism and Prayer Book, published at Rome in 1707, by the Society de Propaganda Fide. The Rev. Andrew Donlevy, a native of Donegal, published at Paris, in 1742, an Irish catechism, which is considered a work of great merit.

Torlogh O'Carolan, the famous Bard and Harper, who has been already mentioned in this article in the account of the Bards, was a native of Newtown, near Kilmainham Wood, in the county of Meath, and diocese of Kilmore. The Rev. Paul O'Brien, of whom an account is given in O'Reilly's Writers, was likewise a native of the parish of Kilmainham Wood, and a relative of Carolan, the Bard. Dr. O'Brien was Irish Professor at the College of Maynooth, where he died in 1820; he was a man of great abilities and acquirements, possessed great wit and poetical talents; he wrote many poems, and published an Irish grammar.

O'Reilly's Irish Writers and Dictionary.—Edward O'Reilly, a native of Meath, descended from the O'Reillys of Cavan, was an eminent Irish scholar, and secretary to the Hiberno-Celtic Society in Dublin, where he died in 1830. He published in the Transactions of the Hiberno-Celtic Society, in 1820, an Account of eminent Irish Writers from the earliest ages, to near the end of the 18th century; he also published an excellent Irish dictionary and grammar; Essays on the Brehon Laws, on the Poems of Ossian, &c.

Mac Geoghegan's History of Ireland.—This work was written in French by the Abbé James Mac Geoghegan, a learned ecclesiastic, a native of Westmeath, who resided for many years in France, and died at Paris in 1755; his History was published at Paris in 1758, and it was dedicated by Mac Geoghegan to the officers of the Irish Brigade in the service of France. This valuable work contains an Epitome of the history of Ireland, from the earliest ages to the end of the Revolution, and Treaty of Limerick, with some other affairs terminating at A. D. 1692, but giving a short account of some subsequent events connected with the Irish Brigades. This History was translated from the French by Patrick O'Kelly, and published in Dublin in the year 1835, in three vols.; but was republished in 1844, in a very elegant style, in one large volume 8vo., by Duffy of Dublin.

Taafe's History of Ireland, written by the Rev. Dennis Taafe, a native of Louth; he was a Franciscan friar, and studied sometime in the University of Prague, and was a man of great abilities, but of eccentric habits. On his return to Ireland, he resided chiefly in Dublin, and, in 1798, actively cooperated with the United Irishmen, and commanded personally with great bravery in Wexford and Wicklow; his Biography is given in Cox's Irish Magazine, Lawless's History of Ireland, and Madden's United Irishmen; he died in Thomas street, Dublin, in the year 1813, in the 60th year of his age. In writing his History of Ireland, his chief patrons were John Keogh, of Mount Jerome, and Dr. Mac Carthy, bishop of Cork. Taafe's History of Ireland was published in 1810, in four volumes 8vo. by Christie, in Dublin did they contemplate to fly before the Tirconnallians at any former time. All the adjoining parts of Tyrone were laid waste by fire and sword by that small force; every person taken who was capable of making resistance was put to the sword and slain; this force having collected great booty, and comprises the period from the English invasion to 1810. Being written with too much haste, and under adverse circumstances, it has some faults as to arrangement and chronological accuracy, but, notwithstanding, it contains much interesting information, written in a bold and patriotic style, and abounds in brilliant passages of great spirit and beauty, with many powerful invectives against anti-Irish writers.

Curry's Civil Wars of Ireland, written by John Curry, M. D. a native of Cootehill, in the county of Cavan; he resided chiefly in Dublin, where he died about 1780. His Review of the Civil Wars in Ireland was first printed in 1775, but has been several times republished in Dublin. This valuable work contains compilations from various sources, on the wars in Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth, the Insurrection of 1641, the Cromwellian war and the War of the Revolution, with accounts of the confiscations, Penal laws, &c.

In the 17th and 18th centuries, many of the Protestant Primates of Armagh were very learned men, and eminent writers, particularly the illustrious James Ussher, one of the most learned men in Europe in the 17th century. The Primates John Bramhall, and John Hoadly, were likewise eminent writers. Many of the bishops in the Archdiocese of Armagh were highly distinguished in these times, as William Bedell, bishop of Kilmore, and Jeremy Taylor, bishop of Down and Connor, both of whom were eminent for their learning and virtues; Bedell's Bible, containing the Old Testament translated into Irish, is a well known work. Richard Pococke, bishop of Meath, was a celebrated antiquary and traveller in the East. William Nicholson, bishop of Derry, was Author of the English, Irish, and Scotch Historical Libraries, and various other learned works. Thomas Percy, bishop of Dromore, was the celebrated Author of Reliques of Ancient Poetry, and many other works. John Stearne, bishop of Dromore and Clogher, was a learned Prelate, and great collector of Irish MSS., which are deposited in Trinity College. Francis Hutchinson, bishop of Down and Connor, published, in 1734, A Defence of the Ancient History of Ireland. Richard Mant, bishop of Down and Connor, a learned Prelate, published in 1840, a History of the Irish Protestant Church. Accounts of the learned bishops above mentioned, and their works, are given in Ware and Stuart's Armagh.

Toland's History of Druidism, and various other well known works, were written by the celebrated John Toland, a native of Donegal, born in Inisowen, near Derry, in 1670; his name in Irish was O'Tuathalain, which he anglicised Toland. His History of the Irish Druids is a learned work, and was republished at Montrose, in Scotland, in 1814.

Archdall's Monasticon and Lodge's Peerage.—The Rev. Mervyn Archdall, a native of Fermanagh, a Protestant clergyman, and rector of Slane in Meath, compiled in several volumes, some of which still remain in MS. in Dublin, an account of the Monasteries of Ireland and other matters on Ecclesiastical History. He published in 1786 his Monasticon Hibernicum, a very valuable work, giving an account of the Monasteries of Ireland from the earliest ages to the Reformation; he also published in 1789 an edition in 7 vols. of Lodge's Peerage, with many valuable additions to the original work.

Stuart's Armagh, printed at Newry in 1819, was written by the Rev. Dr. James Stuart, and is an excellent and impartial work containing the History of Armagh from the earliest times, with accounts of all the Catholic and Protestant Archbishops, and much general information on Irish history and antiquities.

There are various other works connected with the history and topography of Ulster, which may be mentioned, as Pynnar's Survey of Ulster in Harris's Hibernica; Dubordieu's Surveys of Down and Antrim, and Harris's Survey of Down. Sampson's Survey of Derry; Mac Evoy's Survey of Tyrone, and Mac Parlan's Survey of Donegal. Sir Charles Coote's Surveys of Armagh, Monaghan and Cavan, Thompson's Survey of Meath; and a Survey of Westmeath by Sir Henry Piers, in Vallancy's Collectanea. Wright's Louthiana on the Antiquities of Louth; D'Alton's History of Drogheda, and Shirley's History of Farney in Monaghan.

Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres.—This work has been already mentioned, at p. 134, on the Literature of Connaught. It contains many of the chief works of the ancient Irish annalists, as the Annals of the Four Masters, to the English invasion in 1171; the Annals of Inisfallen, of Tigearnach, and of Boyle; and the Annals of Ulster, all translated into Latin, with the Irish text on one side, together with many learned Dissertations on ancient Irish literature, &c. This great work was compiled by the Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor, of the eminent literary family of the O'Connors of Roscommon, nephew to the celebrated Charles O'Connor of Belenagare. Dr. O'Connor was Librarian to the late Duke of Buckingham at Stowe, and, under his patronage, this work, entitled Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres, was, at the cost of many thousand pounds, printed at Buckingham between the years 1814 and 1826, in four large 4to. volumes. Sir F. Palgrave, in his Rise of the English Commonwealth, says of this publication, "A work which, whether we consider the learning of the editor, the value of the materials, or the princely munificence of the Duke of Buckingham, at whose expense it was produced, is without a parallel in modern literature." The translator of these Annals has had the high honour of being presented with a copy of the Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores, by his Grace the present Duke of Buckingham, who has, by this act of liberality, evinced an hereditary regard for the interests of Irish literature; and it may be observed, that from these valuable volumes, presented by his Grace, has been extracted a vast deal of the original matter, given in the annotations in the course of these Annals, never before published, and containing important information, and copious illustrations of Irish history.

The ancient Literature of Leinster.—A full account of the ancient literature of this province will be given at a future time, should an opportunity occur. Amongst the principal works, the following may be mentioned: The Book of Leinster, which is contained in the Books of Leacan and Ballymote; and a copy of it in the library of Trinity College gives the ancient history of Leinster, and its kings, princes, chiefs, and clans, and would be a valuable work if translated into English, and published with proper annotations. The Book of Glendalough, said by O'Reilly to be in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, is an ancient work on the history of Leinster, which should also be translated and published. The Book of Kilkenny, an ancient work, is often quoted by Colgan, in his Lives of the Irish Saints. The Feilire, or Festivity of Aengus Cele De, a celebrated writer of the 8th century, who was abbot of Clonenagh, in the diocese of Leighlin, and Queen's county, and who was a native of Dalaradia, in the county of Down, in Ulster; he was a man of great learning, and his work is one of the most important now extant on the Lives of the ancient Saints of Ireland, but it has never been translated or published; there are copies of it in the libraries of Trinity College, and of the Royal Irish Academy. The Book of Howth, said to be in the Lambeth Library, in London, was an ancient work of note, and from it chiefly was compiled Hanmer's Chronicle. The Annals of Ireland, by James Grace, prior of St. John's in Kilkenny, written in the 16th century; the Annals of Ireland, by John Clynne, a Franciscan friar of Kilkenny, in the 14th century, and the Annals of Ireland by Tbadly Dowling, chancellor of Leighlin, in the latter end of the 16th century, may be mentioned as works connected with the ancient literature of Leinster.

Analecta Sacra; Hibernia Resurgens; Hierographia Hibernia and various other works on Irish Ecclesiastical History and Antiquities, and on the religious persecutions in Ireland, were written by David Roth, bishop of Ossory, who died in 1650, and is much praised by Ware for his great learning; the above works were published at Cologne and other places between the years 1616 and 1640.

The Bleeding Iphigenia, published at Louvain in 1674, and other works, chiefly in vindication of the Confederate Catholics in the war of 1641, &c., were written by Nicholas French, bishop of Ferns.

including cattle and flocks, returned into their own territory. The fortress of O'Neill, i. e. of Torlogh Luineach, was at that time at Strabane, and it was never customary for the O'Neill to reside there until the time of that Torlogh; great was his animosity against the Tirconnallians, and against the brother-in-law of O'Donnell, namely, the earl O'Neill. O'Neill brought a party of the English of Dublin to aid him against the Tirconnallians, and the earl O'Neill, namely, captain Willis, and captain Fulart, with two hundred soldiers. It was a source of mental affliction to young O'Donnell that the English of Dublin should have come to the borders of his territory, to traverse his patrimony, and the province at large, which induced him, in a week's time, to march with a force into Tyrone; the people of the country fled as they had done on former occasions, until they reached Ciannachta of Glen Geimhin (now the barony of Kenaught, in Derry); he proceeded until he came close to where O'Neill and the English were, with their troops, and O'Donnell commanded his forces to attack them in their position; this they accordingly did, and made a fierce rush and charge on them in mid-day; when they beheld the Tirconnallians advancing, they did not wait for them, but retreated to protect themselves to a castle, which stood on the banks of the river, called Roa (the river Roe, in Derry); that was an impregnable castle, and was the fortress of O'Kane, and O'Donnell laid siege to the castle. O'Kane sent his messenger to O'Donnell, with a writing, and the contents of the letter were, that O'Donnell was a foster-son of his, that he had formerly ratified his friendship for him, and that, under the protection of that friendship, he hoped he might be spared on that occasion, on behalf of the property which had come under his guarantee and protection, and that, should he be in pursuit of such again, he would not receive it. O'Donnell forgave him on that occasion, and having returned back, he remained three days and nights in the district, from which the protected preys had been carried off, destroying and completely devastating it; he then proceeded back to his own country, and did not halt until he arrived at Donegal, where he remained for the space of two months under cure. He considered it too long that O'Neill and his English should not be attacked during that time, and having collected his forces, they marched over Barnus More, across the rivers Finn and Mourne, on their progress to Strabane, where O'Neill and his English were, and they did not halt until they arrived just before them; O'Neill, however, or his English, did not leave the stronghold of the fortress to fight them, and when they were not encountered in battle, what they did was to set fire and flames to the four sides of the town, and they did not cease until they burned all the houses that were outside of the walls, and when they could not get the English out to prevent the destruction, they returned to their homes with victory. As to the earl O'Neill, when he perceived the enmity of Hugh Roe O'Donnell's own kindred towards him, what he did was to proceed to the lord justice, namely, William Fitzwilliam, to obtain protection for O'Donnell to appear before him, and to hold a conference with him at Dundalk, which was granted him; and having gone for O'Donnell to Donegal, he took him with him to Dundalk, and both having appeared before the lord justice, he received them very kindly, and he forgave O'Donnell for having escaped, and they confirmed their peace and friendship towards each other in the strictest manner possible; these chiefs having taken their leave of the lord justice, they left him their blessings, and Florilegium Insulæ Sanctorum, &c., a learned work on the Lives of the Irish Saints, was written by the Rev. Thomas Mes-singham, and published at Paris in 1624.

Hibernia Dominicana, written by Thomas de Burgo, or Burke, bishop of Ossory, who died in 1786. He was distinguished for great learning and abilities, and, in 1762, published his Hibernia Dominicana, or History of the Dominican Monasteries in Ireland, with an account of all the eminent men of the Dominican Order. The work also contains immense information on Irish history, with genealogies and biographies of distinguished Irishmen in the service of foreign states, &c., and if translated into English, and published, would form a valuable work on Irish history. The Hibernia Dominicana was printed in Kilkenny, though said on the title page to have been published at Cologne, for such works were at that time prohibited by the Irish government; de Burgo also wrote Lives of several Irish saints. Accounts of Roth, French, Messing-ham, and de Burgo, and their various works, are given in Ware and in Brennan's Ecclesiastical History.

In Ware's Works accounts are given of many learned writers, in ancient and modern times in Leinster, and of the learned archbishops of Dublin, and bishops in other sees of Leinster, accounts are given in Ware's Bishops by Harris; a full account of the Primates is also given in D'Alton's Archbishops of Dublin. Amongst the learned men of Leinster may be mentioned many eminent Anglo-Irish Writers, most of whose works were composed in Dublin, as the Histories, Annals and Chronicles of Giraldus Cambrensis, Stanihurst, Hammer, and Campion, Spenser's View of Ireland, Ware's Antiquities and Bishops by Harris, Vallancey's Collectanea, Grose's and Ledweli's Antiquities, Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, Carew's Pacata Hibernia, the Histories of Ireland, &c. by Fynes Morrison, Leland, Warner, Borlase, Temple, Carte, Clarendon, Plowden, &c.

returned to their respective homes. When those of the Tirconnallians who were in opposition to O'Donnell, heard of his having made peace with the lord justice, they all came in peace and friendship to him; the most eminent of those who came there were Hugh, the son of Huge Duv, son of Hugh Roe (O'Donnell), Niall Garv, the son of Con, son of Calvach, son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv (O'Donnell), and his brethren, and O'Dogherty, namely, John Oge, the son of John, son of Felim, son of Conor Carrach, after he had been taken prisoner by him.

—
A. D. 1593.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, was in his own family residence at Lifford, in the month of January, this year, watching his enemy, namely, Torlogh Luineach, son of Niall Conallach (O'Neill); he continued to wreak his vengeance and animosity on him, to expel him from his lordship, and to reduce him, in order to have Hugh O'Neill appointed in his place; it was well for him that he took the forethought, for a lordship was granted to Hugh O'Neill, and Torlogh Luineach consented and submitted to have the title conferred on him. Hugh O'Neill, i. e. the earl, was then nominated the O'Neill, and Torlogh Luineach sent away the English he had with him, after he had made peace with O'Neill and O'Donnell; and this affair took place in the month of May precisely. The province of Conor Mac Neasa (Ulster), was subjected to the peaceable government of those two, and their hostages and captives were under their controul, so that they were subservient to them.

The Clan William (Burkes of Connaught), whom we have mentioned, surrendered themselves to the governor at Michaelmas of this year; the English so plundered them, that they left them nothing of their property, or great wealth, before May of this year, and such of their people as had not been extirpated, or put to death, were dispersed and scattered throughout Ireland, to seek for subsistence.

A warlike dissension arose between Sir George Bingham, of Ballymote, and Bryan Oge-na-Samthach (of the Battle-axes), the son of Bryan, son of Bryan, son of Owen O'Rourke, about May of this year. The cause of that contention was, that a portion of the queen's rent had not been received from Brefney on that festival, Bryan O'Rourke maintaining that all the rents not paid were on the waste lands, and that he (Bingham), had no right to demand rent from those wastes until they were set. Sir George sent soldiers into Brefney to make a prey in lieu of the rent, and the pledges which they happened to meet with were Bryan O'Rourke's own milch cows; Bryan went to demand their restoration, but it was not granted him, and having returned to his own country, he sent for some common soldiers and mercenaries into Tyrone, Tirconnell, and Fermanagh; after they had come to him, he did not halt by day or night until he arrived at Ballymote, and when near that town he sent forth his scouring parties through the two Triochas (baronies) of the Mac Donoghs, viz., Corran and Tirerrill (in Sligo), and very little of those two territories that they did not plunder on that single predatory expedition; he also burned on that day thirteen towns, in every direction about Ballymote, and he completely plundered Ballymote itself, as well as the other towns; many were slain who are not recorded, among whom were the son of Cobthach Roe Mac Gauran, who fell on the side of Bryan, and Gilbert Graisine (Grace), a gentleman of Sir George's people, who fell on the other side; the son of O'Rourke returned to his country with preys and much booty, and this took place in the first month of summer.

Maguire, i. e. Hugh, the son of Cuchonacht, marched with a force, in imitation of Bryan O'Rourke's force; he first proceeded through the south of Brefney, by the left hand side of Lough Allen, along the south of Tirerrill and Corran, to the bridge of the monastery of Boyle, and into the plains of Connaught, and sent forth his predatory parties, early in the beginning of the day, throughout the neighbouring country. The governor, Sir Richard Bingham, happened to have been that night on a hill before the gate of Tulsk, in the barony of Roscommon, watching the surrounding country; a party of the governor's cavalry were scouring the hills in every direction about the Tulach (Hill), on which he was, and they did not perceive, through the dark mist of the early morning, until they and Maguire, with his cavalry, confronted each other; the governor's cavalry having turned their backs to them, they were hotly pursued by Maguire and his people, who continued slaying and cutting them down, until they reached the border of the place where the governor was; they then turned on Maguire, and pursued him in the same direction back, until he arrived in the midst of his forces. When the governor saw that he had not an equal number of men with them, he returned back, and he himself, and all those along with him, escaped from that dangerous conflict, except William Clifart (Clifford), an eminent gentleman, together with five or six horsemen, who were slain on that occasion; on the other side there were slain Edmond Magauran, Primate of Armagh, who accidentally happened to have been along with Maguire; the abbot Maguire, namely, Cathal Mac Anabbadh Mac Caffry, i. e. Felim, and his brother's son; it was on the 3rd day of the month of July those were slain; but, however, Maguire was not followed from that time till night, and having carried off the preys, and great booty from the country, he proceeded by slow marches from one encampment to another, until he arrived in Fermanagh.¹

Maguire, and the forementioned Bryan O'Rourke, were in alliance, in carrying on war and devastation against the English, during the Summer. Bryan, the son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh, son of John Buighe Mac Mahon, of Dartry of Oirgiall, and the sons of Eiver, the son of Cu-ulla (Mac Mahon), of Farney (both in Monaghan), as well as Richard, the son of Uliek Burke, namely, Mac Deamhain-an-Chorrain, were also plundering and in insurrection against the English. These Oirgiallians made an attack on a company of soldiers quartered at Monaghan, and they slew the most of them, on which account a proclamation was sent to every great town in Ireland, proclaiming those we have mentioned, and their allies, to be traitors.

A. D. 1593.

1. Death of Primate Mac Gauran.—This prelate, Edmond Mac Gauran, was of the old family of the Mac Gaurans, chiefs of Tullaghaw in Cavan, and an account of him is given in Stuart's Armagh, and in Brennan's Ecclesiastical History; he was consecrated, at Rome, archbishop of Armagh, and on his arrival in Ireland, in 1593, a large reward was offered for his apprehension by the lord deputy, Sir William Russell, and consequently the bishop was obliged to keep himself concealed, and was protected chiefly at the residence of his friend, Hugh Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, who refused to give him up to the deputy. Maguire, as above stated in the text, having proceeded with his forces against the English in Connaught, was accompanied by the bishop, and having encountered the English, under the governor, Sir Richard Bingham, they had a sharp conflict at a place called Sciath-na-Feartha, which appears to have been situated near Tulske, in Rosecommon; many were slain on both sides, but the

The lord justice, after that, in the following harvest, commanded the great forces of Meath, Leinster, and Leath-Mogha (Munster), to march into Ulster, and the governor of the province of Connaught commanded all the forces, from the Shannon to Drowis (Bundrowis, near Ballyshannon), to march and join them at the river Erne. With respect to the lord justice, he gave his own command in that army to the marshal of Newry (Sir Henry Bagnall), and to the earl of Tyrone, namely, Hugh (O'Neill), the son of Ferdoreha, son of Conn Bacach. These numerous and very great forces overran the country, on the eastern side of Lough Erne, from Carn More of Slieve Beatha (the great Carn, on Slievebagh mountain, in the barony of Trough, county of Monaghan, on the border of Tyrone), to Easroe (at Ballyshannon). The earl of Tyrone was not willing to march in that army, but, however, his dread of the English compelled him to serve them. When Hugh Maguire received intelligence that those great congregated forces, were marching towards him, he sent his property and cattle, both cows and flocks, into Tirconnell for security, while he himself, with the few forces he had along with him, of his own territory, and of common soldiers from other countries, remained on the western side of the lake, at Enniskillen, to oppose the English, determined not to suffer them to pass that place; they afterwards advanced along the left hand side of the lake, until they arrived at a celebrated ford on the Erne, viz., Ath-Chul-Uain; while they were coming to that place, Maguire, with his forces, was marching parallel with them on the western side of the lake, until he arrived at the same ford on the other side; the English forces then entered the ford, which Maguire endeavoured to defend as well as he could, but, however, the proverb was verified, "that a host overcomes a few," for the ford was obliged to be given up to the English, and Maguire having been defeated, a great number of his people were slain; the earl of Tyrone was wounded on that occasion.² The governor of the province of Connaught, and the earl of Thomond, namely, Donogh, the son of Conor, son of Donogh O'Brien, came to join them (the English), on the other side of the Erne, but they did no execution; and the governor, with the forces of the province of Connaught, proceeded to the monastery of Boyle, where he remained for some time plundering Muintir Eoluis (in Leitrim), and the west of Fermanagh; the men of Connaught afterwards returned to their homes, and the earl of Tyrone, and the marshal, proceeded to their places, after spoiling much in Fermanagh. They left companies in the country to aid Conor Oge, the son of Conor Roe Maguire, who was in opposition to Maguire; unhappy and disturbed were those from Clochar Mac Deimhene (Clogher), in Tyrone, to Raith Cruachain in Connaught (Croghan, in Roscommon), and from Traigh Eothuile (near Ballysadare, in Sligo), to Brefney O'Reilly (county of Cavan), at that time.

English forces were defeated, and Hugh Maguire transixed with a spear, and slew on the spot, Sir William Clifford, one of the chief commanders of the English. The bishop Mac Gauran was accompanied by Cathal Maguire, and Felim Mac Caffry the standard-bearer, who, being attacked by some of the English cavalry, were prostrated in the shock, and some of Maguire's galloglasses having rushed to their aid, on hearing the bishop's voice, they, in consequence of a thick mist which prevailed at the time, mistook Cathal Maguire, who was valiantly defending his fallen friend, for one of the English troopers, and unfortunately slew him; and the bishop himself was slain by the thrust of a spear from one of the English horsemen. It is erroneously stated by de Burgo, in the Hibernia Dominicana, and by other writers, that the Primate Mac Gauran was slain in 1598, near Armagh; but the correct account is given in Stuart's Armagh, and in the Four Masters.

Mac Carthy Riavach, i. e. Owen, the son of Donal, son of Fingin (Florence), lord of Carberry (in Cork), died; he was a sensible, pious man, of good hospitality, and noble deeds, and Donal, the son of Cormac-na-Haoine, succeeded in his place.

Mary, daughter of Cormac Oge, son of Teige Mac Carthy, the wife of O'Sullivan More, died.

Murtogh, the son of Conor, son of Torlogh O'Brien of Druim Laighen (Dromline, in the barony of Bunratty, county of Clare), died, and was buried in his own town, i. e. Dromline; and his son Conor succeeded in his place.

Murtogh, the son of Donal, son of Conor O'Brien of Tulcha (Tulla, in the county of Clare), died.

Teige, the son of William, son of Teige Duv

O'Kelly, of the Caladh, in the territory of Hy Maine (in Galway), died; and the deceased was one of the greatest losses in Hy Maine.

O'Dwyer of Coill-na-Manach (barony of Kilnamanagh, in Tipperary), namely, Philip, the son of Anthony, died, and his son Dermot succeeded in his place.

Margaret, the daughter of O'Boyle, i. e. of Torlogh, died.

A. D. 1594.

Mac Mahon, i. e. the lord of the eastern Corc Baiseind (barony of Clonderlaw, in Clare), namely, Teige, the son of Murrough, son of Teige Roe, son of Torlogh, son of Teige, died; and his son, Torlogh Roe, succeeded in his place.

O'Sullivan of Beire, i. e. Eochy, the son of Dermot, son of Donal, died; he was not, however, the O'Sullivan of Beire at that time, although he had formerly been so, for his brother's son, namely, Donal, the son of Donal, son of Dermot, took Dun Baoi and Beire (Dunboy and Bear, in Cork), from him the year previous to his death, by the decision of the council of England and the council of Ireland; and Donal himself was nominated O'Sullivan Beire.

O'Dowd of Tir Fiachrach, namely, Dathi, the son of Teige Riavach, son of Owen, was killed by a soldier of the queen's people, in one of his own towns in Tir Fiachrach of the Moy (barony of Tireragh, county of Sligo).

O'Heyne (of Galway), i. e. Hugh Buighe, the son of Owen Mantach, son of Edmond, son of Flann, died.

The daughter of Mac I-Brien of Ara (in Tipperary), namely, Onora, the daughter of Torlogh, son of Murtogh, son of Donal, son of Teige, the wife of Peirce, son of Edmond of the Caladh (or Port), son of Pierce Roe Butler, died.

The lord justice, having collected a great force, proceeded unperceived through the adjoining terri-

2. Battle of Ath-Cul-Uain.—This battle was fought at a ford on the river Erne, somewhere near Lough Erne; Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, was at this time in alliance with the English, and commanded in conjunction with the marshal, Sir Henry Bagnall. The Irish were commanded by Hugh Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, assisted by a small body of men, and some Scots sent to his assistance by O'Donnell; and, according to Mac Geoghegan, the Irish were armed with battle-axes, and the Scots with arrows. The English forces opened a cannonade on Maguire's men, who were posted on the opposite side of the river Erne; the Irish, being unable to defend themselves against the English artillery, were forced to give way, and O'Neill, having discovered a ford, crossed the river at the head of his cavalry; but he was severely wounded in the thigh by the shot of an arrow from one of Maguire's men, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, Maguire having rallied his horse and foot, compelled the English forces to recross the river.

tories without delay, until he arrived at Enniskillen, and sat down before it, and laid seige to the fortress; the forces began to batter the wall with the requisite engines, and they did not cease until they at length took it; and the lord justice having left guards in the castle, returned to his residence. When Maguire received intelligence that the lord justice had returned back, he mustered all the forces he possibly could, and laid seige to the same castle, and he sent a messenger to O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, entreating him to come to his aid, and he promptly responded to the call, for he marched to him with his forces, and they laid seige to the fortress, from the beginning of June to the middle of August. These forces devastated and burned all that was under the controul of the English, in the territory of Oirgiall and in Brefney O'Reilly, and they took their cows and cattle as provision stores for their soldiers. O'Donnell remained encamped, carrying on the siege against Enniskillen, from the beginning of June to the month of August, as we have stated, until the guards of the castle had consumed nearly all their provisions. Messages came to O'Donnell from the Scots, for whom he had previously sent, informing him that they had arrived at Derry; and those who came thither were Donal Gorm Mac Donnell, and Mac Leod of Arran. O'Donnell afterwards went to engage their services, accompanied by a small party of his forces, and he left another large portion of them with Maguire to aid him; and he commanded them to remain carrying on the siege against the castle. When the lord justice, Sir William Fitzwilliam, received intelligence that the guards of Enniskillen were in want of stores and provisions, he commanded a great number of the men of Meath, the chiefs of the O'Reillys, and the Bingham of the province of Connaught, under the command of young

George Bingham, to come for the purpose of conveying provision stores to Enniskillen; those chiefs having met together, proceeded to Cavan, the town of O'Reilly, for the provisions; and they marched along the right hand side of Lough Erne, until they came within about four miles of the town (of Enniskillen). When Maguire, i. e. Hugh, learned that those forces were marching towards the town with the provisions before mentioned, he, with his own forces, and the force left him by O'Donnell, together with Cormac, the son of the baron, namely, the brother of the earl O'Neill, proceeded, and halted at a narrow pass by which they expected they would march towards them; that plan was advantageous for they came without taking any notice until they encountered Maguire's party at Beal-Atha-Sainreadhaigh; a violent and fierce conflict, and a strenuous and determined battle ensued between both parties, but at length Maguire and his forces defeated the other party by force of arms, so that he slaughtered their chiefs, and he continued pursuing the vanquished for a long distance from that place. Immense was the number of officers and common soldiers that were slain in that battle; a vast number of horses, and a great deal of arms and of property were left in that place, besides the steeds and horses which were carrying the stores to Enniskillen. Some scattered fugitives of the men of Meath, and of the O'Reillys, escaped from that fierce conflict to tell the tale, and they did not stop until they arrived in Brefney O'Reilly. The direction which young George Bingham took, with the few who accompanied him from that field of battle, was through Largan of Clan Cobthach Mac Gauran, through Brefney O'Rourke, and from thence to Sligo. A name was established for the ford at which that great victory was gained, viz., by naming it Bel-Atha-na-mBriosgaidh¹ (the Ford of

A. D. 1594.

1. Battle of the Ford of the Biscuits.—This fierce battle, in which the English forces under Bingham, together with his Irish allies, were defeated, and 400 of them slain, according to Mac Geoghegan, was fought at a ford on a river called the Farna, within about four miles of Enniskillen, as stated in the text, and is now known as the river Arney, in the barony of Clanawley, county of Fermanagh. The place got its name, in Irish Bel-Atha-na-mBriosgaidh, signifying the mouth of the Ford of the Biscuits, from the circumstance of the English forces, when defeated, having left behind them a vast quantity of biscuits, which they were conveying, with other provisions, to the garrison at Enniskillen. The Irish were commanded by the valiant Hugh Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, and Cormac O'Neill, a chief of Tyrone, assisted by some men sent to them by Red Hugh O'Donnell. The chief of the O'Reillys who was then in alliance with the English was Maolmora or Miles O'Reilly, a young man of great valour and ambition, who was commonly called the Queen's O'Reilly, to distinguish him from the other chiefs of the O'Reillys who fought against Elizabeth; he was called by the Irish Maolmora Breagh, signifying Miles the Brave or Handsome, and having got from the queen a grant by letters patent of the county of Cavan, he commanded a troop of cavalry in the queen's service, and was slain at the great battle of the Yellow Ford, on the borders of Armagh and Tyrone, where, in 1598, the English forces, under marshal Bagnall, were defeated with immense slaughter, by the Irish of Ulster, under the command of Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone.

the Biscuits), on account of the great quantity of biscuits and small cakes that were left in their possession that day. When the guards of the castle received intelligence of the forces being defeated they gave up the town to Maguire, who gave them quarter.

A new lord justice came to Ireland in the month of July of this year, whose name was Sir William Russell; he ordered that provisions and stores should be put into every town in the possession of the queen, despite of all those opposed to him, and he commanded the men of Meath, of Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, to meet him with all their forces at Athlone, on the 16th day of the month of September; at that appointed period the lord justice arrived, as he had promised, at Athlone, and then proceeded from thence to Roscommon.

A.D. 1595.

The lord justice of Ireland, sir William Russell, at the instigation of some of the neighbours, and those living near to Fiacha Mac Hugh (O'Byrne), marched against Fiacha himself to Baile-na-Cuire (Ballinacor, in Wicklow), in the month of January precisely; having arrived near the town, and before they were able to enter the gate of the rampart which surrounded it, the sound of a drum was accidentally heard from the soldiers who were marching on it; Fiacha and his people being startled, quickly prepared themselves, and having sent some of his party to defend the gate, he sent all his people, men, sons, and women, out by the escaping gates of the town; and he himself followed them, and took them, through the wilds and recesses, to a secure place; and while Fiacha was on his guard, Walter Riavach, the son of Gerald, son of Thomas, of the Geraldines of Kildare, came to him. As to the lord justice, he remained for ten days in Ballinacor, after Fiacha had departed from it, and having left one or two companies of soldiers to guard it, he himself returned back to Dublin. In fifteen days after that, Walter Riavach, and some of the clan of Fiacha Mac Hugh, proceeded to make a nocturnal attack, about sleeping time, on Crumghlinn (Crumlin), near the gates of Dublin; they completely plundered and burned that town, and took away with them as much of the leadern roof of the town church as they could carry; and although the flames and sparks of the town on fire, were clearly visible in the streets of Dublin, Walter escaped, without losing a drop of blood, or receiving a wound. At the expiration of a month after that, Walter made an attack on the castle of a gentleman, one of his enemies, who was in his neighbourhood; and as to the gentleman, he was attentively watchful, being aware of the intended attack of his enemies at the time that Walter and his party made a sally on the castle; the gentleman bravely and fiercely made an onset on Walter, and they fought each other with great violence and animosity, and Walter, having been wounded in his foot on that occasion, was carried off by his party to the nearest mountain to them; they put him under cure in an earthen cave which was not known to any three persons, and left none with him but one young physician of his own faithful people, who went every other day to the adjacent woods to collect herbs; a conversation took place privately between him and some of Walter's enemies, and having become friends, he betrayed Walter (Fitzgerald), to them, who took him prisoner; Walter was afterwards brought to Dublin, where he was hanged and quartered.

The entire province of Ulster rose up in one union, and one alliance, against the English this year.

The O'Neills marched with a force, in the month of February, into the estate of the baron of Slane (Fleming, baron of Slane), and left no property after them in those districts, of corn, of dwellings, of flocks, or of cattle.

The O'Neills marched with another force to Kells, and they spoiled and completely plundered the entire country about them.

Maguire, i. e. Hugh, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Cuchonnacht, son of Cuchonnacht, and Mac Mahon, namely, Bryan the son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh, son of Shane Buighe, marched with a force to Brefney O'Reilly; they vigorously plundered and devastated the country, and, moreover, they did not leave a hut in which two or three persons might be protected, in the entire of Cavan, that they did not completely burn, except the monastery of Cavan, in which the English were at that time.

Mac Con, the son of Peregrine, son of Dermot, son of Teige Cam O'Clery, chief professor in history to O'Donnell, a man eminent for his acquirements, learning, and profession, in history, and poetry, eloquent and fluent in speech, by the gift of intellect and judgment, a pious, mild, scrupulous, devout, and charitable man, died at Leitir Maolain, in Thomond.

Sir John Norris, the queen's war general, came to Ireland, with eighteen hundred soldiers, in the end of the month of February, to suppress the war in Ulster and in Connaught.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, mustered a force to march into Connaught; in the first place he proceeded across the river Erne, on the 3rd day of March precisely, and by the right hand side of the Lough of Melge, the son of Cobthach (Lough Melvin), to Bealach-Ui-Mithidhein (Ballaghameehan), where he remained that night; from thence through Brefney into Braid Slieve (in Tirerrill, county of Sligo), where he remained another night. It was impossible for him to surprise or obtain an advantage of the province of Olnegmaecht (Connaught), at that time, for the English resided and dwelt throughout the country in general, and particularly in its fortified seats, and impregnable fortresses; in the first place, sir Richard Bingham, governor of the province of Connaught, was in Rosecommon; another great party of the English was in a monastery of monks which is situated on the banks of the river Boyle; another party in Tulsk, in the centre of Moy-Ai, north west of Croghan (in Rosecommon); a party in Port-Nua, a fortress which the English themselves erected between Lough Kea and Lough Arrow (Port Nua, or Newport, between Lough Kea, in Rosecommon, and Lough Arrow, in Sligo); a party in Ballymote, and another large party in Sligo. Intelligence reached the governor, at Rosecommon, that O'Donnell was marching to the country, and he did not therefore delay, until he arrived at the monastery of Boyle, and commanded all the English who were in the forementioned towns to come to him at that place, for he expected that it should be by that way O'Donnell and his forces would march. On O'Donnell advancing to Coilte Conchobhair (the Woods of Conor), he commanded his forces to fall into rank, and be reviewed, which was accordingly done; and their numbers there were not very great, for there were only four hundred of disciplined and efficient men; no other troops joined his force of the Tirconnallians, on that occasion, except a few from the province of Connaught, who were reconnoitring and directing his course, commanded by Conor Oge Mac Dermott, and Con, the son of Dudley, son of Tuathal O'Conor. The forces, after having been reviewed, proceeded until they arrived at the river Boyle, which they crossed at Droichead-Cnuic-an-Biocara (Knockviear, near Lough Kea, in Rosecommon), in the beginning of the night; from thence they marched through Moylurg and Moy Aoi (both in Rosecommon), and arrived, by the break of day, at Raith Cruachan (Croghan, in Rosecommon); their predatory parties were separated, and sent forth, according as they were directed, before they arrived at that place; far and distant were those warlike companies separated asunder, for some of them went to the estates of O'Conor Roe, and of O'Hanly, another portion of them went to Droichead-Bheoil-Atha-Modh, on the river Suck (the bridge of Ballymoe, on the borders of Rosecommon and Galway), and another party, also, beyond Castlereagh westward. The dense clouds of vapour and smoke which rose from the burnings made by those forces, in every direction through which they had passed, all round Rath Croghan, fully manifested their operations. Those who went to Athmodha (Ballymoe), and the other party who had gone to Airteach and Clan Ceithearnaigh (districts on the borders of Mayo, Rosecommon, and Galway), returned to Rath Croghan before the noon of the day, although it was difficult for them to come in due order, from the vastness of their preys and booty, and they could have procured more, had they been actually able to collect or drive them. O'Donnell, together with those parties and their preys, afterwards proceeded to Elfin, where he remained for some time waiting the return of the predatory party which had gone from him to the estate of O'Conor Roe, and of O'Hanley; he then departed from Elfin by the right hand side of Ath-Slisean, into Hy Briuin, where he remained that night, until all his men came to him with their preys. There had not been obtained or collected by any of the Irish for a long period of time, so much booty as was there by the preying of one day. On the following day O'Donnell commanded his men to have the prey conveyed across the Shannon, and he sent the drivers, and such as were not expert at arms, with the prey and booty into Muintir Eoluis (Mac Rannall's country, in Leitrim). When the rear of the force was crossing the same ford, it was then the drivers and soldiers of the English came up, and a conflict ensued, in which several were cut down and wounded between them; but, however, the Tirconnallians crossed the river, and returned to their homes with their booty, after having gained sway and victory.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, marched with another force into Connaught, on the 18th day of April; he first proceeded across the river Erne, along the right hand side of Lough Melvin, and remained that night at Ros Inbhir (Rosinver, in the barony of Rosclogher, county of Leitrim); on the following day they came to Cill Fearga (Kil-largy, in the barony of Dromahair, county of Leitrim), where they waited for the remainder of his forces to overtake them, and, after they had come up, they then proceeded through Brefney to Bradslieve, thence into Machaire Chonacht (the plain of Connaught, in Roscommon), and such as was left unpreyed by the former force, their preys were brought to him at one place on that occasion; he then proceeded with those preys and booty to Leitrim of Muintir Eoluis that night. When his enemies expected he would return back into Ulster, he did not do so, but sent messengers privately to Maguire, namely, Hugh, requesting he would come with him into Annaly; he sent reconnoiterers before him into the territory, and commanded them to meet him at a certain place; he himself afterwards proceeded with his forces, silently and expeditiously, into the two Annals (North and South Longford), where he arrived early in the morning. These were the territories of the two O'Ferralls, before the English had gained power over them, and one of the English themselves was in possession of O'Ferrall's Port-Air-eachais (hereditary mansion), whose name was Christopher Brown. Scouring parties from the large forces of O'Donnell and Maguire overran the country from Slieve Cairpre (probably the Clanhugh mountains, on the borders of Longford and Leitrim), to Eithne (the river Inny, on the borders of Longford and Westmeath), and set every thing before them in those districts on large columns of fire, and dense dark clouds of smoke; they took the Longport (i. e. the Fortress from which the town of Longford is so called), and set fire to every corner and side of it, so that it was by a long rope they brought out Christopher Brown, together with his relative by marriage, and their women; but, however, fifteen men of the hostages of the country, who were held by the forementioned Christopher, whom they could not save or rescue, were burned by the blaze and flames of the fire. Three other castles were taken by O'Donnell on the same day; many people were slain and destroyed on that occasion, and among their chief men was Hoberd, the son of Fergus, son of Bryan, who was slain by Maguire in consequence of not knowing him, and the son of the prior O'Reilly was taken prisoner by another party of the forces. All the property of the country which they thought of value was collected and brought to them, and they then proceeded with their prey and booty, and encamped in Teallach Dunchadha that night (barony of Tullaghonoho, in Cavan). On the following day they sent forth scouring parties to the monastery of Cavan, in expectation of getting an advantage of the English who were quartered in it, and when they found they were not about the town, they carried away all the property belonging to them they could seize. They next proceeded that night to Tellach Eachdhach (barony of Tullaghagh, in Cavan), westward of Bel-Atha-Conaill (Ballyconnell, in Cavan), and they then returned to their homes, after a victorious campaign on that occasion.

When the English were convinced that the earl O'Neill rose in alliance with O'Donnell, in the war, the lord justice (sir William Russell), and the council, sent ten hundred warriors to Newry to fight against the Tyronians, and the lord justice promised to follow them with his forces, to plunder and spoil the country. O'Neill sent messages to O'Donnell, requesting him to come to his aid against the oppressors who had come to his country, which was not negligently heard by O'Donnell, for he mustered his forces, and proceeded through Tyrone to the place where O'Neill was, and they both marched to Fochaird of Muirtheimhne (Foghard, near Dundalk, in the plain of Muirthevne, in the county of Louth), in the month of May precisely; when the lord justice received intelligence that they were both at that place prepared for him, he remained in Dublin on that occasion.

Young George Bingham, who was in Sligo, from the governor of the province of Connaught, sir Richard Bingham, went with a ship's crew by the right hand side of Ireland north-eastward, to make a plunder in Tirconnell, and they entered the harbour of Lough Swilly, and having obtained an advantage of the country at that time, they plundered the monastery of the Virgin Mary, which was on the margin of the shore (the Carmelite monastery of Rathmullen, in the barony of Kilmacrennan, in Donegal), and carried away with them their Mass vestments, chalices, and other property; they afterwards proceeded to Toraidh (Tory Island, off the coast of Donegal), an island which Columkille, the patron saint, blessed, and having spoiled and plundered every thing in the island, they then returned back to Sligo. O'Donnell, having been informed that his territory had been plundered in his absence by strangers, returned from Tir Eogain to relieve them, but his stay was not long in Tirconnell, when O'Neill's messengers came to him to inform him that the lord justice with his forces had come into Tyrone; he returned back again to the place where O'Neill was, who was much rejoiced with him. Immense was the army which came with the lord justice, namely, sir William Russell, for he had along with him the queen's general of war in Ireland, namely, sir John Norris; the earl of Thomond, i. e. Donogh, the son of Connor O'Brien, with all their forces; and these did not halt until they arrived at Iubhar-Chinn-Tragha (Newry), from which they proceeded to Armagh, where they came to the resolution not to stop until they would reach the Avonmore (the river Blackwater, on the borders of Tyrone and Armagh), in the very centre of Tir Eogain; on their march, in the direct way between Armagh and Avonmore, they beheld the strong camp, and the powerful ranks of battalions in which the Tirconnallians and Tyronians were, along with the earl O'Neill and O'Donnell, and the English forces having perceived them, they remained in that place till the following day when they returned back to Armagh; the Irish went in pursuit of them, and having encamped near them, they remained for fifteen days confronted in that manner, without either attacking the other, for the lord justice and his forces were within the strongholds of Armagh, erecting towers and deepening trenches about the town. At the end of that time the lord justice left three companies of soldiers to guard Armagh, and he himself returned to Newry, and the Irish pursued them to the gates of Newry. In a week afterwards the lord justice went to Monaghan with stores, from which he proceeded with his forces to Dublin, and the English did not attempt to bring an army into Ulster for some time after that, except one force, which was mustered by sir John Norris, and by sir Thomas Norris, his brother, namely, the president of the two provinces of Munster, with the troops of Munster and Meath, for the purpose of marching into Ulster; they proceeded to Newry, and from thence they set out for Armagh. When they had gone nearly half the way, they were met by the Irish, who began to spear, shoot, pierce, and cut them down, so that they did not suffer them to sleep, eat, rest, or refresh themselves for twenty-four hours; they were not allowed to advance one foot forward beyond that; and their officers were thankful for returning to Newry with their lives, after having lost a great many of their men and horses, with arms and property; the General, Sir John Norris, and Sir Thomas his brother, were wounded on that occasion.¹

A. D. 1595.

1. Battle of Clontibret.—An account of this battle is given by Mac Geoghegan and O'Sullivan Beare, and also in Stuart's Armagh; it was fought in the summer of 1595, about the period in which the above battle is recorded by the annalists, at a place called Cluain Tiobruid, or the "Lawn of the Spring," now well known as Clontibret, about five miles south-east of Monaghan, towards the borders of Armagh. Queen Elizabeth, alarmed at the warlike attitude assumed by the Northern Irish, under Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, sent over to Ireland as captain-general of the army, sir John Norris, a distinguished commander who had served in the Netherlands, against king Philip II. of Spain. Norris arrived in Ireland with three thousand of the veteran troops who had served in the Netherlands, and he was some time governor of Munster. He afterwards, in conjunction with the lord deputy, sir William Russell, and his brother, sir Thomas Norris, marched into Ulster with a powerful force to oppose O'Neill, but, after the ill success of their expedition, Russell returned to Dublin, and left the command to Norris, who, in conjunction with his brother, advanced from Newry towards Monaghan, to relieve the English garrison in the castle of that town, which was then besieged by the Irish. The English forces amounted to about three thousand men, and Hugh O'Neill, with some chiefs of the Maguires, Mac Mahons, O'Hanlons, O'Quinns, and O'Kanes, resolved to oppose their progress, and posted their cavalry, with their kerns and galloglasses, at the pass of Clontibret, near a little river situated in a valley enclosed by small hills. The English advanced and made repeated efforts to force the pass, which was resolutely defended

The forementioned George (Bingham), having returned to Sligo, after plundering the monastery of the Blessed Virgin Mary at Rathmullen, and the church of Columkille on Tory Island, God did not allow him a long period without avenging it on him, for there was a gentleman of the Burkes in his company, who had twelve warriors along with him, namely, Ulick Burke, the son of Redmond-na-Sguab, who had been on a former occasion reproached and insulted by George, and by the English, in general, on which account he was angry and enraged, and was resolved to be revenged of George for his insult, if he possibly could, and afterwards to get into O'Donnell's friendship, for he was certain of being secure in his alliance. Having obtained an advantage of the forementioned George, on a certain day, when he was in his private apartment, with only a few attendants, he came up to him and accused him of his oppression and injustice, but did not receive a satisfactory answer, and as he did not, he drew his sword, and struck at him until he cut off his head from his neck; he then took the castle (of Sligo), and sent his messenger to Ballyshannon, where O'Donnell's people were, who dispatched a messenger to Tyrone, where O'Donnell himself was, and having delivered the message to him, he after that went to the earl O'Neill, and they were both rejoiced at that slaying; on the following day O'Donnell took his leave of the earl, and, accompanied by his forces, he did not halt a night until he arrived at Sligo, where he was welcomed, and Ulick having delivered the town to him, he was very happy in his mind; these things happened in the month of June.

When all those of the province of Connaught who were in insurrection, namely, the Lower Burkes, the Mac Donnells, O'Conors, O'Rourkes and Clan Maolroona (the Mac Dermotts of Roscommon, and Mac Donoghs of Sligo), and not they alone but also all those who were proclaimed and dispersed, after they had been dispossessed and expelled by the Bingham into Ulster and other places, heard of the death of George (Bingham), and of the taking of Sligo, they came to O'Donnell at Sligo, and each of them afterwards went to his own native patrimony, and every inhabitant whom the English settled in their lands during the time they themselves had been proclaimed, joined them as adherents from that hour forth. The most of all those from the western parts of Erris and Umhall, (the western baronies of Mayo), to Drowis (Bundrowis, near Ballyshannon), were afterwards in alliance and united with O'Donnell, in the space of one month, and very few castles or fortresses, whole or demolished, in those countries, but were under his controul in the same period. O'Donnell afterwards went to Donegal, where he remained to the middle of August. Having been informed that a Scottish fleet landed in Lough Foyle, commanded by Mac Leod of Arran, he proceeded to them, to take them into his service; they were six hundred in number, and after having been for some time in the country, resting and recruiting themselves, and being engaged by him, he mustered his forces together, with his hired soldiers, and they marched across the rivers Erne, Drowis, Dubh, (Bunduff, on the borders of Leitrim and Sligo), the Sligeach (the river Sligo), to Eas-Dara (Ballysadare), and the Ox mountain, into Liency; by the Irish. Norris, finding his troops repulsed, rallied his men, and rushed forward at their head, animating them to conflict, but his horse being struck by a musket ball, fell dead beneath him, and himself and his brother sir Thomas were wounded in the heat of battle. After the contest had continued fiercely for some time, Sedgrave, a commander from Meath, who from his great strength and gigantic stature was considered their chief champion, and the most valiant man in the English Pale, galloped impetuously forward at the head of a troop of horse, and having made good his passage across the ford which separated both armies, he charged O'Neill's cavalry. The dauntless O'Neill, at the head of his men, met him in mid career, and they closed in single combat, while the troops on both sides stood still as spectators, awaiting the issue of the contest. Both champions were clad in armour, and their spears were shivered to pieces on their breast-plates in the first encounter; they then grasped their swords, and cut at each other, but both being equally expert at their weapons, Sedgrave could obtain no advantage, and resolved to grapple in closer combat; with desperate valour, and trusting to his superior strength, he seized O'Neill by the neck, and, after a severe struggle, the warriors dragged each other off their horses, and fell together to the ground. Both struggled for a few moments in deadly strife, but Sedgrave, by superior strength, getting the earl under, seized his sword to cut off his head, and the contending armies already deemed him slain. The English gave a cheer of victory, but it was premature, for O'Neill, making a powerful effort, grasped his dagger, and buried it in the bowels of his antagonist beneath his mail, and Sedgrave rolled on the ground in the agonies of death. The Irish raised a tremendous shout of triumph, and O'Neill, remounting his steed, charged the enemy at the head of his men, who, attacking the English with redoubled vigour took their standard, put them to flight in all directions, and pursued them with great slaughter to Armagh. The remnant of the English forces, with the two Norrises, fled towards Newry, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, 700 of their men were slain in this battle, and the garrison of Monaghan soon after surrendered to O'Neill.

from thence until he arrived in Costello (in Mayo). The English had at that time a rendezvous and residence in Caislen-Mor-Mec-Goisdealbhaigh (the great castle of Mae Costello, in the parish of Castlemore, barony of Costello), and O'Donnell, with his forces, having laid siege to the castle, the guards were at length obliged to surrender the castle; he then proceeded to Dun-Mor-Mic-Feorais (Dunmore of Bermingham, in the county of Galway); they sent forth predatory parties to Conmaicne (barony of Kilmaine, in Mayo), to Muintir Murchada (barony of Clare, in Galway), to the borders of Machaire Riavaeh, and to Tuaim-da-Ghualann (Tuam); they took Turlach Mochain (Turlaghvohan, or Thurlagh, near Tuam), and a great number of the chiefs of the country, along with Richard, the son of Bermingham; they completely preyed and plundered the country all around them, and having carried off the cattle and flocks, and the wealth and property of all those before them, they returned back. When the governor of the province of Connaught, namely, sir Richard Bingham, received intelligence that O'Donnell had gone past him westward into Connaught, he mustered fifteen companies of soldiers, both horse and foot, with which he marched to the border of the Curlew mountains, for the purpose of attacking O'Donnell on his return from his expedition. O'Donnell having been informed of this, shortly returned back with his preys and booty, from one encampment to another, through Costello, Liency, the lower part of Tirerrill (in Sligo), across the three bridges, viz., the bridge of Collooney, the bridge of Ballysadare, and the bridge of Sligo. The English pursued him as quickly as they could through these passes. O'Donnell having detached a large body of cavalry, he commanded them to fall to the rear of his forces, to prevent the van of the English army from attacking the attendants, and unarmed portion of his men; he then proceeded with his booty, without meeting any opposition, and arrived in the neighbourhood of Gleann Dailain (Glenade and Glencar, on the borders of Leitrim and Sligo). The governor continued the pursuit after him, and took up quarters in the monastery of Sligo, to besiege the guards of O'Donnell, who were in the castle. On the following day O'Donnell sent a party of cavalry to reconnoitre the English, and to receive information respecting the fortress, and the men who were in it, and they having proceeded to the banks of the river, and to the hill which is called Raith-Dabriotog (near the town of Sligo), they beheld the English in all quarters throughout the town. There was a proud and boastful young officer along with Sir Richard at that time, who was a sister's son of his, whose name was captain Martin, and he was the commander of his horse forces; he could not bear to see his enemies so near him without attacking them, and he proceeded with his troops over the bridge of Sligo; when O'Donnell's men perceived them advancing, they returned back as quickly as they could, as they had not a force equal to theirs; the English pursued them, but not being able to overtake them, they returned back. O'Donnell's people related what happened, how they were pursued, and the manner in which they escaped by the fleetness of their horses; when O'Donnell heard this information the resolution he came to was to lay an ambuscade for the foreigners in the same direction; he then selected a hundred of the best horsemen of his force, and three hundred foot soldiers with their shooting arms, viz., bows and quivers; he commanded them to lie in ambush within a mile of Sligo, and send a small party of cavalry to the banks of the river, to decoy the English forces, and should they pursue them, not to wait to engage them until they passed the place where the ambuscade was laid; all this was accordingly done. When captain Martin saw the small party of horsemen on the banks of the river, he proceeded with a large body of cavalry to wreak his vengeance on them; they at the same time moved on slowly and carelessly in the first instance, but it was not long after that until the warriors were obliged to spur on their horses, they were so closely and hotly pursued by the English; one of them, namely, Felim Riavach Mac Davett (the Mae Davids, or Davetts, were a branch of the Burkes of Mayo), was left behind despite of him, on account of the slowness of his horse, so that he was not able to keep up to his party, and was therefore obliged to wait for his enemies, and disobey the command of his lord, that is, in fighting with the English; when he was certain of being instantly killed, he turned his face to the foremost of his pursuers, and that was captain Martin, and he having raised his arm, for the purpose of wielding his weapon on the person before him who opposed them, Felim extended his hand to meet the blow made at him, to cut him down, and struck captain Martin directly in the armpit, and pierced his heart in his breast, and he was completely covered with armour except that place in which he was wounded. The English returned back after their valiant hero and warrior had been wounded, and they carried him with them on a bearer, debilitated and stretched in the faint weakness of death, until they arrived in the town, and he died that night. When O'Donnell saw that the English had retreated, he became enraged, until the decoying party certified on behalf of Felim, that nothing could have saved him from being slain by captain Martin, but that single thrust; he afterwards however became pacified in his mind, when news came to him the next day that the captain died. As to the governor, he was filled with anger and wrath after his kinsman had been slain, and he commanded his forces to construct an engine for demolishing the castle, in the expectation of taking it from O'Donnell's people, who were in it; they accordingly made it of the rafters and boards of the bed-chambers of the Culdees (the monks), and of every article which they could use which was in the monastery; they then covered this engine with the hides of cows and oxen, and also put wheels under it, to move it to the fortress, and they afterwards filled it with champions, valiant warriors, and engineers, for the purpose of demolishing the castle.² They drew with force this powerful engine, at dusk, in the beginning of the night, until they placed it against the angle of the castle, and they then began to demolish the wall. There were engineers within the castle, who commenced penetrating the wall, to enable the men inside to shoot their enemies; others of the guards went on the battlements of the fortress, who began to throw down on them large masses of stones, and rough edged rocks which smashed to atoms every thing they fell upon; others of the people of the castle went to the windows and loop holes of the castle, and began to discharge their leaden balls and rapid flames of fire on them, so that the warriors who were enclosed in the wooden engine were wounded by that pouring of stones and continued firing. The English did not endure to be wounded any longer, and as they could gain no advantage of the fortress, they left their wall-demolishing habitation, and retired deeply wounded, and were thankful for having escaped with their lives. It was an anguish of heart to the governor, sir Richard Bingham, that he could not wreak his vengeance on the guards of the fortress, or on any of the people of O'Donnell, and he returned back across the Curlew mountains through Moy Aoi, until he arrived at Roscommon. O'Donnell afterwards marched across the river Erne, and dismissed his Scottish forces, after having paid them their stipend, and having returned to Sligo, he demolished the castle, lest it should be occupied by the English.

Theobald Burke, the son of Walter Ciotach, son of John, son of Oliver, son of John, laid siege to Bel-Leice (now Belleek, on the river Moy), a castle in the barony of Tyrawley, in the county of Mayo, in which were the governor's guards; when that intelligence reached the governor, he commanded his brother, captain John Bingham, captain Foal, captain Mensi, and the son of William Buighe Tuite, together with a great number of other gentlemen along with them, to march to the relief of the castle, with provisions and arms; but before they were able to relieve the guards Theobald got possession of the castle; they returned back in sorrow, and Theobald pursued them, spearing, and circumventing them, harrassing and slaying them, throughout the day, so that they lost many men and much arms and armour; he slew on that day captain Foal, captain Mennsi, and the son and heir of William Tuite, and many other officers and common soldiers who are not recorded; and it was by their feats of arms, bravery, and good knowledge of the way, that such as survived made their escape on that day.

2. The Engine.—The engine above-mentioned was called by the Irish the Sow, and was constructed of strong planks, iron hoops, &c., covered with cow hides, and was very strong, and proof against musket balls, spears, &c. Like the wooden horse used by the Greeks at the siege of Troy, it was filled with armed warriors, and being very large, might probably contain 50 men or more, who were completely protected; the machine, being rolled on wheels, was advanced under the walls in besieging towns and attacking fortresses. This war engine is described in Ledwich's Military Antiquities, and is mentioned in the Pacata Hibernia, and in Borlase's account of the battles in the war of 1641, and was also used by the Irish at the siege of Sligo in 1689, as mentioned by Harris in his Life of King William.

O'Neill, i. e. Torlogh Luineach, the son of Niall Connallach, son of Art, son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, died; he was the most bountiful bestower of wealth and property to literary men and professors, and all those in the habit of receiving presents, of any of the lords of Ireland in his time, for he often issued invitations throughout Ireland to all those who were in the habit of seeking aid, to come to him precisely on the festivals of the birth of Christ, and when they came none departed without being satisfactorily supplied; he was a lord who had great forces retained, and on pay; a lord who was bountiful in peace, and powerful in war, until age and infirmity overcame him, and an heir was appointed to him ten years before his death, at the Parliament which was held in Dublin, in the name of the queen Elizabeth, namely, Hugh, the son of Feardorcha, i. e. the baron, son of Con, son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, who had been nominated earl (of Tyrone) at that Parliament; where O'Neill died was at Strabane, and he was interred at Ardsratha (Ardsraw, in Tyrone).

Magennis, i. e. Hugh (lord of Iveagh, in the county of Down), the son of Hugh, son of Donal Oge, a man who bore the greatest fame and renown of any of his lineage among the English and Irish of Ireland, died piously.

Torlogh, the son of Bryan, son of Donogh, son of Donogh Bacaeh (Mae Mahon), lord of western Coreabaisein (barony of Moyarta, in Clare), a man of great fame and renown throughout Ireland, according to his patrimony, for he had only a Trioeha Ced (barony), died, and his son Teige Caoch assumed his place.

Edmond-na-Sguab, the son of Ulick of the Heads, son of Riekard, son of Ulick of Knoek Tuagh, died.

O'Gallagher, (of Donegal), namely, sir John, the son of Tuathal, a man of great fame and renown among the English and Irish at that time, died on the 25th of April.

The monastery of Monaghan in Oirgiall was in possession of the English this year, and was constantly guarded by a company of soldiers, and a message reached Dublin from them stating they were in want of provisions. When the lord justice sir William Russell, and sir John Norris, received intelligence of that, they gave directions to send twenty-six companies of English and Irish soldiers, together with many officers, with provisions, and all sorts of necessary stores, to Monaghan; they proceeded on their march unnoticed and unopposed till they arrived at the town, and having remained that night in Monaghan, they prepared to depart on the following day, to go to Newry. When they proceeded a short distance eastward from Monaghan, they were met by O'Neill's people, who were there to oppose them, and uncourtous and unfriendly was the reception they got there, for they (O'Neill's forces), began to shoot, slay, cut down, and destroy them, from the fourth hour before noon-day, to the close of the evening's light, so that it was not easy to relate or enumerate all that were slain of the lord justice's people, both of officers and common soldiers, or of all they lost of military horses, of armour, and arms; and of various sorts of weapons, of property, of fine cloth, horses, and hampers of provisions, in every place through which they proceeded on that day. They encamped in the neighbourhood of Newry, and companies came for them from Newry on the following morning, and deficient and broken were their ranks going to that town, and they did not think, on leaving Dublin, that they would sustain such an overthrow in Ulster; that flying battle was fought in the month of May precisely.³

Captain Felli, a gentleman of the queen's people, who had the controul and care of the governor's lands, was treacherously slain by his own people in Caislean-an-Aircin.

O'Donnell collected his forces in the month of December, for the purpose of marching into the province of Connaught; the direction in which he

3. Battle of Killeclooney.—The engagement above mentioned in the Annals, in which the English forces were defeated with great slaughter, and their arms, ammunition, horses, &c. captured, took place on the borders of Monaghan and Armagh, and in the same year, namely 1595, according to Mae Geoghegan, who quotes O'Sullivan Beare, the lord deputy, sir William Russell, and general sir John Norris, led the English forces from Dundalk to take possession of Armagh, but Hugh O'Neill, with Maguire, O'Kane, the O'Hanlons, and other chiefs, met them on their march, and the Irish forces having attacked them, they had a fierce engagement, in which the English were defeated and put to flight to Newry, leaving 600 men dead on the field of battle, and the loss of the Irish was only 200. This battle was fought at Killeclooney, near the Few's Mountains, about two miles southward of Market Hill, in Armagh.

proceeded was to Sligo, to Traigh Eothuile (west of Ballysadare, in Sligo), through Tireragh, and across the river Moy into Tyrawley. The Clan William Burke were in contention with each other about the lordship of the country, for each of them considered that he himself was entitled to it. When O'Donnell arrived in the country, they all came at his invitation, and he having held a consultation with his counsellors, to determine which of them should be appointed lord, the resolution they finally came to was, to nominate Theobald Burke, the son of Walter Ciotach, son of John, son of Oliver, lord, because he was the first who had gone to him after he had been expelled by the English from his estate, and he promised to aid him if in his power; and moreover he, being in the prime of life, was capable of enduring the troubles and hardship of the war in which he (O'Donnell), was engaged. The title of chief was then conferred on him in the presence of the forces in general, although there were others older and more entitled to the nomination than he; after the appointment of Theobald, hostages and securities were given him by the other Burkes who were in contention with him. O'Donnell remained with Mac William during the Christmas of that year, in the barony of Cill-Meadhain (Kilmaine, in Mayo), and in the Brighs of Clanmorris (hence Mac Muiris-namBrigh, or Mac Morris of the Brighs). The lord justice of Ireland, namely, sir William Russell, was at that time in Galway, and peace was proclaimed for the space of two months, without sureties or pledges, between O'Donnell and the Conacians, on the one side, and the lord justice on the other hand, on his leaving Galway. There was not a county in Connaught, except the county of Clare alone, but all of the inhabitants, or great numbers of them from each of these counties, were in alliance and united with O'Donnell on that occasion, from Drowis (Bundrowis, in Leitrim), to Conmaicne Mara (Connamara, in Galway), and from the Moy to the Shannon; of those were the O'Kellys, except Conor, the son of Donogh Riavach, son of Teige Duv O'Kelly, for he had taken the Caladh (in Galway), from Feardorcha, the son of Kellach, son of Donal, son of Hugh-na-gCail-leach O'Kelly; and Feardorcha having attended the meeting held by O'Donnell, he was nominated lord by O'Donnell. The O'Maddens rose in the same war, except O'Madden alone, namely, Donal, the son of John, and his son Anmcha. The sons of Redmond-na-Scuab, the son of Ulick Burke, and those we have mentioned, proceeded on an expedition, and they took and demolished Meelick of O'Madden (in Galway), Tir-Athain, and the most of the castles of the country, except the Longport (the fortress of O'Madden, in the barony of Longford, county of Galway); they completely plundered and spoiled Clonfert of St. Brendan, and took the bishop of the town (Stephen Kervan, or Kirwan, bishop of Clonfert), prisoner; along with those engaged there was Owen Duv, the son of Malachy Balv O'Madden, from the district of Lusmagh (in King's county); they afterwards proceeded across the Shannon into Delvin (barony of Garrycastle, the territory of Mac Coghlan, in King's county), to Fercall (O'Molloy's territory, in King's county), and on their return back to the banks of the Shannon, two companies of soldiers which were quartered in Meath were sent in pursuit of them, and no notice or warning having gone before them, they arrived, unnoticed and unperceived, until they surrounded the town in which the plunderers were, so that numbers of them were slain, along with Anmcha, the son of Malachy Modarda, son of Malachy, son of Breasal, and Covthach Oge, the son of Covthach O'Madden; the sons of Redmond Burke, with the most of their people, escaped from that conflict. Thirteen of the castles of Connaught were demolished by O'Donnell on that expedition; after O'Donnell had crossed the Moy into Tireragh (in Sligo), he nominated Teige, the son of Teige Riavach, son of Owen, the O'Dowd, and O'Hara Riavach in Lieney; Maurice Caoch, the son of Teige of Triubhas, the Mac Donogh of Tirerrill; Roderick, the son of Hugh Mac Donogh of Corran, and Connor, the son of Teige Mac Dermott, the Mac Dermott of Moylurg; he brought with him the hostages of every country through which he passed, as sureties, and after having completed his expedition, he returned back until he crossed the river Erne.

The hostages of all Connaught, for the most part, were confined in Galway by the governor, sir Richard Bingham. It happened on a time that these became inebriated and excited, after drinking wine, in the first month of harvest of this year, and they contemplated among themselves to escape from the prison in which they were, and to fly, by stealth or force. Having determined on that resolution, they threw off their chains and fetters; the gates of the town were open at that time, and it happened to have been the time of dinner for all persons in general, for it was in the beginning of night they passed out through the gate of the town; the bridge was gained on them, so that they were obliged to face the rough river before them, and it was at the same time they were getting out of the river that the fierce soldiers of the town had arrived there, after they had crossed the bridge to meet them; some of them were killed on the spot, and the others were turned back into the prison from which they had escaped. When these informations reached the governor, he sent a written order to Galway to hang, without respite, every one who had attempted to escape on that occasion; there were hanged by command of the governor the son of Mac William Burke, namely, Edmond, the son of Richard of the Iron; the son of O'Conor Roe, the son of Teige Oge, son of Teige Buighe, son of Cathal Roe; the son of Mac David, namely, Hoberd Buighe, son of William, son of Thomas; Murrough Oge, the son of Murrough of the Battle-axes, son of Teige O'Flaherty; Donal, the son of Roderick, son of Teige O'Flaherty, and Myler, the son of Theobald, son of Walter Fada (Burke).

A. D. 1596.

Mac Carthy More died, namely, Donal, the son of Donal, son of Cormac Ladhrach, son of Teige; and although he was called Mac Carthy More, he had been honourably created earl (earl of Clancare, in Cork), before that time, by command of the sovereign of England; he left no male heir after him, who would be appointed his successor, and only one daughter, who became the wife of the son of Mac Carthy Riavach, namely, Fingin (Florence), and all were of opinion that he was heir to that Mac Carthy who died, namely Donal.

Mac Sweeney-na-dTuath (of the Districts, in Donegal), namely Owen Oge, the son of Owen Oge, son of Owen, son of Donal, an affluent, bountiful man, who incurred neither reproach nor disrespect from the time he assumed the government of his territory to the day of his death, a valiant, warlike man, benevolent and humane, brave in the conflict, successful in attacks, pre-eminent for good sense and council, in peace and war, died on the 26th of January, and his brother's son, namely, Maolmuire, the son of Murrough Mall, assumed his place.

O'Reilly i. e. John Roe, the son of Hugh Conallach, son of Maolmora, son of John, died; and although it had been ordained, according to composition by authority of the queen, some time previous to that period, that each of the descendants of Maolmora O'Reilly should enjoy the lordship of his own territory, O'Neill, i. e. Hugh (earl of Tyrone), the son of Feardorcha, appointed Philip, the son of Hugh Conallach, the O'Reilly over all Brefney; but he did not live long after he had been nominated lord, for he was accidentally killed before the space of half a quarter (six weeks), by the people of O'Neill, by whom he had been inaugurated; and Edmond, the son of Maolmora, the senior of the two lords before mentioned, was nominated the O'Reilly.

The son of the earl of Desmond died, namely, Thomas, the son of James, son of John, son of Thomas of Drogheda.

Theobald, the son of Pierce, son of Edmond Butler, lord of Cathair-Duin-Iasgaidh (Cahir, in Tipperary), and of the Third of Clonmell (barony of Iffa and Offa, in Tipperary), died; he was a man of benevolence and great bounty, and had the greatest collection of poems of any, for the most part, of the Normans of Ireland; and his son Thomas succeeded in his place.

Mac Geoghegan, namely Niall, the son of Rossa, son of Conla, died.

Redmond Fitzgerald, lord of Tuath Brothail (Broghill Castle, near Charleville, in the county of Cork, one of the seats of the Fitzgeralds of Desmond), was put to death in Cork, on account of the crimes of his rebellion against the English.

When the lord justice and the council of Ireland perceived the strength and power of the Irish against them, and that all those whom they had brought under subjection to themselves before that time were joining in alliance with the forementioned Irish, in opposition to them, the resolution they came to was, to send ambassadors to O'Neill and O'Donnell, to sue for peace and truce from them. The persons chosen for negotiating affairs between them were Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, and the archbishop of Cashel, namely, Myler Magrath. The earl of Ormond proceeded to Dundalk, where he remained, and sent dispatches to O'Neill, informing him of the object of his arrival there ; O'Neill sent the same messages to O'Donnell, and O'Don-

XII. Ancient Topography and Chiefs of Ulster &c.—In the various topographical annotations, in the course of these Annals, accounts have been given of the old territorial divisions, and of the possessions held by each of the Irish princes and chiefs ; but an opportunity did not occur, until now, of giving in full O'Dugan's Topography of Ulster, which is now translated from the original Irish, as his topography of Meath, and Connaught, has been given in former numbers. The topography of O'Heerin on Leinster and Munster, has been also given in the course of these notes ; and an account of these important works, the Topographies of O'Dugan and O'Heerin, has been given in the Introduction to these Annals. They contain an account of the territories possessed by each of the Irish princes, lords, and chiefs, in the 12th and 13th centuries, and are now for the first time translated from the Irish, and embodied in these notes ; but a full translation of these valuable Topographies, accompanied with the necessary annotations, and the Irish original on one side, is in course of preparation, and will be published in a separate work, as soon as prepared.

The Eugenians and tribes of Aileach.—O'Dugan thus commences his Topography of Ulster :

"Let us proceed to the chiefs of Uladh (Ulster),
From Tailtean of the valiant warriors,
From the Plain of Bregia, and forth from Meath,
From the select tribes of Temor.

"We must not stop till we arrive at Aileach,
To the race of Eogan of powerful arms ;
The sway of greatness they uprightly obtained,
The supreme nobility of Erin.

"This statement is not an idle saying,
Which has been handed down by historians ;
The torches of royal houses and of feasts,
All were heroes up to Eogan."

The O'Neills and Mac Loughlins are thus designated by O'Dugan :

"Hui Niall rioghda an ratha truí
Agus Meg laomsgair Lachlaind
Dual don maíne an mine
Da aicme na hairdrihe.

"The princely O'Neill, of great prosperity,
And also the mighty Mac Loughlin ;
Hereditary it was to those warlike chiefs
To be both heirs to the monarchy."

O'Dugan then proceeds to describe the other chiefs of the race of Eogan, and their territories :

"Ten Triochas, no mean portion belonged
To the ten sons of Eogan of the red weapons ;
Delightful to behold their possessions,
To them an undisputed inheritance.

"Of the Kinel Eogan, of mild countenance,
The prince of Kianaght is O'Cathain,
His forces are ready at every call ;
Of the race of Teige, the son of Kian of Cashel,
Is the tribe of abundant wealth and fame,
O'Conor was at first their prince."

Aileach, above mentioned, was a celebrated fortress, in Donegal, and the chief residence of the ancient kings of Ulster, of the race of Hy Niall, and an account of it has been given at p. 438 in the notes. The Eugenians, or race of Eogan, also called Kinel Eogain, the head branch of the Northern Hy Niall, possessed the territory of Tir-Eogain, which comprised the present counties of Tyrone and Derry, with a portion of Donegal, and accounts of the chiefs of the Eugenians, and their territories, have been given at pp. 49, 50, and also at pp. 441, 442, in these notes. The O'Neills, above mentioned, were princes of Tir-Eogain, princes of Aileach, and kings of Ulster, and many of their ancestors also monarchs of Ireland. The Mac Loughlins, who are mentioned by O'Dugan and sometimes called O'Loughlins, were a branch of the O'Neills, as before explained, and became powerful chiefs, as princes of Aileach and kings of Ulster ; and two of them were acknowledged as monarchs of Ireland in the 12th century. Many of their distinguished chiefs are recorded in these Annals in the 11th and 12th centuries, and they held their rank to the end of the 12th century, when they were put down by the O'Neills, who became princes of Tir-Eogain, and held their rank and power down to the 17th century. There are still many respectable families of the Mac Loughlins in Ulster, and various other parts of Ireland. O'Cahan, or O'Kane, prince of Cianachta, above mentioned, ruled over the greater part of the present county of Derry, and the name of his chief territory is still preserved in the barony of Kenaght. The territory of the O'Kanes was also called Oireacht-Ui-Chathain, or O'Kane's Country ; these powerful chiefs had also some possessions in Antrim, and a further account of them will be found at p. 50, in the notes. Many distinguished and valiant chiefs of the O'Kanes are mentioned in the course of these Annals, and they held their rank and possessions down to the end of the reign of Elizabeth ; but in the reign of James I., their territory, like most of the other parts of Ulster, was confiscated in the project called the Plantation of Ulster, and transferred to British settlers, chiefly to a Company of Londoners, who gave its name to the county of London-Derry. There are still some respectable families of the O'Kanes in Ulster, and other parts of Ireland. The O'Conors, mentioned by O'Dugan as the first possessors of O'Kane's Country, were the descendants of Teige the son of Cian, or Kian, son of Oilioll Olum, king of Munster or Cashel, in the third century, and from their ancestor Kian the country was called Kianaghta. O'Dugan thus proceeds in his account of the other chiefs of Tir-Eogain :

"O'Dooyiarma of exalted fame,
Chief of Bredach, of ancient nobility ;
Their tribe has been of high prosperity,
The most noble race that sprung from Eogan.
The chief who always cultivated peace,
Of the men of Bredach was the race of the monarchs.

"A strong chief rules over Tullaghoge,
O'Hagan, the lord of fair avenues ;
The oak woods abound through every place,
It is also ruled by another O'Hagan.

"The O'Gormleys of mighty deeds,
Numerous are their warriors at the hanquets ;
The fortress of heroes is comfortable and happy,
They rule over the noble Kinel Moen.

"O'Fergal of substantial aid,
The fair O'Donnellan of fine figure ;
Strongly established on the soil
Are O'Donnagan and Mac Murrough.

"Mac Dunchuan and the agreeable Mac Rory,
Rule over the extensive Teallach Nainbith ;
No others are heard of over the inhabited plains,
Or over the victorious Muintir Birn.

"The chiefs of the exalted Kinel Eochy
Are Muintir Kelly of just judgments ;
O'Kieran rules with might over Fearnmuigh,
And also the strong tribe of O'Tierney.

"The noble men of Moy Ith,
Who have defended distant countries ;
Their worthy acts are seen in every church ;
They are O'Maolbreasail and O'Boyle ;
They excel in ships over all heroes,
O'Quinn the brave, and O'Kenny.

nell, with a large body of cavalry, having gone to where O'Neill was, they both proceeded to Foch-aird Muirthemhne (Foghard, near Dundalk, in Louth). The earl and the archbishop having come to them, they related to the chiefs the object which had brought them, viz., that it was to treat for peace

"Kinel Binigh of the fair glens,
Chiefs who venerated the truth ;
Kinel Binigh of Tuath Rois,
From which lasting fame has spread.

"Kinel Binigh, not accustomed to bondage,
Of Loch-Drochaid of violent waves ;
Heroes who shared in every conflict,
O'Donnell is their brave chieftain.

"Of one tribe are the O'Duvans,
What poet has not truly heard of them ?
Their commands are promptly executed,
Of those are O'Hamill and O'Etigen.

"Three tribes in the eastern territory,
They are Tealach-Cathalain of clerics,
Also the delightful Tealach-Braonan,
In their praise the verse runs smoothly.

"Teallach Dubhrnille of prosperity,
Their noble conduct is hereditary ;
The Fir-Li flourish in that place :
Those are the three tribes.

"Over the powerful Kinel-Tiarnaigh,
O'Mnolfogharty I record ;
Great is their knowledge and prosperity,
Of those are O'Hosey and O'Eogan.

"The Clan Fergus of warriors,
By the records we know their chiefs ;
Victorious are they on every hill,
They are Clan Cunnach and Clan Baothgulaeh.

"Over the lasting Carraic Brachaidhe,
Over Clan Forgusa of the red arms,
Ruled O'Bruadair and O'Maolfabhail ;
They extended on both sides to the waves,
As far as O'Hagan on this side,
Maintaining a tribe of the people.

"Proclaim for Siol-Aodha-Eanaigh,
Their chieftains ruling over their tribes,
For them the poem is not dull or scanty,
They are O'Murrough and O'Mellan.

"Kinel Fearndaigh of the Banquets,
Their pedigree has been always noble ;
O'Fiachra ruled the strong southern half,
I do not fear his courage in the conflict.

"The Siol Airnin rule on the northern side,
And the Siol Maolfabhail of red weapons,
A clan who got their property not unlawfully by arms,
And the Clan Caghwell of battles.

"Two tribes in the east excelling all forces
In the exalted Kinel Fearadaigh ;
The tribe of Maolgeimry of honesty,
And the fair and active tribe of Maolpatrick.

"We cease to treat of the hospitable clans,
We end with the tribes of Fearadneh,
We follow the course of all historians,
And proceed from the exalted race of Eogan."

The tribe of O'Dooyiarma, or O'Duibhdiorina, above-mentioned, were chiefs of note in former times, and possessed the territory of Bredach, near Lough Foyle, in Donegal, as mentioned at p. 50. Some of them are mentioned in the Annals at an early period, but they make no figure in after times ; they anglicised the name O'Dermott or Mac Dermott, but they were a different clan from the Mac Dermotts of Rosecommon. The O'Hagans mentioned by O'Dugan were chiefs of Tullaghoge in Tyrone, in the barony of Dungannon, and were Brehons to the O'Neills, princes of Tyrone. The O'Gormleys were anciently chiefs of note, in the barony of Raphoe, county of Donegal, and are often mentioned in the course of the Annals. The Mac Caghwells, above-mentioned by O'Dugan, were lords of Kinel Feradaigh, in the barony of Omagh, in Tyrone, and held Ardstraw and other districts. They were powerful chiefs, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals, but in modern times there are few families of them of any note ; some of them have changed the name to Campbell, and others to Caulfield, and are to be found in Tyrone, Monaghan, Armagh, and Louth. The various chiefs above mentioned by O'Dugan were located in different parts of Tyrone, Derry, and Donegal, and an account of the territories possessed by each has been given at p. 50, in the note on Tir-Eogain.

The Orgiellians, or tribes of Orgiall.—An account of the ancient territory of Orgiall, which comprised the present counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh, has been given at p. 2, in the note on Orgiall, but ancient Orgiall appears to have been of greater extent, and to have comprised some of the southern part of Tyrone, in the barony of Clogher, bordering on Monaghan, and also the greater part of Fermanagh, and, under the head Orgiall, O'Dugan describes the chiefs of all those territories, and also some in Dalradia, or the southern part of the present county of Antrim, as some of the Orgiellians, or race of Clan Colla, possessed parts of all those territories. An account of the chiefs and clans of Orgiall, of the race of Clan Colla, and the territories possessed by them, has been given at p. 2 in these notes, and a further account of the Orgiellians has been given at p. 417. An account of the chiefs and clans of Fermanagh, who were mostly Orgiellians, has been given at pp. 78, 79, in the notes on Fermanagh. The Hy Manians of Connaught were also a branch of the Orgiellians, of the race of Clan Colla, and came originally from Ulster ; their head chiefs were the O'Kellys, princes of Hy Maine, in Galway and Rosecommon. An account of the O'Kellys, O'Maddens, O'Mulallys, O'Neaghtans, or O'Nortons, Mac Egans, and other chiefs of the Hy Manians, has been given in the notes on South Connaught. O'Dugan thus proceeds to describe the chiefs and clans of the Orgiellians, and their territories :

"Let us hasten onwards on our journey,
Let us leave the country of the nobles,
And not stop till we come to the Orgiellians,
Men who were not fettered as hostages.

"O'Carroll and O'Duibdara,
Exalted princes, free from massacre,
Men who maintained all clerics,
Ruled over the Orgiellians without reproach."

O'Dugan thus designates Mac Mahon and Maguire, princes of Orgiall, in the following verses, of which the translation is added :

"Ardriogha na n-ionadh sin
Meg Mathghamhna is Maguidhir
Maith uaibhsi aniocht a riaghlaibh
Slíocht as naisle d'Orgiallaibh."

"Mag Uidhir as ceann da geath
Air Fearaibh morda Monaeh,
Maith a thoirbearta ga thigh
Flaith as oirdheara n-einigh."

"The high princes of that country
Are Mac Mahon and Maguire ;
It is well for those who are under their rule,
They are the most noble tribe of the Orgiellians.

"Maguire is leader of their battalions,
He rules over the mighty men of Monaeh ;
At home munificent in presents,
The noblest lord in hospitality."

they were sent, and they related the terms which the lord justice proposed, which were the confirmation of the province of Concovar (Ulster), to

The O'Carrolls, princes of Orgiall, ruled chiefly over the territory now forming the county of Louth, with parts of Monaghan and Armagh, and the Mac Mahons, afterwards princes of Orgiall, and lords of Monaghan, Dartry, and Farney, ruled over the territory which forms the present county of Monaghan, with part of Louth, and were lords of Lurgan in that county. Many distinguished chiefs of the O'Carrolls and Mac Mahons are mentioned in these Annals, and in the annotations. It appears that, soon after the English invasion, the O'Carrolls were put down by John de Courcy and his Anglo-Norman followers, as the de Verdons, de Gernons, Clintons, Flemings, Taaffes, Peppards, &c., who took possession of Oriel or Louth, which constituted part of the English Pale. The O'Carrolls afterwards make no figure in Irish history, but the Mac Mahons maintained their independence for many centuries, with great valour, amidst incessant war with the English of the Pale; and copious accounts are given, in the course of these Annals, and in the notes, of the battles of the Mac Mahons with the British settlers for more than 300 years. Down to the reign of James I., and even to the Cromwellian wars, the Mac Mahons had considerable possessions and power in Monaghan, and some interesting accounts of them will be found in the Tracts of sir John Davis. The last celebrated chief of Monaghan was Hugh Mac Mahon, who actively co-operated with sir Felim O'Neill in the great insurrection of 1641, and having, in conjunction with Conor Maguire, baron of Enniskillen, attempted, in 1641, to seize the castle of Dublin, the plot was discovered by one Owen O'Connolly, and Maguire and Mac Mahon, being made prisoners, were sent to the Tower of London, and in 1644 both tried and beheaded at Tyburn. The Mac Mahons are still very numerous in Monaghan, and there are some respectable families of them in that county. There were, in former times, many eminent ecclesiastics of the name, and three of them were archbishops of Armagh in the 18th century, of whom accounts are given in Stewart's Armagh. The Mac Mahons of Monaghan, as before stated, were of the race of Clan Colla, and of a different descent from the Mac Mahons of Clare, chiefs in Thomond, who were of the race of the Dalcassians. Spenser, in his View of Ireland, has absurdly asserted that the Mac Mahons of Monaghan were of English descent, and of the ancient family of Fitz-Urse, or Fitz-Ursula, and he also states that the Mac Sweeneys of Donegal were of English extraction, being a branch of the de Veres, earls of Oxford, and that the Mac Sheehys of Munster were of English descent. Spenser likewise states that the O'Tooles and O'Byrnes of Wicklow were of British descent, but all these assertions are utterly absurd, and fully contradicted by all the accounts of these Milesian clans given by the Irish genealogists and historians. The Maguires, princes of Fermanagh, make a remarkable figure in Irish history, and many distinguished chiefs of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals, amongst others, the valiant Hugh Maguire, a commander of note in the war against Elizabeth, in conjunction with O'Neill and O'Donnell. The O'Dubhdaras, above-mentioned by O'Dugan, were princes of Fermanagh, in the 11th and 12th centuries, before the Maguires, and some of them are recorded in the Annals; but in after times they make no figure, and appear to have become extinct (see notes on Fermanagh, p. 79). O'Dugan thus proceeds with the other chiefs of Orgiall:

"To a lordship entitled by right,
Is O'Lairgnen, a full prince of Orgiall;
Nothing can be claimed without strong warlike power,
By O'Flaithri the high prince of Ulidia."

The name O'Lairgnen has been anglicised to O'Largan, and O'Flaithri, to O'Florry, and both these appear to have been chiefs of note in some part of Orgiall in ancient times.

"Princes of Hy Tuirtre of great victories,
They are O'Flynn and O'Donnellan;
O'Heire rules over Hy Fiachra Finn,
Who never flinched from battle or conflict."

them, except the tract of country from Dundalk to the Boyne, which was inhabited by the English for a long period before that time; and along with

"Lord of the smooth Machaire Meadhaidh,
O'Críodain rules over tribes;
O'Haodha over another clan,
He governs the men of Fearnmoighe."

"O'Keevan, leader of the battalion,
Lord of Magh Leamhna, of high prosperity;
Noble is the warrior of goblets,
O'Machoiden is lord of Mourne"

The O'Flynnns above-mentioned, were princes of Hy Tuirtre, an ancient territory in Dalaradia, which lay along Lough Neagh in the southern part of Antrim, and is described in the notes at p. 20. The O'Flynnns were distinguished chiefs, and are often mentioned in the Annals in the 12th century, and they fought with great valour many battles against John de Courcy and the Anglo-Normans, as recorded in the Annals, and in the notes on Ulster. The O'Donnellans were chiefs on the same territory as O'Flynn. The O'Herces, or Ercks; the O'Críodans, or Creedans, and O'Haodha, that is O'Hugh, or O'Hea, were chiefs in Fermoy, which was situated in the barony of Iveagh, county of Down. O'Machoiden, probably O'Macken, was chief of Mourne in Down. An account of the territories possessed by all these chiefs is given at p. 20 in the notes:

"Two exalted lords ruled over Oirtheara,
They are O'Hir and O'Hanlon;
O'Cosgraigh is chief of the plain of Feara Rois;
They are victorious in every battle."

"Lord of O'Meth Macha, undisputed,
Is O'Hanratty of the great preys,
A scion who ruled over a strong trihe;
Mac Donnell governed Clan Kelly."

The O'Hanlons were lords of the territory which now forms the baronies of Orior, in Armagh, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals; they were powerful and valiant chiefs, and held the office of hereditary standard-bearers to the kings of Ulster. The O'Cosgreys, sometimes called Mac Cuskers, or Mac Oscars, and by others changed to Cosgraves, were chiefs in part of Farney in Monaghan, and some adjoining parts of Louth, as shown at p. 3 in the notes. The O'Hanrattys were chiefs of note in Armagh, and held the territory of O'Meth Macha, sometimes called O'Meath, and part of it forms the district called Meigh, in the parish of Killevey, and barony of Orior, near Newry, and along Slievegullion mountain. Mac Donnell, mentioned as chief of Clan Kelly, appears to have been located in Orior, or the adjoining barony of Iveagh, in Down.

"The blue-eyed host of fair hands,
The red-lipped O'Boylans;
Chiefs of the excellent steeds,
The intrepid lords of Dartry."

"Hy Laoghair, of Lough Lir,
The Muintir Taithligh were their chiefs;
The powerful Muintir Maolduin of Lurg,
Deep were their wounds in combat."

The O'Boylans were the head chiefs of Dartry, in Monaghan. The O'Tullys, or Mac Tullys, were chiefs of Lough Lir, which appears to have been a district in Fermanagh, near Lough Erne, in the barony of Lurg, and several of the O'Tullys are mentioned as abbots and Erenachs of Devenish, in Fermanagh. The O'Muldoons, lords of Lurg, were chiefs of note in ancient times.

"Mac Tiarnan, the flourishing chief,
Rules over the intelligent Clan Fergall;
The fair Tuath Ratha, free from conflicts,
Is entirely ruled by O'Flanagan."

that they promised, that the English should not eneraoch on them beyond that boundary, exept the English who were in Carriekfergus, in Carling-

"Muintir Peodachain of the Port,
Chiefs of the noblest offspring;
Melodious men of the level plain,
I record the prosperous Mac Gilfinnen."

The Mac Tiernans were chiefs of Clan Fergal, which appears to have been either in Clanawley or Magheraboy, in Fermanagh. The O'Flanagan, lords of Tura, ruled over the territory which now forms the barony of Magheraboy, in Fermanagh, and a further account of them will be found at p. 79, in the notes; they were distinguished chiefs, and many of them are mentioned in the course of the Annals. The Mac Gilfinnens were lords of Muintir Peodachain, in the north of Fermanagh, and on the borders of Donegal, and the name of the district is still preserved in the town and river of Pettigoc. The Mac Gilfinnens were distinguished chiefs, and many of them are recorded in the course of the Annals, as military commanders and admirals of Lough Erne, under the O'Donnells of Donegal. A further account of them is given at p. 79, in the notes; in modern times some of them have changed the name to Finnan, and others to Leonard.

"It is proper to speak of and record them,
The valiant chiefs O'Connollys;
The handsome tribe, like lions in combat,
Are the majestic Mac Gilmichaels."

"The prosperous O'Mulrooneys,
And O'Heaneys of great renown,
They are two lords who rule
Over the fertile slopes of Monagh."

"Lord of Triucha Ceud Cladaigh
Is Mac Kenna, as you have heard recorded,
A tree, though it bends, is strong,
He is from Meath, though now in Orgiall."

The O'Mulrooneys and O'Heaneys were chiefs of note in Fermanagh, and appear to have been located on the borders of Monaghan; some of the O'Mulrooneys have changed the name to Rooney. The Mac Kennas were chiefs of Truagh, in Monaghan, and came originally from Meath.

"O'Cormac is valorous with his clan,
He rules over the warlike Hy Mac Carthan.
Over the exalted Hy Breasail Macha Rules O'Garvey, the valiant chieftain."

"O'Longan and O'Duvany,
O'Conor of the well-formed figure,
They all rule over western Hy Breasail,
By whom every nobleman is entertained."

"Over the exalted eastern Hy Breasail,
Rules the brave O'Loreau, free from sorrow,
Like trees they protect every mansion;
O'Heaney rules over Clan Kearney."

"The O'Donnells, men of extensive possessions,
And the prosperous O'Rogans;
They were courageous in battle,
Two noble tribes of Iveagh."

"The tribe of Duibhtire rule over the country,
Over the well-formed Clan Daiuhui;
O'Mulereave, I relate to you,
Rules the dark-haired majestic Clan Sionagh."

"O'Lachtan rules over the lesser Mourne,
Whose sway is not diminished;
O'Hanvey, whose course is prosperous,
Is lord over the profitable Hy Seanain."

ford, and in Newry, who were always permitted to carry on commerce and traffic; that no officers or collectors of rents or tributes should be sent to

"Over the valorous Hy Mac Carthain, Rule noble majestic chiefs,
Most of their ancestors were princes,
They are O'Colgan and O'Connell."

"The high princes of those territories
Are the Mac Mahons of nobility,
Good are their laws and regulations,
The most noble tribe in Orgiall."

"Their most exalted achievements we have proclaimed,
Eastward into Ulidia let us proceed,
It is agreeable for us to part in friendship,
We must not therefore remain in Orgiall."

The O'Garveys, above mentioned in the poem, were chiefs of note in ancient times, and an account of them is given at the latter end of O'Brien's Irish Dictionary; they were located on Hy Breasail Macha, or Clan Breasail, which comprised the baronies of O'Neil-land in Armagh, and some of them also had possessions in Iveagh, in the county of Down. O'Loreau or O'Larkin, and O'Heaney, were also chiefs in Hy Breasail. The O'Donnells and O'Rogans, or Rodaghans, were chiefs in Iveagh, in the county of Down. The O'Loghans were chiefs in Mourne, in the county of Down, and the O'Hanveys were chiefs about the same territory. The O'Cormacs, O'Colgans, and O'Connells, are given as chiefs in Hy Mac Carthain. The Mac Mahons are stated by O'Dugan to have ruled over all those chiefs and territories, above-mentioned, as princes of Orgiall; these were the Mac Mahons of Monaghan, of whom an account has been given in the preceding part of this article.

The Tribes of Creeve Roe and Ulidia.—O'Dugan thus proceeds to describe the chiefs on the territories of Craobh Ruadh, and Uladh. The term Craobh Ruadh, signifying the Red Branch, was applied to the ancient territory originally possessed in the first century by the celebrated champions called the Red Branch Knights of Ulster, and comprised the districts about Emania, which was situated near Armagh. From the ancient kings of Emania, of the Irian race, were descended the kings of Uladh or Ulidia, now the county of Down, and the following princes and chiefs, described by O'Dugan, were their descendants:

"Let us proclaim the renown of Creeve Roe,
The high kings of Ulidia we shall enumerate;
The heads of established hospitality,
Are O'Dunlevy and O'Heoghy."

"Of their nobles are the men of fierce combats,
They are O'Aidith and O'Eochagan;
Great are the acquirements by preys,
Of the O'Lawreys and O'Lawlors."

"O'Loinsy of the haughty champions,
And O'Mordha of the red helmets;
Let us visit their territories,
And cease from treating of the princes;
Hereditary to their chiefs are the possessions;
Of their nobles is O'Mahon."

"The chiefs of Hy Eachach Coba,
Powerful are their ancient tribes;
Delightful are their meetings in every country,
To entertain the active O'Garvey."

"O'Hanvey is high prince there,
He has not been neglected, nor shall we neglect him;
His prosperity and power have not been retarded, Proud is he in leading in the battle."

"Chief over the noble Clan Aodh
Is the exalted and agreeable Magennis;
They settled on the fertile hill,
They took possession of all Ulidia."

them, but to transmit to Dublin the rent which had been formerly imposed on their ancestors ; that no hostages or sureties would be demanded from them for that purpose, and that the same terms should be extended to the Irish who were in alliance with O'Donnell in the province of Connaught.

"To Mac Cartan by charter belongs
The intelligent Kinel Fogartaigh,
Champions who have been liberal to clerics,
The treasurers of hospitality are they.

"O'Duvany above all trites,
Over the exalted Kinel Amalgaidh ;
O'Morna of the tribe of victory,
The leaders of Ulidia of high-tempered weapons.

"Mac Dullaghan of the hosts
Rules over the yellow-haired Clan Breasal ;
The O'Coltarans, adjoining the fortress,
Are dwellers in Dal-Cuirb.

"In the north-east have been collected,
The stock of the nobility in Ulster ;
Brave men by whom tribes are supported,
The head source of hospitality in Erin.

"The sway of heroism of Leath Cuinn,
The champions of triumph and combat,
Numerous are the farmers on their hills ;
They are the Ulidians and Erneans.

"It is difficult to depart from Emania,
From the exalted Creeve Roe of long weapons ;
And though bound to go to the land of the west,
My inclination would lead me to retard my progress.

"Let us proceed from Boirche of the pointed hills,
And from Cualigne, the country of glens ;
From Moyrath of the fatal conflict,
To the port of the heroes of O'Labradha.

"From Dun-da-Leathglas of the mantles (Downpatrick),
Which is the chief cemetery of Erin ;
On trying there I could not discover
The earth of which town enclosed Colum (St. Columkille).

"In the same tomb was buried
Bridget, the victory of heroines,
Where all sway has been conferred on them ;
Patrick lies at Macha, in the great tomb.

"The victory of Erin belongs to the Ultonians,
With the host of chariots of fair form ;
Through their valour they have gained conquest ;
The noblest of Erin are the Eugenians.

"The head of Ireland is the great Armagh,
But not in reference to the nobleness of its chiefs ;
Men profoundly learned are there,
Without disparagement to the three let us proceed."

An account of the territories called Ulidia and Dalaradia, which comprised the present county of Down and part of Antrim, with their chiefs and clans, has been given at pp. 20, 21, in these notes, and a further account of the Ulidians, Dalaradians, Irians, and other tribes who possessed those territories, has been given from p. 415 to 417, in the notes on Ulster. The O'Dunlevys above-mentioned by O'Dugan, and their ancestors of the Irian race of kings in Ulster, were in ancient times kings and princes of Ulidia, and the chief rulers of that territory. Many of them are mentioned in the Annals in the 11th and 12th centuries, but after that period they make no figure in Irish history, being subdued by John de Courcy and his Anglo-Norman followers, the Savadges, Mandevilles, Audleys, Coplands, Russells, Whites, &c., who took possession of the greater part of Ulidia, or county of Down. There are in modern times very few families of any note of the O'Dunlevys in Ireland. The O'Garveys above-mentioned by O'Dugan, were anciently chiefs of note, but they make no figure in modern times ; they had extensive possessions in Down and Armagh, and an account of them has been given in the preceding part of the present article, in the note on Orgiall. The Magennisses mentioned by O'Dugan became the head chiefs of the Irian race, and representatives of the ancient kings of Ulidia ; they were styled princes and lords of Iveagh, and some of them were created viscounts of Iveagh ; they possessed the baronies of Iveagh and Lecale, with part of Mourne, in the county of Down, and a further account of them is given at p. 20 in the notes. Many distinguished chiefs of the Magennisses are mentioned in the course of these Annals, and there are several respectable families of the name in modern times in Ulster and other parts of Ireland. The O'Loinsys, or O'Lynches ; O'Lawreys, or O'Lowrys ; O'Heoghys, or O'Hoey ; Mac Cartans, O'Hanveys, O'Duvans, O'Mahons, O'Moore, O'Lawlors, O'Logh-nans, O'Larkans, O'Colgans, O'Connells, O'Heaneys, O'Coltrans, or O'Coulter, &c., above-mentioned by O'Dugan, were all chiefs of note in ancient times in Ulidia, and part of Orgiall, and were located in the county of Down, and some adjoining parts of Antrim, Armagh, and Louth, and an account of the territories possessed by them has been given in the notes on Dalaradia, Ulidia, and Orgiall. These chiefs appear to have been mostly all put down by John de Courcy and his Anglo-Normans, for in subsequent times few of them make any figure, and many of them were expelled to other parts of Ireland. The ancestors of the O'Mordhas, O'Morras, or O'Moore, of the Irian race in Ulidia in very remote times, settled in Leinster, and were very distinguished chiefs as princes of Leix, now part of the Queen's county and Kildare, and an account of them has been given in the notes on Leix. The O'Lawlors from Ulidia also settled in Leix in ancient times.

O'Dugan above refers to the circumstance of St. Columkille and St. Bridget being buried at Downpatrick, and says that St. Patrick was buried at Macha, or Armagh, but the old ecclesiastical historians state that St. Patrick, Bridget, and Columkille were buried at Downpatrick ; it is, however, stated by others, that the relics of St. Patrick were removed to Armagh, which may be above alluded to by O'Dugan.

Tirconnell and the Connallians.—An account of the territory of Tirconnell or Donegal, with its chiefs and clans, has been given at pp. 51, 52, in the notes, and a further account of the Connallians has been given at pp. 441, 442, in the notes on Ulster. O'Dugan thus commences the topography of Tirconnell :

"Our progress is a journey of prosperity,
Let us leave the valiant host of great Macha,
Let us not refuse good prosperity to that people,
Let us proceed into Kinel Conaill.

"Let them come, it is a prosperous journey,
Rugged is the land of that race,
To meet us at the Cataract of Hugh ;
It is the interest of that people of agreeable aspect.

"The O'Maoldoras, were they living,
Would come (but they will not come),
Without delay, or slow assembly,
To meet us, and so would the O'Canannans."

The Cataract of Hugh is the great waterfall at Ballyshannon called Easroe. The O'Maoldoras, or O'Muldorys, and O'Canannans, were the ancient princes of Tirconnell before the O'Donnells, and of the same descent as that great family who were the head chiefs of the race of the Connallians. Many valiant chiefs of the O'Maoldoras and O'Canannans are mentioned in these Annals in the 11th and 12th centuries ; they were powerful princes in those times, and ruled over Tirconnell and some parts of the adjoining territories, but, in the latter end of the 12th century, they were put down by the O'Donnells, and afterwards make no figure in Irish history ; and O'Dugan, in the above verses, alludes to their having become obscure, and their power extinct in his time ; in modern times there are a few of the name of O'Muldory, or O'Muldarry, and of the O'Canannans scattered in parts of Ulster and Meath, but all extremely obscure.

O'Neill and O'Donnell, and all the chiefs of the province who were along with them, then held a council concerning those terms which were conveyed to them, and they, and the chiefs in general, having considered for a long time on all the treachery which had been committed by the English since

The Clann Dalaigh are thus designated by O'Dugan :

"Tioefa siad budh teand a d-triath
Clanna Dalaigh na n-doinn sgiath
Leo go coimheheart gan chrionadh Oidhreacht o na h-airdrioghaibh."

"These will come, powerful are their lords,
The Clanna Dalaigh of the brown shields;
To them belongs, by undecayed sway,
The inheritance from the high kings."

The Clan Dalaigh, above mentioned, means the O'Donnells, that being their tribe-name, taken from Dalach, a celebrated chief, one of their ancestors in the tenth century; but they afterwards took the name O'Donnell, from Donal, another of their celebrated chieftains in the tenth century. The O'Dalys of Connaught were of the same descent as the O'Donnells, and kept the ancient tribe-name Clanna Dalaigh. The O'Donnells, princes of Tیرهonnell, of whom copious accounts are given in the course of these Annals, were very distinguished chieftains, and many of them were eminent for great abilities and valour. The O'Neills and O'Donnells, head chiefs of the northern Hy Niall, and rulers of Ulster, make a conspicuous figure in the history of Ireland, and were by far the most illustrious of the Irish princes; they always kept up more numerous and better disciplined forces than any others of the Irish chiefs, and, from the 12th to the 17th century, for a period of more than 400 years, they maintained their power and independence amidst incessant warfare with the English of the Pale, and were ultimately subdued only by very powerful armies sent from England in the war of Elizabeth. Ample accounts are given in the Annals of the many battles fought during this war by the northern Irish, under their heroic leaders, Hugh O'Neill and Red Hugh O'Donnell. Even down to the middle of the 17th century, the O'Neills make a remarkable figure in Irish history, in the great insurrection of 1641, and the Cromwellian wars, Felim, and the celebrated Owen Roe O'Neill, being the chief commanders of the northern Irish in those wars. After the war of Elizabeth, the project called the Plantation of Ulster was carried into effect, in the reign of James I., by which the entire lands of six counties in Ulster, namely, Tyrone, Derry, Donegal, Fermanagh, Cavan, and Armagh, were confiscated, and the ancient territories of the O'Neills, O'Donnells, O'Reillys, Maguinness, and other chiefs, were transferred to colonies of British settlers.

O'Dugan thus proceeds with the topography of Tیرهonnell :

"Clan Cinnfaoladh of the white steeds,
And delightful Tir-Ainmireach;
Their troops are valiant to be seen,
And also the warlike Tir-Baghuine.

"This is the portion of the proud host,
The country of O'Boyle of the rosy complexion;
The resident tribe, who are numerous there,
They have a large portion of the land.

"O'Maolmaghna rules over Magh Seireadh,
To learned men he proved intelligent;
O'Hugh governs at the prosperous cataraet,
He is active in the conflict of every great force.

"To O'Taireirt of powerful heroes
Belongs the purely fair Clana Neachtain;
Mac Duvan, as extensively known,
Rules over Kinel Enda of bright arms.

"Gleann Finne, free is the enclosure of streams,
Which belongs to the affluent Mac Loingseachan;
Powerful with his spears in every conflict
Is O'Breislen the hospitable in Fanad.

"The host of Catharnaidh, who are not deceitful,
Are over Ard Miodhair of the fertile slopes;
An account which has been truly established
Has assigned it to O'Dogherty.

"To the power Mac Gillesamhais belong
Ros Guill and Ros Iorguill, as I record,
A host without deception or falsehood;
O'Furaran rules over Fionn-Rus.

"Two other chiefs are certified to you,
Rule over the victorious Tuath-Bladhaigh,
Of those is O'Cearnach, as recorded,
And his prosperity I have certified.

"Of those are the princely host of thriving folds,
Muintir Dalachan of the bountiful presents;
I shall relate in proper verses to you,
Their names and their territories.

"Tir-Mac-Caorthain of the preys and slaughters
Is possessed by the cheerful tribe of O'Mulligan;
To mention them in my poem is our decision,
There was a time when it would not have been regretful.

"Tir Breasail, the country of produce,
Two tribes are in its full possession;
Numerously established are they in their country,
They are O'Donnagan and Mac Garvey.

"The wound-giving Muintir-Maolgaoithe, [fortable.
By whom the country of the foreigners has been made com-
A tribe distinguished as spearmen, O'Maolgaoithe is their lawful chief.

"Mac Tiernan of the fair countenance
Rules over the steady Clan Feargal;
Many prosperous clerics have sprung from the tribe;
Let us depart from Kinel Connell.

"The victory and valour of the clans of Niall,
Are carried in battle-sway by Tیرهonnell;
A host not slow to entertain me there,
Although from Tیرهonnell we must depart."

An account has been given at p. 52, in the note on Tیرهonnell, of the territories possessed by each of the chiefs and clans above-mentioned by O'Dugan, and they were all located in various parts of the county of Donegal.

The Brefnians, or Tribes of Brefney.—O'Dugan proceeds to describe the territories of Connaught, and an account of them, with their princes and chiefs, has been given in the notes on North and South Connaught, and on Brefney, but an opportunity did not occur until now of giving O'Dugan's poem on the chiefs and clans of Brefney.

"From Siol Murray of mirthfulness
Let us proceed into the country of Sen-Feargal,
To the host of Brefney of keen knowledge;
It is time, though slow is our progress."

Siol Murray, above-mentioned by O'Dugan, was Rosecommon, from which he proceeded to Brefney, and he thus designates O'Rourke and O'Reilly, the princes of that territory, which he calls the Country of Sean-Feargal, it being so named from Sean-Feargal, one of the ancient kings or princes of Brefney :

"Airdrigh Brefne as huan snacht
O'Ruair da n-dual cios Chonaecht
Uirrih don gnaol sin nach gunn
Is a thaoisich na thimeheall.

their arrival in Ireland, by their false promises to them, which they had never fulfilled towards them; the numbers of their high-born princes, nobles,

"Rioghthaoisíoch na ruathar n-garbh
O'Raghallaigh na ruadh arm
Do chuintear aoih a orgha
Os Muintir Maoil min Mhordha."

"The high-prince of Brefney, of lasting sway,
Is O'Rourke, to whom the tribute of Connaught belonged:
His attendant lords are not few,
And he is surrounded by his chieftains.

"Head chief of the fierce conflicts
Is O'Reilly of the red weapons;
His courteous commands are heard
Over the mild Muintir Maolmora."

An account has been given, from p. 75 to 77, of the O'Rourkes and O'Reillys, princes of Brefney, who were a branch of the Hy Briuinians of Connaught, as explained at p. 442 in these notes. The ancient territory of Brefney, which comprised the present counties of Cavan and Leitrim, was originally part of Connaught, but Cavan was added to Ulster, as before explained. Brefney was divided into two principalities, namely, West Brefney, or Leitrim, which was called Brefney O'Rourke, and East Brefney, or Cavan, called Brefney O'Reilly. The O'Rourkes and O'Reillys, princes of both Brefneys, were of the same descent, being two branches from one of the ancient kings of Connaught, their ancestor being Aodh Fionn, or Hugh the Fair, a king of Connaught in the 7th century, of the race of Hy Briuin. The O'Rourkes were in ancient times very powerful princes, and two or three of them are mentioned in the Annals as kings of Connaught in the 10th century. The O'Reillys took the tribe-name of Muintir Maolmordha, signifying the people of Maolmora, from one of their celebrated chiefs so called in the 12th century; the name Maolmora signifies a majestic chief, and it has been latinised Milesius, and anglicised Miles; it was a favourite name amongst the O'Reillys, and borne by many of their chiefs. The O'Rourkes and O'Reillys make a remarkable figure from the 12th to the 17th century, and many of their celebrated chiefs are recorded throughout these Annals, distinguished for their valour during their contests, for nearly 500 years, with the Anglo-Normans and English of the Pale, but after the wars of Elizabeth and Cromwell their extensive territories were confiscated, and transferred to British settlers. There are still several respectable families of the O'Rourkes in different parts of Ireland. The O'Reillys are extremely numerous, and it is estimated that there are about twenty thousand persons of the name in the county of Cavan, and many also in Meath, Longford, and Leitrim; there are many highly respectable families of the O'Reillys in the counties of Meath, Westmeath, Dublin, Kildare, Louth, Down, Cavan, and Longford.

O'Dugan thus designates the chiefs Mac Tiernan and Mac Gauran:

"Mac Tigearnain an trean fhear
Fosgadh síor na hfhlaithfheneadh
Ceandach na ecliar sa ceara
Air Theallach ndian nDunchadhla.

"Mac Samhradhain snaidhm go neart Air Theallach Eachaidh oirdheirc."

"Mac Tiernan the valiant man,
The true protector of warlike chieftains,
The patron of clerics, and their friend,
Rules over the powerful Tullaghonoho.

"Mac Gauran, the mainstay of strength,
Rules over the noble Tullaghaw;
A country sheltered from the wind,
Mac Consnamha rules over Clan Kenny.

Mac Tiernan possessed the territory which now forms the barony of Tullaghonoho, and Mac Gauran possessed the barony of Tullaghaw, both in the county of Cavan; Mac Consnamha, a name and chiefs, who, although they had been guilty of no actual crimes, came to an untimely death, merely for the purpose of robbing them of their anglicised to Ford, was chief of Clan Kenny, a district which now forms the parish of Inismaghrath, along Lough Allen, in the county of Leitrim. These were all chiefs of note, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. O'Dugan thus proceeds with the other chiefs of Brefney:

"Mac Cogan of the welcome visits
Rules over the noble Clan Fearmaigh;
Mac Dorchy whose tribe is not enslaved,
Rules over the heroic Kinel Luachain.

"The chiefs of Dartry, as recorded,
And of Calry of the tribes;
They have not destroyed the land by depredation;
Of those are the valiant O'Finn and O'Carroll.
The power of those chiefs has never been subdued,
And of them is the mighty Mac Claney."

An account of the above-mentioned chiefs, and the territories possessed by them, has been given at p. 77, in the notes on Brefney. The O'Carrolls, mentioned by O'Dugan as chiefs of Calry, possessed a territory called Calry, which comprised the present parishes of Drumlease and Killargy, in the barony of Dromahaire in Leitrim, and the parish of Calry, in the barony of Carbury, in the county of Sligo, and the district is mentioned by Colgan, Lanigan, and others, under the name Calrigia. A tribe of those O'Carrolls, in the 13th century, according to Mac Geoghegan, took the name of Mac Brady, and they settled in the county of Cavan, particularly in the barony of Loughree, where they became chiefs of note, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals. The Mac Bradys, sometimes called O'Bradys, are extremely numerous in modern times in the county of Cavan, and are often called, by those speaking the Irish language, O'Carrolls; there are many very respectable families of the Bradys in various parts of Ireland. The celebrated Baron Thomas O'Brady, a distinguished field marshal for many years in the Austrian service, and who died at Vienna in 1827, was a native of the county of Cavan. The Mac Clanays above-mentioned, lords of Dartry, now the barony of Rosslogher, in Leitrim, were powerful chiefs, and many of them are recorded in the course of these Annals.

O'Dugan proceeds to describe other chiefs of Brefney, amongst whom he places the O'Ferralls and O'Quinns, of Longford, as it appears that some of the northern and western parts of Longford, called Conmaicne, belonged to Brefney in ancient times.

"Let us proceed—may it be a prosperous journey,
On a visit to the Clan Fergus,
Towards the other valiant tribe,
To the prosperous Clan Rory.

"Muintir Giollagain of the preys, O'Quinn is their lord and chief;
Mac Maoiliosa of the fair countenance,
His rents are from Magh Breacraidhe;
Mac Fionnvarr, pure is his prosperity,
Ruling over the intelligent Muintir Gearadhan."

The Mac Rannalls are thus mentioned by O'Dugan:

"Mac Raghnail cluintear anois Air Muintir aluinn Eoluis."

"Mac Rannall is now heard to rule
Over the delightful Muintir Eoluis."

The Mac Rannalls, lords of Muintir Eoluis, and of Conmaicne of Moyrein, were powerful chiefs in ancient times, and many of them are mentioned in the course of these Annals; their territory comprised the present baronies of Leitrim, Mohill, and Carrigallen, in the county of Leitrim. The Mac Rannalls were of the same race as the O'Ferralls, lords of Annally or Longford, namely of the Clan patrimonies, they greatly dreaded that what was then promised would not be fulfilled towards them, and they finally resolved on rejecting the peace.

Fergus, also called the Clanna Rory, and an account of them has been given at p. 77, in the note on Brefney; there are still many respectable families of the Mac Rannalls in various parts of Ireland, but in modern times the name has been absurdly anglicised Reynolds.

The other chiefs of Brefney were the following:

"The affable O'Mulveys
Rule over Moy Nisi of many hostages;
Good is their portion, without purchase.
Let us record the chief of the warlike heroes.

"The O'Ferralls now prevail
In the government over the Clan Fergus;
To him belongs the protecting tribes,
The O'Quinns were his ancestors."

The O'Ferralls, styled princes and lords of Annaly, an ancient territory which comprised the present county of Longford, were powerful chiefs in former times, and many of them are recorded in the course of these Annals; there are still many very respectable families of the name in various parts of Ireland. The O'Quinns, above mentioned, chiefs of Muintir Giollagain, were in ancient times lords of the territory which forms the barony of Ratheline, in the county of Longford. An account of the district possessed by the O'Mulveys in Leitrim, near Carrick-on-Shannon, has been given at p. 77, in the notes on Brefney.

The Tribes of North Connaught.—An account has been given of the chiefs and clans of Sligo and Mayo, from p. 97 to p. 100, in the note on North Connaught, but the translation of the poem of O'Dugan, referring to the following chiefs, has not been given:

"Let us proceed into the Lieney's,
Let us depart from the country of Carbury,
Let us remember the clans of Kian,
In the warlike Lieney's of sharp weapons.

"The princes of Lieney, of productive bloom,
Are O'Hara and O'Huathmaran;
Let Lieney of the heroes of swords be visited;
Bear in remembrance O'Kearnachan,
Good is each mansion of that trihe,
O'Gara is of that noble race.

"O'Devlin of good fame,
O'Donaghy of the Kerns,
Let us accurately praise them with affection,
They are the two lords of the level plain of Corran.

"Let us go to the land of Fiachra,
To the melodious hosts of fierce conflicts,
From the hospitable and powerful tribe,
It is our wish there to proceed.

"From Codlmaigh, it is a peaceful visit,
Which marks the end of the territory,
To the boundary of Rodlha to be recorded;
It is a delightful perfect land;
The whole of that portion
Is the inheritance of O'Dowd.

"Fourteen kings of the tribe
Obtained the province undivided,
By deeds of combined force and battle,
Of the illustrious race of Fiachra."

An account of the O'Dowds, princes of Hy Fiachra, and sometimes called princes of North Connaught, has been given at p. 98, in the notes on North Connaught. They were the head family of the race of Hy Fiachra, descended from Fiachra, king of Connaught in the latter end of the 4th century, whose son, the heroic Dathi, the last Pagan monarch of Ireland, was killed by lightning at the foot of

They afterwards communicated the resolution to the earl, who proceeded to Dublin, to the lord justice and council, and related to them that he was the Alps, in A.D. 429, while on a military expedition in Gaul. The ancestors of the O'Dowds, as above-stated, furnished fourteen kings of Connaught of the race of Hy Fiachra. The O'Dowds were powerful princes in ancient times, and copious accounts of them are given in the Annals of the Four Masters; they ruled over the extensive territories which now form the baronies of Erris, Tyrawley, Carra, and Kilmairne, in Mayo, with Tireragh in Sligo. An account of the O'Haras, O'Garas, and other chiefs above-mentioned, in the Lieney's, in Sligo, and Mayo, has been also given at p. 99, in the notes on North Connaught.

The Counties of Ulster.—An account of the formation of various counties from the ancient territories has been given in the course of these notes. In Ulster, the territory of Orgiall was formed into the counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh; Dalaradia, Ulidia, and Dalrieda, were formed into Down and Antrim; Tir-Eogain and Tirconnell into Tyrone, Derry and Donegal; Fermanagh retained its ancient name; Brefney, which was part of ancient Connaught, was formed into Cavan and Leitrim.

Louth was part of Orgiall, and was comprised in the ancient kingdom of Ulster, which extended as far as the Boyne at Drogheda and Slane; the name in Irish is Lugh-Magh, which signifies the Plain of Lugh, or Lughaidh, probably from some ancient chief; it was in remote times also called Magh Muirtheimhne, that is the Plain of Murhevney, from Murtheimhne, a celebrated chief of the Clanna Breogain, or Brigantes, who came along with the Milesians from Spain; and many centuries afterwards it got the name Machaire-Chonail, signifying the Plain of Conal, from Conal Kearnach, or Conal the Victorious, a famous warrior of the Red Branch Knights of Ulster in the first century, whose posterity possessed the territory. Louth was O'Carroll's Country, and also partly belonged afterwards to the Mac Mahons of Monaghan, but after O'Carroll, the prince of the territory, was subdued by John de Courcy and the Anglo-Normans, the territory was formed into the county of Louth, about A. D. 1210, in the reign of King John, and formed part of the English Pale; it was called by the English Oriel and Uriel, a name taken from the ancient one Orgiall, and the name Louth is latinised Lovidia. The chief town is in Irish called Droichead-Atha, signifying the Bridge of the Ford, hence latinised Pontana; the name was anglicised Tredagh, and lastly Drogheda (see p. 2, note on Orgiall).

Monaghan, part of ancient Orgiall, was formed into a county about 1585, by the lord deputy, sir John Perrott; it got its name from the chief town Muineachan, said to signify the town of the monks, and was so called from an ancient abbey there, and the name is latinised Monachana. Monaghan was called Mac Mahon's Country, as those chiefs were the principal possessors; the other chiefs and clans of note were the Mac Kennas, O'Boylans, Mac Cabes, O'Connollys, O'Duffys &c.; a great part of Monaghan was called by the English the Ferney, in Irish, Fearnmuighe, signifying the Plain of the Alder Trees, and this name is still retained in the barony of Farney, which, however, is of much less extent than the ancient Ferney.

In the reign of Elizabeth, about the year 1584 or 1585, the lord deputy, sir John Perrott, according to Cox, Borlase, and others, formed seven counties in Ulster, namely Armagh, Monaghan, Tyrone, Coleraine, afterwards called Derry and Londonderry, Donegal, Fermanagh, and Cavan, though, according to other accounts, these counties were formed, about the year 1570, by the lord deputy, sir Henry Sydney, but not regularly settled until the time of Perrott.

Armagh, part of ancient Orgiall, was formed into a county about 1585, by sir John Perrott, and took its name from the chief town, in Irish Ard Macha, signifying the Hill of Macha, and so called either from Macha, the wife of Nemedius, or in after times from another Macha, a celebrated queen of Emania, who flourished nearly four centuries before the Christian era. A great part of the territory was called Magh-Macha, or the Plain of Macha, and refused the peace, and the answer he got from the Irish. The lord justice and the council sent despatches to England to the queen, informing her of these affairs, so that she then sent an immense number of men to Ireland, with a supply of military stores, and their numbers were not less than comprised the celebrated district and palace of Eamhain Macha, or Emania, the seat of the ancient kings of Ulster; the name is the same in the Latin as in the Irish, namely Ardmacha. It was anciently possessed by the O'Neills, O'Hanlons, O'Hanrattys, O'Garveys, Mac Canns, &c.—(See note, p. 3, on Orgiall).

Down, in Irish Dun, signifying a fortress, was in ancient times called Dundaleathglas, and afterwards Dun Patraic, or Downpatrick, from St. Patrick having been buried there. Down comprised the greater part of ancient Ulidia or Dalaradia, and was formed into two counties, namely Down, and The Ards, or Newtown, in the reign of Edward II., but both were formed into the present county of Down in the reign of Elizabeth, which got its name from the chief town Dune, or Downpatrick, and is latinised Dunum. It was anciently possessed by the O'Donlevys, Mac Gennises, O'Garveys, Mac Cartans, &c., and partly by the O'Neills, lords of South Clannaboy.

Antrim comprised ancient Dalrieda, and part of Dalaradia, or Ulidia; it was formed into a county in the reign of Edward II., and took its name from the chief town, in Irish Aendruim, which is said to signify the Handsome Hill, from Aen or Aon, excellent, and druim a hill; it is latinised Aendromia, and Antrumnia. The O'Flynnos or O'Flinns, O'Kanes, &c., were the chief ancient possessors, and also the O'Neills, lords of North Clannaboy; the Mac Donnells and Mac Quillans possessed the northern parts, called the Routes and Glynns (see notes on Dalaradia and Dalrieda, from p. 20 to p. 22).

Tyrone, in Irish Tir-Eogain, signifying the country of Eogan or Owen, was so called from Eogan, one of the sons of the celebrated king Niall of the Nine Hostages. Eogan conquered this country in the 5th century, and it was possessed by his posterity, called Eugenians, the head chiefs of whom were the O'Neills, princes of Tir-Eogain, hence it was called O'Neill's Country. Part of ancient Tir-Eogain was formed into the county of Tyrone, about 1585, by the lord deputy sir John Perrott; the name Tir-Eogain was anglicised Tir-Owen, and Tyrone, and has been latinised Tironia, and sometimes Eugenia. The other chiefs of note in Tyrone were the Mac Caghewells, O'Quinns, O'Hagans, O'Donnellys, O'Nenneys, &c.

Derry, in Irish Doire, signifies an Oak wood, and the town was anciently called Doire-Calgach, signifying the Oak wood of Calgach, from a chief of that name, and afterwards Derry Columkille, from the abbey founded there by that saint. The territory, which now forms the county of Derry was part of Tir-Eogain, and O'Chan, or O'Kane, being the head chief, it was called O'Kane's Country. It was formed into a county in 1585, by sir John Perrott, and was called the County of Coleraine, from its chief town; it was afterwards called Derry, latinised Derria, and on the confiscation of Ulster, and plantation with British colonies in the reign of James I., a company of London shopkeepers and traders having got a grant of the county and city of Derry, from them the county got the absurd name of London-Derry. An account of the chiefs and clans of Tyrone and Derry has been given from p. 49 to p. 51, in the notes.

Donegal, in Irish Dun-na-nGall, signifying the Fortress of the Foreigners, derived from Dun, a fortress, and Gall, a foreigner, got its name, it is said, from a fortress erected there by the Danes. The ancient territory was called Tir-Conaill, or the Country of Conall, from Conall, brother of Eogan, who, as above explained, possessed Tir-Eogain. This Conall, son of king Niall of the Hostages, and his posterity called Connallians, possessed the territory, and their head chiefs were the O'Donnells, princes of Tirconnell, hence it was called O'Donnell's Country. The other chiefs of note in Donegal, were the O'Doghertys, Mac Sweeneys, O'Boyles, O'Gallaghers, O'Gormleys, O'Breslins, &c. Tirconnell was formed into a county about 1585, by the lord deputy Perrott, and called Donegal, from its chief town; the names Donegal and Tirconnell are latinised Dungallia and Tir-Connellia, and sometimes Conallia. (See notes p.p. 51, 52).

Fermanagh, in Irish Fearamanach, may signify the Men of the Monks, from Feara, men, and manach a monk, as it had in ancient times many ecclesiastical establishments, or it might be derived from Feara, men, and monach, of the marshes, as it was a country full of marshes and lakes; the name is latinised Fermanachia. The Maguires were princes of Fermanagh, hence it was called Maguire's Country, and was formed into a county, about 1585, by the lord deputy Perrott. The other chiefs of note in Fermanagh were the O'Flanagans, O'Muldoons, Mac Manuses, Mac Gilfimmens, Mac Donnells, O'Cassidys, O'Tullys, &c. (See notes on Fermanagh p. 78).

Cavan, in Irish Cabhan, pronounced Cavan, is derived from the word Cabhan, which signifies a hollow place, and corresponds with the situation of the town of Cavan, which is located in a remarkable hollow. The territory of Brefney formed in ancient times part of Connaught, and was divided into East Brefney, or Cavan, and West Brefney, or Leitrim; but when formed into counties, about 1585, by the lord deputy Perrott, Cavan was added to Ulster, and Leitrim was left in Connaught. The territory of Cavan being possessed by the O'Reillys, princes of East Brefney, was called Brefney O'Reilly, and O'Reilly's Country; and the territory of Leitrim, being possessed by the O'Rourke's, princes of West Brefney, was called Brefney O'Rourke, and O'Rourke's Country. The name Leitrim, in Irish Liath-Druim, signifies the Grey Hill, and from the town the county was called Leitrim, as the county of Cavan was called from the town of Cavan; the name Cavan is latinised Cavana, and Leitrim Leitrimnia. Brefney, in Irish Breifne or Brefne, signifies the Hilly Country; it was called by the English The Brenny, and has been latinised Brefnia and Brefinnia. An account of the other chiefs and clans of both Brefneys, as the Mac Gaurans, Mac Tiernans, or Mac Kernans, Mac Bradys, Mac Gowans or Smiths, Mac Cabes, Fitzpatrickes, &c, in Cavan, and the Mac Rannalls, Mac Clancys, &c, in Leitrim, has been given at pp. 74, 75, in the notes on Brefney.

Topography of the Pentarchy.—In the course of these annotations to the Annals, accounts have been given of the topography of the five ancient kingdoms of Ireland, constituting the Pentarchy, with the old territorial divisions, and the possessions of each of the Irish princes, lords and chiefs, from the 10th to the 17th century; also an Epitome of the history of every county in Ireland, and accounts of the great Anglo-Norman, and old English families of note, and of the nobility and chief landed proprietors in each county, from the English invasion to modern times, with an account of the Danes, and the Antiquities, &c, of the country, collected from numerous authentic sources, and most of the matter given has never before been published.

The Ancient Colonies that peopled Ireland from the earliest ages, as the Partholarians, Nemedians, Fomorians, Firbolg or Belgians, Tuath Dedanans, Milesians, Celts, and Scythians, &c., have been described at pp. 123, 340, 341, and 361 to 367, in the notes on Ulster, and other places. Accounts of the Danes or Scandinavians in Ireland, have been given at pp. 457 to 469, 481 to 488, 508 to 516, and 532 to 544; accounts of the Anglo-Normans are given at pp. 1 to 20, 196 to 198, 463 to 464, 536 to 540, and 557 to 558. The territories and tribes of the five kingdoms of the Pentarchy are described under the following heads.

The Kingdom of Meath.—The name in Irish is Midhe, pronounced Mee, and latinised Midia; the people Midhigh, latinised Midii, and Midenses, and anglicised Midians, and sometimes Methians. The kingdom of Meath comprised the present counties of Meath and Westmeath, with parts of Longford, King's county, Dublin, and Kildare; this kingdom was in after times added to the province of Leinster. The kingdom of Meath, with all its ancient territories, tribes, clans, princes, and chiefs, has been described in the articles on Meath, Teffia, Tara, Clancolman, Annaly, Offaly, Moy-Lifey, Bregia, and Fingall, in the annotations on those territories, in the course of the Annals, at pp. 6 to 9, 146, 248, 249, 292 to 298, 314 to 317, 343 to 361, and 442. In the above-mentioned notes, an account has been given of the following races, twenty thousand of paid forces and common soldiers, for the purpose of carrying on war against the Irish. A very great army was afterwards mustered by the queen's war general in Ireland, namely, Sir John Norris, to march into the province of Connaught, for the purpose of subduing all those who had risen in alliance in the war of the Irish. The earl of Clanrickard, namely, Ulick, the son of Rieckard Sagsanach, son of Ulick of the Heads, with all his forces, joined their army; the earl of Thomond, namely Donogh, the son of Connor, son of Donogh O'Brien, also joined them with his forces, and numerous other forces besides, which are not recorded; but, however, some have stated that such an army, belonging to the sovereign, had not been collected for a long period of tribes and clans who possessed those territories, as the Partholomians, Belgians, Danans, Heremonians, Fenians, Temorians, Bregians, Hy-Niellians, Colmanians, Tefians, Annalians, Delvinians, Offalians, Moyliffians, Eblanians and Fingallians.

The Kingdom of Ulster.—The name in Irish is Uladh, pronounced Ulla, and latinised Ultonia; the people were called Ultaigh, in Latin Ultonii, and Ultonienses anglicised Ultonians. This ancient kingdom comprised the counties of Louth, Monaghan, Armagh, Down, Antrim, Tyrone, Derry, Donegal, and Fermanagh, and the old territories of Orgiall, Dalaradia, Ulidia, Dalrieda, Tir-Eogain, Tirconnell, and Fermanagh; the county of Cavan, which was part of Brefney, belonged to Connaught, but was afterwards added to Ulster, and the county of Louth, which was part of ancient Ulster, was added to Leinster. In the notes on the above-mentioned ancient territories, and on Ulster, at p. 2, and at pp. 19 to 22, 49 to 52, 78, 79, 146, 337 to 342, 361 to 367, 412 to 417, 436 to 442, 556, and 601 to 608, an account has been given of their extent, and of the tribes, clans, princes, and chiefs who possessed them. In the above-mentioned notes, accounts are given of the following races, tribes, and clans in Ulster: the Partholomians, Nemedians, Fomorians, Danans, and Milesians; of the Irians, or Rudricians, the Emanians, or Red Branch Knights, the Heremonians, the Hy-Niellians, Eugenians, Conallians, Orgiellians, Ulidians, Dalaradians, Dalriedians, Degadians, Dalriatachians, Erneans, and Cruithneans, or Picts.

The Kingdom of Connaught.—The name in Irish is Conacht, pronounced Conaght, and latinised Conacia; the people were called Conachtaigh, in Latin Conacii, and Conachtenses, anglicised Conacians. This ancient kingdom comprised the present counties of Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, Leitrim, and Cavan, with the northern part of Longford, bordering on Leitrim and Cavan; in ancient times, at different periods, the territory of Clare in Thomond formed part of Connaught, but was ultimately added to Munster, and the county of Cavan was added to Ulster in the reign of Elizabeth. Connaught comprised the ancient territories of Cruachan, Machaire Chonacht, Moy-Aoi, Siol-Murray, Hy-Fiachra, Hy-Maine, Moen-Moy, Moylurg, Brefney, Conmaicne, Connamara, Umhall, Ioras, Trawley, Clanrickard, &c. An account of those territories, and the tribes, clans, princes, and chiefs who possessed them, has been given in the course of these notes on Connaught, Ulster and Brefney, at pp. 75 to 78, 97 to 100, 121 to 132, 341 to 345, 361 to 367, and 606 to 608. In the above-mentioned notes, accounts are given of the following races, tribes, and clans in Connaught: the Fomorians and Danans, the Firbolg or Belgians, Firdonnians, Damnonians, Martineans, Erneans, Attacottians, Gamanadians and Clanna-Mornians, the Heremonians, Hy-Briunians, Bregians, Conmacnians, Hy-Fiachrians, and Hy-Manians.

The Kingdom of Leinster.—The name in Irish is Laignean, latinised Lagenia; the people were called Laigneigh, in Latin Lagenii, and Lagenienses, anglicised Lagenians. In ancient times Leinster was of much less extent than the modern province; it comprised the present counties of Wexford, Wicklow, Carlow, Kilkenny, and Queen's county, with a great part of the King's county, and the whole of Kildare, except a small portion of Carberry, which belonged to Meath; Leinster also comprised that part of the county of Dublin south of the Liffey, and that part north of the Liffey belonged to Meath. A large portion of the northern part of King's county also belonged to Meath, and some of the southern part of King's county, bordering on Tipperary, belonged to Munster. In after times the ancient kingdom of Meath, and also the county of Louth, in Ulster, were added to the province of Leinster. The ancient kingdom of Leinster comprised the old territories of Hy-Kinsellagh, Cualan, Ossory, Offaley, Leix and Moy Liffey. Accounts of those territories, and their tribes, clans, princes, and chiefs, have been given in the notes on Leinster, &c. at pp. 194, 217 to 225, 245 to 252, 266, 267, 343 to 345, 366, 457 to 460, 481 to 488, 508 to 516, and 532 to 544. In the above notes accounts are given of the following races, tribes, and clans in Leinster: the Belgians, Galenians, Menapians, Brigantes, Heremonians, Cahirians, Hy Kinsellians, Cualanians, Ossorians, Offalians, Lisians, Fenians, Moy-Liffians, Eblanians, and Danes.

The Kingdom of Munster.—The name in Irish is Munha, or Munhan, pronounced Moo-an, latinised Momonia; the people were called Muimhneigh, in Latin Momonii, and Momonenses, anglicised Momonians. The ancient kingdom of Munster comprised the present counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, to which was afterwards added Clare, which formed part of ancient Connaught; Munster appears also to have comprised a small portion of Ossory, in the county of Kilkenny, bordering on Tipperary, and also a portion of the south of King's county called Ely O'Carroll, adjoining Tipperary. The principal divisions of ancient Munster were Tuadh-Munhan, or North Munster, latinised Tuemonia, and anglicised Thomond; Deas-Munhan, or South Munster, in Latin Desmonia, in English Desmond; Oir-Munhan, or East Munster, latinised Ormonia, anglicised Ormond; Desies was also an ancient division of Munster, and comprised the greater part of the present county of Waterford. The extent of Thomond, Desmond, Ormond, and Desies, has been described in the notes on Munster, and accounts have been given of the tribes, clans, princes, and chiefs who possessed these territories, in the notes on Munster, at pp. 146 to 154, 170 to 180, 194 to 202, and 248. In the above notes, accounts are given of the following races, tribes, and clans: the Heberians, Eugenians, Dalcassians, Kianians, Ithians, Lugadians, Degadians, Menapians, Tuemonians, Desmonians, Desians, Ormonians and Elians.

Ptolemy's Geography.—From p. 391 to 394, in the notes, an account has been given of the geography and topography of Ireland, in the beginning of the 2nd century, by the celebrated Greek geographer Claudius Ptolemy, of Alexandria in Egypt, who gave a Map of Ireland at that very remote period, with the names of the tribes placed on the different territories, the cities, the promontories, islands, harbours, lakes, and rivers. In the explanation of this ancient geography, in the above-mentioned notes, an account is given of the following seventeen tribes, and their territories, with their original Greek names, which are thus anglicised. The Eblanians, Caucians, Menapians, Brigantes, Coriondians, Udeans, Uternians, or Ivernians, Illibricians or Velabrians, Lucenians, Concanians, Nagnatians Venenians, Robogdians, Darinians, and Uluntians or Ultonians. It may be here observed, that, in the explanation given of Ptolemy's Geography, at p. 392, the promontory called Isamnion, now St. John's Foreland, at the Bay of Dundrum, on the coast of Down, is mentioned, and the Greek name Isamnion was probably derived by Ptolemy from the Irish Magh Seimhne, which sounds very like it, and was the ancient name of a plain in the territory afterwards called Dalaradia, in the same part of the county of Down. At p. 392 it has been explained that Ptolemy called the lake and river Erne Raious, which probably might have been derived from the Irish Eas-Ruadh, or Easroc, which was the ancient name of the cataract at the mouth of the river Erne, at Ballyshannon, and if the word Eas-Ruadh was written Ruadh-Eas, which would have the same signification, it would sound very similar to the Greek word Raious.

time in Ireland as that, for the greatness of its full muster, its foreign forces, and their extraordinary equipment and superior power. When all those had assembled together at Athlone, to meet the general, they then marched to Roscommon, and afterwards to the neighbourhood of the monastery of Boyle, and when they did not find the Conacians there before them, as they expected, they returned back, and proceeded westward to Cionn Locha, into the country of Mac William, and to Maighin (Moyné, in the parish of Shrúle, barony of Kilmáin, county of Mayo), and encamped on the banks of the river Rodhba (the river Robe, which flows through Ballinrobe, in Mayo). When that very great army was threatening to march to that place, Mac William Burke, i. e. Theobald, sent his messengers to O'Donnell, entreating him to come to relieve him, and O'Donnell promptly responded to the call, for he was making ready to march into the province of Meva (Connaught), before the messengers had reached him. He sent letters and written despatches to the Irish of the province of Olnegmacht (Connaught), requesting them to meet him at a certain place on his progress to the camp of the general, Sir John Norris, and he himself commenced his march with his forces, and proceeded across the rivers Erne and Sligo, and along the right hand side of the river of the Ox mountain, through Lieney (in Sligo), and the territory of Gaileang (barony of Gallen, in Mayo). The Irish of the province (of Connaught), marched at the same time without delay at that call; in the first place came O'Rourke, namely, Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan (na-Murtha), son of Owen, son of Bryan; thither marched O'Conor Roe; O'Kelly; Mac Dermott of Moylurg; there came also the two Mac Donoghs, the two O'Haras, and O'Dowd. When those Irish assembled at one place, they did not halt until they pitched their camp, confronting Sir John Norris, on the opposite side of the same river Robe. There was a correspondence carried on between them from both sides, as if through peace and amity, but such in truth was not the case, but to inspect, and reconnoitre, and to deceive each other if they possibly could. They remained in that manner confronted, until the English came short of provisions, and the resolution they came to was, to decamp from the place where they were, when they could obtain no advantage of the Irish; they accordingly did so, and the general proceeded to Galway, from thence to Athlone, and he left soldiers in Cong (in Mayo), and likewise in Galway, in the town of Athenry, in Mullaghmore of Hy Maine, in Kilconnell, in Ballinasloe (all in the county of Galway); in Roscommon, in Tulsk, and in the monastery of Boyle (in the county of Roscommon).

O'Conor Sligo arrived in Ireland, with a great number of English along with him, in the harvest of this year.

Sir Richard Bingham, and his brethren, were removed from the government of the province of Connaught, and they were conveyed to Dublin, and from thence they were sent to England, and a man better than he was appointed his successor in the governorship of the province of Connaught, whose name was sir Conyers Clifford; he was a man who bestowed valuable presents and property on the English and Irish, and there did not come of the English into Ireland, in the latter times, a better man. When he came to Dublin he began to collect men and arms for the purpose of marching into Connaught, and he afterwards proceeded with all his troops and forces to the town of Athlone, and he distributed his companies into camps and fortresses over the towns of Hy Maine and Clanrickard, viz., Galway, the town of Athenry, Mullaghmore, Cong, and Leith-Inis (Lehinch, in the parish of Kilcommon, in Mayo). A great number of the chiefs of the province of Connaught went to the governor, and joined him, on account of his fame and great renown; of those were O'Conor Roe, namely, Hugh, the son of Torlogh Roe, and Mac Dermott, i. e. Conor, and they confirmed their friendship to him.

After O'Conor Sligo had returned from England to Ireland, he set about subduing Connaught as well as he could, on behalf of the English, and was joined by the Mac Donoghs of Collooney, and Ballymote was also under his controul; the O'Harts likewise joined him, for they were always obedient supporters of the man who held his title, and rejoiced at his coming to them; they were filled with vain glory and arrogance, and they began to menace and threaten the people of Tirconnell. When O'Donnell received notice of that circumstance, and that they had joined in alliance with the English against him, he did not wait for collecting a full force, but proceeded with some common and paid soldiers across Sligo westward, and plundered all those who were obedient to O'Connor, wherever they were, in the recesses and retired fastnesses of the country, so that he did not leave them the least head of cattle; and he plundered them alone, although he often before had spared them on account of their defenceless condition, until their insolent talk and arrogance excited him, so that they could not evade O'Donnell's plundering them on that occasion.

Conor, the son of Teige, son of Conor O'Brien of Bel-Atha-an-Chomhraic (in Thomond), went into insurrection, and began to plunder, for he and a number of the Clan Sheehy had been expelled from their patrimonies, as well as the Irish of the North (of Connaught). They put on the resolution of returning to their country, and proceeded to Clanrickard, to Slieve Echtge (Slieve Baughta in Galway, on the borders of Clare), and to the lower part of Clan Cuilein (in Clare); they were pursued from one country to another, until Conor was at length taken prisoner at Coill Mor (or the great wood); he was brought before the president, in the first month of harvest precisely, and he was put to death in Cork at the November term.

Teige, the son of Torlogh, son of Donogh, son of Conor O'Brien, after having been for a long time engaged in plundering, was taken prisoner in the country of the Butlers, and was put to death by advice of the earl of Ormond.

Anthony, the son of Roderick Oge, son of Roderick Cooch, son of Conall O'Moore, was engaged as a gentleman in the art of war at this time, and Leix was completely spoiled by him, as to its crops, corn and dwellings, so that there was nothing in the country, outside the lock of a gate or bawn, but was under his controul. A gentleman of the Saxons was killed by him, who lived at Sraid-Baile-Laoighise (Stradbally of Leix, in the Queen's county), who possessed a large tract of the country, on the authority of the sovereign, and whose name was Cosbi (Cosby), the son of Master Fraus.

The sons of Edmond of the Caladh, son of James, son of Pierce Roe, son of James, son of Edmond, son of Richard Butler, also began to plunder through malice against the earl of Ormond, and their father, Edmond of the Caladh, was taken prisoner for their crimes. Edmond, the son of Richard, son of Pierce Roe, was also taken prisoner.

Fiacha Mac Hugh (O'Byrne), the son of John of Glenmalure (in Wicklow), continued to lay waste Leinster and Meath at that time¹.

A. D. 1596.

1. Battles at Armagh.—The following engagements at Armagh are described in Mac Geoghagan, O'Sullivan Beare, and Stuart's Armagh. In 1596 general sir John Norris, the commander-in-chief in Ulster, stationed a strong body of men at the church of Killother, near Armagh, but they were attacked by the Irish under Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone; and the English forces were defeated with great slaughter, and pursued to Armagh. Norris, as he passed through the city, left a garrison there of 500 men, under Francis Stafford, and proceeded himself to Dundalk. O'Neill besieged Armagh, and reduced the garrison to great distress, on which Norris forwarded a quantity of provisions for its relief from Dundalk, under the escort of three companies of foot and a troop of horse. O'Neill surprised, defeated, and captured this convoy by night, and having stripped the English soldiers, he equipped in their clothes an equal number of his own men, and posted part of them, thus disguised, in the ruins of a monastery on the eastern side of the city of Armagh, under the command of Con O'Neill, while, with the remainder, O'Neill appeared himself at dawn of day, in full view of the garrison, and a sham fight was commenced between the troops who were in the British uniform, and another body of O'Neill's forces. The men on each side rapidly fired their guns, which were only charged with powder, but several of the soldiers fell to the ground, as if shot, to carry on the delusion. Stafford, deceived by this ruse de guerre, sent forth the half of the garrison to the aid of his supposed fellow-soldiers, but when these men advanced to the conflict, they were astonished to find themselves assailed by the troops whom they had supposed to be their friends, as well as by O'Neill's other forces, and Con O'Neill having rushed out with his men from their ambuscade in the ruined church, they attacked the English in the rear, and the entire detachment, thus placed between two fires, was slaughtered. The city was then surrendered to O'Neill, and Stafford was permitted to retire with the remnant of his forces to Dundalk.

Battle of Mullaghbrack.—General sir John Norris, having erected a fortress since called Mount Norris, in the Fews, between Armagh and Newry, placed a garrison in it; but Hugh O'Neill took the place from the English. Norris advanced from Dundalk with great forces against O'Neill, and both parties having encountered at Mullaghbrack, in the Fews, near Market-Hill in Armagh, they fought a fierce battle, described by Mac Geoghagan, in which the English forces were rallied three times by Norris, but finally defeated with great slaughter, and Norris himself dangerously wounded. Hugh Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, commanded O'Neill's cavalry, and, by his determined valour, greatly contributed to the victory. This was the last battle Norris fought in Ulster, and he was soon afterwards sent to Munster, where he died, as mentioned in the Annals in the year 1597, it is said from the effects of the wounds he had received in his campaigns against O'Neill.

Succours from Spain and Outlawry of the Irish Chiefs.—It is stated by Cox, in his Ilibernia Anglicana, that, in May, 1596, three pinnaces, with about 200 men, and some powder, consigned to O'Donnell, arrived from Spain, and in the same year, Cox says, that O'Neill and O'Donnell wrote letters to the king of Spain, offering him the kingdom of Ireland if he would supply them with three thousand men and some treasure. Cox says that O'Neill "took upon him to make an O'Reilly." This was done in consequence of Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, having at that time assumed the authority of king of Ulster, as it had been possessed by

A.D. 1597.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Hugh, son of Manus, was encamped in Brefney of Connaught, on the western side of Sliabh-da-En (on the borders of Leitrim and Sligo), where he plundered the adherents of O'Connor (of Sligo), as we have before stated. He was waiting for his forces and mustering to overtake him from all parts in which they were quartered, and after they had all collected to him, in the end of January, they marched into Triochad Ced Ua-nOilella (barony of Tírerrill, in Sligo); from thence they proceeded to Corran, through the plain of Connaught (in Roscommon), and into Clan Conmaigh, in Crioich Maine (the territory of Maine, that is Hy Maine, or O'Kelly's Country, in Galway). When he arrived in the very centre of Hy Maine, he sent forth quick-moving predatory parties through the district of Caladh, and the upper part of the country, and they brought back numerous herds of cattle, and immense preys, to O'Donnell, at the town of Athenry; and although the guards of the town endeavoured to defend it, the effort was of no avail to them, for O'Donnell's people applied fire and flames to the strong closed gates of the town, and having brought very large ladders to it, they laid them against the walls, by which they went on the battlements of the wall, and they then leaped from the battlements, and gained the streets of the town, and opened the gates for those on the outside; they then set about to demolish the treasure-houses, and the closed habitations, and took out of them all the treasure and property they contained, and they remained that night in the town. It was not easy to recount or enumerate all the brass, iron, cloth, and apparel they carried off from that town on the following day; it was from the same town he sent forth preying parties to plunder Clanrickard, on each side of the river; those scouring parties preyed and completely plundered from Leathraith (near Athenry), to Magh-Sean-Comhladh (or the ancient Plain of Comhladh, in the barony of Dunkellin), and the other portion of them burned and entirely devastated from Baile-an-Riogh, and from Raith-

Ghoirgin, westward to Rinn-Mil, to Meadhraighe (both at the bay of Galway), and to the gates of Galway; they burned Teagh-Brighde, at the door of Spairri, of Galway; O'Donnell and his forces halted and encamped that night between Uaran Mor (Oranmore), and Galway, at Cloch-an-Linsigh precisely. O'Donnell proceeded the next day to Mainistir-an-Chnuic (or the Monastery of the Hill), at the gates of Galway, and he opened an intercourse with the people of the town, for the purpose of trafficking and purchasing, in exchange for his preys, their various goods and fine cloths; he afterwards resolved on returning back, and were it not for the burden of the collected preys, the greatness of the plunder, and the immensity of his booty, it is probable he would not have stopped on that expedition, until he had gone to Gort-Innsi-Guaire (Gort, in Galway), in Kinel-Aodha of Echtge. O'Donnell and his forces, with their preys, proceeded on their return through the very centre of the province of Connaught, by the same way they had gone, and did not halt until they encamped in Calraidhe (parish of Calry), on the west side of Sligo, and he sent his messengers and unarmed attendants, with some of the prey, across the Samaoir (the river Erne), northwards. As to O'Connor Sligo, namely, Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, he collected a very great force of English and Irish, shortly after the festival of St. Bridget, to march to Sligo. O'Donnell remained in Calry, as we have before stated, to watch them, and he made an attack on O'Connor's forces before they had come to Sligo; they did not, however, wait for him, except a small party of the rear of the force, which he overtook at the strand of Eothuile, who were slain and drowned; the son of Mac William, namely, Richard, the son of Oliver, son of John, together with many others besides, who are not recorded, were slain there. O'Connor returned back, and he was not happy in mind for having come on that expedition. O'Donnell then returned to his home, and dismissed his forces, to recruit themselves after their long campaign, he having left his retained and paid soldiers in the his ancestors, and he consequently had power over the appointment of the princes and chiefs, and he appointed Philip O'Reilly as prince of Brefney. At this time, according to Cox, O'Neill, O'Donnell, O'Rourke, Maguire, Mac Mahon, and other chiefs, were proclaimed traitors both in English and Irish, and the reward of one thousand pounds was at one time offered by the government for the head of O'Neill; but Fynes Morrison says, "Howsoever, the name of O'Neill was so revered in the North, that none could be induced to betray him for the large reward set upon his head."

province of Connaught, under the command of Niall Garv, the son of Con, son of Calvach O'Donnell, to carry on war against O'Connor, and the English who were in alliance with him; these continued to plunder and spoil the districts of the Irish, who rose in alliance with O'Connor and the English, until a great number of them, along with Mac Dermott, namely, Conor, the chief of Moylurg, (barony of Boyle, in Roscommon), returned back and came on terms of friendship with him the second time, and paid him his tribute; the chiefs of the districts north of the Curlew mountains did the same, and gave their hostages and sureties to O'Donnell.

Seven score and four (144) barrels of powder came from the queen to Dublin, in the month of March, for the use of her people; after the powder was landed, it was drawn to Wine-street (Wine-tavern-street, near Christ Church), where it was all placed together on each side of the street, and a spark of fire got into the powder; it was not known on the face of the earth by what means that spark came; but, however, the barrels exploded into one blazing conflagration, and a spreading fire, on the 13th of March precisely, so that the stone courts, and the wooden dwellings of the street, were raised from their firm foundations and binding posts, up into the air, where appeared the large long beams, and the stones which had long lain there, and the entire bodies of persons floating in the air over the town, by the explosion of the powerful powder, so that it is impossible to number, calculate, or relate all the people of rank, and artisans of all classes, with women, maidens, and sons of gentlemen who came from all parts of Ireland to receive their education in the city, who were destroyed; it was not to be regretted all the gold, silver, and valuable property that were destroyed, as compared with the number of people who were killed and injured by that explosion; and it was not that street alone that was demolished on that occasion, but the one-fourth of the adjoining part of the city.

O'Connor, i. e. Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, united in alliance and amity his relative by marriage, namely, the son of Mac William Burke, that is Tepoid-na-Long (Theobald of the ships), the son of Richard of the Iron, son of David, son of Edmond, and the governor of the province of Connaught, namely, sir Conyers Clifford; after having established their alliance with each other, Theobald brought the governor, and the companies of the province of Connaught into Tyrawley, and Mac William's country, and they deposed and expelled Mac William, namely Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotach, son of John, son of Oliver, from his patrimony to O'Donnell; they laid waste and completely plundered all those who remained in the country after him, that were in alliance and friendship with him, and Theobald of the Ships, and the governor, took possession of the country on that occasion, after which the governor returned to the town of Athlone, and the companies retired to their garrisons; it was impossible to relate all the prey and booty they carried away from Mac William's country at that time. As to Mac William, after he had gone to O'Donnell, to complain of his troubles to him, he remained with him till the middle month of Summer, when O'Donnell marched with a force into the province of Connaught to aid Mac William, and crossed the Moy of Tyrawley (in Mayo), without any danger; the country not being able to oppose him, he took their hostages and sureties, and he delivered these hostages to Mac William, and he left the country in submission to him; and he also left Roderick (Rory) O'Donnell his own brother, the tanist of Tirconnell, with him to support him against his enemies, with a great force of foot warriors, and of common soldiers, and O'Donnell returned back to his country. O'Connor and Theobald of the Ships collected a great force of English and Irish after O'Donnell had left the country, to avenge their enmity on Mac William, and they expelled Mac William, the second time, and Rory from the country on that occasion, for they had not an equal force with them. The resolution that Rory and Mac William came to was, to send all the property and cattle of the country in their neighbourhood, together with their families and people, before them across the river Moy of Tyrawley, and through Tireragh of the Moy, to get under the protection of O'Donnell, and having arrived at Slieve Gamh (the Ox Mountain), before night, they continued their progress across the mountain during the night. As to the governor, when he sent O'Connor and Theobald of the Ships, with their forces, to expel Mac William from the country, he mustered all his forces to meet Mac

William and Rory, in a place which they could neither avoid or shun. The nobles who accompanied the governor on that occasion were Ulick, the son of Rickard Saxonach, son of Ulick of the Heads, earl of Clanrickard, and his son Rickard, baron of Dun-Coillin (barony of Dunkellin in Galway); Donogh, the son of Conor, son of Donogh O'Brien, earl of Thomond, and Murrough, the son of Murrough, son of Dermot O'Brien, baron of Innsi-Ui-Cuinn (barony of Inchiquin in Clare), together with many other gentlemen besides. Where the governor remained that night was in the castle of Colloony, which is situated on the great river to the east of the Ox Mountain, and to the west of Slieve-da-En, with fifteen hundred warriors of superior valour along with him there; the place where he remained was a general thoroughfare, which was not easily avoided. Rory O'Donnell and Mac William were informed that the governor was before them on the way which they could not avoid, upon which they resolved, when they had come within a short distance of the castle, before morning, to send their cattle and flocks, their attendants and unarmed people, by a way which was more private than the way by which they themselves intended to cross the river, without being noticed in the neighbourhood of the castle, as they had not equal forces with those of their enemies; they accordingly crossed the river, unperceived and unheard, until they arrived on the other side, and they thought that they had secured and protected their cattle, and attendants; but that, however, did not so happen, for the bellowing of the cattle herds and animals, and the shouts of their drivers, being heard in the early morning, troops and companies of the governor's cavalry went in the direction of the bellowing of the cattle, in the hope of capturing them; they took a great number of the cattle, but the greater portion fled from them; a great number of the attendants and drivers were slain, and it was on that occasion was killed Maolmurry, the son of Cu-ula Mac Ward, the most eminent poet of his own tribe; their own people could give them no relief, on account of the numerous force opposed to them; it was a great grief to the governor that they should have passed him without laying hold of them. The Irish made their escape after that manner, and arrived beyond the river Erne northwards; the governor returned back, and was not happy in his mind on account of his enemies having escaped from him, as they were so few in number.

Fiacha Mac Hugh (O'Byrne), the son of John of Glenmalure, (in Wicklow), was slain in the first month of the summer of this year, in a treacherous attack made on him by his kinsman, at the request of the lord justice of Ireland, sir William Russell.¹

A new lord justice, namely, Thomas, lord Burrough, came to Ireland in the beginning of the month of June, with a great deal of arms and soldiers, and having received the sword from the lord justice, who had been in the government for three years till then, namely, sir William Russell, he deprived sir John Norris of the office which he held from his sovereign, viz., the generalship of the war, and he himself assumed that office; he afterwards issued a proclamation to the men of Leinster and Meath, and to all those who were obedient to the queen, from the Meeting of the three Waters (at Waterford), to Dundalk, to meet him, with all their forces, fully mustered, at Drogheda, on the 20th day of the month of July. These orders were attended to by the earl of Kildare, and by the English of Meath and Leinster; the lord justice, with all the forces he could muster, arrived at the same place, and after the forces had met together

A. D. 1597.

1. Death of O'Byrne.—This Fiacha Mac Hugh O'Byrne, called by various writers Feagh Mac Hugh, was head of the clan of the O'Byrnes of Wicklow, and lord of Ranelagh, and he had his chief fortress at Ballynacor, in the valley of Glenmalure; he was a very valiant leader, and, at the head of the O'Byrnes, O'Tooles, and O'Cavenaghs, commanded in various parts of Leinster, in the war against Elizabeth, for a period of about twenty years, during which he had numerous conflicts with the English forces, and frequently defeated them, particularly at the battle of Glenmalure, where he gained a great victory over the lord deputy, Arthur Grey, in 1580, of which an account has been given at that year in these Annals. Many of the exploits of this celebrated chieftain are mentioned by Mac Geoghegan, Cox, Spenser, and others, and also recorded in the course of these Annals. His valour was long remembered in the traditions of the people, and recorded in one of their sayings to the following effect:

"O'Brainn, O'Tuathail is O'Caomhanach Triur do rusgfadh an Sasanach."

"O'Byrne, O'Toole, and O'Cavenach,
Were three who would thresh the Sasanagh."

Lord Arthur Grey, Fitzwilliam, and other deputies, made many attempts, and laid several stratagems to seize O'Byrne, but this formidable chief baffled all their efforts; however, he was finally slain, as above recorded, through the treachery of some of his own people, influenced by the bribes of the lord deputy, sir William Russell. Fiacha O'Byrne was succeeded by his sons Felin and Redmond, who were also distinguished commanders in Leinster, in the war against Elizabeth.

they marched to Tyrone, and proceeded to Avonmore (the river Blackwater), without opposition, or halting; and, what was unusual with O'Neill, an advantage was obtained of his watching, until the lord justice had crossed the river, without battle or opposition, and had arrived on the other side of it. The lord justice demolished and completely broke up the guarding fort, which O'Neill had on the banks of the river, and he raised a new fort for himself on the opposite side of the same river (the fort of Blackwater, at Blackwatertown, in Armagh), and although that opportunity was gained of O'Neill, through the information and instruction of Torlogh, the son of Henry, son of Felim Roe O'Neill, the lord justice, or any of his forces, did not attempt to proceed the distance of one mile beyond that into Tyrone; and they were not allowed rest or quiet, sleep or peace, from a continued skirmishing and firing carried on against them by O'Neill's people, both by day and night; it was impossible to enumerate or relate the immense numbers of the lord justice's people that were slain and destroyed, and all the horses and booty that were taken from them. On a certain day the lord justice went to a hill in the neighbourhood of the camp, to reconnoitre and view the surrounding country, and truly it were better for him he had not gone, for a great number of his officers were slain by O'Neill, and his men; amongst those were the brother of the lord justice's wife, the chief officer of his forces, together with a great number of captains and gentlemen besides; some of the earl of Kildare's people were also slain there, and were it not that the camp was so near to the lord justice, those who escaped would not have survived that conflict. It happened to the earl of Kildare, namely, Henry, the son of Gerald, that, either by cause of some wound or fever, he was obliged to set out for his home, and having arrived at Drogheda, he died in that town; his body was conveyed to Kildare, and was buried, with honour and solemnity, in the tomb of his ancestors; and his brother William was appointed his successor. After the lord justice had completed that new fort on the banks of the Blackwater, and having considered all he lost of his men, and that he was not suffered to advance into the country farther than that place, he put provisions and guards into the fort, and he prepared to return back himself; he first proceeded to Newry, and from thence to Dublin, and his forces returned to their homes.²

2. Battle of Drumfluch, &c.—The battle above mentioned in the Annals was fought, in the latter end of July, 1597, at a place called Drumfluch, signifying the Moist Hill, situated near Benburb in Tyrone, and about two miles westward of Blackwatertown, in Armagh, which was formerly called Portmore. This battle is described by Mac Geoghegan and O'Sullivan Beare, and also in Stuart's Armagh. In 1597, Thomas Borrough, or Burgh, lord Borrough, an English nobleman, who was a distinguished commander, and had served in the Netherlands against the king of Spain, arrived in Ireland as lord deputy, and proceeded to Ulster with powerful forces against Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone. The lord deputy, with the English forces, and those of the Pale, under the command of Henry, earl of Kildare; Barnwall, lord Trimlestown, and other officers, marched to Drogheda, Newry, and Armagh, took Portmore from O'Neill, and placed a garrison in the fort. The English crossed the Blackwater, and O'Neill retired a short distance, his object being to decoy the lord deputy to his own side of the river in Tyrone. The Irish were commanded by the earl O'Neill himself, and his brothers, Cormac and Art O'Neill, aided by Mae Mahon of Monaghan, and other Ulster chiefs; and some forces, it is said, were sent by Red Hugh O'Donnell from Donegal, but he could not come himself, being then engaged in preparing for a defence against the powerful forces of sir Conyers Clifford from Connaught, who invaded Tircconnell, at that time, as hereafter mentioned; there came also to the aid of O'Neill a body of Scots from Antrim, under James Mac Donnell, lord of the Glynnis. The English cavalry, under the lord deputy Borrough, the earl of Kildare, and other commanders, advanced to attack the Irish, who were strongly posted near the woods between Portmore and Benburb. O'Neill's men, who were in two divisions, immediately united, and, led on by himself, his brothers, and other chiefs, rushed to the encounter, and after a fierce conflict, which continued a considerable time, the English forces were routed with immense slaughter, and great numbers of their troops were drowned in the Blackwater, as they fled over the river, at the place now called Battleford Bridge. In the above account in the Annals, it is stated that immense numbers of the English were slain, and that a vast number of horses, together with great booty, were taken in the conflicts before the battle; and that, in the engagement at the hill, many commanders, and an immense number of the English soldiers, were slain; therefore it is considered that at least 800 of the English forces fell in these conflicts. In this battle were slain sir Francis Vaughan, brother-in-law of the lord deputy, with sir Robert Turner, and sir Thomas Waller, all commanders of note, and many other officers. The earl of Kildare was struck twice off his horse, and his two foster brothers were killed in rescuing him, and assisting him to remount; he died shortly after, as stated in the Annals, and also in Lodge's Peerage, from the severity of his wounds, his death being hastened by grief for the fate of his foster brothers; the earl died at Drogheda on the 31st of July, in the 33rd year of his age. The remnant of the English forces retreated to Newry, and it has been stated by several writers that the lord deputy Borrough was mortally wounded in this battle, and died soon after at Newry; but Camden, Cox, and others, say he returned to Dublin, and soon after came again with fresh forces to Ulster, and having passed through Armagh, attacked O'Neill, who was besieging Portmore, but soon after fell sick, and, on his return towards Dublin, died on the way. This account agrees with the Four Masters, as mentioned in these Annals, that, in the course of the same year, namely, 1597, Lord Borrough marched to Armagh, with his forces, to relieve with provisions the garrison of Portmore, on the Blackwater, and had some fierce conflicts with O'Neill's forces, who defeated and slew great numbers of the English, and the lord deputy Borrough, being severely wounded in one of these engagements, died soon after at Newry.

When the lord justice prepared to march with that army into Tyrone, he sent a written despatch to the governor of the province of Connaught, commanding him to march with all the forces he could muster to the western side of the province of Ulster against O'Donnell, while he should be in Tyrone; that command was not slowly attended to by the governor, for he sent for the earl of Thomond, namely Donogh, the son of Conor, and for the baron of Inchiquin, i. e. Murrogh, the son of Murrogh; for the earl of Clanrickard, namely, Ulick, the son of Rickard Saxanach, and his son Rickard, the son of Ulick, baron of Dunkellin; he also requested the gentlemen of the counties of Mayo and Roscommon to come with their forces; he commanded all the officers to meet him at the monastery of Boyle, on the 24th day of the month of July precisely, and that he himself, with his companies, would be at that place before them; all those came to the forementioned place, on the same day, and the number of their forces, when they had met together, were twenty-two colours of foot, and ten standards of cavalry; from thence they marched to Sligo, and afterwards to the river Erne, and they formed a numerous warlike camp on the banks of Samaoir of blue streams (the ancient name of the river Erne); these forces were so elated that they imagined they could not be contended with or opposed in the entire province of Ulster. The forces of the governor rose very early on the following day to cross the river; O'Donnell had guards at every ford on the Erne, but, however, they got an opportunity at an intricate ford, which was on it, viz., Ath-Cuil-Uain (near Ballyshannon), and they rushed with energy and might to that ford; the guards began to shoot at them incessantly, and to defend the ford as well as they could against them; but, however, they could not defend it long against the great and numerous forces opposed to them, so that the governor and his army crossed it, and arrived on the opposite side; however, a very lamentable death took place on that day, namely, Murrogh, the son of Murrogh, son of Dermot, son of Murrogh O'Brien, baron of Inchiquin; he was on his horse outside of the soldiers, in the centre, and in the depth of the river protecting them from being drowned, and encouraging them past him; but fate ordained it that he was directly aimed at by one of O'Donnell's people, by the shot of a ball, at the separation of his mail armour in the arm-pit, and it passed through at the other arm-pit; he could not be helped until he fell from his horse into the depth of the stream, and was immediately drowned. The person who was slain there was greatly lamented among the English and Irish, on account of the highness of his rank, and the nobility of his blood, although he was young in age; and although, by right, his body should have been raised and buried with honours, the forces did not wait for that purpose, but proceeded without halting to the monastery of Easroe (at Ballyshannon); it was on the 31st of the month of July they arrived at that place, and on a Saturday; they encamped about the monastery, inside and outside, and they remained there, since they had crossed the Erne before mid-day on Saturday, till Monday morning. It was on Sunday, while they were in the monastery, that the ships which were promised to follow them from Galway with ordnance, large guns, and stores in general, for the purpose of supporting them while they should be in that strange country, arrived, and those ships took port at Inis-Saimher, before Easroe (the Island of Samer, below the Cataract of Ballyshannon), and they landed the stores on the island, with sufficient guards to protect it; the ordnance was landed on Monday, and was placed before the castle of Ballyshannon; they brought their forces from the monastery to the top of Sith-Aodha (the Hill of Hugh), opposite the fortress, and about the ordnance; they continued firing at the castle during Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, with thick flashes of fire, and red shot from loud-roaring guns, and immensely large and heavy ordnance which they planted before the fortress, so that their resounding and echoing reports were heard in the vaults of the air, far and distant from them; large bands of their select warriors proceeded to the base of the castle, with engines for demolishing walls, having their bodies clad with thick strong iron armour, fine polished helmets on their heads, and completely guarded with bright, round, broad bucklers, and shields of hard iron, to protect them against the shot of their enemies. It did not avail them the attack they made on the fortress, and it were better for them they had not come on the journey which they made there, for they were assailed from the castle with thick showers of fiery shot from the planted and well directed guns, and their very costly muskets, while others hurled down rough-sided rocks, immense heavy stones, beams, and rafters, which were placed on the battlements of the castle directly opposite the firing, so that the coverings which were on the demolishing party were no protection or defence to them; great numbers of them were slain, while others were disabled by being deeply wounded, so that they did not wait to be shot at any longer, and having turned their backs to their opponents, they were driven back to the camp, and the guards of the castle continued firing after them, so that many of them were slain. A party of O'Donnell's cavalry defeated the English cavalry, and it is not ascertained or recorded all those that were slain or wounded between them, except O'Connor Sligo, namely Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, who was wounded on that occasion; for he and O'Connor Roe, namely Hugh, the son of Torlogh Roe, and Theobald of the Ships (Burke), were with the entire of their forces along with the governor at that time. O'Donnell, however, was deficient of forces, and had only a few on the Saturday the governor came to the country with that great army; his people and forces were mustering and collecting from all quarters to him, so that the greater portion of them arrived before the noon of day on Monday. Maguire, i. e. Hugh, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Cuchonaecht, and O'Rourke, namely Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan, son of Bryan Ballaeh, came with their forces to him, and when those chiefs came together, they did not allow the governor or his forces much rest or quietness, for they carried on skirmishing, firing, conflicts, fighting, and defeating attacks against the camp, every day during the three days they had been engaged in their assaults on the castle; O'Donnell's forces often drove the wings of the Conaician camp into its very centre, and its centre into its wings, and they did not permit their horses or cattle to feed beyond the limits of the camp, neither did they let any hay or corn come to them, on account of which the governor and his forces were in great extremities and distress, for although they wished to return, they were not able to face any common ford on the Erne, from Caol-UISge (the Narrow Water, near Lough Erne), to Ath-Seanaigh (at Ballyshannon). The commanders were not happy in their minds, though their forces were numerous, for having been placed in such danger by their enemies. When the governor, the earls, and the officers in general, perceived the great danger in which they were, they held a council from the beginning of the night of Wednesday to the break of day on the morning of Thursday, being the 15th of August, so that the resolution they at length came to in the early dawn was, to proceed directly onward from that place in which they were, at Sith-Aodha, to the turbulent, rough, deep cold stream of Leic above Easroe, which is called Cassan-na-gCuraidh (the Rout of the Champions); and they advanced in companies and parties, to that unknown and unfrequented place, unnoticed and unheard by O'Donnell's forces; the stream was so strong, and some of their forces so helpless, and their horses were so laden with their provisions, that an immense number of their men and women, of their weak and feeble people, of their steeds and horses, and of every thing in general which they had with them, were carried down by the cataract of Easroe westward to the sea; they left their ordnance and their stores of food and drink in the power of the Tíreonnallians on that occasion; but, however, the commanders and officers of the force, and all of them who were efficient, crossed the Erne, after great hardship and danger. The guards of the castle continued firing on them as fast as they could, and pursued them to the banks of the river, in the hope of killing their enemies, and sent word to O'Donnell and his forces; when O'Donnell heard the report of the firing, he and his forces immediately got ready, quickly put themselves in fighting order, and proceeded to the river as expeditiously as they could. When the governor's forces cleared the river, they went into rank and order; they sent their women, their attendants, their unarmed people, their wounded, and all the beasts of burden they had with them, between them and the sea, and they placed their warriors and musketeers, in their rear, and on the other side by land, for they were sure they would be attacked by the forces who were in pursuit of them. O'Donnell's people promptly proceeded in pursuit of them across the river, and the most of them did not wait to put on their armour, or outside coats, they were so anxious to be avenged of the forces that fled from them; they began to circumvent and harass them in fighting, and they continued shooting and cutting each other, from the Erne to Moy Cedne, in Hy Cairpre of Drumcliff (Moy Cedne, in the barony of Carbury, in Sligo). A shower of rain fell at that time, which was exceedingly heavy, so that the forces on either side could not use or fire their arms, their powder-pouches and gun locks having been wetted, but those showers of rain had a greater effect on O'Donnell's people than on the governor's forces, for they had left behind them their outside coats, as we have before stated, which was not the case with the other party, who were clad in armour, besides their outer coverings. The governor and his forces went to Sligo that night, on the following day to the monastery of Boyle, and on the third day to the district of Athleague; the chiefs of Connaught returned to their countries and homes, and the governor to the town of Athlone. The Irish of the province of Ulster were cheerful and merry, for the lord justice having departed from Tyrone without receiving obedience or submission, and the governor from Tirconnell, in one month, as we have written.³

On the lord justice leaving Tyrone, as we have before stated, and having left provisions and guards in that new fort (Portmore, or Blackwatertown, in Armagh), which he himself raised on the banks of Avonmore, he proceeded to Dublin. As to O'Neill, he and his people did not cease, after that, either by day or by night, endeavouring to take by stratagem or assault that fort, and be avenged on the guards who were in it; one day that they attacked that place, thirty of their people were slain, and they effected nothing against the fortress. When the lord justice learned that his guards were harassed in that manner, and that they were in want of stores, he collected a very great force, for the purpose of proceeding to put provisions, and all other sorts of stores, into the fort; the lord justice, having arrived at Armagh with his forces, he proceeded with all the cavalry of the army about him, some distance before his soldiers and companies, in the hope of taking by surprise some of O'Neill's people; when he came near the Blackwater, he fell in with a troop of cavalry and a company of soldiers of O'Neill's people; a fierce conflict and violent engagement ensued between them, and many men were slain, and horses lost, on the side of the lord justice in that battle; when his soldiers came up to the lord justice, he proceeded to the fort, and some have stated that he was not well from that day forth. Having left provisions and guards in the fort, on the following day, they prepared to return back, and they did not go beyond Armagh that night; it was in a carriage the lord justice was conveyed, or he was carried in a litter by his people, that is, either by his relatives or friends, without the knowledge of the greater portion of the forces on that day. O'Neill carried on firing and skirmishing on the lord justice's camp that night, by which the chief commander of the forces, and many others besides, were slain. They marched from thence to Newry, and the lord justice died in that town, from the effects of the wounds which were inflicted on him while coming from Armagh to the new fort. The keeping of the sword of state was entrusted to the chancellor (Adam Loftus, lord chancellor of Ireland, and archbishop of Dublin), and to the lord chief justice of the King's Bench, namely, sir Robert Gardiner, until a new lord justice should come from England.

O'Donnell was grieved that the governor and

3. Battle of Ballyshannon &c.—In the month of July, 1597, the governor of Connaught, Sir Conyers Clifford, joined by O'Brien, earl of Thomond; Burke, earl of Clanrickard; O'Brien baron of Inchiquin; Burke baron of Dunkellin; Theobald Mac William Burke, O'Connor Sligo, and other commanders, marched with a force, amounting to four thousand men, together with his Irish auxiliaries, according to Mac Geoghegan. These combined forces proceeded to Ballyshannon, to act against Red Hugh O'Donnell, and thus co-operate with the army which had marched into Tyrone at the same time, under the lord deputy Borrough, against Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, as before stated. The various conflicts of Sir Conyers Clifford's forces with those of O'Donnell, are above related in the Annals. Clifford laid siege to the castle of Ballyshannon, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, he had four pieces of cannon, and the castle was defended by a Scottish captain named

Owen Crawford, who had under him 80 men, six of whom were Spaniards, and the rest Irish. The attack was very powerful, but the castle was defended with great bravery, and in the course of the siege, Clifford being informed that O'Rourke was advancing on one side, and O'Neill on the other, to relieve the castle, he decamped precipitately, and left behind him three pieces of cannon. It appears that O'Donnell had but few forces prepared to cope with the formidable army under Clifford, but, however, they slew great numbers of them in the various conflicts, and also in the pursuit, and many were drowned in recrossing the river Erne, and Mac Geoghegan states that they lost in one day 300 men, in killed and drowned; therefore it is considered that altogether there were at least 600 of the English forces slain. At p. 622 a curious account is given of the finding of the body, and burial of the baron of Inchiquin, who was slain in crossing the river Erne.

the earls (sir Conyers Clifford and the earls of Thomond and Clanrickard), should have escaped from him in the manner they had fled; but, however, neither of them attacked the other to the end of harvest. O'Donnell thought it too long not to make an attack on the English of Connaught, and on those who had risen in alliance with them, and who had formerly made friendship with him; of those was O'Conor Roe, namely, Hugh, the son of Torlogh Roe, and he (O'Donnell), was meditating how he might prey his territory; that, however, was a difficult undertaking for him, unless he came on him unawares, for where he lived was an intricate country, and the place to which he could send his cattle and property in general, to secure them from his enemies, was near him. O'Rourke promised him (O'Conor), that he would not allow O'Donnell to advance on him, without sending him notice. O'Donnell, having collected his forces, marched into Connaught, and halted on the south-east side of Gleann Dallain (Glenear and Glenade, on the borders of Leitrim and Sligo), where he encamped. When he learned that friendship existed between O'Rourke and O'Conor, the deception he devised against O'Rourke was to send him his messenger, requesting him to come to the camp where he was; O'Rourke promised to go to him on the following day, and he did not think that O'Donnell should leave the camp until he came to him; that was not what O'Donnell did, but, after having sent his messenger to O'Rourke, he departed from his camp, after mid-day, and proceeded beyond Sligo southward, and did not halt until he arrived at the Curlew mountains, where he made a short stay until his men took some of their provisions and rested themselves; and moreover, he did not wish to cross the mountain southwards by the light of day. When the beginning of the night came on them, they proceeded southward over the mountain, and across the river Boyle, through Moylurg of the Daghdá, and through the borders of the Plain of Connaught before morning; they sent forth their scouring parties, in the beginning of the day, into the wilds and sequestered places of the country, in every direction, so that they did not leave the least head of cattle, from Ath-Slisean to Badhghna (Slievebane mountain, in Roscommon), and they preyed and burned all that lay between those places, and they then returned back with their herds of cattle and much booty. O'Rourke was ashamed for the country being preyed without his having given notice of it, and the governor, sir Conyers Clifford, was not less grieved that the country which was under his controul and power should have been spoiled and burned.

Maguire, i. e. Hugh, the son of Cuchonacht, son of Cuchonacht, and Cormac, the son of Feardorcha, son of Con Bacach O'Neill, marched with a force, at the instigation of the O'Ferralls (of Longford), to Mullingar, in Meath; they preyed the country about them, and they completely plundered Mullingar itself; and they left no property in the town, of gold, silver, brass, iron, cloth, or foreign goods, belonging to the people, that could be carried or conveyed, that they did not take with them; and on their return back they set the town into a dark red blaze of conflagration, and they afterwards returned safe to their homes. (Mullingar was then in possession of the English of the Pale).

Oilen (Ellen), Butler, daughter of the earl of Ormond, i. e. of Pierce Roe, the son of James, son of Edmond, son of Richard, who was the wife of the second earl, who was appointed over Thomond, namely, Donogh the son of Conon, son of Torlogh O'Brien, died.

Murtogh Ultach (O'Dunlevey of Donegal), the son of John, died at Druim-na-Loiste, on the 10th of February, after the 89th year of his age.

Sir John Norris, who was the queen's war-general in France and in Ireland, went to Munster, after he had been deprived of his office by the late lord justice (Lord Borough), who had come to Ireland; he remained with his brother, sir Thomas Norris, who was president under him in Munster for twelve years previous to that time; sir John was seized with a disease of which he suddenly died, in the harvest of this year, and sir Thomas was the heir to all his property; sir Thomas obtained the same office which he himself previously held, that is to say, he became president after the death of his brother.

Edmond (Burke), the son of Ulick of the Heads, son of Rickard, son of Ulick of Knock Tuagh, of Ballyhilighi, died in the summer of this year.

Dudley, the son of Tuathal O'Conor, died at Breac-Chluin (in Roscommon).

Con and Dermot, the sons of that Dudley (O'Conor), and the son of Mac Dermott of Moy-lurg, namely, Maolroona, the son of Bryan, son of Roderick, son of Teige, made an attack on the town of Mac David, i. e. Glinsk (in Galway), and seized some booty; on their return from the town with their prey, Mac David overtook them, on the borders of the river Suck, and defeated them; he slew Con O'Connor, one of the most worthy cavalry soldiers in Connaught, and also Maolroona, the son of Mac Dermott, and a great number of other gentlemen besides; and the son of Mac David returned to his home, after having gained the victory.

Mac William, namely, Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotach, returned to his country (in Mayo), about November of this year, and he remained for some time in the fastnesses of his estate, despite of his enemies; he plundered the Umhalls (the baronies of Murrisk and Burrishoole, in Mayo), at that time, and his brother Thomas was slain in Clanmorris-na-mBrigh (the barony of Clanmorris in Mayo), on that occasion.

John Oge, the son of Rickard, son of John (Burke), of the Termon, was slain in a nocturnal attack by some of the Clan Donnell, on Oilen-na-Nenuigeadh, on Fionn Loch Carra (in Mayo).

It happened that the baron of Inchiquin, who was slain in Tirconnell, as we have stated, had some lands in his possession, which were also possessed by his ancestors before him, on the other (southern), side of the Shannon, called Port-Croise; when the Burkes, along the Shannon, and Clan William of Aes-Tri-Maighi (the barony of Clanwilliam in the county of Limerick), heard of the death of the baron, the resolution they came to was, to oppose the claims of the baron's family, and of his mother Margaret, the daughter of Thomas Cusack, to those lands, on the authority of an old chart of their ancestors. Some of the inhabitants of Kinel Fearmaic, viz., the baron's estate (the barony of Inchiquin in Clare), joined Margaret, to aid and assist her; Margaret and this party went with their force and people to Port-Cross; when intelligence of that was received by the forementioned Burkes, namely, Thomas, the son of Theobald, son of William, son of William, son of Edmond, and Ulick, son of William, son of Edmond, collected all the forces they could and they attacked Margaret and the baron's people; a fierce conflict ensued between them, and though the baron's people were fewer in number, they bravely defended themselves; some chiefs were slain between them on both sides, and on the side of the Burkes fell Ulick Mac William Burke, the son of Edmond, and three or four other chiefs; there also fell, on the other side, Hugh O'Hogan, one of the most worthy chiefs' sons of the county of Clare, in goodness and pre-eminence; also another worthy chief, namely, Murrough, the son of Donogh, son of Murrough Roe Mac Brien, together with the son of Cruise, i. e. Thomas, the son of Christopher.

Captain Tyrrell, captain Nugent, the O'Cave-naghs, O'Conors Faily, the O'Moores, and the tribe of Rannall (O'Byrnes of Ranelagh, in Wicklow), carried on great war, plundering, and insurrection, in Leinster, and in the country of the Butlers, from Lady-day to Christmas of this year; and it would be tedious to write of all they slew and spoiled in those countries during that period; they moreover slew two bodies of soldiers at Port-Leix (Maryborough, in Queen's county).⁴

The governor of Carrickfergus, together with three companies of soldiers, were slain by James,

4. Battle of Tyrrell's Pass.—The captain Tyrrell above mentioned in the Annals was Richard Tyrrell, a gentleman of the Anglo-Norman family of the Tyrrells, lords of Fartullagh in Westmeath; he was one of the most valiant and celebrated commanders of the Irish in the war against Elizabeth, and, during a period of 10 or 12 years, had many conflicts with the English forces in various parts of Ireland; he was particularly famous for bold and hazardous exploits, and rapid expeditions, and copious accounts of him are given by Fynes Morrison, Mac Geoghegan, and others; after the reduction of Ireland he retired to Spain. The battle of Tyrrell's Pass is described by Mac Geoghegan, and mentioned by Leland and other historians; it was fought in the summer of 1597, at a place afterwards called Tyrrell's Pass, now the name of a town in the barony of Fartullagh, in Westmeath. When Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, heard that the English forces were preparing to advance into Ulster, under the lord deputy Borrough, as before mentioned, he detached captain Tyrrell, at the head of 400 chosen men, to act in Meath and Leinster, and by thus engaging some of the English forces of the Pale, to cause a diversion, and prevent their joining the lord deputy Borrough, or co-operate with Sir Conyers Clifford. The Anglo-Irish of Meath assembled at Mullingar, to the number of 1000 men, under the command of Barnwall, baron of Trimlestown, intending to proceed and join the lord deputy. Tyrrell was encamped, with his small force, in Fartullagh, and was joined in command by young O'Connor Faily of the King's county. The baron of Trimlestown, having learned where Tyrrell was posted, formed the project of taking him by surprise, and for that purpose dispatched his son, at the head of the assembled troops. Tyrrell having received information of their advance against him, immediately put himself in a posture of defence, and making a feint of flying before them as they advanced, drew them into a defile covered with trees, which place has since been called Tyrrell's Pass, and having detached half of his men, under the command of O'Connor, they were posted in ambush in a hollow adjoining the road. When the English were passing, O'Connor and his men sallied out from their ambuscade, and with their drums and fifes, played Tyrrell's March, which was the signal agreed upon for the attack. Tyrrell then rushed on the son of Sorley Buighe Mac Donnell, in Clanaboy, about November of this year.⁵

The Clan Sheehy, namely, Murrough Baclamhach, the son of Murrough Balv, son of Manus Mac Sheehy, together with his brother Roderick, and Edmond, the son of Murrough Bacaeh, son of Edmond, son of Manus Mac Sheehy, were put to death by the English, on account of their warring and insurrection.

After the death of the lord justice, namely, Thomas, lord Borrough, at Newry, from the effects of his wounds, and after the keeping of the sword of state had been given to the chancellor, and to sir Robert Gardiner, the chief justice of the King's Bench, as we have stated, the person who was appointed as commander-in-chief for war and peace, in Ireland, was the earl of Ormond, namely, Thomas, the son of James, son of Peirce Roc, so that it was on that account a truce took place between the earl and the chiefs of the province of Ulster. It was not long after until the general, namely, the earl of Ormond, and the earl of Thomond, i. e. Donogh, the son of Conor (O'Brien), proceeded into the province of Ulster, in the month of December, shortly before Christmas, and they themselves, with O'Neill and O'Donnell, remained together at one place for the space of three nights; and a conference for peace was carried on between those earls on behalf of the queen with the Irish of Leath Cuinn, and the result of the conference was, that peace was made between the English and Irish, on the pledge of those earls, till the following May. The proposals and writings of the forementioned Irish, being the subject of the articles and terms on which they would receive peace for themselves and for their allies, in the war, in every place they were located, were sent to the queen, in England, by the earl of Thomond, and whatever answer should return in May they were to act upon it accordingly. (This conference was held at Dundalk on the 22nd of December, according to Cox).

O'Connor Sligo, namely, Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, went to England a short time before the Christmas of this year.

The body of the baron of Inchiquin, of whom we have treated (see p. 617), who had been wounded and drowned on the crossing of the river Erne by the governor and the forementioned earls, with their forces, was taken up by Cormac O'Clery, one of the monks of the monastery of Easroc (at Ballyshannon), and the body was buried by him in the monastery with due solemnity, on account of which a dispute and controversy arose between the friars of Donegal and the monks; the friars contended that by right the body should be buried in their own monastery, because it was in the monastery of St. Francis in his own country, the ancestors of the baron were interred, for a long period before that time; the monks were claiming him for themselves, so that the friars and monks went before O'Donnell, and the two bishops who were in the country, namely, Redmond O'Gallagher, bishop of Derry, and Niall O'Boyle, bishop of Raphoe (neither of them is mentioned in Ware), and those nobles decided that the baron, Murrough, the son of Murrough O'Brien, should be buried in a Franciscan monastery; this was accordingly done at Donegal, for the body was exhumed in a quarter of a year after its interment in the monastery of Easroe, and the friars buried it with themselves with due honours and solemnity. (This curious controversy was carried on between the Cistercians of the abbey of Easroc at Ballyshannon and the Franciscans of the monastery of Donegal).

them in front, and the English, being thus hemmed in on both sides, were cut to pieces, the carnage being so great, that out of their entire force only one soldier escaped the slaughter, and having fled through a marsh, carried the news to Mullingar. O'Connor displayed amazing valour, and being a warrior of great strength and activity, he hewed down many of their men with his own hand, while the heroic Tyrrell, at the head of his men, repeatedly rushed into the thick of battle. Young Barnwall, being taken prisoner, his life was spared, but he was delivered to O'Neill. A curious circumstance is mentioned by Mac Geoghegan, that, from the heat and excessive action of his sword-arm, the hand of O'Connor became so swelled that it could not be extricated from the guard of his sabre until the handle was cut through with a file.

5. The Governor of Carrickfergus.—In Lodge's Peerage, on the Chichesters, earls of Donegal, it is stated that sir James Mac Donnell had a party of Highland Scots concealed in a cave, about four miles from Carrickfergus, while he marched with another body of them towards that town, and leaving the garrison, the governor, sir John Chichester, made a sally, when Mac Donnell, seeming to fly until he had brought sir John to the place where he had laid his ambuscade, turned on him suddenly, and his party being instantly surrounded by the Scots, joined by those in ambush, they defeated Chichester's forces, and slew great numbers of them. Sir John was taken prisoner, and beheaded on a stone at the head of the Glynn. Mac Donnell many years after, on going one day to view the monument of the Chichesters, in the church of St. Nicholas, at Carrickfergus, and seeing sir John's statue, asked "How the devil he came to get his head again, for he was sure he had once cut it off him?" It may be here observed that the Irish kerns and galloglasses generally decapitated the chiefs they had slain in battle, as they considered no man actually dead until his head was cut off.

O'Conor Don, namely, Hugh, the son of Dermod, son of Carbry, whom O'Donnell had in imprisonment for a long time, was set at liberty from his incarceration by O'Donnell on the 4th of December, after he had paid him his ransom, and he bound himself and others to give sureties to be always submissive to O'Donnell, under guarantees and oaths to God and the clergy, and on these terms he (O'Conor), gave him the following hostages as securities for the fulfilment thereof, namely, his own two sons, the son and heir of O'Beirne, the eldest son of O'Hanley, and the heir of O'Flynn, &c.

A. D. 1598.

The blind abbot, namely, William, the son of David, son of Edmond, son of Ulick Burke, who called himself the Mac William after the death of Mac William who preceded him, as lord, i. e. Richard, the son of Oliver, son of John, did not enjoy that title of lord happily, for he was expelled from his patrimony by sir Richard Bingham, so that he was a fugitive from one country to another until he died in Clan Cuilein (in Clare), in the month of September, and was interred at Quinn, in the burial place of Siol-Aodha (Quinn abbey, in the barony of Bunratty, county of Clare, the burial place of the Siol Aodha, or Mac Namaras of Clare). The Mac William who then governed was Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotach, son of John, son of Oliver, whom O'Donnell nominated Mac William, as we have before written.

O'Kane (of Derry), namely, Roderick, the son of Manus, son of Donogh, son of John, son of Aivne, died on the 14th day of the month of April, and his son, Donal Ballach, was appointed his successor.

Rickard, the son of John, son of Thomas, son of Rickard Oge Burke of Doire-Mic-Lachtina (in the barony of Clare, county of Galway), died in the month of August.

Judith Cam, the daughter of the earl of Desmond, i. e. of James, son of John, son of Thomas of Drogheda, died, in the winter of this year, having spent many years in widowhood, after the extinction of her own relatives, and of the good and worthy men to whom she had been married in succession.

Mac Donogh of Tirerrill (in Sligo), namely, Maurice Caoch, the son of Teige of Triubhas, was slain in Brefney O'Rourke (Leitrim), while carrying off some prey, and Conor Oge, the son of Malachy of Baile-an-Duin (Ballindoon near Ballinacfad, in the barony of Tirerrill), was appointed the Mac Donogh.

Ogan, the son of John Mac Ogan of Ard Croine, died in the spring of this year.

Murtogh Cam, the son of Conor, son of Mahon, son of Thomas (Mac Mahon), of Knock-an-Lacha, in the eastern Triocho-Ced of Corco-Baiscind (barony of Clonderlaw, the western Triocho-Ced being the barony of Moyarta county of Clare), died in the month of March.

Boctius, the son of Hugh, son of Boetius, son of Murtogh Mac Clancy of Knock-Fionn, in the county of Clare, died, in the month of April; he was a man of oratorical fluency in Latin, Irish and English.

Dermod, the son of Edmond, son of Roderick O'Dea of Tully O'Dea (in Clare), was slain by the insurgents of the county of Clare, in the month of July.

The earl of Thomond went to England in the beginning of the month of January, with the terms and writings of the Irish in general; and Rickard, the son of Ulick, son of Rickard Saxanach, son of Ulick of the Heads, baron of Dunkellin, also went to England, precisely in spring.

After the peace we have before mentioned was made, from Christmas to May, between the Irish of Leath Cuinn and the general, the earl of Ormond, the Irish of the North requested all those who were in insurrection in Leinster, and Meath, namely, the O'Cavenaghs, O'Conors, O'Moores, the tribe of Rannall (O'Byrnes of Wicklow), the O'Tooles, Tyrrells, and Nugents, to desist henceforth from their plundering and insurrection, and they accordingly obeyed the instructions of their chieftains. General, the earl of Ormond, permitted them to frequent Leinster, Meath, and Ormond, and to take their meat and drink until they received instructions from England at May, for either peace or war. They were, accordingly, through that cessation, frequenting and inhabiting every country about them, from Kill-Mantain (Wicklow), in the lower part of Leinster, to the river Suir, and from Loch-Garman (Wexford), to the Shannon; it was not easy for those countries to bear the oppression they suffered for that time.

James, i. e. the brother of the earl of Ormond, the son of Edward, son of James, son of Pierce Roe Butler, and the son of Mae Pierce, sheriff of the county of Tioprat-Arann (Tipperary), together with many gentlemen, proceeded precisely at Easter, to make an attack on Bryan Riavach O'Moore, a gentleman of the Irish party, who was spending the Easter in Ikerrin (in Tipperary), but misfortune and injury befell the attackers, for a great number of their gentlemen, common people and soldiers, were slain, and James, the son of Edmond Butler, was taken prisoner, but Bryan Riavaeh delivered him to the earl of Ormond in a week after, on account of the peace we have mentioned, and it having been certified, that it was not by the permission of the general, i. e. of the earl of Ormond, that attack had been made.

O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan, son of Bryan Ballach, son of Owen, was angry with O'Donnell, namely, Hugh Roe, the son of Hugh, son of Manus, on account of his having, contrary to his wish, plundered O'Conor Roe, as we have before written; and moreover, he was not in peace with his own brother, namely, Teige O'Rourke, the son of Bryan, son of Bryan Ballach, respecting the partition of the territory and lands between them, so that it was, therefore, O'Rourke ratified his peace and friendship with the governor sir Conyers Clifford. O'Donnell was not happy on receiving that intelligence, for the O'Rourkes had been always friends to his family, and he himself was a kinsman of his, and he did not wish to make an attack on him or plunder his territory, as he would on all others in Connaught, and he was of opinion, that he must plunder it, unless he would join the Irish again in alliance, for he was not in peace with any one who was secretly in alliance with the English; for some time he privately entreated him to come back, and at another time he menaced and threatened to plunder his country, unless he should return. O'Rourke was receiving those messages from the beginning of Spring, to the following May, at which period he went to Athlone, gave his hostages to the governor, and they pledged their vows and promises to be faithful to each other, but though friendly that engagement had been, it was not long maintained.

An answer to the writings of O'Neill, O'Donnell, and the Irish who were in alliance with them came from England, but the queen and the council did not consent to grant the conditions they demanded, and when they did not agree to them the Irish exchanged their amnesty for war, their submission for strife, and their peace for opposition, so that they revived the slumbering embers of their old wrongs, in the beginning of the summer of this year.

After the governor and O'Rourke had parted in peace and friendship, at the town of Athlone, in May, and when O'Rourke saw that the English and Irish were not in peace with each other, and that the English were not more powerful than the Irish on that occasion, he therefore dreaded that his country might be plundered by O'Donnell, so that he resolved to attend at his call, and on this resolution he acted by the advice of his people, for they preferred the governor to be opposed to them rather than be threatened by O'Donnell's vengeance, should they remain in alliance with the governor. After O'Rourke had confirmed his friendship with O'Donnell on that occasion, O'Rourke marched with his forces into Meath, at the instigation of O'Ferrall Baun, namely, Rossa, the son of William, son of Donal, and they plundered Mullingar, and from Mullingar to Baile-Mor of Loch-Seimhidhe, (Ballymore of Lough Seudy, in Westmeath). O'Rourke marched with another force in the first month of harvest, and did not halt until he arrived at Bealach-an Tirialaigh (Tyrrell's Pass in Westmeath), and at Bealach-Chille-Brighde in Fartullaeh (Pass of Kilbride, in the barony of Fartullagh, Westmeath), he took preys, and slew some people at Tyrrell's Pass, and he returned back to his country without receiving a wound or experiencing danger.

After the peace before mentioned had been terminated, Redmond Burke, the son of John-na-Seamar, son of Riekard Saxanaeh, son of Ulick of the Heads, with a number of his young kinsmen, and a hundred men came to O'Neill (earl of Tyrone), to complain to him, that the answer he received from his father's brother, namely, the earl of Clanriekard, i. e. Ulick Burke, was, that if Redmond were willing to accept the breadth of a cloak of the inheritance or patrimony, from Shrule, to Abhainn-da-Loilghech (the river of the two mileh cows), on the conditions of peace or war, he would not grant it to him. O'Neill entertained that complaint of Redmond, and promised to relieve him if in his power; and having given him the command of some hundreds of soldiers, he gave him permission to plunder and completely devastate every part of Ireland, that abetted or aided the English; after Redmond Burke and his kinsmen parted with O'Neill, they went in alliance with the Irish of Leinster, and remained with them during that summer.

Six hundred soldiers arrived from England, in the south of Ireland, to aid against the enemies of the sovereign; when they arrived at Dun-Garbhain (Dungarvan, in Waterford), the resolution they came to was to join the general, namely, the earl of Ormond, and on their march along the borders of Leinster they were encountered by a party of the Irish of that country, and a battle ensued between them, in which four hundred and ten (410), of them (the English), were slain.¹

The earl of Ormond mustered his forces to march into Leix, in the month of June; his forces numbered twenty-four companies of foot, and two hundred horse, and the earl halted in the evening on a high hill on the borders of the country; the earl having been informed that night that there were only a few to defend the country, he commanded his brother's son, namely, James, the son of Edward, son of James Butler, to march on the following morning, with six or seven companies, across the borders, into the nearest part of the country, in the hope of performing some exploit or achievement; and although James was unwilling to go on that expedition, early in the morning of Sunday, he nevertheless proceeded at the command of the earl. The first pass they came to they found it cut and completely torn up, at which Bryan Riavach O'Moore, with a hundred and a half of soldiers (150), were planted, who had come to defend it on the same day; fearful and terrific was the sight that Bryan and his force displayed to James and his soldiers, and having attacked them in front and rear, he began to circumvent and surround them, spearing and shooting them, so that in a short time bodies were hacked and pierced by him throughout the pass. A very lamentable death took place there, namely, James, the son of Edward, son of James, son of Pierce, a man on whom the people relied most of any of his age living of the Butlers at that time; and such of his people as were not cut down in that place fled back in dismay and discomfiture to the earl and to the camp. Bryan Riavach O'Moore himself was wounded, and it was not long after till he died from the effects of the wounds he had received on that occasion. It was on that very day, after the forementioned conflict, that Anthony, the son of Rory Oge O'Moore, Redmond, the son of Shanena-Seamar (Burke), and captain Tyrrell, came and encamped opposite the earl's camp; when it was expected that the earl would march into the country, what he did was to return back to Kilkenny before noon on the following Monday, and he sent his soldiers into their garrisons.

Port-Nua (Portmore, now Blackwatertown, on the river Blackwater, in Armagh), of which we have before written an account, was guarded, during the peace and war, by the queen's people. When the English and Irish did not continue the peace between them in the beginning of summer, O'Neill laid siege to the fortress, until the guards became scarce of provisions, in the last month of summer; intelligence of that having reached Dublin, the resolution the council came to was, to collect the most faithful, and those who distinguished themselves most in the war of the queen's soldiers in Ireland, in the neighbourhood of Dublin and of Athlone, and when they had come together they selected from among them four thousand foot soldiers, and six hundred horse, and they sent those with provisions to Portnua; a full supply of provisions, of drink, of beeves, of lead (balls), of powder, and of every kind of stores in general, was sent with them. They then marched to Drogheda, from thence to Dundalk, to Newry, and to Armagh; they remained at Armagh that night, and sir Henry Baging (Bagnall), marshal of Newry, was their general. When O'Neill learned that that immense great army was marching towards him, he sent his

A. D. 1598.

1. Battles in Leinster.—Mac Geoghegan mentions that, in 1598, sir Samuel Bagnall was dispatched from England, with 2000 foot and 100 horse, and these forces having landed at Wexford, were attacked in their march by the Irish, who slew great numbers of them. The battle above-mentioned in the Annals, in which 410 of the English forces were slain on their march from Dungarvan to join the earl of Ormond, took place about the same time, in the summer of 1598, and appears to have been fought about the borders of Waterford and Kilkenny, as the English forces marched towards Leinster.

messengers for O'Donnell, entreating him to come to his aid against this excessive foreign force, which was coming to his country. O'Donnell immediately proceeded with the entire muster of his warriors, both horse and foot, along with a great force from the province of Connaught, to aid his relative against the oppressors who were marching on him; the Irish of the entire province of Ulster joined the same army, so that they were all prepared to meet the English before they arrived at Armagh. They constructed a deep earthen trench against the English, on the common way by which they expected them to march towards them. As to the English, after they remained a night in Armagh, they rose early on the following day, and the resolution they came to was to leave their provisions, drink, women, young persons, horses, baggage, attendants, and common people, in that town of Armagh; they ordered every person fit for service, of both horse and foot, to march against their enemies, wherever the marshal and the officers of the army in general commanded them to go; they then formed into rank and order, as perfectly as they could, and proceeded in the most direct road before them, in large solid bodies, and in close compact companies, until they arrived at the hill over Beul-an-Atha-Buidhe. Having reached that place, they beheld O'Neill and O'Donnell, the Iveachians of Ulidia (Magennises of Iveagh, in the county of Down, &c.), and Oirgiellians (Mac Mahons of Monaghan, Maguires of Fermanagh, &c.), together with the chieftains, leaders, valiant warriors, and champions of the North, in one dense mass before them, planted and arranged in the particular passes by which they expected they would march on them. When the commanders of the North observed the very great danger which threatened them, they began to incite and exhort their people to fight valiantly, and they told them, that unless they were victors on that day, no property would remain to them after it, and that they themselves would be slaughtered and destroyed without reserve, while others of them would be cast into prisons, and bound in chains, as the Irish had often been on former occasions, and that such as might escape from that battle, would be dispossessed and banished into strange distant countries; they told them, moreover, that it was easier for them to defend their patrimonies against that strange foreign people, than to take possession of the property of any other person by force, after being expelled from their own dear country. That inciting harangue, delivered by the chiefs, made the desired impression, and their men and the soldiers declared that they were ready to suffer death, rather than allow their fear to prevent them from encountering the enemy. As to the marshal and his English, when they saw the Irish before them, they displayed not the slightest symptom of fear, but advanced boldly straight forward, until they rushed across the first broad deep trench which lay before them, and some of them were slain in crossing it. The Irish forces then made a charge on them, very vehemently, with great fierceness, and they raised a shout in their front and rear, and on all sides of them; their van was obliged to bear the shock, remain to be cut down, and submit to be shot, until their close ranks were thinned, their officers reduced, and their warriors subdued; but in short the general was slain, namely, the marshal of Newry; and as it is not usual for those who lose their commander, and their chief leader and counsellor, to maintain the battle field, the general's men were ultimately repulsed, by force of arms and fighting, across the earthen pits, and the broad deep ditch over which they had come, and the pursuers bravely and actively continued fighting, discomfiting, routing, and cutting them to pieces. It was then that God willed, and the Trinity permitted, that one of the queen's soldiers, who had consumed all the powder about him by his vast firing, should go to the next barrel of powder to fill his measure, and pouch, and a spark having dropped from his match into the powder in the barrel, it exploded up on high into the air, together with every barrel nearest in succession, and also the great gun which they had there; a great number of the people who were about that powder were blown up in like manner, and the rising ground all around them appeared in one dense, dark, gloomy mass of clouds, for a considerable part of the day after that. Such of the queen's forces as escaped from being slaughtered, destroyed, burned and annihilated, fled back to Armagh, and were unrelentingly pursued, during which they were reduced, surrounded, slain, and cut down in twos, in threes, in twenties, and thirties, until they passed within the walls of Armagh. The Irish besieged the town in all directions around it, and they were firing, and shooting at each other, for three days and three nights, until the English at length ceased: and at the end of that time they sent messengers to the Irish, to inform them that they would evacuate the fort (of Portmore, at Blackwatertown), if the guards who were in it should be permitted to come to them, to that town of Armagh, without being slain or injured, and that after they came there, if protection and quarter should be given them, and that they were escorted in safety from the country until they arrived in a secure territory, they would even evacuate Armagh itself. When these messages were delivered to the Irish, the chiefs held a council to determine how they should act respecting that proposal; some maintained that the English should not be suffered to escape from the dilemma in which they were placed, until they were either slain, or perished by starvation; but, however, they at length decided on permitting them to depart from those places in which they were, on condition that they should not take with them provisions, drink, armour, arms, ordnance, powder, or lead, from the fort, except that the captain in it might take his trunk and arms. They consented on both sides to abide by these terms, and they sent a number of their officers from either side to hold a conference with the guards at the fort, and having communicated with those, they delivered the place to O'Neill, as they were commanded. The captain and the guard came to Armagh, to join such of those of their people as survived, and an escort was sent with them from Armagh to Newry, and from Newry until they entered the English Pale. After these had left Tir-Eogain, O'Neill directed particular persons to count the officers and common soldiers slain on the field of battle, and to bury them, and their entire number, when counted, was two thousand and a half (2,500), along with the general and eighteen captains, with a great number of gentlemen whose names have not been recorded. The queen's people were dispirited and sorrowful, while the Irish were cheerful and rejoiced, from the result of that battle; it was on the 10th day of the month of August that battle of Ath-Buidhe was fought; the chiefs of Ulster returned to their homes, after having committed great slaughter, and gained a complete victory, although they lost many men.²

2. The Battle of the Yellow Ford.—This battle is described in Camden's Britannia, Speed's History of England, Fynes Morrison's History of the War of Elizabeth, Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, Borlase's Reduction of Ireland, O'Sullivan Beare, Mac Geoghegan, Stuart's Armagh, Taaffe, and in O'Connor's Military Memoirs, or History of the Irish Brigades. It was fought on Thursday the 10th of August, 1598, in the county of Armagh, towards the borders of Tyrone, about five miles north-west of the city of Armagh, in the parish of Clonfeacle, near Portmore, now called Blackwatertown, by which led the old road from Armagh to Dungannon; it has been by some writers called the battle of the Black water, being fought near that river, which separates the counties of Tyrone and Armagh; but by the Irish writers the battle-field was named Beal-an-Athabuidhe, signifying the Mouth of the Yellow Ford, from a stream of turbid yellow waters which flowed from the marshy ground near it. The Irish were commanded by Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, and Red Hugh O'Donnell, prince of Tirconnell, together with Hugh Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, and various chiefs of the following families, at the head of their clans, as the O'Neills of Tyrone, and of the Fews in Armagh, and of Clannaboy, in Down and Antrim; the Magennis and Mac Cartans of Down; the O'Hanlons of Armagh; the O'Hagans, O'Quinns, and O'Donnells of Tyrone; the O'Kanes of Derry; the Mac Donnells of Antrim; the O'Donnells, O'Doghertys, Mac Sweeneys, O'Boyles, and O'Gallaghers of Donegal; the Maguires of Fermanagh; the Mac Mahons of Monaghan; the O'Reillys of Cavan; captain Richard Tyrrell of Fartullagh, in Westmeath, who commanded 200 Ulstermen, and Theobald Mac William Burke of Mayo, at the head of the Connaught forces; and Teige O'Rourke, with some troops from Brefney. Torlegh O'Hanlon, chief of Orior in Armagh, attended as standard-bearer of Ulster. O'Neill's forces were composed of Kerns, Galloglasses, and cavalry, with some musqueteers, but he had no artillery. The Kerns, or light foot, were armed with long spears or pikes, bows and arrows, darts, skians, &c., and the galloglasses, or heavy infantry, who were the grenadiers of the Irish, were chiefly armed with swords and battle-axes, but few, except the chiefs, wore armour. The combined forces of the Irish amounted to 4,500 foot and 600 horse. The English army, under the command of Marshal sir Henry Bagnall, amounted to nearly the same number, namely, 4,500 foot and 500 horse, so there were 10,000 select men engaged on both sides in this battle. Bagnall was a commander of great valour and experience for many years in Ireland, and was assisted by several brave and able officers, as Cosby, Wingfield, Billing, Brooke, Montague, Fleming, &c. In the English army there was a great body of Irish auxiliaries, under Fitzpatrick of Ossory, who is said to have carried the standard, O'Reilly, and others, and during the entire war great numbers of the Irish chiefs joined the standard of Elizabeth, as O'Brien, earl of Thomond, and O'Brien baron of Inchiquin, Niall Garv O'Donnell, Conor Roe Maguire, &c., hence those and others are often mentioned at this time as the queen's O'Brien, the queen's O'Donnell, the queen's O'Reilly, the queen's Maguire, the queen's O'Hanlon, the queen's O'Molloy, and so on, as there were other chiefs of the same names who fought under O'Neill and O'Donnell, on the side of the Irish. The O'Reilly, who joined Elizabeth, as before mentioned, was Maolmora, or Miles O'Reilly, the son of sir John O'Reilly of Cavan, who was a young man of great valour and ambition, and, from his bravery and fine person, was called by the Irish Maolmora Breagh, that is Miles the Brave or Handsome; having gone to London, he made terms with the queen, and got from her, according to Mac Geoghegan and others, a grant by Letters Patent of the county of Cavan; he commanded a troop of cavalry in her service, and was called the queen's O'Reilly, to distinguish him from the other chiefs of the O'Reillys who fought on the side of the Irish; for it is stated by Fynes Morrison, in his Catalogue of the Irish forces, that the O'Reillys of Brefney brought to the standard of O'Neill 800 foot and 100 horse. O'Neill, with the main body of his forces, was encamped about a mile from Port-

Ballymote (in Sligo), which had been in the possession of the queen's people for thirteen years 'till this time, was taken by its own original inhe-more, or Blackwatertown, on the way towards Armagh, at a place where the plain was narrowed to a pass or causeway, secured on one side by a marsh, and on the other by a moor or bog, and a wood. Across this strait O'Neill had thrown up a strong earthen rampart, four feet high, and sunk in front a fosse or deep ditch. By a stratagem similar to that devised by Bruce at Bannockburn, O'Neill had deep pitfalls and trenches cut in the plain, in front of his position, and carefully covered over with wattles, green sods, and grass, and he posted 500 active Kerns, concealed in the woods and thickets, along the pass. These matters were arranged the day before the battle, O'Neill having received intelligence that Bagnall had advanced as far as Armagh. Stuart, O'Connor, and others, mention a curious incident, that O'Neill's Bard, O'Clery, assured him, on the faith of an old prophecy made by St Ultan, who was a bishop of Ardbraccan in the 7th century, that a great battle would be fought with foreigners at a Yellow Ford near the river Blackwater, in which the Irish would be victorious. This information being communicated to the forces, gave them great confidence, and their enthusiasm was further excited by an animated harangue addressed to them by O'Neill. Bagnall's army was composed chiefly of veteran British troops who had served in France, and in the Netherlands, against the Spaniards, and the cavalry consisted mostly of Cuirassiers, clad in armour; he had a large force of musqueteers, and several pieces of artillery, while O'Neill had no cannon. Bagnall, at the head of the British troops, joined by the Anglo-Irish forces of the Pale, and the Irish auxiliaries, marched from Newry to Armagh to attack O'Neill, and relieve the garrison of Portmore, which he had besieged. The British forces marched from Armagh before sunrise; the spearmen were divided into three corps, and formed the main body, while the wings consisted of musqueteers and cavalry, followed by the artillery. They advanced boldly, with unfurled banners, while the air, clear and serene, resounded with the clangor of trumpets, and the shrill tones of the "ear piercing fife;" O'Sullivan Beare says "Sereno et grato die, vexillis explicatis, tubarum clangore, tibiarum concentu," &c. Bagnall delivered an address to his army, which is given by O'Connor in his Book on the Irish Brigades: "Relying on your bravery, I selected you as my companions in arms; the undisciplined I left in garrisons, the cowardly with Ormond. From your exertions alone I anticipate victory. I have often witnessed your valour. Will these men, unarmed and undisciplined, dare to encounter troops accoutred, armed, trained as you are, and inured to war? I should be mad if I could suppose they would sustain your shock for a moment. Remember how you drove O'Neill from his camp at Mullaghlinn. On him who this evening brings me the head of O'Neill or O'Donnell, I bestow a thousand pounds. March then, and delay not the moment of victory." O'Neill, early that morning, also delivered an animating address to his men in Irish, the substance of which is given by O'Connor: "My hopes of victory are not placed in the thunder of artillery, but in your valour. Recollect how often you have defeated greater forces, nobler commanders, and even Bagnall himself, when less prepared and less disciplined than you are now; you are to fight for your country, your religion, your wives, your children, and your possessions. Bagnall, the bitterest of your enemies, not content with the plunder of your properties, seeks to exterminate your race. Here he must meet the just retribution for his cruelty; here we must avenge our wrongs, and the death of our companions killed at Portmore. St. Ultan has promised and prophesied our victory." The troops of Bagnall advanced unmolested over a level and open tract of ground, and, about 7 o'clock in the morning, they entered the narrow pass beyond which O'Neill was encamped. Along this pass, screened by trees and thickets, and protected by defiles, O'Neill had posted 500 active kerns, who suddenly from their ambuscade attacked the British troops, some pouring on them volleys of shot, and others rushing on them with their long spears and darts; in this encounter great numbers of the English were slain, but Bagnall, leading the first division, steadily pursued his course, and advanced through the pass, while ritors, in the summer of this year, namely, by the Mac Donoghs of Corran, that is, by Tomaltach and Cathal Duv. The governor (of Connaught), the kerns retired towards the camp of O'Neill. The centre division, under Cosby and Wingfield, with the rear and cavalry led by Montague, Billing, Brooke, Fleming, and O'Reilly, pushed forward into the open ground in front of O'Neill's entrenchments. Some troops of British cavalry dashed onward impetuously into the plain, where O'Neill had dug the trenches and concealed pitfalls, and galloping precipitately into these invisible fosses, many of the men and horses were thrown headlong to the ground, their limbs and necks broken, and their bodies maimed; while the troops were thus in disorder, they were fiercely attacked by the Irish kerns and pikemen, who slew great numbers both of men and horses. Bagnall, undaunted by this discomfiture, pushed forward with his troops into the open plain, and charging at the head of his cuirassiers, a furious conflict took place between them and O'Neill's light infantry, or kerns; the cuirassiers were armed with spears, six cubits, or about 10 feet in length, which rested on the right thigh, and they made powerful charges, where able to assail their opponents hand to hand. The Irish kerns, armed with even longer spears or pikes, about 11 or 12 feet in length, which they grasped in the middle with their bands, the weapons resting on their right shoulders, rushed on the British cavalry, great numbers of whom were slain in these encounters. Bagnall, undismayed, still charged onward at the head of his cavalry, and his infantry, spearmen, and musqueteers, also poured into the plain, while he opened a heavy cannonade on the rampart, in front of O'Neill's lines; having levelled part of the rampart, he succeeded for a time in beating back its defenders, and two strong corps having crossed the entrenchments, hurst forward into the level ground, where O'Neill was encamped. At this juncture the right wing of the Irish commanded by O'Neill in person, and the left, under O'Donnell, advanced to the charge, their standards raised, their Bagpipes playing, and they rushed onward with fearful shouts and fierce battle-cries. O'Neill rode rapidly onward, at the head of his cavalry, to seek out Bagnall, his hated foe, in the thick of battle. Morrison says "Tyrone prieked forward, with rage of envy and settled rancour, against the marshal." The heroic Red Hugh O'Donnell, at the head of his Tírconnallian cavalry, dashed onward into the conflict; the valiant Hugh Maguire led on his Fermanagh horsemen, and the Mac Donnell's of Antrim, and Mac Sweeney's of Donegal, rushed on with their galloglasses into the thick of the fight, and hewed down whole ranks of the British soldiers, cleaving with their keen-edged and heavy battle-axes, even the cuirassiers, through their iron helmets and coats of mail. It was now about noon-day, and the battle had raged for some time with great fury on both sides. Bagnall, being repulsed, rallied his men and, with a powerful body of his reserved troops, advanced again to the charge; but on raising his helmet to take a view of the battle-field, he was shot in the forehead with a musket-ball, and fell lifeless to the ground. About this time, in the very tempest of the fight, some barrels of gunpowder were accidentally ignited in the English ranks by an unskilful gunner, and a terrific explosion took place, which blew many of the British soldiers in atoms into the air. The English forces, dismayed by this disaster, and the death of Bagnall, seemed to give way, and at this critical moment O'Neill, making a tremendous charge at the head of his cavalry and galloglasses, the English troops, and their Irish auxiliaries under Montague, Wingfield, Cosby, Brooke and Fleming, reeled before their impetuous charge, and were put to flight. O'Reilly, at the head of his troop of cavalry, was the last officer who remained on the field of battle, and was slain while endeavouring to cover the retreat, and rally the flying forces. He had much at stake in contending against his countrymen, and, like many other Irish chiefs, preferred his own private interest to that of his country, but missed the object of his ambition, and, by that day's defeat lost his life, as well as the earldom of Cavan. In the rout, great numbers of the British troops were tumbled headlong into the fosse, and trampled to death by the flying cavalry. The remnant of the British forces, with a few cavalry under the command sir Conyers Clifford, and O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, were bidding against each other for the castle, and proposing to purchase it from the Mac Do-noghs, but the conclusion of the treaty was, that the Mac Donoghs gave the town to O'Donnell, on terms of purchase and contract, in the middle month of Montague, fled towards Armagh, closely pursued by Torlogh O'Hanlon, the standard-bearer, at the head of O'Neill's cavalry. The English took refuge within the walls and churches of Armagh, where it appears, according to the Annals, they stood a siege of three days and nights, and then surrendered, making conditions that the lives of their fellow-soldiers, in the fort of Portmore on the Blackwater, should be spared, and O'Neill permitted the troops in Portmore to depart, with their commander, captain Williams, but they were not allowed to carry with them arms, ammunition, or any other articles, except that the captain was permitted to take away his trunk, and nothing more. Camden, Fynes Morrison, and the other English writers, make the number of the British soldiers slain fifteen hundred, together with marshal Bagnall, and 13 valiant captains; but the Irish writers, with more accurate information, make the numbers slain much more; the English only reckoned the British troops who fell, which they underrated, and did not enumerate the Irish auxiliaries who were killed. According to the Annals of the Four Masters, 2,500 of the queen's soldiers were slain, together with Bagnall, and 18 distinguished commanders and many inferior officers, the bodies being reckoned on the field of battle by order of O'Neill, and all decently interred. O'Sullivan Beare and others also state, that 2,500 of the queen's forces were slain, along with 23 officers of note. Along with the 2,500 who fell on the field of battle, probably not less than 500 more were slain in the pursuit, and conflicts at Armagh. The entire number of the British forces slain in that battle, and in the conflicts on the three subsequent days, must have amounted to at least 3,000 men, besides great numbers must have been wounded and disabled, of whom no account is given, so that it appears probable, that out of the select army of 5,000, under marshal Bagnall, not more than about 1000 effective men survived; and it is evident that O'Neill could have entirely cut off the remnant of the English forces, as they lost all their artillery, arms, &c., but he generously permitted them to depart, and even had them escorted safe to the Pale. The Irish, by this great victory, got into their possession all the baggage-waggons, with an immense quantity of provisions and military stores, all the artillery of the English, their arms, armour, musical instruments, and 34 military standards, together with twelve thousand pieces of gold. The Irish had only 200 men killed, and 600 wounded in this battle. Speed, in his History of England, says of this battle: "Tir-Oen obtained not only a joyous triumph over his private enemy (Bagnall), but withal went away with a glorious victory over the English, who, never since they first set footing in Ireland, received so great an overthrow; and Tir-Oen was renowned all the realm over, as their Horatius, and founder of their freedom." Camden says: "Never since the English gained a footing in Ireland had they sustained such a loss." Fynes Morrison remarks that the Irish obtained a great victory, and says that "the English, from their first arrival in that kingdom, never had received so great an overthrow as this, commonly called the defeat of Blackwater;" and again he says "Tyrone was among the Irish celebrated as the deliverer of his country from thralldom and "the general voice was of Tyrone amongst the English, after the defeat of Blackwater, as of Hannibal amongst the Romans, after the battle of Cannæ." Borlase says "a victory the like the Irish never gained since the English first set foot in Ireland." Cox says "by this victory the Irish got arms, ammunition, and victuals, and which was more, so much reputation that the English could act only on the defensive part, and not that itself, without continual fear and danger." Leland says "the illustrious O'Neill was every where extolled as the deliverer of his country, and the disaffected, in all quarters, condemned their own weak and passive conduct, which had deprived them of the like glory." Lingard says, "The O'Neill was celebrated in every district as the saviour of his country; and the whole of the indigenous population, with many of the chieftains of English origin, rose in arms to assert the national independence."

Copious accounts of Hugh O'Neill, prince and earl of Tyrone, and of Red Hugh O'Donnell, prince of Tirconnell, are given in the course of these Annals. O'Donnell was at this time in the 25th year of his age, and, as before-mentioned, he was many years imprisoned by the English in the castle of Dublin; after his escape this heroic young man defeated the British forces in many battles. Red Hugh was as valiant a chief as appeared in any age; he was of fine figure and tall stature, and was one of the handsomest men of his time; he was called by the Irish Aodh Ruadh, or Red Hugh, from the colour of his hair and florid complexion. After the defeat of the Irish forces and Spaniards at Kinsale, in 1602, O'Donnell went to Spain, with the hope of obtaining fresh forces; he was treated with distinguished honours, and received much sympathy and support in the country of his Milesian ancestors; he was well received by king Philip, the marquis Caracena, and others of the nobility, and was promised large supplies of men and money; but O'Donnell never saw Ireland again, for, in the midst of his active preparations, he was seized with a fever, and died at Simancas, on the 10th of September, 1602, in the 29th year of his age. He was, by order of the king, buried with all honors due to a distinguished prince, in the monastery of St. Francis, in the city of Valladolid. An account of his embassy, and death in Spain, is given at the year 1602, in these Annals. Thus terminated, in a foreign land, the eventful life of the renowned Red Hugh O'Donnell, as true a patriot and as brave a chieftain as ever fought for freedom, or led a clan to battle.

Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, was the son of Ferdorcha, called Matthew, baron of Dungannon, son of Con Bacach O'Neill, earl of Tyrone; he was for many years commander-in-chief of the northern Irish, in the war against Elizabeth; he was a man of great abilities and valour, and at this time was about 55 years old, but in the full vigour of middle age. His personal appearance, character, and abilities are described by Fynes Morrison, and various other writers, and in Stuart's Armagh. He was a man of middle stature, but strongly built, active, athletic, enterprising, and admirably adapted for hazardous exploits; patient, hardy, spirited, bold, temperate, vigilant and valiant, of great perseverance, and capable of enduring the most extreme privations without a murmur; he was of polished, affable, and agreeable manners, of liberal education, of acute intellect, politic, subtle, smooth-tongued, and in his negotiations generally overmatched the English statesmen. He had served some years in the English army, when a young man, acquired a great knowledge of military affairs, and was a favorite at the court of Elizabeth. On his return to Ireland he continued some time in the service of the queen, but having revolted, he became the chief leader of the northern Irish, and with great perseverance disciplined his forces in Tyrone. He had his chief residence at Dungannon, and Fynes Morrison states that he imported large quantities of lead, apparently for the purpose of roofing his castle, but he had it all cast into bullets. Hugh O'Neill has been called the Irish Hannibal, and was (perhaps with the exception of his relative, the renowned Owen Roe O'Neill), the ablest general that ever contended against the English in Ireland. O'Neill carried on the war with great vigour, to the end of the reign of Elizabeth, but became reconciled to the state in the reign of James I.; however, on a fictitious charge of a plot or conspiracy, against the government, he and Rory O'Donnell, earl of Tirconnell, were forced to fly from Ireland, in 1607, and they retired to Rome, where old, blind, and worn down by misfortunes, the heroic Hugh O'Neill, the last representative of the ancient kings of Ulster, died, in the year 1616, and was buried in the church on St. Peter's Hill. Rory or Roderick O'Donnell, earl of Tirconnell, also died in exile at Rome, in 1617, and Hugh O'Neill, baron of Dungannon, son of Hugh the earl, died at Rome in 1641. A monument was erected to these princes, according to de Burgo, in the Franciscan Church of St. Peter, in Monte Aureo, and he gives the Latin inscription on it in the Supplement to his Hibernia Dominicana. Hugh O'Neill was first married to a sister of Red Hugh O'Donnell, and secondly to a sister of the marshal sir Henry Bag-of the harvest of this year; four hundred pounds (£400), and three hundred cows was the price O'Donnell gave the Mac Donoghs for the town.

nall, and it appears from the Annals that he was a third time married, his last countess being the sister of Magennis, lord of Iveagh. He married Bagnall's sister, without his consent, in consequence of which the marshal was ever afterwards his mortal enemy, and a deadly hatred always existed between him and O'Neill, which was only terminated by the death of Bagnall at the Blackwater.

Battle of Benburb.—The localities along the Blackwater, on the borders of Tyrone and Armagh, are amongst the most famous battle-fields in Ireland, and several engagements are mentioned in the Annals which took place near that river in the war of O'Neill against Elizabeth, amongst others the battle of Drumfluch, near Benburb, fought in 1597, and described at p. 616 in the Annals. Benburb is on the Tyrone side of the Blackwater, near Battleford Bridge, and about two miles distant from the battle-field of the Yellow Ford. The battle of Benburb, famous in Irish history, was fought on Friday, the 5th of June, 1646, that is 48 years after that of the Yellow Ford; it is described by various Irish and Anglo-Irish historians, as Borlase, Cox, Carte, Leland, Warner, Mac Geoghagan, and Taaffe; in the Desiderata Curiosa Hibernica, by Richard Belling, and by Colonel Henry Mac Tully O'Neill, an officer who was engaged in all the campaigns of Owen Roe O'Neill; in Stuart's Armagh, and in Italian in the Memoirs of the Nuncio Rinuccini, published in 1844. The commander-in-chief of the Irish Confederates in Ulster, in the war subsequent to the great insurrection of 1641, was the celebrated Owen Roe O'Neill; he was the son of Art, son of Ferdorcha, called Matthew, baron of Dunganon, son of Con Baccach O'Neill, earl of Tyrone; his father, Art O'Neill, was brother of Hugh, the famous earl of Tyrone, though other accounts make Owen Roe the grand-nephew of Hugh the earl. He was called by the Irish Eogan Rnadh, that is Owen Roe, or Red Owen, from the colour of his hair; when a young man, he served some years in Catalonia, in Spain, and was designated by the Spaniards Don Eugenio Rufo. He served many years in the Spanish and Imperial Austrian army, with great reputation, according to Carte and Leland; he held the rank of colonel, and being appointed governor of Arras, was particularly distinguished for his defence of that town, when besieged by the French in 1640. He was a man of graceful person, agreeable and mild manners, but of great strength of mind and determined bravery; cool, cautious, and calculating; quick in taking advantage of favourable accidents and mistakes of his opponents; of consummate skill in the arrangements for battle, seldom risking an engagement except under advantageous circumstances, and of a genius admirably adapted for defensive and protracted warfare, hence he has been designated the Irish Fabius. He was a man of great prudence, reserve, sobriety, and knowledge of the world, of patriotic spirit, honest in purpose, and of the highest honour and humanity in his transactions with the enemy. From his great military reputation and abilities, Owen Roe was invited over from Flanders, in 1641, to take the command of the Irish Confederates in Ulster, and having embarked at Dunkirk, he landed at Doe castle, in Donegal, on the 13th of July, 1642, accompanied by some officers and old soldiers, amounting in all to 100 men, with a supply of arms and ammunition; soon after, in a meeting of the chiefs of Ulster at Kinnard, now Caledon in Tyrone, he was chosen commander-in-chief of the northern Irish, instead of his relative sir Phelim O'Neill, who was rather a rash, violent and intemperate leader. Owen Roe organised his forces with great regularity, kept up strict discipline, and sternly punished the refractory. For a period of seven years, from 1642 to 1649, as commander-in-chief of the confederated Irish of Ulster, and in co-operation with the old Anglo-Irish of the Pale, as the Barnwalls, Prestons, Plunketts, Flemings, Talbots, Dillons, Dareys, Bellews, Netervilles, Fitz-Eustaces, Fitzgeralds, Whites, &c., with some of the Burkes of Connaught, and Butlers of Ormond, Owen Roe defeated the British forces in more than 40 engagements, overran various parts of Ulster and Leinster, and took most of the strong castles and fortified towns of the old English Pale, as those of Trim, Athboy,

The earl of Ormond mustered an immense force to put provisions into Port Leix, and they having proceeded in that direction, they were met on the

Longford, Kells, Swords, Portlester and Athlone; also Naas, Athy, Woodstock, Rheban, Dunamase, and Maryborough, in Kildare and Queen's county, with Birr in the King's county, Nenagh in Tipperary, and other strong places in Leinster and Munster, together with almost all the strong towns and castles in Ulster. The commander of the Irish at Benburb was Owen Roe O'Neill, assisted by various chiefs of Ulster, acting as captains, and colonels, namely, sir Phelim, Torlogh, Bryan, Hugh, Art, Cormac, and Con O'Neill, with their men from Tyrone, Armagh, Down, and Antrim; some of the O'Hanlons of Armagh; sir Constantine or Con, Art, Rory, and Eiv Magennis, and Patrick Mac Cartan of Down; Cormac and Hugh O'Hagan, Patrick Mac Nenev, Patrick O'Donnelly, and Torlogh O'Quinn of Tyrone; Manus O'Kane of Derry; Alexander Mac Donnell of Antrim; Hugh Buighe and Manus O'Donnell, and Miles Mac Sweeney of Donegal, with some of the O'Doghertys of Inisowen; Rory or Roger, Bryan, and Donogh Maguire of Fermanagh; Bryan, Hugh, and Colla Mac Malon, and Niall Mac Kenna of Monaghan; colonel Philip O'Reilly of Ballinacargy castle, in the county of Cavan, and his relative colonel Miles O'Reilly of Kilmore; colonel Philip O'Reilly was brother-in-law of Owen Roe, being married to his sister, Rose O'Neill; he was a commander of note in this war, and gained the brilliant victory at Julianstown Bridge, near Drogheda, in November, 1641, and many battles afterwards. Colonel Miles O'Reilly was a celebrated commander at this time, and, from his great strength and dauntless valour, was commonly called Miles the Slasher. Captains Hugh and Owen O'Reilly also came to Benburb, and the entire forces of the O'Reillys consisted of 500 men, horse and foot, from Cavan, namely the O'Reillys, Mac Bradys, Mac Cabes, Mac Gowans or Smiths, Fitzsimons, Fitzpatrick, Mac Gaurans, Mac Kernans, &c. The men of Leitrim came under Con and Owen O'Rourke, and some from Sligo under Teige and Hugh O'Connor. The men of Longford came under Richard, William, and Francis O'Ferrall, and some men from Meath under Edward Betagh of Moynalty, and James Fleming of Slane, with some of the Barnwalls and Plunketts of Meath and Louth. Most of the above-mentioned chiefs came to Benburb, and such as did not come sent their forces. According to Carte, Leland and others, O'Neill's forces at Benburb were 5,000 foot and 500 horse, while the British troops, under Monroe, amounted to 6,000 foot and 800 horse, who were much better armed and accoutred than the Irish; besides, the British had 7 pieces of artillery, while it is not mentioned that O'Neill had any cannon; the British were far superior to him in musketeers, and it appears O'Neill's forces consisted chiefly of Swordsman and Pikemen. The British troops consisted chiefly of Scots, with some English regiments; those forces were called Parliamentarians, and afterwards Cromwellians; they were mostly republicans in rebellion against Charles I., in England, and they were joined by many Irish allies. There was another great party in Ireland at that time called Royalists, who supported the cause of King Charles, and were commanded by the duke of Ormond, but they were not engaged on either side at Benburb. The Irish of Ulster, under O'Neill, rose to recover their confiscated lands and national independence. The English and Scotch forces at Benburb, and their Irish allies, of the British settlers in Ulster, were commanded by the Scotch general Robert Monroe, and his brother George; Hugh Montgomery, called lord Montgomery of the Ardes, in the county of Down, afterwards earl of Mount Alexander, and his relative, colonel sir James Montgomery; colonel lord Edward Conway, of Kilnlagh, in the county of Antrim, of the family of Seymour Conway, earls of Hertford; sir Henry Blayney, baron Blayney of Monaghan; colonel Cunningham, captains Burke, Hamilton, &c. General Monroe was encamped on the borders of Antrim and Armagh, and having heard that O'Neill had advanced to the borders of Tyrone, he marched forward, and arrived at the city of Armagh, with all his forces, at midnight on Thursday the 4th of June. Monroe had ordered his brother George to proceed with his corps from Cole-way in which they marched by Athony, the son of Rory Oge, son of Roderick Caoch O'Moore, by Redmond, the son of John-na-Seamur, son of Rickard Saxonach (Burke), and by captain Tyrrell, namely, Richard, the son of Thomas Oge Tyrrell;

rairie, with expedition, to meet him at Glasslough in Monaghan, about two or three miles from Benburb where O'Neill was encamped. George Monroe marched from Coleraine along the western shore of Lough Neagh, towards Dungannon, with his force consisting of 500 foot, according to the Desiderata Curiosa, and also a troop of horse, according to other accounts; but O'Neill, aware of this movement, despatched the day before the battle colonels Bryan Mac Mahon and Patrick Mac Nene, with some horse and foot forces against him, who had an encounter with Monroe near Dungannon, in which they defeated his forces, and checked his advance. General Robert Monroe, early on the morning of Friday, the 5th of June, marched at the head of his forces from Armagh towards the river Blackwater, intending to proceed to Glasslough, to meet the troops of his brother George. O'Neill, having advice of their march, drew out all his horse, says Carte, to the top of the hill at Benburb, where the battle was afterwards fought, and there took a full view of Monroe's forces, as they passed along the road on the other side of the Blackwater. The British, finding a ford on the river at Kinnard, now called Caledon, crossed over, and advanced towards the Irish camp. As they came forward, they were met by colonel Richard O'Ferrall, who was posted with some troops on the strait or defile about two miles from the camp, to oppose their progress, but colonel Cunningham, with the cannon and 500 musketeers, having opened a fire on them, compelled O'Ferrall and his men, after a short rencontre, to retreat towards the camp. O'Neill was encamped in a strong position between two hills, his rear secured by a wood, his left by a bog, and his right by the river Blackwater; in his front were hillocks, rough ground, bushes, and brushwood. Carte and Stuart state that the wary O'Neill amused his enemy for four hours with little skirmishes, and firing at a distance, until he had got the sun on his back, which before had been favourable to his opponents, and as it began to descend in the rear of the Irish, it shed a dazzling glare on their enemies. Monroe stood still all that time, in order of battle, within musket shot of the Irish, says Carte. About 4 o'clock in the evening, the forces under Mac Mahon and Mac Nene, who had gone against George Monroe, were perceived at a short distance, advancing towards both armies, and Monroe, on seeing them, was rejoiced, thinking they were the troops of his brother George, but he soon found, to his consternation, that they joined O'Neill, and he appeared to waver, and prepare for a retreat. O'Neill, with the promptitude of an experienced commander, seized the auspicious moment for attack, and, according to the Desiderata Curiosa, he addressed a short harangue to his forces, exhorting them to fight for their religion, their country, and their king; his friend, colonel Philip O'Reilly, stood by his side at the time on the hill. O'Neill, keeping Rory Maguire's regiment in reserve, ordered his men to advance, and they came forward rapidly from the hill; Carte says that O'Neill ordered his men not to fire a piece until they were within pike's length of the enemy, and then to fall on with sword and pike in hand, which would give the victory to the strongest men. The Irish rushed onward with great impetuosity, and hewed to pieces, and piked the British infantry on all sides, and having broken their ranks, they threw them into disorder, and pursued them with dreadful carnage; O'Neill's horse, after a short resistance, routed their cavalry, in all directions with immense slaughter. Belling and O'Neill state, in the Desiderata Curiosa, that the battle continued two hours, and that Monroe's forces were routed about two hours before night. Lord Blaney's English regiment made a determined defence, but they were cut to pieces, and he was himself slain. Monroe fled without his coat, hat, or wig, and saved his life only by the fleetness of his horse; he never halted till he arrived at Lisnagarvey, now called Lisburn, about ten miles from the field of battle. Colonel James Montgomery's regiment retreated with some regularity, but the rest of the British troops fled in total disorder.

the earl of Ormond lost more than the value of the provisions in men, horses, and arms, on that expedition, and it was with difficulty the earl himself escaped after he had been wounded.³

O'Neill, (earl of Tyrone), sent despatches to

Lord Conway, accompanied by captain Burke, and about 40 horsemen, escaped to Newry, having two horses killed under him in his flight. Great numbers were slaughtered in the pursuit, and it is stated in Stuart that Heber Mac Mahon, bishop of Clogher, who was in O'Neill's camp, addressed the army, and entreated them with great humanity to spare the flying soldiers, and give them quarter. Lord Montgomery, together with 21 officers and 150 soldiers, were made prisoners; and it is stated by Lodge and others, that lord Montgomery was confined for some time in O'Reilly's castle of Cloughoughter, near Cavan. Almost all the accounts agree as to the numbers slain, which they make 3,243, who fell on the field of battle, but great numbers were killed during the pursuit that evening and the following day, and many were drowned in their flight across the Blackwater; and it is stated by colonel O'Neill, in the Desiderata, that 4,000 of the British forces were slain in this battle. O'Neill lost at Benburb only the very small number of seventy men killed, and 200 wounded; on the side of O'Neill the officers killed were colonel Manus O'Donnell, the son of Niall Garv, and the cornet, or standard-bearer of colonel Miles O'Reilly's cavalry; colonels Phelim Mac Tuahall O'Neill and Richard O'Ferrall were wounded. It is stated in the Desiderata, that the day after the battle O'Neill ordered the bodies of lord Blaney and captain Hamilton to be buried with due ceremonies in the church of Benburb. By this great victory the Irish got immense booty, consisting of all the arms and ammunition of the enemy, with their 7 pieces of artillery, a vast quantity of provisions enough to supply the entire army for two months, 1500 draft-horses, all the tents and baggage, and 32 colours.

O'Neill continued to carry on the war till 1649, when Cromwell arrived in Ireland, but while making preparations to meet that fierce invader, he fell sick and died, and after his death the Irish had no commander able to cope with Cromwell. O'Neill is traditionally said to have taken some disease in his limbs, which after some time caused his death, in consequence of having danced in a pair of poisoned boots presented to him by a lady of the Coote family, at a ball in Derry, to which he was invited by the Cromwellian general, sir Charles Coote, in 1649; but it is stated in the Desiderata Curiosa, that he was poisoned by a pair of russet boots presented to him by one of the Plunketts of Louth, who boasted that he did the English a good service in dispatching O'Neill out of the world. O'Neill fell sick at Derry, and it is stated by Matthew O'Connor, in his History of the Irish Catholics, that the poisoned boots produced a defluxion in his knees, and that he was obliged to be carried in a litter. Owen Roe came to Cavan in October, 1649, and spent some time with his relative, colonel Philip O'Reilly of Ballinacargy castle, and was also a short time at another castle of the O'Reillys at Drumholme, near Ballyhays, but he was afterwards removed to Cloughoughter, a strong castle of the O'Reillys, situated in an island in Loughoughter, between Cavan and Killeshandra, as a place of greater safety from the Cromwellians; he died here soon after, on St. Leonard's Day, the 6th of November, 1649, about the 50th year of his age. It is stated by Carte, in his Life of the Duke of Ormond, and in the Desiderata, that he was buried in the abbey of Cavan, though it is traditionally believed that he was interred in the old abbey of Trinity Island, situated in one of the lakes of Loughoughter, and about two miles from Cloughoughter castle, but in either place no memorial marks the grave of the gallant O'Neill. The memory of the renowned Eogan Ruadh was long celebrated by the Irish Bards, and to this day his name is highly revered in the traditions of the people. Owen Roe was married to Rosa, the daughter of O'Dogherty, chief of Inisowen; she died at Brussels in 1660, and was buried in the Irish Franciscan monastery at Louvain, where a monument was erected to her memory, the inscription on which is given in the Supplement to de Burgo's Hibernia Dominicana.

3. Battles in Leix.—On the death of the celebrated chieftain

Leinster in the first month of the harvest of this year, requesting Redmond Burke, Anthony O'Moore, and captain Tyrrell, to leave the guarding of Leinster with their other colleagues in war, and themselves to go to make captures, and to bring into their alliance some of the people of the countries who were opposed to them, by persuasion or by force, and he also commanded them to go into Munster, at the request of the sons of Thomas Roe, the son of James, son of John, son of the earl (of Desmond); after these gentlemen we have mentioned read the despatches, they proceeded with all the force and aid they could muster into Ossory, and all the people of that country came to them spontaneously, except Mac Gillpatrick, namely, Fingin (Florence), the son of Bryan, son of Florence; they afterwards proceeded to the northern end of the Slieve Bloom mountains, in order to get the Irish of Ormond and of Westmeath to join them in alliance, namely, O'Mulloy, and Conal, the son of Cahir; Mac Coghlan, i. e. John Oge, the son of John, son of Art, son of Cormac, and O'Carroll, namely, Calvaeh, the son of William Odhar, son of Ferganaim, son of Maolroona; although these chiefs had been for some time acting in behalf of the sovereign, they were better pleased to receive peace from those leaders who were traversing every country, and having made peace with them, they directed their course into the two Ormonds, and it was not peace or friendship they demanded from them, but to plunder them forthwith, on account of their enmity against the earl of Ormond, and they took five castles of the towns of Ormond; of those was Drnim Aidhneach (the castle of Dromineer, in the barony of Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary), on the banks of the Shannon, which Redmond Burke held in his possession for the purpose of maintaining and supporting the war of Clanrickard by it. They remained for two or three weeks encamped in that country, during which time preys were brought to their camp from the eastern side of the river Suir (in Kilkenny), and from Clanwilliam (in Tipperary), and their Irish neighbours were coming to hold conferences with them, and uniting with them in alliance; of those were O'Dwyer of Kilnamanagh (in Tipperary), namely, Dermot, the son of Anthony, son of Philip; the sons of Mac Brien of Cuanach (barony of Coonagh, in Limerick), namely, the sons of Murtoth, son of Torloagh, son of Murtoth; the O'Ryan, along with Conor-na-Mainghe, the son of William Caoch, son of Dermot O'Maoilriain (O'Mulryan, or O'Ryan), and the Siol Briain Oge of Duithehe Ara (the Mac I-Briens of Arra, in Tipperary). After these Irish had joined in alliance and friendship with the people of O'Neill, and had united all countries through which they passed in league with them, they prepared to march, with the risings out of those countries, into the territory of the Geraldines, at the instigation of the sons of Thomas Roe (Fitzgerald), the son of the earl (of Desmond). In the first instance they proceeded into the county of Limerick; the president (of Munster), sir Thomas Norris, was at that time in Kilmallock, and understanding that he was not prepared to fight against the Irish parties, he went to Cork to avoid them; they then proceeded across the river Mague, westward into

Rory O'Moore, lord of Leix, of whom an account has been given at p. 497, in the notes, his son Anthony was brought up by his friend Fiacha Mac Hugh O'Byrne, chief of Wicklow, and when of age he assumed the title of lord of Leix, and attempted to recover from the English that principality, which had been possessed by his ancestors; and, as recorded in the Annals in the year 1596, at p. 612, he slew Cosby of Stradbally, in the Queen's county, one of the chief English possessors who was located on the lands of his ancestors. This chief is erroneously called by Mac Geoghegan, Cox, and others, O'wney, or Owen Mac Rory O'Moore, his name in Irish being Uaitlne, that is Anthony, and not Owen, which in Irish is Eogan. Mac Geoghegan and others state, that, in 1597, Wmham St. Leger, then governor of Leinster, marched his forces into Leix, or Queen's county, but being encountered by O'Moore, and his allies the O'Byrnes, O'Tooles, O'Cavenaghs, and O'Conors, they had a severe engagement, in which the English forces were defeated, and 500 of them left dead on the field of battle. In 1598, as above recorded in the Annals, many other engagements took place in Leix, between the O'Moores and the English; and Mac Geoghegan mentions that Bryan Riavach O'Moore, another valiant chieftain, at the head of his clans, and 1500 allies sent to his assistance by Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, besieged Portleix, now called Maryborough, in the Queen's county, which was a fortified town, and the English had a strong garrison in the fortress. Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, dispatched three thousand men against O'Moore, commanded by his nephew, James Butler, but they were defeated in various conflicts; and, according to Mac Geoghegan, 1500 of them, together with their commander, were slain; but the valiant Bryan O'Moore died soon after of his wounds, and Anthony O'Moore succeeded as commander. The auxiliaries sent by O'Neill to O'Moore were commanded by Redmond Burke of Gnlway, and captain Richard Tyrrell. Port Leix was taken by the Irish, and, as above mentioned in the Annals, the earl of Ormond's forces were defeated with great slaughter, and he himself was wounded; O'Moore and his allies obtained a great number of horses, with arms, armour, and provisions, on that occasion. A further account of the exploits of Anthony O'Moore is given in the Annals, at the year 1599, in which he gained a great victory over the English, under the earl of Essex, in Leix, at a place called the Pass of Plumes.

the Connelloes (in Limerick), to the borders of Slieve Luachra (Slieve Logher, in the barony of Trughenackmy, county of Kerry), and of Glen Corbraighe (Glyn in Limerick). James, the son of

XIII. Ancient History of Fermanagh.—The following account of the Maguires, and other chiefs and clans of Fermanagh, is now, for the first time, translated from the Irish original, a valuable MS. in the possession of Mr. Geraghty, the publisher of these Annals; and which is considered to have been compiled towards the middle of the 18th century, about A. D. 1740, from the old books of the O'Clerys of Donegal, by James Maguire, a learned writer, a native of Fermanagh. The tract chiefly refers to Fermanagh, with a short account of the Mac Mahons of Monaghan, and contains much interesting information connected with the ancient ecclesiastical history of Fermanagh, and some account of Lough Derg, and of St. Patrick; of the old traditions, manners, and customs of the people, the laws of Tanistry and Brehonism, of the ancient tenures and the rents and tributes of the chiefs of the Maguires, lords of Fermanagh; of the various tribes and clans who possessed the country; of the Termons, or church lands, &c.; and gives a picture of the manners and customs of the people of Fermanagh, at a remote period, namely, in the 14th century, or about 470 years from the present time. Donn More Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, mentioned in this tract, was probably the same chief recorded in the 14th century, at A. D. 1371, in these Annals. An account of Fermanagh, in ancient times, and of the Maguires, Mac Mahons, and other head chiefs of the Orgiellians, or race of Clan Colla, in Ulster, and of their various tribes and clans, has been already given at pp. 2, 78, 417, 602 to 609, in the notes on Orgiall, Fermanagh, and Monaghan. The passages included in parenthesis, in the following translation, are not in the original, but are additions necessary to elucidate the text; the tract commences as follows:

From Manus and Giollaisa, the sons of Don More, son of Rannall Mac Uidhir, the Maguires of Fermanagh have derived the name; he was the son of Searraidh, son of Oirgialla, son of Uidhir, son of Searraidh, son of Oirgialla, son of Uidhir (from this Uidhir they took the tribe name of Mac Uidhir, or Mac Guire), son of Cearnach, son of Lughan, son of Iorgallach; and Nadhaile, who consecrated Cill Nadhaile, was the person who baptised Lughan, the son of Iorgallach, son of Eigniaich, son of Cormac, son of Fergus, son of Aodh, son of Cormac, son of Cairbre-Daimhairgid. (Saint Naal, or Natalis, above mentioned, was a native of Fermanagh, and accounts of him are given by Colgan and Lanigan; he was abbot of Devenish, in the 6th century, and founded the church of Kilnaile, now Kinawley, a parish in the diocese of Kilmore, partly in Cavan and partly in Fermanagh.) It was in the time of that Cormac, that he himself, and his brother Nadhsluagh, divided the territory of Orgiall between them, viz., from Fionnghlais, in which bishop Eogan was in the habit of bathing, contiguous to Cluain-eois (Clones, in Monaghan) to Leac-na-Narm, on the north (now Lack, a town in the north-east of Fermanagh), and from Car-Leadna to the gate of Ath-Seanaigh (Ballyshannon, in Donegal), on the western side of the river Erne. Other and more ancient authorities state that this division comprised from Inis-Saimer to Drobbais (from Ballyshannon to Bundrowis, in Leitrim), westward, and across from Sgeitheog-an Phreuchain (the crow's hush, now probably Skeog, in Fermanagh), to Beul-Atha-na-Meirdreach, westward, and as far as Lios-na-d Torc (signifying the fort of the swine, probably Lisncore, in Fermanagh), at which those two brothers, namely, Cormac and Nadhsluagh, had many feasts, so that it was from the great number of swine slaughtered there this place derived its name; and from that same Lios to Braghaid-na-Caoile (probably Glenkeel, in Fermanagh). If you wish to be informed why it was called Braghaid-na-Caoile, it is as follows: An extraordinary monstrous serpent, called the Caol (Caol signifies long or slender, and might be applied to an animal like a serpent), was in the habit of passing its time in the following manner: it came to Fionnlough every morning, where it remained during the day, till the beginning of night, and then proceeded to Gleann-na-Caoile (Glenkeel, near Lough Erne, on the western side, towards Leitrim), and it is stated that it consumed a great deal of the produce of that locality for a long period, until the religious champion of God, St. Patrick, came to Ireland, and having received intelligence of this monster, he went in the most direct way to Fionnloch, where the serpent was at the time on the island in the lake; and it immediately took to the water, with its devouring mouth opened, and set the lake into a commotion of boisterous waves; after which it gave its body a very strong bend, and rose into the clouds of the air and the shades of the firmament, so that no one knew where it had gone for a long time, until at length they perceived it in the shape of a hideous monster, directing its course towards the lake, and it dashed itself into its deep waters, in the presence of all the beholders, so that the bottom of the lake was raised to its surface; and the monster continued sweeping through the lake, and finally directed its course to the shore, near which it opened its capacious mouth, and cast forth its internal poisonous matter, resembling a shower of hailstones, over the lake, but chiefly in the direction where the saint and his clergy stood, so that the clergy became greatly terrified at the monstrous serpent. St. Patrick, perceiving this, circumscribed the ground with the sign of the cross, about himself and the clergy, and invoked the Almighty God to defend them against the poison of the serpent. The monster having then advanced to the land, with its jaws expanded, intent on devouring the clergy, the saint and his clergy went on their knees, and prayed fervently that the poison of the serpent might pass them for that time; and St. Patrick having cast his crozier at the serpent, which struck and pierced its breast, and through the miracles of God and St. Patrick, the serpent turned its back to them, and proceeded through the lake in their presence, while, at the same time, its blood flowed so profusely that it turned all the water of the lake red, from one side to the other, and it resembled any other blood. After that St. Patrick said that Fionnloch would be called Loch-Dearg, from thenceforth to the day of judgment; and the name of God and of St. Patrick was magnified through that miracle. (Fionnloch signifies the white or fair lake, and was the ancient name of the celebrated Lough Derg, on the borders of Donegal and Fermanagh; but, from this monstrous serpent being killed there, according to the above account, it got the name Lough Derg, which signifies the red lake). Thus had Fermanagh and the country of Monaghan been divided between those two princes presumptive, namely, Cormac, from whom are descended the Siol Uidhir (the tribe of the Maguires), and Nadhsluagh, from whom descended the Mahonians (Mac Mahons of Monaghan), and the other tribes which sprung from them respectively. This division has ever since been continued, down to the time of Manus Maguire, so that it has not been recorded that any prince has been nominated over Orgiall since the time of Manus, but a Maguire ruling over Fermanagh, and a Mac Mahon over Orgiall (i. e. Monaghan), which was a rare circumstance in Ireland at that time; for it was customary to call every man over a territory or district of land, or a chief of a country in Ireland, a prince; and the lawful heirs were elected by upright men among the laity and clergy in every province and in every country of Ireland, and such had been the form of nominating a head chief for ages, till the time in which those two sons of Donn More, the son of Ragnall, whom we have above mentioned, namely, Manus and Giolla Iosa, governed jointly over this country of Fermanagh. From this Gillaisa descended all the princes of Fermanagh, and from Manus sprung the Clan Manus of Seanaidh (Mac Manus of Fermanagh) in every place they dwell. As it is my object to give an account of the heirs, and of the distinct history of those princely chiefs, in regular succession from their ancestors, I shall not touch on the general history of the clans of Colla, or of any of the other large possessions which they had in any other country, which they had gained by conquest in Ireland, in the time of the high kings, but shall merely confine myself to that small portion of it relating to Fermanagh and the county of Monaghan; an enumeration of the terms of the country; of the chiefs of districts, from the time of Nadhsluagh till the present time of the sons of Donn; of the life and death of Manus, son of Donn More; and of the rule and government of Giolla Iosa, during the lifetime and after the death of his brother, namely, the same Manus. The following were the chiefs of dis-

Thomas Roe (Fitzgerald), came to them in the Connelloes on that occasion, and John, the second of the tricts at that time in the country, namely, O'Maolruanaidh, from whom are descended the Clan O'Mulroona, in Uachtar Tire (the upper country); Mac Donnell of Clan Kelly; the Clan Mac Uinninnain of Tir Kennedy and Fearan Oireachta; O'Muldoon of Lurg; O'Flanagan of Tura; Mac Gilfinnen of Muintir Fodocain; and Giolla Coinhde of Bally Mac Giolla Coimhde. The following are the heads of ecclesiastical tennons, namely, the three Gowans of Drom Uilehe; O'Corragain of the chapel of Machaire Milioch; O'Coigle (O'Quigley) of Clan Tibhirinn; Mac I-Maolchuill of Gabhail Sin, and also O'Donagan; Muintir Cairbre and Clan Mac Sgoiloe of Aghalureher; Muintir Olltachain (O'Dunlevy) of Aghavea; O'Luinin, O'Breslin, and Muintir Bhanain (O'Bannans) of Derryvullen; O'Keenan, and O'Corcoran of Cleenish; Muintir Murehadha of Sepel-an-Mhuilín (the chapel of the mill); O'Tully, O'Miothain (O'Meehan), and O'Casey of Devenish; O'Cassidy of Bally O'Cassidy; Clan Mac Antagart of Ballymacsagart; Muintir Conghuile (the O'Connollys) of Ballycounolly; Muintir Treasaidh (the O'Traceys) of Kiltierney; the Magraths of Termon Magrath; Muintir Leanain (Mac Lennons) of Inis Muighe Samh (Inishmesaint); O'Fialan (O'Felans) and Magaraghans of Bohoe; O'Felan of Lough Mac Gilliasar, and Muintir Blathmac of Killassar (parish of Killesher), and of Teampall-an-Aifrin (mass church); Muintir Droma (O'Droms) of Kinawley in the diocese of Kilmore; Muintir Gormain (O'Gormans) of Temple Guirmuin and of Calla-Choil (Callow-hill), and those two chapels belong to the vicarage of Kinawley in Barnos; Muintir Dunachain (O'Donegans) of Damhnach and of Tullagh-na-Gaorthan (Tullykeeran); they do not, however, count it as a church, but it was merely built by the vicar, Mac Murrough, with the consent of Maguire, for the convenience of the Clan Connolly, as they were not sufficiently accommodated at the other parochial churches, and it was consecrated by the bishops to make it a burial place; and also the chapel of Teampall-mhoil-an-ghleanna, which belongs to the parochial church of Clones (in Monaghan); it is not right to omit them, namely Muintir Coisigle (Mac Cosglys), viz., the tennons of Derrybrusk. Such was the number of tennons in Fermanagh, during the time of those sons of Donn More, the son of Raghnall. With respect to those sons, namely, Manus and Gillaisa, we shall state a few of their great exploits, and the manner in which the country was under their rent and tribute during their time and government; as also of their heirs to the present time. Manus, the son of Donn More, while he governed as prince of Fermanagh, collected his regal rents once in every year, and he always commenced collecting them at the lower (northern) part of the county, at Leac-na-nAru, namely, on Rathmore (the great rath) of Miodhluc; he would send, on those occasions, for the chiefs of the country, namely, O'Flanagan of Tura (in the barony of Magherahoy), O'Muldoon of Lurg (barony), and would also send for his brother, i. e. O'Donnell, for they were born of the same mother, who had been the queen of O'Neill, and she was also married to Donn More (Maguire) after the death of O'Donnell. Manus kept a house of general hospitality, on the great Rath of Miodhluc, where he gave numerous feasts and banquets to those chiefs about him during the time he was engaged in collecting that rent there, and made large presents to the laity, clergy, literary men, professors, and to all classes of people, for persons of good authority have stated that there had not been in Ulster, in his time, a lord who had greater wealth and property than he, particularly of cows and cattle, herds, horses and flocks, and of every kind of wealth and property. He usually remained a month at the house of the Rath, receiving his rents from his head chieftains of the lower part of Fermanagh; and at the end of that period, after taking his leave of those nobles, he proceeded to Bun Abhan of Termon, to the residence of Magrath (Termon Magrath, in the parish of Temple Carne, on the borders of Fermanagh and Donegal), where he partook of a great banquet, and was in the habit of remaining a night there. At this place he embarked in one of the boats or vessels of his fleet, and the second place where he took up his quarters, to meet the nobles of Uachtar-an-Tire (the upper or southern part of the county), was at Gabhail Liuin, where sons of Thomas Roe, was along with themselves on those expeditions, leading them to the country. The he kept a house of general hospitality for a month, in like manner. The chiefs of the country waited on him there, namely, Mac Donnell of Clankelly, Mac-UI-Maolruana (O'Mulroona), and all his other chieftains. He was so much esteemed by the people of his country, that there was not in Ulster a prince more beloved or bore a higher reputation with his people, and with every one in general, than he, during his government. His regal residence was Part Dubhain, at Cnoc Níne (Knockninny), where Nine, the son of Adamnan, had resided, from whom that hill got its name (St. Nennidh, abbot of Inismacsaint, in Fermanagh, in the 6th century). He (Manus) continued after that manner for thirty-five years, ruling and governing those seven territories of Fermanagh, as becoming a prince and a lord, without strife or contention among the laity or clergy during that period; but as it is usual in the termination of the government of every chief, he was seized with great uncommon sickness, and a dangerous disease, which was called Galar-na-nAlt (the disease of the joints, i. e. gout or rheumatism), so that he fell into such a debilitated state and consumption, that he was unable to come to table or to go to bed, except by being carried by his own faithful attendants; and he continued in that state for three years, consumed by those virulent diseases. When it was made known through the territories of Fermanagh that his physicians despaired of him, that there was no hope for a restoration of his health, and that there had not been a penny of their lord's rents collected from them for a long time previously, as a frequent borrowing usually ends in a title, they conceived within their deceitful and malicious minds that their lord's sons were feeble, young, and incapable of fighting in defence of their country, and they therefore put on the resolution not to pay rents to any one, until he himself should come to receive them in the usual manner. Upon some of his lordship's sincere friends hearing this, they disclosed it to him, after which he commanded that his retinue troops, or collectors, should be sent to collect the rents throughout the country, who immediately set out, and in the first place proceeded to O'Flanagan, who returned them in answer that he would not pay rent until he should see the lord, to whom he might deliver it at his feast, and that they were not better securities in holding it than himself. When the troops heard this answer of O'Flanagan, they proceeded to seize on the goods, property, cows and cattle, of every description, from all the inhabitants throughout the territory. The O'Flanagans and their clans pursued them across Slieve-da-Con, and overtook the collectors in the Glac-Manchaidh, at a place called Amodhlais-an-Chairn, and both parties attacked each other, and many were slain on each side, among whom was O'Flanagan himself, and many of his people, together with fifteen of the lord's relatives, and many others who are not recorded, and the peasants and common people of Tura drove back the cattle while the fight was carried on. Those who survived the conflict conveyed tidings to the prince of Fermanagh, concerning all that had happened, from the beginning to the end, and all that were slain there; he was also informed of the fifteen of his own relatives who were killed, and Manus Maguire was very much grieved at that. He then sent for his chief counsellors, namely, the ecclesiastics of his country and household, his historians and physicians, and the leading men of the county, such of them as were near him, with whom he sat in consultation and council; after having revealed to them the disobedience of O'Flanagan, the slaying of his people, and all the evils which resulted therefrom, he asked those great nobles, both lay and ecclesiastical, what resolution they should come to concerning that affair? O'Breslin answered and said, "You, my lord, have here assembled the greater portion of the chiefs of your country, such as we consider to be loyal to you, in the absence of the chiefs of the lower part of the country, and it is as likely that O'Muldoon, and the other clans of his tribe, will go in opposition to you, as O'Flanagan has already done; and, therefore, let a private council be held here of these nobles present, both lay and ecclesiastical, and let them consult on the matter, and determine what Eric (fine) should be decided on for the death of your people, for it is disloyalty you have experienced respecting Gamhnach (full-grown heifer or milch cow), the Bo-ionlaogha (cow in calf), were given for sixpence; the Lair-groigheadh (brood-mare), was given for three pence, and the very best hog for a your own lawful rents." (The O'Breslins were chief Brehons to the Maguires). This proposition of O'Breslin was approved of by all, and those nobles sat in private council, and the decision they came to was, that no reparative eric should be given from either party to the other, because there were many slain on both sides, and particularly as O'Flanagan himself had fallen, so that such as were living should live, and let the dead rest; and they requested O'Breslin to deliver this decision, after which they proceeded to the presence of the prince of Fermanagh, to the bedside in which he lay. "Well, noble chiefs," said he, "how have you decided that case?" O'Breslin answered and said: "Whatsoever we might do concerning all that has happened, we cannot forgive the shedding of blood, or the death of those people; but, should it seem pleasing to you, the decision we have come to is, that no eric be demanded for your people, or for the fifteen men who were slain from you, and more especially as the loss to Tura, by the death of O'Flanagan, is a sufficient reparation; we have therefore freed them from you, but to receive your regal rents from them henceforth." "That is not a just judgment you deliver, O'Breslin, for you are inclined to favour O'Flanagan, because you yourself and your ancestors before you are from Fanaid (in Donegal), and I accuse you, on the spot, that you have given a false judgment, for it is certain that every subject should yield obedience to his lord, and pay him his lawful rights, and as he (O'Flanagan) had not yielded submission or obedience to his lord, by not giving me my right, it is therefore just they should give me an eric for the death of my people, as they shall yet do." After that those high nobles were entertained with feasts and banquets, at the regal fortress of Dobhran (Purt Dobhran), for three days and three nights; then, having taken leave of the prince of Fermanagh, they departed for their respective homes. After those nobles had departed, Manus (Maguire, prince of Fermanagh) sent privately for O'Luinnin and O'Cassidy; and, on their arrival, he brought them to his bedside, and he asked them their opinion of the various arguments used by those nobles in behalf of O'Flanagan. "What I infer, my lord," said O'Luinnin, "is that you feel the want of your health, and the incurable disease which affects you; and that this encouraged them to do what they have done, as is evident to yourself and to every other person of understanding, for they have never risen, by day or night, in opposition to you, while you enjoyed your health, nor since you have assumed the rank of your ancestors." "O'Luinnin," said Manus, "and be it known to you, although those chiefs of Fermanagh may think to the contrary, that I have at present an efficient heir, through whom this county shall be governed unto the seventh generation after me; and were I in my health, as I was three years ago, I would make public examples of those that would be manifest to the neighbouring countries; but, since I am not so, glory be to God, I have a successor, a rightful heir, to subdue those chiefs of Fermanagh, and who will not receive O'Breslin's judgment, without getting an eric, and this person is my brother Giollaioisa Maguire; and, O'Luinnin, write thou letters to my brother up to Brefney, and it is after this manner you shall write them, viz., let him come to me without delay to this place, and immediately despatch my own messenger with these letters to inform him of the disobedience of the chiefs of Fermanagh." O'Luinnin and O'Cassidy retired to write these letters as they were directed, and after having written them they returned to their lord, and having read them, he was pleased with the manner in which they had been done, and his hand was obliged to be held while he was signing his name to them, because his hand shook. After that two of his couriers were called to him, and having given them gold and silver for their travelling expenses, they proceeded in the shortest direction through every place after leaving the regal household, partaking of feasts and banquets, and rejoicing in mirth and pleasures in each other's company; and nothing remarkable is recorded of the journey of those messengers until they arrived at the house of O'Reilly in Brefney (co. of Cavan), where Giollaioisa Maguire was then staying, namely, the heir to the principality of Fermanagh, and they delivered to him those letters of his brother; he took the letters and read them, and no sooner had he comprehended their purport, than his countenance became greatly altered, and a redness pervaded all round his eyes and eye-balls, so that the entire of the household of his grandfather trembled and became alarmed at the change which came over him from the tidings which he received. He then called to him his guards and attendants, and commanded them to make ready their horses, and having taken his arms, he quickly huddled them on. After that his grandfather, namely, the prince of Brefney, came to him and asked what were the tidings he received, through which his countenance and whole frame had undergone so great a change. "My beloved father," said he, "that I cannot tell you, and since I cannot, read these letters yourself, and you will learn all the information I am possessed of." The prince of Brefney having then read these letters, said it was a melancholy circumstance to which his own people had reduced the prince of Fermanagh, deprived as he was of the use of his feet, and the power of his hands, "and it is evident that such is his condition, when the chiefs of Fermanagh dared to attempt or evince a disposition to set themselves in opposition to him, for it is certain that in my time there was not a prince in Ulster who would attempt to keep from him his own rights, not even if he were somewhat in the wrong. I do not, however, consider that of any importance, but I am surprised, and it will be greatly wondered at by all persons, and by the lords of Ireland, that any chiefs should be so presumptuous as to set themselves in opposition to their lord, for merely demanding his own rents from them." After that the entire of the regal household, but particularly the messengers, were entertained with banquets, and all were happy and merry; after which Giollaioisa (Maguire), rose up and went on his knees before his grandfather, and asked his blessing, which he heartily gave him; he then proceeded in the most direct way, and nothing is recorded of his journey until he arrived at the regal fortress of his brother, namely, Purt Dubhrain, and all the members of the princely household went to meet and receive him, and kissed him in the most cordial and friendly manner. The messengers went to their lord, and they told him that Giollaioisa had arrived; "bring me," said he, "my garments until I am carried forth amongst the household to receive him;" his faithful military officers surrounded him and carried him amongst his household, and Giollaioisa rose up to meet him, and they cordially and affectionately kissed each other, and then sat together, and viands of the most delicious description and of the best flavoured drinks were supplied, so that all the nobles and common people of that princely fortress, were merry and happy. After that Manus spoke and said, "My brother, your coming is a great source of restoring my faculties and health, and I think, that should more of your kind come to me, it would be the means of completely restoring my health." After this, tables of various colours of the regal fortress were laid out, on which were placed the choicest viands; when it was time for them to go to sleep, Manus ordered that a bed should be prepared for Giollaioisa in his own sleeping chamber, in order that they might hold a consultation with each other, which was accordingly done, and they remained so together till the following morning, when Manus spoke and said—"My brother, Giollaioisa, you have already heard how those chiefs of Fermanagh have rebelled against me, and the evils arising therefrom, viz., the slaying of fifteen of my dearest friends in that commotion, and my rents unpaid for a length of time, and the reason I have sent for you, though independently we are glad to see you, is that you may take revenge for the death of my people, and to get an eric for them, and also that you may bring me my rents despite of those chieftains." "It is certain, brother," said Giollaioisa, "that all things you require shall be done in that affair, I am prepared to do your will." "If so," said Manus, "my advice to you is not to delay on to-morrow morning until you go to Slieve-da-Chon, viz., a mountain which lies on the borders of this territory and of Brefney O'Rourke (Leitrim); and, brother, it is essentially necessary for you to know and be informed of the boundaries of this territory of Fermanagh, all around it in every direction, as I am old and incapable of looking after it to govern it efficiently, and therefore you are more likely to enjoy all the emolupenny, and these bargains were proclaimed and offered at every camp in which they had been.

ments due to me from the country, than myself; and it will be also necessary for you frequently to seek for information of those from whom you may expect to obtain it, and to get acquainted with the ancient venerable names of those places, such as that Slieve-da-Chon, for it was from two hounds belonging to Fionn (Mac Cumh-aill), which were lost on that mountain by some demonism or enchantment it derived the name of Slieve-da-Chon (the Mountain of the Two Hounds); it was formerly called Glean Caoin, until Fionn imposed this name on it, after he had lost his two hounds by the enchantment of the sons of Lir, and therefore be thou guided by the instruction of the wise man who composed this verse, viz.:—

'If thou be inquisitive thou wilt be instructed;
Intelligent in various branches of learning;
The light to a question is to propose it,
The door to knowledge is to enquire after it.'

You should not, therefore, lose sight of, or neglect to be guided by, these precepts, and make no delay now until you go to the residence of my brother at Ballyshannon, namely, the house of O'Donnell, and inform him of the disobedience of O'Flanagan, and not of O'Flanagan alone, but of the other chiefs, as I am informed by my officers who are demanding the rents from them, and tell him likewise of the death of fifteen of my people who were slain by O'Flanagan, for they were known to himself both here and below; he will then send for O'Gallagher, O'Boyle, and the three Mae Sweeneys, and for all the other constables in his pay, and bring thou with thee a sufficient force of them to Glen-da-Chon, where I have seven chiefs. Give a milch cow or heifer to each man before you ask them for a day's service, and also to each constable proportionately until they are satisfied, and let themselves send persons to drive them to Tirconnell. After that, march with those forces, and do not leave a chief or constable in the lower part of Fermanagh, that you will not bring me here hand-cuffed or bound in chains." After that their horses were equipped for Giollaisa and the small force which accompanied him, and Manus said, "May you enjoy those accoutrements, and may it be at a lucky hour and time you have put them on;" and he then commanded the cavalry to carry with them the choicest liquors for the journey, and when they were ready and prepared, they took their leave and proceeded on their march, of which nothing is recorded until they arrived at Ballyshannon. When O'Donnell heard that Giollaisa Maguire with his cavalry had arrived on the lawn outside, he went out to meet and receive them, and having kissed Giollaisa in a most affectionate manner, he brought him in with him to his hall, and the sweetest meats and the best flavoured liquors were served to them, and they so spent their time till the usual hour for dinner, which was then served in, which they took in cheerfulness and friendship together, and continued to enjoy themselves till sleeping time. O'Donnell himself went then with Giollaisa Maguire to his bedchamber, and they were followed thither by the servants with sweet and delicious mead. Giollaisa then spoke to O'Donnell, and told him of the disloyalty of the chiefs of Fermanagh towards his brother, and how fifteen of his people were slain by O'Flanagan. O'Donnell asked, "Who are those of my brother's household who have been slain?" Giollaisa told him all their names. "By the Cathach under which the people of Tirconnell conquer," said O'Donnell, "that opposition to my brother, and the slaying of his people by the chiefs of Fermanagh, will not go unpunished with them; many a day and night I have spent amongst that household, and with those fifteen of them who have been slain, and I am certain, there is not a lord in Ulster but each of them individually would have been to him a full worthy champion, and leader in battle, for I have been acquainted with them from my infancy." Then Giollaisa communicated to O'Donnell every message which his brother had sent to him, who answered and said, that he himself, and all those who would join him, should go to take revenge on those chiefs of Fermanagh, for the evil deeds they had committed in the opposition they had given to their lord, and after O'Donnell had delivered these sayings, he sent messen-

When the earl of Ormond received intelligence of the military progress of those warlike parties, he gers to O'Boyle, O'Gallagher, and the three Mae Sweeneys, requesting their attendance at Ballyshannon with all their forces; those forces without delay marched to Ballyshannon, and having all assembled there, their number amounted to seven hundred men armed in armour, and prepared for battle. "O'Donnell," said Giollaisa, "I will now command these brave forces, and it is meet to confer on them some mark of commendation, as their services are at present required," after which he himself and O'Donnell went a second time to review them, and Giollaisa, in the midst of those forces said in a loud, distinct and clear-toned voice, "Come with me now, my brave men, in a lucky hour and period, but I shall not, at the same time, ask one day or night of your service, until I give you before hand the value of your services, previous to your going to perform them." After that O'Donnell said, "March my brave forces on those pledges of the son of the prince of Fermanagh, with my blessings, and let it known to you, that my instructions to you are, to obey every command which Giollaisa Maguire shall deliver you, until you return again, in a similar manner as you would concerning me were I in the predicament of being expelled from Tirconnell." Then the constables or leaders of those forces said—"Beloved son of Don Maguire, be not afraid or in dread that we shall not be truly faithful to thee, for we shall give you an oath that we will be as faithful to thee as we should have been to O'Donnell, while we are engaged with you in this expedition." After that they proceeded with one accord and unanimity in a lucky hour and period to Leic-nan-nam, and did not halt until they arrived at Slieve-da-Chon, where Manus's flocks and cattle were in the care of his own herds, and Giollaisa ordered them to collect those cattle together, which was accordingly done, and Giollaisa then gave a cow to each of the seven hundred forces which were along with him, and those leading chiefs sent drivers with them to their own estates in Tirconnell, after which he himself (Giollaisa), and those forces marched forward through Tura, so that there was no head of a house in that territory but was sent bound in chains to Purt-Dohlrán; and he told the party which accompanied them thither to tell his brother to exact from those whatever Eric would seem proper to himself, as Eric's for the death of his people, and the rebellious opposition they had given him, "And tell him," said he, "that I am gone to the territory of Lurg, where his other rebellious opponents are." The prisoners of Tura were then sent off in the custody of the guards, and he himself and his forces marched along until they arrived in Tuath-Luirg (now the barony of Lurg), and they encamped for that night at the top of Glen-Dorchá (the Dark Vale), in the land called Srath-na-d-Tarbh-anradh (the Marsh of the Contending Bulls), from the fight of two bulls which were in Ulster, namely, the Donn Cuailgne and the Finnhneanach; the Donn Cuailgne was so called from being of a dun or brown colour, and from being calved in Cuailgne (a large district in Louth and Armagh); the Finnhneanach had horns whiter than the snow of one night's fall, and was called the Finnhneanach (or White-horned) of Moy Ith, and from these circumstances they were called those two names, namely, the Finnhneanach and the Donn Cuailgne; and it is read in the historical composition entitled Tain-Bo-Cuailgne (or the Cattle prey of Cuailgne), that it was from the conflict of those two bulls in Srath-na-d-Tarbh, it derived the name of Srath-na-d-Tarbh, and every other name in Ireland which has been so derived, is universally called Tarbh. The cause why Glen Dorchá is so called, is, that on a certain day Fionn, accompanied by many others of the Fenians, went to hunt in it, the glen became so dark they could not perceive the nearest hill or valley to them during their stay in it, and it was on this occasion Fionn composed the prophetic poem, of which the following is the first verse:—

"Gleann-Dorchá, though dark and gloomy,
It's hills are more pleasant than those of other tribes;
A glen of oak forests frequented by black birds,
It's inhabitants learned, of good figure, and fair."

This, however, is no place to give that poem, and we will not here dwell on it, but shall treat of the heir to the principality of Fermanagh and his forces. After having remained on the foremen-proceeded with his horse and foot forces in pursuit of them to the county of Limerick, and he sent word to Cork, requesting the president to come to meet him at Kilmallock. When the Irish forces who tioned Srath-na-dTarbh, they sent forth parties in every direction from the forces, who brought back flocks and every description of cattle from the woods and plains of Fermanagh, and from the glens of Fir-Luirc to the camp; having slaughtered many of these, they constructed tents and huts, in which they spent that night in cheerfulness and friendship. On the morrow O'Muldoon, Magrath, and the chiefs of the country in general, came to them, bringing with them a variety of all kinds of food and liquors that were then generally used in that country; all those chiefs individually welcomed Giollaisa Maguire, and served himself and those chiefs of Tircconnell with mead and ale, after which they were seated round the beir to the principality of Fermanagh, and were supplied with delicious palatable meats, and well-flavoured exhilarating potations. Then Giollaisa enquired of O'Muldoon what cause had he to rebel against his lord in not giving him his rent; O'Muldoon said, that it was not through disloyalty he had committed any thing he had done, but because he did not see the lord himself up to give it to him, "and now we are willing to give you our rent as the representative of your brother." "That may be, O'Muldoon, but I will not take the rent from you, for I have been told a great deal of the disloyalty and opposition of this territory of Lurg, and particularly of your own, and my advice to you is, that you yourself now go to Purt Dobhrain with that rent, and make your own excuse to him, for I am not absolved until I purge you of your disloyalty, and have promised my brother that I would not leave a chief of a house or territory after me in Fermanagh without bringing to him, together with getting their rents from them willingly or by force; therefore go thou, O'Muldoon, to my brother, and let Magrath accompany you, for he has great influence with him, and let him describe the entire state of this country;" after that they spent some time drinking, carousing, rejoicing in merriment and cheerfulness. Giollaisa then commanded the constables to take their arms, told O'Muldoon to redeem his pledge and word, and he himself and those forces, after taking their leave of the chiefs of Lurg, marched into the territory of Tir-Ceannfhada (barony of Tirkennedy), which was then inhabited by the Clan Mac Uinsionnain (now Mac Gulsenan), and by the other tribes which were then along with them, such as the O'Duibhins (O'Devines), O'Segdananns, and Clan Mac-an-Uisce (Waters), and many other tribes which are not here mentioned. They halted on the hill which is called Craobh-Ui-Fhuadachain, where dwelt Muintir Fhuadachain, from which he sent word and messages to the chiefs of the country, and ordered them to meet him on the same Creeve. O'Seaghdhannan and O'Fuadachain entertained him that night with the choicest meats and all sorts of liquors, until the rising of the sun on the morrow, when the head chiefs of that country congregated to them, and Giollaisa enquired of them if they had brought the rents due by them along with them? They said, "that they had it not at present, although their not having it on that day, did not make them the less willing to pay it." Giollaisa then ordered them to make Mac Uinsionan prisoner, and all those present of his name, upon which they were immediately taken prisoners, and Giollaisa Maguire said, "I will teach you that you shall be no longer disobedient in paying your rent every time you ought to pay it, and you shall see every place and spot in which you have done injustice to my brother, respecting his own lawful rents, and be it known to you, that I shall yet disclose to you all your evil doings." He, however, bound them by a pledge to meet him on a certain day agreed upon between them there, at Purt Dobhrain, and he then set them at liberty. As to Giollaisa himself, he did not halt or stop until he went the circuit of those seven territories of Fermanagh, and did not leave a chief of a territory in it that he did not bind by either hand or foot, until he came before his brother at Cnoc Ninne (Knockninny), after having brought those under subjection at the top of the spear and sword, and in that manner he himself and his enforcing officers, together with his constables, followed them to Purt Dobhrain, where he found those prisoners before him. He immediately went before his brother, and Manus welcomed him; and Giollaisa said, "what has induced you, brother, to retain those prisoners I have sent you, so long in confinement without receiving your rents from them, or why not do in time everything they must have at length done to give satisfaction in every evil deed they have committed against you?" Manus answered and said, "brother, it must be known to you and all persons, that during the time I have been keeping my bed, I have been incapable of transacting business, and as I am not on terms with those chiefs of Fermanagh, I did not permit them into my presence until you yourself should come to them, and now whatever restitution you yourself shall be pleased to exact from them, I shall be satisfied with it." After that Giollaisa went among the household and called the stewards, and told them to serve and attend diligently those nobles of Tircconnell, while they should remain in the fortress. The stewards answered that all sorts of liquors were in abundance, together with every other kind of ofals that were requisite for the present purpose, "and, therefore, let the nobles be seated about you in the princely hall." Giollaisa then stood up and called O'Boyle, O'Gallagher, and the three *Mac Sweeney*s, and all the other constables who were along with him in that force, and after that he called the chiefs of Fermanagh, and after being seated, they were served with metheglin and ale, and all the nobles and chiefs of Tircconnell and Fermanagh were merry and happy together. Then Giollaisa enquired of those chiefs of Fermanagh if they had their rents with them to pay their lord. They said they had. "Well," said Giollaisa, "come along with me into the presence of my brother, until you pay your rents to him;" and then excused himself to the chiefs of Tircconnell, and ordered the stewards to make much of them until he would return. He took those chiefs then before his brother, and told them to pay him the rents. Mac Uinsionnain, Mac Donnell, Mac Mulroona, Mac Gillfinnen, and all the other head chiefs made that payment, until it came to O'Flanagan's turn to be brought forward to pay his, and to be reconciled to his lord, when Giollaisa said, "Gentlemen, your rents shall not be taken without an Eric for all you have slain of our people, and a satisfactory reparation for every disloyal act you have committed, and should we act properly towards you, we would compel you to pay for all the troubles which have befallen us from the disloyalty of the chiefs of the entire of Fermanagh, because you were the persons who commenced the trouble; and I declare to you, that you shall not part with me until I send you to Lough Oughter (the upper Lough Erne, where there was a fortress), where you shall be kept until my brother is fully satisfied with you for every evil deed you have committed against him and me, but however, pay the rent as you now have it;" which they accordingly did, and after receiving the rent from them, he ordered the guards who were over them to convey them to the guard-house where they had been before, and to watch them carefully till morning, as they should no longer be a trouble to them; after which they were removed from the presence to the house in which they had previously been. After that he ordered those other chiefs before him, and said to them—"Ye chiefs who are here present, bind yourselves by an oath and a pledge that you shall be henceforth loyal to your lord, and that you will pay your rents periodically as it behoves you to do, and if you do not I shall send you to Lough Oughter, and I swear to you by the solemn oaths which I am accustomed to make, that you shall not leave that until you are glad that sureties be taken on your behalf, and be ever submissive to your lord." "Well then," said they, "to prove that we are willing and anxious to be governed by his and your will, we shall take these oaths with sincerity of disposition never to do any thing in opposition to you." After that the Duibhenach was brought to them, and they swore on it in the presence of the laity and clergy there, that while ever they lived they would not rise up against their lords either by day or by night. After that Giollaisa stood up and said that he was a long time absent from those nobles of Tircconnell, and told them to remain with his brother until they would finally settle their affairs, and give him sureties of one another to be loyal and faithful in serving him henceforth, which they accordingly did; after which Giollaisa went to join those chiefs of Tircconnell, and he found them cheerful and pleasant, and on going amongst them he were in the west of Connello received information of that, they marched eastward to the neighbour-sat between O'Boyle and O'Gallagher, and began to drink and he merry along with them, and he proposed the health of O'Donnell to be drunk. They spent their time after that manner until dinner hour came on, when the thin broad tables of the princely fortress were covered, and on which were served the choicest meats and liquors, and each of them sat down in the place allotted for him by his rank as had ever been hitherto the custom in this household. After taking their dinner they spent the night drinking and carousing till bed-time came on, and those chiefs of Tirconnell begged to be allowed to go to rest, for unless they were permitted to do so, they would not be in a state of departing and marching on the morrow; and they all begged they might be permitted to retire to sleep, after which they were shown to their sleeping rooms. When they got up the following morning, Manus sent for O'Gallagher, O'Boyle, the three Mac Sweeneys, and all the other constables who came into his presence, and he received them with much affability, and having been seated around him, they were served with metheglin (or mead), and ale. Then Manus said to Giollaísa: "Brother, go out and put these forces which accompanied you sitting in that great house without, and give directions that particular attention be paid them, in supplying them with abundance of metheglin and ale, for I do not wish to leave them to the care of any other person but your own; and let food and strong drink be furnished to ourselves here, for their lords would use their best endeavours to make you comfortable, or any person belonging to you. After that Giollaísa went out, and commanded the stewards not to spare food or strong drink on those forces of Tirconnell, or on the chiefs of Fermanagh either, and that was accordingly done; it was in the private apartment of the prince of Fermanagh that those chiefs of Tirconnell sat, and they and the prince of Fermanagh dined and supped together cheerfully and happily during the day, and it was then O'Boyle and all those chiefs of Tirconnell spoke with one accord, and said: "Prince of Fermanagh, we have come hither with this small force by command of our own lord, and to serve you for the purpose of doing you good; and since we have come we have asked no favour of you, and our request now is, that you settle with the people of O'Flanagan, as we have done with the other chiefs." Then Manus answered and said "that it was not the same kind of settlement that appertained to those other chiefs and the O'Flanagans, for those have committed an act that could not be palliated by the greater portion of the chiefs of Ireland, but the best settlement that can be made I shall do it on your account." Giollaísa having been called in, he was told what O'Boyle had stated respecting that affair, and Giollaísa said "that there was an eric due by the people of O'Flanagan, for the fifteen men whom they had slain in an unlawful conflict against my brother, for demanding his own rightful rent of them." Then O'Boyle said "that they would not go to law with them on behalf of the O'Flanagans, but rather to assist them in getting a settlement for them, and that he did not know how they would make a reparation for the deeds they had committed unlawfully, unless they themselves saw the impropriety of the act against their lord." After that the O'Flanagans were called in, and Giollaísa asked them "what excuse they had for every misdeed they had committed against their lord, or what eric they had to give for the killing of his people, for, as these gentlemen are present, I wish to know your apology and answer in your misdeeds, for you might say that we have acted unjustly towards you." The O'Flanagans answered and said, "that they were of opinion an eric was due to themselves, if they got justice, in the same manner it was demanded of them, on account that O'Flanagan, and twenty-two of their people along with him, were slain." "My answer to that," said Giollaísa, "is, that you are not entitled to receive an eric or reparation for any person that was slain from you in that conflict, because it was unlawful for you to follow my people, who were levying the lawful rent which you should have paid without opposition; and if any thing, I say, is unjust, the chiefs of Tirconnell are here present, and let them judge if I am saying what is unjust; and I swear that had not these gentlemen been here present, I would not hood, of Kilmallock, and showed themselves to those two lords who were in pursuit of them;

be a day older until you should be on Cloch Oughter (probably Clough Oughter Castle, on the lake of Lough Oughter, near Cavan) where, you might get enough of law; however I did not wish to send you thither until these gentlemen had heard your crimes; and, as these gentlemen have undertaken to speak on your behalf, you shall obtain the benefit of their decision in the affairs they have heard between us, and if the gentlemen leave my brother without an eric, be it on their own judgment; and, by the aforesaid oaths, no judgment should pass between us were it not that they have interfered, and that we wish that every cause which we have, and every apology which you have, should be explained to the prince of Tirconnell; for I hear that you often commit unfair acts against him, and against every chief of his people; and therefore, O'Boyle, go you and do that which may seem proper to you, concerning every thing you have heard." O'Boyle, O'Gallagher, and the three Mac Sweeneys then rose, and they sat in council to determine what they should do respecting that affair; and the decision they came to was, to impose the payment of seven hundred loilgheachs (milch cows) on the O'Flanagans, as an eric for the slaying of the fifteen men of the prince of Fermanagh's people, by which they were to obtain peace from their lord, and likewise to bind them by oaths not to rise out in a similar opposition while they should live; and, having determined on these decisions, they returned to Manus's sleeping chamber. Then Manus sat up in his bed, welcomed them, and drank to their lord's health, with joy and gladness for them; and he began to relate all the circumstances that had taken place between himself and O'Donnell, from the period of their infancy till the time they had separated from each other; he requested O'Boyle to convey to him his blessing, and said that it was evident he was not able to walk or move; otherwise he would visit him oftener than he came to see him, as he enjoyed his health. After that O'Boyle said: "My lord, we have come to a decision in that affair between you and the O'Flanagans, if you are pleased it should be so." "It is not proper not to consent to every matter you have determined in that case, as it has been referred to you." "If so," said O'Boyle, "we have decreed that the O'Flanagans do pay seven hundred milch cows, as an eric for the fifteen men of your people that have been unlawfully slain by them." "Brother Giollaísa, what sayest thou to that decision?" "I say," said Giollaísa, "that I would not reject the decision of these head chiefs of Tirconnell in my own country, and I would not recommend you to reject it, and I advise you to send for the O'Flanagans, and have them brought forward here, and to learn from them if they are satisfied to abide by the decision which has been determined on." They having appeared before them, Giollaísa enquired of them if they were prepared to agree to the decrees which those chiefs of Tirconnell had decided on respecting all the differences which existed between themselves and his brother there present. They answered and said they were. "If so," said Giollaísa, "take the established oaths, which we have here, viz., the Duibheineach, for the fulfilment of every thing that has been decreed against you in that decision, in the presence of these chiefs and your own lord." They accordingly did so, as Giollaísa told them; after which the decision we have stated was made known to them; they then ratified their allegiance and friendship with their lord, and made an amicable peace with each other. Giollaísa then took a golden goblet, and requested his brother to drink to these gentlemen, as a confirmation of peace and friendship, and he then took the golden goblet from the hand of Giollaísa, and drank to the heir apparent of O'Flanagan, and nominated him the O'Flanagan; and the Christian name of that O'Flanagan, who was nominated on that day, was Dermot of the Wine, the son of Hugh Meith, son of Donal of the Wine, son of Bryan-na-Mudhen, son of Gilpatrick, son of Lughnaine, from whom the family of Mac Laoighisidh derives the name, who was the son of Artioghail, son of Lachlin, son of Malachy of the Hunting, son of Donal Dunu, son of Cormac Caoch, son of Tuathal Maolgarbh, son of Cairbre, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, from whom the Hy-Niull of Ireland are named; and thus were the chiefs of Fermanagh reconciled to their lord. After that, various viands were served these lords, by mutual consent, proceeded to Maigheala (Mallow, in the county of Cork), for the purpose of avoiding coming in contact with them; they (the Irish), pursued them to the gates of to the nobles and common people, both lay and clerical, to the bards and professors in the regal mansion, and particularly to the people of Tirconnell. O'Boyle, O'Gallagher, and the three Mac Sweeneys then rose to take their leave of those chiefs of Fermanagh; their steeds were got ready for them, and they having taken their arms, those assembled were cheerful and merry on parting from each other; and those chiefs of Tirconnell took their leave of every one of the household, from the highest to the lowest; O'Flanagan, Magrath, and O'Muldoon also took their leave of those sons of Don Maguire, and they themselves and Giolla Iosa, accompanied by a small body guard, proceeded and did not halt until they arrived at Sgiath-Baile-MacMurchadha, where they encamped that night, and they sent through the country to procure as much provisions as would be requisite for that night, and every kind of strong drink that could be obtained. Mac Gilfinnen and the chiefs of the country in general, sent them all sorts of viands that were necessary for the present occasion, and on the following day the chiefs of Tirconnell and of the lower part of Fermanagh took their leave of Giolla Iosa, by wishing him long life and happiness, and each party returned to their homes; and such was the parting of Giolla Iosa Maguire and the chiefs of Tirconnell and of the lower part of Fermanagh, with each other, after they had brought the seven districts of Fermanagh under rent and subjection to himself and his brother Manus Maguire. On the same day Giolla Iosa returned to the regal residence at Purt Dobrain, where his brother resided; and, on his entering, he did not stop until he went to the sleeping room in which Manus was, and he sat at the side of his bed, and said: "Thou art melancholy, brother." "Such is our lot at present," said the lord, "and do thou assist in making us cheerful." "I shall do so," said Giolla Iosa; and he then ordered all the professional men to be called into the bed-chamber; then came the bards, good professional men, persons of various offices, and the musicians of the household, and they played for them sweet melodious tunes on their stringed instruments, and recited the songs and melodies of their forefathers and ancestors, and they continued drinking and carousing together, and making mention of those chiefs who had left them on the day before; and in this manner they continued for three days and three nights. After that Giolla Iosa Maguire said: "Brother, now your country and lands are brought under your rent and tribute, and are submissive and obedient to thee; and I am of opinion that no chief of a district in the territory of Fermanagh will attempt to show any disposition of disobedience against your rules and orders henceforth, and do you always keep officers that will be strong and powerful, to go through the country collecting your rents amongst them; and I think it time to pay a visit to my grandfather's house in Brefney (Cavan), but should any opposition or conflict occur between any chief of a district and your people, Cloch-Uachtair (O'Reilly's castle of Clough Oughter) is near you to send me an account, and I shall be with you without delay, as you have not yourself the power of meeting them." "That is sorrowful, my brother," said Manus, "certain it is, that a country without a lord is a helpless country, and I will not at all events live long, and it is not better I should live, since I lost my powers of motion; and every one sees that I have no children who are likely to become of use shortly after my death, none but a senseless child, for whom those inclined to give opposition would care but little; for I am of opinion that these chiefs of Fermanagh are combined against every one of us, although they don't acknowledge it, and, my friend" said he "don't part me after that manner until I die, and do you assume the government after me, to govern and protect them, and as my time in this life is short, don't part with me till I die, when you will settle every thing after me in a proper manner, and take to thyself my title and inheritance after me." Giollaisa answered and said, "Brother, it would be a cause of reproach and envy for me to assume your title or inheritance, while you have a lawful heir to succeed you; and I think it would not be lawful for me to act in that manner." "Let not that hinder you," said Manus, "for those heirs are not of greater concern to me than you are, and I am better pleased that you and they should enjoy a lasting government, rather than they should be dispossessed of the entire country by your absence from defending it; and I shall now mention the portion which I would wish my own heirs should inherit, and the terms on which I shall give my own right and title of the county to you, and the following are the terms: Should my heirs come to maturity, that is to say, they themselves and their heirs, they shall be advisers and counsellors to thee and thine heirs, in succession; in the second place, they shall have the settlement and regulating of every ordinance and compact, subservient to you; I do not require of this territory of Fermanagh, but all that which lieth from Beulatha-na-nGall downward to Cunga-Caoil-Gabhla, and from Caraidh-Mic-Duinidh, on the west, to Achaid-na-Sgiath on the east; from Inis-Cnoca downwards on the lake to Daire-Inis, and the number of islands, great and small, that lie between these places, and Bally Mac Seraidh in the east, to be my mensal land; and the uplands which belong to Inishmore at present, viz., the quarter of Baile-an-Mhointidh, the Cam Derry-Braguin, on the southern side of Avon-Duv, which contain 90 Taite." (According to Pynnar's Survey of Ulster, in 1619, the ancient divisions of land in Fermanagh were called Tathes, each Tathe containing 30 acres; but according to the Tracts of sir John Davis, in his account of Monaghan and Fermanagh, he says that a Tathe was 60 English acres, and that 16 Tathes made a Ballybetagh, and therefore that every Ballybetagh contained 960 acres; and he says that the term Ballybetagh signifies a Townland, able to maintain hospitality. The term was derived from the Irish Baile, a town, biadh, food, and teach, a house, and originated from the houses of hospitality called Biatachs, which were institutions amply endowed with lands, and numerous established throughout Ireland, by the Irish princes and chiefs, for the maintenance of hospitality, and gratuitous support of the indigent and of all travellers and strangers). "And should your son or relative be slain by any of the men of Ireland, you shall claim no rent or tribute over these, except the service of eleven men, in collecting a force, and no person shall demand as much as the Copan Laoitheadh in any place in Fermanagh where my heir shall be; and on the due fulfilment of these conditions to my heirs, I shall leave to you, brother, my own right and title of this county of Fermanagh, from my own day forth; unite together the districts, and support and protect them." "It is certain," said Giollaisa, "that I should be happy to do every thing which you would impose on me to perform, and be assured that there is not one article you have mentioned but I shall endeavour to fulfil, for your heirs, and I shall take care to have them established after my time in Fermanagh; but yet I am not pleased or satisfied to assume your authority, lest it might be supposed, amongst other lords in Ulster, that it might be on account of my services to you against these chiefs of Fermanagh, or because you are helpless and incapable of acting, I would accept the government of your country, or the inheritance which your own son is entitled to obtain." "That will not be supposed in any part of Ulster," said Manus, "for you do not ask it, it is I that take into consideration the injury which may befall the country after my death, unless a governor is left over it, and, therefore, I consider it more proper to make this arrangement while I am living, in order that my own heir and you may benefit by it, rather than be depending on O'Donnell, or any other lord in Ulster, to maintain the government in my country after my death; and before the professors who are here present, and also all the clergy and laity there, I ordain all these things, and leave my own title over this country of Fermanagh to thee, on the terms we have before stated; and Giolla-na-Neeve O'Luinin, let all these things be written by you." "If so" said Giollaisa, "I shall give you your own will, and I engage to fulfil all these terms." After that Giolla-na-navee (O'Luinin), the upright Brehon O'Breslin, and Giolla-Maghuda O'Cassidy, retired apart, and they wrote all those compacts and points as they were directed, and it was to record those conditions that Giolla-na-navee composed the following verses:

"Powerful soldiers from Tirconnell
Were engaged by Giollaisa, who bore all sway;

Mallow, and they began to defy and provoke them, telling them they would not get a better opportunity of wreaking their vengeance and animosity on them, than to attack them while they were all assembled in one place; but, however, the resolution those great men came to was, that the president should go to Cork, and the earl to return back into the country of the Butlers. As the

The cattle droves of Manus the affable
First induced him to march with a force
From Belleek to the borders of Brefney,
And through the districts each side of the lake;
Their prisoners and hostages in fetters
Were held by that son of Donn;
The youthful, and noble Giollaisa
Brought these districts under his rule;
Manus flourished like the blooming blossoms,
Excelling in power all Ulster's princes;
Manus obtained, through Giollaisa,
Every tribute great and small,
Even to the Copan Laoithe,
Although each guest might wish to drink it."

But, however, they continued conjointly governing these seven districts of Fermanagh, for the space of three half years, from that time when his (Manus's), sickness and weakness increased, and a shortness came over his days; but, before he died he ordered that gold, silver, cattle, goods, treasure, and presents, should be distributed amongst the ecclesiastical orders, orphans, and widows of the country, and also the poor and indigent in every neighbouring district; he then died, after extreme unction and repentance, and after having gained the victory over the world and the devil; so that it was in that manner Manus Maguire left his lordship to his brother in succession after his death.

Lough Derg—Pilgrimages—Ancient Seminaries.—The lake called Lough Derg is situated in Donegal, on the borders of Fermanagh and Tyrone, in the parish of Templeearne, sometimes called Termounmagrath, part of which forms the parish of Pettigo, in the diocese of Clogher. The lake is very large and beautiful, and contains many fine islands. This lake was anciently called Fionn Loch, that is, the Fair or White Lake; but, as above-mentioned in the beginning of this article on Fermanagh, it got the name Loch Dearg, or the Red Lake, from the monster said to have been slain there by St. Patrick, the blood of which tinged the lake of a red colour. Accounts of Lough Derg and its antiquities are given by Giraldus Cambrensis, Matthew Paris, Camden, Ware, Colgan, Archdall, and Lanigan, and in various Topographies. In the latter end of the 5th century, about A.D. 490, St. Daboe founded a monastery on an island in Lough Derg, and it became a priory of Augustinian monks. The island was called, in after times, St. Fintan's island, from Fintan Munnu, a celebrated saint in the 7th century, who was of the race of the Connallians of Tirconnell. On the island was formed a cave or cell, called St. Patrick's Purgatory, which became celebrated as a place of penance and pilgrimage. Various accounts are given as to the time this place, called the Purgatory, was founded. Some ascribe its institution to St. Patrick himself, in the 5th century; while others are of opinion that it was first instituted in the 9th century, about A.D. 850, by a monk named Patrick, one of the priors of the island; but Lanigan considers it was not established till the 11th or 12th century. St. Patrick's Purgatory became famous as a place of pilgrimage, and in former ages was resorted to by vast numbers of pilgrims, not only from all parts of Ireland and Britain, but even from the continent. It is recorded in Rymer's Fœdera, that in 1358, King Edward III. granted to Malatesta Ungarus, a Hungarian knight, and to Nicholas de Beecario, a nobleman of Ferrara, in Italy, a safe conduct through England, to visit St. Patrick's Purgatory; and, in 1397, King Richard II. granted a like conduct to Raymond, Viscount de Perilleux, knight of Rhodes, country was left under the controul of the Irish forces on that occasion, they nominated James (Fitzgerald), the son of Thomas Roe, son of James, son of John, son of the earl, as earl of Desmond, on the authority of O'Neill (See note on the earls of Desmond, p. 531); they did not leave one Saxon throughout the length and breadth of that country, viz., the country of the Geraldines, which extended with a train of 20 men and 30 horses. Camden and others state that in the latter end of the 15th century, namely, in the year 1497, on St. Patrick's Day, the place called St. Patrick's Purgatory, and its buildings were demolished by order of Pope Alexander VI. (Roderick Borgia), by the guardian of the Franciscan monastery of Donegal and some others of the deanery of Lough Erne or Clogher, deputed for that purpose by the Bishop of Clogher; but the Purgatory was again restored, and continued as a place of pilgrimage. The monastery of Termounmagrath, at Lough Derg, is often mentioned in the course of these Annals. It was subject to the great abbey of Armagh, and was dedicated to SS. Peter and Paul; three great festivals were annually held at the abbey, on the 1st of January, the 24th of July, and the 16th of December, in honor of the patron and founder, St. Daboe, who is buried there. The abbey continued to be of great note to the 17th century, but in A.D. 1632, by order of the lords justices, sir Adam Loftus viscount of Ely, and Richard Boyle earl of Cork, the abbey and other buildings on the island of Lough Derg, were demolished and the friars expelled, by sir James Balfour and sir William Stewart, who were deputed for that purpose. Some ruins of the old abbey still remain, and a plate is given in Ware's Antiquities, of the buildings on the island. It still continued as a place of pilgrimage, but in modern times the place of performing penance has been removed from Saint's Island, to another near it called Station Island. Lough Derg, to the present day, is visited by vast numbers of pilgrims from all parts of Ireland, and many from England and Scotland, and some even from America. The time of performing penance is from the 1st of June to the 15th of August, and the number who visit it annually, of late years, is estimated at from ten to fifteen thousand persons; about the year 1825, a boat was swamped on the lake, by which accident seventy or eighty persons were drowned, and their bodies were buried on Saint's Island.

The ancient Irish, amidst all their fierce feuds amongst themselves, and sanguinary conflicts of centuries with foreign foes, were still a religious race, and imbued with a great love of literature; and their kings, princes, and chiefs founded and amply endowed a vast number of ecclesiastical and literary establishments, abbeys, colleges, and great schools; as those of Armagh, Downpatrick, Bangor, Derry, Donegal, Clogher, Clones, Devenish, Fenagh, Boyle, Cong, Mayo, Clonfert, Louth, Monasterboice, Mellifont, Slane, Kells, Ardbraccan, Trim, Clonard, Clonmacnois, Rahan, Fore, Kildare, Clonagh, Tallaght, Glendalough, Leighlin, Ferns, Lismore, Cashel, Holycross, Ross, Roscrea, Inisethay, Aran of the Saints, and others. Of these famous seats of piety and learning amongst the ancient Irish, many venerable ruins still remain, but of many more even their very ruins have disappeared, destroyed by the hand of time, or the still more destructive violence of fanaticism and war. The most celebrated places of pilgrimage in Ireland were Lough Derg, Armagh, Downpatrick, and Derry Columbkille, in Ulster; Croagh Patrick mountain, in Mayo; Aran of the Saints, off the coast of Galway; the seven churches of St. Kieran at Clonmacnois, and of St. Kevin at Glendalough; Kildare of St. Bridget, and Holycross in Tipperary. Many of the Irish kings and princes are recorded to have gone on pilgrimages to the abbey founded by their countryman, St. Columbkille, at Iona, in the Hebrides; in the course of these Annals, many princes and chiefs are also recorded to have gone on pilgrimage, in the 14th and 15th centuries, to the shrine of St. James, at Compostella, in Spain; others to Rome, and some even to Jerusalem and the river Jordan.

from Dunqueen (in the county of Kerry), to the river Suir, and which was possessed and inhabited by Englishmen, abounding with dwellings and immense property, that they did not slay or banish out of it, in the space of seventeen days; nor did they leave, during that time, a chief seat, a castle, or one sod of the Geraldine estates, that they did not put into the possession of the earl of Desmond, except alone Castlemaine, in the county of Kerry, Askeaton in Hy-Conuill Gabhra (barony of Connello, in Limerick), and Magheala (Mallow), in the county of Cork. These officers of O'Neill having performed that great duty in a short time, they took their leave of and bade farewell to the earl of Desmond, whom they had appointed. Anthony O'Moore, and such of those forces as were under his command, proceeded into Leix; Redmond Burke, with all those of the same force who were engaged and commanded by him, marched into Ormond; the risings out of the Ultonians, who were along with those chieftains, returned to their countries and homes, without want of treasure or booty being the benefit of that expedition. Captain Tyrrell remained with the earl of Desmond, and the earl was wasting and overrunning Munster, and gaining the people in continuation, during the two remaining months of the end of this year.

The lord of Mota Gairett (Mountgarrett, in Wexford), namely Edmond, the son of Richard, son of Pierce Butler, joined O'Neill in friendship, in the harvest of this year.

The lord of the Third of Clonmel (barony of Iffa and Offa, in Tipperary), and of Cathair-Duini-Iasgaigh (Cahir), namely Thomas, the son of Theobald, son of Pierce, son of Edmond (Butler), and the baron of Luachmaighi (Purcell, baron of Loughmoe, in the barony of Eliogarty, in Tipperary), together with a great number of young men of the Butlers, rose in war and alliance with the Irish.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, sent an armed force from Tirconnell with Mac William (Burke), namely Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotach, son of John, son of Oliver, to march into Mac William's country, in the harvest of this year; he sent O'Dogherty, and a large force along with him, namely John Ogc, the son of John, son of Felim, son of Conor Carrach. It is doubtful if they were perceived in any country in which they arrived, or through which they passed, until they reached the Umhalls (baronies of Burrishoole and Murrisk, in Mayo), unnoticed, and in those were the property, herds, flocks and cattle, for the most part, of the entire country of Mac William. They collected all the property on the mainland, from the small islands outwards, and though great was the gathering and collecting of preys they made, they experienced no obstacle or injury in their progress, except alone the toil of removing and driving them, until they returned safe to their countries, viz., Mac William to Tyrrawley, and O'Dogherty to Inisowen.

When O'Donnell got possession of Ballymote, in the middle month of the harvest of this year, as we have before stated, the Connallians sent their flocks into the county of Sligo, and O'Donnell himself lived at Ballymote, from the time he had got possession of it till after great Christmas. O'Donnell, having called for a mustering of his forces from all quarters in which they were, he was in the first place joined by the Tirconnallians, with all their troops, and also by Mac William Burke, namely Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotach, with all those under his command; and those having collected together to O'Donnell at Ballymote, in the end of the month of December precisely, the resolution he came to was, to march into Clanrickard, although the people of that country were in dread and on their guard; but, notwithstanding their fear and terror of him, he proceeded with his forces unnoticed and unperceived, until he arrived silently, and to his satisfaction, at the gate of Kilcolgan (in the barony of Dunkellin, county of Galway, where there was an abbey), at the dusk of the early morning; he then sent forth his predatory parties into all parts of the country about him, but particularly through the centre of Clanrickard; one party of them arrived in the vicinity of the district of Redmond (Burke), and another party went to Dun-Guaire (near Kinvarra, in Galway, on the borders of Clare), in Coill-ua-bhFiachrach. Lamentable deaths were occasioned by that party that went to Coill-Ua-bhFiachrach, viz., the two sons of Rossa, the son of Anthony, son of Malachy O'Lochlin (of Burren, in Clare), namely Torlogh Buighe and Bryan, were slain; there was also slain a gentleman of the Clan Donnell galloglasses who was along with Mac William (Burke), in that force, namely, young Hugh Buighe, the son of Hugh Buighe, son of Maolmurry Mac

Donnell, who fell by the hand of Torlogh Buighe, the son of Rossa (O'Loghlin) on that occasion, before he himself had been slain; there were likewise slain, by another party of O'Donnell's people, the two sons of William, the son of John (Burke), of Rinn-Mhil, and the son of Theobald, son of Dabog of Doire-Ui-Domhnaill (places near the town of Galway), together with his grandson; Mac Herbert of Dysert Kelly, namely, William, the son of Ulick Roe, son of Ulick Oge, was taken prisoner by O'Donnell's brother, i. e. Manus, the son of Hugh, son of Manus. Although there were great and vast numbers of retained soldiers belonging to the earl quartered in Clanrickard, O'Donnell was enabled to carry away with him, out of the country, all the immense preys, large herds of cattle, and booty and property, that were conveyed to him, without conflict or battle, and arrived with the entire back at Ballymote.

There were disputes and contentions between some of the gentlemen of Thomond, respecting the partition and joint occupation of their territory and land, and of their towns and ancient castles, too tedious to be written or recorded.

When the queen of England and the council were informed that the men of Ireland rose in opposition to her, as has been already stated, and the immense number of her people that were slain this year, the resolution the sovereign and the council came to was, to send over sir Richard Bingham, with eight thousand soldiers along with him, to maintain and carry on the war here, until the earl of Essex should arrive, who was commanded at that time to come to Ireland, from the festival of St. Bridget forth, with such clothing, treasure and arms, the like of which had not been undertaken to be sent to Ireland since the time the Saxons had first invaded it till then. The forementioned sir Richard was an honourable knight of the queen's people, who was well acquainted with Ireland, and had been for some years previously governor in the province of Connaught. The earl of Essex we have also mentioned was a man who was esteemed, favoured, and honored by the queen, and was a person who had made plunders and captures in the provinces of western Europe, on behalf of the same queen, and by him was taken, shortly before that time, a strong impregnable city in the kingdom of Spain, the name of which city is Cadiz.

The earl of Thomond was an entire Kalend in England this year.

The earl of Kildare, namely William, the son of Gerald, son of Gerald, went to England in the spring.

O'Conor Sligo, namely Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, returned from England in the winter.

The following were amongst the gentlemen of Thomond who were in contention with each other, as we have stated, namely, Teige, the son of Connor, son of Donogh O'Brien, by whom the bridge of Porteross (O'Brien's Bridge, in Clare), was taken; and although he was not the first who attempted to take it from Margaret Cusack, it finally came into his possession; he took Caislen Cluaine in Iv Caisin (Clonie, in the barony of Bunratty, county of Clare), and Caislen-na-Sgairbhe, in the east of Hy-Bloid (Scariff, in the barony of Tullagh, in Clare), from the Turnac (officer), of the son of the bishop of Meath. Of those also was Conor, the son of Donal, son of Mahon, son of Bryan O'Brien, who took Baile-an-Chaisleain, in upper Clan Cuilein, from Mac Namara Fionn, namely, John, the son of Teige, son of Cumeadha; of those likewise was Torlogh, the son of Mahon, son of Torlogh, son of Mahon of Coill O'bh-Flannchadha, who took Doire Eoghain (Derry Owen), from George Cusack, of which the sons of Awlave, son of Kian O'Shaughnessey, were the first inheritors; and Mahon, the son of Torlogh Buig O'Brien became established in Coill O'bh-Flannchadha. Of the same gentlemen were Torlogh, the son of Murogh, son of Connor O'Brien of Cathair-Mionain, and his brother, Dermot Roe, who joined in the war of the Irish. Of those also was Teige Caoch, the son of Torlogh, son of Bryan, son of Donogh Mac Mahon, who, at Christmas, seized on an English ship, which had been astray for a long time before that, and happened to take port in western Coreabaiseinn, in the vicinity of Carrig-an-Chobhlaigh (Carrigaholt, in the barony of Moyarta, county of Clare), and Teige took the ship, with its valuable cargo, from the crew; it was not long after when its profit was light to Teige, and the demand on him for it was great; the same Teige took Dunbeag, one of his own towns, which was in the possession of a merchant of Limerick, in lieu of debt.

A. D. 1599.

The earl of Kildare, namely, William, the son of Gerald, son of Gerald, whom we mentioned, had gone to England in the foregoing year, prepared to return to Ireland in the spring of this year. Having entered a ship accompanied by eighteen men, of the gentlemen of Meath, and of the English Pale, and having sailed till out of sight at sea, none of them were seen alive ever since, and it was from other countries in two months after that, an account of the certainty of their deaths came to England and Ireland. He did not leave a son or brother after him to succeed him in the title, and a relative of his, namely, Gerald, the son of Edward, son of Gerald, son of Thomas, son of John Cam, was appointed by the queen and the council of England; he was a captain over soldiers in the queen's service, until God granted him that title without battle, war, peril or danger.

O'Molloy, (of King's county), i. e. Conall, the son of Cahir, died in the spring of this year, and his son, Calvach assumed his place, by the power of the queen; there were some gentlemen of his lineage who objected to and opposed him, according to the law of the Irish, (the law of Tanistry), concerning that title.

Fergus, the son of Bryan, son of Bryan, son of Roderick, son of Cathal O'Ferrall, died in the month of March, and his death caused lamentation in his country (in Longford).

Donal, the son of Niall Meirgeach, son of Maolmurry, son of Hugh, son of Niall, (Mac Sweeney), having been slain by Maolmurry, the son of Bryan Oge, and by Hugh Buighe, the son of Ferfeadh Mac Sweeney, they were burned, or hanged, by O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, on the top of Sith-Aodha (a hill at Ballyshannon), for their crimes, according to the law of corporal punishment.

James, the son of Torlogh, son of Tuathal O'Gallagher, was hanged by O'Donnell, on the top of the Sith (hill), above Easroe, at Ballyshannon, on the 4th day of March, after it was proved against him that he had been engaged in betraying and watching O'Donnell, and inducing the English to come to his country.

George Cusack, the son of Thomas, was killed in the month of July, by Torlogh, the son of Mahon, son of Torlogh, son of Mahon, the son of the bishop O'Brien (bishop of Killaloe), respecting the estate of his father; for sir George Bingham gave the estate of Mahon O'Brien, after he had put him to death, to the forementioned George, and he (Torlogh), was endeavouring to obtain his patrimony, until he slew George on that occasion; and he was interred in the monastery of Ennis.

The son of O'Conor Kerry, namely, Donogh Maol, son of Conor, son of Conor, son of John, was slain in the month of August, by a party of the common soldiers of the earl of Desmond, namely, by the sons of Manus Oge, the son of Manus, son of Edmond Mac Sheehey; and that slaying was considered a great loss by the earl, for O'Conor himself, i. e. John, and his brother, that Donogh, together with all those in their country, were united with him in war.

John, the son of the Giolla Duv, son of James O'Kennedy, of Baile-an-Gharrdha of Knock-Sith-Una, in Ormond, was slain by Hugh, the son of Murrough O'Kennedy, of Baile-Ui-Chuire.

The prior of Lothra (Lorrah), in Ormond, namely, John, the son of John, son of Giollapatrik O'Hogan, was slain by a party of the O'Kennedys, in the month of July precisely.

More, the daughter of Donal, son of Conor, son of Torlogh O'Brien, died in the month of January; she was a woman worthy of praise, in the manners of women.

The earl of Thomond, namely, Donogh, the son of Conor O'Brien, returned from England, in the month of January, and remained with the earl of Ormond, in the country of the Butlers, for some time afterwards.

One of the sons of O'Neill, namely, Con, the son of Hugh, son of Ferdorcha, son of Con Bacach, proceeded, in the month of January, to visit friends, and unite them in his father's war in Leinster and Munster, to ascertain those of them who were firm in their friendship and promises to O'Neill and the Irish. He remained the greater part of spring in those countries, procuring provisions for his soldiers, and confirming them in the war in which they were engaged; and there was a correspondence and friendship carried on between that son of O'Neill and the son of the earl of Thomond, namely, Teige, the son of Conor O'Brien, on each side of the Shannon.

Torlogh, the son of Donal, son of Conor O'Brien, took into his service some common and hired soldiers, in the very beginning of this year to aid the queen against her enemies.

The brother of the young earl of Thomond, namely, Donal, the son of Conor, son of Donogh, had the controul and command of the earl of Thomond's people in aiding the queen.

After the taking of that English ship, of which we have before treated, by Teige Caoch, the son of Torlogh Mae Mahon, an unfriendly feeling and an appearance of contention arose between himself and that son of the earl (of Thomond), namely, Donal, and that Teige went to the earl of Desmond, and made his friendship with him, like all other parties who ratified their alliance with him.

After Teige had returned across the Shannon, he made a nocturnal attack on the young chief Donal O'Brien, on the 17th day of the month of February, at Cill-Muire-O'mBraeain (Kilmurphy Ibraekane, in Clare); he wounded and took prisoner Donal, and slew a great number of his hired soldiers; and he (Donal), was conveyed to Dunbeag, to be guarded, where he remained imprisoned only a week, when he was set at liberty without sureties or pledges.

O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Hugh, son of Manus, was residing at Ballymote, in the county of Sligo, since the gaining of the battle of Ath-Buighe, in the very beginning of August, to the festival of St. Bridget of this year. He thought it too long not to have gone on an expedition into some distant country, during that period, and he did not know to what particular place he should go, for he had not left a quarter, border, fastness, or sequestered place in the province of Connaught, he did not plunder or take hostages and sureties from, except Thomond, in particular. At the expiration of that period, he commanded a muster of his forces for the purpose of marching into Thomond; in the first place the Tireonnallians joined his gathering; amongst those were Hugh Oge, the son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv O'Donnell; Niall Garv, the son of Con, son of Calvaeh, son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv; O'Dogherty, i. e. John Oge, the son of John, son of Felim, son of Conor Carraeh; O'Boyle, namely, Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Torlogh, son of Niall; Mac Sweeney Fanad, i. e. Donal, the son of Torlogh, son of Maolmurry; Mac Sweeney Banagh, namely, Donogh, the son of Maolmurry Meirgeach, son of Maolmurry, son of Niall, all of whom came with their forces. There came in the same army Maguire, i. e. Hugh, the son of Cuchonaehit, son of Cuchonaehit, son of Cuchonaehit, son of Bryan, son of Philip, son of Thomas; the son of O'Rourke, namely, Teige, the son of Bryan-na-Murtha, son of Bryan Ballaeh, son of Owen, and the Mac William, who had been appointed by O'Donnell himself before that time, namely, Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotaeh, son of John, son of Oliver. When all these chiefs, with their forces, came to O'Donnell at Ballymote, the army was so immense and great that he sent a force into the country of Mac William, while he himself should be in Thomond, and the chieftains appointed to command this force were Mac William, and Niall Garv, the son of Con O'Donnell. This force ransacked and overran the country, from the eastern end of the country of the Mac Costelloes (in Mayo), to Umhall of Clan Giobuin (Clan Gibbon, in Mayo); they took on that occasion Oilen-Leath-Ardain (Loeharne, or Clare Island); they slew eighteen of the chiefs of Clan Gibbon, together with a great number of their people, and carried away preys, booty, and much property, on their return from the country. As to O'Donnell and his forces, they proceeded to march into Thomond, and they did not halt until they arrived, unpereceived, and crossed the river (Suek), into Clanriekard (in Galway); they made an extensive camp of armed warriors, in the evening of the day, at the Ruadh-Beithigh, between Cill-Colgan and Ardraitin (Kileolgan and Ardahan, both in the barony of Dunkellin, county of Galway). They then held a consultation to determine the best means of attacking the strange country to which they had marched, and, having taken some of their provisions, they went to sleep before undertaking that great journey and toil, except their sentinels, who were along with them, and in that state they remained till midnight, when O'Donnell commanded them to rise forthwith, in order to march into the territory before light of day rose on them; they immediately got up, and then proceeded in the most direct open roads until they arrived, early in the morning, at the eastern end of Coill O'bhFlainnehadha, at Trioeha-Ced Cencoil-Fearmaic, in Thomond (Mac Clancy's Wood, in the barony of Inchiquin, county of Clare). They detached their predatory companies there, and sent a party of them northward into Boirinn (barony of Burren), commanded by Teige O'Rourke, and Mac Sweeney of Banagh; another party southward to Baile-Ui-Ogain of Coill More (the town of O'Hogan, of the great wood), to Tully O'Dea (i. e. Dyseret O'Dea, in the barony of Inchiquin), and to the gate of Baile-Ui-Ghriobhta (the town of O'Grivha); Maguire also advanced with a large party of the force. O'Donnell proceeded with the main body, and thick of his army, through the centre of Coill O'Flanchadha, through Bealach-an-Fiodhfail, to Cill-Inghine-Baoith (Kilneboy), in the upper part of Dalcas, where he arrived before the noon of day; those who had gone to the south returned back northwards by Druim-Fionnglaisi, by Coradh-Finn (Corofin), and Kilneboy, to meet O'Donnell. The preys of the entire of Kinel Fearmaic (or Inchiquin), were brought to that place, viz., those from Dyseret to Glen Columkille, to Tolaidh-Chuman, to Cluaim-Sailchearnaigh, and to Leim-an-Eich (all which places were about the boundaries of Kinel-Fearmaic, or the barony of Inchiquin). The son of O'Rourke, and Mac Sweeney, were not able to come up to him that night with the preys of Burren, neither was Maguire able to come from the other side, for these encamped in the different places where the night overtook them. O'Donnell having encamped that night at Kilneboy, he left that town on the morrow, before mid-day, and the direction he went was into Triochat-Ced of Corcomruadh, to Cill-Fionnabhradh (Kilfenora, in the barony of Corcomroe); he sent forth scouring parties from thence, southward to Eidhnigh (Killieney, where there is an ancient burial place), to Breintir-Fearmacaigh (Brentry), and Corcamaigh, to the gates of Innis-Diomain (Innistymon), to Cill-Easpuig-Lonain (Killaspuglenane), to Baile-Paidin, and back again eastward to Kilfenora, with their preys and booty, to meet O'Donnell; he remained there until the following day, till his forces overtook him from all quarters in which they had been; the son of O'Rourke, and Mac Sweeney of Banagh, came to him with the preys of Burren; Maguire came to him with preys and much booty from the other side. When O'Donnell beheld the hills becoming crowded and blackened in all directions about him with the droves and numerous flocks of every country through which his forces had passed, he prepared to return back along the chain of rugged hills of Burren, by the early light of the morning, through Burren, and marched onward to Nua-Chongbhail (Noghvale), to Turlogh (in the barony of Burren, on the borders of Galway), to the monastery of Corcomroe (i. e. Abbey), to Carcair-na-gCleireach, and halted that night in the Rubha, in the west of Hy-Fiachra-Aidhne (in the barony of Kiltartan, county of Galway). On the following day he marched through the upper part of Clanrickard, by the gate of the town of Athenry, and his progress from thence, until he arrived at Ballymote, is not recorded, except that Mac William and Niall Garv O'Donnell met him on the borders of Hy Maine, with much prey and booty, which they had carried off from Mac William's country. The learned historian and Bard Mac Brody, i. e. Maoilin Oge, alleged that it was to avenge the demolition of the palace of Oileach, by Murtogh More, the son of Torlogh, son of Brian Boromhe, formerly, that God permitted, through the malediction of Columkille against the O'Briens, the complete plundering and devastation of Thomond which was effected by O'Donnell on that occasion; and the same Maoilin Oge came to O'Donnell, to seek for the restoration of his property which had been carried off by a party of those forces, and it was freely granted to him, on which Maoilin composed the following verse (see note on Aileach, p. 438):

"It was destined in revenge for Oileach, O'Hugh Roe, which the prophet declared,
That your force should come to the land
Of Magh Adhair, in the western territory."

(O'Donnell made this expedition into Thomond against Donogh O'Brien, earl of Thomond, and others who were in alliance with the English).

In the first week of March, the governor of the province of Connaught, sir Conyers Clifford, went to Galway, with a large force, consisting of a great number of officers and common soldiers; after he had been nearly a week in Galway, he sent seven or eight companies of English and Irish soldiers to the county of Clare, to ascertain who were obedient and disobedient to the queen in it; he appointed Theobald Dillon, captain Lyster, and the sheriff of the county of Clare, namely, Richard Sgorlog (Sherlock), in command over them, until they should go to where Torlogh O'Brien was, who was also appointed in command over them; after entering the country, they remained the first night at Cill-Caoidi, in the east of Kinel Fearmaie (Kilkeady, in the barony of Inehiquin, in Clare). When all these people engaged in warfare, who were in alliance with Teige, the son of Conor O'Brien, heard of their arrival in the country, they lay in ambush for them, and on the march of the queen's people, on the following day, through Bealach-an-Fhioldhfail (between Kilkeady and Kilneboy), westward from Kilkeady, Teige's men attacked them, and many were slain between them on both sides; and although there were more of the queen's people slain, the death of any person of note who fell there has not been recorded; on the side of the Irish a gentleman of the O'Briens, namely, Dermod Roe, the son of Murrough, son of Conor, was slain; besides what happened there, the pass was let free to the queen's people, and they halted and remained at the end of the day at Kilneboy. The resolution that Teige, the son of Conor O'Brien, came to after that was, to come on terms with the queen, and to abandon his soldiers, and particularly those who were engaged in the forementioned conflict; he sent his messengers to Theobald Dillon, at Kilneboy, and to the governor at Galway. Theobald Dillon and the queen's people left Kilneboy on the following day, and proceeded to the place of Torlogh, the son of Donal O'Brien, who was a protection and a rallying post to every one of the queen's people who wished to avail themselves of it; when they and Torlogh met, they laid siege to Cathair-Mionain, in the barony of Coreomroe; that town was a den for thieves, and a cover for insurgents, to which all the plunder and prey of the surrounding country were conveyed, to Torlogh, the son of Murrough, son of Conor O'Brien, a gentleman who was at that time in alliance with the Irish; that town was obliged to be surrendered to the queen's people. Torlogh and Theobald left Cathair-Mionain, with their force, and proceeded into western Corebaisein (barony of Moyarta), to make peace with Teige Caoch Mac Mahon, and when they could not pacify him, they carried off much prey and booty from the country; they then proceeded to eastern Corebaisein (barony of Clonderlaw), and afterwards to Ennis, where they held a session for fifteen days, and the gentlemen of the country and of the county in general attended them; at the end of that period, Theobald Dillon and captain Lyster quitted the country, having left four companies of soldiers, a sheriff, and sub-sheriff, in it, and they also established an acknowledgement of the queen's rent. The earl of Thomond, in a week after that, came to the country, after having been nearly a quarter of a year in the country of the Butlers; when he arrived in Thomond, he proceeded, without sleeping two nights in any one town, to take revenge of Teige Caoch Mac Mahon, for the dishonour inflicted, and the attack made by him on his brother; the greater portion of the people of the country joined him to march into western Corebaisein, and he laid siege to Carrigaholt, on the Monday before Easter, in the month of April precisely; the property and cattle of the entire country, from Knoek Doire to Leim-Cueulainn (Loop Head, at the mouth of the Shannon), were brought to him to that camp; in four days after the earl took the castle, and at the end of the Easter holidays he got some ordnance brought from Limerick, to lay siege to Dun-Beag (Dunbeg in the parish of Killard, barony of Ibrickane, county of Clare), and having planted the ordnance against the castle, the guards did not wait for one shot being fired at them when they surrendered the castle to the earl, and they got quarter only during the time they were being conveyed to Garmain-na-Croiche (the scaffold of the gallows), where they were hanged together in couples. The earl obtained Dunmore-Mie-an-Fhearmacagh (Dunmore, in the parish of Killard), after the same manner. After the earl took those castles of the Coreobasknians, he sent the large ordnance back to Limerick, and he himself proceeded across the mountain eastward, to the centre of Thomond; he restored to the rightful inheritors every town which had been taken to the dishonour of the queen, and of those were Doire-Eoghain, the two towns of the castle of Clonie, and Lios-Aodha-Finn (Lisfin-Castle, near Tullagh, county of Clare),

Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, came to Ireland about May of this year, as had been promised, with a great deal of treasure, arms, ammunition, powder, lead, provisions, and drink, and those who beheld them have stated that so great an army had never come into Ireland till that time, since the earl Strongbow and Robert Fitz-Stephen came with Dermot Mae Murrough, king of Leinster, in former days. When the earl of Essex arrived in Dublin, many things were proclaimed to be done by him, and the first of those was, that every one of the Irish who was sorry for having gone in opposition to the queen should receive forgiveness and pardon, in every crime they had committed till then; amongst the same proposals was, that any of the men of Ireland who would assert that his castle (or town), or estate, had been taken from him by the Saxons, through oppression or violence, that a restitution should be made for the illegality of the same against him, and that he would be favourably heard on that occasion; but, however, not many of the Clanna-Gael (Irish), availed themselves of that invitation. Garrisons of soldiers, with all necessary stores, were sent by that earl to Carrickfergus, to Newry, to Dundalk, to Drogheda, to Wicklow, to Naas of Leinster and several other towns besides. Having mustered seven thousand soldiers of the best he could select of the army, he marched from Dublin westward directly, for he was informed that there was not in Ireland, of those who were plundering the queen, a party which could be more easily attacked by him than the Geraldines, situated as they were on that occasion. The earl and his forces did not halt until they arrived in the very centre of the province of Leinster, and to attack the Irish of the province of Leinster on that occasion was not as if he were amongst friends in a distant country; these were Donal Spaineach (Donal the Spaniard or Spanish), the son of Donogh, son of Cahir Carrach Cavanagh; Anthony, the son of Rory Oge, son of Rory O'Moore; the O'Conors Faily; the tribe of Rannall (O'Byrnes), and many other gentlemen who are not recorded. These parties made desperate fierce attacks, and severe and irresistible onsets on him, in intricate places and narrow passes in which they encountered each other, and great numbers of the earl's people were destroyed; but, however, after sustaining all the injuries he encountered, he at length arrived in the country of the Butlers. The earl of Ormond came and waited on him with due honor and respect, and also the lord of Mountgarrett, namely, Edmond, the son of Richard, son of Pierce Butler, who had been in alliance with O'Neill previous to that time. When the Butlers joined the earl, they proceeded with all their forces into the Third of Clonmel (the barony of Iffa and Offa, in Tipperary), and they laid siege to Cathair-Duine-Iasgaidh (Cahir castle). Thomas, the son of Theobald, son of Pierce Butler, was the lord of that town, and he was for some time previous to that in alliance with O'Neill and the earl of Desmond; the siege carried on by the earl and his forces was of no avail to them, until they brought some large ordnance from Waterford against it, by which the nearest half to them of the castle was demolished, after which they were obliged to surrender the town to the earl of Essex and the queen. In the days on which the earl of Essex laid siege to Cahir, the president of the two provinces of Munster, namely, sir Thomas Norris, came from Cork to Kilmallock to wait on the earl, before he should come to Limerick; he resided nearly a fortnight in that town waiting for the earl to come across the Suir, and he was in the habit of scouring the hills of the county of Limerick every other day in the hope of slaying or taking prisoners some of the queen's enemies; on one of those days, on which he proceeded to the border of the country, he happened to fall in with Thomas Burke, the son of Theobald, son of William, son of Edmond of Castleconnell, without either being in search of the other; Thomas had near a hundred Irish soldiers along with him, but none on horseback excepting himself; the president, on beholding him, made a determined active attack on him, and nearly twenty of Thomas's people were slain on that occasion, and many more would have been cut down, were it not that the president happened to be wounded, for he was directly struck by the thrust of a pike, which he received between the jaw-bone and the upper part of the neck; when his people saw him wounded in that manner, they surrounded him, and conveyed him back to Kilmallock, where he was confined for six weeks under the hands of doctors, until he died, in the month of July precisely¹.

A. D. 1599.

1. Battles in Munster and Death of Norris.—Sir Thomas Norris, above mentioned, president of Munster, was brother of sir John Norris, whose campaigns in Ulster, against Hugh O'Neill, have been recorded at the years 1595-96, in the Annals. According to Mac Geoghegan, sir Thomas Norris, at the head of 2,500 men, marched from Cork towards Kilmallock, but was attacked at a place called Berrach Abharra by William Burke, who repulsed him, killed many of his men, and took his baggage. Norris afterwards advanced to Kilmallock, but, on his return, was attacked at Ard-Sciath by the earl of Desmond, Butler, viscount Mountgarrett, and Butler, baron of Cahir, Purcell, baron of Loughmoe, William Burke, and captain Richard Tyrrell, who pursued his forces during the entire day, for eight miles of his march, and slew great num-

When Cahir was taken by the earl of Essex, he himself, along with the earl of Ormond and the officers of the army, proceeded to Limerick, and he formed his camp outside of Limerick. The governor of the province of Connaught, namely, sir Conyers Clifford, together with the earl of Clanrickard, i.e. Ulick, the son of Rickard Saxanaeh, and the earl of Thomond, namely, Donogh, the son of Conor O'Brien, joined him at that town; when those nobles concluded their consultation together, the governor and the earl of Clanrickard returned back into Connaught, and the earl of Essex, along with the earl of Ormond and the earl of Thomond, prepared to march into Munster, in the hope of obtaining an opportunity of attacking the Geraldines; the first night after leaving Limerick, in the month of June, they encamped on the banks of the river of Adare; on their march westward through Moin-Robhair, on the following day, being a Saturday, the common soldiers and officers of the earl of Desmond, and the Geraldine forces, showed them their faces, and fierce and grim was the welcome and reception they gave their sovereign's viceroy, on his first visit to them, for they shot a cloud and smoke of black powder, and a shower of balls from their sure-aiming guns, into their eyes; he also heard the loud shouts, cries, and clamour of the commanders and champions, instead of the submission, honour, and the mild and bland expressions which should be used towards him; but, however, the result of that conflict was, that immense numbers of the earl of Essex's forces were destroyed, and he was not allowed to make any progress of note on that day, and he encamped at a short distance to the east of Askeaton. On the following day, being on Sunday, the resolution the earl of Essex, together with the earl of Ormond and the earl of Thomond, came to was, to send a cavalry force to put ammunition into Askeaton, and themselves to proceed no farther westward into

Munster on that occasion. On their return eastward on the following day, being Monday, near Baile-an-Eletraigh, they got a strenuous hard fight, and a slaughtering dangerous conflict from the Geraldines, and an immense number of the earl of Essex's forces were slain on that day, together with a noble knight of great fame and renown, namely, sir Henry Norris; the earl of Essex went after that to Kilmallock, and, after having remained in that town for three nights, he directed his course southward to Ceann-Feabhra of Slieve Caoin of the son of Dearn Dnalach, (a mountain in the barony of Coshlea, county of Limerick, towards the borders of Cork), to pass into Roche's Country (Fermoy, in Cork); and when it was supposed he would go to Cork, the direction he proceeded in was across Ath-Mainistreech-Fearmaighe (the Ford of the monastery of Fermoy), through Conachail, through Moy-Ile, and to Lios-mor-Mochuda, (i. e. Lismore in Waterford, where a monastery was founded in the 7th century, by St. Carthach or Mochuda). The Geraldines continued following and shooting them, attacking, pursuing, slaughtering and wounding them along that distance. When the earl of Essex arrived in the Desies (in Waterford), the Geraldine forces returned with great joy and gladness to their own countries and homes, and when the same earl came to Dungarvan, the earl of Thomond departed from him along the sea to Eechoill (Youghal) to Cork, and from thence to Limerick. The earl of Essex proceeded from Dungarvan to Waterford, from thence into the country of the Butlers, and into Leinster, and their march through every place they passed from Waterford to Dublin, was not fortunate, for the Irish of Leinster were pursuing and attacking them, surrounding and circumventing them, so that they slew and destroyed immense numbers of them in every way and direction through which they bers before they reached Kilmallock. Norris made another expedition, with 2,400 foot and 300 horse, against the lord Roche of Fermoy, who being joined by Donal Mac Carthy of Desmond, and Dermot and William O'Connor of Kerry, their combined forces amounted to 2,500 foot and about 100 horse; both armies continued skirmishing for 12 days, but Norris, having at length resolved to return to Cork, was pursued by the Irish, who killed 200 of his men at Monaster-mu-Mona. Some time after this, Thomas Burke, brother to the baron of Castleconnell, having left the queen's party, joined the Irish, and got from Redmond Burke the command of 200 men, with whom he proceeded to attack some places held by the English in Musery Cuire, now Clanwilliam, in Tipperary, and having encountered Norris at Killtilli, at the head of 1,200 men, he valiantly attacked him, and Norris, as above-mentioned, being wounded in the neck with the thrust of a spear, by a young man named John Burke, the English forces gave way when they saw their leader fall, and many of them were slain. Norris, being mortally wounded, died in 15 days after at Kilmallock, not at Mallow, as mentioned by Cox and Mac Geoghagan; the place where Norris was killed, called Killtilli, is Kiltelly or Listecley, near Pallasgreen, in the county of Limerick.

passed; and the Irish were in the habit of saying that it were better for him he had not gone on that expedition from Dublin to Hy-Conaill-Gaura (the baronies of Connello, in Limerick), as he was obliged to return back after the first conflict which was maintained against him, without receiving obedience or submission from the Geraldines, and without having accomplished, in his progress, any achievement worth notice, except the taking of Cahir-Dun-Iasgaidh.² O'Connor Sligo, namely, Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, was along with the earl of Essex in that army, till their march from Munster, as we have stated, and on their return eastward from the Connelloes, to the county of Limerick, it was there O'Connor parted with them, and he proceeded to Connaught, to the governor sir Conyers Clifford. O'Connor had none of all his towns in the county of Sligo under his controul at that time, except one castle belonging to the Mac Donoghs of Tirerrill, which stood near the borders

2. Expedition of the earl of Essex to Munster.—Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, earlmarshal of England, came to Ireland as lord lieutenant, and landed at Dublin on the 15th of April, 1599, accompanied, says Borlase, with many of the prime gentlemen of England. He had, says Cox, "an army as great and as well furnished as his heart could desire for that service, being at first 16,000 foot, and 1300 horse, but afterwards increased to 20,000 men complete." The annalists say that so great an army did not come to Ireland since the days of Strongbow. Essex sent part of his forces to different garrisons in Ulster, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, he dispatched 3000 men to assist sir Conyers Clifford, in Connaught, in his contests with Red Hugh O'Donnell, and he placed 3000 foot and 500 horse under the command of sir Henry Harrington, to act against the O'Conors, O'Moores, O'Byrnes, O'Tooles, O'Cavenaghs, and other chiefs in Leinster. Some of the Irish chiefs joined Essex, and on these he conferred the honour of knights of the Golden Spur. According to Cox, Mac Geoghegan, and others, Essex himself, with the main body of his army, amounting to 7000 foot and 900 horse, and accompanied by 300 knights and gentlemen, set out from Dublin on the 20th of May, on his march to Munster; the cavalry was commanded by Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton.

Battle of the Pass of Plumes.—Essex marched through Kildare into Leix, on his way to Kilkenny and Tipperary. The celebrated chieftain Anthony O'Moore, of whom an account has been given at p. 632, not Owen O'Moore, as stated by several writers, determined to oppose his progress, posted in a woody defile 500 of his clansmen, who suddenly attacked from their ambuscade the troops of Essex in the rear, and in a fierce conflict cut off about 500 of the English, and many officers. The place where this battle was fought was afterwards called Bearn-na-g-Cleiteach, signifying the Pass of Plumes, from the great quantity of plumes collected, which had decorated the helmets of the English knights slain there. This conflict is considered to have taken place within a few miles of Maryborough, in the Queen's county. It is above stated in the Annals, at p. 647, that many attacks were made on the troops of Essex in their progress, and there were at least 700 of them slain by the O'Moores, O'Conors, &c., in those various conflicts.

Siege of Cahir.—Essex next advanced into Kilkenny, and thence into Tipperary, and besieged Cahir castle, on the river Suir, which belonged to Thomas Butler, baron of Cahir, who was against the queen. The earl of Desmond, Redmond, and William Burke, together with James Butler, brother of the baron, according to Mac Geoghegan, came with their forces, and had several skirmishes with the troops of Essex, of whom many were slain; they thus retarded the siege, but the small garrison, having no artillery, and the cannon of Essex playing on them, the castle was surrendered, after a siege of ten days; this attack on the castle of Cahir is mentioned at p. 647 in these Annals. Essex placed a garrison in it, but in about two months after, according to Cox, the castle was retaken by James Butler, who put the English garrison to the sword.

Battles at Askeaton, &c.—These battles are mentioned at p. 648 in the Annals. The earl of Essex next proceeded to Limerick, where his progress was opposed by the forces of the Geraldines, commanded by James Fitzgerald, earl of Desmond, who was in alliance with O'Neill, and was commonly called the Suga earl; Donal Mac Carthy More, Redmond Burke, and other chiefs, also joined Desmond; and the Irish, according to Mac Geoghegan, had 2,500 men. Essex was joined by the earls of Thomond and Ormond, and the first engagement above-mentioned in the Annals, took place between Adare and Askeaton, and the second between Askeaton and Croom, at a place called in the Annals Baile-an-Eletraigh, and by Mac Geoghegan Baile-en-Finitere, which is probably Ballinelety, near Askeaton. At this place, according to Mac Geoghegan, the battle was very bloody, and lasted from 9 in the morning 'till 5 in the evening, and great numbers of the English were slain, together with sir Henry Norris, a valiant commander. Essex, after this engagement, encamped for a few days at Croom, and then marched towards Waterford; but Mac Geoghegan says, he was pursued and harrassed during six days by the Catholic army. In these battles, and several others alluded to in the Annals, many hundreds of the forces of Essex were slain by the Geraldines and the Irish chiefs.

Battles in Leix, Offaley, &c.—Sir Henry Harrington marched with his forces into Leix, against the O'Moores, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, the English were defeated in a great battle, and 1,200 of them slain, with all their officers, and amongst the rest Adam Loftus, son of the archbishop of Dublin. Another great victory was gained over Harrington by the O'Byrnes, in the glens of Wicklow, after which, Essex, to punish the English troops for want of courage, had them decimated. At this time, according to Mac Geoghegan, Christopher Blanche was sent to Ireland as marshal, and marched with his forces into Offaley, or King's county; but he was met by the O'Conors, and a fierce engagement ensued, in which the English were defeated, and 500 of their cavalry slain; the marshal himself escaped with difficulty, having his leg broken in the battle.

The earl of Essex continued some time in Cork, deeply affected by the success of his arms. Mac Geoghegan says he wrote a letter to the English council, which was intercepted by the Irish, and in it was the following passage: "I am confined in Cork, where there is an abundance of warlike stores, but still I have been unsuccessful; my undertakings have been attended with misfortune, and I do not know to what this can be attributed, except to an evil star that has led me here." Essex, seeing his forces discomfited on all sides in various engagements, set forward on his return to Dublin, but on his progress through Leinster, in Wexford, Carlow, and Kildare, he was pursued and harassed by the Irish clans, under the Mac Marroghs, O'Cavenaghs, O'Tooles, O'Byrnes, and O'Moores, who, in various conflicts, as mentioned in the Annals, cut off great numbers of his men, and ultimately the earl effected his retreat to Dublin, where he arrived, towards the end of July, with a shattered remnant of his forces. Of the select army of 8000 men, with which Essex set out on this expedition, together with the troops under Harrington, amounting to more than 3000, about 5000 of them were slain by the Irish, in the various battles in Leinster and Munster. Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, says that Essex, understanding the queen was angry at his fruitless expedition into Munster, attributed the fault to the council, and on his return he found his army so impaired, that he and the council joined in a letter for the supply of 1000 men.

of the great river (Ballysadare river, near Sligo), the name of which is Collooney. O'Connor having remained a short time with the governor, he then proceeded, by day and night, until he reached that town, in the month of July precisely; when O'Connor arrived at Collooney, some cattle belonging to O'Donnell's people which were throughout the country at that time, were brought to O'Connor at that town, unnoticed by their owners. When O'Donnell was informed of that affair, he was glad that O'Connor had come to the country, and he was pleased with what he did, in order that he might be revenged of him for all his bad deeds before that time. O'Donnell commanded his cavalry forces not to wait for their foot soldiers, until they reached the castle, lest O'Connor might be able to leave the town before the arrival of the forces; this was accordingly done for him, for truly his commands durst not be disobeyed; the horse forces then proceeded, as expeditiously as they possibly could, until they arrived at the town, and the main force followed quickly, and formed themselves into a circle of encompassment around the fortress. That castle was an impregnable stronghold, and it was not easy to watch the person who would be inclined to leave it, for the place where it was situated was near to intricate fastnesses. O'Donnell encamped in the outskirts of a wood which lay on the other side of the river, in front of the town; companies of guards and sentinels were appointed by him, both by day and night, to watch in every direction about the fortress, and large troops of cavalry were kept always mounted on guard from the dusk of the evening to the following morning, in order that O'Connor might not escape from them. These reports spread throughout Ireland, viz., that O'Connor Sligo was placed in that predicament by O'Donnell at Collooney, and when the earl of Essex was informed of that affair, he sent dispatches to the governor of the province of Connaught (sir Conyers Clifford), and he commanded him to come to meet him on a certain day in Fercall (O'Molloy's territory, in the King's county). The governor sustained great loss and opposition on his march through Fercall to meet the earl, for a great number of his common soldiers and officers were slain, and among those was Richard, the son of William, son of Richard, son of Oliver Burke, a gentleman of the Burkes of Trawley; and the governor himself was in danger of being slain; but, however, he reached the earl, and they remained for two days and nights together in consultation; at the termination of that period, the earl sent additional forces and soldiers with the governor, and he commanded him, that, after his arrival at the town of Athlone, to request Theobald of the Ships, the son of Richard of the Iron, son of Edmond, son of Ulick (Burke); Murrough-na-Maor, the son of Donal of the War, son of Gilladuff O'Flaherty, and the forces of Galway, to convey the provisions and drink, and their machinery for erecting castles, which had come from England to Galway, round along the headlands and coasts northward, to the harbour of Sligo, and the governor himself, with all his forces, to proceed by land, by the most direct roads, until he should arrive at Collooney, and to relieve and release O'Connor Sligo from the strait and predicament in which he was placed by O'Donnell; the earl also commanded the governor not to return back until he had erected a strong impregnable castle in Sligo, that would always resist the Ultonians. The governor, having undertaken to have all these things executed, took his leave of the earl, and proceeded to the town of Athlone, and he enjoined Theobald of the Ships, Murrough-na-Maor, and the people of Galway, that they should proceed by shipping along the coast of Ireland directly from the west to Sligo; they did not neglect these instructions, for they prepared to come, without delay or cessation, and sailed with their fleet along the right hand side of the land, until they entered the harbour of Sligo, from the west, where they remained, as they were ordered, until they should receive information about the forces. The governor himself proceeded to Roscommon, and he mustered all the English and Irish under his controul in the adjoining districts, who were in the service of the queen; of those were the sons of the earl of Clanrickard, namely, Rickard, baron of Dunkellin, and Thomas; O'Connor Don, i. e. Hugh, the son of Dermod, son of Carbry; Theobald Dillon, and Mae Sweeney of the Tuatha, namely, Maolmurry, the son of Murrough Mall, son of Owen Oge, who was plundering and in opposition to O'Donnell, in alliance with the governor at that time. They afterwards proceeded from Roscommon to Tulsk, and they had twenty-eight colours of soldiers on their departure from that town, on the Sunday before Lammas (the Sunday before the 1st of August), precisely ; the governor, with his forces, arrived before noon of that day at the monastery of Boyle, where they remained to make preparations for the general march, which they finally made. As to O'Donnell, when he succeeded in establishing and confirming the siege against the fortress in which O'Connor was to his satisfaction, so that none would be suffered to go into or come out of the castle, he left Niall Garv O'Donnell in command of those who were carrying on the siege, and having given him directions in every thing necessary to be done, he himself marched with his forces to Coir-Shliabh-na-Scaghsa (the Curlew mountains, on the borders of Sligo and Roscommon), and he encamped there, in order to prevent the foreign army from crossing it unawares, for, from the first time he received intelligence of the governor's intended march towards him, by command of the earl of Essex, he was in wait, and on the look out for him, for the space of two months, till the 15th of August, on the borders of Bealach-Buidhe (the Yellow Pass), on the north side of the Curlew mountain ; but, however, his forces were dispersed and separated from him, in various places, viz.. a party of them besieging the castle in which O'Connor was, a portion of them stationed before Theobald of the Ships, and the forementioned fleet, and others of them guarding the passes from Lough Kea, at the eastern extremity of Seghais (the Curlew mountain), to Loch-Teicheat (Lough O'Gara, in Sligo), at the western extremity of Seghais. His chiefs and counsellors told O'Donnell that they had not a force sufficient to oppose the English in battle, as they had not their troops collected together, but he considered their opinion of little weight or consequence, and said, that it is not by a host of men a battle is gained, but whoever confides in the power of God, and has justice on his side, it is he that must conquer and gain the victory over his enemies. O'Donnell continued in that manner till the 15th of August, as we have stated, and that was the anniversary of the day on which the Virgin Mary yielded her spirit, and he fasted with abstinence in honour of the blessed Virgin Mary, as he was accustomed to do ; a Mass was celebrated for him, and the forces in general, and after making his confession, and rigidly repenting of his sins, he received the Eucharist, and he commanded his forces to pray to God fervently for the salvation of their souls, in the first place, and to deliver them from the great danger which awaited them by the English. During the time the governor remained at the monastery of Boyle, he was preparing and threatening, declaring and boasting, every day, against the northerners, and promising he would cross the mountain northward, despite of them, and he marched on that day to perform what he had promised. When O'Donnell received intelligence of that affair, he commanded his forces to be assembled in one place, to be reviewed, and put in order, and after they were inspected in ranks, he then divided his forces into two bodies. He arranged his swift and active men, his nimble and expert soldiers (the kerns), and his shooting parties (musketeers), on one side, with their loud-reporting, sure-aiming guns, their forcible, smooth-stringed arrows (the archers), their blood-drawing sharp spears, and all other kinds of missile weapons ; he appointed fighting chieftains, and battle-maintaining warriors, to command over the men, in closing, pressing, and leading them on to the conflict, and to push them on to fight from the rear, whenever their weapons became relaxed ; he placed his chiefs, and champions, and steady soldiers (the galloglasscs), on the other side, with their strong, well-tempered, sharp swords, and well-shaped, keen-edged battle-axes, and well-trieed, large-headed spears, to maintain the force of battle ; he also converted his cavalry into foot soldiers, and distributed them amongst his warriors, on account of the difficulty of the ground before them. O'Donnell having disposed his men in that manner, he commanded the shooting party to advance, before the others, to meet the foreign forces, to fight and shoot them before they would come across the difficult part of the mountain, and that he would be with the other party at a certain place prepared to give them battle, where he was sure of overcoming them ; for it was easier to defeat them, after they had been first disabled by that party. O'Donnell had watching, every day, a number of sentinels, who were concealed on the brow of the mountain, in order that the foreign force might not pass it unnoticed ; a party of them happened to have been there that day, who were reconnoitering at a distance the monastery, and those who were in it ; while they were thus watching, they perceived the forces taking their arms, raising their standards, blowing their trumpets, and mustering for general battle; they sent speedy information of this to O'Donnell, who, as soon as he heard it, commanded the party he had directed to take the lead in the pass to proceed, with all possible speed, onwards, to engage with the English before they should come across the intricate parts of the slopes of the mountain; they then proceeded as they were directed, with great ardour, and each man of them having the courage of a champion, they quickly reached the brow of the mountain, before the English; O'Donnell followed them steadily, with a slow pace, attended by the steady warriors, and faithful and strong heroes whom he had selected about him, until they arrived at the particular place in which they were sure they would meet the English, where they halted to encounter them. As to the advanced force, which was commanded to take the van, they continued to proceed in the way to meet the foreign battalions, until they confronted them; when they came close to each other, the Irish cast forth at them destructive showers of well-formed, ash-handled darts, flights of sharp-pointed arrows, from their long and powerfully effective bows, and thick volleys of red flaming flashes, and of hot fiery balls of lead, from their perfectly straight and sure-aiming guns. These shooting volleys were answered by the English soldiers, and their reports and echoes, and resounding noise, were heard in the woods and waters, and in the castles and stone buildings of the neighbouring districts; it was a wonder that the faint-hearted, and even the brave, did not fly from the attack and conflict, on hearing the battle clangour, and the echoing and resounding of the powerful firing. Champions were pierced, and heroes slain on either side between them; their chieftains in the fight, and their leaders in the conflict, commanded O'Donnell's people not to remain standing before the foreigners, but to circumvent and surround them on all sides, on which they closed around them on every side as they were commanded, and they continued to cut them down fiercely and actively, and without reserve, until they subdued their battle courage in them in all directions, by the closeness and vehemence of the conflict; but, however, the English at length turned their backs to the powerful men of the North, and the few in number defeated the hosts of hundreds, and precipitately were the English routed back to the same place from whence they had come; their flight was so pressing, that not one of them looked back for friend or relative, and did not know whether any of those they had left behind them was dead or alive, after they once turned their backs to their enemies; and not one of them would have escaped to tell the tale, were it not that those who routed and pursued them were fewer in number, for it was impossible for them to cut down all those in their power, on account of the greatness and vastness of the numbers who were flying before them; but, however, they did not cease from pursuing them until they went within the walls of the monastery from which they had previously come. O'Rourke happened to have been at that time on the eastern side of the Curlew mountain, in a separate camp, and he had promised O'Donnell that he would be ready to attack the English, in conjunction with all others, whenever the opportunity should offer. When he heard the loud sounding of the trumpets and drums, the great reports, and the resounding along the earth of the powerful firing, he prepared to proceed from his camp with his warriors, and they having put on their battle-arms, they did not halt in their quick progress until they arrived at the place where O'Donnell's forces were fighting the battle, and they commenced cutting and shooting the champions, in conjunction with the others, until the warriors lost a vast number of heads and weapons. The governor, sir Conyers Clifford, was slain, together with an immense number of English and Irish, and it was in the beginning of the engagement he was laid prostrate on the mountain, mortally wounded, and the soldiers were ignorant who first wounded him; but, however, it was by a ball which passed through him, and none of the soldiers recognised him until O'Rourke at length came to the place where he was, and discovered that it was the governor, and he gave orders to behead him; this was accordingly done, so that he was a mangled trunk after his head was taken off. The person who was slain there was greatly lamented, and it was grievous to have treated him so ignominiously. The Irish of the province of Meva (Connaught), were not happy at his death, for he was a bestower of precious gifts and property to them, and he stated no falsehood of them; it was not to one place that the governor was conveyed, from the field of battle, for his body was brought to be buried to the island of the Trinity on Lough Kea, in the barony of Moylurg (barony of Boyle), in the county of Roscommon, and his head was afterwards carried to Collooney, in the barony of Tirerill, in the county of Sligo. After the defeated party had escaped to the monastery, O'Donnell's people returned back, carrying with them the heads and military weapons of their enemies; and having retired to their encampments with great joy and gladness, they offered up thanksgivings to God and the Blessed Virgin Mary for their victory; and the unanimous voice of the men was, that it was not by the force of arms the English were defeated, but through the miracles of God, and the supplications of O'Donnell and his forces, after he had received the pure essence of the body and blood of Christ, in the beginning of that day, after the fast which he had kept the previous day, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary. As to the English, after O'Donnell's people returned, they took to the road, with all expedition, such of them as survived, until they arrived at their homes in grief and sorrow. O'Donnell's people remained in their tents that night, and they buried all those that were slain on their side; when they learned that the English had fled back, they proceeded to the castle of Collooney, where they had left the siege carrying on against O'Connor. When O'Connor was informed of the defeat and fall of sir Conyers Clifford, in the battle of the Curlew mountains, he did not believe it, until the head of the governor was shown to him; when he beheld the head he gave up all hope of being rescued from imprisonment, and what he did was, to come forth and surrender at the mercy of O'Donnell, and he made his submission to him; that was a good resolution for him, for O'Donnell put him in the possession and government of his country, and he presented him with many gifts of horses, cattle, and all sorts of property, so that after that he possessed his country³.

3. Battle of the Curlew Mountains.—The Curlew mountains are situated on the borders of Roscommon and Sligo, about two miles north of the town of Boyle, in Moylurg, or Mac Dermott's Country. These mountains, called by the Irish Cor-Slieve, are celebrated in Irish history, their passes being in ancient times the scene of many great battles, several of which have been recorded in the course of these Annals. This battle was fought on the 15th of August, 1599, and is described by the various Irish and Anglo-Irish historians, from whom the following particulars have been collected. The Irish were commanded by Red Hugh O'Donnell, and by Bryan O'Rourke, lord of West Brehney, or Leitrim; this Bryan was son of the celebrated chief Bryan-na-Murtha O'Rourke, who, having gone to Scotland for some auxiliaries, was treacherously taken prisoner by King James VI., afterwards James I., of England, who sent him to London to queen Elizabeth by whose order he was confined in the Tower, afterwards tried, and hanged at Tyburn; an account of his death has been given at the year 1591, in these Annals. Amongst the chiefs who commanded on the side of O'Donnell were sir John O'Dogherty of Inisowen, Owen Mac Sweeney, and O'Gallagher of Donegal, and Conor Mac Dermott, chief of Moylurg. O'Donnell assembled his forces at Ballymote, and sent, says Mac Geoghegan, a garrison of 400 foot, under Mac Sweeney of Fanat and Mac William Burke, to Sligo, to secure that town against Theobald of the Ships, who was in alliance with the English, and sailed towards it with a fleet from Galway; he also sent 200 horse, under Niall Garv O'Donnell, to blockade Donogh O'Connor Sligo, who then held the castle of Collooney for the queen. These detachments reduced O'Donnell's forces to about 1,500 men; having possessed himself of the defiles of the Curlew mountains, he had many large trees felled, and placed on the passes to obstruct the advance of the English. O'Donnell then encamped on the adjoining plain; his forces consisted, as usual, of Kerns and galloglasses, with some bodies of musketeers and archers, whose weapons are well described in the Annals. He had some troops of cavalry, which he dismounted and ordered to fight on foot, as they could not otherwise act with advantage on the slopes of the mountain. Sir Conyers Clifford, governor of Connaught, marched with the British forces from Athlone to Tulsk, and thence to Boyle, where he was joined by the garrison of that town, and determined to attack O'Donnell, and assist his ally O'Connor Sligo. His army, according to Mac Geoghegan and others, amounted to 2,500 foot, with some squadrons of cavalry. It is above stated in the Annals that he had 28 colours, and as each company, which usually consisted of 100 men, bore a colour, the entire of the British forces, and their Irish auxiliaries, amounted to about 2,800 men. The following were the officers under Clifford: sir Alexander Radcliffe, who led the van guard, and sir Arthur Savage, who brought up the rear; Richard Burke, baron of Dunkellin, son of the earl of Clanrickard, commanded in the centre; sir Griffin Markam, and captain John Jephson, commanded lord Southampton's cavalry; colonel Theobald Dillou, baron of Kilkenny West, in Westmeath; sir John Harrington, captains Lyster, Cosby, and Oliver Burke, were also commanders. Several of the Irish chiefs, with their forces, also joined Clifford, as Hugh O'Connor Don, and O'Connor Roe of Rosecommon; Maolmora Mac Sweeney, and sir John Mac Sweeney, who, in consequence of some quarrels, revolted from O'Donnell, though before that time the Mac Sweenys always fought on his side. On the morning of the battle, O'Donnell addressed to his men on the mountain an animating harangue, in the Irish language, the substance of which is given by Taaffe, from O'Sullivan Beare, in which are the following passages—"The great dispenser of eternal justice has already doomed to destruction those assassins, who have butchered our wives and our children, plundered us of our properties, set fire to our habitations, demolished our churches, and monasteries, and who have changed the face of Ireland into a wild uncultivated desert. On this day, more particularly, I trust to heaven for protection, a day dedicated to the greatest of all saints, whom these enemies of religion endeavour to vilify; a day on which we have purified our consciences to defend honestly the cause of justice, against men whose hands are reeking with blood, and who, not content with driving us from our native plains, come to hunt us like wild beasts into the mountains of Dunaveeragh. But, brave Irishmen, you burn for revenge. Scorning the advantage of this impregnable situation, let us rush down, and show the world, that, guided by the Lord of life and death, we exterminated those oppressors of the human race. He who falls will fall gloriously, fighting for justice, for liberty, and for his native land; his name will be remembered, while there is an Irishman on the face of the earth; and he who survives will be pointed at, as the companion of O'Donnell, and the defender of his country. The congregation shall make way for him at the altar, saying, that hero fought at the battle of Dunaveeragh." The

When Theobald of the Ships received intelligence of the defeat of the English, and of the fall of the governor, and that O'Connor had been released from the castle as we have stated, the resolution he came to was, not to fight against O'Donnell any longer, and he afterwards confirmed his friendship with him, and O'Donnell permitted the fore-mentioned ships to return back again to Galway.

Some gentlemen of the Mac Mahons of Oirgiall (in Monaghan), together with a hundred soldiers, were employed for pay by O'Carroll (of Ely Carroll, in Tipperary, and King's county), namely, Calvach, the son of William Odhar, son of Fear-ganiam, in the spring of this year; and when the time of paying their stipend arrived, O'Carroll and his people went to them by night, and slew them on their sleeping places, and in their inns; some of them were hanged on the nearest trees to him, but, however, a party of a town of them escaped, despite of O'Carroll.

After the president of the two provinces of Munster and the governor of the province of Connaught,

British forces advanced from Boyle towards the mountain, in the morning, and, about 11 o'clock, the conflict commenced, and continued for a considerable time very fiercely on both sides. Sir Alexander Radcliffe, at the head of his men, made some advance up the hill, towards a bog and wood, from which he was attacked by the Irish, and, after fighting about an hour and a half, it is said Radcliffe's men had expended their powder and shot, and the van guard, pressed on by the Irish, wavered, wheeled about, and were routed on all sides. Radcliffe received a wound in the face, and another in the leg, and was soon after slain. The van guard being routed, sir Conyers Clifford himself endeavoured to animate his men to the contest, and laboured to rally them by his voice and example, but in vain, and the brave veteran, rushing onward, was shot through the body with a ball, and slain in the thick of battle. Sir Griffin Markham was shot through the arm and nearly killed. Sir John Harrington (the translator of Ariosto), who was a captain in the queen's service, gives an account of this battle in his Nyna Antiqua, and he and Morrison state, that the cavalry under Jephson gave a desperate charge up the hill, among rocks and bogs, but they were mostly cut to pieces by the fierce onsets of the Irish kerns and galloglasses, and all their colours were taken. The valiant O'Rourke, being posted at a distant part of the mountain, to guard a pass to Sligo, did not arrive on the field till about the middle of the battle, but he then fell on with great fury, animated with the recollection of old wrongs, and revenge for the death of his father; he led on his kerns and galloglasses, and they rushed impetuously down the hill, with terrific shouts and clashing of arms, pouring on the English ranks like a torrent, and they piked and hewed their way through them on all sides, with unrelenting rage, and pursued them with great slaughter. The English were pursued as far as Boyle, where the remnant of their forces found refuge that night, but fearing O'Donnell, they, early the next morning, retreated to Athlone. Morrison says, "but the lord of Duokellin, sir Arthur Savage, captain John Jephson, and many of the best judgement, considering that, as the governor was lost, our troops utterly dismayed, and O'Donnell come down with all his forces into these parts, they thought it our men should retire to their garrisons. So captain Jephson all that night kept the lord (at Boyle), while our foot, in the silent night, retired, and in the morning, when they were in safety, he, with the horse under his command, went softly after them to the castle of Athlone." Mac Geoghegan states, that of the English forces 1,400 were slain, but at least 1,500 fell in the battle and pursuit; and the Four Masters say, that if the pursuers had not been so few in number, as compared to those who fled, that few of the English would have escaped to tell the tale. As to Morrison, Cox, Lelund, and other Anglo-Irish writers, they give most absurd and confused accounts of this battle, and appear to have had no accurate information on the subject, and they did not even know that O'Donnell was the commander. In this battle O'Donnell lost only about 150 or 200 men in killed and wounded. The Irish obtained immense booty, ammunition, arms, armour, colours, horses, &c. Mac Geoghegan says that O'Neill was advancing to assist O'Donnell, but he arrived too late by two days to share in the glory of the victory. The body of sir Conyers Clifford being recognized amidst the slain, O'Rourke had his head cut off, and O'Donnell sent it to the castle of Collooney, to O'Connor Sligo, as the Roman general, to dismay the Carthaginians, had cast before their advanced guards the head of Asdrubal. O'Connor, dismayed at the death of Clifford, surrendered the castle to O'Donnell, and sued for pardon. It is stated by Taaffe, that the day after the battle O'Donnell ordered O'Rourke to pursue O'Connor Don, but O'Rourke refused, saying, "O'Connor Don is my brother-in-law, and I have no enemies but those foreigners and Saxons who murdered my father." O'Donnell himself marched to Ballintober, and O'Connor's clan, awed by his name, forsook their own chief, who had joined Elizabeth. O'Donnell had, it is said, but one piece of artillery, a brass cannon which was sent as a present to him from Spain, and, assisted by O'Connor's men, this gun was placed on the heights of Ballyfinnegan, to batter the castle of Ballintober, when O'Connor surrendered at discretion. O'Donnell generously forgave O'Connor Sligo, and restored him to his possessions, and he and O'Connor Roe gave up the queen's cause, and joined their countrymen; but O'Connor Don took no active part against the English. In D'Alton's Annals of Boyle some interesting particulars are given about this battle, and, amongst other matters, the following letter, which was sent by Mae Dermott to the constable of Boyle, with the body of sir Conyers Clifford, giving permission to have it buried in the monastery of the Holy Trinity at Boyle. Sir John Harrington condenses the Latin as he had, but says the sense was civil. "Constabulario de Boyle salutem. Scias quod ego traduxi corpus Gubernatoris ad Monasterium Sanctae Trinitatis propter ejus dilectionem et alia de causa; si velitis mihi redire neos captivos ex predicto corpore, quod paratus sum ad conferendum vobis ipsum, alias sepultus erit honeste in predicto Monasterio, et sic vale. Scriptum nupud Gaywash 15th August, 1599. Interim pone bonum lineamen ad predictum corpus, et si velitis sepelire omnes alios nobiles non impediam vos erga eos." The Latin is not good, but it may be excused, as written in a hurry on the day of battle, and probably no dictionary at hand, but the purport appears to be as follows: "To the constable of Boyle, health. Know that I have sent the body of the governor to the monastery of the Holy Trinity, out of respect to him, and other reasons; if you wish to restore my prisoners, in exchange for the aforesaid body, I am ready to confer with you on the subject; at all events, the body will be honourably buried in the aforesaid monastery, and so farewell. Written at Gaywash, &c.; in the meantime put good burial clothes on the aforesaid body, and if you wish to bury all the other nobles, I will not prevent you doing so towards them." The celebrated Cistercian abbey of Boyle was founded, and amply endowed, by the Mac Dermotts, lords of Moyburg, and the venerable ruins which still remain show its former magnificence. It appears that, at this time, this ancient abbey was converted into a military depot, and was one of the chief garrisons of the English in Connaught. In May, 1601, according to Fynes Morrison, the lord deputy Mountjoy, and the council, appointed that 1000 foot and 60 horse should be left at the abbey of Boyle, under the command of the earl of Clanrickard, with instructions to infest O'Connor Sligo, and prevent O'Rourke from joining O'Donnell, which served, he says, to further their new plantation at Ballyshannon, where a garrison was placed, and sir Henry Folliott appointed governor.

were slain, as we have stated, in their proper places, the earl of Essex, and O'Neill, i. e. Hugh, the son of Feardorcha, son of Con Bacach, went to meet each other, to hold a conference, on the first days of the month of September, and the result of their conference was, that peace was ratified between them for the space of two months, and that the English and Irish should hold their own places respectively during that period.⁴ When the earl of Essex made peace with O'Neill, on that occasion he proceeded to Dublin, but did not stop long there until he went to England, after having displayed the most splendid regal state ever exhibited by the Saxons in Ireland; he left Ireland without peace, tranquility, lord justice, governor, or president, except alone that he left the care of the sword of state with the chancellor and sir Robert Gardiner. (According to Cox, the lords justices were Adam Loftus, lord chancellor, and sir George Cary, treasurer-at-war). It was not known to any of the Irish whether the earl had left Ireland with the intention of returning back again, or to remain beyond (in England).

O'Kennedy Fionn, namely, Anthony, the son of Donogh Oge, son of Hugh, son of Awlave of Baileui-Eachdach, in Lower Ormond, in the county of Tipperary, died in the month of November, and Giolla Duv O'Kennedy was nominated the O'Kennedy.

Master Neillan, i. e. James, the son of Donal, son of Awlave, son of Donogh O'Neillan, a man who kept a house of general hospitality, and who was skilled in the arts, died in the month of October at Baile-Ui-Aille, in the barony of Quinn (now Bunratty), in the county of Clare.

Castlemaine (in Kerry), was taken by the earl of Desmond, about the November of this year, from the queen's people, on account of the guards being in want of the necessaries of life.

Loch Gair (in the barony of Small County, in Limerick), was also taken by the same earl from the queen's people.

O'Connor Sligo, namely Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, remained in the friendship and alliance of O'Donnell, from the time in which the governor was slain to the end of this year; that was a beneficial change and an advantageous protection against adversity for him to join in that friendship, and abandon the slow, unprofitable promises made to him (by the English) from year to year till then; when O'Connor became obedient to O'Donnell, he gave O'Connor an immense deal of cows, horses, and of every sort of cattle and flocks, also of corn, and of all other necessary things he required to cultivate and inhabit the country, after it had been a waste, without dwellings or habitations, for a long time till then.

O'Donnell went, in the month of December, to make peace between the Clan William (Burkes of Connaught), in their dissensions, viz., between

4. Conference between O'Neill and the earl of Essex.—An account of this conference is given by Camden, Cox, Fynes Morrison, and MacGeoghegan. In the beginning of September, 1599, Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, marched towards Ulster, by Kells and the borders of Cavan, with 2700 horse and 300 foot, against Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone. O'Neill was posted with his forces for several days on the hills in Monaghan, on the borders of Louth and Armagh, and it is said he sent one of his officers, named O'Hagan, to the earl of Essex, requesting a conference on the next day at a ford called Ballaclinch, not far from the town of Louth, and near the castle of Gerald Fleming. Leland says that captain Thomas Lee, an English officer under Essex, acted as internuncio between him and O'Neill; this Lee was author of the celebrated memorial on the state of Ireland addressed to queen Elizabeth, and given in Curry's Civil Wars. Essex having agreed to the interview, sent persons before him to examine the place, and they met O'Neill near the ford, and he informed them that though the river was much swelled by the rains they could easily converse with each other across the stream. Essex came down to the banks of the river alone, having planted a troop of horse on the next hill. O'Neill was on the opposite bank, and boldly rode his horse up to his middle into the river; much conversation passed between himself and Essex for about an hour, but there were no persons within hearing of them. This interview took place about the 7th or 8th of September, according to various accounts; each of the earls returned to their troops, and Con O'Neill, Tyrone's son, following Essex, requested a further conference, which he agreed to, provided the chiefs who came did not exceed six. The earl O'Neill, with his brother Cormac, accompanied by Magennis, Hugh Maguire, Eir Mac Colla Mac Mahon, Niall O'Quinn, and Henry Ovington advanced to the ford. The earl of Essex came down to meet them, attended by the earl of Southampton, sir George Bouchier, sir Warham St. Leger, sir Henry Danvers, sir Edward Wingfield, and sir William Constable. The earls saluted each other with great respect, and, after some conversation, it was agreed that certain deputies should next day treat about peace. It was finally concluded between them, that a truce for six weeks should take place from that day, to be renewed every six weeks 'till the 1st of May, yet so as that both sides should be at liberty, upon 14 days' notice, to renew the war, and if any of O'Neill's confederates refused to consent to this, he should leave him to be pursued by the lord deputy. This conference took place on the river Lagan, which separates Monaghan from Louth, and Garrett Fleming's castle was situated near the Ardee road. In Shirely's History of Farney it is stated that the ford of Ballaclinch is now called Annaghelint, and that it was here the interview took place, though, according to others, it was at Essex Ford, in the parish of Killany, and supposed by some to be on the river Glyde, near the Lagan. It appears that the earl of Essex was on the Louth side, and O'Neill advanced on the Monaghan side of the Lagan, in Farney. The conference between O'Neill and Essex forms the subject of an excellent historical painting by J. E. Doyle, an Irish artist, and was exhibited during the present summer (1846), at the Royal Hibernian Academy.

Mac William, i. e. Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotaeh, and Theobald of the Ships, the son of Richard of the Iron, and after having established peace, he proceeded to march into Clanrickard, but, however, he did not go beyond Oranmore on that occasion, and he encamped for three nights in the vicinity of Machaire Riavaeh and of Galway; a prey was brought to him from the Spaire of the great town (Galway), and although the fear and dread of him were generally felt from that place to Leim-Cueulain (or the Leap of Cueulin, now Loop Head, in Clare), he did nothing more on that occasion, but returned back into Ulster.

The province of Ulster was as a full pool, a well ready to overflow, or an unruffled wave, in this year, without danger of battle, preying, fighting, or capture, from any quarter of Ireland, while, in truth, their terror was over every country.

I. The English Forces in War of Elizabeth.—The kings of England sent immense forces to Ireland, at various times, under different lords-lieutenant, deputies, and marshals, of which accounts have been given in the course of these notes. In 1171, King Henry II., landed at Waterford, with a fleet of 240 ships, and a force of 4,000 cavalry, or men-at-arms, and archers, with 500 Knights. In 1185, prince John, son of king Henry II., came to Ireland with a fleet of 60 ships, and great forces, and landed at Waterford; and again, in A. D. 1209, the same John, being king of England, landed at Waterford, with a great fleet and army, for the reduction of Ireland. In 1394, king Richard II., having resolved on the conquest of Ireland, collected an immense army, and landed at Waterford, with a fleet of 200 sail, and a force of thirty-four thousand soldiers, consisting of 4,000 cavalry, or men-at-arms, and 30,000 archers, besides a great number of Knights and noblemen. King Richard returned to England the following year, after having obtained the submission of some of the Irish princes and chiefs. In 1399, king Richard again invaded Ireland, and landed at Waterford, with a great fleet and an immense army, amounting to between thirty and forty thousand men, but great numbers of his forces were cut off in various conflicts with the Irish chiefs of Leinster, under Art Mac Murrough, king of that province; Richard returned to England in the same year, without effecting the conquest of the country. These were the greatest armies that had ever before invaded Ireland, and accounts of these expeditions have been given at p. 191 in these notes. The various lords-lieutenant and deputies who came to Ireland from the time of Henry II., to the reign of Elizabeth, were all generally accompanied with forces from England, varying from 500 to 1000, or 2000 men; but, during the reign of Elizabeth, more numerous forces were sent for the reduction of Ireland than at any other period. An account of the forces which came to Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth is given in Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, in Mac Geoghegan's Ireland, and other histories, but of the last six years of the war, from 1596 to 1602, a more particular account is given in Fynes Morrison's Ireland. O'Sullivan Beare also gives a full account of the war, for the last fifteen years of the reign of Elizabeth; and of the two last years an account is given in Carew's Pacata Hibernia. Borlase, in his Reduction of Ireland, also gives an account of the forces which came to Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth. In 1559, Thomas Radcliffe, earl of Sussex, lord deputy, had, according to Cox, a force of 1360 foot, 320 horse, and 300 Kerns. In 1565, sir Nicholas Arnold, lord justice, had a force of 1596 soldiers; and in 1566, colonel Randolph came from England to Derry with 700 men. The lords deputies, sir Henry Sydney, sir William Fitzwilliam, sir William Pelham, and sir William Drury, between the years 1570 and 1580, had each of them generally a force of from 2,000 to 3,000, horse and foot. In 1573, Walter Devereux, earl of Essex, came from England with a force of 400 foot and 200 horse, to plant an English colony in Clannahoy. In 1579, captains Bourchier and Carew came to Waterford with 600 men, and sir John Perrott with six ships and forces to Cork; and admiral Winter came with a fleet to the coast of Kerry. The lords deputies Arthur Grey, sir John Perrott, and sir William Fitzwilliam, had each generally a force of about 3,000 men under their command in the war with the Geraldines; and captain Zouch, president of Munster, had also great forces. From 1578 to 1583, vast numbers of the English forces were slain in the war with the Geraldines of Munster. From 1594 to 1597 the lords' deputies sir William Russell, and lord Borrough, with generals sir John and sir

Thomas Norris, in the campaigns in Ulster against Hugh O'Neill, had always a force of from 3000 to 5000 men; and sir Richard Bingham, governor of Connaught, and his brother George, had great forces in their battles with O'Donnell, O'Rourke, &c. In 1596, when O'Neill, O'Donnell, and the other Irish chiefs, at the great convention held at Fogharty, near Dundalk, refused to ratify any peace with the English, except on conditions of being allowed their full rights, and the free exercise of the Catholic religion, according to Mac Geoghegan, with a restoration of the greater part of their ancient territories, it is stated at p. 610, in these Annals, that an immense army of no less than twenty thousand men was sent to Ireland by the queen. In 1598 and—99, the marshal sir Henry Bagnall, in Ulster, and sir Conyers Clifford, governor of Connaught, had each an army of 5,000 men, but their forces were cut to pieces by O'Neill and O'Donnell, in the great battles of the Yellow Ford, and of the Curlew mountains. During this war, there were marshals or military governors, called presidents, in the four provinces, and each of them always had an army of about 3,000 men under their command. In the year 1599, at p. 642 in these Annals, it is mentioned that sir Richard Bingham, who had been governor of Connaught, returned to Ireland with a force of 8000 men from England. In 1599, on the 15th of April, Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, came to Ireland as lord lieutenant, and landed at Dublin with a great army; Cox says he had "an army as great and as well furnished as his heart could desire for that service, being at first 1,300 horse and 16,000 foot, which was afterwards increased to 20,000 men complete." About 5,000 of these forces, as before stated, were cut off by the Irish chiefs, during the expedition of Essex into Leinster and Munster. From 1600 to 1602, the lord deputy Mountjoy got about 20,000 men from England; he had about 3000 men under his own command, and from 1000 to 2000 men each were commanded by sir Warham St. Leger, and sir George Carew, the presidents of Munster. Sir Arthur Savage, president of Connaught, had about 2000 men, and the earls of Clanrickard and Thomond had each a force of about 1000. In 1600, it is stated by Morrison, that sir Henry Docwra brought more than 3000 men from England, and that he had afterwards 4000 foot and 200 horse at Lough Foyle and Derry; but the Four Masters state that he had 6000. In 1601, according to Cox, a force of 2000 men from England landed at Waterford and Cork, and in the same year 2000 foot and some horse came from England, and landed at Waterford. In the same year the admirals Levison and Preston came, with ten ships of war, and 2000 foot, to Cork, and also a large supply of artillery, arms, ammunition, &c. The combined British forces, under lord Mountjoy, sir George Carew, and other commanders, in 1601, amounted to 16,950 foot, and 1487 horse. The entire of the forces that came from England, in the reign of Elizabeth, for a period of more than 40 years, from 1560 to 1600, amounted to at least 80,000 men.

Anglo-Irish Forces.—Independent of the armies from England, there were also great forces raised in Ireland, consisting of Anglo-Irish, that is Irish of English descent, and of native Irish. In A. D. 1571, Cox gives the following account of some Irish and Anglo-Irish forces in the service of the queen, in the county of Cork. Mac Carthy More had 6 horse, 24 shot, 126 galloglasses, and 100 Kerne. Mac Carthy Riagh, 8 horse, 10 shot, 40 galloglasses, and 50 Kerne. Sir Donogh Mac Teige Mac Carthy of Muskerry, 6 horse, 10 shot, 20 galloglasses, and 40 Kerne. Mac Donogh, chief of Kanturk, 4 horse, 8 shot, 20 galloglasses, and 30 Kerne. The

A. D. 1600.

Robert, earl of Essex, whom we stated to have come to Ireland in the May of the foregoing year, lord Barry, 6 horse, 10 shot, 30 galloglasses, and 20 Kerne. The lord Courcy, 2 horse, 4 shot, 6 galloglasses, and 8 Kerne. Total 32 horse, 66 shot, 242 galloglasses, and 248 Kerne. In 1584, Cox gives the following account of the Militia in Munster in the queen's service :

	Shot.	Billmen.
The city of Waterford - - - -	300	300
The city of Limerick - - - -	200	600
The city of Cork - - - -	100	300
Cashel - - - -	20	140
Clonmel - - - -	40	200
Kilmallock - - - -	20	100
Fethard - - - -	20	100
Kinsale - - - -	20	100
Carriack - - - -	20	40
The barony of Muskerry in Cork - -	20	300
do. Carberry do. - -	30	1000
do. Imokilly do. - -	12	80
do. Condons do. - -	8	60
Lord Barry's Country do. - -	30	200
Mac Carthy More do. and part of Kerry	8	400
Decies in Waterford - - - -	20	200
The county of Tipperary - - - -	50	400
Total - - - -	918	4,520

The Billmen, above mentioned, were a sort of battle-axe men, armed with halberds, or pole-axes; those mentioned as shot were musketeers. In 1585, the lord deputy, sir John Perrott, according to Cox, issued a commission to sir Richard Bingham, governor of Connaught, and others, authorising them to compound between the queen and the subject, and between the lord and the tenant, for cesses, rents &c., and to bring the inhabitants of Connaught, and of Thomond, or the county of Clare, to a composition of paying ten shillings per annum for every quarter of land containing 120 acres, besides a certain number of soldiers amongst them on every Rising out; and having proceeded, by Inquisition of a jury, they allotted certain payments mentioned by Cox, and the following numbers of soldiers were to be levied: The county of Mayo was to contribute 200 foot and 40 horse, at their own charge, when required, and 50 foot and 15 horse in such manner as the peers and English bishops ought to do; the entire province of Connaught was to contribute 1054 foot and 224 horse, to the general Hostings in Connaught, and 332 foot and 88 horse at every time, for 40 days, any where in Ireland. Thomond was to furnish 200 foot and 40 horse armed, at all Hostings in Thomond, and 15 horse and 50 foot, at all general Hostings. In 1585, according to Cox, the lord deputy Perrott had instructions that the regular army, being then 1,900 strong, the deputy should certify "whether it were better give the soldiers sterling pay, and no victuals, or to continue victuals, and the old Irish pay, for the queen will no longer allow both victuals and the increased pay."

The Hostings here mentioned were great meetings of the military of a province, county, or district, convened to prepare for service in the field, and to show their strength, equipment, &c. An account of the Hostings, and other modes of military management and discipline of the forces of the English Pale, their pay, arms, &c., is given in Baron Finglas's Breviate, in Harris's Hibernica. In Spenser's View of Ireland, and the Tracts of sir John Davis, accounts are also given of the forces and military management of the Pale. In A. D. 1601, Cox and Morrison give an account of a general Hosting of the Pale, assembled on the Hill of Tara in Meath, on the last day of June, at which attended the following forces: For the county of Dublin, 12 horse, 95 archers, and 16 kerne. For Meath, 81 horse, 173 archers and 100 kerne. For Westmeath, 60 horse and 2 archers. For Kildare, 18 horse and 57 archers. For Louth, 36 horse and 51 archers, making in all 207 horse, 378 archers, and 116 kerne. The Irish forces which attended along with these were 182 horse and 307 kerne. In and to have gone to England in the November of the same year, met with a repulsive, reproachful, sharp, and uncourteous reception from the council

Leinster, from the year 1580 to 1600, Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, according to Cox, Lodge, and others, maintained 200 horse and 500 foot, in all expeditions made by the lords deputies, and fought in almost every battle. Cox says that "in Desmond's rebellion, Ormond and his forces slew 46 captains, 800 traitors, and 4,000 common soldiers."

Garrisons.—From 1597 to 1602, there were powerful English garrisons in various parts of Ireland, but they were chiefly established by the lord deputy Mountjoy, in the year 1600. In the first and second volumes of Fynes Morrison, a full account is given of these garrisons, and their commanders, and partly also by Cox and Mac Geoghegan. In Ulster, and the parts of the Pale bordering on that province, the following garrisons were placed. In May, 1600, according to Morrison, Cox, and others, sir Henry Docwra came from England with a fleet of 67 ships, and a force of 3,000 foot and 200 horse, besides seamen, afterwards increased by 1000 men more from Dublin; Mac Geoghegan states that he had 5000 foot and 300 horse, and the Four Masters say he had 6000 men. Docwra first came to Carrickfergus, and sailed from thence to Lough Foyle, where he arrived on the 14th of May, and according to Morrison, he had under him 25 captains. He formed the following garrisons: at Derry, 850 foot; at Dunalong, 650; at Lifford, 800; there was also a force of 1000 foot and 50 horse sent to form a garrison at Ballyshannon, under sir Matthew Morgan, and afterwards commanded by sir Henry Folliott. Sir Arthur Savage, the governor of Connaught, placed a garrison of 1000 foot and 60 horse at the abbey of Boyle, in Roscommon, to act against O'Rourke and O'Connor Sligo, and prevent their co-operation with O'Donnell. In Carrickfergus, there was a garrison of 850 foot and 125 horse, under sir Arthur Chichester and others, and Chichester also had 850 foot and 100 horse at Mountjoy in Tyrone. In Newry, 1000 foot and 50 horse, under sir Samuel Bagnall, and several captains. At Lecale and Downpatrick, 500 foot and 100 horse, under sir Richard Morrison. At Carlingford, 100 foot. In Dundalk, 650 foot and 100 horse, under sir Richard Morrison, and others. At the abbey of Armagh, 800 foot and 125 horse, under sir Henry Davers, &c. At Mountnorris, in Armagh, 600 foot and 50 horse, under sir Samuel Bagnall, and captain Edward Blaney. At Portmore, on the Blackwater, 350 foot and 50 horse, under captain Williams. At Lisgannon, in the county of Cavan, towards the borders of Monaghan, 500 foot and 50 horse, under Plunkett, lord Dunsany, captain Esmond, sir William Warren, and sir Henry Harrington. There were also garrisons some time in the towns of Cavan, Enniskillen, and Monaghan, about the years 1595-96, but these towns were retaken by the O'Reillys, Maguires and Mac Mahons. Several places on the borders of Ulster were strongly garrisoned. In Annaly or Longford, 800 foot and 12 horse, under sir John Barkley. At Kells, 400 foot and 50 horse, under the earl of Kildare, lord Dunsany, sir Henry Harrington, and Hugh O'Reilly. At Ardee, 700 foot and 50 horse, under sir Garrett Moore, and sir Charles Percy. In Drogheda, 500 foot and some horse, under captain Billing. Cox and Morrison say, that Mountjoy made war on the Irish, by a small flying army and numerous garrisons, and it appears, from the above accounts, that there were more than 12,000 horse and foot appointed to act against O'Neill and O'Donnell, in Ulster. There were also garrisons varying from 200 to 500, and in some places from 700 to 1000 men, placed in various strong towns of the Pale, and throughout Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, of which accounts are given by Morrison, and these various garrisons amounted to at least 10,000 men. The chief garrison towns were Athboy, Trim, Navan, Mullingar, Ballymore, Philipstown, Maryborough, Rheban, Athy, Kildare, Naas, Dublin, Newcastle, Wicklow, Wexford, Enniscorthy, Carlow, Kilkenny, Waterford, Cork, Kilmallock, Limerick, Galway and Athlone.

Anglo-Irish for the Queen.—The following were the old families of English descent who supported the queen's cause: In Meath and Leinster, Henry, William, and Gerald Fitzgerald, earls of Kildare; the Plunkets, barons of Killeen, Dunsany, and of England, when he appeared before them; he was, in the first place, reprimanded for his pusillanimity and cowardice, while in the service of the queen in Ireland, and that he wanted nothing which Louth; the Prestons, viscounts of Gormanstown; Fleming, haroh of Slane; Taaffe of Louth; St. Laurence, haron of Howth; Barnwall, baron of Trimlestown; Butler, baron of Dunhoine; Nugent, baron of Delvin; Dillon, baron of Kilkenny West. In Munster, Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond; Barry, lord Barrymore and Buttevant; de Courey, haron of Kinsale; Burke, baron of Castleconnell. In Connaught, Ulick, and Richard Burke, earls of Clanrickard and barons of Dunkellin; Theobald Burke of the Ships in Mayo; Bermingham, baron of Athenry.

Anglo-Irish against the Queen.—In Munster, Gerald and James Fitzgerald, earls of Desmond, with the other great families of the Geraldines of Munster. Patrick and Thomas Fitzmaurice, harons of Lixnaw and lords of Kerry; and Patrick Candour of Condons, in Cork; David Roche, viscount of Fermoy; Thomas Butler, haron of Cahir; and Richard Butler, viscount Mountgarrett; Richard Purcell, baron of Loughmoe, in Tipperary; and sir Pierce de Lacy of Bruff, in Limerick. In Meath and Leinster, James Fitz-Eustace, viscount of Baltinglass; captain Richard Tyrrell, of Fartullagh, in Westmeath, and some of the Nugents, Plunketts and Fitzgeralds. In Connaught, Theobald Mac William Burke of Mayo, and Redmond Burke, baron of Leitrim, in Galway.

Milesian Irish for the Queen.—In Munster, Donogh O'Brien, earl of Thomond, and Murrough O'Brien, baron of Ineliquin, with their forces in Clare and Limerick, fought on the side of the queen. Cormac, Donogh, and Teige Mac Carthy, in Desmond, Carberry and Muskerry, in the counties of Cork and Kerry, with some of the Mac Donoughs, O'Sullivan, O'Donevans, and others, joined the queen. In Leinster, Bryan and Florence Fitzpatrick, barons of Ossory, in the Queen's county; Mulroona O'Carroll, lord of Ely, in King's county; sir Terence O'Dempsey, and sir Teige O'Dunn, in Queen's county; and two chiefs of the O'Ferralls in Longford, with O'Melaghlin in Westmeath. In Connaught, Hugh O'Connor Don, and O'Connor Roe, in Roscommon; and Donogh O'Connor Sligo. In Ulster, Niall Garv O'Donnell, a chief of Donegal, joined the queen, being set up by the English in opposition to Red Hugh O'Donnell, prince of Tírconnell. Morrison says, that the lord deputy, Mountjoy, in 1600, desired to have authority out of England to pass Tírconnell, or the county of Donegal, to Niall Garv, reserving only 800 acres about Ballyshannon, and the fishing of the Erne, to her majesty; and, says Morrison, "such was the opinion of the service this turbulent spirit could do the state, that he got the command of 300 foot and 100 horse in her majesty's pay." In Fermanagh, Conor Roe Maguire joined the English, with his sons and forces, being set up in opposition to Hugh, the legitimate lord. In Cavan, Miles O'Reilly, in opposition to Edmund O'Reilly, prince of Brefney, got a grant of the county of Cavan, by letters patent from the queen, and commanded as colonel, a regiment in her service. In Tyrone, Art, the son of Torlogh Luineach O'Neill, former prince of Tyrone, also joined the English, and was called sir Arthur O'Neill. Many others of the Irish chiefs joined the queen, being set up and supported by the English, in opposition to the legitimate lords of the various territories, hence these chiefs are frequently mentioned by different writers, at this time, as the queen's O'Donnell, the queen's Maguire, the queen's O'Connor, the queen's O'Reilly, the queen's O'Neill, &c. Cox, giving an account of the lord deputy Russell's progress in Ulster, in 1595, says, that O'Molloy of the King's county earned the English standard one day, and O'Hanlon of Armagh on the next. According to the accounts of Cox and Morrison, one-third of the queen's army in Ireland, or about 5000 men, consisted of Irish kerns, galloglasses, and cavalry, and these writers condemn, as dangerous to the state, the practice of taking Irish into the queen's service; they state that the lord deputy, sir John Perrott, first introduced the practice to save charges, and "he armed the Irish in Ulster against the incursions of the Islander Scots, and so taught them the use of arms, to the ruin of Ireland;" and Cox says, that "the lord deputy Fitzwilliam took many Irish into the army, and in providently sent others of them to the Low countries, where they became excellent soldiers, and returned to be stout rebels."

Cox again says, at p. 424, in the reign of Elizabeth, "before the battle of Kinsale, the papists in the queen's army had promised to revolt, and many did so, by two, or three, and ten at a time, and that, if they had all done so then, there had been an end of the English for ever." Morrison makes some curious remarks, showing the estimation in which the lives of the mere Irish were held, and it appears it was considered that the more of these miserable mercenaries fell the better. In giving an account of some Irish soldiers who were killed in Mountjoy's expedition to Ulster, in 1600, he says, "the death of these unpeaceable swordsmen, though falling on our side, yet was rather a gain than loss to the commonwealth;" and again, in reference to 50 of the Irish kerns, in the queen's service, who were killed in a conflict at the fort of Liscannon, in the county of Cavan, in 1600, he says, "and 50 of our side were slain, but we cannot learn that any English were among them, so we account our loss to be no more than the taking of captain Esmond, who was with them, and was made prisoner."

Irish forces against the Queen.—Fynes Morrison gives an account of the forces of the Irish under O'Neill, O'Donnell, and other chiefs, from 1598 to 1601, collected in the time of the earl of Essex, and of the lord deputy Mountjoy, from the documents of the council at Dublin Castle; accounts of the Irish forces are also given in Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, and in Carew's Pacata Hibernia. The following accounts are mostly collected from Morrison, vol. I., pp. 71, 117, 277, also from Mac Geoghegan, and the Four Masters:

In Leinster.—In the counties of Dublin and Wicklow, Morrison says, all the mountaineers were in actual rebellion, and only two castles, namely, Newcastle and Wicklow, were held for the queen. The insurgent forces, under Felim, and his brother, Redmond O'Byrne, sons of Fiacha Mac Hugh, with the O'Tooles, Walter O'Byrne, chief of the galloglasses, and the Mac Donnells, were 480 foot and 20 horse, and 100 more afterwards came with the Walshes and Harolds. In Wexford and Carlow, the castles of Carlow, Leighlin, and Ferns, were held for the queen, and 6 castles belonging to Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, with some castles held by sir Thomas Colclough, sir Richard Masterson, and sir Dudley Loftus. The Irish forces against the queen, under Donal Spainagh and others, of the O'Cavenaghs, the O'Murroughs, or Murphys; the O'Kinsclaghys, the Keatings, and others, were 750 foot and 50 horse, afterwards increased to 900. In Kilkenny, the earl of Ormond had almost the entire country and its castles, for the queen; but Richard Butler, viscount Mountgarrett, joined Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, who was his father-in-law; and also Thomas Butler, baron of Cahir, in Tipperary, joined the Irish; these Butlers, joined by some of the Irish, had 130 foot and 20 horse, with two castles. In Kildare, James Fitz-Pierce Fitzgerald, and two other Geraldines, his brothers, says Morrison, to the late earl of Kildare, with some of the Delahoydes, Eustaces, and O'Dempseys, had against the queen 220 foot and 30 horse, afterwards increased to 500, by the going out of the Birminghams, Lynaghs, and other sept. In Leix, or Queen's county, Anthony and Bryan O'Moore, with their clans, and the chief of the galloglasses of that country, of the sept of Mac Donnell, with the O'Dempseys, O'Doynes, or Dunns, and the base son of the earl of Kildare, had 570 foot and 30 horse. Sir Terence O'Dempsey, and Teige O'Doyne, joined the queen, and captains Hartpole, Bowen, and Pigott, held Maryborough, and other castles for her majesty. In Offaly, or King's county, the fort of Philipstown was kept by an English garrison, and sir George Colley, sir Henry Warren, and John Moore, held castles for the queen; but the O'Conors, O'Molloys, and O'Dunns, had 468 foot and 12 horse against the queen, and Mac Coghlin afterwards joined them with 200 more, and the O'Dunns with 100. In Meath, the son and heir of sir William Nugent joined the Irish, and the county, says Morrison, "lying in the heart of the Pale, was greatly wasted by the Ulster rebels, and many castles lay waste without inhabitants." The Irish forces were 150 under the Delahoydes, Darcys, Husseys, and Rochfords, and, says Morrison, "beyond the river (the Boyne or Blackwater), captain John O'Reilly, having then 100 foot in he required for war or battle; he was also blamed for having gone to England without permission, or asking leave of the council there or here, on that occasion; after these things were stated to him, the queen's pay, well armed, revolted and joined the rebels." In Westmeath, Richard Mac Geoghegan, and others of his sept, with some of the Nugents and Fitzgeralds, had against the queen 140 foot and 20 horse; besides, captain Richard Tyrrell of Fartullagh, whom Morrison calls "a rebel of English race," had of Ulster-men and strangers 200 foot, and the Irish of Westmeath were increased 100 at least, says Morrison, by the revolt of the eldest son of William Nugent, brother to lord Delvin, with many of the Pettits and Daltons. In Longford, two chiefs of the O'Ferralls joined the queen, and the castle of Longford was held by an English garrison: the other O'Ferralls joined the Irish, and had 180 foot. In Louth, sir Edward Moore, sir Francis Stafford, and Plunkett, lord Louth, whom Morrison calls an English-Irish baron, held all the towns and castles for the queen, but the lands were wasted by the Ulster Irish. The entire of the Irish forces in Leinster were 3048 foot, 182 horse, afterwards increased 1280 horse and foot, making in all 4510 horse and foot.

In Ulster.—In the province of Ulster, says Morrison, consisting all of Irish septs, except the Scots possessing the Routes and Glyms (in Antrim), "those of Lecale and the little Ardes alone (in the county of Down), held for the queen, but were overawed by Tyrone (Hugh O'Neill), and forced to give way. Dundalk, the frontier town between the Pale and Ulster, and Knockfergus (Carrickfergus), a frontier town, were kept by English garrisons, as likewise Newry, Carlingford, Greencastle, and Narrow Water (all on the borders of Down and Louth), and the castle of Ballynagary, in the Brenny" (county of Cavan). Many of the other strongholds in Ulster were at that time in possession of O'Neill, and the other Irish chiefs; the following were the forces of the Irish chiefs of Ulster in alliance with O'Neill: In Tyrone.—The earl O'Neill himself had, in 1599, according to Morrison, 700 foot and 200 horse, and the other O'Neills in Tyrone had the following forces: Cormac Mac, Baron O'Neill, the earl's brother, 300 foot and 60 horse. Sir Art O'Neill, another brother, 300 foot and 60 horse. Henry Oge O'Neill, 200 foot and 40 horse. O'Hagan, 100 foot and 30 horse. The O'Donnells, 100 foot and 60 horse. O'Quinn, 80 foot and 20 horse. In Armagh.—Torlogh Mac Henry O'Neill of the Fews, 300 foot and 60 horse. Mac Cann of Clan Cann, 100 foot and 12 horse. In Down.—Bryan Fertough O'Neill, in Upper Clannahoy, 80 foot and 30 horse. Mac Cartan and Mac Neill, 100 foot and 20 horse. Mac Rory, captain of Kilwarlin, 60 foot and 10 horse. The Whites of Dufferin, 20 foot. Felim Mac Gennis, lord of Iveagh with Con, Art, and Rory Mac Gennis, had 200 foot and 40 horse, against the queen. In Antrim.—Sir James Mac Sorley Boy Mac Donnell, and his Scots, possessed the Route and the seven Glynnies, and had 400 foot and 100 horse against the queen. Shane Mac Bryan Carrach Mac Donnell, upon the Bann side, 50 foot and 10 horse. Hugh Mac Murtogh, beyond the Minn Water, 40 foot. Cormac Mac Neill, captain of Kilultagh, 60 foot and 10 horse. Shane Mac Bryan O'Neill, in Lower Clannahoy, 80 foot and 50 horse. Island Magee belonged to the earl of Essex, but was altogether waste, says Morrison. In Derry.—O'Kane had 500 foot and 20 horse. In Donegal.—Red Hugh O'Donnell had 200 foot and 60 horse, and his brother Rory 150 foot and 50 horse; Niall Garv O'Donnell was for some time on the side of the Irish, but afterwards joined the English, and was called the queen's O'Donnell. The Three Mac Sweeneys had 500 foot and 40 horse. Sir John O'Dogherty, 300 foot and 40 horse. O'Gallagher of Ballyshannon, 200 foot and 40 horse. O'Boyle 100 foot and 20 horse. Sliocht Rorie, 100 foot and 50 horse. All these forces in Donegal amounted to 1550 foot and 300 horse, and were under the command of Red Hugh O'Donnell. In Fermanagh.—Hugh Maguire had 600 foot and 100 horse, on the side of O'Neill, but Conor Roe Maguire, another chief, joined the English, and was called the queen's Maguire. In Monaghan.—Bryan Mac Mahon, the chief, Evir Mac Colla Mac Mahon, in Farney, with Rossa Mac Mahon, and others of the name in Clan Carvil, had 500 foot and 160 horse. In Cavan.—Philip, John, Edmund, Conor, and Owen O'Reilly, chiefs of Brefuey, joined O'Neill with 800 foot and 100 horse, but colonel Miles O'Reilly, before mentioned, joined the English, and was called the queen's O'Reilly. The Irish forces in Ulster were 7,220 foot, and 1,702 horse making in all 8,922 men.

Forces of O'Neill in 1600.—Morrison gives the following statement of O'Neill's own forces in Tyrone, in the year 1600, exclusive of those of the other Irish chiefs in Ulster; the account was obtained from the information of Shane Mac Donnell, who had been O'Neill's marshal, but made his submission to the English. Of horse, O'Neill's own guard, 100; his son, Hugh 100; Con, another son, 20; his brother Cormac, 100; his brother Art, 20; Felim O'Hanlon's son, 10; Torlogh Brasilagh O'Neill's son, 50, making in all 400 horse. Of foot, O'Neill's guard, led by James O'Shiel, a Leinster man, 200; by Jenkin Fitzsimon of Lecale in the county of Down, 200; making in all 400. The other foot forces were as follows: Hugh Mac Caghwel, and two other captains under Cormac O'Neill, the earl's brother, 600; Con son of Art O'Neill, 100; Bryan Mac Art O'Neill, 200; Con O'Neill, the earl's son, 100; Donal O'Neill, 100; Felim O'Neill, 60; Torlogh Brasilagh's sons, 200; Henry Oge, and Torlogh O'Neill, 200; Mac Cann of Armagh, and Owen Mac Cann, 200; Kedagh and Gilladuff Mac Donnell, 200; three brothers, Gillaspic, Rory, and Randal Mac Owen (probably Scots), 300; Donal and Patrick Mac Phelim, 200; Henry Wragton, 200; Donogh, Owen, James, Art, and Hugh O'Hagan, 100 men each, making 500; Owen and Niall O'Quinn, 100. The total of horse and foot troops, under O'Neill, was 4060. Morrison says that all those troops, except 300, had means to support themselves in Tyrone, and many of the chiefs had great forces besides in their own countries; he also says that the earl of Essex, in 1599, dispatched letters to the lords in England, stating that O'Neill had made his forces into two great divisions, one consisting of 6,000 horse and foot, under his own command, in Ulster; the other of 4,000 men under O'Donnell, who acted chiefly in Connaught.

In Connaught.—In Roscommon, the castles of Athlone, Roscommon, Tulsk, Boyle, and Ballinasloe, were held for the queen, but the Irish of various septs in alliance with O'Neill and O'Donnell, as the O'Conors, O'Kellys, Mac Dermotts, O'Hanleys, O'Flanagans, &c., had 560 foot and 60 horse. Hugh O'Conor Don and O'Conor Roe, were sometimes on the side of the Irish, but mostly for the queen. Dermot O'Conor Don, mentioned by Morrison, Cox, and Mac Geoghegan, was a very valiant commander at this time, and an account of him is given in these Annals; he went to Munster, and entered the earl of Desmond's service, with a body of 1,500 men, kerns, galloglasses, and cavalry, but he betrayed Desmond, and made him prisoner; the earl was soon after released by his own men, and O'Conor, and his Connaughtmen, were expelled from Munster; O'Conor himself was soon after slain, in the year 1600, in Galway, by Theobald Burke of the Ships. In Sligo.—The Irish septs, O'Conors, O'Dowds, O'Haras, O'Garas, Mac Donoghs, O'Harts, &c., had 300 foot and 30 horse, and only the castle of Collooney was held for the queen. Donogh O'Conor, chief of Sligo, joined the queen, but was compelled to co-operate with O'Donnell after the battle of the Curlew mountains, and Morrison says, by the revolt of O'Conor, the Irish forces were increased 300. In Leitrim.—The Irish under Bryan O'Rourke, and his brother Teige, chiefs of Brefney O'Rourke, were 600 foot and 60 horse, and no castle in that country was held for the queen. In Mayo.—Some castles were held for the queen, but they were taken by Theobald Mac William Burke, and the various Irish septs had 600 foot and 60 horse. Theobald Burke of the Ships, son of the celebrated Granu Weal, or Grace O'Malley, joined the queen, but he sometimes wavered towards the Irish. In Galway.—The towns of Galway and Athenry, and the castle of Meelick, were held for the queen by the earl of Clanrickard, but Redmond Burke, and some others of the name, joined the Irish, and the various septs of the O'Kellys, O'Maddens, &c., had 490 foot. The whole of the Irish forces in Connaught were 3,000 horse and foot.

In Munster.—In Clare, Donogh O'Brien, earl of Thomond, and Murrough O'Brien, baron of Inchiquin, who was slain in battle with O'Donnell at Ballyshannon, joined the English; but Teige O'Brien, and having been accused of many other affairs, he was ordered to relinquish every preferment, command, and honour he had received from the queen, and the keepers of the hostages and sureties of the brother of the earl, was on the side of O'Neill, and others of the O'Briens, with the Mac Namaras, and some of the Mac Mahons, and O'Loughlins, had against the queen 600 foot and 50 horse. In Limerick.—Pierce Lacy of Bruff, joined by various Irish septs, had against the queen 300 foot and 15 horse. In Kerry.—Fitzmaurice, lord of Kerry, O'Conor Kerry, O'Donoghoe of the Glens, John Delahoyde, and others, had 500 foot and 30 horse against the queen. In Cork.—James Fitzgerald, earl of Desmond, had 300 foot and 300 horse; and Mac Donogh, lord of Duballow, 200 foot and 8 horse against the queen; Barry Oge and the lord Barry's brother, in Muskerry, 120 foot and 3 horse, but lord Barry himself joined the queen. David Roche, lord of Fermoy, with some of the O'Mahons and O'Donovans of Carberry, had 500 foot. In Desmond, or part of Cork and Kerry, Donal O'Sullivan Beare, and Dermot O'Sullivan More, Dermot Mac Carthy More, Donal and Florence Mac Carthy, Teige O'Mahony, Con, Donogh, and Dermot O'Driscoll, had 500 foot and 6 horse, against the queen. In Waterford, the Irish had 200 foot and 10 horse. In Tipperary, the following were the Irish forces against the queen: Butler, baron of Cahir, with his brother and followers, had 300 foot and 12 horse. Edmond Fitzgibbon, called the White Knight, 400 foot and 30 horse. Richard Purell, baron of Loughmoe, 200 foot and 6 horse. The O'Mulrians, or O'Ryan, of Owey, 300 foot and 6 horse. The O'Keenedys of Ormond, 500 foot and 30 horse. O'Meaghers, 60 foot and 3 horse. The Burkes of Clanwilliam, 200 foot and 4 horse. Morrison says, that all the cities, seaport towns, and castles in Munster, and many great lords and gentlemen, held for the queen. The forces in Munster were 5,680 foot and 292 horse. The entire of the Irish forces against the queen were as follows:

		Foot.	Horse.
In Ulster	- - -	7220	1702
In Leinster	- - -	4240	270
In Munster	- - -	5680	292
In Connaught	- - -	2770	230
Total	-	19,910	2494

The earl of Essex, soon after his arrival in Ireland, in 1599, wrote a letter to the queen, which is given by Cox, and in it are the following passages: "I humbly beseech your majesty to tell you, that now having passed through the provinces of Leinster and Munster, and been upon the frontier of Connaught, I dare begin to give your majesty some advertisement of the state of this kingdom, not as before by hearsay, but as I beheld it with mine own eyes. The people in general have able bodies by nature, and have gotten, by custom, ready use of arms; and by their late successes, boldness to fight your majesty's troops. In their rebellion they have no other end but to shake off the yoke of obedience to your majesty, and to root out all remembrance of the English nation in this kingdom. The wealth of the kingdom, which consisteth in cattle, oatmeal, and other victuals, is almost all in the rebels hands, who, in every province 'till my coming, have been masters of the field. The expectation of these rebels is very present, and very confident, that Spain will either so invade your majesty, that you shall have no leisure to prosecute them here, or so succour them that they will get most of the towns into their hands, ere your majesty shall relieve and reinforce your army, so that now, if your majesty resolve to subdue these rebels by force, they are so many, and so framed to be soldiers, that the war will certainly be great, costly, and long. If your majesty will seek to break them, by factions amongst themselves, they are covetous and mercenary, and must be purchased, and their Jesuits, and practising priests, must be hunted out, and taken from them, which now do sodder so fast, and so close together. If your majesty will have a strong party in the Irish nobility, and make use of them, you must hide from them all purpose of establishing English government till the strength of the Irish be so broken, that they shall see no safety but in your majesty's protection. If your majesty will be assured of the possession of your towns, and keep them from supplying the wants of the rebels, you must have garrisons brought into them, able to command, and make it a capital offence for any merchant in Ireland to trade with the rebels, or buy or sell any arms or munition whatsoever. Your majesty virtually your army out of England, and with your garrisons burning and spoiling the country in all places, shall starve the rebels in one year, because no place else can supply them. Now, if it please your majesty to compare your advantages and disadvantages together, you shall find, that though these rebels are more in number than your majesty's army, and have, though I do unwillingly confess it, better hodies, and perfecter use of their arms, than those men which your majesty sends over, yet by commanding the walled towns, holds, and champaign countries, and having a brave nobility and gentry, a better discipline, and stranger order than they, and such means to keep from them the maintenance of life, and to waste the country which should nourish them, your majesty may promise yourself that this action will, in the end, be successful though costly, and that your victory will be certain, though many of us, your honest servants, must sacrifice ourselves in the quarrel, and that this kingdom will be reduced, though it will ask, besides cost, a great deal of care, industry and time."

The Irish Forces were composed of Kerns, Galloglasses, and cavalry; the word kern, in Irish Ceithearnach, or Ceatharnach, pronounced Kebernagh, signifies a battler, being derived from Cath, a battle; the name is made kerne in the plural, by some writers, and by others, kerns. The term Galloglass, in Irish Gall-oglaoch, or Gall-oglach, signifies a foreign warrior, being derived from Gall, a foreigner, and oglach, which signifies a youthful man, a champion, or soldier, and may be derived from the words og, young, and laoch, a champion. Various opinions have been given as to the origin of the term, but it is considered it was first applied to soldiers resembling those of the Gaill or Danes, whose champions were clad in armour, and whose chief weapon was the battle-axe; besides, it is to be observed that Giraldus Cambrensis says the Irish adopted the use of the battle-axe from the Danes. The Scots, who were of Irish descent, had likewise, at an early period, their kerns and galloglasses, and in Shakespear's Macheth is mentioned, "the merciless Mac Donald, from the Western Isles, with his kerns and galloglasses." The Mac Donnells of Antrim, who came from the Highlands and Hebrides, were celebrated commanders of galloglasses in Ireland; many other clans, famous as galloglasses, have been already mentioned in these notes, as the Mac Sweeney of Donegal, the Mac Caves of Brefney and Monaghan, the Mac Sheelies of Munster, &c. The kerns were the light foot of the Irish, armed with long spears or pikes, javelins, darts, skians, or daggers, bows and arrows, and also with slings, in the early ages; and when deficient of other weapons, they often flung with their hands showers of stones at the enemy; they had no defensive armour, except sometimes wooden or leather shields. These native soldiers made rapid and irregular onsets into the ranks of the enemy, not fighting in exact order, but rushing and attacking on all sides, then rapidly retreating, and coming on again at an advantageous opportunity. The Irish were famous at forming ambuscades in their mountain passes, defiles, woods, and bogs, by which they advantageously cut off great numbers of their opponents. The javelins, or short spears, and darts of the kerns, were favourite weapons; the handles were generally of ash, to which was fitted a long, sharp-pointed, iron or steel head; this javelin was tied to the arm or shoulder by a thong or cord of great length, so that they could hurl it at the enemy at several yards distance, and recover the weapon again. These darts and javelins were whirled rapidly round the head, and then cast with such force that they penetrated the hodies of men, even through their armour, and killed their horses at a great distance. In the account of the expedition of king Richard II. in Ireland, at p. 191 in these annals, a French knight who was in the king's army, describing their conflicts with the Irish, says, that "their soldiers rushed on with fearful cries and clamours, which might be heard a good league off, and cast their darts with such might, that no Hauhergeon, or coat of mail, was of sufficient proof to resist their force, their darts piercing them through both sides;" and he further says, that the kerns "were so court were ordered to retain him with themselves, until the anger of the sovereign against him

nimble and swift of foot, that, like unto stags, they ran over mountains and vallies." Froissart in his Chronicle, giving an account of king Richard's expedition, says "the Irish soldiers were so remarkably strong and active, that on foot they could overtake an English horseman at full speed, leap up behind the rider, and pull him off his horse." The kerns were divided into bodies of spearmen, dart-men, slingers, and archers, and in after times, musketeers; the archers were very expert, and their bows were made chiefly of ash and yew. The galloglasses were the heavy infantry of the Irish, a sort of grenadiers, being select men of great strength and stature, armed with swords and battle-axes, and also generally wore armour, as helmets and breast plates of iron, coats of mail, composed of a net work of small iron rings, and sometimes armour made of strong leather; shields or bucklers, made of wood, sometimes covered with skins of animals. Their chief weapon was the battle-axe, and, in remote times, their warriors used a formidable weapon called a battle-hammer, which was a wooden club studded with short spikes and knobs of iron. Giraldus Cambrensis, in the 12th century, described the battle-axes of the Irish as large, heavy, well-tempered, and extremely keen-edged; the weapon was wielded by one hand, the thumb being placed on the handle to guide the stroke, and they struck with such force, that they often clove the skull of a warrior through his iron or brazen helmet with a single blow; and Cambrensis says, that sometimes, with one stroke, they cut off the thigh of a horseman, the limb falling on one side and the dead body on the other. The galloglasses were divided into bodies of sword-men and battle-axe-men, and being the strongest, steadiest, and best disciplined forces of the Irish, generally bore the brunt of battle: the Irish commanders all wore armour, helmets, coats of mail, shields, &c.

Warriors, Weapons, Banners, Battle-cries, &c.—The terms Taoiseach, and Taoiseach-Buidhne, Flaith, Ceann-Feadhna, or head of a force, and Ceann-Sloigh, that is, the head or leader of a host, were all names applied to military commanders; and the terms Laoch, Curraidh, Gaisgidh, or Gaisgidheach, and Urradh, were applied to champions, chieftains and heroes. The chief terms for weapons were Claidheabh, pronounced like cliv, a sword; Tuagh, or Tuagh-catha, a battle-axe; Laighean, a spear; Lann, a lance or javelin; Craoiseagh, a lance, javelin, or halberd; Ga, Gath, or Gai, a dart; Saighhead, an arrow or dart; Bnlg-Saighhead, a bag or pouch for arrows, or a quiver; Sgian, or Skian, a dagger, but properly signifies a knife, being a sort of large knife; this weapon was carried by all the Irish soldiers, and also by the chiefs, and used in close combat; the ancient sling was called Crann-tabhuil. The armour consisted of the Luireach, i. e. Loricæ, a coat of mail; the shield, buckler and target were termed Sciath, and the helmet Cath-Bharr, derived from Cath, a battle, and Barr, the head or top. The banners of the ancient Irish have been described at p. 512, on the Battle of Clontarf; the banner was termed Bratach, and the standard Meirge; the standard-bearer was called Meirg-cach, and a banner-bearer Fear-Brataighe. The Bards attended battle fields, and raised the Rosg-catha, or war-song. The Irish rushed into battle with fierce shouts of defiance, and loud battle cries; their chief cry, according to Ware, was Farrach, Farrah, of the origin of which word various opinions have been given by antiquaries, but it may be the same as the word Fearadh in O'Brien's Dictionary, which signifies to fight valiantly, or like a man, or, according to others, the Irish used the word Faire, Faire, pronounced Farray, which signifies watch, watch, or be on your guard; and the word Hurrah is supposed to have come from the same source. The war-cry Aboo, according to various writers was used by the Irish, and different opinions have been given as to its origin, but it was derived from the Irish word Buaidh, pronounced like bo-ee, which signifies victory; this word was anglicised Aboo, and hence the various chieftains are said to have had their war-cries, as O'Neill Abo, O'Donnell Aboo, O'Brien Aboo, that is victory to O'Neill, to O'Donnell, to O'Brien, &c. The great Anglo-Irish families adopted similar war cries; the Fitzgeralds had Crom Aboo, said to have been taken from the castle of Crom, in Limerick, one of the ancient fortresses of the Fitzgeralds; the Butlers of Ormond had should be allayed. They then came to the resolution of sending other officers and arms to Ireland,

Butler Aboo, and the Burkes had Clanrickard Aboo, and Mac William Aboo, and various other families had similar cries. The Irish chiefs had each their own banner and battle cry; the O'Neills had for their battle cry, Lamh-dearg a n-uachtar, that is, the Red Hand uppermost, a red or bloody hand being their crest, and borne on their banners; the battle cry of the O'Briens of Thomond was, Lamh laidir a n-uachtar, that is, the strong hand uppermost. Spenser, in his View of Ireland, thus speaks of the kerns and galloglasses, "yet sure they are very valiant and hardy, great endurers of cold, labour, hunger, and all hardness, very active and strong of hand, very swift of foot, very vigilant and circumspect in their enterprises, very present in perils, very great scorers of death." It appears the Irish scarcely ever had any cannon in their battles with the English, and O'Neill, addressing his men at the Yellow Ford, said, "My hopes of victory are not placed in the thunder of artillery, but in your valour."

The Cavalry of the Irish might be considered as mounted kerns, being chiefly a kind of light horse. They were armed with spears, javelins, swords, darts, and skians, or daggers, and in later times they had also pistols, like other dragoons; they sometimes wore armour, as helmets, coats of mail, shields, &c. The Irish do not appear to have brought their cavalry to any great perfection, or to have had them in large numbers, their chief forces being the kerns and galloglasses. The term Marcach was applied to a horseman, or cavalry soldier, and Marc-Shluagh signified a host, army, or troop of cavalry. Ridire signified a knight, and was the name applied to an English chief in armour. The Irish knights, according to Ware and others, were attended by a young man, or page, sometimes called a knave, by the old writers; according to Ware, this attendant was called Daltin, in Irish Dailtin, which signifies a fostered or adopted person. The predatory troops of the Irish are often mentioned under the name of Creach-Sluagh, derived from Creach, a plunder, and Sluagh, a host; the term Caoraighecht was applied to a body who attended the army as predatory troops, and they are called by the English writers Creaghts. The hired troops of the Irish chiefs were called Buanaighe, from Buan, which signifies bound, or continued, and these mercenaries are mentioned by English writers under the name of Bonnoghs or Bonnoghts. The terms Sluagh and Sochraide were applied to an army or host.

The English forces were in general better armed, accoutred, and disciplined, than the Irish, though not superior to them in valour, or equal in strength of body, activity or hardness, as stated by the earl of Essex. The British cavalry was superior to that of the Irish, much better armed, accoutred, and disciplined, and their cuirassiers, or men-at-arms, were covered with coats of mail or plate-armour, and wore iron or brazen helmets; they were armed with spears or lances, swords, pistols, &c. Their archers were also very powerful, and they had mounted archers amongst their cavalry. Their infantry were armed with swords, spears, and halberds, or pole-axes, and amongst them were also bodies of archers; they always had a far greater number of musketeers than the Irish, and they had several pieces of artillery, in all their battles in the war of Elizabeth, while it appears the Irish scarcely ever had any cannon in these engagements.

Expenditure and numbers slain in War of Elizabeth.—During the entire 45 years of the reign of Elizabeth, fierce and almost incessant wars were carried on with the Irish princes, and chiefs; the earls of Desmond, and the Geraldines of Munster, and other great Anglo Irish families who resisted the Reformation. During the last 15 years of her reign, from 1588 to 1603, the contest raged with remarkable fury, particularly in the North, against the O'Neills, O'Donnells, O'Rourkes, O'Reillys, Maguires, Mac Mahons, Magennises, O'Kanes, &c., who made the last stand in Ulster for religious liberty and national independence. This contest is called, by O'Sullivan Beare, Bellum quindecim annorum, or the 15 years' War. The War of Elizabeth cost the lives of some hundreds of thousands of men, and millions of money, with enormous destruction of property, of cattle, corn, &c., of towns, cities, castles, monasteries, &c., the whole of Ireland presenting a continued scene of direful famine, rapine, and slaughter. Accord-namely, sir Charles Blunt, lord Mountjoy, as lord justice, for there was not a lord justice in Ireland for two years till then; and sir George Cary (Carew), as president over the two provinces of Munster; a fleet, which contained upwards of six thousand armed men, with the necessary supplies for an expedition, was got ready to accompany those officers to Ireland, and all those were to proceed by land and sea to the province of Ulster particularly; it was about the festival of St. Patrick that these matters were determined on by the council of England.

A gentleman of the house of O'Connor Don, namely, Dermot, the son of Dudley, son of Tuathal, was in command over a large body of Irish soldiers, who were in the service of the earl of Desmond, in Munster, during the preceding year. Dermot proceeded, in the end of the same year, in the beginning of the month of December, to pay a visit to O'Neill, by whom he was kindly received; having terminated his visit to his satisfaction, he asked leave of O'Neill to return to Munster, in the beginning of the month of January; O'Neill desired him to be watchful in the countries through which he was to pass, and that he himself, with his forces, would follow him, to visit Meath, Leinster, Munster, and the southern side of Ireland, to ascertain who were friendly or opposed to him. When Dermot, with his party of forces, arrived amongst the allied Irish of Ormond, he proceeded in the most direct ways to go to the earl of Desmond, and he directed his course towards Uaithnibh and Clanwilliam on the borders of the Shannon (the baronies of Owey and Arra in Tipperary and of Oweybeg and Clanwilliam in Limerick). When the baron of Castleconnell (in Limerick), namely, Richard, the son of Theohald, son of William, son of Edmond Burke, heard of Dermot's arrival there, he and his brother Thomas collected all the horse and foot forces they could, of their own people and of those of the queen, and they carried on a conflict against Dermot and his force from the monastery of Uaitne (the abbey of Owey, or Abington, in the barony of Oweyheg), to Droichead-Buinbriste, in the county of Limerick, and a great number of his leaders and common soldiers were slain during that distance. When Dermot and his party were crossing the forementioned bridge, it was then that those two sons of Theobald Burke, namely, the baron, and Thomas, rushed ding to the previous calculations in the present article, there fell in those wars, during 45 years, at least 70,000 of all the troops that came from England, and about 30,000 or more of their Anglo-Irish and Irish allies, that is 100,000 men on the side of the English, and probably about the same number of the Irish against the queen, either on the field or by famine, thus making in all 200,000 men slain in Ireland, in the numerous battles, sieges, conflicts, burnings, and massacres, during the Elizabethan war. A great number of the English generals, and many of the lords deputies, were killed in those wars, and some died of their wounds or disease, and others were put to death in England. The lord deputy sir William Drury, died at Waterford, in 1579; the lord deputy sir John Perrott, died in the Tower of London; the lord deputy Borough, and the earl of Kildare, were mortally wounded in a battle with O'Neill in Ulster, in 1597, and in 1598, marshal sir Henry Bagnall was slain in battle with O'Neill at the Yellow Ford; general sir John Norris died about the same time, of the wounds he received in the battles with O'Neill in Ulster, and his brother, sir Thomas Norris, president of Munster, and sir Henry Norris, were slain in battle with the Irish, in 1599; and in the same year, sir Conyers Clifford, governor of Connaught, was slain in the battle of the Curlew mountains against O'Donnell; sir George Bingham, brother of sir Richard, governor of Connaught, was slain by the Irish; sir John Chichester, governor of Carrickfergus, was slain by the Mac Donnells, and sir Warham St. Leger was killed near Cork, by Hugh Maguire, in 1600. The earl of Essex, after his return from Ireland, was put to death in England, in 1601, and sir Walter Raleigh, who had been a commander in Ireland, was put to death for treason.

The cost of the war of Elizabeth is given by Morrison, Cox, and Borlase. In 1573, according to Cox, the money sent by Elizabeth into Ireland since her accession to the crown in 1558, that is, for a period of 15 years, amounted to £490,779, or nearly half a million of money. From 1573 to 1598, a period of 25 years of almost continued contest with the Irish chiefs, including the great war with the Geraldines of Munster, the cost must have been, on a moderate calculation, at least £30,000 a-year, that is, about the average of the preceding years, thus making £750,000. But the great war with Hugh O'Neill, and other chiefs, during the last four or five years of the reign of Elizabeth, from 1597 to 1602, was carried on with greater vigour, larger armies, and more enormous expenditure than before. Morrison and Cox give the amount of expenditure in these years as follows:

In 1598, the public expenditure for the support of the army and other charges, was	£299,111
Contingencies - - - - -	50,000
In 1599 - - - - -	222,961
In 1600 - - - - -	255,773
Contingencies - - - - -	50,000
In 1601 - - - - -	322,502
In 1602 - - - - -	290,733
Total - - - - -	1,491,080
Expenditure of the previous years, as above	1240,779
Total - - - - -	£2,731,859

Borlase, in his Reduction of Ireland, says, that the war of the Irish with Elizabeth, in the last four years, cost more than a million of money; and sir John Davis says, in his Tracts, p. 79, that the war with O'Neill cost "a million of sterling pounds at least," and Morrison says, that during the last four years the cost was more than one million, besides great Concordatums, great charge of munitions, and other great extraordinaries. The entire cost of the Irish wars in the reign of Elizabeth was, as above shown, nearly three millions sterling, an enormous expenditure in those days, the relative value of money being estimated as at least ten or twelve times greater than in modern times, that is, £1 at that time being equivalent to at least £10 at the present day; therefore, the cost of the war of Elizabeth may be estimated at about thirty millions sterling.

forward, with arrogance and fierceness, from the midst of their own force into the thick of Dermod's party, but they were not able to return back safe, for they were surrounded, felled and put to the sword, without reserve, by their enemies; it was a cause of lamentation what Dermod and his party committed on that occasion, viz., the slaying of the baron and of Thomas, and although they were young in age, they were heroic in fame and noble deeds.

O'Neill (earl of Tyrone), i. e. Hugh, the son of Feardorcha, son of Con Bacach, mustered a force in the month of January of this year, to march to the south of Ireland, to confirm his friendship with those who were in war alliance with him, and to wreak his vengeance on his enemies. O'Neill, having departed from the province of Ulster, proceeded along the borders of Meath and Brefney, (county of Cavan), and into Dealbna Mor (barony of Delvin, in Westmeath), and he committed great destruction through the country, until the baron of Delvin, namely, Christopher, the son of Richard, son of Christopher (Nugent), submitted to O'Neill on his own terms; he completely spoiled Machaire-Cuirene (barony of Kilkenny West, in Westmeath), and every thing belonging to Theobald Dillon. O'Neill afterwards marched to the gates of the town of Athlone, along the southern side of Clan-Colman, to Kinel Fiachy (the territory of Mac Geoghegan, in Westmeath), and into Farcall (O'Molloy's country, in King's county), in which country he remained encamped for nine nights, and the people of Farcall, of the south of Leinster, and of Westmeath, made their submission, and confirmed their friendship with him. O'Neill on leaving that country, proceeded over Slieve Bloom (Mountains on the borders of Tipperary, King's and Queen's counties) westward, and he sent forth three predatory parties in one day into the territory of Ely, on account of his animosity against O'Carroll, lord of Ely, (in Tipperary and King's county), namely, Calvach, the son of William Odhar, son of Fearganainm, in revenge of the inhuman murder, and sanguinary abominable massacre which he had committed on the Orgiellian gentlemen of the Mac Mahons, who were under his protection and in his employment, as we have stated in the preceding year; the ill fate of that evil deed befel the territory of Ely on that occasion, for all its cattle, wealth, and great property, that could be conveyed were carried away out of it, so that nothing was left in it but ashes, instead of its corn, and embers in place of its dwellings; immense numbers of their men, women, sons, and daughters, were left in a dying, perishing state; some gentlemen of his own tribe and lineage were left in the country, in opposition to O'Carroll. O'Neill proceeded onward to the borders of Bealach-Mor of Magh Dala, (near Burros, in Ossory), to Roscrea, to Ikerrin (in Tipperary), to Corco-Teineadh (the parishes of Templemore and Killea, with some adjoining districts, which was the patrimony of the O'Cahills, in Tipperary), marching forward from one encampment to another, until he arrived at the gate of the monastery of Holycross; they were not long there when the Holy Cross was brought to them, to shield and protect them, and the Irish gave large presents, alms, and many offerings, to its conservators and monks, in honour of the Almighty God; and they protected and respected the monastery, with its buildings, the lands appropriated for its use, and its inhabitants, in general. O'Neill remained for some part of the month of February of this time on the borders of Ele-Deisceartaidhe (i. e. South Ely, or the barony of Eliogarty, in Tipperary), of the western part of the country of the Butlers, along the river Suir and of Kilnamanagh. The earl of Ormond, namely, Thomas, the son of James, son of Pierce Butler, the earl of Kildare, i. e. Gerald, the son of Edmond, son of Gerald, and the baron of Delvin, namely, Christopher, the son of Richard, son of Christopher (Nugent), with all those who were in service and obedience to the queen, from that country to Dublin, were threatening every night to engage and attack O'Neill, and although they privately resolved on that, they did not put it into execution. O'Neill, after that, marched to the gates of Cashel, to which place the earl of Desmond came to meet him, namely, James, the son of Thomas Roe, son of James, son of John, who had been appointed by his command, and on his own authority, in opposition to the statutes of the sovereign, and they were rejoiced to meet each other; they afterwards proceeded westward across the Suir to Cnamhchoill, to Slieve-Muice, along the east of Slieve-Claire, to Bearnagh-Dhearg, to Clangibbon (barony of Condons and Clangibbons, in the county of Cork), to Roche's country (barony of Fermoy, in Cork), and to the estate of Barrymore (barony of Barrymore).¹ O'Neill neither injured nor devastated anything in those countries through which he passed, except of such as he found were unfriendly on account of family discord; he afterwards proceeded to Barry's country, as he was always acting in support of the queen, and the person who was at that time the Barry (lord Barrymore), was David, the son of James, son of Richard, son of Thomas, son of Edmond. O'Neill remained in the country until he preyed, and burned, and ransacked it from one corner to the other, both plains and high grounds, and smooth and rugged districts, so that no one considered or expected it would be occupied or inhabited for a long time. O'Neill afterwards proceeded beyond Cork, and across the river Lee southward, and he pitched his camp between the Lee and the river Bandon, on the borders of Muskerry and Carberry; all the Mac Carthys, north and south, came and submitted to O'Neill in that camp; thither came two who were in contention and strife with each other respecting the lordship of Desmond, namely, the son of Mac Carthy Riavaeh, i. e. Fingín (Florence), the son of Donogh, son of Donal, son of Florence, and the son of Mae Carthy More, namely, Donal, the son of Donal, son of Donal, son of Cormac Ladrach; thither came the sons of the lord of Ealla (the Mae Donoghs, lords of Duhallow); thither came the O'Donoghues, the O'Donovans, O'Mahonys; thither came the greater portion of the English and Irish of the two provinces of Munster, from the great town outward, in submission and obedience to O'Neill, and such of them as were not able to come, sent to him tokens of submission, and valuable presents, except Barry More before mentioned; the lord of Muskerry, namely, Cormac, the son of Dermot (Mac Carthy), and O'Sullivan Beare, i. e. Donal, the son of Donal, son of Dermot. O'Neill obtained eighteen hostages of the chiefs of Munster at that camp, and he continued for fifteen days consulting and arranging matters among the men of Munster, and pacifying them with one another, in their contentions.

Maguire, i. e. Hugh, the son of Cuchonacht, was along with O'Neill at that time; one day, in the month of March this year, shortly before the festival of St. Patrick, he proceeded with a small party of horse, and some foot, to scour the districts at a distance from the camp, and he did not halt until he arrived at the gates of Kinsale, and from thence he went to Rinn-Corrain (Rincorran near Kinsale), viz., the town of Barry Oge, in Kinel-Aodha (barony of Kinclea, in Cork); they afterwards repaired back with their preys and booty, and with a great deal of bees and provisions

A. D. 1600.

1. Localities in Tipperary, Limerick, and Cork.—The places above mentioned in the text were situated in Tipperary and Limerick, and the following account of these localities has been chiefly collected from information kindly communicated by Andrew O'Ryan of Gortkelly, Esq., in that county, a learned gentleman, possessed of much knowledge on the ancient topography and families of those localities, and clans of Tipperary, which he has furnished. Cnamheoill is considered to be the place called Donoghille, in the parish of the same name, and barony of Clanwilliam, anciently called Muisery Cuire, and this account appears to agree with the statement of Keating on the ancient divisions of Munster. Slieve Muce is situated on the borders of Tipperary, not far from Galbally, and forms one of the chain of hills called Slieve-na-Muck, at the foot of the Galtees, and overlooks the glen of Aherlow, on the borders of Limerick. Slieve Claire is further on in Limerick, and Bearn Dearg, or the Red Gap, are known by those names at the present day; the latter place is traditionally said to have been in ancient times the scene of a sanguinary conflict, from which it got the name of the Red Gap or Pass. From this place O'Neill appears to have crossed the river Funcheon to the castle of Fitzgerald, called the White Knight, at Mitchelstown, through Clangibbon and Condon's Country, in Cork, at the foot of the Kilworth mountains, thence by Castle Drining and Castle Lee to Fermoy, or Roche's Country, to Barry's Castle, and by Rathcorrine and Glanmlire to Cork. Slieve Eibhline, near Cashel, a place often mentioned in the Annals, is considered to be a large hill situated south-west of Mantle hill, near Golden, and between it and the parish of Clonoulty, in Tipperary, and it forms part of a chain of hills extending from Ballyowen to Cashel.

 The Pass of Plumes.—At the year 1599, p. 649, an account has been given of the battle of the Pass of Plumes, in which the O'Moores of Leix, the O'Dempseys, and others, attacked and slew great numbers of the earl of Essex's cavalry, on his expedition to Munster. The locality where this engagement took place, is stated, in Lewis's Topographical Dictionary, and in the Dublin Penny Journal for March, 1835, in the article on Lea Castle, to be Ballybrittas, or the Pass of Ballybrittas, in Queen's county, between Monastereven and Maryborough. But the learned antiquary Thomas L. Cooke, Esq. of Parsonstown in King's county, in a communication on the subject, which he has kindly furnished, considers, with great probability, that the conflict of the Pass of Plumes took place within about a mile of the village of Ballyroan, in the parish of Ballyroan, between Maryborough and Abbeylisc; the locality is still called The Pass, and there is a defile there, with a morass on the one side and the Cullinagh Hills on the other, and the river of Ballyroan in front, the whole presenting a most favourable place for an attack or ambuscade. Mr. Cooke quotes an Inquisition taken at Tankardstown, the 43rd of Elizabeth, or the year 1601, stating that Shane Mae Kedagh O'Moore, and Owney Mac Rory O'Moore (Anthony O'Moore), had entered into rebellion against the queen at Bealaronie (Ballyroan), on the 20th of June, in the 41st of her reign, that is in the year 1599; and other Inquisitions, taken at the same place and time, all of which find that many of the O'Moores and others entered into rebellion at Stradbally, confirm Mr. Cooke in his opinion that the O'Moores came from Stradbally, and surprised the army of Essex on his left flank, on his march towards Abbeylisc.

As they were fatigued at the end of the day, after the long journey, on account of the greatness of their prey and booty, what Maguire's people did was, to remain in the next place to them, to protect their prey and booty, and Maguire repaired, without stopping or halting, to proceed to O'Neill's camp. When Maguire had left the camp, in the beginning of that very day, intelligence was sent to Cork to sir Waram Salender (sir Warham St. Leger), vice-president of the two provinces of Munster, informing him of Maguire's departure from the camp, with a small force, as he had gone, and the direction in which he went; sir Warham did not neglect that affair, but immediately mustered an active troop of horse, armed and clad in armour, and marched out from Cork to a certain narrow defile, by which he expected Maguire would come on his return; having remained a short time in that ambush, they espied Maguire coming towards them, with his small party of horsemen, and they having perceived each other, it was not to retrace a step, a disposition of avoiding or an inclination to fly that the person who came thither displayed, but rather his courage was exalted, and he marched forward to slay his enemy, as he did on that occasion, for he and sir Warham attacked each other with fierce rage and determined animosity, and each of them wounded the other; but, however, Warham was slain on the spot by Maguire, and five of the horsemen who were along with sir Warham were killed in like manner by Maguire; he himself, however, was deeply cut and wounded in that conflict, and became incapable of carrying on the contest on that occasion, so that what he did was, to pass through them without remaining to fight any longer, and he did not proceed far from the place of encounter when the weakness of death came on him, so that he was obliged to dismount from his horse, and he immediately afterwards died. The death of Maguire was a cause of profound sorrow and severe affliction to O'Neill, and the Irish chiefs in general, and that was not to be wondered at, for he was the pillar of battle and conflict, the shield of protection and deliverance, a tower of defence and fortitude, and the mainstay of hospitality and generosity of the Orgiellians, and of most of the Irish in general in his time.²

2. Death of Maguire.—The above mentioned Hugh Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, was a very valiant chieftain, and commanded, for a period of about ten years, in the war with Elizabeth; he defeated the English forces in various engagements in Ulster and Connaught, of which accounts have been given in the course of these Annals, and he was particularly distinguished as a commander of cavalry under Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, whom he accompanied in all his expeditions. Sir John Davis, in his Tracts on Fermanagh, says, "albeit Hugh Maguire, that was slain in Munster, was indeed a valiant rebel, and the stoutest that ever was of his name." An account of the conflict between Maguire and St. Leger is given in the Pacata Hibernia, in Cox and Mac Geoghagan. Maguire is stated by Mac Geoghagan to have gone out from O'Neill's camp, to reconnoitre the country near Cork, and was attended at the time only by a few followers, amongst others a priest, with Niall O'Durnin, and Edmond Mac Caffry, his standard-bearer. About a mile from Cork he unexpectedly encountered sir Warham St. Leger, president of Munster, at the head of a party of 60 horsemen. In the Pacata it is stated that St. Leger was accompanied by several captains, and a guard of horse; and Fynes Morrison says that sir Henry Poer was also along with him. This encounter took place within about a mile of Cork, in February, according to the Pacata, but in March, according to these Annals. Cox says, that St. Leger rode out to take the air near Cork, when he accidentally met Maguire; but the Four Masters state that St. Leger went out with a party prepared to attack Maguire. The dauntless Maguire, though encountering fearful odds, struck spurs to his horse, and advanced like a lion, for he was a man who never turned his back to an enemy. It is stated in the Pacata that St. Leger instantly discharged a pistol at Maguire, and shot him, and he was also struck on the head by some of the horsemen. The valiant Maguire, though mortally wounded, summoned all his strength, and struck St. Leger such a blow with his sword, that he cleft his head through his helmet, of which wound he soon after died. Maguire then dashing onward, with desperate energy, cut his way through the ranks of horsemen, five of whom he slew, and escaped from them, but died of his wounds the same day. The sword of the ancient chiefs of the Maguires was some time in the possession of Mr. Geraghty, the publisher of these Annals; it was of excellent workmanship, of a scimitar form, but so heavy that it could hardly be wielded by any modern arm. Hugh Maguire was the last prince of Fermanagh, for none of the chiefs after his time possessed the power or property of their ancestors. On the death of Hugh, his brother, Cuchonacht or Constantine, became the Maguire, and joined O'Neill, but he had many contests for the lordship with another chief named Conor Roe, who joined the English, and was called the queen's Maguire. Sir John Davis, in his Tracts on Fermanagh, states that Conor Roe Maguire got a grant of the county of Fermanagh from the queen by letters patent, but he was afterwards persuaded to surrender his patent, and, on the submission of Cuchonacht, the country was divided between the two chiefs. On the plantation of Ulster with British colonies, in the reign of James I., almost the whole of Fermanagh was confiscated and transferred to English and Scotch settlers; but, according to Pynnar's Survey, 12,300 acres were regranted to Conor Roe Maguire, in the baronies of Magherastephana, Tirkennedy, Clankelly, and Knockninny. Bryan Roe Maguire, son of Conor Roe, was created baron of Enniskillen, by James I., and his son Conor, by a sister of the celebrated Owen Roe O'Neill, succeeded as second baron; he became an active leader in the great insurrection of 1641, and having laid a plan to seize the castle of Dublin, he was taken prisoner, sent to London, and confined in the Tower, where he remained a long time, and being tried for high treason, he was, in February, 1644, hanged and beheaded at Tyburn; an account of his trial is given in Temple's Irish Rebellion. Several other lords of Enniskillen, of the Maguires, are mentioned in de Burgo's Hibernia Dominicana, but they were merely nominal barons, having little or none of the property or power of their ancestors. Conor Maguire, son of Conor, who was executed at Tyburn, became the third baron, and his son Hugh was the fourth; Roger, his uncle, became the fifth baron; he was a colonel in the service of king James II., and sat in his

Some assert that O'Neill would not have returned from Munster 'till the following May, were it not for the death of Maguire after that manner, so that what he did was to proceed south-east of Cork, to the estate of Barry More (barony of Barrymore), to Roche's Country (barony of Fermoy), and to Clangibbon; he then took his leave of the Momonians, and he promised them that if he could get an opportunity, from the war carried on against him by the English, he would again visit them, to settle their disputes, arrange their affairs, and make peace between them; he took some of their chiefs as hostages, and some as prisoners, to bring them to Tyrone, and he left others of them in the keeping of the earl of Desmond, and of Redmond, the son of John Burke; he gave his own authority and warrant to Dermot O'Connor and to the sons of John Burke, for maintaining two thousand men in the country of the Geraldines, for the purpose that the earl of Desmond might have their aid and services. O'Neill afterwards proceeded, in the most direct roads, to Cliadh of Mal, the son of Ugaire (in the county of Limerick), to the river Suir, and by the south of Cashel; although the lord justice and the president (lord Mountjoy, and sir George Carew), had a large army both by land and sea, after having arrived in Dublin, on the first days of March, and although the earl of Thomond, and the earl of Ormond, were in Limerick, prepared to attack him on his return from the south, he passed them in marching back in the exact routes by which he had proceeded to Munster, until he arrived in Tyrone, without experiencing from them any disturbance or opposition, without an attack in any pass or defile, or the death of any worth notice on his side, except Maguire alone, as we have before stated.³

The earl of Ormond and the earl of Thomond proceeded from Limerick, along the river Suir, in pursuit of O'Neill, and he having passed them without battle or encounter, the earl of Thomond burned some corn and dwellings in Clangibbon, in the estate of the Ridire Fionn (the White Knight). These two earls proceeded into the country of the Butlers, and to Kilkenny, where they passed the Easter, and after the Easter holidays, they went to Dublin, to welcome and pay their respects to those new officers who had come to Ireland, namely, lord Mountjoy, the lord justice, and sir George Carew, president of the two provinces of Munster; when these earls had made their visit in Dublin, they returned back, without delay, accompanied by the president, until they arrived at Kilkenny. It was not long after that when a day was appointed for holding a conference between the earl of Ormond, and Anthony, the son of Rory Oge O'Moore, and each to be accompanied by a number of men in arms and armour, at that meeting; the earl of Ormond took with him, on his own side, the president and the earl of Thomond, to that conference; when both parties came to the place of parley, which had been selected between them, adjacent to Beul-Atha-Raghat (Ballyragget), they began to argue about their affairs, and complain of their wrongs against each other, until at length a gentleman of Anthony's party laid hold of the reins and trappings of the earl of Ormond's horse, and finally determined to make the earl prisoner; when parliament at Dublin, in 1689, but his estates were confiscated by king William, for his adherence to the House of Stuart. Philip, brother of Roger, was called the sixth baron, and was married to a daughter of sir Phelim O'Neill, general of the Ulster Irish, in 1641, by whom he had a son, Theophilus, called the seventh baron; his son Alexander, according to de Burgo, was the eighth baron, and was a captain in Buckley's regiment, in the Irish Brigades in the service of France.

3. O'Neill's Expedition to Munster.—Morrison says, "Tyrone, who had hitherto contented himself in the North, only making short excursions from thence into the Pale, being proud of his victories, and desirous to show his greatness abroad, resolved with his forces to measure the length of Ireland." O'Neill set out on this expedition from Tyrone, about the 20th of January, 1600, and on the 23rd arrived in Cavan, where he was joined by some forces of Brefney O'Reilly; he marched through Meath and Leinster, with a force, according to Morrison, of 2,500 foot and 200 horse. His object was to organise the forces of Leinster and Munster, and concert measures with his friend, James Fitzgerald, earl of Desmond. Morrison and Cox state that O'Neill, under pretence of a pilgrimage to Holycross in Tipperary, proceeded to organise the Irish of Munster; but it appears from the Annals, that he only incidentally visited the celebrated Cistercian abbey of Holy-cross. O'Neill organised the forces of Munster, and concerted measures with the earl of Desmond for carrying on the war; he deposed Donal Mac Carthy More, who had joined the English, and placed Florence Mac Carthy, chief of Carberry in Cork, in his stead, as lord of Desmond. After remaining more than a month in Munster, where he was honourably received by most of the chiefs, and recognised like one of the ancient kings of Ireland, and having overran the territories of the lords and chiefs who had joined the English, reduced them to subjection, and compelled them to give hostages, he returned towards Leinster, and appointed Richard Tyrrell, chief commander in that province. He then proceeded between Athlone and Mullingar, through Westmeath, and it is stated by Morrison and Cox that, on the 10th of March, the lord deputy Mountjoy proceeded with the English forces from Dublin, to Mullingar, to intercept O'Neill, but, before the deputy arrived, he had passed into Brefney O'Reilly. Morrison and Cox state that O'Neill left 1000 of his men with the earl of Desmond, and 800 with his ally Richard Butler, lord Mountgarret, and with a small force of only 600 men returned by rapid marches to Ulster.

the president and the earl of Thomond saw that affair they turned their horses back, and did not halt until they arrived at Kilkenny; but, however, the earl of Thomond was wounded in that rencounter; Anthony, the son of Rory (O'Moore), brought the earl of Ormond with him into the fastnesses of his territory, and it was a news of surprise throughout Ireland that the earl of Ormond should have been imprisoned in that place.⁴ In a week after the earl of Ormond was taken prisoner, the president and the earl of Thomond proceeded from Kilkenny to Waterford, from thence to Youghal, and from Youghal to Cork. When the earl of Desmond, and Florence, the son of Donogh Mac Carthy, received intelligence of their arrival in that place, they came with all their forces and formed an extensive encampment of tents, so that they completely surrounded Cork, north and south, in every direction; they remained for a whole fortnight in that manner, when a month's truce was agreed upon between Florence Mac Carthy and the president. After the truce was ratified between them, the earl of Desmond marched through the country to procure provisions for his Buannadha (Bonaghts or hired soldiers). When the president and the earl of Thomond learned that those who were opposed to them had separated from each other, and that the way from Cork to Limerick was clear to them to march, they proceeded with two or three hundred cavalry, and one or two thousand soldiers, from Cork to Mallow, from Mallow to Kilmallock, and from Kilmallock to Limerick. The earl of Desmond then marched into the Connelloes (in Limerick), with an immense force, to watch and reconnoitre the president and the earl of Thomond. It was at this time that a private correspondence was carried on between the president and the earl of Thomond, on the one side, and Dermot, the son of Dudley O'Connor, on the other; he was a person who was in the military service of the earl of Desmond, for hire and pay, precious gifts, and valuable property, for some years before this time, and who had then a great number of mercenary soldiers under his controul and command; the determination which Dermot's misfortune brought him to was, to deliver the earl of Desmond to the president, and to the earl of Thomond, in consideration of wealth and profit, and the freedom and benefit of an estate for himself, and for all those who joined him; he sent messengers privately with those conditions to the president, and the earl (of Thomond), and they respectively ratified their compacts. Dermot did not delay what he had undertaken, for he took the earl of Desmond prisoner, on one of the first days of the month of June of this year, in his own territory, and in the very centre of his country and lands, for Dermot's power was very great, and his men were very numerous in that country. After he had taken the earl prisoner, the place where he sent him to be guarded was, to one of the earl's own castles, viz., Caislen-an-Lissin (Castlelissen), in the very centre of the country of the Geraldines, and he put as many Conacian kerns as were requisite to defend and watch the castle into it along with the earl, to guard him in that castle; he himself proceeded to another part of the country, and sent his messenger to the president, and the earl of Thomond, to inform them of the affair, and demanding all that had been promised him for the earl. When

4. Capture of the Earl of Ormond.—An account of this affair is given in Morrison, Mac Geoghegan, Cox, and the Pacata Hibernia. On the 7th of April, 1600, sir George Carew, president of Munster, accompanied by the earl of Thomond, lord Audley, and many officers, with a force of 700 men, proceeded to Naas and Carlow, and, on the third day, arrived at Kilkenny. They were visited by Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, who informed them that he had appointed a parley, to arrange some disputes with the chief Anthony O'Moore. On the 11th they all rode out together from Kilkenny, with a body of their forces, and met O'Moore at a place called Corrone-duffe, in Idough, near Ballyragget, in the barony of Fassadinin, in Kilkenny, towards the borders of Queen's county. O'Moore came forward from the woods, where he left his forces, and was accompanied only by a few pikemen. The forces of both parties were at some distance, when the conference took place; O'Moore was accompanied by a Jesuit named Archer, and Ormond, having entered into a controversy with him, called him a traitor, on which O'Moore's people became enraged, and one of them, having seized the earl, dragged him off his horse and made him prisoner. Carew and Thomond, who were convenient, became alarmed, and ran to his assistance; in attempting to rescue the earl, one of his men was killed by O'Moore's pikemen, five were wounded, and fourteen of them taken prisoners. O'Moore laid hands on Carew, but the earl of Thomond rushed to his assistance, and they both escaped, says Morrison, by the swiftness of their horses; but the earl of Thomond was wounded in the back with the thrust of a pike. A curious plate, with a representation of this affair, is given in the Pacata Hibernia. The countess of Ormond addressed letters to O'Neill for the earl's liberation, which she obtained on condition, says Mac Geoghegan, that he would not again act against his religion or his country, and that he should give hostages for his fidelity. It is stated in Lodge's Peerage that Ormond was detained prisoner by O'Moore 'till the 12th of June, when he was set at liberty by delivering hostages for the payment of £3000, if he should seek any retaliation for his injury; and it is stated in the Annals at p. 670, that Ormond was obliged to deliver, for his release, sixteen hostages of the sons of the principal persons in the country.

the Geraldines received intelligence of the capture of the earl, and of the predicament in which he was placed, the race of Maurice Fitzgerald collected from all quarters, on a certain day, to the vicinity of Castlelissen; thither came Fitzmaurice of Kerry, namely, Patrick, the son of Thomas, son of Edmond; the knight of Kerry, namely William, the son of John, son of William; the knight of Glyn, i. e. Edmond, the son of Thomas, son of Edmond, son of Thomas; the White Knight, namely Edmond, the son of John; the earl's own brother, i. e. John, the son of Thomas Roe, and a gentleman of the Burkes, whose name was William, the son of Shane-na-Seamar, son of Richard Saxanach, who had been engaged along with the earl, since he was appointed earl, till that time. After all these had assembled together, they were not long in consultation when they came to the resolution of dividing themselves on the four quarters of the castle, to attack it forthwith, and to have no regard for the safety of their bodies, or precious lives, until they liberated the earl out of it, either by persuasion or force; they then proceeded directly until they arrived at the walls of the castle, and they did not mind any opposition or injury they experienced, and made little of all that were slain and destroyed of their people, until they at length took the castle from the guards, and liberated the earl out of it by force, without paying a ransom for him, or without himself being wounded, or losing a drop of blood, and they gave quarter to the guards. That capture of the earl of Desmond became a disgrace and dishonour to Dermot O'Connor, throughout Ireland, and when the earl went amongst his people, he commanded Dermot, and every Connaughtman who was along with him and their kerns, to quit the country, which they accordingly did forthwith, and they proceeded from the country of the Geraldines with much wealth and treasure, moveable property and cattle, and it was not easy to enumerate all that the Conacians carried away with them, of various kinds of property, before and at that time, from the country of the Geraldines, during the period of their own contentions with each other, till then,⁵

In the month of July, after that, the president

5. Capture of the earl of Desmond and death of O'Connor—These events are related in the Paeata Hibernia, and by Morrison, Cox, and Mac Geoghegan. The above-mentioned earl of Desmond was James Fitz-Thomas Fitzgerald, who had been appointed earl of Desmond by Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, and was an active ally of O'Neill against the queen. He was commonly called by the Anglo-Irish the sugan earl, signifying the earl of straw, as his title was not recognised by the English. He was a distinguished commander in Munster for some years against the queen, and Cox says he was the handsomest man of his time. The plot for his capture was formed by sir George Carew, president of Munster, and this treacherous transaction is fully detailed in the Paeata Hibernia. Dermot O'Connor Don, above-mentioned, was a chief of the O'Connors of Roscommon, a very valiant man, who, with a body of 1500 kerns and galloglasses from Connaught, had entered the service of the earl of Desmond. O'Connor was married to Margaret, daughter of Gerald Fitzgerald, the celebrated earl of Desmond who was put to death by the English in Munster, in 1583, as related in the Annals. The lady Margaret, to promote the interests of her brother, James Fitzgerald, whom the queen had about this time appointed earl of Desmond, in opposition to the other James, appointed earl by O'Neill, and influenced by the offers of Carew, induced her husband O'Connor to undertake the capture of the earl, and amongst the parties who conspired in this transaction is mentioned Miler Magrath, archbishop of Cashel, as one of the chief agents. O'Connor was promised a reward of £1000 for his treachery, as soon as he took Desmond prisoner, and, to give a colour to the affair, Carew wrote with his own hand a letter addressed, as it were, to the earl of Desmond, in which the earl is represented as conspiring against the life of O'Connor, and promising to deliver him dead or alive into the hands of Carew. This forged letter was sent by Carew to O'Connor, who was cognizant of the plan, and he was to produce it, as if intercepted by him, to justify to his soldiers his taking of Desmond; and thus O'Connor concealed his treachery from his own followers, having apparently a good excuse for seizing the earl. These things being contrived, O'Connor sent a message to Desmond, to meet him at a place of parley on the 18th of June, to concert measures concerning the war. The earl came to the place appointed in Conello, on the borders of Limerick and Cork, attended by some of his men, and was there met by O'Connor with a party of his soldiers; after some time a controversy arose between the marshal of O'Connor and Murrough Mac Sheehy, the marshal of Desmond, and then O'Connor laid bands on the earl, and made him a prisoner in the name of O'Neill, declaring him a traitor, and to justify this proceeding to his followers, he produced Carew's fictitious letter as a proof of Desmond's guilt, saying he had intercepted it, and thus falsely charging the earl as having conspired against his life. Desmond was sent by O'Connor to the fortress of Castlelshin, situated in the great wood and fastnesses of Conello, on the borders of Cork, Limerick, and Kerry, the ruins of which castle still remain in the parish of Knoektemple, in the county of Cork, near the mansion of sir James Fitzgerald. The Geraldines, with Pierce Laey and others, having assembled their followers, took the fortress, and liberated the earl on the 26th of June. Dermot O'Connor and his Connaughtmen were then expelled out of Munster for his treachery to Desmond, but the young earl of Desmond being sent to Ireland by the queen in the same year (1600), O'Connor resolved to repair to him in Munster, the earl being his brother-in-law, as before stated. The lady Margaret, the earl's sister, got for her husband, O'Connor, and his followers, a safe conduct from Carew, and also from sir Arthur Savage, governor of Connaught, and the earl of Clanrickard, and Carew sent 100 foot to guard O'Connor as soon as he should enter Thomond. O'Connor set out in October, and proceeded through Clanrickard to O'Shaughnessy's country near Gort, in Galway, where he and his party were attacked by Theobald Burke of the Ships, who commanded 100 foot in the queen's pay; O'Connor having taken refuge in an old church, Burke burned it over his head, and on coming out of it he was taken prisoner, and 40 of his men slain; on the following morning Burke cut off O'Connor's head, alleging that he did so in revenge for the death of his cousin, Lord Burke, who was slain in Munster, in a conflict with O'Connor. The lord deputy Mountjoy, according to the Paeata Hibernia, cashiered and dismissed Theobald of the Ships from the queen's service for this daring deed. Dermot O'Connor gained nothing by his treachery to Desmond for he never received the thousand pounds he had been and the earl of Thomond, with a large force of soldiers, proceeded from Limerick westward, on the northern side of the Shannon, through the county of Clare, until they arrived at Baile-Meg-Colmain in Triocha-ced of eastern Corcobaiscin (barony of Clonderlaw); they then crossed the Shannon in boats to Cloch-Ghleanna (the Rock of the Glen), a town (or castle), which lies on the southern banks of the Shannon, and was one of the towns of the Knight of the Glyn; and it was from that Glen in which the town is situated, viz., Gleann-Corbraighe, the knight took his title, and also that Rock, to which the great clamorous force came, derived its name; large ordnance was conveyed in boats from Limerick to the president and the earl of Thomond, to the same castle, and having planted it against the castle, they reduced it, at the end of two days, and demolished a portion of it by the heavy ordnance, after which they assaulted it in all directions, and they slew twenty or forty of the officers and common soldiers of the Knight's people, who were guarding the castle, along with many women and young people; some of the men of the president, and of the earl, were also slain by the guards, and that castle would not be easily taken, were it not that his people separated from the earl of Desmond before that time. (This was the castle of Fitzgerald, the Knight of Glyn, on the banks of the Shannon in Limerick, towards the borders of Kerry). When O'Connor Kerry, namely John, the son of Conor O'Connor, learned that the forces of the country were diminished, and that Cloch-Gleanna (the Rock of the Glyn), had been taken without slaughter or hazard, he went to the president and earl (of Thomond), and he promised to be in alliance with his sovereign from that forth, and he gave up his castle of Carrigafoyle (on a small island in Kerry, near the mouth of the Shannon), as a guarantee and security to the president and the earl. When it became generally known in Kerry, and in Clan Maurice, that the queen's people gained those advantages over their opponents, they commenced to demolish their castles, and to leave their residences and family seats wide open; they took away with them their women and people behind the rugged-topped hills, and into intricate and retired woods, from along the river Mang (in Kerry), and the borders of Desmond. When the president and the earl of Thomond learned that the inhabitants of the entire country for the most part, on each side of the Feale and of Casan had fled (the rivers Feale and Casan, in Kerry), they sent soldiers to garrison Leic-Snamha (Lixnaw), which was the fortress of Fitzmaurice; so that they had garrisons in Lixnaw, Carrigafoyle, the Rock of Glyn, Askeaton, Fianann, Tralee, Ardfert, Lios-Cathain, (castles in Kerry and Limerick), and in promised, besides, he lost his life in consequence of that transaction; the lady Margaret was to meet Carew at Kilmallock, and receive the money, but before that affair was arranged, the earl of Desmond was rescued from Castleishin, and O'Connor was refused his reward. The earl of Desmond's forces being dispersed in the course of the war, he was reduced to great distress, and on the 29th of May, 1601, while concealed in a cave in the mountain of Slieve-grot, in Tipperary, he was taken prisoner by Fitzgibbon, called the White Knight, chief of the Clan Gibbon, a branch of the Geraldines of Munster, hence he is called Fitzgerald by some writers; the White Knight was bribed by Carew to betray Desmond, and having delivered him up at Shandon Castle, he received from Carew, says Mac Geoghegan, a reward of £1000 for this infamous act. The earl was some time secured in irons at Shandon castle, and, being tried at Cork, was condemned for treason. About the same time the celebrated chief, Florence Mac Carthy of Desmond, who was in alliance with O'Neill, was likewise, by the contrivance of Carew, taken prisoner, and he and the earl of Desmond were sent together prisoners to London, on the 14th of August, 1601, and confined in the tower, where, after an imprisonment of seven years, the earl died in 1608, and was buried in the chapel of the Tower. Another plot was laid by Carew, in 1600, against John Fitz Thomas Fitzgerald, the earl of Desmond's brother, the particulars of which are given in the Pacata Hibernia. In the year 1600 this John Fitzgerald was posted, with 200 men, in a strong fortress on an island in Lough Guire, a lake about three miles from Bruff, in Limerick; in May, the president, Carew, attacked the place with his cannon, and one Owen Grome, a stranger from the North, says

Carew, who had the command of the castle, delivered it to the queen's forces on promise of pardon, and receiving a sum of £60 in money, which was paid, by the president's order, by one Rowley. At this time John Nugent, one of the Irish leaders, was induced by Carew to plot against the life of John Fitzgerald, and his brother the earl, the president having promised him not only pardon, but also "some store of crowns to relieve his wants hereafter." Nugent, on these conditions, promised that he would soon ruin the earl of Desmond, or his brother John. Carew says that Nugent was so valiant and daring that he would attempt any thing. John Fitzgerald rode forth from his fortress at Lough Guire, towards the fastness of Arloghe, where most of his men were posted, and accompanied only by a gentleman named John Coppinger; Nugent, as soon as their backs were turned, following them at a short distance, came up with a pistol in his hand, charged with two bullets, prepared to do the bloody deed, when Coppinger, perceiving his intent, instantly snatched the pistol from his hand, crying out "Treason!" whereupon Fitzgerald suddenly turned upon the assassin. Nugent thought to escape by the goodness of his horse, and spurred hard, but the horse stumbled, and he was taken, and having on examination confessed his intent, was hanged by Fitzgerald on the next day. It is stated in the Pacata that Nugent, when going to be hanged, confessed that it was his intention, as soon as he had killed Fitzgerald, to have gone to the camp of the earl of Desmond, to communicate the first news of his brother's death, and then to call him aside and kill him. This John Fitzgerald, in 1603, retired to Spain, where he was styled earl of Desmond, and died at Barcelona.

the towns of Clanmaurice in general, except Lios-Tuathail (Listowel, in Kerry). The president and the earl of Thomond returned to Limerick, after having gained sway on that expedition, and the most of the people of Connello, of the county of Limerick, and of Kenry, came to them, having turned against the earl of Desmond, and joined their sovereign.

Fitzmaurice of Kerry, namely, Patrick, the son of Thomas, son of Edmond, son of Thomas, died in the middle of his age, and prime of life, after having been joined with the earl of Desmond in the forementioned war; it was a cause of lamentation that a man of his personal figure, blood, and hospitality, should have so died before his time; his son Thomas succeeded him.

The Roche, namely, Maurice, the son of David, son of Maurice, son of David (Roche, lord of Fermoy), died in the month of June of this year; he was a young man distinguished for his gentleness, personal figure, and learning in Latin, Irish, and English, and his son David succeeded him.

O'Carroll (of Ely). i. e. Calvach, the son of William Odhar, son of Ferganaim, son of Maol-roona, was slain in the month of July, by some inferior gentlemen of the O'Carrolls and O'Meaghers; that Calvach was a warlike, defending man, and a strong arm against his English and Irish neighbours; he was a knight by title and honour, by authority of his sovereign.

6. Death of O'Moore.—An account of this celebrated chieftain Anthony O'Moore, lord of Leix, erroneously called Owney O'Moore, by various writers, has been given at page 632 in these Annals. He was, for a period of about ten years, a distinguished commander in Leinster, in the war against Elizabeth, and was a man of great valour and abilities; he defeated the English forces in many engagements, and was particularly famous for his attack on the army of the earl of Essex at the Pass of Plumes, his capture of the earl of Ormond, and other daring exploits. An account of his death is given by Morrison, Cox, and Mae Geoghegan; on the 12th of August, 1600, according to Morrison, the lord deputy Mountjoy, with a body of 560 foot, 60 horse, and some volunteers, marched to Naas, and thence to Philipstown, in King's county, and took a prey of 200 cows, 500 sheep, and 700 garrons, and burned the country; on the 16th he was joined by sir Oliver Lambert, and they marched to a fastness on the borders of Leix and Offaly, where they were attacked by Anthony Mae Rory O'Moore, and captain Richard Tyrrell. In the encounter, Mountjoy was in great danger, having his horse killed under him, and he escaped with difficulty through a bog; but in the course of the conflict, after many had fallen on both sides, the valiant O'Moore himself was slain—Mae Geoghegan says, the Irish gained the victory, but its value was far outweighed by the death of O'Moore, whose loss was irreparable to the Irish of Leinster; after his death says Morrison, "they were so discouraged that they never after held up their heads." O'Moore was succeeded in command by his relative Redmond O'Moore, but the O'Moores, O'Lalors, O'Conors, Many quarrels, conflicts, sanguinary martyrdoms, effusions of blood, in which immense numbers of people were destroyed, took place between the English and Irish of Leinster in this summer.

Anthony O'Moore set at liberty the earl of Ormond, in the month of June, and he received sixteen hostages of the eldest sons and heirs of the most honourable gentleman under the earl, as sureties for the fulfilment of every compact and article that were agreed upon for his release. The same Anthony, the son of Rory Oge, son of Rory Caoch O'Moore, for a long time an illustrious, famous, and celebrated gentleman, was slain by the queen's people, in a fierce and desperate conflict, which was fought between them in the vicinity of Leix, in the month of August of this year, and his death gave a check to the valour, bravery, and courage of the Irish of Leinster, and of all Ireland; he was the sole rightful heir to his estate, and he gained the government of his patrimony by the power of his hand, and determined strength of heart, from the grasp of tyrants and foreigners, who were reducing its former greatness for a long time before that, until he brought it under his own controul and government, and under the management of its officers and soldiers, according to the custom of the Irish, so that none of the towns of his patrimony was out of his possession, from one side to the other, except alone Port-Leix (Maryborough).⁶

O'Kellys, O'Cavenaghs, and Keatings, were soon after compelled to submit to the lord deputy. It is stated by Morrison, and Cox, that Mountjoy remained in Offaly till the 23rd of August, during which time he continued devastating the King's and Queen's counties, Carlow, and Kildare, and destroyed more than ten thousand pounds worth of corn; and he carried off immense preys, amounting to 1000 cows, 500 garrons, and a great number of sheep; at the same time sir Oliver Lambert slaughtered great numbers of the inhabitants. The inhuman Mountjoy, and his barbarian soldiers, thus adopted the system of subduing the Irish by destroying their crops and corn, and carrying off their cattle, thereby producing famine, a plan which they put extensively into execution in various parts of Ireland, of which ample accounts are given by Morrison, Cox, and others; on these devastations in Offaly, Morrison says, "our captains and the common soldiers did cut down with their swords all the rebels' corn, to the value of £10,000, and upward, the only means by which they were to live. It seemed incredible that, by so barbarous inhabitants, the ground should be so manured, the fields so orderly fenced, the towns so frequently inhabited, and the highways and paths so well beaten, as the lord deputy here found them; the reason whereof was, that the queen's forces, during those wars, never till then came among them." A very sufficient cause for the prosperity of the country. In these Annals, in the course of this year, an account is given of the methods adopted by the English, for the destruction of the crops, by harrows, seythes, sickles, &c. After the death of Anthony, the powerful Clan of the O'Moores, whose chiefs were for many

After his strange insurgents had parted from the earl of Desmond, he proceeded with the small force he then had along with him to Castlemaine, and had none of the Geraldine gentlemen in his alliance, or aiding him, except the son of the deceased Fitzmaurice, whom we have mentioned, namely, Thomas, the son of Patrick; the Knight of the Glyn, and young Pierce do Les (Pierce de Lacy).

A written despatch came from England to Munster in the month of July of this year, and the purport of it was, that the young son of the earl of Desmond, namely, James, the son of Gerald, son of James, son of John, who was in imprisonment with the queen for the crimes of his father, and his father's brothers, who had been at war with her, was set at liberty from his confinement by the queen, after he had gone under her mercy, and after he had been twenty-one years imprisoned by her; this dispatch also contained, that it should be proclaimed in all the countries, and great towns of of Munster, that this young man, namely James, the son of Gerald, was coming over as an honourable earl, by the authority of the sovereign, and that every person on his estate, who was in war till then, would be restored to his blood and honours, and his crimes forgotten, on condition of returning back to the sovereign and this young earl. The time the forementioned young earl came to Ireland, having a great force along with him from the queen, was in the month of October, precisely; when he arrived in Cork, the president and the earl of Thomond went to him, to welcome him; they afterwards respectively came to Mallow, Kilmallock, and Limerick; all those who inhabited the country of the Geraldines, on beholding the true lineal descendant of the family, came to that young earl, and the party whom James, the son of Thomas, had in care of Castlemaine (in Kerry), delivered the castle to the young earl, namely, James, the son of Gerald; and the earl gave possession of it to the president; there was no town in the possession of Fitzmaurice, namely, Thomas, except Listowel alone, as we have stated, and even that was taken by the governor of Kerry, namely, sir Charles Volment (Wilmot), in the month of November of this year.⁷

The daughter of the earl of Thomond, namely, Onora, the daughter of Conor, son of Donogh O'Brien, the wife of Fitzmaurice before mentioned, fled from the plundering and insurrection of her husband, to her own country, under the protection of the president, and of the earl of Thomond; and she died soon after at the Daingean (fortress), of Mac Mahon, and was buried in the monastery of Ennis.

The chief constable of the Geraldines, namely, Roderick, the son of Manus, son of Edmond Mac Sheehy, died, Dermod, the son of Dudley, son of Tuathal O'Connor, having left the country of the Geraldines, after he had taken prisoner the earl of Desmond, namely, James, son of Thomas, as we have stated, and from whom he had been again forcibly rescued, that Dermod arrived in the estate of O'Connor Roe, at the Cluainte (in Roscommon); he obtained protection, from the lord justice, who was doing service and acting for the queen in Leinster and Ulster, in the harvest of this year, until the young earl of Desmond, of whom we have treated, namely, James, the son of Gerald, came to Ireland. When he came, he sent for Dermod, for Dermod had ages lords of Leix, and famous warriors, fell into complete decay, and their territories were transferred to British settlers. The last celebrated chief of the name was Rory, or Roger O'Moore, of Kildare, one of the principal leaders in the great insurrection of 1641, a man of great spirit and abilities, who planned this remarkable rising of the Irish for the recovery of their confiscated lands, and national independence.

7. The Queen's earl of Desmond.—When Gerald Fitzgerald, the celebrated earl of Desmond, was put to death by the English in Munster, in 1583, his son James, then a child, was sent to England, and confined in the Tower, where he remained a prisoner till the year 1600, when the queen, advised by Cecil, according to Cox, considering that his presence in Ireland might promote the English interest, she sent him over to Ireland, in opposition to the other James Fitzgerald, who was called O'Neill's earl of Desmond, with the hope that he might win over the followers of the House of Desmond, and bring them under obedience to the crown. The queen's earl of Desmond was restored, in blood and honours, by letters patent, and sent over, under the conduct of captain Price, to Carew, the president of Munster. He landed at Youghal, on the 14th of October, and proceeded to Mallow to meet Carew; he next went to Cork, where, says, Cox, the inhabitants, finding he was a Protestant, refused to entertain him, so that he was fain to intrude himself on the mayor. He went thence to Limerick, accompanied by Miler Magrath, archbishop of Cashel, and on Saturday, came to Kilmallock, where great multitudes went to see him, to welcome the heir of the old House of Desmond; but seeing him go to the Protestant Church on Sunday, all the people, and even his relatives the Geraldines, forsook him to a man, and, according to Cox, and Mac Geoghegan, treated him with every contumely, and the most profound contempt. The earl, finding himself forsaken by all his friends, returned to London in the same year, where he soon after died, in 1601, under suspicion of having been poisoned.

married a sister of that earl, while engaged in the war of the Geraldines, the year before that; and some assert that it was through her, James, the son of Thomas, was taken prisoner, as she considered her own brother might more readily succeed when he was set aside. When the earl's dispatch reached Dermot, he prepared to go at his invitation, by the permission and protection of the lord justice, and of the president of the two provinces of Munster; on his proceeding through the north-west of the province of Connaught, to cross the Shannon to Limerick, he was pursued by Theobald of the Ships, the son of Richard of the Iron, and by David, the son of Ulick-an-Timchill (Burke), through enmity, and having overtaken him near Gort, while he had only a small party along with him, they beheaded Dermot, finding he had only a small force; and although he was then so circumstanced, it was not long before that time when that party would not have found it practicable to attack him, for he was a commander of fifteen hundred men, and he himself was very valiant; but, however, none can escape death when his last day arrives.

The lord of Slieveardagh (in Tipperary), namely James, the son of Pierce, son of James Butler, died in the winter of this year.

Redmond Burke, the son of Shane-na-Seamar, son of Rickard Saxanaeh, was a distinguished and illustrious gentleman at this time according to the customs of the Irish; he and his brethren, John Oge, William, and Thomas, remained in Ormond and in Ely during the summer, harvest, and winter of this year, and the forces of those sons of John Burke were so great and numerous, that they devastated and laid waste the neighbouring countries and cantreds; they took many castle towns in Ely and in Ormond, on that occasion, and of those were the Roin, Bel-Atha-Dungair, and Cuil-O'nDudhubhain in Ely, and Port-a-Tolehain in Ormond.⁸

After the fall of Anthony, the son of Rory Oge O'Moore, as we have stated, Leix was overrun by the Saxons, who began to repair their lime-stone habitations, and to settle in the ancient residences of the race of Conall Cearnach, to whom the territory of Leix was hereditary, for there was not a worthy heir equal to Anthony to defend it against them.

The O'Conors Faily, namely, the tribe of Bryan, son of Cahir, son of Con, son of Calvaeh, were in alliance with the Irish for three or four years till this time, and during that period they took and demolished the most of the castles of Offaly, except Dangan (Philipstown, in King's county), and a few others. The lord justice of Ireland went there about the Lammas (August), of this year, with many harrows, great iron rakes, and with a great deal of scythes and sickles, and cut down and destroyed the crops of the country, ripe and unripe, and in consequence of this the inhabitants of that country went into flight, banishment and exile, into Ulster and other countries, until the end of this year.

Donal Spainagh, the son of Donogh, son of Cahir Carraeh O'Cavenagh, made peace with the lord justice, in the harvest precisely; the sons of Fiacha Mac Hugh (O'Byrne), the son of John, made peace with him in like manner.

The English fleet, which had been ordered by the queen and the council of England to be sent to Ireland, to act against the province of Ulster, at the time lord Mountjoy was appointed lord justice over Ireland, at the festival of St. Patrick precisely, as we have stated, was preparing and making ready, without cessation or delay in the most expeditious and active manner possible on that occasion in England, with all necessities required, for it was a great vexation of mind to the queen of England, and to the council both here and there, the defence and stand which the Tircconnallians, Tyronians, and the Ultonians in general, with all those who were in alliance with them, made in opposition to them; and they also remembered, and it was like a concealed disease in their hearts, all that were slain and destroyed of their people, all they spent of their money and treasure, by the

8. Castles in Ely and Ormond.—The castle at Roin, above mentioned, is considered to be Castleroan, near Dunkerrin, in the King's county, on the borders of Tipperary. Bel-atha-Dungair was in Ely O'Carroll, in the King's county, towards the borders of Tipperary, about a mile north of Roserea. Port-a-Tolehain, is now called the castle of Redwood, on the banks of the Shannon, in Lower Ormond, between Portumna and the little Brosna river, and part of the townland is called Port-land. Baile-ui-Eachdach, before mentioned in the Annals, is now called Ballyhoctor, near Redwood castle, and there are some ancient tombs of the O'Kennedys in the ruined church of Lorra. This information has been communicated by the learned Thomas L. Cooke, of Parsonstown, Esq.

war in Ireland till then, so that the resolution they came to was, to send the forementioned fleet to Ireland, which put into the port of Dublin, in the month of April of this year; from thence they sailed, in the beginning of summer, by the advice of the earl of Clanrickard, and of the earl of Thomond, and they were commanded to proceed to the Lake of Feaval, the son of Lodan (Lough Foyle, between Derry and Donegal); they afterwards sailed along the left hand side (that is the eastern side), of Ireland, and entered port at that place where they were directed. After they landed, they erected on both sides of the harbour three forts, with trenches in the earth, as they had been ordered in England; one of those forts was on O'Neill's part of the country, in the neighbourhood of O'Kane's territory, viz., Dun-na-Long (the fortress of the Ships), and two forts in O'Donnell's country, one of which was at Culmore, on the estate of O'Dogherty, in the barony of Inisowen, and another fort south-west of it, in Derry Columkille. The English immediately began sinking trenches about them, and constructing a strong earthen mound, and a great rampart, so that they were in a state of defence against their enemies; and these were stronger, and more defensive, than courts of lime and stone, or citadels, on the building of which much time and immense labour might be spent. They then demolished the monastery and cathedral, and such as remained of the ecclesiastical buildings in the town, of which they made houses and apartments. The name of the general who was with them was Henry Docwra; he was a distinguished knight, of wisdom and ingenuity, and a pillar of battle and valour; six thousand was the number that came to that place, and, after they arrived at Derry, they considered Culmore and Dun-na-Long of little consequence. The English, for a long time, were so much afraid and in dread, that they did not come outside of the ramparts, except a short distance, and a great number of them were on guard every night, lest they might be surprised by an attack, and they were seized with distemper and disease, on account of the confinement of the place in which they were, and the heat of the summer weather, and great numbers of them died of that sickness. With respect to O'Donnell, when he perceived that they were not in the habit of coming outside of their encampments, through fear and dread, he considered them of no consequence, and he collected his forces to march into the south of the province of Connaught, to plunder the districts about Slieve-Echtge (Slievebaughta, in Galway, on the borders of Clare), and Thomond in particular, because he had good reason, for the the earls, namely, the earl of Clanrickard and the earl of Thomond, were those who induced the lord justice and the council to send that great armed force against him, to engage him in his own country, away from them, on account of his frequent incursions into their territories. Having determined on that resolution, he left O'Dogherty, chief of Innisowen, namely, John Oge, the son of John, son of Felim O'Dogherty, to watch the foreigners, that they might not come to plunder his country; he also left Niall Garv O'Donnell, and others of his forces, to guard against them on the western side, between them and Triochoa-Ced of Enda, the son of Niall (i. e. the Triochoa-Ced, or barony of Enda, the son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, now the barony of Raphoe, in Donegal). After that he (O'Donnell), collected his forces to march across the river Erne westward, and in the first place he took with him all those who were under his controul in Ulster, in that army. All the Conacians at the same time, from the river Suck (between Galway and Roscommon), to Bundrowis (near Ballyshannon), and from the west of Tyrawley (in Mayo), to Brefney O'Reilly (county of Cavan), were expecting and waiting his coming to them at Ballymote, after they had gone thither at his command; of the Conacians who were there waiting for him were O'Rourke, namely, Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan, son of Bryan Ballach, son of Owen; O'Conor Sligo, i. e. Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, son of Teige, son of Cathal Oge, with all those of the districts which lie northward from the Curlew mountain to the sea; O'Conor Roe, namely, Hugh, the son of Torlogh Roe, son of Teige Buighe, son of Cathal Roe, with the entire of his force; Mac Dermott of Moylurg, namely, Conor, the son of Teige, son of Owen, son of Teige, with his people, and Mac William Burke, i. e. Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotach, son of John, son of Oliver, with his party. When O'Donnell, with his forces from Ulster, joined these Conacians at Ballymote, he marched through Corran (in Sligo), through the centre of Moy Ai, of Finnbeanach (in Roseommon), to Clan Conway, to the territory of Maine, son of Eochy, and to the centre of Clan-riekard (all in Galway), without battle or conflict, and without any being injured from him or by him; and he halted and encamped in the west of Clanriekard, in the country of Redmond (Burke, baron of Leitrim, in Galway), on Saturday evening, and the festival of St. John (24th of June), was on the following Tuesday. Notice was sent into Thomond before him at that time, and they expected he would not proceed from the place where he happened to be on Sunday night, till day light on Monday morning; that was not what he did, but rose early on Sunday morning, and marched forward through Redmond's country to Kinel-Aodha (on the borders of Clare), to Kinel-Dungaile, and to upper Clan-Cuilein (both in the baronies of Tullagh and Bunratty, county of Clare), and crossed the Forcus (river Fergus) westward, after having plundered the most of those territories before the middle of the day. O'Donnell encamped that night on the banks of the river Fergus, to the west of Cluain-Ramhata (Clonroad), after having burned the entire of Ennis, except the monastery; he sent forth his predatory parties to plunder the surrounding districts, and far and wide did those scouring parties extend asunder, for they overran, preyed, burned, plundered, and devastated, from the same time of day till night, all that lay from Craig-ui-Chiordubhain, in the lower part of the territory, in Triothead-Ced-na-nOilen (the barony of Islands), to Cathair-Murhadha, in western Coreabaiscin (barony of Moyarta), to the gate of Kilmurry (in the barony of Ibriekane), to Cathair-Ruis, and to the plain in Ibriekane, to the gate of Baile-Eoin-Gobhan, in Coreomroe, and Boithe-Neill in Kinel-Fearmaie (barony of Inehiquin).⁹ Many a feast fit for a worthy gentleman, or for the lord of a territory, was enjoyed by parties, consisting of four or five of O'Donnell's people, under the cover of a hedge, or at the side of a bush, during that night in Thomond. O'Donnell, on the following morning of Monday, steadily and slowly, without mustering or hurrying, repaired with his forces from their wide extended tents full of people, and they began to march on their way directly through Thomond, north-east by the borders of Hy Corbmaie, through the centre of Kinel Fearmaie (barony of Inehiquin), into Burren, and arrived before night at the monastery of Coreomroe, and to Carcrair-na-gCleirach, with their preys and booty. The forces continued traversing and overrunning the country about them nearly the entire day, and they did not leave a dwelling or habitation worth notice that they did not burn and completely destroy; they left the entire country after them, as far as could be seen, in one continued dark vapour and smoke, in every direction around them, and the vastness of the dark clouds of smoke, which rose above them in every place they directed their course on the same day, sufficiently marked their progress. O'Donnell, with his forces, prepared on the following morning of Tuesday, and proceeded through the passes of the white rocky cliffs of Burren, and along the close Carcrair of the narrow roads, without conflict, battle, pursuit, or attack, until they arrived in the open level plains of Meadhraidhe (at Claren's Bridge, near Galway), they remained that night on Knoek-an-Gearrain-bhain (the Hill of the White Horse), between Kileolgan and Galway; they divided amongst themselves their preys and booty on the following morning, in that place, and each party of them was afterwards engaged in keeping together, and driving closely, their own distinct flocks, along the high ways of the delightful province of Connaught; they did not, however, perform a long journey on that day, for they were fatigued and wearied, not having slept soundly the previous night, as they were in dread of being attacked by their enemies, after their country had been plundered. They made an encampment that night not far off, as their fear was removed; their servants and attendants got ready their dinners, and they afterwards took their food until they were satisfied, and then went to sleep till the following morning, when the forces arose from their slumber, and

9. Localities in Clare.—The following information on the places above-mentioned, has been kindly communicated by Thomas L. Cooke, Esq. Baile-Eoin-Gobhan is a castle, in ruins, about three miles north of Ennistymon; it signifies John Smith's Town, and is now called Smithstown. Boithe-Neill castle is now in ruins, and is called Bohucil, in the parish of Inagh, barony of Inehiquin. Craig-ui-Chiordubhain is supposed to be Ballynaereggan, in the parish of Clare Abbey; and Carcrair-na-gCleirach appears to be Gortaelare, a fort near the village of Turlogh, in the barony of Burren. Doire-Eogain, mentioned in these Annals, is Derryowen, in the parish of Kilkeedy, barony of Inehiquin; and Baile-ui-Eogain is on the borders of the same parish. Cathair-Mionain is a castle, in ruins, about a mile east of Killeenora.

made ready for marching. O'Donnell permitted Mac William, and those who had come from the west of Connaught, to return to their homes, and he himself proceeded directly eastward along the common roads, and arrived at the end of the day in Conmaicne-Cuile-Toladh (barony of Kilmaine, in Mayo), in the very centre of the province, where they remained that night. O'Donnell commanded his people on the following morning to send away their cattle preys in general, and their booty, to their homes, and also their attendants, and the unarmed and unfighting people, along with them. Of those of their chiefs who had been mortally wounded on that occasion were Teige Oge, the son of Niall, son of Niall Roe, son of Niall, son of Torlogh Oge, son of Torlogh Bearnach O'Boyle, and Duibhgion, the son of Mac Con, son of Peregrine O'Clery, and the manner in which they were both wounded was by another party of O'Donnell's people, who were attacking great Clare, against the earl of Thomond, and from that Clare the county of Clare derived its name; the forementioned two died on the way on their return, and were both conveyed to their countries, and were buried at Donegal. O'Donnell sent a great number of his warriors and common soldiers with the preys, and the forementioned people, to direct them in the way; he recommended O'Rourke and his people to return to their homes, and the Connacians in general. O'Donnell retained five hundred champions of the best of his warriors, together with sixty horsemen of his own faithful people; they remained in the camp in which they had been the previous night 'till after mid-day, and they then proceeded through the province south-east, until they arrived at Loughrea, on the following morning by the break of day, and that was the hereditary fortress of the earl of Clanrickard. They sent forth their predatory parties in every direction about them to plunder the country, and they collected all the property and cattle from all quarters in their vicinity, which they brought with them to one place; they proceeded with their preys through the province eastward, and encamped on the borders of the country on the south side of the river Suck, on Sunday night precisely, where they remained 'till Monday morning; on the following day they proceeded across Ath-Liag-Fionn (Athleague), on the river Suck, and through Magh-nAoi of the son of Allgubha (the Plain of Moy Aoi, in Roscommon), and arrived at Seghais (the Curlew mountains) in the evening; they encamped on the north side of the river (Boyle) that night, and on the following day they crossed the Curlew mountains, and proceeded through the territory of Corran and arrived at Ballymote; the forces afterwards dispersed to their homes with booty and riches.¹⁰

The son of O'Neill, namely, sir Art, the son of Torlogh Luineach, son of Niall Connalach, son of Art, son of Con, joined the English who were garrisoned at Dun-na-Long (a fortress on the river Foyle, in the barony of Strabane, and parish of Donaghedy, about 6 miles south of Derry), to war against O'Neill; and the same Art died while along with the forementioned English.

As to O'Donnell, he and his forces made no movement since they had returned from Thomond, on the forementioned expedition, 'till the following September, and after his common soldiers and paid forces had recruited themselves, during that time, he called for a muster of them, in the hope of getting an advantage of the English; he was informed that the horses of the English were in the habit of being sent to graze every day to a pasture field opposite the town of Derry, and they were watched by a party of the English cavalry; having received this intelligence, he began to meditate how he could take by surprise those horses, and the resolution he came to was to bring along with him privately, in the darkness of the night,

10. O'Donnell's Expedition to Thomond.—This was the second expedition O'Donnell made into Thomond, another being recorded in the year 1599, at p. 644, in the Annals. In these expeditions O'Donnell completely plundered the territories of Galway and Clare, to punish Donogh O'Brien, earl of Thomond, and Ulick Burke, earl of Clanrickard, both of whom were in alliance with the English, and determined enemies to O'Neill and O'Donnell. It appears that the earls of Thomond and Clanrickard made no stand against O'Donnell, on these occasions, being afraid or unable to encounter that valiant chieftain, who led a very formidable and active force of horse and foot, with which he swept over those countries, with astonishing rapidity, marching at least 30 or 40 Irish miles in a day, and performing the expedition from Donegal to Loop Head, in Clare, at the mouth of the Shannon, and back again, in 8 or 10 days. On this occasion O'Donnell overran Galway, and the territory of Thomond, as far as Loop Head, and appears to have met little or no opposition from the earls. Mac Geoghegan states that the earl of Thomond, who was then at Limerick, alarmed at the news of O'Donnell's approach, applied for assistance to the President Carew, who immediately dispatched captain Flower, with 800 foot and 60 horse, to join the earl, but it appears that these forces had no encounter with O'Donnell.

a large body of his warriors, and a detachment of his cavalry, amounting to no less than six hundred, both horse and foot, to a deep ravine on a mountain which lay opposite Derry, to the north, from which they could espy the people of the town, who at the same time could not well see them; he sent a small party of his cavalry to lie in ambush, in concealed places near the town, for the horses, and those who attended, to prevent them from driving back the horses whenever they pleased; they remained after that manner in wait for them 'till the early part of the day, when they beheld their horses advancing across the bridge, with those who took care of them as usual; O'Donnell's horsemen rose up in their rear, attacked their keepers, slew many of them, and others escaped by the fleetness of their horses, and by running; O'Donnell's people began to drive the horses of the English, which were in their possession, and his own forces having come up to aid them against the English, they sent the horses on before them. O'Donnell commanded a party of his cavalry to proceed with the horses, without waiting for him, until they reached a secure place, which they accordingly did, and O'Donnell remained behind, with all those he retained of his cavalry and foot soldiers. When the English saw that their horses had been taken away from them, they immediately took up their arms, and went in pursuit of O'Donnell; the general, sir Henry Docwra, and his cavalry, mounted their horses, such of them as had them in their places of keeping, and that had not lost them on that occasion, and they went in the pursuit as expeditiously as they could. When O'Donnell saw the English cavalry in full pursuit after him, he remained in the rear of his foot soldiers, with his troop of horse, until the cavalry of the English overtook him, who valiantly attacked O'Donnell on behalf of their plundered property, and in defence. O'Donnell halted, and made ready for the conflict, with boldness and determination, and a fierce engagement ensued between both parties; one of O'Donnell's relatives, namely Hugh, the son of Hugh Duff, son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, aimed at the general, sir Henry Docwra, with the cast of a dart, and struck him directly in the forehead, and wounded him very severely; the general, on being thus wounded, retreated, and all the English in general, after their commander, chief counsellor, and champion had been wounded, retired in sorrow and discomfiture, and did not follow in pursuit of their horses any farther. The people of O'Donnell retired to their encampments, and having counted the horses which they seized, they numbered upwards of two hundred, after which O'Donnell divided the horses amongst the chiefs. O'Donnell remained besieging the English, without leaving his country, till the end of October, when he undertook to march again into Thomond, to plunder it; having determined on that resolution, he mustered his forces, and he did not halt until he crossed Sligo westward, and arrived at Ballymote. He left Niall Garv, the son of Con, son of Calvaeh, son of Manus O'Donnell, after him in the country, to guard it against the English, that they might not come to plunder it; the English began privately to entreat and gain over Niall Garv O'Donnell, and to offer him the sovereignty of the country should they be victorious; they promised him, along with that, many presents and great wealth, should he join in alliance with them; he was receiving these proposals for a long time, until his misfortune at length induced him to go to them, through the ill counsel of a vain idle party who were about him, although he was afterwards sorry for it; his three brothers joined him in that revolt, namely, Hugh Buighe, Donal, and Con. Truly the English were the better of their joining them, for they were wearied and exhausted for want of sleep and rest every night, through fear of O'Donnell, and they were suffering from sickness and distemper, on account of the closeness of the place in which they were, from the stale provisions, and the salt and sour flesh meat, and having no fresh meat or other fresh provisions requisite for them. They complained of their distress to Niall O'Donnell, respecting all things they stood in need of, and he relieved them from the close imprisonment in which they were; he took with him ten hundred warriors to Lifford, which was a town on the borders of the same lake (Lough Foyle), and had been a famous fortress belonging to O'Donnell, but at that time it was insecure, for there was no strong keep or castle of lime and stone there for a long time, since it had been formerly demolished, and only an imperfect rampart made of clay and sods, surrounded by a shallow water ditch, while it was in contemplation to re-build the fortress which had been previously there. The guards vacated that fort, through fear and terror, when they perceived the English advancing towards them, and O'Donnell not being near them, upon which the English entered the fort, and they raised immense great mounds, and ramparts of earth and stone, to protect them, so that they were sufficiently strong to hold out a defence against their enemies. One of O'Donnell's faithful people followed to inform him of the state of the country, and told him of all that had taken place there in his absence ; it was a great surprise and mortification to O'Donnell that his relative, and kinsman by marriage, should have turned against him, for Nualadh, the sister of O'Donnell, was the wife of Niall. O'Donnell returned from the province of Connaught, for he had not gone beyond Ballymote westward when the message reached him, and his forces returned, as expeditiously as they could ; but, however, his warriors could not accompany O'Donnell, except a small party of his cavalry, and he arrived in the vicinity of the forementioned Lifford. The English were not able to make any preys or plundering before O'Donnell returned back, but were engaged in strengthening their fortress, and raising ramparts, and when they learned that O'Donnell had arrived, their dread of him did not suffer them to leave the fort in which they were for any thing they required. O'Donnell remained at a place not far distant from the English, until a small party of his foot soldiers came up to him ; O'Donnell thought it too long without attacking the English, and he did not wait any longer for his forces, but displayed the small party he had to the English, on the south side of Cruach-Lighean, to the north of the river ; when the English beheld him, they marched out to meet him, with Niall Garv O'Donnell, and his brothers, as leaders of the battle ; they made skirmishing attacks on each other, but they did not come to close conflict that day, but continued to reconnoitre each other, for the English were not aware that O'Donnell was in want of forces, as he actually was, and they were in dread of an ambush being laid for them, so that they were not inclined to go from the fortress, through fear of him ; it was the same case with O'Donnell's people, as it would be hazardous for them to encounter their enemies so near the fort, with the small force they had, and having respectively retired, they parted in quietness and cessation ; some were wounded on either side, by the casting and shooting of darts, and arrows, and leaden balls ; but, however, there were more of O'Donnell's people wounded in the skirmishing, on account of their being fewer in number. The English afterwards returned to their homes, and O'Donnell and his people retired to their encampments ; it was in anger and great wrath that O'Donnell proceeded thither, as he was grieved that his forces had not come up to him, that day, for he was sure, if he had them there, the English would not escape from him as they had. O'Donnell, after his forces had come up to him, carried on a close siege against the English, and he encamped within two thousand paces of Lifford, which we have mentioned, to protect his people, until they reaped and secured the corn adjacent to the English ; he sent persons to watch and reconnoitre the town every night, to prevent any from going into or coming out of it, unless they went across the river southward, and there was not a pass or ford by which they might escape, within a thousand paces of the town, that he did not leave sentinels and ambuscades at, to watch and guard against the English, that they might not pass them unawares, and particularly against the sons of Con O'Donnell and his people, for against them he considered it most difficult to guard, and it was on their account that his guards and sentinels were so numerous ; he remained for thirty days in that place, until the people of the country were enabled to save their corn, and they put it into small hampers and bags, to carry it, and in loads on horses, and beasts of burden, to convey it to secure places, where their enemies could not get at it. O'Donnell, at one time, before he had left that camp, went to attack the English, in the hope of inducing them to come outside of the ramparts, on the open plain ; when O'Donnell's people arrived before the fort, the English began to view them, but they did come to encounter them, for they knew it was for conflict and battle they had come. O'Donnell's people returned back, when they did not succeed in effecting that for which they had gone, and they halted on the banks of the river called the Daol (the river Deel), on the north side, a short distance from the fort ; great numbers of them went to their encampments, and to other employments, for they did not think the English would follow them that day. When Niall Garv O'Donnell beheld O'Donnell's people dispersed and unprepared, he told the English it would be desirable for them to attack them; the English, at his request, began to put on their armour, as quickly as they could, in the centre of their ramparts where they could not be seen by their enemies, until they were armed and in armour; when they were accoutered, they then sallied outside of the ramparts, in order of battle, and in that manner they quickly advanced towards O'Donnell's people, led on by Niall and his brethren, along with their people. O'Donnell beheld them advancing towards him, and was glad to see them coming; he arranged his warriors in their proper places, facing them with their battle-arms, and he did not suffer them to shoot at them until they came up to the opposite side of the river; having afterwards met and encountered, a fierce and terrific battle ensued between them; their cavalry charged on each side, and they began to make thrusts at each other with large great-javelins, and blue-headed spears; Niall O'Donnell made a thrust with a sharp-pointed, very long spear, and struck Manus, the brother of O'Donnell, under the shoulder blade, and having deeply pierced him with the lance through the armour which he wore, he wounded his internal parts; when Rory O'Donnell, prince apparent of Tirconnell, saw his brother wounded, he boldly rushed at Niall, and made a fierce determined cast at his breast with a large dart; Niall having raised the fore-part of the high-spirited foreign steed which he rode between them, the blow struck the horse in the very forehead, and pierced it to the brains; Rory, in pulling it back by the thong, smashed the blade of the javelin, so that he left the iron of it in the horse, and had only the handle in his hand, and the horse finally died of it. My sad sorrow, that those champions of Tirconnell had not joined their blows in battle on the same side against their enemies, and that they were not united, for while they should remain so, they would not be scattered, expelled, or banished from their dear country, as they afterwards had been. As to the English, while the cavalry were engaged fighting each other, they made a simultaneous onset on O'Donnell's foot soldiers, who fled before them a short distance; but, however, only a few of them were wounded, for the English did not pursue them beyond the battle-field, and the reason why they did not follow them further was, that their commander had been wounded in the conflict, and they were obliged to return with him to Lifford, where he afterwards died. A great number of O'Donnell's people pursued them for a long distance, and they continued shooting and cutting them down, so that numbers of them were slain and wounded; and the pursuing party were convinced, that had the forces followed them farther, they would have defeated them; but the failure of the party who had been first put to flight would not permit them to pursue them again. O'Donnell returned to the encampments, after the English had departed, and melancholy and mournful were they that night in the camp, on account of the son of their prince, and the prince presumptive, had he survived his brethren, being in a dying state. When O'Donnell arrived at the camp, he ordered a white slender litter to be made for Manus O'Donnell, to carry him across Barnus (Barnusmore mountain), which was accordingly done, and a great number of his friends and faithful people went with him to Donegal, where a curing couch was made ready for him, and O'Donnell's doctors being brought to cure him, they could effect no cure, but pronounced him for death. There was a monastery in the vicinity of the fortress, in which were Meic-Beathaidh (Sons of Life), of the order of St. Francis, and the most experienced of them were in the habit of visiting him, to prepare him for his confession, and to make his peace with Christ; he made his confession without reserve, and he mourned for his transgressions against God, and repented of his evil thoughts and misdeeds during his lifetime; he also forgave the person who inflicted the wound on him, and said that he himself was in the fault, because it was he made the first attack; he continued in that manner for a week, expecting his death every day, and his Father Confessor of the forementioned order attending him, to guard him against the temptations of the devil; he then received the Eucharist, after which he died, on the 22nd of October, having gained the victory over the world and the devil, and was interred in the burial-place of his ancestors, in the forementioned monastery. His father, namely, Hugh, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Duff, then at a very advanced age, was near to him in the vicinity of the monastery, and having heard of his death, he was greatly affected, and was in a declining state for some time after it ; and his spiritual friends were also instructing him regarding the benefit of his soul. This Hugh, the son of Manus, son of Hugh Oge, son of Hugh Roe, son of Niall Garv, died on the 7th of December ; he was lord of Tirconnell, Inisowen, and of North Connaught, for twenty-six years, until he was weakened by the English, and gave his lordship, with his blessing, to his son Hugh Roe, after he had escaped from the English. That Hugh, the son of Manus, was a man who obtained a lordship without treachery, killing of a relative, war, or contention, after the death of his brother Calvach ; he was a prosperous, warlike man, victorious in battle and conflict, before and during the period of his lordship ; he was the plunderer and devastator of those who were bound to pay him tribute, far and near, while establishing over them his hereditary right, until he brought them under subjection ; a man who laid aside the cares and troubles of the world, after having given his lordship to his son ; he was well-doing towards God, to merit the reward of it for his soul, during eight years, until he died on this occasion ; and he was buried with due honours and solemnity in the monastery of St. Francis, at Donegal, in the tomb of the lords who preceded him in succession. As to O'Donnell, at the end of those thirty days on which he carried on the siege against the English, he prepared to leave the camp in which he had been during that time, to go to another place, which was not less convenient, but a little farther from the English, between them and Barnus (Barnusmore mountain), on the western side of the river Finn, for at the approach of the rough wintry weather he was concerned for his soldiers, who were watching and guarding against the English every night ; this happened to have been in November, and he considered it time to bring his forces to a place of rest, after their great toil, for they were not at ease for a considerable time.¹¹ The forces proceeded to the forementioned place, and having encamped there under the shelter of the wood, in the vicinity of the river, they afterwards erected tents and huts ; they began to cut down the wood about them, and made strong barriers between them and their enemies, so that it was difficult to approach them beyond it. They remained in that position until he received intelligence that two ships had come from Spain to the Irish who were engaged in the war, with money and arms, powder and lead, and where they entered port was at Inver More in Connaught ; he sent the same news to O'Neill, and he himself proceeded to Connaught, in the month of December precisely, and he left his brother, Rory O'Donnell, with the most of his forces, after him in the camp we have mentioned, to protect the country. When he arrived in Tireragh of the Moy (in Sligo),

11. Battles in Donegal—Nial Garv O'Donnell.—In the various engagements above mentioned, between O'Donnell's forces and the English under Docwra, at the garrisons of Loughfoyle, Derry, Lifford, Dunalong, &c., there were 1500 of the English slain, according to Mac Geoghagan, besides many of their commanders, and Docwra himself was near killed, being deeply wounded in the forehead with the thrust of a javelin, which cut through his helmet, and was cast at him by a chieftain of the O'Donnells. It is evident that O'Donnell would, at that time, have entirely cut off the English forces, or expelled them from Derry and Donegal, were it not for the treacherous revolt of Nial Garv O'Donnell, who had under his command 1000 men at Lifford, with whom he joined the English in O'Donnell's absence, and supplied them with provisions while they were in a starving condition, and dying off with distempers. This Nial Garv was a relative of Red Hugh O'Donnell, and was married to his sister Nuala ; he was surnamed Garbh, or Garv, signifying the rough, it is said from the rudeness and violence of his temper ; he was a very valiant man, and fought with great bravery in many of O'Donnell's battles but, influenced by ambition, and the promises of the English, who offered to make him lord of Tirconnell in opposition to Red Hugh, he was induced to revolt, and with his three brothers and their forces joined the English. Morrison says "the lord deputy Mountjoy desired to have authority out of England to pass Tirconnell or Donegal to Nial Garv, reserving only 800 acres about Ballyshannon, and the fishing of the Erne, to her Majesty ;" and he further says, "such was the opinion of the service this turbulent spirit could do the state, that he got the command of 300 foot and 100 horse, in her Majesty's pay." Docwra, writing from Derry, in 1601 and 1602, to lord Mountjoy, speaks highly of the services rendered the English by Nial Garv, but at the same time, says, he was full of pride, ambition and covetousness, with importunities, continual begging, and wasting of whatever he got, prone to extravagance, and underhand jugglery ; though at the same time he says, he was afraid to charge him with any of his faults, lest he should revolt, and raise a war against the English government, and become "a desperate rebel ;" and again, that Nial had excited Mac Sweeney, underhand, to go into rebellion, and he also complains of his insolence, and disloyal practices, in consequence of which he took from him his cows, horses, and all his substance, for that Nial had forbid his people to yield any relief to the English garrisons, and threatened to set fire to Lifford, and refused to admit any sheriff into his country, and that he swore he would go into rebellion, rather than any Englishman should enjoy a foot of church land in his country. Morrison says, Nial was of a nature fiery and violent, extremely proud and covetous. It appears Nial Garv afterwards, in opposition to the English, went to Kilmacrennan, and had himself inaugurated as, The O'Donnell, preferring that honour to the English title of earl, on which the lord deputy Mountjoy, after assigning Nial some good portions of land, procured the rest of Donegal to be granted to Rory O'Donnell, the brother of Red Hugh, who was, by James the I., created earl of Tirconnell. In one of the battles in Donegal, in 1601, sir John O'Dogherty, lord of Inisowen, who had always been the faithful ally of O'Donnell, was slain, on which O'Donnell appointed his brother Felim O'Dogherty as chief, but Docwra set up in opposition to him Cahir O'Dogherty, the son of sir John, then a minor, with the usual policy of the English, to create division amongst the Irish chiefs.

he sent messengers to the ships we have before mentioned, to request them to proceed to the harbour of Cealla-Béaga (Killybegs, in Donegal), while he himself remained at Dun-Neill (at Dromore West), for then was the festival of the Nativity of Christ, and he kept the first days of the feast, as he was in the habit of doing. Intelligence reached him that O'Neill had come after him to the country, and he waited no longer, but went to meet O'Neill, so that they met each other on the way; they proceeded without halting until they arrived at Donegal, and the chiefs of Leath Cuinn came to them at that place. The ships we have mentioned came afterwards to the harbour of Teilionn (Telin harbour in Donegal), near Killybegs, and all the money and other supplies they contained, which were sent to the chiefs, were brought to them at Donegal, and were divided into two portions, that is, one half for O'Neill, and for those who were in war alliance with him, and the other half for O'Donnell, and for those who were joined with him.¹²

Judith, the daughter of Maguire, i. e. of Cuchonacht, commonly called the coarb, son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, son of Thomas, who was the wife of the baron O'Neill, namely Fear-dorecha, son of Con, son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, and who was the mother of O'Neill, namely Hugh (earl of Tyrone), and of Cormac his brother; after the baron was slain, she was married to Henry, the son of Felim Roe, son of Art, son of Hugh, son of Owen, son of Niall Oge (O'Neill), and she brought forth to him an estimable son, namely, Torglogh; this woman, who was a pillar of support and sustenance to the rich and poor, to men of learning and exiles, widows and orphans, ecclesiastics and professional men, the distressed and indigent; a woman who was a head-piece of consultation and counsel to the chiefs and tribes of the province of Conor Mac Neasa (Ulster); a pious, charitable, mild, benign female devotee, of pure piety and love of God and her neighbour, died at Machaire-na-Croisi (Magheracross, in Fermanagh), on the 22nd of June, and was buried in Donegal, after having received the body and blood of Christ, after extreme unction and repentance, after bestowing many charities on the ecclesiastical orders of God, but particularly on the order of St. Francis, that they might undertake to pray to God for her before and after death.

The lord justice of Ireland, lord Mountjoy, mustered an army, in the month of September, to march into Tyrone; in the first place he proceeded to Drogheda, from thence to Dundalk, and to Bealach-an-Maighre, and O'Neill came to the other end of the pass. When the lord justice learned that O'Neill had come to that place, what he did was, to encamp on the side of the pass at which he himself was, so that the pass was not attempted or forced by either party for a long time. The lord justice, considering it too long that the pass was guarded against him, he put on the resolution one day to force it, despite of O'Neill; when O'Neill perceived that affair, he sent forward bands of well disciplined fierce soldiers, similar to swarms of bees coming forth from their hives, as they rushed on from the tents and booths of the camp to oppose them, and they began to wound and sharply spear them, and to cut and pierce them, until they were compelled to return back the same way to the camp, after an immense number of their nobles, officers, common soldiers, and attendants were slain; they also lost a vast deal of all sorts of property, consisting of horses, steeds, accoutrements, arms and armour in that conflict.

In some time after that, the lord justice got an

12. Succours from Spain.—In the latter end of the year 1600, king Philip III., of Spain, sent some succours to O'Neill and O'Donnell, under a Spanish captain, who came with two ships laden with warlike stores; they first came to the harbour called in the Annals Invermore, which appears to be the bay of Killala, in Mayo; but they afterwards landed at Killybegs, in Donegal. There arrived along with those Spanish vessels, according to Mac Geoghegan, two Legates, namely, Matthew de Oviedo, and Don Martin de la Cerda, who were empowered to grant indulgences to the Irish who fought against the English in defence of their religion. Pope Clement VIII., at the same time, sent a crown of Phoenix feathers to O'Neill, says Mac Geoghegan, as the champion of the Catholic cause, in imitation of Urban III., who had sent, in the 12th century, a crown of Peacocks' plumes to king John, as lord of Ireland. The Legates likewise brought to O'Neill and O'Donnell twenty thousand pieces of gold, towards defraying the expenses of the war. This Mathew de Oviedo was an eminent Spanish ecclesiastic; and a Franciscan friar, he was appointed by the Pope archbishop of Dublin, in 1600, and came again to Ireland, along with the Spanish forces to Kinsale, in 1601; but after their defeat, he returned to Spain, and did not preside altogether more than about one year over the see of Dublin. O'Neill at this time sent his son Henry on a mission to king Philip of Spain, according to Mac Geoghegan, who gives a Bull of Pope Clement, in the year 1600, exhorting the Irish princes to persevere in the war, in support of the Catholic faith, and granting them all the indulgences which the Roman Pontiffs had been accustomed to bestow on those who fought against the Turks for the recovery of the Holy Land.

advantage and opportunity of O'Neill's watching of the pass, so that he proceeded through it without conflict or battle, in the month of October precisely. When O'Neill discovered that affair, he marched in the way before the lord justice, so that the two camps were confronted to each other, 'till the end of the same month; the lord justice was not suffered to advance beyond that into Tyrone on 13. Mountjoy's Expeditions to Ulster in 1600.—On the 24th of February, 1600, Charles Blount, lord Mountjoy, arrived in Ireland as lord deputy, and landed at Howth, accompanied by sir George Carew, who was appointed president of Munster; and sir Henry Poer was made governor of the Pale. An account of Mountjoy's campaigns in Ulster is given by Fynes Morrison, Cox, Leland and Mac Geoghegan. On the 5th of May, Mountjoy marched with a strong force from Dublin to Drogheda, and thence to Dundalk, in a few days, having collected all the troops he could from the garrisons of the Pale, to encounter O'Neill.

Battles at Moyry Pass, Carlingford &c.—On Whit-Sunday morning, Mountjoy advanced near the Pass of Moyry, and came to Newry; the celebrated Pass of Moyry is often mentioned at this period, being the scene of many conflicts between the forces of O'Neill and those of the lord deputy; the place is above mentioned in the Annals, under the name of Bealach-an-maighre, and was situated on the borders of Louth and Armagh, in a direction between Dundalk and Newry, about two miles north of Foghard, in the southern part of the barony of Orior, bordering on the Fews, near Slieve Gullion mountain, and Jonesborough, in Armagh. The place was environed with bogs, marshes, and woods, and strongly fortified; Morrison says that O'Neill marched from Lough Foyle, in haste to Dungannon, and having razed the old fort of Blackwater, and burned Armagh (then in possession of the English), he drew his men into the strong fortress of Loughlurgan, where he made trenches, and fortified the place for three miles in length. On the 16th of May, Mountjoy marched from Newry, and encamped towards Armagh, with about 2,000 horse and foot, according to Morrison. The earl of Southampton, and sir Oliver Lambert, arrived on that day with more troops at Dundalk, and on the 17th captain Edward Blaney was detached by Mountjoy, with 500 foot and 50 horse, to secure their passage through the Pass of Moyry; he proceeded from the camp through the Moyry, to Foghard, from which hill to Dundalk there was, says Morrison, no danger. Blaney left his foot to secure the Pass of Moyry, and passed on with his horse to Dundalk, to conduct the earl of Southampton, and his forces, to the lord deputy, who, with the rest of the army, would meet him at the Causeway beyond the Pass. The earl of Southampton, sir Oliver Lambert, and sir Henry Folliott, then advanced with their forces to Foghard, and captain Blaney commanded the van guard towards the Four-mile-water, being a ford all environed with woods, in the midst of the Moyry Pass. When they came within half a mile of the Pass, they saw the Irish posted on both sides in the wood, whereupon the earl ordered the van guard to pass over the water, and to make good the rising of the hill beyond it. When these came within musket shot, they perceived 200 of the Irish foot posted beyond the water; captain Blaney then divided his men into three parties, sending one to the right, under captain Atherton, and another to the left under captain Williams, while he remained himself with the central body. In the mean time the lord deputy, being on the hill beyond the Pass, sent his van guard of two regiments, under colonels sir Charles Percy, and sir Richard Morrison, to advance towards the Pass. Captain Blaney made an attack on the Irish, and the Deputy's van guard also advanced to their assistance, and a conflict took place for some time at the ford. O'Neill's forces, says Morrison, "retired to the earl of Southampton's rear, and came desperately on our men, hot with horse and foot, but sir Henry Folliott made a very good stand, and sir Oliver Lambert, fearing lest our men should be distressed, the more to encourage them, took his colours in his own hand, and, with a party of that occasion, so that he was obliged to return on the eastern side of Bealach-an-Maighre, along the borders of the Oriors (the baronies of Orior, in Armagh); he afterwards proceeded in boats from the harbour of Carlingford, into the English Pale, from thence to Dublin, and the lord justice did not attempt to go beyond Ballagh-Moyry for a considerable time after that.¹³

Southampton's best vanguard men, attacked the assailants; the Irish, having spent their powder, and thrown all their staves and darts, with innumerable stones recovered their ground, where O'Neill himself stood, at the head of about 200 foot and 220 horse, with a far greater number in the woods." The earl then commanded his men to advance, and join the deputy's forces, and Richard Wingfield, the marshal of the army, came to them with an order from the lord deputy to continue their march to Newry. Great numbers were slain on both sides in these engagements, but the English were defeated, and the expedition was unsuccessful, Mountjoy feared to advance further into the North, as he saw the hill sides bristled with the spears of O'Neill. Morrison says, that the deputy, being informed that the Pass of Moyry, by reason of much rain, and the Irish having broken the Causeway, was hard to be passed, returned on the 28th of May by Carlingford to Dundalk, and thence to Dublin, the Irish having, in his absence, burned and laid waste Meath, and other parts of the Pale, though he had left for its defence 2,000 foot and 175 horse in Leinster.

In the course of the same year Mountjoy made a second expedition from Dublin into Ulster, as above mentioned, in the Annals; on the 15th of September, according to Morrison, he encamped at Foghard, near Dundalk, where he remained till the 9th of October, his progress further being impeded by O'Neill's forces, as well as the severity of the weather. O'Neill had possession of the Moyry Pass with a strong force, and Mountjoy having marched his troops thither, they had several encounters for two days, but on the 8th the Irish left the pass clear. The deputy having refreshed his army at Dundalk, marched on the 21st of October to Newry, through the Pass of Moyry, where, says Morrison, he caused the entrenchments to be levelled, and the woods cut down; he remained at Newry for want of victuals till the 2nd of November, when he set forward 8 miles towards Armagh, and there encamped. The Irish appeared on a hill, whereupon sir Samuel Bagnall's regiment was ordered to advance against them. The next day Mountjoy rode about a quarter of a mile from the camp, and viewed a place where sir John Norris formerly intended to build a fort, and Mountjoy then commenced to erect a fortress there, on a hill like a promontory, all environed with bogs, a river, and extensive wood, and near it a fine country, with houses and much corn. O'Neill was posted with his forces on a neighbouring hill, watching the movements of Mountjoy, and both parties had several skirmishes, in which many were slain on each side; and Nial O'Quin, one of O'Neill's chief commanders, was taken prisoner. Mountjoy having finished the fortress, called it Mount Norris, in honour of the general sir John Norris, and he placed in it a garrison of 400 foot, under captain Edward Blaney. Mountjoy, says Morrison, then put all his army under arms, and with all the drums and trumpets, and a great volley of shot, proclaimed Tyrone's head, with promise of £2,000 to him that brought him alive, and £1,000 to him that brought him dead, and the deputy then marched to Newry. Mountjoy, having resolved to return into the Pale by Carlingford, came with his army, on the 12th of November, to the Narrow Water, whence he sent sir Josias Bodley, with a force of 500 foot, to prevent the Irish from impeding his progress over the river, the stream of which was so very rapid, that it was dangerous for the horses to pass over. The foot forces having crossed, the deputy sent sir Henry Folliott to possess the Pass of Faddome, where all the cavalry crossed, and the Irish forces were then seen drawing over the mountains towards the Pass of Carlingford. The English encamped that night between the Passes of Faddome and Carlingford, and, early on the morning of the 13th, the scoutmaster brought word that O'Neill, with all his forces, was lodged on a pass in a thick wood, at the foot of a great mountain reaching down close to the sea side. The English were commanded by captains Roper, Berry, Billing, Trevor, Esmond, Constable, Caulfield, Hansard, &c., and by Christopher St. Laurence, sir Garrett Moore, sir Richard Morrison, sir Samuel Bagnall, sir William Godolphin, sir Henry Danvers, and Mountjoy himself was present, at the head of a troop of horse. O'Neill's forces were posted on a small semi-circular plain, whereof the sea, says Morrison, made the diameter, and a thick wood the circumference, and near it ran a river out of the wood into the sea, the ford of which was of good advantage to them, and all along the circumference they made divers trenches, and on one side a Barriado reaching a good way into the wood, and down to the sea. When the vanguard of the English crossed the river, the Irish poured on them volleys of shot, and others fell on with pike and sword, and a fierce conflict was carried on for some time, in which great numbers fell on both sides, amongst whom, on the side of the English, was George Cranmer, lord Mountjoy's secretary, with the ensign of sir Garrett Moore, and Hugh O'Hanlon; captains Hansard and Trevor, also on the side of the English, and other officers were severely wounded. Morrison says that O'Neill himself was nearly slain by a musket shot, which killed the next man to him, on whose shoulder he leaned at the time. This battle of Carlingford Pass was fought on the 13th of November, and Morrison says, that, while walking in his brother's garden at Dundalk, he distinctly heard by the reverberation of the wall, the sound of the volleys of shot, though the place was six miles distant. Mountjoy next marched to Dundalk, and, on the 17th, arrived in Dublin; Mac Geoghegan states that in one of those engagements at Moyry or Carlingford, Mountjoy was severely wounded, and remained some time to get cured at Newry. The forces of Mountjoy were far greater on these expeditions, than stated by Morrison and Cox, who, as usual, greatly underrate the numbers who fought, as well as the slain, while, on the other hand, they always exaggerate the amount of killed on the side of the Irish. According to Morrison, the lord deputy Mountjoy had only about 2,000 men on each of those expeditions to Ulster, but Mac Geoghegan states that in the second expedition, he had 6,000 fighting men, and he had under him a great number of distinguished commanders, as above mentioned. In the engagements at the Moyry Pass, as stated in the Annals, the English were defeated with great slaughter, and the Irish obtained immense booty of arms, armour, horses, &c. The number of the British forces slain in these engagements with O'Neill, is stated by Mac Geoghegan at 4,000, but this estimate appears to be excessive, therefore, taking a medium between the accounts of Morrison and Mac Geoghegan, it appears probable that Mountjoy's army amounted to about 4,000 men, and that he would not, with a smaller force, have attempted to encounter the formidable O'Neill, in his strongholds in the North; and in the various engagements during these two campaigns, there were at least 2,000 of the English forces slain in Ulster.

Sir John Chamberlain, a colonel of the English of Derry, proceeded with a large force against O'Dogherty, to prey and plunder him; O'Dogherty, with a small party, encountered the English, and a fierce conflict ensued between them, in which the English were defeated, and the colonel, and many others along with him, were slain by O'Dogherty.

Mountjoy's Expedition to Leinster and Meath in 1600 and 1601.—An account of this expedition is given from page 200 to 211, in the 1st vol. of Fynes Morrison, and partly in Cox and Mac Geoghegan. Mountjoy, in the month of December, first proceeded to Wicklow against the O'Tooles, O'Byrnes, &c.; he arrived at Naas on the 22nd, where he assembled the Leinster garrisons, and then marched to Monastereven, and next over the mountains, covered with snow, to the glens of Wicklow; on Christmas Day he arrived suddenly at the residence of Felim O'Byrne, chief of Glenmalur. O'Byrne himself escaped, but Mountjoy made his wife and eldest son prisoners; he regulated himself plentifully in

Niall Garv O'Donnell, together with his brethren and his English, were at Lifford, as we have before stated, and they marched with a force into O'Kane's country, for prey and plunder, and did not halt until they arrived at Dianait; they were encountered by a large party of O'Neill's people, and an engagement ensued between them, in which

O'Byrne's house, and remained there with his forces until the 20th of January, plundering and laying waste the country in all directions, with his usual inhumanity. Even Morrison, his secretary and panegyrist, says, "his troops spoiled and ransacked the countries of Ranelagh and Caslay, swept away the most part of their cattle and goods, burnt all their corn, and almost all their houses, leaving little or nothing to relieve them; and to finish the work, his lordship planted two strong garrisons on them, one at Wicklow, in the east, and the other at Tullagh, on the west." Mountjoy next marched back to Monastereven, and, on the 29th of January, to Abbey Connell, passing, says Morrison, "by the ruined city of Kildare, now altogether disinhabited;" from thence he crossed the Liffey, to Hussey's castle, and thence to Maynooth, the ancient castle of the earls of Kildare; he met no opposition in his progress from the O'Moores, or O'Conors, of Leix and Offaley, whose territories he laid waste in the preceding autumn of the same year. On the 31st, he came to Trim, "through which," says Morrison, "the Boyne runs, and it lath the ruins of a sumptuous castle." He remained at Trim till the 11th of February and then passed by the mansion of Barnwall, baron of Trimlestown, to the residence of Nugent, baron of Delvin in Westmeath; on the 12th he came to Mullingar, went thence to Ballymore, and to sir Theobald Dillon's, and on the 17th arrived at Athlone. The greater part of these countries lay waste, and he returned to Westmeath; on the 19th he came to Bryan Mac Geoghegan's castle at Donore, and thence proceeded to act against captain Richard Tyrrell, who was posted in a stronghold seated in a plain, on a little island, encompassed with bogs and deep ditches of running water, and with thick woods. Tyrrell, secured in this fastness, valiantly defended the place against great forces, and Morrison says, that while he himself was along with some horsemen on a hill reconnoitering the place, and riding on a white horse, he was nearly shot, one ball flying close to his head, and the second went through his cloak, and lodged in the saddle, after it had bruised his thigh. Mountjoy's cavalry were posted on a hill, and he sent sir Christopher St. Laurence, captains Winsor, Roper, Rotherham, and other officers, with the wings of foot, into the wood, to attack the fortified island; but Tyrrell's men poured their volleys on them, by which captain Darcy was shot in the neck; on the 22nd the English carried bundles and faggots to pass into the island, but the water carrying them away, and his lordship's guard, says Morrison, "being badly seconded by the Irish, we came off with loss, and captain Rotherham was killed." On the 23rd Mountjoy again attacked the island, and he got a supply of provisions for the camp from all parts, particularly from Athlone by boats; he had 400 lodged in the Abbey, where he dined, and proclaimed Tyrrell's head at two thousand crowns, and after dinner, drawing to the island, he divided the forces, sending part to attack the island in boats, and others into the woods, to seize on their corn secured there, and burn their houses, and such things for their relief, as they could not carry away. On the 24th, being Shrove-Tuesday, there was a great fall of snow, and the next night Tyrrell withdrew from the island, on which Mountjoy found some wines, corn, cows, and garrons; he continued to burn the houses and corn, and Morrison says he gave a piece of coin, called an angel, to a soldier, to swim over to an island on a lake, and burn the houses; he next came to a river which divides Meath and Offaly (probably the Brosna), and sent several companies, under Christopher St. Laurence, to lay waste the country. On the 27th he rode to the strong castle of sir John Tyrrell, who was a subject, and went by the place called Tyrrell's Pass, encompassed with bogs and hilly woods. On the 1st of March he came to sir Terence O'Dempsey's house at Cloneygowen, near Portarlinton, thence to Ballybrittas, and sir Henry many were wounded on each side, and O'Neill's people were defeated; and Niall and his English returned again to their homes at Lifford, with much booty and sway.

On another occasion after that, Niall, with his brethren and his English, went into Tyrone, and they preyed the entire of Gleann Aichle. They defeated in another engagement the sons of Ferdorcha, the son of John, son of Donal (O'Neill), at Cnoc-Buidbh, near Strabane, and they slew some people; Torlogh Oge O'Quinn, with some others, were taken prisoners, and three score marks were exacted for his ransom.

Baile-Nua (Newtownstewart), in Tyrone, and Castlederg, were taken by Niall and the English, but it was taken from them again in a short time after.

Rory, the son of Eignechan, son of Eignechan, son of Nechtan, son of Torlogh of the Wine O'Donnell, died.

A. D. 1601.

The sons of Shane-na-Seamar, the son of Rickard Saxanach (Burke), of whom we have already treated, were encamped in the estate of O'Meagher in Ikerrin (in Tipperary), on the first days of the month of January. Spies and reconnoiterers came about them in that place, from the Butlers, after it had been reported by some of their gentlemen that an opportunity and an advantage could be obtained to attack them at that place where they were; so that it was on that account sir Walter, the son of John, son of James Butler, and Mac Pierce, namely, James, the son of Edmond, son of James, with a number of the gentlemen of the two counties, viz., of the county of Tipperary and of the county of Kilkenny, came to meet and join each other on a certain night, at a particular place appointed and agreed upon by them; the resolution to which they came in their consultation, and on which they agreed was, to attack the Conacian camp very early on the following morning. An unusual thing and an evident fatality befel that camp of the Burkes, viz., an advantage being gained of their watching, so that their enemies came amongst them, who left them stretched lifeless, with their flesh lacerated, and their gory bodies completely hacked, throughout their tents and booths. On that occasion O'Shaughnessey, i. e. John, the son of Giolla Duv, son of Dermod, son of William, who had been expelled from his patrimony, like all the other insurgents who were along with the sons of John Burke, was slain; John Oge, the son of John Burke, was taken prisoner there, and was brought to Kilkenny, to be imprisoned. Redmond Burke and William, together with a number of their party, having escaped from that conflict, went from thence into Ely, but did not remain long in that territory when they proceeded into Ulster, leaving the towns of Ormond, which were in alliance with them 'till then, feebly defended. When they had arrived amongst the Irish of the North, namely, O'Neill and O'Donnell, Redmond Burke began to employ some common soldiers to march into Clanrickard, and having engaged those, he proceeded on the first days of spring across the river Erne (at Ballyshannon), along the borders of Brefney O'Rourke (county of Leitrim), into the county of Sligo, to the county of Roscommon, across the river Suck, into Clan Conmaigh (in Galway); he took prisoner the lord of that country, namely, Mac David (Burke), i. e. Fiacha, the son of Hoberd Buighe, son of William, son of Thomas. Redmond, after that, arrived at Tuath-an-Chaladh (the district of the port or ferry, west of the river Suck, at the Shannon), in the south of Hy-Maine, in the county of Galway. When the earl of Clanrickard, namely, Ulick Burke, received intelligence of that affair, he proceeded to the eastern border of his

Warren's house in Leix. There he received directions from the council of England to decry the silver money and proclaim a new coin 3 ounces fine (that is 3 ounces of silver, and 9 of brass in the lb). Great quantities of this base coinage, or Brass Money, was sent for circulation to Ireland at this time, which ruined thousands, and impoverished all classes, and excessively raised the prices of all commodities. Morrison says, "this base money was sent over to impoverish the rebels, but, in conclusion, it was the undoing of all the queen's servants, who came home beggars, so that only the treasurers and paymasters, who were thereby infinitely enriched, had cause to bless the authors of this invention."

(See Note on Brass Money, page 426). In the course of the month of March, Mountjoy proceeded to Trim, Ardbraccan, and other parts of Meath, and thence into Monaghan, and plundered Farney, and other parts of Mac Mahon's country, burned the houses, corn, and goods of the people, and thence came to Ardee, and to sir Edward Moore's house at Mellifont, and to Drogheda, where he remained till the 16th of April, and then returned to Dublin, having, in the course of this marauding expedition, plundered, burned and laid waste the countries through which he passed, and massacred the inhabitants with unrelenting fury and inhumanity.

country, to wait for and watch Redmond, but, notwithstanding all his watching, Redmond, on the thirteenth night of the month of March, unperceived or unheard by the earl or his sentinels, went past them into Clanrickard, until he arrived at Tuath-Chenel-Fheighin (district of Kinel-Feichin), in the southern part of the barony of Leitrim, in the county of Galway. Redmond sent forth his predatory parties, early in the morning of that night, to all the towns of the district, from Magh-Glas to Crannog-Mac-Cnaimhin (i. e. the Cranoge, or fortress of MacNevin), and from Coill-Breac to the mountain (Slievebaughta Mountain, in the barony of Leitrim, on the borders of Clare). The most of the wealth of the district, and all its moveable property, were under the controul of Redmond, before the noon of that day; he afterwards proceeded to take up his quarters in the woods of the upper part of the district, and he continued four or five days in that campaign, drawing supplies from the neighbours, and fortifying about him, until the earl of Clanrickard, with the greatest force he could procure of the inhabitants of the country, came and encamped at the monastery of Kinel-Feichin. They remained four or five days in those positions, during which dishonourable slayings were committed between them, until Teige, the son of Bryan-na-Murtha, son of Bryan Ballach, son of Owen O'Rourke, with fierce companies of well-armed soldiers, came to aid Redmond. When those two combined forces overtook the earl, he departed from the camp in which he was, and proceeded through the passes into Clanrickard, and they pursued him to the town of Loughrea; as the earl and his people escaped from them on that occasion, they overran and devastated all that lay from Leitrim to Ard-Maoldubhain and to the gate of Feadan, in the west of Kinel-Aodha (in the barony of Kiltartan). It was at that time a lord of a country of the Momonians was slain on their side, namely, Mac Donogh (of Duhallow, in Cork), i. e. Donogh, the son of Cormac Oge, son of Cormac, and the manner in which he went on that expedition was this, that O'Neill, having brought him captive from Munster, in the spring of the foregoing year, he remained in Ulster from that time 'till he marched with those sons of John Burke, and fell after that manner in the war of the Clan William. When

Redmond and his predatory parties arrived on the borders of Thomond (county of Clare), they encamped on the western side of Loch-Cutra (Lough Cooter, in the barony of Kiltartan, in Galway), where a young gentleman of the Dalcassians, namely, Teige, the son of Torlogh, son of Donal, son of Conor O'Brien, came to him, by the advice and request of some foolish people, without asking the permission or leave of his father, or of the earl of Clanrickard, to whom he was related and in friendship. When the sons of John Burke and Teige O'Brien confirmed their war alliance with each other, Teige requested, in three days after that, to be furnished with a party for the purpose of scouring some quarter of Thomond; he was not refused that request, for a number of the gentlemen of the camp, accompanied him with their kerns; of those were William, the son of John Burke, and the son of Mac William Burke, namely, Walter, the son of William, son of David, son of Edmond, son of Ulick; after they left the camp, they proceeded to the border of Kinel-Aodha, and of Echtge, and to Kinel-Dungaile (in the barony of Tullagh, in Clare), they sent forth their predatory parties on both sides of the river Fergus, through the lower part of Hy-Fearmaic (barony of Iuchi-quin), and the upper part of Clan-Cuilein (baronies of Tullagh and Bunratty); some of them went to Baile-ui-Aille (in the parish of Templemally), and near Clonroad, (at Ennis); they returned back with their booty that night to Cill-Reachtais, in Upper Clan Cuilein (in the parish of Kilraghtis, in the barony of Bunratty); on their leaving that town on the following morning, they were overtaken by the gentlemen of the two Clan-Cuileins, with their risings out, and also by the companies of the earl of Thomond; that pursuing party of Thomond began to shoot these insurgents, and slew many of their people, from that place to Meelick of O'Grady (in the barony of Bunratty), in the eastern part of Kinel Dungaile; the pursuers, however, returned, and the other party carried off the prey to the camp, after having lost a number of their gentlemen, and common soldiers; of those was that son of Mac William we have mentioned, namely, Walter, the son of William Burke; on the same day, moreover, Teige, the son of Torlogh O'Brien, was wounded by the shot of a ball, so that he was obliged, after arriving at the camp, to confine himself to a sick couch, and to go under the hands of doctors, despite of his incorrigible disposition and rash temper. Large bodies of the queen's people came from various quarters to aid the earl of Clanrickard, and of these were eight or nine colours of soldiers, from the president of the two provinces of Munster; thither came the son of the earl himself, who had been for some time previous to that along with the lord justice, with a large force of foreign soldiers; thither came the deputy governor of the province of Connaught, and also an auxiliary force from Galway. When the sons of John Burke received intelligence of the assembling of those, they removed back eastward along the mountain, into the fastnesses of the district of Kinel Feichin, and remained in the temporary huts in which they had previously been; they were not, however, long there, when the sons of the earl, namely, the baron of Dunkellin and sir Thomas Burke, together with every one of his sons who was able to serve as commanders in the army, came, with numerous forces along with them, into the district, in pursuit of them, and formed a large extensive camp in the centre of the district. The earl of Clanrickard himself was not in that camp, for he was attacked by a fit of sickness, and a dangerous severe disease, in the week before that, so that he was not able to march with an army at that time. When the deputy governor of the province of Connaught, and the baron of Dunkellin, learned that Teige O'Brien was mortally wounded in that camp of Redmond Burke, they sent him a protection on behalf of the queen, and he therefore went to them; the baron sent an escort with him to Leitrim, one of the earl's towns, but he did not long survive there, for he died soon after, and was buried in the town of Loughrea, and in the town of Athenry in succession, in one week; the young scion who then died was a lamentable loss to his country, for he was expert at every military weapon, and every battle engine which were used amongst the Irish, in feats of valour, and he was distinguished for gaiety, mirth, activity, feats of arms, mildness, comeliness, fame, and hospitality. As to those camps in the district of Kinel-Feichin, they were closely confronted every day, guarding against each other, from the festival of St. Patrick to the end of the month of April, until the provisions and flesh meat supplies, of the sons of John Burke, became reduced and exhausted, and on that account they prepared to quit the place; and, after having left the country, they took a prey from O'Madden, namely, Donal, the son of John, son of Breasal; they proceeded from thence across the river Suck, and the sons of the earl having pursued them during that space, many people were slain between them on both sides, on that occasion. The sons of John Burke proceeded after that to Tirconnell to O'Donnell, and the sons of the earl returned to their country and homes, and on their arrival in their estate, the condition in which they found their father, the earl, namely, Ulick, the son of Rickard, son of Ulick of the Heads, was in his last moments, after making his will, taking leave of his nearest friends, and after settling his worldly affairs; he died in the month of May, in the town of Loughrea, and was buried in the town of Athenry, with great solemnity. The person who then died was one of the most lamented amongst the Irish in his time; he was a lord of deliberate, just judgments, of a mild countenance, becoming a chief, to all those who addressed him; kind to the people of his country, warlike to his neighbouring people, equitable in council, a man whose weakness, or want of energy, were not witnessed on the point of danger, since the time he assumed a military command to the day of his death; his son Rickard was appointed his successor, and it was to record the year in which the earl died the following was composed:

"Since Christ had entered the human flesh
To intercede for us in every future age,
Sixteen hundred years and one elapsed
Unto the death of the earl Ulick."

O'Dogherty, i. e. John Oge, the son of John, son of Felim, son of Conor Cuireach (the Heroic), died on the 27th of January; he was lord of the barony of Inisowen, and there was not a lord of a barony amongst the Irish more distinguished for manual action and hospitality, or more bold in counsel than he. O'Donnell nominated Felim Oge, John's brother, the O'Dogherty; the clan of Ailin, and the clan of Daibed, brought Cahir, the son of John Oge, to the English at Derry, and the general, sir Henry Docwra, nominated him O'Dogherty, through animosity for O'Donnell.

Redmond O'Gallagher, bishop of Derry, was killed by the English in O'Kane's country, on the 15th of March.

James, the son of Sorley Buighe, son of Alexander, son of John Cathanach, the most distinguished leader of the Clan Donnell in his time, either in peace or war, died on Easter Monday.

Mac I-Brien of Ara (in Tipperary), namely Torlogh, the son of Murtoigh, son of Donal, son of Teige, died in the month of February; there was not a lord of a country in Ireland of his age the night he died, a more active and valiant man, who would lead his force more safe out of every country into which he had made incursions; and seldom any force escaped from him in the same strength they entered his country; he was a person who defended the rugged and intricate tract of land which he retained until he died, and he was buried at his own fortress in Baile-an-Chaislein (Castletownara, in the barony of Owney and Arra, county of Tipperary).

O'Reilly, i. e. Edmond, the son of Maolmora, son of John, son of Cathal, died in the month of April; he was an aged, grey-haired man, of strong memory of remote times, and active and energetic, both in mind and body, till his death; he was buried at Cavan, in the monastery of St. Francis, and his brother's son, namely, Owen, the son of Hugh Connallach, was appointed his successor.¹

A. D. 1601.

1. The last Chiefs of the O'Reillys.—The MS. work called the Book of Cavan, which is in the possession of Mr. Geraghty, the publisher of these Annals, and was chiefly compiled from ancient documents by the late learned Chevalier Thomas O'Gorman, gives a history of the O'Reillys, from which some of the following particulars have been collected. This Edmond O'Reilly, above-mentioned, was known as Edmond of Kilnacrott; he had a castle at that place, in the county of Cavan, where Morton's magnificent mansion now stands. Edmond was brother of Hugh Connallach O'Reilly, the celebrated prince of Brefney, whose death, in the year 1583, is recorded at p. 538, in these Annals; he was surnamed Connallagh, or the Connallian, from being fostered and brought up in Tirconnell, under the care of his maternal grandfather, Hugh Duv O'Donnell, prince of that country. This Hugh O'Reilly was three times married: first to the daughter of Betagh of Moynalty, in Meath; secondly, to a daughter of sir Thomas Nugent, of Carlanstown, in Westmeath; lastly, to lady Isabella Barnwall, of Meath; by his first wife he left three sons, Shane Roe, or Red John, Philip, and Eogan; by his second a son, Maolmora, or Miles, but no children by his third wife. On the death of Hugh, his brother, Edmond, the Tanist, or heir apparent, was to succeed as prince of Brefney, but was opposed by his nephew, Shane Roe, whose claim was supported by the English, and both these chiefs, while in contention for the lordship, attended sir John Perrott's parliament in Dublin in 1585, as representatives for the county of Cavan, as mentioned in these Annals. Shane Roe made his submission to the English, went to London, was well received at Court, and knighted by queen Elizabeth. Sir John O'Reilly agreed to hold his extensive estates in the county of Cavan under the crown, and to give up the ancient tenures and customs of Tanistry, but sir John afterwards joined Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, against the English, and died at Cavan on the 1st of June, 1596. On the death of sir John, his brother Philip was appointed prince of Brefney, by Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, but Philip held the lordship but a short time, for he was accidentally killed by some of O'Neill's people on the 19th of November in the same year. At this time Maolmora Breagh, or Miles the Handsome, the son of sir John O'Reilly, a young man of fine person, great valour, and ambition, who was married to a niece of Thomas Butler, earl of Ormond, aspiring to the lordship of Brefney, joined the English, and having repaired to London, was well received by queen Elizabeth, who gave him a grant of the county of Cavan by Letters Patent, with the promise of an earldom; he commanded a regiment of cavalry in the English service, and was called The Queen's O'Reilly; he was slain in 1598, at the great battle of the Yellow Ford, in Armagh, of which an account is given at p. 627 in the Annals. Edmond O'Reilly, above mentioned, succeeded his nephew Philip as prince of Brefney, in 1596, and died in his castle of Tullymongan, at Cavan, in 1601; he was succeeded by his nephew, Eogan or Owen, one of the sons of Hugh Connallach, and Owen having died in 1603, was succeeded by his brother Maolmora. This Maolmora, or Miles, was the last prince of Brefney, and though he and some of his successors were styled lords of Cavan, they had but little of the power or possessions of their ancestors. During the time of Miles, from 1610 to 1620, the plantation of Ulster with British colonies took place, and the county of Cavan being confiscated by James I., was seized by the crown, and almost the whole of its lands, the ancient territory of the O'Reillys for many ages, was transferred to English and Scotch settlers, called Undertakers, of which transactions accounts are given in Pynnar's Survey, in Harris's Hibernica, and in the Tracts of sir John Davis. Some chiefs of the O'Reillys got regrants from the Crown of portions of their own ancient possessions, amongst others Miles O'Reilly, the last lord of Brefney, who was obliged to give up the ancient seat at Tullymongan, in Cavan, that town and castle coming into the possession of the corporation established there by king James in 1610. Miles built a castle at Camett, now called Castle Cosby, near Crossdoney, where he retired and died in 1635. Colonel Philip O'Reilly, of Ballinacargy castle, in the county of Cavan, was next recognised as The O'Reilly; he was the son of Hugh, son of sir John O'Reilly above-mentioned, and when a young man had served some time in the Spanish army; shortly after his return to Ireland he became one of the chief leaders in the great Insurrection of 1641, and was a distinguished commander for many years in co-operation with Owen Roe O'Neill, his brother-in-law, being married to his sister, Rose O'Neill. After the Cromwellian war, O'Reilly retired with his forces to Spain, in 1652, and entered the Spanish service in the Netherlands, where he died about the year 1655, and was buried in the Irish monastery at Louvain. His relative, colonel Miles O'Reilly, of Camett, was high sheriff of the county of Cavan in the year 1641, and was a commander of note at that period; he also retired to Spain along with Philip, and afterwards went to France, where he died about the year 1660, and was buried in the Irish monastery at Chalons-sur-Marne. Hugh Roe, the son of colonel Philip O'Reilly, was a valiant commander, and was killed in a battle with the Cromwellians in the county of Cavan, in 1651; he was married to a daughter of Conor O'Brien, viscount of Clare, by whom he had a son named Hugh, who was drowned at sea on going to Spain. His cousin Edmond, called Eamun Buighe, succeeded as The O'Reilly; he was some time in the French service, and came to Ireland with king James II. in 1689, and he was appointed governor of the county of Cavan, and commanded as a colonel in the army of king James, at the battles of Cavan, the Boyne, Aughrim, Limerick, &c. He retired with the Irish Brigades to France, where he died in 1693; he was married to the daughter of O'Ferrall, chief of Longford, by whom he had a son, Owen or Eugene, who was in the French service, and considered as The O'Reilly. According to Mac Geoghegan, the representative of the ancient princes of Brefney O'Reilly, called the Chevalier O'Reilly, was a lieutenant in Dillon's Regiment, in the Irish Brigade, in 1745, and, according to the Book of Cavan, the above-mentioned Eugene O'Reilly was married to the daughter of colonel Felix O'Neill, of the French service, by whom he had a son Edmond, who, at the beginning of the Revolution, was living at Paris, with the rank of

After those sons of John Burke, had joined O'Donnell, as we have stated, they continued to harass and plunder the queen's people in every direction through which they passed, in alliance with O'Donnell; so that it was on that account the lord justice of Ireland commanded the earl of Ormond to put to death the brother of those sons, namely, John Oge Burke, whom we mentioned to have been taken prisoner by a number of gentlemen of the Butlers, in the estate of O'Meagher, in Ikerrin (in Tipperary), in the first week of this year, and this was accordingly done in the month of June precisely.

Conor, the son of Murtoth Garv, son of Bryan, son of Teige O'Brien, died about May, at Craigh-Chorcrain, and was buried in the monastery of Ennis.

Mary, daughter of Con O'Donnell, the wife of O'Boyle, i. e. of Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Torlogh, died on the 6th of November, and was buried at Donegal.

O'Conor Sligo, namely, Donogh, the son of Cathal Oge, was taken prisoner by O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, the son of Hugh, son of Manus. The cause of that capture was this, that O'Donnell learned that O'Conor was deceiving and betraying him to the lord justice, and the English of Dublin, for the lord justice, some time before that, promised that he would get his own country for O'Conor from the queen, and that the young earl of Desmond, namely, James, the son of Gerald, who was imprisoned in London, would be set at liberty, and sent to his patrimony; for the mother of that young earl was the wife of O'Conor. As O'Donnell ascertained, and was convinced of that affair, he took O'Conor prisoner, and O'Donnell caused Ballymote, which he had given to O'Conor before that time, and also Collooney, to be restored to himself again; and O'Conor was sent to be imprisoned to the island of Loch-Iasgaidh (Lough Eask, near Donegal), in Tirconnell.

The young earl of Clanrickard, namely, Rickard Burke, whom we mentioned to have been appointed to succeed his father, was commanded by the lord justice of Ireland, i. e. lord Mountjoy, to come with a full military force to the monastery of Boyle, and to proceed from thence to Sligo, if possible. At the command of the lord justice, the earl was joined by immense numbers of the English, who were in garrisons on behalf of the queen, in the great towns of Munster, viz., in Limerick, Kilmallock, Askeaton, &c.; great bodies of the soldiers of Galway, and of the town of Athlone, joined in the same army. When all those had collected together to the earl, they all agreed to march to the monastery of Boyle, and to Sligo, and having crossed the river Suck, the resolution they came to was, to proceed directly eastward by the long straight roads of the Plain of Connaught, until they arrived at Elphin, on the borders of Moylurg, Hy-Bruin of the Shannon, Clan-Cathail, and Moy-Aoi of Finnbeanach. When O'Donnell received intelligence that that immense great army had come to the place we have before mentioned, he mustered his forces together, and he did not halt until he crossed the Curlew mountains, and the river Boyle, into Moylurg, and pitched his camp immediately before them; they remained for some time in that manner confronted, watching and guarding against each other, and many were their conflicts, lieutenant-colonel in Dillon's Regiment, and was a knight of the military order of St. Louis. Colonel John O'Reilly of Garryrobuck, near Oldcastle, on the borders of Meath and Cavan, a cousin of the above-mentioned Edmond Buighe, was a representative in parliament for the county of Cavan, and became colonel of a regiment of cavalry in the service of king James; he commanded with distinguished bravery in various battles, and after the war retired to his seat at Garryrobuck, where he died in 1716, and was buried in the old church of Kill, in the parish of Crosserlough, county of Cavan, where his monument, and those of many others of the family, still remain. The O'Reillys of Kilnacrott, Baltrasna, Ballinrinke, and Tullystown, on the borders of Cavan and Meath, of Thomastown Castle, in Louth, and of Heath House, in the Queen's county, were all branches of the old stock of the O'Reillys, princes of Brefne. Many of the O'Reillys have been distinguished in the military service of foreign states, amongst whom the following may be mentioned: The celebrated count Alexander O'Reilly of Spain, was son of captain Thomas O'Reilly of Baltrasna, by Rosa, daughter of colonel Luke Mac Dowel of Mantua, in the county of Roscom-mon, and grandson of the above-mentioned colonel John O'Reilly. Count Alexander O'Reilly, by his great valour and abilities, rose to the rank of Generalissimo in the Spanish army, between the years 1770 and 1800, and an account of him will be found in Swinburne's Travels in Spain, and various histories of those times. Count Andrew O'Reilly, of the family of Ballinlough, in Westmeath, and brother of the late sir Hugh O'Reilly Nugent, entered the Austrian service, where he rose to the rank of general of Cavalry, and was for upwards of forty years distinguished as a commander of great valour, in various battles, amongst others Austerlitz and Marengo; he died at Vienna, in 1832, in the 90th year of his age. His nephew, count John O'Reilly, was also in the Austrian service, and is at present sir John O'Reilly of Ballinlough. Count Michael Charles Joseph Reille, a distinguished general of Cavalry in the French service, in Bonaparte's campaigns, and at present a peer of France, is a descendant of one of the O'Reillys of the Irish Brigades. Many other officers of the O'Reillys, too numerous to be here mentioned, were highly distinguished in the military service of Spain, Austria and France.

severe charges, skirmishes, and onsets, during the time they remained opposed to each other, until at length the English forces dispersed, and returned in sorrow to their homes. Messages came to O'Donnell, afterwards, that Niall Garv, the son of Con, son of Calvaeh (O'Donnell), had come with his English and Irish from the east across Barnus mountain, and encamped in Donegal, on the borders of Tirhugh; O'Donnell having received intelligence that the English had come to that place, he was greatly grieved at the profanation of the monastery, and that the English should occupy and inhabit it in place of the Mie-Beathaidh (Monks), and Culdees, whose rightful residence it was till then, and it was not becoming him not to go to relieve them if he possibly could. What he did was, to leave the farmers and Biatachs of Tirconnell, with their cattle and goods, throughout North Connaught, along with some of his soldiers, to protect them against troops, kerns, and foreigners; he himself proceeded with the most part of his forces across the rivers Sligo, Duff, Drowis, and the Erne, northward, and encamped in a strong position, precisely at the Carrig, upwards of two thousand paces from Donegal, where Niall Garv O'Donnell and his English were. As to O'Donnell, he commanded large companies of his forces alternately to lay siege to the monastery, by day and by night, to prevent the English from coming outside of the walls, to spoil any thing in the country. It was not happy or comfortable that the two armies spent their time, for slaying and destroying, conflicts and shooting, were carried on by them respectively against each other. The English were reduced to great distress and straits, on account of the long-continued battling in which O'Donnell's people kept them engaged, and some of them were in the habit of escaping in parties of two and three to O'Donnell's camp, on account of the want and distress in which they were for the necessities of life. They remained in that manner until the end of September, when God willed to be avenged on, and punish the English, for the profanation and abuse which they committed on the churches and apartments of the learned psalmists, viz., on the monastery of Donegal, and the monastery of Magherabeg, in which the English we have mentioned were quartered and encamped, and others of them in the castle of Donegal. The visitation which

God inflicted on them, however it occurred, was that the powder which they had in the monastery of Donegal for carrying on the war was ignited, so that it burned the boarded chambers, and the stone and wooden buildings of the entire monastery. When those of O'Donnell's people who were besieging and watching the English perceived the brown-red blazing flames, and the dark mist of vapour and smoke which arose from the monastery, they began to shoot off their leaden balls, and their flashes of firing, in order that O'Donnell might come to them immediately to attack the English, for they considered it too great a delay to send him messengers. That signal was not slowly attended to by O'Donnell and his forces, for they quickly and rapidly advanced, as expeditiously as they possibly could, in companies and parties, to where their people were at the monastery; fierce and sanguinary was the assault they made on the English, on their friends, and on their own blood relations who were there, and it was hard and difficult for O'Donnell's people to attend to the firing of the soldiers in the monastery, in the castle of Donegal, and in the ship at the harbour before them; but, however, O'Donnell's people did more execution, and slew great numbers of them. Of the gentlemen who fell on O'Donnell's side there was Teige, the son of Cathal Oge Mae Dermott, a noble captain of the Clan Maolroona (the tribe-name of the Mac Dermotts in Rosecommon); on the other side fell Con Oge, son of Con, the brother of Niall O'Donnell, together with three hundred men, in that conflict. When Niall Garv O'Donnell perceived the predicament in which his people and the English were placed, he proceeded westward, unnoticed, along the coast to Magherabeg, where a great number of the English were, and he brought them with him along the same way, to relieve the other English, who were placed in a dangerous position by O'Donnell and his people; and the crew of the ship continued fighting and firing, to cover them, until they entered within the central walls of the monastery. When O'Donnell perceived the strongly-fortified position of the place in which they were, and the large force which had come to relieve the English, he commanded his warriors to withdraw from the fight, and retire backward, for he did not consider it proper that they should be destroyed in an unequal conflict; his commands were immediately executed, and he removed his camp a little nearer to the monastery, and he put some of his forces into that of Magherabeg, in which the English had been, whom Niall Garv took with him to relieve his people; it was on the festival-day of St. Michael precisely (29th of September), the monastery was burned, and that affair took place. O'Donnell carried on the siege after that manner against the English, reducing them to a state of distress and difficulty, from the end of September till towards the end of October, without any deed of note being performed between them during that time, until news came to them of the Spanish fleet, which had arrived in the south of Ireland to aid the Irish who were engaged in the war.

The lord justice of Ireland, lord Mountjoy, marched with an army, in the month of June, to proceed into Ulster, and his progress is not recorded until he arrived at Ballagh-an-Moyry; this place was always defended and guarded by O'Neill, and great numbers of people had been often slain and destroyed, and lamentable deaths took place among the English and Irish, about that pass, between O'Neill and the English, until the lord justice got an opportunity and an advantage of him (O'Neill), at that time, a thing which seldom happened, so that the outskirts, and the very centre of the pass, were under his controul on that occasion. He (Mountjoy), encamped in an advantageous position at that pass, and erected a castle of stone and lime, at a certain secure place on that way, and having completed the castle in a month, he left two hundred soldiers there to guard it; he himself then proceeded onward to the Fews Mountains, to Armagh, and across Avonmore (the river Blackwater), inwards, to go to Portmore, which had been raised by the lord justice of Ireland, namely, lord Borough, four years before that time, and it was on his march to put provision stores into that fort, after it had been raised, that the same lord justice came by an untimely death, through O'Neill. In a year after the death of the lord justice, O'Neill also took the same fort from the queen's people, and in taking it from them, he committed slaughter among their men and officers, and the fortress remained in the possession of O'Neill from that time till this, in which the new lord justice had come to it. When he arrived in the vicinity of that way, O'Neill's people quitted the fort, and left it wide open to their enemies and opponents, which was an unusual thing with them till then. On the first days that the lord justice encamped in that fort, he went to reconnoitre, overlook, and take a view of the country about him, and having arrived on the borders of Benburb (in Tyrone), he was met at the end of one of the passes of the country by some of the kerns of O'Neill, with grim and stern countenances of animosity, and a dreadful fierce conflict ensued between them respectively, and immense numbers were slain in that place, but, however, more of the lord justice's people were slain than of O'Neill's soldiers. The lord justice, notwithstanding all the opposition he encountered, returned back to the camp, and, during the period of about a month and a half that he remained in the fort, none of his forces went one mile beyond that into Tyrone, until he returned back into the English Pale, and to Dublin, in the month of August, after having left garrisons at Portmore, Armagh, in Machaire-na-Cranncha, at Ballagh-Moyry, Carrickfergus, at Newry, Carlingford, Dundalk, Drogheda, &c. It was an addition of fame and honour to the lord justice, the length and distance he had proceeded into Tyrone on that expedition, such as a man holding his office had not performed for three or four years before that time.²

The earl of Essex, who had been a man of power

2. Mountjoy's Expedition to Ulster in 1601.—In April, 1601, the lord deputy Mountjoy, according to Morrison, was at Drogheda, and received the submission of Torlogh Mac Henry O'Neill of the Fews; Eivir Mac Colla Mac Mahon of Farney, sir Eochy O'Hanlon, and other chiefs. Captains Blaney and Bodley, with forces from Mount Norris and Newry, according to Morrison, attacked a fortified island at Loughrocan, and having prepared their arrows with wild-fire, shot them across the water, by which means they set fire to the houses on the island, which was used as a magazine by the Irish, and contained great store of butter, corn, meal, and powder. They also burned the houses along the shore, and killed many people, amongst others, many churls (peasants), and calliachs (old women), and they ravaged the country. Mountjoy returned to Dublin, and, on the 23rd of April, says Morrison, "kept St. George's feast with solemn pomp, the captains bringing up his meat, and the colonels attending on his person at table." O'Neill, Mac Mahon, O'Hanlon, Donal Spainach Cavenagh, and O'Byrne, who had made their submission, "were invited and entertained with plenty of wine and all kindness." Mountjoy having resolved to make another expedition against O'Neill, marched from Dublin to Drogheda, on the 23rd of May, thence to Dundalk on the 25th, and on the 8th of June he came to the hill of Foghard, encamped near the Moyry Pass, and built a fort there, at the Three-mile-water. From the camp at Foghard, he published the proclamation for the new coin, and having finished the fort at Moyry, proceeded to Carrickbane, near Newry, on the 14th, and eminent service, and of prosperity and good fortune, on behalf of the queen of England, a man who had been engaged by the men of England as a leader in making invasions and conquests in foreign countries, and who had served for half a year in the name, and as representative of the sovereign in Ireland, as we have before stated, began in the first month of this year to give reproach and disrespect to the sovereign, and to set aside the crown. When that treachery was discovered by the men of London, they rose up quickly, and well prepared, in opposition to the earl, so that he was driven and pursued from one place to another, through the streets of the town, and likewise outside of the town, so that he was obliged to go to Essex-House, to protect himself; he had not been long in that place, when he was forcibly compelled to submit and surrender himself prisoner, and lay down his arms to the queen's people; and he was afterwards sent to be imprisoned, as a traitor, to the Tower, and every person who had share, counsel, part, or alliance with him in that traitorous affair, was executed and quartered, and hung upon the gates and portals of the town; the earl was beheaded on the 18th day of the month of February; captain Lee, a gentleman who was advising the earl, and who was aiding and counselling in committing that act, was also put to death for the forementioned crime.

James, the son of Thomas Roe, son of James, son of John, son of the earl, who had been nominated earl of Desmond on behalf of the Irish, as we have before stated, sent his brother John, the son of Thomas Roe; Fitzmaurice of Kerry, i. e. Thomas, the son of Patriek, son of Thomas, son of Edmond, son of Thomas, and Pierce de Laey, to Ulster, to ask for relief and aid from the Irish of the North, when he became reduced and weak-and thence to Iveagh; and sir Richard Morrison was sent with a great force into Lecale, and having plundered the country, took Downpatrick; Morrison says they made one of the Bradys prisoner, and cut off his head. Mountjoy received the submission of Felim Mac Gennis, of Mac Cartan, and of Mac Rory of Kilwarlin, but the chiefs, Art and Edmond Magennis, would not be received to the queen's protection without first doing some service. Having left sir Richard Morrison, with 500 foot and 50 horse, at Downpatrick, Mountjoy marched towards Newry, and having heard that O'Neill, with his forces, was near Armagh, and had his creaghts, says Morrison, feeding some thousands of cows, the lord deputy prepared his troops, and strengthened his garrisons at Mount Norris, Newry, Armagh, &c., and on the 23rd, proceeded towards the fort of Blackwater, and passed the place where Marshal Bagnal's army was defeated, at the Yellow Ford, and he viewed the battle-field for a long time with great attention. He then returned, and left a garrison of 750 foot and 100 horse at the Abbey of Armagh, under sir Henry Danvers, and, on his return to Mount Norris, viewed the ford where general sir John Norris, a few years before, had been mortally wounded in a battle with O'Neill. It appears that Mountjoy's forces were at this time fiercely attacked by the Irish, under O'Neill, and forced to retire with much loss; and, on the 24th, Mountjoy arrived with his forces at Newry, and went thence to Dundalk, where he received the submission of the chiefs Art, Rory, and Glasny Magennis, and Patrick Mac Mahon. On the 9th of July he proceeded to Newry, and encamped at Latenbur, beyond that town; and on the 13th he marched towards the Blackwater, where he made a stand, as O'Neill, with his horse and foot, shewed themselves out of a wood on the other side of the river, with the trumpets, drums, and colours gained from the English, at the battle of the Yellow Ford. The Irish poured some volleys of shot on Mountjoy's forces, which was answered by their cannon, and sir William Godolphin was sent forward to the attack with troops of horse; but the Irish, during the entire night, continued pouring in their shot. On the 16th Mountjoy advanced, with a regiment of Irish under sir Christopher St. Lawrence, and passing the Blackwater, proceeded towards Benburb, where there was an old castle of the O'Neills. Here they were attacked by O'Neill's forces, and Morrison says, they had a hot and long skirmish, which continued three hours, on a fair green meadow, both sides being alternately repulsed, and the English often driven back to their colours. Morrison, as usual, makes light of the number of Mountjoy's forces that fell there; but, according to the Annals, immense numbers of the English were slain in this engagement. Morrison says that Dr. Latwar, the lord deputy's chaplain, was mortally wounded. Mountjoy built a new fort at the Blackwater, near the old one which had been demolished by O'Neill, and he placed a garrison in it of 350 men, under captain Williams. With his usual barbarity, Mountjoy cut down and destroyed the crops and corn, and burned the country in all directions through which he passed, and he renewed his insolent proclamation that whoever brought O'Neill alive would get £2,000, and for his head receive £1,000 reward. During the remainder of the month of July, he had various conflicts with O'Neill's forces, in which many were slain on both sides, and Mountjoy then retired towards Armagh, and on the 3rd of August encamped a little beyond the city to the north. O'Neill followed them closely, and, towards night advanced from the woods to a hill, under which the English were encamped in a meadow; and Morrison says, the Irish advanced with loud cries, and sound of drums, and bag-pipes, and poured into the camp about 3,000 shot. In this attack on the camp, many of Mountjoy's forces were killed, and several also of O'Neill's men, amongst whom was slain Pierce Lacy of Bruff, a very valiant commander for many years in Munster, in alliance with O'Neill, and the earl of Desmond. At this time Plunkett, lord Dansany, who commanded a garrison of 550 horse and foot for the queen at Lisgannon, between Ballyhaise and Cootelhill, in the county of Cavan, took a prey of 1600 cows from the Mac Mahons of Monaghan, who pursued them, recovered the cattle, and slew about 50 of the English forces, and took captain Esmond prisoner. On the 7th of August, Mountjoy withdrew towards Newry, and encamped at Mount Norris, where he remained till the 13th, and then removed and encamped within three miles of Armagh; from thence he came back to Mount Norris, and marched near Newry on the 16th, and remained at Newry till the 25th, he then returned to the Pale, and, on the 29th, arrived at Trim where he remained some time, and went from thence to Kilkenny, where he arrived on the 13th of September, and on the 23rd, he and the earl of Ormond received intelligence of the landing of the Spanish fleet at Kinsale. Mountjoy then proceeded to Clonmel, and thence to Cork, to concert measures with Carew against the Spaniards. According to Morrison and others, Mountjoy had 3,000 horse and foot in this expedition against O'Neill, besides detachments from the different garrisons in Ulster; but he was forced to retire without bringing O'Neill under subjection, and lost at least 1000 men in the various conflicts in this campaign.

ened in the allied war he was carrying on against the English, and he remained himself, with a small party along with him, concealing and hiding himself among his faithful friends, in lonely cold huts, and in caves of the earth; he continued for some time after that manner, until on one occasion the White Knight, namely, Edmond, the son of John, received private information that James was in a certain cave in the vicinity of his country, so that what he did was, to make an incursion on his relative, by kindred and pedigree, and his lord, while engaged in treason for some years before that, respecting the small fragment of his country in which he was then, for he had not in his possession of Munster but that cave, in which he happened to be on that occasion. James was taken into custody by the knight, on account of that, and he took him with him to the president at Cork, without asking pardon or protection for him, and James, having been delivered into the hands of the president, he was carefully guarded till the month of July precisely. It was in the same month that Florence, the son of Donogh Mac Carthy, commonly called Mac Carthy More at that time, came to the president at Cork, and as soon as he arrived in the town, he was taken prisoner for the queen, and Florence began to proclaim aloud, without reserve, that they were seizing him in opposition to the word and protection of the queen; but that was of no avail to him, for he and James, the son of Thomas, were sent to England in the month of August precisely; when they appeared before the council of England, the Tower was by order appointed as their residence, for living and sleeping in it from that forth, till the time of their death, or during their lives, according to the will of God and of their sovereign (see note p. 669).

The office of governor was held by the earl of Thomond, namely, Donogh, the son of Conor O'Brien, in the county of Clare, from the day on which the governor of the province of Connaught, sir Conyers Clifford, had been slain by O'Donnell, on the Curlew mountain; a session was held by him for fifteen days in the monastery of Ennis, about the festival of St. Bridget of this year, and sixteen men were hanged by him at that session. The same earl, together with his brother Donal, went to England in the month of March; Donal returned about Lammas, and the earl remained there after him.

The young earl of Desmond, namely, James, the son of Gerald, son of James, son of John, whom we mentioned to have come from England as an earl in the harvest of the foregoing year, went to England in the spring of this year, and he remained there until the first month of winter, when he died; and were it not that his father had fallen while in opposition to the queen, and for the manner in which his people and faithful followers had been reduced by the English, the two provinces of Munster would have been in one wave of sorrow, lamentation, affliction, and mourning, for that young man; he was the only rightful heir of the stock of the true lineage, and the last remnant of the pure race of the Grecian (or noble), descent of the Geraldines; his death was the more to be lamented, that he left no heir, of either son or brother of his own, or of his family, to be appointed his successor, except a few, and these few were acting against the laws of the sovereign.

Captain Tyrrell, namely, Richard, the son of Thomas, son of Richard, remained along with O'Neill during the foregoing part of this year, and that captain, having got some retained kerns from O'Neill, he proceeded with them, about the Lammas of this year, into the province of Leinster, and it would be impossible to recount, relate, or enumerate all the captain effected of preys, slaughters, taking of towns, and of people, of plunder and of booty, in the county of Ceithearlach (Carlow), in the county of Kildare, in the county of Hy Failge (i. e. Offaly, or the King's county), and in the county of Tipperary, from Lammas (August), to the first month of the following winter.

The Lower Burkes, namely, Mac William Burke, i. e. Theobald, the son of Walter Ciotach, who was in alliance with O'Donnell, and by whom he had been formerly nominated lord, and Theobald of the Ships, the son of Richard of the Iron, who had been usually acting on behalf of the queen, were peaceable and very amicable to each other, since the time O'Donnell had established alliance and friendship between them, until the first month of the spring of this year; a commotion of war, and a revival of enmity arose between them, and Theobald of the Ships was the instigator of exciting the discord and renewing the anger, and the remembrance of the animosity which arose between them, so that the tribe of Ulick Burke joined in one alliance against Mac William, namely, Theobald, the son of Walter, and they deposed and expelled him from his patrimony, so that he was obliged to go to O'Donnell, and another Mac William was appointed to succeed him in the government of the country, by the tribe of Ulick, and by Theobald of the Ships, namely, Richard, the son of Rickard, i. e. Deamhan-Corrain, and he was commonly called the son of Deamhan-an-Chor-rain. When Mac William, i. e. Theobald, the son of Walter, went to O'Donnell, he complained to him of his troubles and oppression, and the manner in which he was expelled from his country; O'Donnell was grieved at that circumstance, but, however, he could not relieve him immediately, for he and all his forces were engaged in besieging and watching the English who had come to his country, so that he could not march into any distant territory, to relieve either friend or relative, on account of the opposition carried on against him in his own country. Mac William remained with him from the first month of Spring to the following Michaelmas, when O'Donnell sent with him as many forces as he could, to visit his patrimony in Mac William's country; when he arrived in the very centre of the country, the Mac William who had been appointed by the tribe of Ulick Burke, and by Theobald, the son of Richard of the Iron, by force, and in opposition to him, met him on the way in which he had proceeded, and a fierce conflict ensued between them, and each of them began to reproach the other with their old grudges, and their recent animosities, until at length Richard, the son of Rickard Burke, was defeated, and he himself was slain in that engagement, so that it was in that manner his government terminated.

A Spanish fleet arrived in the south of Ireland, and Don John de Agola (Don John, or Juan de Aguila, or Aquila), was the name of the leader who was their general; the place where they entered port was in the harbour of Kinsale, at the mouth of the blue pool of Banndan (the river Bandon), on the border of Courcy's country, on the one side, and of Kinel Aodha, viz., Barry Oge's estate on the other (the baronies of Courcy's and Kinnalea, in Cork). On their arrival at Kinsale, they took under their controul the fortifying, protection, defence and maintenance of the town, from the inhabitants who dwelt in it 'till then; they quartered their gentlemen, captains, and assistants in every stone and wooden building in the town; they conveyed from their ships to the town their supplies of provisions, drink, ordnance, powder, lead, and all other necessaries which they had with them, and they sent away their shipping back to their country; they planted their great guns and their engines of shooting and defence, at every place by which they considered their enemies might attack them; they also appointed sentinels and guards in succession, to be relieved at alternate hours, as had been their constant practice before their arrival at that place, for they were perfectly sure that the lord justice would come to attack them, with the queen's army, when the news should reach him. There was another castle on the eastern side of the harbour of Kinsale, which was called Rinn-Corrain (Rincorran castle), exactly on the estate of Barry Oge, in Kinnalea, and the Spaniards sent a party of their select men into that castle, to guard it in like manner. When the lord justice of Ireland received intelligence of these affairs, he did not delay until he arrived at Kinsale, with all the forces he could muster, of all those who were obedient to the queen in Ireland; thither came the president of the two provinces of Munster, with the forces of Munster along with him; the earl of Clanrickard, and every leader of a force or body of troops that was obedient to the command of the lord justice in Connaught, came with their forces to the same place; thither also came the Lagenians and Methians, as they had been commanded by the lord justice, for the forementioned purpose. After they assembled at one place, they pitched and formed a camp before Kinsale, from which they made an attack on Rincorran, and they did not allow them tranquillity or rest, sleep or repose, for a long time, while they carried on severe conflicts and valorous assaults against each other, until the guards, after enduring all the dangers they encountered, laid down their arms, and surrendered to the lord justice, leaving behind them their ammunition and ordnance; the lord justice sent those to be distributed among the great towns of Munster, until he should see how his warfare with the other party of them, who were in Kinsale, would terminate; it was on that occasion that young Carbry, the son of Carbry Mac Egan, who was standard-bearer to the son of the earl of Ormond, was slain. The lord justice and his forces, and the Spaniards of Kinsale, continued shooting and firing at each other, during the first month of winter, when the queen and the council recommended the earl of Thomond to come with many ships and vessels, men, good arms and provision stores, to succour and aid the sovereign's people in Ireland. The earl, with the fleet, having arrived at the harbour of Kinsale, they landed at the side of the port on which the lord justice's people were, and four thousand men was the number under the command of the earl of Thomond, of that army. Some assert that, were it not for the great valour and courage maintained by the lord justice, before the arrival of the earl of Thomond and these forces, the camp would have been vacated, and that the English would disperse and return to their great towns; the earl of Thomond encamped apart for himself, at the nearest angle of the lord justice's camp to Kinsale. At that time the Spaniards made a sally by night, on a quarter of the lord justice's camp, and having slain great numbers, they broke the stones and supporters (the platform) of the great gun of the queen's ordnance, in order that they might prevent their enemies from firing out of it, and they would have slain more were it not for the earl of Clanrickard, for it was he, and those that happened to be along with him, that compelled the Spaniards to return back to Kinsale. One hour's cessation, either by day or night, did not pass between these two camps, that blood was not shed on either side, from the first day the lord justice pitched his camp before Kinsale, until they separated, as hereafter stated.

When O'Neill, O'Donnell, and the Irish of Leth-Cuinn in general, received intelligence of that Spanish fleet, the resolution they came to, with one accord and disposition, although their chiefs and nobles had not assembled together to determine on their resolutions, or to conclude their counsels, was, that each lord of a country of them should leave a protection and guard over his territory and fair lands, and go with his arms and forces, without delay or stopping, to succour and aid the Spaniards who had come at their invitation and request, for it was an anguish of heart and a torment of mind to them that they should remain in the difficulty and predicament in which they were placed by their enemies, without relieving them if they could. O'Donnell was the first who prepared to proceed on that expedition, and having left guards to protect his cattle and flocks, and all his people in the county of Sligo, he set out in the beginning of winter from Ballymote. The following were some of the chiefs who accompanied him, namely, O'Rourke, i.e. Bryan Oge, the son of Bryan; the sons of John Burke; Mac Dermott of Moylurg; the O'Conors Roe; O'Kelly, and the chiefs who were expelled from Munster, and were with him during the foregoing part of this year, namely, Fitzmaurice of Kerry, i.e. Thomas, the son of Patrick; the Knight of the Glynn, namely, Edmond, the son of Thomas; Teige Cooch, the son of Torlogh Mac Mahon (of Clare), and Dermot Maol, the son of Donogh Mac Carthy. These forces proceeded through the county of Roscommon, along the borders of the county of Galway, through Siol Anmcha, and to the Shannon; they were expeditiously conveyed across the Shannon at Ath Croch (Shannon harbour); from thence they proceeded to Delvin Mac Coghlan, to Farkall (in King's county), to the borders of Slieve Bloom, and into Ikerrin (in Tipperary). O'Donnell remained nearly twenty days on the hill of Drom Saileach, in Ikerrin, waiting for O'Neill, who was marching slowly after him. O'Donnell's people continued devastating and plundering the country about them, during the time they remained at that place, so that they stood in need of nothing in their camp that a force could desire, the space they remained there. When the lord justice of Ireland received intelligence that O'Donnell was marching towards them, he sent the president of the two provinces of Munster, namely, sir George Carew, with four thousand soldiers along with him, for the purpose of meeting to oppose him, in order to prevent the march on which he was resolved, and to intercept him in the common way. When O'Donnell learned that the president, with his large army, had arrived in the vicinity of Cashel, he proceeded with his forces westward from Ikerrin, along Upper Ormond, to Owey, and the monastery of Owey, to Clanwilliam, on the borders of the Shannon, to the gates of Limerick, and south-westward until they arrived, without stopping or halting, by day or by night, beyond the plain into Hy-Conaill-Gabhra (the baronies of Conello, in Limerick). When the president discovered that O'Donnell had passed him into the fastnesses of the country, he considered it useless to pursue him, and returned back with his forces to the lord justice. Fitzmaurice was permitted by O'Donnell on that occasion to proceed along with a party of the force to visit and reconnoitre Clannaurice (in Kerry); while these were traversing the territory, they got an advantage of some of the castles of the country, and they took possession of them; the names of those were Lixnaw, Caislean-Gearr of Ardfert, and Baile-I-Chaola, and they put guards into those castles; it was on the same occasion that O'Conor Kerry, namely, John, the son of Conor O'Conor, took his own castle, namely, Carrigafoyle, which had been in the possession of the English for more than a year before that time, and he himself, with the people of his castle, joined in alliance with O'Donnell. O'Donnell remained nearly a week in these districts of Hy-Conaill-Gabhra, preying, devastating, plundering, and spoiling the country of every person in his vicinity, who had part or alliance with the English. O'Donnell after that proceeded over the heights of Sliabh-Luachra (Slieve Lougher mountain, in the barony of Trughenackmy, county of Kerry), into Clan Amhlaoibh (Clanawley, in the barony of Duhallow, county of Cork), to Muskerry and to Bandon, in the Carberries. All the Irish of Munster came to him at that place, except Mac Carthy Riavach, i. e. Donal, the son of Corinac-na-Iaoine, and Cormac, the son of Dermot, son of Teige, lord of Muskerry, and all these Irish promised they would be in alliance and union with him from that forth. As to O'Neill, namely Hugh, the son of Ferdorela, son of Con Bacach, he departed from Tyrone a week after Samhain (that is, a week after the 31st of October), to go to the relief of the forementioned Spaniards; after he had crossed the Boyne, he began to prey and burn the territory of Bregia and Meath; he afterwards proceeded through Westmeath and Ormond, across the Suir westward, and his further progress is not recorded until he arrived at Bandon, where O'Donnell was then, and John, the son of Thomas Roe, son of the earl (of Desmond), was along with O'Neill on that expedition. When the Irish chiefs, with their forces, arrived at one place, they encamped within a short distance of the lord justice's camp, on the north side, at Bel-Guala, in Kinnalea. Many a leader of a force and troop, lord of a territory, and chief of a district, were along with O'Neill and O'Donnell, at that place; great was the enthusiasm and courage, bravery, and valour, of the people who were there; and there was not a quarter or border, throughout the five provinces of Ireland, that these, or some party of them, did not spread an abhorrence and hatred, a dread and terror amongst the English and Irish who were fighting against them 'till that time; frequent and numerous were their battles, their exploits, their preys, their conflicts, their slaughters, and their feats of arms, against their enemies, in various territories, 'till that very hour; there was no power that they did not overcome, nor host so great they were not able to encounter, while the Trinity and prosperity aided them, and whilst they did the will of their Lord God, and fulfilled his commandments and testament; ample for giving battle and a full engagement against their enemies, on other occasions, was the number of the forces which were in that camp, were they all united in aiding each other, had God granted them to fight bravely and valiantly, with one disposition and one accord, on behalf of their religion and their country, in the difficult predicament to which their enemies were reduced on that occasion. The Irish brought the English into great difficulties, for they did not suffer hay, corn, or water, straw or fuel, to be conveyed to the lord justice's camp; they continued for some time in that manner, watching each other, until Don John, the general of the Spaniards, sent a written dispatch privately to the Irish, requesting them to make an attack on a certain quarter of the lord justice's camp on some night, and that he himself would attack the other part of it on the same night, for they were reduced to great difficulties by the English, just as the English were distressed by the Irish. The leaders of Tirconnell and of Tyrone began to deliberate in council respecting that proposal, and they disagreed and were in opposition for some time in determining on an unanimous resolution, for it was O'Neill's advice not to attack them immediately, but to maintain against them the difficulty in which they were placed, until they should perish of famine, and from want of all the necessities they stood in need of, as some of their people, and likewise of their horses, had already perished. It was an anguish of heart and shame to O'Donnell, to listen to the complaint and the predicament of the Spaniards, without relieving them from the difficulty in which they were, even should his death, or slaying or the loss of his people be the result of it ; so that the resolution they at length came to was, to attack the lord justice's camp, as they were requested. When the particular night on which they resolved to make that attack came on, the Irish bravely and courageously took up their arms of battle and conflict, and were ready for the march ; their leaders disputed with each other which party should be first in commencing the attack of that night, and they thus proceeded in three powerful columns of battle, and in three large and numerous bodies of forces, shoulder to shoulder, and elbow to elbow, outside of the borders of their camp. O'Neill and the Tyroneans, together with all those of the Orgiellians (the Mac Mahons, Maguires, and others, of Monaghan and Fermanagh), and of the Iveachians of Ulidia (Magennises, and others, of the county of Down), were in a separate powerful column ; O'Donnell and the Tirconnallians, together with his chieftains, and the Conacians in general, were in another column ; and such as were there of the gentlemen of Munster, Leinster, and of the men of Meath, together with their forces, of all those of them who rose in the war alliance of the Irish, and such as were expelled into Ulster in the foregoing part of this year, marched in the third column, valiantly, with a steady pace, without intermixing with the other forces. Having marched outside of the camp in that order, the forces mistook the way, and strayed in their advance on account of the great darkness of the night, so that their guides did not succeed in arriving at the appointed place before the lord justice's camp until day-light on the morrow. Some assert that a certain person of the Irish sent notice and a forewarning to the lord justice that the Irish and Spaniards were to make an attack on him that night, so that it was therefore the lord justice and the queen's forces were posted on their dangerous passes, and their advantageous positions, to defend their camp against their enemies. When the darkness of the night diminished, and the light of day was clear to all in general, it was then O'Neill's men happened to have arrived in the vicinity of the lord justice's people, without the Irish being actually aware of it, and as they were unprepared they avoided them, for the purpose of falling into their order and ranks, and to wait for O'Donnell, and the other party, who had mistaken their way, as we have before stated. When the lord justice saw that affair, he sent forth powerful active troops to attack them, who encountered O'Neill's people, so that they continued killing and slaying them, subduing and reducing them, until five or six colours were taken from them, and many of their men were slain. O'Donnell came up by the side of O'Neill's people, after they had been defeated, and he began to exhort those who were retreating to stand to maintain the battle along with his own people, until his utterance and voice failed him, by the excess of speaking and loud calls that he addressed to all in general, entreating his brave clans to stand by him and fight against their enemies ; he also told them that it was a shame and treachery for them to have acted in that unusual manner, viz., to turn their backs to their enemies, such as was never the custom with their race till then ; but, however, all he could do was of no avail to him, for as the first force was defeated, so was every other party in succession, but, notwithstanding that they were defeated, the number slain of them was not immense, because the pursuers were fewer compared with those who were before them. The displeasure of God, and misfortune, were evident against the pure Gadelians of Fodla (Ireland), on that occasion, for oftener had they defeated, with a small party of those, many hundreds of the English, than turned their backs to their enemies, in the field of battle and the pass of danger, in every place they encountered till that day. Great and immense was their loss in that place, though small was the number slain there, for the chivalry and bravery, prosperity and affluence, nobleness and valour, renown and pre-eminence, hospitality and generosity, heroism and defence, piety and pure religion of the Island of the Gael, were lost in that conflict. O'Neill and O'Donnell, with their Irish forces, returned back westward to Inis-Eoganain (Innishannon, between Kinsale and Bandon), that night. Alas ! it was not in the condition they were in on that night, they thought they would have returned from that expedition, for much blame and recrimination, regret and sadness, sorrow and anguish, prevailed throughout their camp in every quarter, and they could not become calmed, or much consoled ; hasty, immature, and precipitate were their counsels after they assembled together, so that the resolution they at length came to was, that O'Neill, and Rory, the brother of O'Donnell, with their commanders and the chiefs of Leth-Cuinn in general, should return back to their countries, to protect their territories and lands against foreign invaders, and that O'Donnell, namely Hugh Roe, Redmond, the son of John Burke, and captain Hugh Mus (Mostian), the son of Robert, should go to Spain to complain of their troubles, and difficulties to the king of Spain.

3. Landing of the Spaniards, Siege and Battle of Kinsale.—

An account of these events is given in the work of Fynes Morrison, who was Secretary to the lord deputy Mountjoy, and also in the Pacata Hibernia of sir George Carew, who was President of Munster, and partly in Mae Geoghegan's Ireland, from O'Sullivan Beare and others; and in Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, from which works the following particulars have been collected. King Philip III., of Spain, having resolved to send succours to O'Neill, O'Donnell, the earl of Desmond, and Florence Mac Carthy, to carry on the war against the English, assembled for that purpose some forces under the command of Don Juan del Aguila, or de Aquila, who had served some time against the French and English in Bretagne, but though he was a commander of some experience, he had not much reputation. O'Connor, however, in his Military Memoirs of the Irish Brigades, unjustly condemns Don Juan, for he appears to have been a brave man, though, perhaps, not possessed of much military abilities, besides he was rather vain and insolent towards his Irish allies. The fleet intended to convey the Spaniards to Ireland, was in the mean time sent, under the admiral Don Diego de Brochero, to the island of Terceira, in the Azores, to protect the Spanish galleons coming from America, against the English. This circumstance retarded the expedition, and much diminished the forces; on the return of the fleet from Terceira, it set sail from the Tagus for Ireland, and consisted of 45 vessels, most of them small, 17 of which carried guns, and only 6 were of the large class called galleons, 3 of which were named the St. Paul, the St. Peter, and the St. Andrew. The forces were mostly composed of old soldiers from the garrisons in Italy, with men from the Terceiran islands, and 1,500 Biscayan sailors. Shortly after the fleet had got into the open sea, it was dispersed by a storm, and 7 of the ships, carrying the artillery, warlike stores, and provisions, under the vice-admiral Don Pedro de Zubiar, were forced to take shelter in the harbour of Corunna, which the English writers called the Groyne. The remainder of the fleet, according to some accounts, 35 ships, landed at the harbour of Kinsale, on the 23rd of September, 1601, with about 3500 men, though the forces originally destined for Ireland amounted to 6,000. It appears from Morrison that de Aquila, after landing his forces, sent all his ships back to Spain, except 12, which he kept in the harbour of Kinsale. Carew gives, in the Pacata, the names of all the Spanish captains and commanders, and says they marched to Kinsale with 25 colours. As soon as the Spaniards landed, captain Saxey, the English commander, evacuated Kinsale, and withdrew his garrison to Cork. Kinsale is a seaport, situated near the mouth of the river Bandon, and was then a strong, stone-built town, well secured by nature and art. When the Spaniards approached Kinsale, the townsmen set open their gates, and permitted them quietly to enter; the Sovereign, says Carew, "with his white rod in his hand, going to billet them in several houses, more ready than if they had been the queen's forces." Don Juan issued a proclamation to the following effect:

"We, Don Juan de Aquila, general of the army to Philip, king of Spain, by these presents do promise that the inhabitants of the town of Kinsale shall receive no injury from any of our retinue, but rather shall be used as our brethren and friends, and that it shall be lawful for any of the inhabitants that list, to transport, without any molestation in body or goods, and as much as shall remain, likewise, without any hurt." The Spaniards brought a great quantity of arms for the use of the Irish who would join them, and also 1,600 saddles, expecting, as they were promised, to be furnished with horses by the Irish. Don Juan despatched messengers with letters to O'Neill and O'Donnell, advising them of his arrival, and Mathew de Oviedo, who had come to Donegal to O'Donnell the year before, and had been appointed by the Pope archbishop of Dublin, came with the Spaniards to Kinsale and, on the 12th of October, wrote to O'Neill and O'Donnell the following letter, which is given in the Pacata:

These nobles left a party of their neighbouring allies in Munster, to spoil it in their absence, namely, captain Tyrrell, with the other sons of John Burke, together with some other gentlemen; these noble Gadelians, namely O'Neill and O'Donnell, ordered that their command and controul should be given to O'Sullivan Beare, i. e. Donal, the son of Donal, son of Dermot, for he was the best chief commander of his party in Munster at that time, in wisdom and valour. It was on the 3rd day of the month of January that the Irish were defeated in that battle.³

"Pervenimus in Kinsale, eum classe et exercitu Regis nostri Philippi; expectamus vestras excellentias qualibet hora, veniant ergo quam velociter potuerint, portantes equos, quibus maxime indigemus, et jam alia via scripsimus; non dico plura: valete.

"FRATER MATHEUS,
"Archiepiscopus Dublinensis.

"Excellentissimis Dominis,
"Don O'Neill et O'Donnell."

"We have come to Kinsale with the fleet and army of our king Philip; we expect your excellencies any hour you please; ye will therefore come as quickly as ye can, bringing horses, of which we stand in great need; we have already written by another way. I say no more. Farewell.

"BROTHER MATHEW,
"Archbishop of Dublin.

"To the most excellent lords,
"Don O'Neill and O'Donnell."

Mountjoy having, at this time, published a proclamation censuring the Spaniards for their invasion of Ireland, was answered in a manifesto published by Don Juan, which is given in the Pacata as translated from the Latin, and commences thus: "Don Juan de Aquila, general of the war, and the Catholic king of Spain's chief commander in God's war which is made in Ireland for the defence of the faith," &c. In it are the following passages in answer to Mountjoy: "O immortal God! who doth not wonder at your bitter and inexpressible cruelty, and your boldness shewed in these words; for who is it that doth not know the great cruelty which you English have exercised, and cease not to exercise, towards the miserable Irish. You, I say, go about to take from their souls the Catholic faith, which their fathers held, in which consists eternal life; truly you are more cruel than bears and lions. Who is it that hath demolished all the temporalities of this flourishing kingdom except the English? Look upon this and be ashamed; whereas on the other side we, commiserating the condition of the Catholics here, have left our most sweet and happy country Spain, that is replenished with all good things, being stirred with their cries, which pierce the heavens, and have reached the ears of the Pope, and of our king Philip."

Many of the Munster chiefs joined the English, amongst others Cormac Mac Carthy, lord of Muskerry, while others came to assist the Spaniards at Kinsale, of whom the principal man was the valiant Donal O'Sullivan Beare, aided by Donogh and Fincen O'Driscoll; John O'Connor Kerry, with Fitzgerald, knight of Kerry, Donal Mac Carthy, son of the earl of Clancaire, and some

A. D. 1602.

After the Irish, and the small party of the Spaniards who were along with them at that time, of the king of Spain's people had been defeated by the English, in the battle of Kinsale, on the 3rd day of the month of January, as has been already stated, O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, was seized with of the Mac Carthys of Carberry, the adherents of Florence Mac Carthy, and some of the O'Mahonys and O'Donovans of Carberry; but the Irish of Munster made only feeble efforts, being broken down after Carew had taken the earl of Desmond and Florence Mac Carthy, and sent them prisoners to the Tower of London. The lord deputy Mountjoy was at Kilkenny when the Spaniards landed, on which he proceeded to Clonmel, and thence to Cork, to concert measures with sir George Carew, president of Munster, and collect the English forces. On the 29th of September, Mountjoy, accompanied by Carew, with a troop of horse, went to view Kinsale, and the Spanish fleet, and fix on a fit place for their camp. About the 10th of October the English had collected all their forces in Munster at Cork, under Mountjoy, Carew, sir Benjamin Berry, &c., and the forces of the Pale, in Leinster and Meath, under the marshal sir Richard Wingfield, with those from Athlone and the frontiers of Connaught, under sir John Barkley, serjeant-major of the army, and those from Armagh, and other garrisons in the North, under sir Henry Danvers. On the 16th of October Mountjoy came with his forces from Cork, within five miles of Kinsale, at a place called Owney Buoy, and on the 17th the army advanced and encamped within half-a-mile of the town, under the hill of Knock-Robin, and commenced the siege, but afterwards removed their camp to a hill called the Spittle, north of the town. The Spaniards were fortified in Kinsale, and also put garrisons in two forts or castles at the entrance of the harbour, that on the right being called Rincorran, and the one on the left Castle-ni-park. The forces of Mountjoy, amounting at this time to about 7,000 men, commanded by various colonels, as sir Richard Wingfield, sir John Barkley, sir William Godolphin, sir Arthur Savage, sir Oliver St. John, sir Richard Percy, lord Audley, &c., with captains Blaney, Bodley, Taaffe, &c., incessantly continued the siege against the Spaniards, who very valiantly made four or five sallies or sorties on the English, in which great numbers were slain on both sides. The artillery of the English, cannons and culverins, constantly battered the castle of Rincorran, which at length surrendered, on the 1st of November, and about 86 of the Spaniards, with a multitude of Irish churls, says Morrison, and many women and children, were made prisoners, but all the swordsmen escaped to the town. The English forces at Kinsale, on the 27th of October, 1601, according to Morrison, amounted to 6,900 foot, and 611 horse, making 7,511 men. On the 10th of November Donogh O'Brien, earl of Thomond, came from England with 13 ships, and 1,000 men, but the Annals say he had 4,000, which included other forces that came at the same time, for, on the 11th, 2,000 foot and 100 horse, under sir Anthony Cook, landed at Waterford, according to Cox and Morrison, and on the 12th admirals Levison and Preston arrived at Cork with 10 ships of war, from England, and 2,000 men. The fleets under these admirals, and the earl of Thomond, brought artillery, arms, ammunition, provisions, and other supplies. The forces of the earl of Thomond came to Castlehaven, and thence to Kinsale, and those of Levison, Preston, and Cook, were brought from Cork and Waterford to Kinsale, all to act against the Spaniards. According to Morrison, the army at Kinsale, on the 20th of November, amounted to 11,800 foot, and 857 horse, thus making in all 12,657 men, and O'Connor says, in his Military Memoirs, the English had 15,000 men at Kinsale.—Morrison, vol. i. pp. 344, 362, 364, and vol. ii. pp. 6, 8. The foot forces, under Mountjoy and Carew, were distributed into 11 regiments, and commanded by 9 colonels. Mountjoy had 1,400 men, commanded by his lieutenant sir Benjamin Berry, and Carew had 1,100 men; Richard Burke, earl of Clanrickard, had 1000; the earl of Thomond, 1,000; sir Charles Wilmot, 1,000; sir Oliver St.

great anger, anxiety, and anguish of mind, and he could not repose or rest for the space of three days and three nights afterwards, so that he despaired of relief, and the resolution he came to, at the end of that time, through the recommendation of O'Neill, although it was with reluctance he advised him to it, was to depart from Ireland, and John, 1,050; sir Christopher St. Lawrence, 1,050; sir Richard Morrison, 1,100; sir Richard Percy, 950, and lord Audley 900. The cavalry was commanded by the marshal sir Richard Wingfield, sir John Barkeley, sir Oliver Lambert, sir Garrett Moore, the earl of Kildare, sir Edward Herbert, sir Henry Poer, sir William Godolphin, sir William Fortescue, sir Theobald Dillon, sir Thomas Burke, and captains Bodley, Bostock, Esmond, Rotheram, Roe, &c. The English actively continued the siege during the month of November, the Spaniards making several sallies on them, and severe skirmishes took place, in which great numbers were slain on both sides; the English artillery for a long time battered the fortress of Castle-ni-park, and the walls of Kinsale, having about 20 pieces of artillery, but the Spaniards defended the town with great valour, though they had only three or four cannons, the rest of their guns being on board the ships driven by storm to Corunna.

In the mean time O'Donnell, having set out on his march to Munster, about the beginning of November, the president Carew was sent to intercept him in Tipperary, with a force of about 5000 men, horse and foot, under his own command, assisted by sir Charles Wilmot and sir Christopher St. Lawrence. About the middle of November these forces advanced to Ardmaile, near Cashel, to attack O'Donnell, who was at that time encamped near Holycross. O'Donnell, in haste to relieve the Spaniards, did not wait to encounter Carew's forces, and having caused fires to be lighted in his camp to deceive the enemy, he marched onward before day to the defiles, by the Abbey of Owney, or Abington, through O'Ryan's country, and a sharp frost having set in at the time, he crossed the Slieve Felim mountains, on the borders of Tipperary and Limerick, towards the Shannon, and did not halt until he arrived at Croom. The boggy mountains would have been impassable, were it not for the frost that fortunately set in, and O'Donnell, with his hardy soldiers, performed this astonishing march of 32 Irish miles, or more than 40 English miles, in twenty-four hours, which, Carew says, "was the greatest march with carriage that hath been heard of." Carew advanced rapidly in pursuit of the Irish to Abington, but he there learned that O'Donnell was at Croom, on which Carew proceeded to Kilmallock, but says his labour was lost, and he then returned to Kinsale. O'Donnell next marched into Kerry, and thence to the county of Cork, and in December joined the Spaniards at Castlehaven.

The siege of Kinsale was still carried on incessantly, and Castle-ni-park was taken on the 26th of November; the Spaniards, as usual, made several sallies, and many were slain on both sides. On the 28th the English sent a Trumpet to summon the town to surrender, but he was not suffered to enter, and got his answer at the gate, the Spaniards saying that they held the town, first for Christ, and next for the king of Spain, and would defend it against all enemies. The English on the 30th, having made a breach in the walls, resolved on the 1st of December, says Morrison, "to give the Spaniard a Bravado," and for this purpose 2,000 foot were selected, under their chief commanders, and having advanced, had a severe skirmish with the Spaniards, who were lodged in the trenches outside, near the walls. In this conflict one of the Spanish captains, named Don Pedro Morijon, displayed amazing bravery, and having walked across the breach animating his men, sword in hand, sir Richard Wingfield caused many great and small shot to be fired at him, and offered a reward of £20 to whoever should hit him, but though many balls beat the dirt and stones in his face and about his ears, yet he constantly stood his ground, without receiving any hurt, to the end of the engagement, which continued an hour, and the English then withdrew their forces, after great numbers had been killed and wounded on each side.

go to Spain to king Philip III., to request more forces and succours from him, for he was of opinion that the king of Spain was the most likely person to relieve him, and likewise the most disposed to aid all those who fought on behalf of the Roman Catholic religion, and moreover, on ac-

The English having resolved to erect an earthen fort or rath on the west side of the town, in which they would lodge foot forces to second their artillery, captain Bodly, the Trench-master, captain Blaney, marshal Wingfield, and Mountjoy himself, having entrenched their forces on the hill, began to cast up the fort during the night, while the Spaniards, from their trenches, fired hotly during the night on the men, guarding the pioneers, and on the following day, the 2nd of December, the Spaniards poured in their small shot; but the English finished the fort, after many had been killed and wounded on both sides. On the night of the 3rd the trenches where theannon was planted, on the east side of the town, were manned with Mountjoy's guards, under captain Blount, with the companies of sir Thomas Burke, sir Benjamin Berry, and captains Rotheram and Harvey; and the fort newly erected on the west side, near the town, between the two camps, in one of which, called the great camp, Mountjoy and the earl of Clanrickard were lodged, and the earl of Thomond in the other, was manned by the forces under captains Flower, Spencer, Dillon, Clare, Boise, Masterson, &c., with those of sir Arthur Savage, sir John Dowdall, sir William Warren, sir William Fortescue, sir Richard Morrison, sir Francis Rush, sir Oliver St. John, and some of the earl of Thomond's troops; and the cavalry was commanded by sir William Godolphin and the earl of Clanrickard. On that night, which was dark and rainy, the Spaniards, to the number of 2000, made a powerful sally, directed chiefly against the platform and battery, where the English artillery was planted on the east side, and made determined efforts to force the place, and demolish the gabions and trenches, being armed with all sorts of tools and weapons, and with spikes and hammers, to cloy the cannon. After a severe contest, the Spaniards took the fort on the west side, but it was retaken by the English. There were about 5000 men engaged on both sides in this conflict, which continued for a long time, with great fury, and the Spaniards displayed the most undaunted bravery; according to Morrison 200 of the Spaniards were slain, and the same number wounded, and there were at least as many killed and wounded on the side of the English, with some officers mentioned by Morrison.

On the 3rd of December, the six ships which had been driven to Corunna by storm, and were under the command of the admiral Don Pedro, arrived at Castlehaven, about 20 miles from Kinsale, with a force of 700 men, or 1000, according to some accounts, with arms, artillery, &c.; the fleet was commanded by admiral Siriago, and the forces by Don Alonzo del Campo, some of these forces took possession of the fortress of Castlehaven, which belonged to Donogh O'Driscoll, chief of that district, and they were joined by five brothers of the O'Driscolls. Finceen O'Driscoll gave a party of the Spaniards his castle of Baltimore, and Donal O'Sullivan Beare gave another party of them his strong castle of Dunboy, at Bearehaven. The English admiral, sir Richard Levison, was sent with six ships from Kinsale to attack the Spaniards at Castlehaven, where he arrived on the morning of the 6th of December, and had a sharp action with the Spanish ships, and the forces in the castle. Morrison, as usual, claims the victory for the English; but it appears they had the worst of it, and Levison returned to Kinsale the next day; this engagement continued part of two days, and the English lost about 300 men, though Mac Geoghegan says 575 of the English forces were slain. A Scottish ship commanded by one David High, of Leith, was engaged by the Spaniards at Corunna, but was separated by storm from those which arrived at Castlehaven, and came to Kinsale; the Scotch captain, instead of conveying the Spaniards to their own countrymen, betrayed and delivered them into the hands of the English. This ship contained 25 ton of bread, and 6 butts of wine, and there were about 85 Spaniards on board, who were sent prisoners to England. The siege of Kinsale was still actively continued, and Morrison mentions a curious incident which occurred at this time, that Don Juan de Aquila sent a challenge to lord Mountjoy, that the question between England and Spain should be decided between them by single combat, but the offer of the valiant Spaniard was declined by Mountjoy, who absurdly alleged, as one of his reasons, that the Romanists were forbidden by the council of Trent from fighting single combat, and that Don Juan had therefore no right to challenge him. Mountjoy appears to have had no great taste for single combats, and he and Carew were far more expert in attempts to get their opponents betrayed or assassinated, as, for instance, when Mountjoy offered a reward of one thousand pounds for the head of O'Neill; and Carew, by large bribes, got the earl of Desmond and Florence Mac Cnrthy betrayed into his hands. About the 7th of December, O'Donnell's forces joined the Spaniards at Castlehaven, and news arrived on the 8th, says Morrison, that O'Neill was advancing towards Kinsale, on which the English more strongly fortified their camp. The siege was constantly continued during the month of December, amidst violent storms of wind and rain; and on many nights there was terrific thunder and lightning, a thing very unusual at that season, the horrors of the scene being thus heightened by the awful fury of the elements, the fire, and roar of artillery, alternating with flashes of lightning, and loud thunder. The Spaniards, as usual, made several sallies during this period, with great bravery, and many fell on each side. On the 21st O'Neill shewed himself, with all his forces, horse and foot, on a hill northward, within about a mile or two of Kinsale, near the river Owney Buoy, and a place called Belgoley.

Battle of Kinsale.—On the news of the arrival of the Spaniards at Kinsale, O'Neill and O'Donnell actively collected their forces to come to their assistance, those heroic chiefs and their hardy soldiers undertaking this arduous expedition of more than 200 miles to Munster, in the depth of winter, by bad roads, and over bogs, morasses, and mountains. The chiefs under O'Donnell, according to the Pacata, and other accounts, were his brother Rory, Felim O'Dogherty, Mac Sweeney of Tnath, O'Boyle and others, in Donegal; Brian O'Rourke of Leitrim; the two Mac Donoghs of Corran in Sligo, and the brother of O'Connor Sligo; the two O'Conors Roe, Conor Mac Dermott of Moyburg, and O'Beirne of Roscommon, O'Kelly, and the two O'Flahertys, William and Redmond Burke, and Hugh Mostian, from Galway; and in Munster he was joined by Thomas Fitzmaurice, lord of Kerry, the Fitzgeralds, knights of Kerry and Glynn, and Dermot Maol Mac Carthy of Carberry, brother of Florence. O'Donnell's forces amounted to 2,500 men. The chiefs who came with O'Neill were the O'Neills and O'Magans of Tyrone; Randal Mac Sorley and others, of the Mac Donnells of Antrim; the Magennis of Down; the Mac Canns of Armagh; the Mac Mahons of Monaghan; Constantine Maguire of Fermanagh, with some of the O'Reillys of Cavan; captain Richard Tyrrell, John Fitzgerald, brother of the earl of Desmond, and Pierce Lacy. O'Neill's forces were about 4000, and the entire of the Irish forces, according to Morrison and the Pacata, were 6000 foot and 500 horse, with about 300 of the Spaniards from Castlehaven under Don Alonzo del Campo, and O'Sullivan Beare. The English forces at Kinsale as before stated, according to Morrison, amounted to 12,600 men, in the latter end of November; but making allowance for those killed and wounded since that time, at the siege, or who died of disease, they had at least 10,000 men at the battle of Kinsale, though Morrison, with his usual veracity, make them only 6,600, and says that only about 2000 of them were engaged in this battle, which statement is a most glaring falsehood. The Irish army was encamped on the 21st, north of Kinsale, about a mile from the English camp. O'Neill and O'Donnell were advised by de Aquila to make an attack by night on the English camp, and that he and his Spaniards would sally out from Kinsale, and assault them simultaneously on the other side. It appears O'Neill was averse to this plan, and gave his advice not to come to an engagement, but to hem in the English, and cut off their supplies, and thus reduce them, by famine and disease, which had already set in amongst them; but O'Donnell was of a contrary opinion, and considered himself bound in honor to meet the wishes of the Spaniards, and was resolved count of his alliance with the Irish, from their having originally come from Spain to invade Ireland, as recorded in the book called the Book of Invasions. Having determined on that resolution, the persons he selected to accompany him on that mission were, Redmond Burke, the son of John; cap-immediately to attack the English. According to the Pacata, Brian Mac Hugh Oge Mac Mahon, whose son had been a page with the president Carew in England, some years before, sent, on the 22nd, a boy to captain William Taaffe, requesting him to procure a bottle of aqua vite, or usquebaugh, from Carew, which he sent him for old acquaintance sake. On the 23rd Mac Mahon sent the same messenger, thanking Carew for his present, and at the same time sent him a letter advising him to stand well on his guard the following night, for that he was present at a council, wherein it was resolved that the English camp should be assaulted the next night, by the Irish and Spaniards, therefore Mountjoy and Carew were perfectly prepared for the expected surprise; besides, it is stated, that on the 23rd, a letter was intercepted from De Aquila to O'Neill, advising the attack. It was determined on to assault the English camp on the 23rd, but it appears there was some misunderstanding between O'Neill and O'Donnell, as to which should have the honor of leading the vanguard; however, it was finally agreed upon that captain Tyrrell should lead the van, O'Neill the centre, and O'Donnell the rear. It was intended to attack the English early in the night, but, from the great darkness, the Irish forces missed their way, and did not come up to the camp 'till near day-break on the 24th. The English forces were commanded by Mountjoy himself, Carew, the earls of Thomond and Clanrickard, the marshal Wingfield, sir Richard Percy, sir Charles Wilmot, sir Christopher St. Laurence, sir Richard Greame, sir Benjamin Berry, sir Richard Morrison, lord Audley, sir Oliver St. John, sir Henry Folliott, sir John Barkley, sir Samuel Bagnall, sir Henry Poer, sir Henry Danvers, sir William Godolphin, sir Francis Rush, and captains Fleming, Taaffe, Roper, Roe, and many other officers. The battle commenced near a ford and some boggy ground, and continued but about an hour, when the Irish suddenly gave way, some of their troops having been seized with a panic, partly caused it appears, according to Morrison, by the blowing up of a gunpowder bag, and being thus repulsed, they could not again be rallied, by all the efforts of O'Neill, O'Donnell, and Tyrrell, who displayed their usual determined bravery, and retreated in good order, and the English were deterred from the pursuit for fear of an ambush. On the side of the English sir Richard Greame was killed, and Danvers, Godolphin, and other officers were wounded, but few of their men fell, according to Morrison; while, he says, 1,200 of the Irish were slain, and many hundreds wounded; but the Irish were however completely defeated, and it appears probable that about 1000 of them, and 200 of the English, fell in this battle. It is stated by Morrison and Carew that the earl of Clanrickard was nearly killed, several shots having passed through his clothes, and they say, "no man did bloody his sword more than his lordship that day, and with his own hand he killed about 20 Irish kerne, and cried out to spare no rebel;" and Carew says, "he would suffer no prisoners to be taken, but bade them kill the rebels." Some of the Irish chiefs taken prisoners offered great ransoms, but Carew says, when brought to the camp, they were all hanged; the Spanish captain Alonzo del Canipo was taken prisoner, but not put to death; according to Morrison, the following chiefs were slain on the side of O'Neill, namely, Torlogh O'Hagan; Kedagh, Donal, Rory, and Colla Mac Donnell; Mulmora O'Hagerty; three chiefs of the O'Neills, and five of the Mac Canns. It appears the Spaniards in Kinsale, through some mismanagement, were not engaged in this ill-concerted attack, but, on the 25th and 26th, they made some sallies from the town. In Morrison, and in the Pacata, is mentioned a singular prophecy respecting the battle of Kinsale; Carew says the earl of Thomond often told him, that in an old book of Irish prophecies which he had seen, it was said that, towards the latter days, there would be a battle fought near Kinsale, between the English and Irish, in which the former would be victorious; and Morrison says, that on the day of the battle, an old written book was shewn to Mountjoy, wherein was a prophecy naming the ford and hill where the battle was fought, and foretelling the overbrow of the Irish at that place; in this prophecy it was also mentioned, that when the three Hughes were conquered in Munster, Ireland would be lost. These were Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, Red Hugh O'Donnell, and Hugh Maguire, who was killed in combat with Warham St. Leger. The Irish, from some unaccountable cause, never fought so badly before, and it appears there was no proper concert between them and the Spaniards in Kinsale. Besides, it is to be observed, that as the earl of Desmond and Florence Mac Carthy, the chief leaders of the Munster Irish, were subdued and sent prisoners to the Tower, and O'Brien of Thomond being joined with the English, the Munstermen were at this time broken down, and gave but feeble support to the Irish of the North. Many of the Irish chiefs had been gained over by the artful policy of Mountjoy and Carew, and they used every effort to sow discord and dissension amongst the rest. Carew says, in the Pacata, "as for Fineen O'Driscoll, and the Irish in these parts, they are become so well divided amongst one another, and are fallen to preying and killing each other, in such a manner, as we are of opinion will greatly avail to the quieting of those parts;" and again he says, "and also it was thought no ill policy to make the Irish draw blood, one upon another, whereby their private quarrels might advance the public service." But this policy was of older date than the time of Carew, for in the state papers of the reign of Henry the 8th, the following passage occurs in a letter of the king to his lord deputy: "Now, at the beginning, politic practices may do more good than exploit of war, till such time as the strength of the Irish enemy shall be enfeebled and diminished, as well by getting their captains from them, as by putting division among them, so that they join not together." Even Leland admits, in his history, that had the Irish chiefs acted with unanimity and concert, they could, by a simultaneous effort, have easily, at any period, annihilated the English power in Ireland; and no doubt O'Neill and O'Donnell would have wrested Ireland from the English, had the men of the other provinces made such energetic efforts as the Ultonians. The battle of Kinsale was fought on the 24th of December, 1601, old style; but, on the 3rd of January, according to the Annals, which is the same date reckoning by the new style. The Annalists sorrowfully record the subjugation of the Irish, and Taaffe, alluding to this period, thus pathetically laments their fall; "Melodious lyre of Inis-fail, strike mournful notes. The heroes who delighted in thy festive strains, and cherished thy muse, are hastening to the last act of the fatal tragedy, which closes with their utter overthrow, saddened by calamities unequalled, by desolation and ruin. A nation patriarchal in its recorded antiquity, in its constitution, laws, manners, and customs, is on the point of extermination; or, if a remnant is to survive slaughter and famine, 'tis only to irretrievable degradation." After the defeat at Kinsale, O'Neill rapidly proceeded through the counties of Cork, Limerick, and Tipperary, and thence through the Pale, to Meath and Ulster. The Tircconnallians, under Rory O'Donnell, accompanied O'Neill to Meath, and then proceeded on their way to North Connanght, through Westmeath, where they were attacked at Ballymore, Lough Scudry, by the Anglo-Irish; but, according to Mac Geoghegan, they were defeated by O'Donnell's cavalry, and 200 of them slain.

On the 31st of December, Don Juan sent proposals of capitulation to Mountjoy, and on the 2nd of January, old style, or the 12th new style, the terms were agreed to, which were very honourable to the Spaniards, who were to evacuate Kinsale with colours flying, and with their arms, ammunition, money, and all other valuable articles, and to be sent back safe to Spain, on giving up their other garrisons at Dunboy, Baltimore, and Castlehaven. Thus terminated the remarkable siege of Kinsale, which had continued from the 17th of October to that time, a period of more than 10 weeks. During the siege, the Spaniards displayed great bravery, and about 1000 of them were slain in the many sallies and sorties made by them against the English, and in the assaults and attacks tain Hugh Mostian, the son of Robert ; Flaithri, the son of Fithil O'Maolconry, a worthy Father of the order of St Francis, who was a spiritual friend of his, and some others of his own faithful friends besides. When that resolution was made known to all in general, most mournful and melancholy were the clapping of hands, the excessive sorrowful weeping, and the loud lamentations and wailing which prevailed throughout O'Donnell's camp at that time ; and they had cause for that, had they known it, at the time, for they did not ever again behold their leader, and lord of their country, to rule over them as prince in the island of Eire. O'Donnell and his brave companions took shipping at Cuan-an-Chaislein (Castlehaven, in Cork), on the 6th day of the month of January, and the first favourable breeze of wind which came having wafted them over the vast stormy ocean, they entered port on the 14th day of the same month, in the vicinity of Corunna, a noble town in the kingdom of Galicia, in Spain, where lay Tor-Breogain (the Tower of Breogan), called Brigantia, which had been built in former times by Breogan, the son of Bratha, and from thence the sons of Milesius of Spain, the son of Bile, son of Breogan, had come, on their first invasion of Ireland against the Tuatha-Dedanán. When O'Donnell landed at Corunna, he proceeded through the town, and went to see the Tower of Breogan, and he was happy at his having landed in that place, for he deemed it an omen of great prosperity to him to be wafted to the place from which his ancestors had formerly gained strength and power over Ireland. After having rested himself for a short time at Corunna, he proceeded to where the king was, in Castilla (Castile), for it was there he happened to have been at that time, in the city called Samora (Zamora), where he was then on his progress through his kingdom. O'Donnell having appeared before the king, he went on his knees in his presence, and he made his submission and obeisance to him, as was due to his majesty, and he would not rise until the king granted him his three requests ; the first of these was, to send an army with him to Ireland, with the necessary supplies and arms for the expedition, as soon as prepared ; the second was, that none of the nobles of his blood, of the free-born clans, might be appointed to sway or power over himself or his successors, should the king's majesty assume authority and power over Ireland ; and the third request was, that the rights of his ancestors might not at any time be reduced or diminished, on himself or on his successors, in any place where his ancestors had strength and power before that time in Ireland. All these were granted him by the king, and he received great respect from him, so great an honour probably as none of the Irish ever received in the latter times from any other king. O'Donnell having transacted his affairs with the king, he was recommended by the king to go back to Corunna, and remain there until all things should be ready for his return ; this he accordingly did, and he remained there until the month of August following. It was an anguish of heart and a tribulation of mind to O'Donnell, the length of time that the Irish were unrelieved or unaided by him ; and as he considered it too long that the army which had been promised him was not mustered together, he prepared again to go before the king, to learn what retarded or delayed the forces which he had promised, and when he arrived at the town called Simancas, two leagues from the king's court at Valladolid, God permitted, and the ill fate, misfortune, curse, and malediction attending the island of Heremon and the Gadelians of fair Banba (Ireland) would have it, that O'Donnell took a disease and his death sickness, and after being confined seventeen days to his bed, he died at the end of that time, on the 10th day of September precisely, in a house belonging to the king of Spain, at that town of Simancas, after having mourned his faults and imperfections, after a rigid repentance of his sins and transgressions, after making an unreserved confes-

made by the English on the town. The English lost at least 4000 men in this siege, about 1000 of whom were killed by the Spaniards, and the rest died of disease. According to Carew and Morrison, the Spaniards, who returned from Ireland, were 2,070, from Kinsale, and 415 from Baltimore and Castlehaven, which, with those from other places, made in all 3025, besides captains and other officers, priests, and a great number of Irish.

On the 28th of December, or 6th of January, N. S. the admiral Don Pedro or Siriago, sailed from Castlehaven for Spain, accompanied by Red Hugh O'Donnell, Hugh Mostian, Redmond Burke, and others, and a list of a great number of the Irish who afterwards went to Spain along with de Aquila is given in the Pacata. On the 9th of January, Mountjoy came to Cork, accompanied by Don Juan, and the Spaniards having surrendered Kinsale, Castlehaven, Baltimore, Dunboy, &c., a great number of them sailed from Kinsale on the 20th of February, and the remainder of them sailed from the same harbour, for Spain, on the 16th of March, under Don Juan de Aquila.

sion to his spiritual friends, after receiving the body and blood of Christ, and after extreme unction, as was meet, at the hands of his own spiritual advisers, and his own learned divines, Father Flai-thri O'Maolconry, O'Donnell's confessor and spiritual adviser, and who was afterwards archbishop of Tuam, and Father Maurice Ulltach (O'Dunlevy) the son of Donogh, a poor friar of the order of St. Francis, from the conventual monastery of Donegal, and who was of O'Donnell's household. His corpse was conveyed, in a covered burial carriage, to the king's court at Valladolid, surrounded by immense numbers of the state officers, counsellors, and the king's guards, with luminous lamps, and beautifully brilliant torches of wax, lighted on each side of him; he was afterwards buried at the monastery of St. Francis, exactly in the chancel, with great honours and solemnity, and more magnificence than ever any of the Irish had been interred before. Masses, and many hymns, chaunts, and melodious canticles, were celebrated and sung for the good of his soul, and prayers, as meet, were offered up to God for him. Alas! mournful to many was the untimely loss of him who departed, for he was the chief head of the conference, council, and consultation of the most of the men of Ireland, either in peace or war; he was a powerful and bounteous lord, with the authority of a prince to maintain the laws; a lion in strength and might, of determination and command in word and action, so that truly he durst not be disobeyed, for whatever he ordered to be done, should be promptly executed, according as he directed it by his word; a dove in meekness and mildness to the religious orders, clergy, and learned men, and to every one not opposed to him, and who rendered him obedience; a man who spread the fear and terror of his name amongst all persons far and near, and whom no man could terrify; a lord who was the expeller of insurgents, and destroyer of malefactors; who exalted the sons of life, and executed the sons of death; a man who did not suffer any injury, injustice, or insult offered him to pass unpunished, but quickly took satisfaction, and was avenged; a determined, fierce, and bold invader of districts; a warlike, predatory, and desolating despoiler of distant territories; a persevering, indomitable, and stern destroyer, who subdued both the English and Irish who opposed him; one who did not neglect, during life, to perform every duty becoming a prince; a sweet-sounding trumpet; a man of superior understanding, eloquence, wisdom and counsel, and of so agreeable a countenance, that he captivated every one who beheld him; a promised fulfiller of prophecy, who had been truly foretold in verse by prophets, long before his birth, and particularly by the holy Saint Columkille, the son of Felim, who said as follows:

"A man of exalted fame shall come
Who will cause mournful weeping in every country;
He will be the pious chief,
And shall rule as prince for ten years."

Mournful was the condition of the men of Ireland, after the death of O'Donnell, for their energy and spirit were broken down; they exchanged their courage for cowardice, their magnanimity for weakness of mind, and their pride for servility; their success, bravery, valour, chivalry, triumph, and battle-sway forsook them after his death; they gave up all hopes of relief, so that the greater part of them were obliged to seek refuge amongst enemies and strangers, while others of them were scattered and dispersed, not only throughout Ireland, but through foreign countries in general, as poor, indigent, wretched wanderers, and other parties of them sold their military services to foreigners, so that immense numbers of the free-born noble sons of the men of Ireland were slain and destroyed in various, distant, foreign countries; and strange places, and unhereditary grave-yards became their burial grounds, in consequence of the death of that one man who departed from them. But in short it would be too tedious, and impossible to enumerate or relate all the great evils that sprung and became permanently established in the Island of Eire, through the death of Red Hugh O'Donnell at that time.⁴

4. Death of O'Donnell.—Ample accounts of the renowned Red Hugh O'Donnell have been given in the course of these Annals, and in the Pacata Hibernia, some particulars are given of his arrival and reception in Spain. An interesting Life of O'Donnell will be found in the Antiquarian Researches of the learned sir William Betham. The day after O'Donnell's arrival at Corunna, on the 15th of January, he was nobly received by the count of Caracena, governor of Galicia, who invited him to lodge in his own mansion, where he remained till the 27th, when he departed, accompanied by the count and many captains, and, according to the Pacata, "Caracena evermore gave O'Donnell the right hand, which within his government he would not have done to the greatest duke in Spain"; and at his departure he presented O'Donnell with one thousand ducats; he lay that night at Santa Lucia, and Caracena returned. The next day O'Donnell proceeded to the city of Compostella, where he was received with magnificence by the prelates, citizens, and clergy,

The Irish having dispersed, after the battle of Kinsale, as we have before stated, the lord justice, the president (of Munster), the earl of Thomond, and the earl of Clanrickard, with the commanders of the English forces in general, put on the resolution of attacking Kinsale, to take it by entering the gates and battered breaches which were made by the foreign immense great ordnance which they had with them, for shooting and firing on the town, from the first day they encamped before it till that day. When Don John heard of that affair, and learned that the Irish, to whom he had come, and from whom he expected relief, had dispersed and left him in the confined place and close prison in which he was, and that it was not in his power to return back to his friends, or to go forward against his enemies, on account of their immense and vast numbers, and the excellence of their defence, and watching by day and night, the resolution he came to was, to send a messenger to the lord justice, the president, the earl of Clanrickard, the earl of Thomond, and the commanders of the army, to inform them that he would surrender to the lord justice, and those lords, on conditions that his people should be allowed to remain in the town till the festival of St. Patrick following, with permission for his men to go in and come out along with the queen's people indiscriminately, and likewise to be allowed to receive their money, their supplies, and every thing they required, should relief or aid come to them from the king of Spain during that time; that the lord justice should be bound to let Don John at large among his people; that the lord justice and these lords should have him conveyed back to Spain, and that Don John would send back safe to Ireland the ships which were to convey him. The terms of the dispatch were well received by the lord justice, and the nobles in general, and their proposals were agreed to. After the conditions were ratified, and confirmed by both parties, Don John came to the lord justice, and was honourably received by the lord justice, and the nobles who were along with him; the lord justice, the president, and Don John, proceeded to Cork, and all returned to their homes afterwards. As to the earl of Thomond, he came to his country, after having been a long time absent from it in England, and in the camp at Kinsale, and he was not long at rest after arriving in his estate, when he attacked the gentlemen who were spoiling and plundering his country, since the time they heard that Don John had come to Ireland till that hour, and of those were Torlogh, the son of Mahon, son of Torlogh, son of Mahon O'Brien, and Conor, the son of Donal, son of Mahon, son of Bryan O'Brien; these were obliged to deliver up the castles of Derryowen and Baile-an-Chaislein (in Clare), which were in their possession, and to which some of the wanderers and helpless people of the country were in the habit of coming, to upright people, who were not disposed to plunder the country by means of them; a promise of protection, and a fortnight's respite, was obtained for them from the earl, to take leave of their friends, and quit the country, on condition that they would not return back again without the permission of the lord justice, and of the council. As to these gentlemen, before the period of their protection expired, they prepared to leave the country, and they proceeded through Clan-Cuilein, until they arrived at Killaloe, from whence they crossed the Shannon into Ara (in Tipperary), and they resolved to stay that night in the district of Ara. When the sons of Torlogh Carrach, son of Torlogh, son of Murrough, son of Donal, son of Teige O'Brien, namely, Donogh and Donal, who were acting on behalf of the queen, and having visited the Archbishop, he prayed him to lodge in his own palace, which O'Donnell respectfully declined, and on the 29th, the Archbishop celebrated mass, with pontifical solemnity, and administered the sacrament to O'Donnell; and he feasted him at dinner in his palace, with great magnificence, and on his departure presented him, as Caracena had done, with one thousand ducats. The king (Philip III), having heard of O'Donnell's arrival, wrote to Caracena concerning his reception, and the affairs of Ireland; and, says the Pacuta, "which was one of the most gracious letters ever a king directed, and stated that he would endanger his kingdom to succour the Catholics of Ireland to their content, for the perfecting whereof great preparations were in hand." O'Donnell, accompanied by Father Florence Conry, afterwards Archbishop of Tuam, Redmond Burke, Hugh Moslian, and nine other Irish gentlemen, proceeded to the city of Zamora, where the king then was, and they were all most graciously received by his majesty, who promised the Irish nation every possible aid. O'Donnell then returned to Corunna, and this heroic chieftain was every where received with the highest honours, in the land of his Milesian ancestors. During the Spring and Summer, he made energetic efforts to hasten the forces for Ireland, and for this purpose resolved again to visit the king, but when he reached Simancas, about two leagues from the city of Valladolid, where the court was then held, he was seized with fever, or some severe disease, of which he died on the 10th of September, 1602, in the 29th year of his age, and thus terminated the career of that heroic chief, whose loss was irreparable to his country.

heard that they had so arrived in the country, while no longer protected by the earl's promise, and not having the word of the sovereign, or of any other person, they attacked them in every place they were, and took them prisoners, except Torlogh, the son of Mahon O'Brien, who had gone, after taking his dinner, to the dense intricate woods, and the rugged-topped hills, to protect himself against his enemies. The chiefs taken there were Conor, son of Donal, son of Mahon O'Brien, Bryan Ballach, son of Mahon, and Tieghe Ulltach, son of Mahon O'Brien, together with those who happened to be along with them; after being taken prisoners, they were brought back bound in fetters to the earl at Killaloe, and they were hanged in couples, face to face, on the nearest trees to them. After the earl dispersed and put to death those gentlemen and insurgents, he went to Limerick and from thence to Cork, to the lord justice, and the lord justice commanded the earl to march to Beare, with three thousand soldiers along with him, to see if he could get an opportunity of attacking O'Sullivan Beare, and the gentlemen who were along with him, namely, a party of the Mac Carthys, captain Tyrrell, Fitzmaurice of Kerry, O'Conor (Kerry), and the knight of the Glynn. The earl did not neglect that command, but proceeded onward, without stopping or halting, until he arrived at the monastery of Bantry, in the estate of the sons of Owen O'Sullivan, and the sons of Owen were aiding the earl against O'Sullivan, for O'Sullivan had taken Dunboy and Beare from their father by the decision of the council both here and beyond (in Ireland and England), and he was asserting that the rents of Bantry were his by right. The place where O'Sullivan and his forces were then was, at Ceim-an-Ghabhair, between the army on that side, and the entrance to Beare; that place was a common way to enter the country, and it was intricate and narrow for the great army of the queen to pass through, even was there no cutting of woods or of earthen trenches, or no people, ordnance, or force planted there to oppose them, as was the case at that time, to defend the pass against them. The earl remained nearly a week in the monastery of Bantry, while negotiations were carried on between himself and O'Sullivan, and as they did not meet each other, and that it was not easy for the earl or the army to assault or attack that narrow pass, the earl left a garrison of soldiers on Oilen-Faoit (Whiddy-Island, in the bay of Bantry), against O'Sullivan, and he himself returned to Cork to join the lord justice.

Teige Caoch, son of Torlogh, son of Bryan, son of Donogh Mac Mahon, was accidentally killed with the shot of a ball by his own son, at Beare, in the month of May of this year, which happened in the following manner. The president (Carew), the earl of Thomond, the governor of Kerry, i. e. sir Charles Wilmott, and such of the lords of Munster as were aiding the sovereign, all marched against Beare and O'Sullivan. It happened that Teige Caoch seized a merchant-ship at sea before that time, and O'Sullivan asked Teige for the use of that ship, to send it to Spain, to request relief from the king of Spain, before the queen's army should come to attack him; Teige told him he would not give him the ship, as he had no means of defending or protecting himself but the ship, and having so said, he sent his own son, and some other guards along with him to defend the ship. O'Sullivan went into a boat to seize on the ship by force, and Teige happened to be along with him in the boat at that time; Teige called out to his son Torlogh and the guards to fire on O'Sullivan and his people, which they accordingly did, and, above all the firing which took place between them, Torlogh hit Teige with the shot of a ball in the upper part of his breast, and he died on the eighth day after that. That Teige was lord of western Corcabaiscin (barony of Moyarta, in Clare), until he was deposed and expelled from his patrimony by the earl of Thomond, three years before that time, when he was killed, as we have stated. There was not a barony in Ireland but that Teige would be a lord full worthy of it, in manual action, in bounty, in purchasing of wine, horses, and merchandize, and had he an estate or inheritance, the person by whom he was killed would be his rightful heir to succeed him.

As to the earl of Thomond, after he had gone to Cork to the lord justice, the resolution that the lord justice came to was, that the earl should return back again with forces to the island on which he had left the garrison before that, viz., the Island of Whiddy, and he sent a fleet with ordnance round by sea, which arrived in the vicinity of Dun-Baoi (Dunboy), and having entered port, they took an island called Baoi-Bheire the (island of Beare), and they slew the guards of it, along with their captain, Richard, the son of Rossa, son of Connla Mae Geoghegan, which happened as follows. The crews of the fleet, having landed their arms and ordnance at Dunboy, took it by constructing a well-fortified defensive ditch, and a very strong trench, in order to fire on the castle with the ordnance, and having continued firing on it for a considerable time, they demolished and razed the castle to the ground, and slew the guards, and such of them as had not been slain were hanged in couples by the earl of Thomond.⁵

After that castle had been taken from O'Sullivan,

5. Siege of Dunboy.—A full account of this remarkable siege is given in the Pacata Hibernia, and in Mae Geoghegan; in the Pacata plates are given, representing the siege and the strong castle of Dunboy, which was situated at Bearehaven, in the county of Cork, and was the principal fortress of the O'Sullivans, lords of Beare. The celebrated chief Donnl O'Sullivan Beare, having delivered his castle of Dunboy to the Spaniards, under Don Juan de Aquila, with whom he entered into alliance, he was highly indignant when he learned that Don Juan, on the capitulation of Kinsale, had agreed to surrender it to the English. O'Sullivan was lodged in the castle, along with his Spanish friends, and having resolved to recover the castle from them, he put his plan into execution about the 20th of February, and in the dead of night, when the Spaniards were soundly sleeping, he had a hole broke in the wall, through which 80 of his men entered, whom he had ready outside. In the morning the Spanish captain, Don Francisco de Savedra, finding himself surprised, had no remedy but submit, particularly as he was informed by Father Archer, a Jesuit, one of O'Sullivan's friends, that O'Sullivan had a force of 1000 men near the castle, under his friends Fitzmaurice, lord of Kerry, Donal Mae Carthy, captain Richard Tyrrell, and William Burke. The Spaniards attempted some resistance, and shot two or three of the Irish, but they were all disarmed by O'Sullivan's men, and he kept the captain, with a few of their best men and gunners, and sent the rest to Baltimore, to be embarked for Spain. O'Sullivan seized all the ordnance, arms, ammunition and provisions, and made every preparation to fortify his castle against the English; he wrote letters, which are given in the Pacata, to the king of Spain, the count of Caracena, &c., justifying his conduct, and saying he held the castle for the king of Spain, and in one of his letters he says, "his ancestors had maintained the credit and calling of great gentlemen for 2,600 years, since their first coming out of Spain." On the 9th of March, the president Carew sent the earl of Thomond with 2,600 men, into Carberry and Beare, "to view in what manner the castle of Dunboy was fortified, of the incredible strength whereof much was noised." The earl marched with his forces to the abbey of Bantry, but Tyrrell and his men, being posted in the mountains of Beare, he feared, says Carew, "that he could not advance further without apparent danger." The heroic Tyrrell, a man of peerless valour, fought in almost all the battles during this war, in alliance with O'Neill, and was one of the most formidable commanders the English had encountered. The earl of Thomond returned to Cork, but, according to Mac Geoghegan, he left a large force on Whiddy Island, under sir John Dowdall, lord Barry, captain Flower, and other officers, but they were expelled from the island some time afterwards by O'Sullivan. Carew himself, having resolved to besiege Dunboy, marched from Cork on the 23rd of April, with 3000 men, accompanied by the earl of Thomond, and they were afterwards joined by the forces of sir Charles Wilnot from Kerry. The English advanced to Bantry, in May, and the crafty Carew with his usual policy, preferring to gain his points by bribery instead of fighting, he had a letter privately conveyed (by Owen O'Sullivan, a chief who was opposed to O'Sullivan Beare), to the Spaniards at Dunboy, persuading them to abandon O'Sullivan, but they honourably refused his offers. On the 31st of May, the English forces were landed on Beare island, and, by the contrivance of Carew, an interview took place on the island between the earl of Thomond, and captain Richard Mae Geoghegan, a chief of Westmeath, who, from his distinguished valour, was appointed by O'Sullivan constable of his castle at Dunboy. The earl of Thomond, by Carew's instructions, endeavoured to induce Mac Geoghegan to betray the castle into the hands of the English; but all their offers were scorned by that faithful commander, and Carew says, "all the eloquence and artifice which the earl could use availed nothing." The fleet from Cork had arrived some time before to co-operate with Carew, and having brought large supplies of artillery, ammunition, and provisions, the siege was commenced with great vigour. The English were posted on the great and little island, and on the main land near the castle, which they commenced to batter with 7 pieces of artillery, some of which were brass guns called Falcons. On their landing near Dunboy, they were attacked by the Irish with great bravery, and many were slain on both sides. Captain Tyrrell, says Carew, "was shot in the body, but not deep enough; two prisoners were taken and presently hanged, one of whom was a servant of James Archer, the infamous Jesuit, and if the Jesuit himself had not been a light-footed priest, he had fallen into our hands."

At this time a Spanish ship landed at the haven of Kilmakillock, near Ardea, bringing some munitions of war and money to O'Sullivan; in this vessel were several Irish, and, amongst others, Owen Mac Egan, who was appointed by the Pope bishop of Ross, and vicar apostolic, and, according to Mac Geoghegan, he brought with him £12000 for the assistance of the Irish. On the 7th of June Carew posted his forces on a neck of land, within a mile of Dunboy, an arm of the sea passing between the castle and the camp, and he battered the castle with all his cannon. On the 13th captain Tyrrell made a bold attack on the English camp about midnight, and poured much shot through their tents; the artillery continued incessantly to batter the castle till the 17th, when a breach was effected, and an assault made, but the besieged sallied out on the English from the castle on the sea side, and many were slain on both sides. Mac Geoghegan the commander, being mortally wounded, Thomas Taylor, a relative of Tyrrell, was chosen to command, and he and his men retired into the vaults of the castle, where there were 9 barrels of gunpowder, and Taylor, having seized a lighted torch in his hand, threatened to set the powder on fire, and blow up the castle, unless they had promise of life, which was refused by Carew; but his soldiers, for their own safety, compelled him to surrender. Captain Power, and other officers, having entered the vault, they found Mac Geoghegan lying there mortally wounded, but he, perceiving Taylor and the rest ready to surrender, he raised himself from the ground, and snatching a lighted candle, staggered forward to a barrel of powder which was uncovered, and, with desperate resolution, attempted to set it on fire, and thus blow up the English in the castle, as well as his own friends; but he was seized by captain Power, and some of the English soldiers rushed forward and killed him. Taylor and the rest were then brought prisoners to the camp, and the same day, says Carew, 58 of them were hanged in the marketplace; according to Carew, the entire garrison consisted only of 143 select men, of whom none escaped, being all slain, executed, or buried in the ruins, and, he says, "so obstinate and resolved a defence hath not been seen within this kingdom." The siege of Dunboy lasted 18 days, from the 1st to the 18th of June, and the small garrison defended themselves, says Mac Geoghegan, with Spartan bravery, against an army of more than 3000 men, with powerful artillery, and he says the English lost, during the siege, 600 men. Carew's forces at this time, according to Mac Geoghegan, massacred all the inhabitants of Dorsey Island, and on the 22nd of June, Carew blew up the castle of Dunboy with gunpowder, and the outworks and fortifications were utterly destroyed. Captain Taylor, who was made prisoner, was brought to Cork by Carew, and soon after hung in chains, near the north gate of the city, on a charge of having been one of the persons who, many years before, had killed captain George Bingham at Sligo, and Dominick Collins, a friar who was taken prisoner at Dunboy, was hanged at he went, with his cows and cattle flocks, with his people and moveable property, behind the rugged-topped hills, into the recesses and fastnesses of his country; the earl (of Thomond), with his forces, and O'Sullivan and his party, continued shooting and fighting against each other 'till the Christmas times, and the two forces rested and encamped opposite each other in the Gleann-Garbh (i. e. the rough, or rugged glen, now Glengariff), and that glen was O'Sullivan's principal stronghold. His people began to separate from O'Sullivan privately, without his permission; in the first place captain Tyrrell parted from him, and he himself was obliged to depart, unperceived and unnoticed by the earl, on the Christmas holidays; their first night's journey from Glengariff was to Baile-Muirne (Ballyvourney, in the barony of West Muskerry, in Cork); the second night to the borders of the-territories of O'Keeffe and Mac Auliff (in the barony of Duhallow); the third night they arrived at Ard-Padraig (Ardpatrick, in the barony of Coshlea, county of Limerick); the fourth night at Sulchoid (between Limerick and Cashel); they were the fifth and sixth nights in Bel-na-Coilleadh; the seventh night in Leatharach (Latteragh, in Ikerrin, in Tipperary); the eighth night at Baile-Achaidh-Chaoin (probably Burrisokane, or Uskeane, in Lower Ormond); he was not a day or night during that space without encountering desperate conflicts and severe pursuits, which were valiantly and promptly resisted by him. Having arrived on the ninth night at the wood called Coill-Phinne (the forest of Brosnach, according to Mac Geoghegan), they remained for two nights at that place; Donogh, the son of Carbry Mac Egan, was in their vicinity, and he was boldly attacking and shooting at O'Sullivan and his people, so that at length he was obliged to be slain, as he would not cease at the request of O'Sullivan. When they could not get skiffs, or any other boats, ready, they killed their horses for the purpose of eating, and carrying with them their flesh, and putting their hides on frames formed of slender, tough long osiers, to make Curachs of them to convey them across the Shannon's blue stream, at Ath-Coilleadh-Ruadh, and they crossed over it without hazard or danger, and they landed on the opposite side, in Siol-Anmcha (barony of Longford, in Galway); they proceeded from thence, and, on the eleventh night, they reached Aughrim of Hy-Maine; when they arrived there, the clans and parties in their vicinity collected before and after them, and raised a cry on all sides of them. Of the nobles who overtook them on that occasion, were the son of the earl of Clanrickard, namely, Thomas, the son Ulick, son of Rickard Saxanach; Mac Coghlan, i. e. John Oge, son of John, son of Art; O'Madden, namely, Donal, son of John, son of Breasal, and his son Anmcha, and active parties of the O'Kellys, and many others who are not recorded, with all their forces with them. O'Sullivan, O'Conor Kerry, and William Burke, the son of Shane-na-Seamar, with their small party, for they did not all amount to three hundred, were obliged to remain at Aughrim of Hy-Maine, to engage and fight, so that they gave them a pitched battle, and their true valour was tried against many hundreds who were harassing and pursuing them. O'Sullivan made an onset, with rage and anger, with fury and vehemence, towards the place where the English were, for against them was excited his entire vengeance, and animosity, and he did not stop until he gained the place where he beheld their commander, and he fiercely and quickly cut off the head of the noble Englishman, namely, the son of captain Malby; that collected force was afterwards defeated, and a great number of them were slain, and it is doubtful if the like number of a force, fatigued after a long march, and encompassed by their enemies as they were, performed

Youghal, his native town. At this time, according to Mac Geoghegan, the Spanish army, which was collected by the exertions of Red Hugh O'Donnell, assembled at Corunna, and amounted to 14,000 men; but the expedition to Ireland was countermanded when the news had arrived of the fall of Dunboy, which was the last fortress held by the Irish of Munster, and the Spaniards altogether gave up the expedition to Ireland after the death of O'Donnell. O'Sullivan Beare was along with his friend Tyrrell when the castle of Dunboy was taken, and he afterwards went to the North, to join O'Rourke, as recorded in the Annals. This Donal O'Sullivan was the last prince of Beare, and his ancestors, for many ages, ruled over the territory which forms the baronies of Bear and Bantry, in the county of Cork, and another branch of the same family were lords of Dunkerrin, in Kerry. Donal O'Sullivan Beare, after the subjugation of Ireland, retired to Spain, where he died, and his son, Don Philip O'Sullivan Beare, wrote the celebrated work on Irish history entitled "Historiæ Catholicæ Hiberniæ Compendium," published at Lisbon, in 1621. Don Philip O'Sullivan was a sea captain, in the service of king Philip, and those O'Sullivans, and some of their descendants in the Spanish service, were styled Counts of Bearhaven.

such an exploit as they achieved on that day, in defence of their lives and renown. They proceeded from thence, after encountering great dangers, betrayals, and way-layings, along the roads, until they arrived in Ulster.

Mac Namara Fioun (the Fair), namely, John, the son of Teige, son of Cumeadha, died on the 24th of the month of February, and Donal his son succeeded him.

Torlogh, the son of Mahon, son of the bishop O'Brien, was killed in Hy-Maine by John Burke, the son of Rickard, son of John of Doire-Mac-Lachtna.

Mac Brody, i. e. Maoilin Oge, the son of Maoilen, son of Conor, died on the last day of the month of December, and there was not in Ireland one historian who was a better bard and poet than he; it was he that composed these historical poems as follows, in Dan-Direach (a kind of Irish verse, see Halliday's Grammar, p. 155) "I will put an obligation on the clan of Tail;" "Give attention to me, Oh Insi-an-Laoigh" (the ancient name of Ennis in Clare); "Know me, Oh Mac Coghlan;" "Let us make this visit to the clan of Cais;" "Strangers here are Cahir's race;" "From four the Gadelians have sprung," &c. (See O'Reilly's Irish Writers A. D. 1602).

Niall Garv O'Donnell marched with a force of English and Irish, from Fraoch-Magh, in Tyrone, at the request of the lord justice, who was carrying on a siege against the island of Fraoch-Magh at that time; and he (Niall Garv), plundered Cormac, the son of the baron, the brother of O'Neill, and the Busdunach, and the country westward as far as Magherastephana (in Fermanagh), and took with them much prey and booty to the lord justice in Fermanagh.

Niall Garv marched with another force of English and Irish into Brefney O'Rourke (Leitrim), and carried away with them much cattle.

King James was proclaimed successor to queen Elizabeth on the 24th of March, 1602, according to the English calculation; but, according to the Roman computation, 1603, and he was James VI., of the kings of Scotland (see Note at A. D. 1603.)

As to O'Neill, and the Irish who remained in Ireland after the defeat of Kinsale, the instructions and commands which O'Donnell, i. e. Hugh Roe, gave them before his departure for Spain, was to act valiantly in defence of their patrimonies against the English, until he should return to them with forces to relieve them, and to remain in the camp in which they were, for their loss was small, although they had been defeated. He told them, moreover, it would not be easy for them to return safe to their country, if they were inclined to do so, for their enemies and opponents would pursue and attack them, and that those who were friendly and kind towards them, on their march to Munster, would be inimical and treacherous to them on their return to their countries, and that they would attack and plunder them, and insult them. The Irish leaders did not take his advice, and did not act according to his request, as he himself was not among them, but resolved on returning to their countries; they afterwards proceeded, in separate bodies, without being under the general command of any one lord, but each lord and each chief apart, followed by their respective leaders and faithful people. Alas! it was not the same cheerfulness, courage, valour, vaunting, threatening or prowess that the Irish had on their return at that time, which they had on their first going on that expedition. The opinions of the prince O'Donnell, and every thing he foretold for them, were verified, for not only did their enemies rise up before and after them, to give them battle, but those who were in friendship and union, and in war alliance with them, rose up and were attacking and firing on them in every narrow pass through which they proceeded; it was not easy for their lords and chieftains, their leaders and warriors, to defend and protect their people, on account of their long journey before them, the great numbers of their enemies, the storm and severity of the rough wintry weather, for it was at that time the end of winter precisely; but, however, they returned to their countries, after great dangers, without the death of any one of note occurring, and each lord of a district endeavoured to defend his patrimony as well as he could. It was to Rory O'Donnell, son of Hugh, son of Manus, that O'Donnell, the night before his departure, committed the command of his people, his country, his lands, and every thing which belonged to him, until he should return back again, and he enjoined on O'Neill and on Rory to be friendly to each other, as both themselves were, and they promised him they would be so. The Tirconnallians afterwards proceeded, under the command of the representative of their lord, although it was equal to the parting of the soul from the body to the most of them their separation from him, who had been, 'till then, their commander and governor. O'Donnell's son, i. e., Rory, led on his people with resolute bravery, through every difficult and intricate way, and through every danger and hazard which they encountered since they left Kinsale, until they arrived, in the beginning of spring, in North Connaught, where the cattle, farmers, property, and flocks of the Tirconnallians, were throughout the country, in Corran, Lieny, and Tireragh of the Moy (baronies in Sligo). Good was the herd and shepherd who came to them there, for though numerous were the cattle flocks from neighbouring territories, which O'Donnell left his people on his departure from them, Rory did not allow them to be restored, despite of him, to any country from which they had been taken away, for he stationed in various places, his soldiers and warriors, on the dangerous passes and undefended places of the country, so that no one would attempt to pass them, to plunder or attack any of his people. O'Gallagher, namely, Owen, the son of John, was in care of Ballymote on behalf of O'Donnell, since he had proceeded to Munster, 'till this time, and when Rory returned to him, he gave him the castle, which he took under his command.

The castle of Ballyshannon, in which were guards from O'Donnell, was taken by Niall Garv O'Donnell, and by the English, after they demolished and destroyed it by a great gun which they brought to it, and the guards escaped from it safely, as there was neither relief nor aid near them, and it was in spring precisely that castle was taken.

Inis-Samer and Inis-Mac-Conaill (in Donegal), were taken by Hugh Buighe, the son of Con O'Donnell, and Cormac, the son of Donogh Oge Maguire, was also taken prisoner by him.

Niall Garv, with his brethren and the English, proceeded in boats on Lough Erne, and they took and demolished Enniskillen; they also took Devenish and Lisgoole, and left guards in them.

Mac Sweeny of Banagh (in Donegal), namely, Donogh, the son of Maolmurry, came to Niall

O'Donnell and the English; Niall and Mac Sweeny had an engagement with a party of the Maguires, and of the Mac Caves, in which many of them were slain, and they took Bryan, the son of Dubh-gall Mac Cabe, prisoner.

The island of Kiltiernan, in Fermanagh, was taken by Donal, the son of Con O'Donnell, and he carried off much property from it.

Hugh Buighe, the son of Con O'Donnell, took a prey from Tuathal, the son of Felim Duv O'Neill, in the estate of the tribe of Art O'Neill.

Sir Oliver Lambert, with a large force of English and Irish, arrived in Sligo, in the summer precisely, and they resolved to attack Rory O'Donnell, who was to the south of them, and on the people of North Connaught in general, in order to seize on some of their property. Cathbar, the son of Hugh Duv O'Donnell, went to sir Oliver, and ratified his allegiance and friendship with him; where Cathbar had his residence and fortress at that time was, at Dun-Aille, to the west of Sligo, and sir Oliver and Cathbar, with their forces, prepared to go to Fermanagh, in search of prey and booty. When Rory O'Donnell received intelligence of those military preparations, he was concerned that his allies and friends should be plundered, without his going to relieve them, if in his power, and he went to O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan Oge, to request of him to accompany him in his force to oppose the English, on the way in which he expected to obtain an advantage of them, and he also requested of him to aid him in the war, until O'Donnell should return to relieve the Irish, to give him one of his strongly-fortified and impregnable castles, as a place of security for his wounded, helpless, and sick people, and along with that to permit his people to bring their property and cattle into his country. O'Rourke refused O'Donnell's son every thing he requested of him, and it was a grief and an insult to him to be thus refused, so that what he did, as he had not an equal force with the English, was to remain to protect his own people. As to sir Oliver, he and Cathbar, with their forces, proceeded, and they plundered all that lay in their vicinity of Fermanagh, and having carried off with them much property, they returned to their homes. Sir Oliver was informed of the preparations made by Rory O'Donnell, and how he requested of O'Rourke to accompany him to obstruct him in the forementioned expedition, and his animosity against him was increased on account of it; and it was therefore he sent to Athlone for additional forces to wreak his vengeance on Rory. When Rory learned that the English of Athlone were marching on him on the south, and the English of Sligo on the other side, he took with him his property, his flocks, and his cattle herds, across the Curlew mountains into Moylurg (in Roscommon), from thence across the Shannon into Muintir-Eoluis (Mac Rannall's country, in Leitrim), and to Slieve-an-Iarain, in Conmaicne-Rein, so that the English took nothing from them, and the English of Athlone returned to their homes without any victory on that occasion. The people of O'Donnell's son returned back with their property again to those places from which they had departed, viz., to Corran, to Lieney, and to Tíreragh. Rory himself proceeded, with the entire of his force, until he arrived at the island of Lough Easke, on the eastern side of Donegal, where O'Donnell's guards were, and on which O'Connor Sligo was left imprisoned, since he had been taken by O'Donnell, till the end of that summer. When he arrived at the place, his people were rejoiced to see him; O'Connor promised his allegiance to O'Donnell's son, and they having ratified their securities and compacts with each other, he set O'Connor at liberty, and they afterwards returned back into Connaught.

About that time, viz., in harvest precisely, the English of Roscommon, and of South Connaught, mustered a large force to march against Rory O'Donnell again, and they did not halt until they arrived at the monastery of Boyle; Rory and O'Connor collected another force to oppose them, and having proceeded across the Curlew mountains, they encamped before the town on the other side; they brought their people and their property and cattle with them, from Moy O'Gara in Cuil-O'bhFloinn (barony of Coolavin, in Sligo), and left them in their rear, at the eastern end of the Curlew mountains, for they dreaded that they might be plundered by the English who were in Sligo, in their absence, should they be far distant from them. They remained for some time in that manner confronted, watching each other, and many people were slain and wounded between them while they were in the monastery. The English thought it too long they remained in that position, so that the resolution they came to was, to force the pass of Ballagh-Buighe against Rory and O'Connor, and to pass through it, despite of them; but they were met and opposed by the Irish, and a fierce conflict ensued between them, in which great numbers of the English were slain, and they were finally compelled to return back, having been greatly discomfited; they afterwards left the monastery, and they returned to Roscommon. Rory and O'Connor returned across the Curlew mountain, and they encamped at Ballysadare, to oppose the English who were in Sligo. It happened one time that a party of the forementioned English were engaged at a certain place in cutting the corn and green crops of the country, for they were not plentiful in provisions, and they were instantly slain by them. They remained for a month opposed to each other after that, and they continued so until the beginning of winter, when the lord lieutenant, namely, Charles Blount, lord Mountjoy, the general of the war in Ireland, sent a messenger and a written despatch to Rory O'Donnell, requesting him to come on terms of peace and cessation from hostilities. The import of these was, that it behoved him to accept of peace and friendship, and should he not do so, that he would be truly sorry for it, for he received information that O'Donnell, Rory's brother, had died in Spain, and that there was an end to the war by his death, and it would be a great mistake and folly for him if he did not forthwith make peace with them. When they read the dispatches, Rory called his counsellors together, to determine what should be done, and they began to deliberate in council; some of them maintained that the death of O'Donnell was not true, and that it was to cajole and deceive him, and to bring them under the law, that fictitious story was sent to him; another party maintained that it was true, and that it was a good advice to accept of peace when it was offered them, and they at length determined that he and O'Connor Sligo should go to Athlone, to ratify their peace with the general; they afterwards went, and were well received by the general, and he gave great honour and respect to the son of O'Donnell, and made peace with him on behalf of the king, and confirmed his friendship with him particularly, and he afterwards advised him to return to his patrimony, if he wished to do so.⁶

6. Mountjoy's Expedition to Ulster and Connaught in 1602.—After the defeat of the Irish and Spaniards at Kinsale, in December, 1601, O'Neill with his forces returned to Ulster, and Red Hugh O'Donnell went to Spain to solicit succours for a renewal of the war. Mountjoy came from Kinsale to Cork and Kilkenny, and arrived in Dublin on the 28th of March, 1602; on the 5th of May he proceeded towards Ulster against O'Neill, with a force of about 3,000 horse and foot, assisted by detachments from various garrisons. At this time Mountjoy, in a letter to the lords of the council in England, which is given by Morrison, details the dangers he had formerly encountered in the engagements at the Moyry Pass in Armagh, which he says was "one of the most difficult passages in Ireland, fortified with good art, and with admirable industry; the enemy having raised from mountain to mountain, from wood to wood, and from bog to bog, long Traverses with large and high Flankers of great stones mingled with sods of earth, and staked on both sides with Pallisadoes wattled;" in another place he says these fortifications extended three miles in length, (see note, page 681). In the beginning of June, Mountjoy advanced to the Blackwater, and encamped near the river about five miles east of the fort of Blackwater, and sent sir Richard Morrison with his regiment across the river to secure the passage of the army against O'Neill; Mountjoy caused a bridge to be built over the river, and a fort on the Armagh side, which from his own name Charles, he called Charlemont, and he left in the fort captain Toby Caulfield with 150 men. O'Neill's forces at this time had mostly all dispersed, and, according to Mac Geoghegan and others, were reduced to 600 foot and 60 horse, and being totally unable to cope with the powerful army of more than 3,000 men under Mountjoy, he resolved to abandon Dungannon, for many ages the residence of his ancestors, and he set fire to the ancient castle rather than it should fall into the hands of foreign foes. In like manner it is said Red Hugh O'Donnell destroyed his castle at Donegal, on recovering it from the English forces in 1601, lest it should ever again fall into their hands, for on his expedition to Munster he was obliged to leave his fortress undefended, and he never returned to Donegal again. Mountjoy, as he advanced into Tyrone, saw the castle and town of Dungannon in flames, and the place being thus deserted, he sent sir Richard Morrison with his regiment to take possession of the town, where he soon after came himself with the rest of the forces. O'Neill retired to Castle Roe, on the river Bann, in O'Kane's country, and Glanconkein is mentioned as one of the places where he afterwards scoured himself; it was a glen environed with woods, bogs, and waters, forming an inaccessible fastness, and situated apparently in the southern part of Derry, towards the borders of Tyrone and Lough Neagh. About this time sir Henry Docwra, governor of Derry and other places near Lough Foyle, had planted a garrison at Omagh, and having advanced with his forces, he formed a junction with Mountjoy at Dungannon; their combined forces preyed, plundered, and laid waste by fire and sword, Tyrone and Fermanagh, along Lough Erne, as far as Enniskillen. They took some of O'Neill's fortified islands, and recovered three pieces of English cannon; they took Magherloney, which Morrison says was one of O'Neill's chief places of abode, and a magazine for his war. From Dungannon, Mountjoy sent sir Richard Morrison with 500 foot to meet sir Arthur Chichester, who came with his forces from Carrickfergus, and was to pass Lough Sidney (Lough Neagh, so named after the lord deputy sir Henry Sidney), and land within a few miles of Dungannon. These forces having arrived, were joined by the lord deputy about five miles from Dungannon, near Lough Neagh, where they erected a fort, which, after his own title, he called Mountjoy, and he placed in it a garrison of 850 foot and 100 horse, under the command of sir Benjamin Barry and captain Francis Roe; and this fort was to be victualled from Carrickfergus by boats over Lough Neagh. Mountjoy then despatched Docwra to Derry to prepare his forces to march as far as Dungiven in O'Kane's country, to act against O'Neill, and Chichester was ordered to bring his forces from Carrickfergus to Toome for the same purpose, while the deputy him-

A. D. 1603.

O'Neill, i. e. Hugh, the son of Ferdorcha, and self was to attack O'Neill towards Killetero, thus hemming in O'Neill on all sides with at least 6,000 men, all of which forces were to be assembled in twenty days, according to Morrison. Mountjoy then marched towards Monaghan, and took some islands and strong places, but in a conflict with the O'Neills and Mac Mahons, many of his men were slain, together with captain Willis and sir John Barkley, sergeant major of the army, a commander of great note; on the 29th of July he arrived in Monaghan and planted a garrison there of 300 foot and 25 horse, under sir Christopher St. Lawrence (baron of Howth), and captain Esmond, but finding Mac Mahon, says Morrison, "to stand on proud terms, his lordship spoiled, burned, and ransacked all that country." He appointed Conor Roe Maguire, who had joined the English, as chief of Fermanagh, and placed him in the principal house of Mac Mahon, lord of Monaghan, within two miles of Fermanagh. Mountjoy then proceeded to Newry to refresh his troops, and writing to the lords of the council in England, he says—"We have left no man in all the North that is able to make any great resistance O'Rourke only excepted, who hitherto hath been furthest off from feeling the fury of our prosecution;" and he says at the same time that O'Neill was in a place of incredible fastness in O'Kane's country (Glanconkein), where it was impossible to do him any hurt, the ways being inaccessible to an army.

About the 10th of August the forces of Chichester, from Carrickfergus, of Docwra from Derry, of Danvers from Armagh, with the garrisons from the forts of Mountjoy, Mountnorris, Blackwater, and Charlemont, and Mountjoy's own forces, the whole amounting to at least 8,000 men, were prepared to act against O'Neill. Morrison gives an account of a stronghold of O'Neill's called Inistoghtin, which was seated in the midst of a great bog, and no way accessible but through thick woods almost impassable; it was surrounded with two deep ditches both encompassed with strong pallisadoes, a very high and thick rampart of earth and timber, and well flanked with bulwarks. Mountjoy sent his forces under Danvers and Chichester, to attack this place, which was defended only by 42 musketeers and 20 swordsmen, who, after some resistance, surrendered the fortress, in which was placed an English garrison, and the Irish soldiers were sent bound to the lord deputy at Newry, on the 19th of August. Morrison says that great spoils were taken in this fortress, consisting of plate and other valuable goods of the chief persons in the country, who had sent them there for safety from the English garrisons. This stronghold was situated in the parish of Magheramesk, on the borders of Down and Antrim, near the river Lagan, between Moira and Lough Neagh. Mountjoy in a letter to the secretary Cecil, on the 19th of August, says, "to-morrow, by the grace of God, I am again going into the field, as near as I can, utterly to waste the country of Tyrone." On the 20th, says Morrison, he encamped midway between Newry and Armagh, and having heard that O'Neill had retired into Fermanagh, Mountjoy resolved "to spoil the entire country of Tyrone, and banish all the inhabitants to the south side of the Blackwater, so that if O'Neill returned he should find nothing in the country but the queen's garrisons." To promote these objects he planted a garrison at Augher, in Tyrone, which was Cormac O'Neill's chief residence, being a castle seated on an island, from which he took two brass cannons. On the 29th he crossed the Blackwater at Charlemont Bridge, and encamped that night at Dungannon, which he fortified, and left a ward to keep the place as a retreat for their men on service, and to preserve the oats growing thereabouts for their horses in winter. Mountjoy spent five days about Tullaghoge, the seat of the O'Hagans near Dungannon, where, according to Morrison, he destroyed the corn of all the country, and O'Neill's own corn, and with barbarous vindictiveness broke in pieces the celebrated stone chair placed in an open field at Tullaghoge, on which the O'Neills were inaugurated for many ages, as princes of Tyrone and kings of Ulster. Docwra here met the lord deputy, and brought with him O'Kane of Derry, who had made his submission, and at the same time Randal Mac Sorley Mac Donnell of Antrim submitted, and the greater part of the Irish of Leth-Cuin, accepted peace except O'Rourke; for general peace, and a restoration of their titles and estates, to all those offered to serve the queen with 500 foot and 40 horse at his own charge. O'Neill at this time, with Brian Mac Art O'Neill of Clanaboy, Cormac Mac Baron O'Neill, and Mac Mahon, retired, says Morrison, to the bottom of a great fastness towards the end of Lough Erne, where, in the beginning of September, Mountjoy followed them as far as he could with his forces, but could not come within 12 miles of them, besides, he says, they could proceed from thence to O'Rourke's country to which the army could not pass; and he says O'Neill and his confederates had at this time but 600 foot and 60 horse. On the 8th of September, sir Arthur Chichester was sent to the garrison at Mountjoy, and ordered to clear Tyrone of all inhabitants, and destroy all the corn he could not preserve for the garrisons. Mountjoy then marched back with his army on the 9th of September, and divided all the waste lands on the south side of the Blackwater towards Newry, between Henry and Con O'Neill, who had made their submission; they were sons of the celebrated Shane O'Neill, former prince of Tyrone. Mountjoy only gave them leave to live there with their creaghts, or persons who tended the flocks and cattle, and such followers as should come to them till the queen's pleasure was further known, and he enjoined them to sow their corn for the next year on the plains. He then returned to Newry on the 11th of September, and in his letters to the council in England and to Cecil, he says—"We found every where men dead of famine, insomuch that O'Hagan protested to us, that between Tullaghoge and Toome there lay unburied 1,000 dead, and that since our first drawing this year to Blackwater, there were above 3,000 starved in Tyrone." In other passages Morrison relates, that from the excessive famine, persons were reduced to the horrible extremity of eating human flesh. Thus the merciless Mountjoy devastated the country, destroyed the crops and corn, and produced a direful famine, which killed thousands, while many other thousands were massacred by the sword. He went to Dublin in November, and at this time employed sir Garret Moore to command in "the Brenny," or county of Cavan, and receive the submission of the chiefs. One of the O'Reillys came with 100 men, and Mac Gauran's sons with 50 men and 1,000 cows from one of the O'Rourkes. Mountjoy proceeded to Connaught in the latter end of November, and arrived at Athlone the 2nd of December, where, on the 14th, Rory O'Donnell, brother of Red Hugh, and O'Conor Sligo, came and made their submission; he next went to Galway where he spent his Christmas, and in that town the O'Flahertys, O'Conor Roe, the Mac Dermotts of Roscommon, and other chiefs made their submission. At this time all the Irish leaders had submitted except the few above mentioned who were joined with O'Neill, and Bryan O'Rourke, lord of Leitrim, Cuchonaght Magnire in Fermanagh, captain Tyrrell who had lately returned from Munster and joined O'Rourke, and Donal O'Sullivan Beare. The patriotic and valiant O'Rourke had at this time a considerable force, and held out to the last, and for his resistance to the queen Morrison calls him "the proud and insolent O'Rourke." After the taking of his castle of Dunboy, O'Sullivan Beare, disdaining to surrender to the English, resolved to join O'Neill and O'Rourke in the North, and set out from Munster on the last day of December, accompanied by O'Conor Kerry and other chiefs, and about 400 men, according to Mac Geoghegan. In their progress through Cork, Limerick, and Tipperary, on their way to Connaught, they were incessantly attacked by the English garrisons, but effected their passage, and fought their way through enemies on all sides, with such determined bravery, that Mac Geoghegan compares their progress to the retreat of the Greeks under Xenophon. On the 7th of January they arrived at the forest of Brosnach, and having deliberated how to cross the Shannon, they at length decided on constructing a number of boats, made of osiers and branches of trees, and having killed some of their horses for the purpose, they covered these Corraghs with their hides, and having conveyed them in the night to Portlaughan, opposite Portumna, they commenced crossing the river. O'Malley, who went in the first, was upset, with 10 sol-who wished to avail themselves of the same, were proclaimed by order of his majesty, king James,¹ after he had been appointed as successor to the diers, but the rest reached the opposite shore in safety. O'Sullivan's men, in their various conflicts, were reduced to 300; he proceeded through O'Kelly's country, in Galway, but in his progress was attacked at Anghrin by the English, under captain Malby and sir Thomas Burke, brother of the earl of Clanrickard. O'Sullivan's men, though opposed by a far superior force, fought with great bravery, and defeated their opponents, great numbers of whom, together with Malby himself, were slain, and O'Sullivan's men continued their progress to Brefney, where they were well received by O'Rourke. Thus the valiant O'Sullivan, and his faithful followers, fought their way with amazing bravery, amidst excessive difficulties, through enemies, for 200 miles, in the depth of winter. O'Sullivan Beare, captain Tyrrell, Maguire, and some other leaders, having assembled at O'Rourke's residence at Dromahaire, in Leitrim, and still faithful to O'Neill, resolved, along with O'Rourke, to proceed towards Lough Erne, and had several conflicts with the English garrisons. At the end of January, 1603, Mountjoy returned to Dublin, and during that month and February he corresponded with the queen and council, forming plans to subdue the still formidable O'Neill.—See account of O'Sullivan's Expedition, at p. 705 in the Annals.

A. D. 1603.

1. King James I.—It is mentioned at p. 706 in the Annals, that king James succeeded to the crown on the 24th of March, 1602, by the English calculation, but on the 24th of March, 1603, according to the Roman computation. This chronological difference arose from the old practice of commencing the year on the 25th of March having still continued in England, while, by the Roman computation, the year was commenced on the 1st of January, from the year 1582, according to the chronology of sir Harris Nicholas, at which time Pope Gregory the XIII. introduced this improved chronology, together with the New Style, called the Gregorian Calendar, instead of the Old Style, or Julian Calendar; therefore the 24th of March, 1602, according to one computation, was exactly the same date as the 24th of March, 1603, by the other. Queen Elizabeth died on the 24th of March 1603, and a short time before her death, as well as by her will, she nominated James VI. of Scotland as her successor, probably as some atonement for having put his mother to death. James was the son of Mary Queen of Scots, by her second husband and cousin, Henry Stuart, earl of Darnley, son of Matthew Stuart, earl of Lennox, and James's right to the crown of England was derived by maternal descent from the House of Tudor, as his ancestor, James IV., king of Scotland, was married to Margaret Tudor, daughter of King Henry the VII., of England. James was the first English monarch of the House of Stuart, and he united in his person the right to the crown of the three Kingdoms, derived by descent from the Scottish, British, Saxon, and Norman kings, as well as from the Irish kings, for the old Scottish kings, and the House of Stuart, were descended from the Irish kings of Milesian race, through Loarn and Fergus, kings of Scotland in the beginning of the 6th century, who were the descendants of the Irish prince Carbry Rieda, who planted a colony from Ireland in Albany, or Scotland, in the 3rd century, as fully explained in O'Flaherty's Ogygia, and Chalmers's Caledonia. King James put forward this claim to the crown of Ireland, for in the account of his reign, in Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, it is stated, that in a speech delivered by King James, at the Council table in White Hall, on the 21st of April, 1613, he used the following expressions: "There is a double cause why I should be careful of the welfare of that people, (the Irish), first, as the king of England, by reason of the long possession the crown of England hath had of that land, and also as king of Scotland, for the ancient kings of Scotland are descended of the kings of Ireland." After a reign of 22 years, king James died on Sunday, the 27th of March, 1625, in the 59th year of his age. He was married to the princess Anne of Denmark, daughter of king Frederic II., and by her had a son, who succeeded queen over England, France and Ireland. Mac Sweeney Fanat, i. e. Donal, went to Niall O'Donnell, to come under the law. Mac Sweeney of the Districts, namely, Maolmurry, the son of Murrough, and Cathbar Oge, the son of Cathbar, son of Manus O'Donnell, proceeded into Tirconnell, him as Charles I., and was put to death by the Cromwellians; king James also had a daughter Elizabeth, who was married to Frederic, Elector Palatine of Germany, and king of Bohemia, and from them were descended the kings of England, of the House of Brunswick or Hanover.

Lords Lieutenant.—At the death of Elizabeth, Mountjoy was lord deputy, but having returned to England in 1603, he was succeeded by sir George Carey, who was appointed lord deputy on the 1st of June, 1603, but was recalled in 1604, and succeeded as deputy by sir Arthur Chichester, governor of Carrickfergus, and ancestor to the earls of Donegal. Chichester continued deputy to the year 1613, when Thomas Jones, archbishop of Dublin, lord chancellor of Ireland, and the marshal sir Richard Wingfield, were appointed lords justices. In 1614, sir Arthur Chichester, then baron of Belfast, was again appointed lord deputy, and in 1615, Thomas Jones archbishop of Dublin, lord chancellor, and sir John Denham, chief justice of the King's Bench, were made lords justices. In 1616, sir Oliver St. John, afterwards viscount Grandison, was appointed lord deputy, and continued to 1622, when Adam Loftus, viscount Ely, lord chancellor, and Richard Wingfield, viscount Powercourt, were constituted lords justices. In 1622, Henry Carey, viscount Falkland, was appointed lord deputy, and continued to 1628.

Submission of O'Neill.—In the course of the year 1602, many of the Irish chiefs, as already related, made their submission to Mountjoy, and others treacherously revolted, while many of the most valiant of O'Neill's commanders and allies, as Hugh Maguire, Anthony O'Moore, Pierce de Lacy, and others, were slain. The earl of Desmond and Florence Mac Carthy were prisoners in the Tower, and the heroic Hugh O'Donnell having died in Spain, there were no hopes of succour from that country; yet though the Irish chiefs were utterly broken down, and their forces dispersed, still, supported by a few faithful followers, O'Neill, with heroic fortitude, held out in his fastnesses against the English forces, and their garrisons in Ulster, amounting to at least 10,000 men. Mountjoy, as before-mentioned, proclaimed many of the Irish chiefs, and offered large rewards to any one who would assassinate them; for instance, he offered £1000 for the head of O'Neill, and 2000 crowns for the head of Tyrrell. Monstrous insolence to proclaim as rebels and traitors those heroic and patriotic men who stood forward in defence of their homes and their altars, exercising only the natural right of maintaining their national independence, and upholding their civil and religious liberty; endeavouring to establish their rights, and transmit their hereditary possessions to their posterity. Notwithstanding the large rewards offered by Mountjoy, he could find none of the Irish so base as to betray O'Neill into his hands, though at one time he offered a reward of £2,000 to any person who would bring him alive. Mountjoy, in his letters to the council in England, in February and March, 1603, as given by Fynes Morrison, says, "No subjects have a more dreadful awe to lay violent hands on their sacred prince, than these people have to touch the person of their O'Neills; and he hath the ancient swelling and desire of liberty in a conquered nation to work upon, their fear to be rooted out, and generally over all the kingdom, the fear of persecution for religion." Morrison says, on the same subject, "However, the name of O'Neill was so revered in the North, as none could be induced to betray him for the large reward set upon his head." It appears from the correspondence between Mountjoy and sir Robert Cecil, secretary of state in England, as given by Morrison at this time, that overtures were made to O'Neill by some of Mountjoy's agents, intimating that his submission would be favourably received, but these proposals were made in bad faith, Mountjoy endeavouring to entrap O'Neill into an unconditional surrender, and the following passage occurs in one of his letters to Cecil, on the 25th of March, 1603: "I have received by captain Hays, her Majesty's letters of the 6th of February, wherein I am directed to send for Tyrone, with promise of security for his life only, and upon his arrival, without further assurance, to make stay of him, 'till her pleasure should be further known; and at the same time I received another from her Majesty of the 17th of February, wherein it pleased her to enlarge the authority given unto me, to assure him of his life, liberty, and pardon, upon some conditions remembered therein. And withal I received a letter from yourself of the 18th of February, recommending me your own advice, to fulfil as far as I possibly could, the meaning of her majesty's first letter, and signifying her pleasure that I should seek by all the best means I can, to promise him his pardon by some other name than earl of Tyrone, and rather by the name of baron of Dungannon, or if it needs be, by the name of some other earl; secondly to deliver him his country in less quantity and with less power than before he had it; and lastly, to force him to clear his passes and passages, made difficult by him against any entry into his country." Again he says—"And first for her majesty's first letter, I pray you sir, believe me, that I have omitted nothing, both by power and policy, to ruin him and utterly to cut him off, and if by either I may procure his head, before I have engaged her royal word for his safety, I do protest I will do it and much more, be ready to possess myself of his person, if by only promise of life or by any other means, whereby I shall not directly scandal the majesty of public faith, I can procure him to put himself into my power. But to speak my opinion freely, I think that he, or any man in his case, would hardly adventure his liberty, to preserve only his life, which he knoweth how so well to secure by many other ways, for if he fly into Spain, that is the least whereof he can be assured, and most men, but especially he, do make little difference between the value of their life and liberty; and to deceive him I think it will be hard, for though wiser men than he may be overreached, yet he hath so many eyes of jealousy awake, that it will be impossible to charm them." (Morrison, v. 2, pp. 292 to 296.) Thus, it appears, that while the queen and Cecil, and their treacherous tool Mountjoy, were negotiating with O'Neill about his submission and pardon, they used every effort to deceive him by false promises, and even plotted against his life; but the wary O'Neill knew their bad faith, and took good care not to surrender till he had obtained his terms, with ample security and assurance, not only for life, liberty, and religious freedom for himself and his allies, but also for the reversal of his attainder, and that his title of earl of Tyrone, and his estates, with new Letters Patent for his lands, should be granted and confirmed to him by the crown. Mountjoy advised the queen to restore his title of earl of Tyrone, as he considered it would do him more harm than good, and says, "you do but give him a title which he did shake off as a mark of his bondage, and that which he falls from (O'Neill, prince of Tyrone), to accept this, he did as much prefer before this, as the estate of an absolute prince, before the condition of a subject; and it is the name of O'Neill with which he hath done so much mischief that is fatal and odious, and not the name of Tyrone, which he was fain to leave before he could have power to become a rebel; for believe me, out of my experience, the titles of our honours do rather weaken than strengthen them in this country." During these negotiations, queen Elizabeth died on the 24th of March, of which event Mountjoy received private information on the 27th, and anxious to have the honour of receiving O'Neill's submission, he hastened the affair, as he well knew that O'Neill would by no means submit if he heard of the queen's death. Mountjoy was at this time in the castle of sir Garrett Moore at Mellifont, near Drogheda, and on receiving the account of the queen's death, he gave strict orders to have the news concealed. He had previously on the 25th, sent sir William Godolphin and sir Garrett Moore with a commission, dated from Drogheda, to treat with O'Neill, and on the 27th, having arrived at Charlemont, Moore rode that night to Tullaghoge, near Dungannon, where O'Neill was at that time, at the residence of O'Hagan. On the 28th sir Garrett Moore wrote to Godolphin that O'Neill was resolved to come to the lord deputy, and Henry O'Hagan, who brought the letter, gave assurance of the same. Mountjoy was very anxious to conclude the with their people and property, to war against Niall Garv and the English, and they did not stop until they arrived in the Rosses, and in the islands; they were not long there when they were plundered by Niall and his brethren, who took Cathbar Oge, and kept him a prisoner. The people of Rory O'Donnell proceeded into Tirconnell, with all their property, cattle, and great wealth, in the first month of spring, and Rory himself, with his party and forces of Irish and English, along with captain Guest, previous to his people having departed from the west, proceeded to take revenge and satisfaction on O'Rourke, namely, Bryan Oge, for his insult and dishonour, which he had in contemplation for some time before that; so that they plundered and laid waste Brefney, both crops and corn, and all their property they laid hold of, for the most of them fled into the recesses and fastnesses of the territory; a few people were slain between them, including Owen, the son of Ferdorcha O'Gallagher, and Torlogh, the son of Mac Loghlin, who fell by each other on that occasion. A party of the English were left in garrison at Dromahaire, for the purpose of devastating the country about them, and O'Rourke was obliged to remain with a small force in the woods, in the remote glens, and on the islands in the lakes of his country, from that forth.

treaty with O'Neill, lest he should break off on hearing of the queen's death; and Morrison says "for those reasons he resolved speedily to strike up the former treaty with Tyrone," and he despatched a horseman to Godolphin, commanding him to hasten the coming of O'Neill. Godolphin rode from Charlemont, and met O'Neill at nine o'clock in the morning on the 29th at Togher, about five miles beyond Dungannon, and having produced his Protection, which was shortly after delivered into his own hands, O'Neill, along with Moore, Godolphin, and a guard of 50 horse, rode to Mellifont, where they arrived on the 30th of March, in the afternoon; and on the following day O'Neill made his formal submission in writing to the lord deputy, the terms of which are given in Morrison. The vain-glorious Mountjoy, to give himself the greater honour in this transaction, states that O'Neill went on his knees for more than an hour at his chamber door, making a penitent submission; an absurd falsehood, for O'Neill did not come there to ask pardon or favour, but merely to make a formal submission, having taken good care to have his terms granted and confirmed to him before he came, for he was too keen otherwise to have trusted himself in the power of the treacherous Mountjoy, who had a short time before offered for his head a reward of a thousand pounds. On the 3rd of April, Mountjoy, accompanied by O'Neill, rode to Drogheda, and from thence to Dublin on the 4th; on the 5th, a ship arrived there in which sir Henry Dunvers brought letters from the lords of the council in England, with the official account of the queen's death, and the accession of James I. This was the first time O'Neill heard of the queen's death, and in presence of the council at Dublin Castle, he burst into tears, moved with indignation and regret that he had been deceived into

As to Niall Garv O'Donnell, a letter came from Dublin to him, requesting him to appear before the lord justice and the council, to receive a Patent for Tirconnell, as a reward for his services, and aid to the crown; he however neglected that affair, so that what he did was to go to Kilmacrennan, and he sent for O'Firghil, the coarb of Columkille, and he was nominated the O'Donnell, without the permission of the king's representative, or of the council. When the lord justice and the council received intelligence of that, they were incensed against Niall, nor was he yet much esteemed by the general sir Henry Docwra, although he was friendly, and of great service to him before that time. Rory O'Donnell happened to be then in Dublin, and having been summoned before the lord justice, and the council, they sent letters and written despatches with him to sir Henry Docwra, commanding him to take Niall Garv prisoner, and having sent some captains along with him, Rory arrived at Derry, and the governor sent some of the commanders and captains of Derry. There is a short blank here in the Annals, but it appears that it refers only to Niall Garv having been attacked and taken prisoner). Tuathal Mac-an-Deaganaigh O'Gallagher; Hugh Buighe, the son of John Oge, and Felim, the son of John Oge, with several others, were taken prisoners on that a premature submission, for had he held out till after the queen's death, he could have protracted the war, and made far more favourable terms for himself and the other chiefs. O'Neill made a new submission to king James, and sent letters to the king of Spain, recalling his son Henry from that country. He then returned to Tyrone, and peaceably took possession of his ancient seat at Dungannon, from whence, in the latter end of May, 1603, he was summoned to Dublin by Mountjoy, to accompany him to England, where they arrived in June, but on their progress through the country, the mob and many women flung stones at O'Neill, and reviled him for the loss of their relatives who had been slain in the Irish wars. O'Neill was honourably received at court by king James, but on his return to Ireland in September, he was escorted through England by troops of horse, to protect him from the violence of the mob. After his return he lived peaceably at Dungannon till the year 1607, when, on a charge of conspiracy against the state, he and his friend Rory, or Roderick O'Donnell, who had been created earl of Tyreconnell, were forced to fly from Ireland, and having retired to Rome, they both died there as hereafter related. A sketch of the character and personal appearance of Hugh O'Neill, earl of Tyrone, has been given at page 629 in the notes. After the flight of the earls, their extensive possessions, together with the lands of all the other chiefs of Ulster, were confiscated and transferred to British settlers; and thus terminated the power of the renowned race of the O'Neills and O'Donnells, for many ages princes of Tyrone and Tirconnell, and after the O'Neills and their ancestors had ruled for more than a thousand years as kings of Ulster.

occasion; Niall made his escape shortly after that, and he and his brethren, with their people, retired into the woods of Ceanumaghair.

Manus Oge O'Sruitheir was slain at that time by Donal, the son of Con O'Donnell, in revenge of his brother, who had been formerly slain by him, namely Calvach, the son of Con, and it were better for him he had not committed that act, for many evils happened them, as the result of it. Rory O'Donnell, and all the Irish who were joined with him, together with the captains who came with him to the country, and also captain Guest, who was along with him in Connaught, were commanded to go in pursuit of Niall, his brethren, and people, to prey and plunder them; this he accordingly did, as directed, so that the smallest head of cattle was not left with Niall's people; and they carried off many thousand cattle with them, and great numbers of those who were plundered there, died of cold and famine. Rory divided the preys, and gave their proportions to the gentlemen who proceeded in his force. Hugh Buighe, the son of Con, was wounded in his ankle, and he was sent to be cured into Crannog-na-n Duine, in the Tuatha in Ros-Guill precisely (Roscuill, near Sheep Haven, in Donegal); the same Hugh was taken prisoner by the English, and was brought to Derry, and the governor declared he would not set him at liberty until the person who had committed the slaying, namely Donal, the son of Con, should be given up for his release; Niall and Donal went on the word of protection before the governor, and Hugh Buighe was set at liberty, and Donal was retained. Niall O'Donnell afterwards proceeded to England to ask forgiveness for his crimes, and to obtain the reward of his support, services, and aid to the crown of England, from king James. Rory O'Donnell went to England for the same purpose, although the services of both to the crown were not equal, and each of them was putting forward his claim to Tirconnell, so that it was then the king and the council appointed Rory O'Donnell earl over Tirconnell, and assigned his own estate to Niall, viz. from Leachta-Siubhaine westward, as far as the Seasgan-Lubanach, on both sides of the river Finn (about Lifford, in Donegal), and they both returned to Ireland in peace and on good terms, after they had thus been reconciled.

Niall Gary, the son of Rory, son of Eigneachan, son of Eigneachan, son of Neachtan, son of Torlogh of the Wine O'Donnell, died.

Conor, son of Donogh, son of Murrough, son of Torlogh O'Brien, died in the month of December.

An excessive famine took place throughout Ireland².

2. Depredations and Famine.—The Annalists mention a direful famine in this year; and accounts of immense depredations, as well as many massacres committed by the English forces during the reign of Elizabeth, and of the great famine which prevailed in Ireland in consequence of the wars, and the destruction of crops, corn, and cattle, are given in Fynes Morrison's Ireland, Holinshed's Chronicles, Cox's Hibernia Anglicana, Pacata Hibernia, Leland, &c., from which works the following particulars have been collected. In 1563, the lord deputy, Thomas Ratcliffe, earl of Sussex, in the war with Shane O'Neill, entered Tyrone and took a prey of 600 kine, and on another occasion Sussex seized the immense prey of 3,300 kine, and 1,500 garrons (horses) and mares, which he divided amongst his soldiers, according to Cox, and he then returned to Drogheda. In 1567, the lord deputy Fitzwilliam, according to Cox, plundered O'Neill's country, and took a prey of 2,000 cows, and 500 garrons. In 1580, the lord deputy, sir William Pelham, marched with his forces to attack the earl of Desmond, and carried off from Clanawcliffe, in Cork, a prey of 2,000 kine and many sheep, and soon after took another great prey at Castlemaine in Kerry. In 1580 also, according to Cox, the earl of Ormond marched with the queen's forces against the earl of Desmond, and about Dingle, Tralee, and other parts of Kerry, they drove the whole country before them, and took the enormous prey of 8,000 cows, besides many garrons, sheep, &c., and slew many people. At this time the deputy, lord Arthur Grey, plundered and laid waste various parts of the country, and Leland says that all persons, both of English and Irish race, sent complaints to England of his barbarity, saying he would leave nothing for the queen to reign over in Ireland, but "carcasses and ashes." In 1586, sir Richard Bingham, governor of Connaught, in his contests with the Irish, took in Galway and Mayo a prey of 4,000 cows, and slew 140 of the people. In 1588, Hugh Roe Mac Mahon, lord of Monaghan, had to give the lord deputy Fitzwilliam a bribe of 600 cows to get possession of his own lands, but he was soon after hanged by Fitzwilliam; and about the same time, Maguire, lord of Fermanagh, had to give Fitzwilliam a bribe of 300 cows to have his country free from a sheriff. In 1600 and 1601, sir Henry Docwra, governor of Derry, repeatedly plundered and ravaged Derry and Donegal, massacred the inhabitants, destroyed the crops, and carried off upwards of 3,000 cows. In 1600, Carew, president of Munster, plundered and laid waste various parts of that province. In 1601, sir Charles Wilmot ravaged Kerry, and on one occasion took a prey of 4,000 cows from Iveragh, and the same year sir Samuel Bagnall took a prey of 2,000 cows, with horses and sheep, from Muskerry in Cork. In 1600 and 1601, sir Arthur Chichester, governor of Carrickfergus, plundered and laid waste the counties of Down and Antrim, destroyed the crops, and carried off the cattle. In 1601, sir Francis Barkley took a prey of 3,000 cows in Longford, and in the same year he plundered the counties of Cavan and Fermanagh, and carried off 2,000 cows, 200 garrons and many sheep. In the years 1600, 1601, and 1602, an account has been given of the expeditions of the lord deputy Mountjoy, in Leinster and Ulster, and the immense depredations and destruction of property. In 1600, Mountjoy plundered and laid waste Wicklow, Kildare, Carlow, King's, and Queen's counties, and Morrison says, that in that harvest he destroyed more than ten thousand pounds worth of corn, carried off a prey of 4,000 cows, 700 garrons, and many sheep, and massacred the inhabitants; and, at the same time, sir Oliver Lambert committed great devastations there, and carried off 1,000 cows, and 500 gar-

A. D. 1604.

O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan Oge, son of Bryan-na-Murtha, son of Bryan Ballach, son of Owen, died in Galley (in the barony of Iraghticonor, in Kerry), on the 28th of January, and was buried at the monastery of Ros Iriala (Muerus Abbey, at Killarney, in Kerry), with the Franciscan friars. Mournful rons. In 1601 and 1602, Mountjoy laid waste all Ulster; Morrison says, "We marched into Ferney, the country of Mac Mahon, and there we burned the houses, and spoiled the goods of the inhabitants;" and again, "We resolved to draw towards Monaghun, and spoil the corn of that country, being of exceeding quantity;" on another occasion he says, "We burned a town in O'Kane's country, together with many women and children in it, and killed also 40 kernes and churls." In Tyrone, Mountjoy burned and laid waste the country, and Morrison says, "our men cut down the corn with their swords, according to our fashion." In 1601, according to the Pacata, sir Francis Barkley, with troops from Askeaton, proceeded to Mac Anliffe's country in Cork, and took from thence 1,000 cows, and 200 garrons, with much sheep and other spoils, and in 1602, sir Charles Wilnot sent a troop to plunder Dunkerron, and other parts of Kerry, and they drove off the immense prey of 2,000 cows, 4,000 sheep, and 1,000 garrons. In Holinshed's Chronicles, (vol. 6, page 427 to 430), are related many plunders and massacres of the English forces, during the war in Munster. On one occasion, he says, "they drove the whole country before them to Ventry in Kerry, and took all the cattle to the number of 8,000 kine, besides horses, sheep, goats, &c., and all such people as they met they did without mercy put to the sword; by these means the whole country, having no cattle nor kine left, they were driven to such extremities, that for want of victuals they were either to die and perish by famine, or to die under the sword." He relates several other depredations committed by the soldiers, and says that in one day they killed 400 of the people in the Slievoghler mountains and woods in Kerry, and that they spared neither man, woman, nor child. Holinshed (B. 6, p. 459), describes the effects of the war in Munster, as follows: "And us for the great companies of soldiers, galloglasses, kerne, and common people, who followed this rebellion, the numbers of them are infinite whose blood the earth drank up, and whose carcasses the beasts of the field, and the ravening fowls of the air, did consume and devour. After this followed an extreme famine, and such whom the sword did not destroy, the same did consume and eat out; for they were not only driven to eat horses, dogs, and dead carions, but also did devour the carcasses of dead men." Again he says, "the land itself, which before those wars was populous, well inhabited, and rich in all the good blessings of God, being plenteous of corn, full of cattle, well stored with fish, and sundry other good commodities, is now become waste and barren, yielding no fruits, the pastures no cattle, the air no birds, the seas, though full of fish, yet to them yielding nothing; finally, every wny the curse of God was so great, and the land so barren, both of man and beast, that whosoever did travel from the one end to the other of all Munster, even from Waterford to the head of Smerwick, which is about six scores miles, he would not meet with any man, woman, or child, saving in towns and cities, nor yet see any beast, but the very wolves, the foxes, and other like ravening beasts, and many of them lay dead, being famished, and the residue gone elsewhere." Spenser in his "View of Ireland," page 106, speaking of the effects of the war in Munster says, "For, notwithstanding that the same was a most rich and plentiful country, full of corn and cattle, that you would have thought they should have been able to stand long, yet ere one year and a half, they were brought to such wretchedness, as that any stony heart would have rued the same. Out of every corner of the woods and glynns they came, creeping forth upon their hands, for their legs could not bear them; they looked like anatomies of death; they spake like ghosts crying out of their graves; they did eat the dead carions, happy where they could find them, yea, and one was the death of him who departed there, for he was the maintaining pillar and supporting prop of the tribe of Hugh Fionn; he was a tower of battle in bravery, and the guiding star of encounter and conflict of the Hy Briunians; a valiant defending man, who did not allow Brefneiy to be endangered during his time; a man of calm reflection, of au-another soon after, insomuch as the very carcasses they spared not to scrape out of their graves; and if they found a plot of watercresses or shamrocks, there they flocked as to a feast for the time, yet not able long to continue there withal; that in short space there were none almost left, and a most populous and plentiful country suddenly left void of man and beast." Spenser the poet was in Munster many years, and the last time he was there was in the year 1597, so he was an eye witness of some of the horrors he describes. Fynes Morrison, who accompanied Mountjoy to Ulster in 1602, relates many horrible instances of famine in that province; amongst others he gives an account of some persons at Newry who made fires in the fields, and driven by direful hunger, devoured some young children. He relates many other dreadful cases of famine, and says, "And no spectacle was more frequent in the ditches of towns, and especially in wasted countries, than to see multitudes of these poor people dead, with their mouths all coloured green by eating nettles, docks, and all things they could rend up above ground." Mountjoy, in a letter to the lords of the council in England, says, "from O'Kane's country northward of Tyrone, we have left none to give us opposition, nor of late have seen any but dead carcasses, merely starved for want of meat;" and again he says, when in Tyrone, "O'Hagan protested unto us, that between Tullaghoge and Toome, there lay unburied a thousand dead, and since our first drawing this year to Blackwater, there were above three thousand starved in Tyrone." (Morrison, v. 2, pp. 200, 283, 284). Cox, speaking of the year 1602, says that the famine at the siege of Jerusalem, when taken by the Romans, was not greater than that in Ireland at this time. Le-laud, (B. 4, chap. 3), says on these wars in Munster, "The southern province seemed to be totally depopulated, and except within the cities, exhibited an hideous scene of famine and desolation." Sir John Davis, in his Tracts, page 58, says, "The army, under the command of lord Mountjoy, broke, and absolutely subdued all the lords and chieftains of the Irish, and degenerate or rebellious English, whereupon the multitude being beat as it were in a mortar with the sword, famine, and pestilence, altogether, submitted themselves to the English government." Spenser in his "View of Ireland," page 28, thus speaks of the beauty and fertility of the country at this time, "And sure it is yet a most beautiful and sweet country, as any is under heaven, being stored throughout with many goodly rivers, replenished with all sorts of fish most abundantly, sprinkled with many very sweet islands and goodly lakes, like little inland seas, that will carry even ships upon their waters, adorned with goodly woods even fit for building of houses and ships, so commodiously, as that if some princes in the world had them, they would soon hope to be lords of all the seas, and ere long of all the world; also full of very good ports and havens, opening upon England, as inviting us to come unto them to see what excellent commodities that country can afford, besides the soil itself most fertile, fit to yield all kind of fruit that shall be committed thereunto; and lastly, the heavens most mild and temperate." Sir John Davis, attorney-general in Ireland, in the reign of James I., says, "I have visited all the provinces of that kingdom, in sundry journeys and circuits; wherein I have observed the good temperature of the air, the fruitfulness of the soil, the pleasant and commodious seats for habitation, the safe and large ports and havens lying open for traffic into all the west parts of the world, the long Inlets of many navigable rivers, and so many great lakes and fresh ponds within the land, as the like are not to be seen in any part of Europe; the rich fishings, and wild fowl of all kinds; and lastly, the bodies and minds of the people, endued with extraordinary abilities of nature."

thority amongst his friends, and fierce to his enemies; a man the most illustrious for justice, hospitality, excellence, noble deeds, circumspection, and prudence, of any that lived of his tribe for a long time.

A. D. 1605.

Sir Arthur Chichester, lord justice of Ireland, and the earl of Tyrone, namely, Hugh, the son of Ferdorcha, came to Strabane, and O'Neill was demanding a portion of the estate which Niall O'Donnell had obtained from the king, viz., the Moentacht; Niall brought before the lord justice the securities which he had for the Moentacht in succession, from his ancestors, and besides, the charts which Manus O'Donnell exacted from O'Neill, namely, Con Bacach, for the release of Henry, the son of John, who was in imprisonment with O'Donnell, i. e. Manus, until he got those charts for his release, and the lord justice, sir Arthur, having understood the arguments of both parties, he adjudged the Moentacht to Niall, and said that O'Neill could not by right claim the land, for the title became long extinct, as it had exceeded sixty years, and they were both obliged to abide by that decision.

O'Rourke, i. e. Teige of the Wine, the son of Bryan-na-Murtha, son of Bryan Ballach, son of Owen, lord of Brefney, a man who experienced much trouble and injury in defending his patrimony against his brother O'Rourke, i. e. Bryan Oge; a man who it was not expected would have died on his bed, but rather should fall by sword or spear; a man who encountered hard contested conflicts, and many perilous hazards, in maintaining the inheritance of his patrimony, and becoming successor to his father, until at length God granted him a lordship; died, and was buried with due honours in the monastery of St. Francis at Carrickpatrick (at Dromahaire, in Leitrim). Mary de Burgh, daughter of the earl of Clanrickard, was the mother of that Teige.

A. D. 1606.

A. D. 1607.

O'Boyle, i. e. Teige Oge, the son of Teige, son of Torlogh, died at Druim-Arc, near the town of O'Boyle, on the 3rd of May, and was buried at Donegal.

Maguire, i. e. Cuchionacht, and Donogh, the son of Mahon, son of the bishop O'Brien, brought a ship with them to Ireland, and they entered the harbour of Suiligh (Lough Swilly, in Donegal). They took with them from Ireland the earl O'Neill, namely Hugh, the son of Ferdorcha, and the earl O'Donnell, i. e. Rory, the son of Hugh, son of Manus, together with a great number of the nobles of the province of Ulster. The persons who accompanied O'Neill were the countess, namely Catherine, the daughter of Magennis, her three sons, Hugh the baron, John, and Bryan; Art Oge, the son of Cormac, son of the baron; Ferdorcha, son of Con, the son of O'Neill; Hugh Oge, the son of Bryan, son of Art O'Neill, along with a great number of his faithful friends. Those who accompanied the earl O'Donnell were Cathbar his brother, with his sister Nuala, and Hugh, son of the earl, who wanted three weeks of being a year old; Rose, daughter of O'Dogherty, the wife of Cathbar, with her son Hugh, aged two years and a quarter; his brother's son, Donal Oge, son of Donal; Naghtan, the son of Calvach, son of Donogh Cairbreach O'Donnell, together with a great number of his faithful friends; it was on the festival of the Cross in harvest (14th of September), they embarked in the ship. That was a distinguished company for one ship, for it is most certain that the sea has not borne nor the wind wafted from Ireland in the latter times a party in any one ship more eminent, illustrious, and noble than they were, in point of genealogy, or more distinguished for great deeds, renown, feats of arms, and valorous achievements; and would that God had granted them to remain in their patrimonies, until their youths should arrive at the age of manhood! Woe to the heart that meditated! woe to the mind that planned! woe to the council that determined on the project which caused the party who went on that voyage to depart, while they had no prospect to the end of their lives of returning safe to their hereditary estates, or patrimonial inheritance!¹

A. D. 1607.

1. The Flight and Death of the Earls.—The circumstances connected with these events are given by Cox, Leland, Mac Geoghegan, Curry, Taaffe, and various other historians. Cox, in his Hibernia Anglicana, relates the matter thus:—"On the 7th of May, 1607, a letter directed to sir William Usher, clerk of the council, was dropped in the council chamber of Dublin Castle, which discovered a conspiracy of the earls of Tyrone and Tiron-

A. D. 1608.

Grievous dissensions and strife arose between the governor, who was in Derry Columkille, namely, sir George Pawlett, and O'Dogherty, i. e. Cahir, the son of John Oge; it was not only that nell, Maguire, O'Cahan, the lord of Delvin, and almost all the Irish of Ulster, to surprise the castle of Dublin, and murder the lord deputy and council, and set up for themselves." "They had sent," says Cox, "a baron to the arch-dukes to solicit assistance, and probably had employed somebody else to Spain; but as soon as they had notice that their plot was discovered, the earls of Tyrone and Tirconnell, and the lord Maguire fled beyond seas to get Spanish aid, and the rest did shift for themselves as well as they could, but some were taken and executed." In Curry's "Civil Wars," (chap. 5), the following account of the affair is given from a work by Doctor Carleton, bishop of Chichester, wherein it is stated, that George Montgomery, bishop of Derry, having attempted to recover certain church lands belonging to his see, which it is said were held by O'Neill, the bishop by some means obtained the assistance of O'Cahan or O'Kane, as a witness for the recovery of the said lands. O'Cahan was brought for that purpose before the council in Dublin. O'Neill was likewise summoned to appear in Dublin regarding the suit, but having, it is said, entered into a plot against the state some time before, he was afraid that O'Cahan, who knew of the conspiracy, had revealed it to the government, on which O'Neill and his confederates fled out of Ireland; but Curry altogether disbelieves the existence of this pretended conspiracy, and says, "the accounts were framed to give some colour of right to public acts of slander, oppression, and rapine." In the Preface to Borlase's "Rebellion of 1641," reference is made to this matter by Henry Jones, bishop of Meath, who states, that in the year 1607 there was "a providential discovery of another rebellion in Ireland, the lord Chichester being deputy; the discoverer not being willing to appear, a letter from him, not subscribed, was superscribed to sir William Usher, clerk of the council, and dropped in the council chamber, then held in the castle of Dublin, in which was mentioned a design for seizing the castle and murdering the deputy, with a general revolt, and dependance on Spanish forces, and this also for religion." This letter was dropped in the council chamber on the 19th of May, and its contents are given in Lodge's Peerage, on the Nugents, earls of Westmeath. In the work called "Anderson's Royal Genealogies," (page 786), another account is given of this affair, in which the contrivance of the plot is attributed to Robert Cecil, earl of Salisbury, the secretary of state in England. Anderson says, "artful Cecil employed one St. Lawrence to entrap the earls of Tyrone and Tirconnell, the lord of Delvin, and other Irish chiefs, into a sham plot which had no evidence but his; but those chiefs being informed that witnesses were to be hired against them, foolishly fled from Dublin, and so taking guilt upon them they were declared rebels; and six entire counties in Ulster were at once forfeited to the crown, which was what their enemies wanted." Mac Geoghegan gives the same account, and considers the whole business to have been planned by the secretary Cecil, who he says, employed for that purpose Christopher St. Lawrence, baron of Howth, who, "to entrap the leaders of the Catholics, invited them to a secret conference;" he further states, that the earls O'Neill and O'Donnell, with Richard Nugent, baron of Delvin, and other Catholics of distinction, attended this meeting, at which St. Lawrence made them swear not to divulge what he would communicate and informed them, "that the court of England had determined to eradicate the Catholic religion out of Ireland, and force them to become Protestants;" he then advised them to stand in their defence, but afterwards, says Mac Geoghegan, accused them to the king of having formed secret designs against the state, and O'Neill and others being summoned before the council, and finding themselves unexpectedly confronted by St. Lawrence, acknowledged they attended the meeting, but repelled the calumny of having entered into any treasonable plot against the state; and no evidence having been produced against them, they were allowed to depart free the governor abused him in language, with scorn and contempt, but also inflicted on him a personal castigation, so that he preferred death to life, rather than endure the insult and dishonour he received, and he would not delay or put off being from arrest, but were ordered to appear on the following day. In the meantime, says Mac Geoghegan, some false friends in the council advised them privately to consult for their safety, on which, fearing that hired witnesses would be produced against them, and their lives endangered, they fled from Ireland, as above recorded in the Annals. Some of the O'Neills, O'Donnells, O'Kanes, and other chiefs, were executed in Dublin, and others were imprisoned in the tower of London. The baron of Delvin was imprisoned in Dublin Castle, but he made his escape and fled to O'Reilly's castle of Cloughoughter in Cavan, but was afterwards pardoned. The earls O'Neill and O'Donnell, with some other chiefs, set sail for France and landed in Normandy, on which, according to Mac Geoghegan, the English ambassador at the court of king Henry the IV., demanded they should be surrendered as rebels to king James, but Henry refused the request with scorn, as an act beneath the dignity of a king. The earls next proceeded to Flanders, where they were well received by the archduke Albert, who then governed the Low Countries; and they lastly retired to Rome, where they were kindly and honourably received by Pope Paul V., who, together with the king of Spain, granted pensions for their support. Most of those illustrious exiles died soon after; Constantine Maguire died at Geneva in the same year, while preparing to go to Spain; the earl O'Donnell died at Rome in 1608, as recorded in the Annals, not in 1617, as stated by several writers; and his brother Cathbar died at Rome in the same year, and also Hugh O'Neill, baron of Dungannon, son of Hugh, the earl. The heroic Hugh O'Neill himself, the last representative of the ancient kings of Ulster, died at Rome in the year 1616, old, blind, and broken down by many misfortunes; his son Henry, who was in the Spanish service, was assassinated a few years afterwards at Brussels. The princes and chiefs of Tyrone and Tirconnell who died at Rome, were buried on St. Peter's Hill, in the Franciscan church of Monte Aureo, according to De Burgo, who gives the Latin inscription on their monument in the supplement to his Hibernia Dominicana. In O'Reilly's Irish Writers, at A. D. 1600, and in these Annals at the year 1608, an account is given of Owen Roe Mac Ward, who was chief bard to the O'Donnells, and accompanied the earls in their exile to Rome. He wrote a beautiful elegiac poem on the death of the princes of Tyrone and Tirconnell, in which he addresses Nuala, the sister of the earl Roderic O'Donnell, and he pathetically represents her as weeping alone over the graves of the princes on St. Peter's Hill. This poem, translated from the Irish, has been admirably versified by Clarence Mangan, of which the following verses afford a favorable specimen. There are allusions in it to the great victories gained over the English by the O'Neills and O'Donnells in the North, and which have been recorded in these Annals, as the battles of Athbuidhe or the Yellow Ford, of Bullaghmoyle or the Moyry Pass, of Ashane or Ballyshannon, of Mullaghlbrack, of the Curlew Mountains, &c.; and the poem concludes with an allusion to the blood of Conn, meaning the O'Neills and O'Donnells, one of whose ancestors was Conn of the Hundred Battles, a celebrated king of Ireland, in the second century.

"O woman of the piercing wail,
Who mourest o'er yon mound of clay,
With sigh and groan;
Would God thou wert among the Gael!
Thou wouldst not then from day to day
Weep thus alone.
'Twere long before, around a grave,
In green Tireconnell, one could find
This loneliness;
Near where Beann-Boirche's banners wave,
Such grief as thine could ne'er have pined Companionless.

revenged, but became so filled with anger and fury, that it was a wonder he did not go distracted and mad ; so that what he did was, to advise with his faithful friends how he should be avenged for

" Beside the wave, in Donegal,
In Antrim's glens, or fair Dromore,
Or Killilee ;
Or where the sunny waters fall,
At Assaroe, near Erna's shore,
This could not be.
On Derry's plains—in rich Drumclieff,
Throughout Armagh the Great, renowned
In olden years,
No day could pass but Woman's grief
Would rain upon the burial-ground
Fresh floods of tears !

" O no !—from Shannon, Boyne and Suir,
From high Dunluce's castle walls,
From Lisadill,
Would flock alike both rich and poor,
One wail would rise from Cruachan's halls
To Tara's Hill :
And some would come from Barrow-side,
And many a maid would leave her home
On Leitrim's plains,
And by melodious Banna's tide,
And by the Mourne and Erne, to come,
And swell thy strains !

" Two princes of the line of Conn
Sleep in their cells of clay beside O'Donnell Roe :
Three royal youths, alas ! are gone,
Who lived for Erin's weal, but died
For Erin's woe !
Ah ! could the men of Ireland read
The names these noteless burial-stones
Display to view,
Their wounded hearts afresh would bleed,
Their tears gush forth again, their groans Resound anew !

" The youths whose relics moulder here
Were sprung from Hugh, high Prince and Lord
Of Aileach's lands ;

" Thy noble brothers, justly dear,
Thy nephew, long to be deplored
By Ulster's bands.
Their's were not souls wherein dull Time
Could domicile Decay, or house Decrepitude !
They passed from earth ere Manhood's prime,
Ere years bad power to dim their brows
Or chill their blood.

" And who can marvel o'er thy grief,
Or who can blame thy flowing tears
That knows their source ?

O'Donnell, Dunnasara's chief,
Cut off amid his vernal years,
Lies here a corse

Beside his brother Catbbar, whom Tirconnell of the Helmets mourns
In deep despair—

For valour, truth, and comely bloom,
For all that greatness and adorns,
A peerless pair.

" O, bad these twain, and he, the third,
The lord of Mourne, O'Niall's son,
Their mate in death—
A prince in look, in deed, and word—
Had these three heroes yielded on
The field their breath.

O, bad they fallen on Crimthan's plain,
There would not be a town or clan
From shore to sea,
But would with sbricks bewail the slain,
Or chant aloud the exulting rann (verse)
Of Jubilee !

" When high the shout of battle rose,
On fields where Freedom's torch still burned
Through Erin's gloom,
If one, if barely one of those
Were slain, all Ulster would have mourned
The hero's doom !
If at Athbuighe, where hosts of brave
Ulidian horsemen sank beneath
The shock of spears,
Young Hugh O'Neill had found a grave,
Long must the North have wept his death,
With heart-wrung tears !

" If on the day of Ballaghmore,
The lord of Mourne had met, thus young
A warrior's fate,
In vain would such as thou desire
To mourn alone the champion sprung
From Niall the Great !
No marvel this— for all the dead,
Heaped on the field, pile over pile,
At Mullaghbrack,
Were scarce an Eric for his head,
If Death bad stayed his footsteps while On Victory's track.

" If on the day the Saxon host
Were forced to fly—a day so great For Ashanee—
The chief had been untimely lost,
Our conquering troops would moderate
Their mirthful glee.
There would not lack on Lifford's day,
From Galway, from the glens of Boyle,
From Limerick's towers,
A marshalled file, a long array,
Of mourners to hedew the soil
With tears in showers.

" O, had the fierce Dalcassian swarm,
That bloody night on Fergus' banks
But slain our Chief,
When rose his camp in wild alarm,—
How would the triumph of his ranks
Be dashed with grief !
How would the troops of Murbach mourn,
If on the Curlew Mountains day,
Which England rued,
Some Saxon hand had left them lorn,
By shedding there amid the fray,
Their Prince's blood !

" Red would have been our warriors' eyes
Had Roderick found on Sligo's field
A gory grave ;
No Northern chief would soon arise,
So sage to guide, so strong to shield,
So swift to save.
Long would Leith-Cuinn have wept, if Hugh Had met the death he oft had dealt
Among the foe ;
But, had our Roderick fallen too,
All Erin must, alas ! have felt
The deadly blow !

the insult he had received. The unanimous resolution they came to in the first place was, on the 3rd of May, that he should invite captain Hart, who was in Culmore, a place which lay on the banks of Lough Foyle, on the north side of the Derry we have mentioned, and he kept him prisoner until he obtained the fort for his release. He then immediately proceeded, at the dawn of day, to Derry, and fiercely attacked the people of the town by surprise; the governor was killed by Eochy, son of Niall, son of Gerald O'Dogherty, and lieutenant Corbie by John, son of Hugh, son

"What do I say? Ah, woe is me!
Already we bewail in vain
Their fatal fall!
And Erin, once the Great and Free,
Now vainly mourns her breakless chain,
And iron thrall!
Then, daughter of O'Donnell! dry
Thine overflowing eyes, and turn
Thy heart aside;
For Adam's race is born to die,
And sternly the sepulchral urn
Mocks human pride!

"Look not, nor sigh for earthly throne,
Nor place thy trust in arm of clay—
But on thy knees
Uplift thy soul to God alone,
For all things go their destined way
As He decrees.
Embrace the faithful Crucifix,
And seek the path of pain and prayer
Thy Saviour trod;
Nor let thy spirit intermix
With earthly hope and worldly care
Its groans to God.

"And thou, O mighty Lord! whose ways
Are far above our feeble minds
To understand,
Sustain us in these doleful days,
And render light the chain that binds
Our fallen land!
Look down upon our dreary state,
And through the ages that may still Roll sadly on,
Watch thou o'er hapless Erin's fate,
And shield at least from darker ill
The blood of Conn!"

In May, 1608, sir Cahir O'Dogherty, lord of Inisowen, a young man of great spirit and valour, then only in the 21st year of his age, raised an insurrection against the English in Ulster, being unable to tolerate the insolence and tyranny of sir George Paulett, governor of Derry. O'Dogherty and his forces having surprised Derry, they slew Paulett and most of the garrison, and burned the town; he also took the fort of Culmore, near Derry, from captain Hart, where he found 12 pieces of cannon, and gave the command of the fortress to a valiant chief, Felim Mac Davett. O'Dogherty ravaged the settlements of the English in various parts of Derry, Donegal, and Tyrone, and defeated their forces in several engagements. Marshal Wingfield and sir Oliver Laanbert marched against him with 4000 men, and having advanced to Culmore, Mac Davett, unable to defend the place against so great a force, set fire to the fortress, and sailed off with his men towards Derry, carrying away some of the cannon, and throwing the rest into the sea. Wingfield then advanced against Burt Castle, the of Hugh Duff O'Donnell, and many others were slain besides; captain Henry Vaughan, and the wife of the bishop of the town, were taken prisoners; they afterwards plundered and burned the town, and they carried off much booty from it. Alas! although it was not disreputable for the noble chief to take revenge for his dishonour, numerous and inexpressible were the evils which sprung and became permanently established in the entire province of Ulster, through that insurrection, which arose against the laws of the king, for from that resulted his death, on the 18th of July fol-chief residence of O'Dogherty, near Lough Swilly. Mac Geoghegan says the castle was commanded by a monk, who, not having a sufficient force to defend it, and not wishing to subject O'Dogherty's lady, who was Mary Preston, daughter of lord Gormanstown, to the dangers of a siege, surrendered the castle on condition that the garrison should be spared, but Wingfield put most of them to the sword, and sent O'Dogherty's wife to her brother. O'Dogherty had various encounters with the English forces, and maintained his ground for about three months in Donegal; the lord deputy Chichester offered a reward of 500 marks for his head, and sir Cahir being encamped at the Rock of Doune, near Kilmacrennan, was shot dead with a musket ball, by an English soldier, who took deliberate aim at him, recognising the warlike chief amidst his men, from his waving plume and lofty stature. The extensive estates of O'Dogherty were confiscated, and transferred to Chichester, ancestor to the earls of Donegal. After the flight and attainder of the earls, their extensive possessions became forfeited to the crown, and not only the lands of the earls, but those of all the Irish chiefs and proprietors in Ulster were confiscated. The tenants, and people of Irish descent, were deprived of their lands, and the Swordsmen, according to Pynnar, "were transported into the waste lands of Connaught and Munster, where they were dispersed, and not planted together in one place;" some of the Irish chiefs got regrants from the crown of small portions of their own hereditary lands. Six entire counties in Ulster, namely, Armagh, Tyrone, Derry, Donegal, Fermanagh, and Cavan, were confiscated, and, by the project called the Plantation of Ulster, carried into effect by king James, from 1607 to 1612, the extensive territories held for many ages by the O'Neills, O'Donnells, O'Dogherties, O'Kanes, Maguires, O'Reillys, and many other chiefs mentioned in the course of these Annals, as the ancient possessors of Ulster, were transferred to colonies of British settlers, of which transactions accounts are given in Pynnar's Survey, published in Harris's Hibernica, and in the Tracts of sir John Davis. These settlers were called Planters and Undertakers, and came chiefly from Scotland. Fynes Morrison, who was in Ireland in the time of the lord deputy Mountjoy, having visited the country in the year 1613, says, "At this time I found the state of Ireland much changed, for, by the flight of the earls of Tyrone and Tironnell, with some chiefs of countries in the North, and the suppression and death of sir Cahir O'Dogherty, their confederate in making new troubles, all the North was possessed by new colonies of English, but especially of Scots. The mere Irish in the North, and over all Ireland, continued still in absolute subjection, being powerful in no part of the kingdom, excepting only Connaught, where their chief strength was yet little to be feared, if the English-Irish had sound hearts to the State." Thus, after a continued contest and fierce wars for 430 years, from the time of Strongbow, comprising the period from 1170 to 1600, the reduction of Ireland was ultimately effected; and with the heroic struggles of Hugh O'Neill, and Red Hugh O'Donnell, terminated the power of the Irish princes and chiefs, not only in Ulster, but in all the other provinces, for afterwards, with the exception of the great confederacy of 1641, the Milesian Irish made no national movement to recover their independence.

lowing, by the chief marshal of Ireland, Robert Wincwel (Wingfield), and by sir Oliver Lambert, and he was quartered between Derry and Culmore, and his head was sent to Dublin to be publicly exhibited; many of the nobles and chiefs of the province, too numerous to be mentioned, were also put to death. It was on account of this insurrection, and the flight of the earls we have mentioned, that their inheritance, their estates, their landed properties, their fortresses, and strongholds, their delightful prosperous harbours, and their fish-abounding bays, were taken from the Irish of the province of Ulster, and were transferred in their presence to foreigners, and they were expelled and banished into various strange countries, where most of them died. Niall Garv O'Donnell, with his brethren and his son Naghtan, were taken prisoners, about the festival of St John of this year, after they were accused of being in league with O'Dogherty; they were afterwards conveyed to Dublin, from whence Niall and Naghtan were sent to the tower of London, after Niall had been freed from death by the decision of the law, and they remained imprisoned in the Tower till the end of their lives; Hugh and Donal were set at liberty from their imprisonment afterwards, in the following year.

The earl of Tirconnell, i. e. Rory, the son of Hugh, son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv, son of Hugh Roe O'Donnell, died at Rome on the 28th of July, and was buried in the monastery of St. Francis, on the hill on which St Peter the Apostle was crucified, after mourning his faults and imperfections, after an approved confession and repentance of his sins and transgressions, after receiving the body and blood of Christ at the hands of the learned ecclesiastical psalmodists of Rome. Mournful was the short career and the untimely loss of him who departed, for he was a brave, defending, triumphant, valorous, and warlike man; often had he been engaged in the pass of danger, in defence of his faith and patrimony, in aiding his brother, Hugh Roe, before he himself assumed the lordship of Tirconnell; he was a bountiful lord, in bestowing great presents and of good hospitality, to whom the inheritance of his ancestors did not seem too much for his liberality and entertainments; a man who did not give his mind or thoughts to worldly substance, or riches, but rather to subdue and expel both noble and ignoble according to their deserts.

Maguire, i. e. Cuchonacht Oge, son of Cuchonacht Oge, son of Cuchonacht, son of Bryan, son of Philip, son of Thomas, lord of Fermanagh, a person who obtained a lordship without fraud, without deception, without treachery or without the slaying of a relative, but was elected in the presence of the men of Ulster, as successor to his brother Hugh; a learned, well-featured, cheerful, high-spirited, and rapid-marching warrior; a man of superior wisdom and personal figure, and of all other good qualifications, died at Geneva, in Italy, on the 12th of August.

James, the son of Eiver, son of Cu-uladh Mac Mahon (of Monaghan), died on the same day, and was buried at the forementioned place (Geneva).

Cathbar, son of Hugh, son of Manus (O'Donnell), the most distinguished and famous for magnanimity and heroism, and for entertainments and hospitality, of any lord's son in the island of Heremon (Ireland); the regeneration of Cuan, son of Cailchin (a lord of Fermoy who lived in the 7th century), and of Guaire, son of Colman (a king of Connaught in the 7th century), in generosity and hospitality, a man from whom no person ever returned with a refusal, died at Rome, on the 17th of September, and was buried along with his brother the earl.

Hugh O'Neill, the son of Hugh, son of Ferdorcha, baron of Dungannon, heir to the earl O'Neill, the only hope of the Tyronians to succeed his father, should he survive him, died, and was buried in the same place with his mother's brethren, namely, the earl O'Donnell and Cathbar.

A. D. 1609.

Cathbar Oge, the son of Cathbar, son of Manus, son of Hugh Duv O'Donnell, was put to death in Dublin by the English, on the 18th of July. It would not be a dishonour to the tribe of Conall, the son of Niall (the Tirconnallians), that good man to be appointed to the government over them, had he succeeded to the lordship, in respect of his nobleness of blood, high-spiritedness, power, valour, prudence, protection, prowess, and the conducting of those who were sent under his command.

Bryan-na-Samhtach, son of Art, son of Bryan-na Muicheirge (O'Rourke), was slain by the English.

Mac Ward, i. e. Owen, the son of Geoffrey, son of Owen, son of Geoffrey, chief professor to O'Donnell in poetry, a learned and intelligent man, who kept a house of general hospitality, died at an advanced age, after the victory of repentance.

A. D. 1610.

A. D. 1611.

Conor O'Duwaney, bishop of Down and Connor, who was first a friar of the order of St. Francis, of the convent of Donegal, and was afterwards elected to this bishoprick, for his superior merits, was taken prisoner by the English, and he remained for a long time with them, in bondage and punishment; and they offered him much wealth and presents, if he would conform to their tenets, but he rejected that offer, for he preferred to abandon the transitory good for an everlasting kingdom. God released him on that occasion from the English, but he was taken again, and put to death; and sir Arthur Chichester was lord justice in Ireland at that time; he was first beheaded, then quartered and cut in pieces, in Dublin, on the 1st day of February. There was not a Christian in the land of Ireland, whose heart did not shudder at the dreadful martyrdom which the pure and enlightened divine, and the experienced and truly humble, upright man, suffered and endured for the benefit of his soul; every one of the Christians who were at that time in the city of Dublin, emulated each another to see which of them should have one of his members, and not his members only, but they had supplied themselves with quantities of fine linens to receive his blood in them, that it might not be lost, for they were confident that he was one of the holy martyrs of the Trinity. Giolla-Patrick O'Luchairen, an eminent priest, was along with the bishop at that time; when the English decreed that they should be both put to death, the bishop dreaded that he might be dismayed and terrified on beholding the dreadful usage that would be inflicted on his own body, in his presence, so that he therefore requested of the executioners to put the priest to death before himself; the priest said that he need not be in dread of him on that account, and that he would follow him without fear, and he moreover said, that it was not meet that an illustrious bishop should be without a priest to accompany him; that he fulfilled, for he endured and suffered the same treatment to be inflicted on himself, for sake of the kingdom of heaven, for his soul.

Niall O'Boyle, bishop of Rath-both (Raphoe, in Donegal), died in Glen-Eidhnighe, on the 6th of February, and was buried at Iniskeel (in the barony of Boyleagh, county of Donegal).

A. D. 1616.

O'Neill, i. e. Hugh, the son of Ferdorecha, son of Con Baeach, son of Con, son of Henry, son of Owen, who had been baron from the death of his father, till the year in which the celebrated Parliament was held in Dublin, 1584, and who had been created earl of Tyrone at that Parliament, and had been afterwards nominated O'Neill, died at an advanced age, after having fulfilled his time and career with pre-eminence, power, prudence, honour, and excellence; where he died was at Rome, on the 20th of July, after an approved repentance of his sins, and after gaining the victory over the world and the devil; although he died far distant from Armagh, the burial place of his ancestors, it was a manifestation that God was pleased with his life, for the place in which God granted him to be buried, was not worse, viz., Rome, the capital of the Christians; the person who then departed was a powerful mighty lord, of subtle, acute, and profound intellect and mind, a warlike, valiant, predatory and enterprising lord, in defence of his religion and patrimony, against his enemies; a pious, charitable lord, of meekness and mildness towards his friends, but fierce and stern to his enemies, until he brought them under controul and subjection to his authority; a lord who did not covet to possess the lands or property of any others, but was content with what his ancestors inherited originally; a lord possessing the power and praise-worthy fame of a prince, who did not suffer robbery, or insubordination, plunder or violence, animosity or treachery, to prevail during his government, but kept all within the bounds of the law, as was becoming a prince.

END OF THE ANNALS OF THE FOUR MASTERS.

APPENDIX.

As a favourable opportunity did not occur of giving the following important documents, at the periods to which they refer, they are inserted here:

The Bull of Pope Adrian IV. to King Henry II.—An account of this document is given by the various Irish historians, particularly in Mac Geoghegan's Ireland, and Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History. Pope Adrian IV., by name Nicholas Breakspere, was by birth an Englishman; he was a monk of St. Albans, and was elected Pope in 1154, and died in 1159. Being a personal friend of King Henry II., of England, it is said he was influenced to grant him a Bull, conferring on him the sovereignty of Ireland; and it is stated in Hanmer's Chronicle (p. 215), that king Henry sent a monk named John of Salishury, and others, as a deputation to Rome, to solicit this Bull from Adrian, who granted it in the year 1155, at which time Henry meditated an invasion of Ireland. But king Henry postponed this object, and it is stated by Mac Geoghegan, that the empress Matilda, the king's mother, was opposed to the publication of the Bull, and the invasion of Ireland. King Henry came to Ireland in 1171, and returned to England in 1172; and Adrian's grant of Ireland to him, was confirmed by a Bull, or Brief of Pope Alexander III., in 1172, according to Lanigan. Keating states that Adrian's Bull was published at Waterford, in a meeting of bishops and clergy, before this time; and, according to other accounts, the Bull was produced in 1172, by king Henry, at the council of bishops and clergy which he had convened at Cashel; but Lanigan correctly states, that the Bulls of Adrian and Alexander were, for the first time, publicly read at Waterford, in the year 1175, at a meeting of bishops and clergy convened for that purpose, by Nicholas, prior of Wallingford, who had been sent with these documents, from England, accompanied by William Fitz Adelm de Burgo, afterwards lord deputy of Ireland. Thus it appears the Bull of Adrian was kept private, and not published, 'till 20 years after it had been received by king Henry. The Bull of Adrian is represented as a forgery by Mac Geoghegan, and in Camhrens Eversus, these writers being of opinion that it was fabricated to facilitate the conquest of Ireland, by the English; but Lanigan, who is considered the best authority on the subject, maintains that it is an absolutely authentic document. The Bulls of Adrian and Alexander are given in Latin, in the French edition of Mac Geoghegan, and in English, in the edition by Duffy, of Dublin, in which the Bull of Adrian is translated as follows:

"Adrian, bishop and servant of the servants of God, to his most dear son in Christ, the illustrious king of England, greeting, health, and apostolical benediction.

"Thy greatness, as is becoming a Catholic prince, is laudably and successfully employed in thought and intention, to propagate a glorious name upon earth, and lay up in heaven the rewards of a happy eternity, by extending the boundaries of the church, and making known to nations which are uninstructed, and still ignorant of the Christian faith, its truths and doctrine, by rooting up the seeds of vice from the land of the Lord: and to perform this more efficaciously, thou seekest the counsel and protection of the apostolical see, in which undertaking, the more exalted thy design will be, united with prudence, the more propitious, we trust, will be thy progress under a benign Providence, since a happy issue and end are always the result of what has been undertaken from an ardour of faith, and a love of religion.

"It is not indeed to be doubted, that the kingdom of Ireland, and every island upon which Christ the sun of justice hath shone, and which has received the principles of the Christian faith, belong of right to St. Peter, and to the holy Roman church, (which thy majesty likewise admits), from whence we the more fully implant in them the seed of faith, that seed which is acceptable to God, and to which we, after a minute investigation, consider that a conformity should by us be the more rigidly required. Thou, dearest son in Christ, hast likewise signified to us, that for the purpose of subjecting the people of Ireland to laws, and eradicating vice from amongst them, thou art desirous of entering that island; and also of paying for each house an annual tribute of one penny to St. Peter; and of preserving the privileges of its churches, pure and undefiled. We, therefore, with approving and favorable views, commend thy pious and laudable desire, and to aid thy undertaking we give to thy petition our grateful and willing consent, that for the extending the boundaries of the church, the restraining the prevalence of vice, the improvement of morals, the implanting of virtue, and propagation of the Christian religion, thou enter that island, and pursue those things which shall tend to the honour of God and salvation of his people; and that they may receive thee with honour, and revere thee as their lord: the privilege of their churches continuing pure and unrestrained, and the annual tribute of one penny from each house remaining secure to St. Peter, and the holy Roman Church. If thou therefore deem what thou hast projected in mind, possible to be completed, study to instil good morals into that people, and act so that thou thyself, and such persons as thou wilt judge competent from their faith, words, and actions, be instrumental in advancing the honour of the Irish church, propagate and promote religion, and the faith of Christ, to advance thereby the honour of God, and salvation of souls, that thou mayest merit an everlasting reward of happiness hereafter, and establish on earth a name of glory, which shall last for ages to come. Given at Rome, &c. &c. &c."

Letters of King Donal O'Neill, and Pope John XXII.—In the Scotch Chronicle of John of Fordun, which was written in the 14th century, there is given, in Latin, a long letter which was sent by Donald, or Donal O'Neill, king of Ulster, to Pope John XXII., complaining to his Holiness of the excessive tyranny exercised by the English in Ireland. This was the Donal O'Neill, prince of Tyrone, who, at the year 1319, is mentioned by the Four Masters, to have been twice deposed by the power of the English, and whose death, at the year 1325, is recorded in these Annals. O'Neill, and other Irish princes at this time invited over Edward Bruce, brother of the renowned king Robert Bruce, and on his arrival in 1315, with an army of Scots, he was crowned king of Ireland at Dundalk, the Irish princes and chiefs considering he had a fair claim to the crown of this kingdom, as the ancient Scottish kings, and the House of Bruce, were of Milesian descent. This remonstrance, dated from Dungannon, was sent to Rome by O'Neill, in 1316, in the reign of Edward II., as shewn by Lanigan (vol. 4. p. 163), and not in the reign of Edward III., as erroneously stated by Mac Geoghegan and many other writers. There is a passage in the letter, which states that the Milesians came from Spain 3500 years before that time; but this appears to be a mistake of some transcriber, and should be 2,500, or 2,300 years, which was about the period that had elapsed since the arrival of the Milesians in Ireland, to the time of Donal O'Neill. These and other passages have not been correctly translated before, but are rectified, by a literal translation in the present article; it is mentioned in the letter, that Ireland was uninhabited at the arrival of the Milesians, but this must be a mistake, being contrary to the ancient History of Ireland, and may therefore be omitted. It is mentioned in the remonstrance, that the English were not punished for killing any of the Irish, which agrees with the statements of sir John Davis, who says, in his Tracts, that in the eye of the law it was considered no crime to kill a mere Irishman, even in time of peace, the Irish being reputed aliens and enemies. Curry, in his "Civil Wars," confirms this statement, and it appears that a person of English descent was only punished by paying a fine of one mark, or 13s. 4d., for killing any of the mere Irish. Pope John, moved by the remonstrance of O'Neill, and the grievances of the Irish, addressed a letter to king Edward II., exhorting him to check the tyranny exercised against the people of Ireland, in consequence of which, the Pontiff says, they were constrained to throw off Edward's dominion, and appoint another king to rule over them, thus alluding to Edward Bruce. The remonstrance of O'Neill, and the Pope's letter to king Edward, are given in Latin, in the French edition of Mac Geoghegan, and are translated as follows:

Letter of O'Neill.—"To our Most Holy Father the Lord John, by the Grace of God Sovereign Pontiff, we his faithful children in Christ, Donald O'Neill, king of Ulster, and by hereditary right lawful heir to the throne of Ireland; as also the Nobles and great men of this kingdom, with the Irish people, humbly recommend and devoutly cast themselves at his feet," &c.

"From the sharp and venomous calumnies, and false and unjust representations made against us, and the defenders of our rights, by the English, your mind may have been excited against us, a thing to be much deplored, and influenced by such falsehoods and misrepresentations, which you might receive as undoubted truth, you might visit us with your displeasure: We have therefore resolved to inform you of our origin, and the state of our country, if country it can be now called, and of the cruel injuries inflicted on us, and our ancestors, by some of the kings of England, and their iniquitous ministers, and even by the English barons born in Ireland, cruelties inhumanly commenced, and continued to the present time; and our loud cries having reached your ears in these communications, you may proceed to examine, and be enabled to perceive, on which side the complaints are founded in truth; and therefore that, being diligently and fully informed, in such manner as the real state of the matter requires, the severity of your judgment shall fall on the guilty party, and punish the delinquents. Be it therefore known to you, most Holy Father, that from the time when our forefathers, who were Spaniards, namely, the three sons of Milesius, or Micellius, directed by Providence, came with a fleet of 30 ships from Cantabria, a country of Spain on the banks of the river Hiberus (the Ebro), from which we have received our name, into Ibernina, 2,500 years and upwards have elapsed; and descended from them, without any admixture of foreign blood, 136 kings have reigned over the monarchy of Ireland, to the time of king Leogarius, from whom I, the aforesaid Donald, am descended in a direct line. It was in his days that our chief apostle and patron St. Patrick, sent by your predecessor Celestine, through the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, in the year of the Incarnation 435, most efficaciously taught our fathers the truth of the Catholic faith. From the time of his mission, and the reception of the faith under humble obedience to the Church of Rome, 61 kings of the same race, unconnected with any foreign blood, excellently instructed in the faith of Christ, and abounding in works of charity, recognising no superior in temporal matters, have likewise ruled to the year 1170, in uninterrupted succession. And it was these (kings) and not the English, or people of any other nation, who amply endowed the Church of Ireland with lands, extensive possessions, and many privileges, of which lands and privileges it has, by the English in modern times, been damnably despoiled. After our kings for so long a time had strenuously defended by their own valour, against the tyrants and kings of many foreign countries, the inheritance granted them by God, and always preserving their native liberty, at length Pope Adrian your predecessor, an Englishman, not only by birth, but in heart and disposition, in the year of our Lord 1170, from the false and most iniquitous suggestion of Henry, king of England, under, and perhaps by whom, the holy Thomas of Canterbury, in the same year, was put to death, for his uprightness and defence of the Church, did as you know transfer the sovereignty of our kingdom, under some certain form of words, to the said king, whom rather, for the forementioned crime, he should have deprived of his own kingdom. The judgment of the Pontiff being thus, alas! blinded by his English prejudice, regardless of every right, he did thus in fact unworthily confer on him our kingdom, thereby depriving us of our regal honours, and delivered us up, having committed no crime, and without any rational cause, to be torn as with the teeth of the most cruel wild beasts, and such of us as escape from the fangs of those deceitful foxes and ravenous wolves, lacerated and half devoured, only fall with greater misfortune into an abyss of intolerable slavery. From the first time the English came, by virtue of the donation before-mentioned, they, under a certain exterior appearance of piety and religious zeal, nefariously entered the boundaries of our kingdom, and with all their might, and every possible perfidy, endeavoured entirely and radically to extirpate our nation. By foul and fraudulent cunning they prevailed so much against us, that without the authority of any superior, they violently expelled us from our spacious habitations and paternal inheritance, and forced us to fly for refuge to the mountains, woods, marshes, and barren wastes, and even into the caverns of the rocks, and to inhabit them for a long time like wild beasts, for the safety of our lives. Even in these recesses they incessantly attack us, and endeavour by every means to force us from them, and arrogantly usurp every place that affords us an asylum, mendaciously asserting, through the most blind and insolent folly, that we are not entitled to any free place of habitation in Ireland, but that this country entirely and by full right belongs to themselves. From these, and many other the like causes, between us and them have arisen implacable enmities, and perpetual wars; from which have followed mutual massacres, incessant depredations, continued rapine, frauds and perfidy too frequent and detestable; but alas! from the defect of authority, we fail in all power of correction and due reform. From this state of things, the Irish clergy and people have been grievously endangered for many years, not only in transitory and temporal matters, but too frequently, from these misfortunes, is endangered the safety of their souls. We hold it as an undoubted truth, that in consequence of the aforesaid false suggestion, and donation (of Ireland) which followed it, there fell from that time to the present, of both nations, more than fifty thousand men by the sword, besides those destroyed by afflictions, captivity, and famine. These few statements respecting the general origin of our progenitors, and the miserable state in which the Roman pontiff has placed us, suffice for the present time. Know, most holy Father, that Henry King of England, to whom it was granted to enter Ireland in the manner which has been already stated, as also the four kings his successors, have clearly transgressed the limits of the concession made to him by the papal Bull under certain conditions, as from the Bull itself is evidently apparent. For the said Henry promised, as specified in that Bull, that he would extend the boundaries of the Irish Church, preserve its rights whole and undefiled, bring the people under subjection to the laws, and instruct them in good morals, implant virtues and eradicate the roots of vice, and to pay a yearly tribute of one penny from each house (called Peter's pence), to St. Peter the Apostle. As to this promise, he, as well as his aforesaid successors and their iniquitous ministers, the deceitful English, paying no regard to the interests of Ireland, and totally violating the terms of the grant, studiously and intentionally have accomplished the very reverse of all these conditions, for the rights of the church have been so much restricted, contracted, and curtailed by them, that some cathedral churches have been, by open force, robbed of half their lands and possessions, and deprived by them of almost every ecclesiastical privilege. The bishops and prelates are indiscriminately cited, arrested, seized, and incarcerated by the officials of the king of England in Ireland, and having suffered such frequent and grievous injuries of this kind, they are oppressed with such a servile fear, that they have not dared to communicate those grievances to your Holiness; and since they themselves are shamefully silent, we have resolved to say no more on this subject. Besides they (the English), have so instructed the Irish people, whom they undertook to reform in morals, and subject to the laws, that their honest and dove-like simplicity of manners, from intercourse with them, and from their evil example, is wonderfully changed into a serpent-like cunning. They have likewise deprived us of our written laws, under which we had, for the most part, been hitherto governed, and of every other law, except such as could not be wrested from us, instituting, to exterminate our nation, the worst, most infamous, and unjust laws of their own, a few of which, for example sake, are here inserted:

"1st. In the court of the king of England in Ireland, the following laws are strictly observed. It is permitted to every man, who is not Irish, for any action whatever, to go to law with any Irishman, while every Irishman, layman or ecclesiastic, prelates alone excepted, is prohibited from going to law with any Englishman for any cause.

"2nd. If, as it often occurs, any Englishman perfidiously and falsely kills an Irishman, however noble and innocent he may be, whether an ecclesiastic or layman, regular or secular, even were he an Irish prelate, who had been slain, no punishment or correction is inflicted by the said court on such a nefarious murderer; nay, on the contrary, the more worthy and distinguished among his countrymen the person slain has been, so much more the assassin is honoured and rewarded by the English, not only by the common people, but even by the ecclesiastics and English bishops; and chiefly by those persons on whom it is incumbent, by virtue of their office, to inflict due correction and proper punishment on such malefactors.

"3rd. Every Irishwoman, whether noble or otherwise, who is married to any Englishman, is, after the death of her husband, entirely deprived of the third part of his lands and possessions, for that reason alone of her being Irish.

"4th. The English, when they can by violence overcome an Irishman, they by no means permit that the Irish, in such cases, should make any wills, testamentary arrangement, or dispose of their property in any manner, but seize on all their effects, and appropriate them to their own use, thus depriving the church of its rights, and, by their assumed authority, violently reducing a race, free from time immemorial, to the condition of slaves.

"5th. By the common consent of the king of England, as well as of some English bishops, the chief of whom, the archbishop of Armagh, (Roland de Jorse), a man of little prudence and no learning, a certain iniquitous law was lately passed, in the city of St. Kenicus (Kilkenny), in Ireland, in the following absurd form: "It is ordained, that all the religious orders resident in the territory in peaceful possession of the English, be prohibited from receiving into their order, or religious community, any persons but those of the English nation, and if they act otherwise, our lord the king shall arrest all persons, of both parties, who have contemned his command; and the founders and patrons of those institutions, shall have power to seize upon persons of either party, who act in opposition and disobedience to this ordinance. Agreed to by common consent amongst the English throughout Ireland." But even before this statute was enacted, as well as since, the Friars Preachers (Dominicans), the Minors (Franciscans), the Monks (Benedictines and Cistercians), the Canons (Augustinians, &c.) and all the other English religious orders, observed the spirit of it with sufficient strictness, and received only persons of their own country, though the monasteries for Monks and Canons, from which, in modern times, the Irish are excluded by them, were founded for persons of every country. Virtues were to be implanted amongst us, and the seeds of vice eradicated, but they have sown their vices amongst us, and completely obliterated our virtues."

There are some passages of O'Neill's letter not mentioned in Mac Geoghegan, given in Moore's History of Ireland (vol. iii. p. 76), as follows: "From a total dissimilarity, as they allege, between the English and themselves, not only in race and language, but also in every other respect, a dissimilarity greater, they declare, than word or pen can adequately describe, there appeared no longer the slightest hope that they could ever live peaceably together. So great was the lust and pride of governing on the one side, and such the resolution on the other to cast off the intolerable yoke, that as they never yet had been, so never in this life would there be peace or truce between the nations. That they themselves had already sent letters to the king and council, through the hands of John Hotham, now bishop of Ely, representing the wrongs and outrages they had so long suffered from the English, and proposing a settlement by which all such lands as were known to be rightfully theirs, should be secured in future to them, by direct tenure from the crown, or even agreeing, in order to save the further effusion of blood, to submit to any friendly plan proposed, by the king himself, for fair division of the lands between them and their adversaries. To this proposition, forwarded to England two years before, no answer had been returned, wherefore, they say, "let no one feel surprised if we now endeavour to work out our own deliverance, and defend as we can our rights and liberties against the harsh and cruel tyrants who would destroy them." In conclusion, they announce to the Pope, "that, for the speedy and more effectual attainment of their object, they have called to their aid the illustrious earl of Carrick, Edward de Bruce, a lord descended from the same ancestors as themselves, and have made over to him, by Letters Patent, all the rights which they themselves, as lawful heirs of the kingdom, respectively possess, thereby constituting him king and lord of Ireland."

Letter of Pope John.—"John the bishop, servant of the servants of God, to his most dear son in Christ, Edward, the illustrious king of England, health and eternal benediction:

"Our unceasing entreaties to you, dearest son, to maintain peace in your kingdom, justice in your decisions, the blessings of tranquility amongst your subjects, and lastly, to omit nothing which can contribute to your happiness and glory, proceed from the paternal solicitude which we bear towards your majesty: you ought, therefore, to devote yourself altogether to these objects, and prove yourself eager and willing to promote them. We have a long time since received from the princes and people of Ireland, letters addressed to our well beloved Anselmus, priest of the chapel of SS. Marcellus and Peter, to Lucas, dean of St. Mary, to the cardinals and nuncios of the holy see, and through them, letters enveloped with their own, addressed to us. These we have read, and among other things which they contain, have particularly noted, that our predecessor, pope Adrian, of happy memory, hath given to your illustrious progenitor, Henry II, king of England, the kingdom of Ireland, as specified in his apostolical letters to him. To the object of these letters neither Henry nor his successors have paid regard, but passing the bounds that were prescribed to them, have, without cause or provocation, heaped upon the Irish the most unheard of miseries and persecution, and have, during a long period, imposed upon them a yoke of slavery which cannot be borne. None have dared to stem the persecutions which have been practised against the Irish, nor has any person been found willing to remedy the cause of them: not one, I say, has been moved, through a holy compassion for their sufferings, although frequent appeals have been made to your goodness in their behalf, and the strong cries of the oppressed have reached the ears of your majesty. Thus no longer able to endure such tyranny, the unhappy Irish have been constrained to withdraw themselves from your dominion, and to seek another to rule over them in your stead. If these things be founded in truth, they are in direct opposition to our regards and consideration for your felicity. Our advice is, therefore, that your majesty will not lose sight of this important matter, and that you will carry into speedy effect the commands of your Creator, in order to avoid that which must draw down the vengeance of God upon you. The groans and sorrows of the afflicted have been heard by the Omnipotent, who can, as the holy Scriptures attest, change and transfer kingdoms to others, as he has abandoned his chosen people in punishment for the crimes they had committed. Our most ardent wish is, that your majesty omit nothing, particularly during these revolutions, to conciliate by your goodness the hearts of the faithful Irish, and avoid every thing that can tend to estrange them, from you. As it is, therefore, important to your interest to obviate the misfortunes which these troubles are capable of producing; they should not be neglected in the beginning, lest the evil increase by degrees, and the necessary remedies be applied too late: and having considered the matter maturely, we herein exhort your majesty, that you remove the cause of these misfortunes, and arrest, by honourable measures, their cause and consequences, that you may render him from whom you hold your crown, propitious to your views and government; and that by fulfilling the duties of lord and master you may afford no subject for complaint, by which means the Irish, guided by a wise administration, may obey you as lord of Ireland; or if they, (which heaven forbid), continue in rebellion which they describe before God and man to be innocent, that rebellion may be deemed unjust. In order, therefore, that your majesty may become acquainted with the grievances of the Irish people, we send to you, enclosed, the letters they have sent to the above named cardinals, with a copy of the Bull which our predecessor Adrian, of happy memory, hath sent to the illustrious Henry, king of England, concerning the act of conferring on him the kingdom of Ireland. Given," &c.

E R R A T A .

At A. D. 1171, p. 5, note 26, instead of "baronies of Burren and Corcomroe, in Galway," read "baronies of Burren and Corcomroe, in Clare."

At A. D. 1174, p. 9, in the account of the battle of Thurles, instead of "seven hundred of the English were slain," read, "seventeen hundred of the English were slain."

At A. D. 1178, p. 12, second column, seven lines from the bottom, after the words, "four hundred and fifty" omit the note of admiration.

At A. D. 1197, p. 26, instead of "O'Flaherty, tanist of Tir-owen," read "O'Laverty," as also at p. 38, and other places where O'Flaherty of Tyrone is mentioned.

At A. D. 1215, p. 37, on "Teige Mac Eitigen, a chief of Clan Dermot," read, "a chief of Clan Dermot, now Clondermot, near Derry."

At A. D. 1233, note 3, p. 55, in reference to Caislean-na-Cailighe, which was situated in Lough Mask, county of Mayo, for "Hog's Castle" read "Hag's Castle."

At A. D. 1302, p. 104, note 1, read "Miles, bishop of Limerick, was probably Gerald de Mareschal, mentioned by Ware, and appears to have been of the family of le Mareschal, lords of Leinster."

At A. D. 1318, p. 112, note 3, instead of "battle of Foghard, near Dundalk, was fought on the 28th of May, A. D. 1318," read "was fought on St. Calixtus's Day, namely, Saturday, the 14th of October, A. D. 1318."—See p. 559.

At A. D. 1400, p. 194, note 1, instead of "Thomas Butler, prior of Kilmainham, son of the duke of Ormond," read "son of the earl of Ormond."

At A. D. 1432, p. 237, and at A. D. 1453, p. 261, on the Mac Mahons of Monaghan, instead of "Lurgan-Green, in the county of Louth," read "Lurgan, near Carrickmacross."

At A. D. 1450, p. 258, line 18, col. 1, after "surprise," add "at Gabhail Liun (now Galloon, in Fermanagh.)"

At A. D. 1460, p. 266, instead of "Bregia was the name applied to the immense plain comprising the present counties of Meath and Dublin," read "Bregia was the name applied to the immense plain comprising the greater part of the present counties of Meath and Dublin."

At A. D. 1490, p. 324, instead of "killed by a harper of Ulster," read "by a mariner of Ulster."

At A. D. 1503, p. 349, after Musery Caire, instead of "Muiserith Tire, in Ormond," read "now the barony of Clanwilliam, in Tipperary."

At A. D. 1583, p. 530, note 1, instead of "Hibernicis ipsis Hiberniores," read "Hibernis ipsis Hiberniores."

At A. D. 1608, p. 719, it is mentioned that Maguire died at Geneva in Italy; the word in the Irish is Genua, which may signify either Geneva, or Genoa, in Italy.

Some other typographical errors, and mistakes in punctuation, may be occasionally discovered, a thing unavoidable in all publications, and which the reader is requested to correct.

INDEX.

A.

ABBEYS, monasteries, &c. 406 to 408.—
See articles on the various Abbeys.

Abbeylara, 323.

Abbeyleix, abbots of, &c. 256.

Abbots, deans, archdeacons, erenachs, &c.
See articles on the various Abbeys.

Achonry, bishops of, &c. 38, 46, 49, 59, 83,
84, 85, 102, 108, 137, 187, 189, 209,
239, 246.

Achalethderg, 2.

Adare, abbey of, &c. 227, 349.

Aicme Enda, 7.

Aileach, 49, 294, 296, 437 to 439.

Aircinneachs, 13, 27.

Airgiod Ross, 219, 245.

Airtheara, 25.

Alfred, king of England, 441.

Almain or Allen, 221, 223, 299, 317.

Anglo-Normans, 464, 536 to 540, 557, 558.

See English Families.

Annals.—See Books.

Annally or Longford, chiefs and clans of, 9, 607, 608.

Aradh Cliach, 200.

Aran Islands, 406, 407, 452.

Archers, 191, 222, 570, 651, and other places.

Architecture.—See accounts of Cyclopean fortresses, raths, cities, towns, abbeys, churches, and castles.

Ardagh, bishops, abbots of, &c. 9, 12, 37,
40, 49, 59, 94, 113, 136, 157, 161, 164,
187, 215, 230, 253, 291, 356, 364, 410.

Ardcarne, abbey of, &c. 40, 43, 61, 62, 65.
Ardes, 293.

Ardfert and Aghadoe, bishops of, &c. 14, 70, 181, 536.

Ardfinnan, 17.

Ardglass, 261.

Ard Miodhair, 28.

Ardnaree, 561.

Ardsrath, bishops, abbots of, &c. 13, 14,
27, 51, 186, 598.

Armagh city, archbishops of, &c. 3, 5, 7, 8,
10, 13, 15, 16, 17, 19, 21, 25, 28, 29, 38,
61, 64, 67, 69, 71, 73, 80, 81, 82, 84, 85,
86, 87, 96, 103, 137, 140, 148, 170, 186,
258, 263, 307, 360, 375, 412 to 415, 441,
443, 453, 584, 588, 605.

Arms, armour, &c., ancient, 191, 220, 266
to 270, 309-336, 374, 413, 457, 458, 465, 484, 512, 570, 581, 597, 651, 652,
660, 661.—See Fire-arms.

Artagh, 28.

Askeaton, abbey of, &c. 227.

Ath-ai, 426.

Ath-an-urchair, or Aghalurcher, 23, 256,
298, 303, 347.

Ath-Cliaith.—See Dublin.

Ath-Crochda, or Shannon Harhour, 85.

Ath-da-la-arg, 8, 26.

Ath-Firdia, or Ardee, 260, 413.

Atberury, 67.

Athleague, 39.

Athleathan, abbey of, &c. 70, 165.

Athlone, town, abbey of, &c. 35, 40, 43,
61, 64, 70, 73, 84, 86 to 106, 262, 263,
428, 432, 541, 591.

Ath-Seanaigh, 64.

Attacotts, or Aitheach Tuath, 74, 345, 393.

B.

Backs, 15.

Balla, 14.

Ballymote, 104, 110, 592, 628, 641.

Ballysadare, 19.

Ballyshannon, 34, 64, 65, 142, 230, 240,
298, 333, 378, 577, 617, 707.

Bangor, abbey of, &c. 35.

Banners and standards, 122, 149, 220, 458,
512, 661.

Bantry, abbey of, 112.

Bards and Historians, 8, 17, 18, 19, 36, 40,
52, 53, 62, 76, 78, 85, 86, 88, 89, 91, 94,
100, 108, 121, 130, 131, 133, 134, 136,
137, 139, 141, 142, 144, 147, 148, 150,
155, 161, 162, 163, 164, 167, 168, 169,
170, 174, 177, 182, 183, 184, 186, 187,
190, 193, 204, 205, 206, 207, 210, 211,
214, 215, 220, 223, 228, 230, 232, 234,
236, 237, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244,
255, 257, 258, 259, 260, 265, 274, 277,
278, 281, 288, 291, 294 to 299, 301, 303,
309, 310, 312, 324, 326, 327, 331, 336,
348, 355, 356, 359, 361, 365, 366, 373,
375, 376, 384, 386, 389, 397, 398, 400,
419, 422, 425, 427, 431, 436, 455, 459, to 462, 483, 490, 492, 497, 502, 514 to 516, 521, 527, 528, 535, 546, 554, 567,
578 to 585, 592, 615, 706, 716, 720.

Barnwalls, 320, and other places.

Barretts, 92, 206, 212 to 234, 241, 244,
310 to 493.

Barrys of Cork, 180 to 228, to 308, 347,
356 to 517 to 664.

Battles—of Achalethderg, 2; to 4, to 9, of Thurles, and 197; 11 to 14, to 19, of the Curlew Mountains; 20 to 52, of Muine
Brocaim, and 487; to 56, to 64, of Bal-lyshannon; to 66 to 71, of Moysleacht; to 73, of Credrain; to 80, of Down-patrick; to 92, to 95, to 97, of Moy Tuire; to 107, 109, to 110, of Atherry;

of Foghard, 111; to 116, of Ardnorcher, to 117, to 124, of Magh Cruimbe; to 147, of Moylena, and 196, 245; to 149, of Moinmore; to 173, of Ventry, and of Dundalk; to 187, in Wicklow; to 188, of Cinneitigh; to 192, to 196, 486, of Roscrea; to 213, of Killucan; to 216, to 221, 246, in Leinster; to 222, of Glenmama, 510, Delgany, and Odhha; to 234, to 240, to 261, 265, to 267, of Gaura; to 290, to 329, of Benhoirche; to 334, to 345, of Moybolg; to 351 of Knocktow; to 370, to 379, to 401, to 409, of Ballyhoe; to 413, 414, to 430, to 435, to 436, of Knockingen; to 439, of Moyrath; to 440, to 449, of Cula Dreimhne; to 465, to 469, to 481, at Dublin; to 483, of Brunanburgh; to 485, to 487, to 501, to 505, of Glenmalure; to 508, of Sulcoid; to 509, of Tara and of Dublin; to 511, to 516, of Clontarf; to 533 to 534, of Moycoha; to 535, of Dublin and Meath; to 544, to 559, to 561, to 588, to 590, of the Ford of the Biscuits; to 594, of Clontibret; to 598, of Kilelooney; to 612, of Armagh and Mullaghbrack;
to 616, of Drumfiuch; to 619, of Ballyshannon; to 621, of Tyrrell's Pass; to 627, of the Yellow Ford; to 630, of Benhurh; to 649, battles in Munster and Leinster; to 649, of the Pass of Plumes;
664, Askeaton; to 651 to 653, of the Curlew Mountains; to 679 to 681, of Moyry Pass, Carlingford, &c.; 661 to 696; siege and battle of Kinsale, to 700,
704; siege of Dunhoy, to 712, 718.

Battle-cries, 149, 193, 512, 661.

Bealach Buighe, 370.

Bealach Conglais, near the Bay of Cork,
171, 452, 488.

Bealach Mughna (Ballymoon), or Moy
Ailbe, 196.

Bel-atha-Conaill, or Ballyconnell, 284, 290.
Belfast, 291, 370, 433.

Belgians.—See Firbolg.

Bells, 141, 231.—See Relics.

Benboirche, 328.

Berminghams, 3 to 91, 94, 96, 104 to 116, to 136, to 163, to 280, to 288.

Biatachs, and Houses of hospitality, 43, 53,
61, 69, 83, 89, 92, 95, 96, 103, 106, 115,
121, 135, 140, 149, 154, 160, 163 to 167,
170, 171, 186, 190 to 194, to 205, 212,
216, 228, 232 to 236, 241, 253 to 258,
261, 267, 280, 282, 289, 301 to 307, 325
to 331, to 336, 347 to 351, 353 to 356, 360 to 366, 373 to 378, 382, 387, 394 to

- 399, 403, 407, 413, 419, 431, 441, 462, 478, 492, 497, 502, 523, 528, 546, 560, 568, 574, 598, 639, 719, 720.
- Binn Eadair, or Bhowth, 266.
- Bishops and bishops' sees.—See the articles on the various cities and sees, as Armagh, &c.
- Bogs and ancient Forests, 337.
- Books, Annals, and Histories—of Cavan, 76; of Leacan and Ballymote, 101; of Connaught, 133; of Ily Maine, Leabhar Breac, of Boyle, of Kilronan, and of Fenagh, 134; Book of Rights, 148, 582; of Dinseanchus, 154, 583; of Inisfallen, Munster, Fermoy, O'Heerin's Topography, and O'Sullivan Beare, 181; Book of Lismore, 204; Psalter of Cashel, 204, 297; Keating's Ireland and Cormac's Glossary, 204; Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History, 205; Leabhar Gearr, 215, 284; Leabhar-na-Fluidhre, 284; Psalter of Tara, 295, 297, 582; Annals of Ulster, 336; Book of Bhowth, 536, 585; Books of Prophecies, 582, 699; of Kells and Armagh, 582; Annals of Tigearnach, Chronicon Scotorum, Annals of Ulster, Book of Invasions or Conquests, Book of Orgiall, of Clonmacnois, and Colgan's Lives of Saints, 583; Jus Armacanum, Irish Catechisms, Mac Geoghagan, Taaffe, Curry, Stuart, and other Histories, 584, 585; Archdall's Monasticon, and Hibernia Dominicana, 585, 586; Books of Leinster and Glendalough, 585; Rerum Hib. Scriptores, 585.
- Boyle, abbey of, &c., 8, 25, 26, 43, 48, 49, 59, 60, 63, 83, 91, 103, 104, 120, 134, 137, 167, 189, 244, 658.
- Brass Money, 426, 683.
- Bredach, 15.
- Breaghmuine, 7.
- Breasal Macha, 3.
- Brefney, or counties of Cavan and Leitrim, chiefs and clans of, 75 to 78, 606 to 608.
- Brefney O'Rourke, 3, 75.
- Brefney O'Reilly, 59, 60, 67, 75.
- Bregia, 6, 266, see Moy Liffey.
- Brehons and Law Professors, 5, 38, 100, 107, 110, 111, 113, 115, 117, 130, 145, 146, 155, 164, 165, 183, 174, 177, 192, 207, 210, 216, 223, 229, 235, 241, 242, 243, 253, 256, 288, 289, 298, 303, 310, 327, 331, 355, 381, 384, 389, 492, 498, 578, to 581 to 635 to 640.
- Brian Boru, 147, 148, 220, 508 to 516.
- Brigantes, 6, 124, 172, 218, 266, 366, 388.
- Brogia, 7.
- Brugh Boine, 123.
- Bruce's Invasion of Ireland, 109 to 112, 558.
- Bruighin-da-Choga, 214.
- Buckingham, Duke of, Rer. Hib. Scriptores, &c. 585.
- Buddhism, 362, 379.
- Bull of Pope Adrian, and Letters of king Donal O'Neill and Pope John XXII. 721 to 723.
- Bundroos, 227, 230, 281, 340, 378.
- Burkes of Connaught, 28, 29, 30 to 56 to 82 to 93, 94, 101 to 118 132 to 154 to 194 to 235 to 243 to 281 to 305 to 349 to 378 to 423 to 476 to 523 to 546 to 560 to 596 to 610 to 623 to 685.
- Butlers, 104, 202, 204, to 207, 231 to 252 to 260, to 275 to 425 to 474 to 503 to 600, 651 to 667.
- Buttevant, 69.
- C.
- Cabhan-na-gCranard, 19.
- Cahir, 518, 600, 649.
- Cahirians, 220, 224.
- Cairbre Aodhbha, 152.
- Cairbre Gabhra, 7.
- Cairbre of Drumcliff, 9, 18.
- Caislean-UI-Chonaing or Castle Connell, 10, 29, 81.
- Calatrom or Galtrim, 11.
- Caledonians, 345, 367, 391.
- Calry of Leitrim, 77.
- Calry of the Shannon in W. Meath, 7, 13, 19, 249.
- Camel or dromedary, 287.
- Canma, 52.
- Cannons—See Fire-arms.
- Cantabrians, 365, 722.
- Carberry in Cork, 172.
- Carews, 440.
- Carns, 123, 272, 339.
- Carn Feradaigh, 146, 151.
- Carn Fraoich, 43, 160, 209, 274, 278.
- Carn Siadhaill, 60.
- Carraigh Eacharadh, 23.
- Carraig Brachaidhe, 27.
- Carrickfergus, castle, abbey of, &c. 168, 333, 350, 622.
- Carrigafoyle, 504.
- Cashel, city, archbishops of, &c. 14, 15, 37, 71, 104, 195, 196, 198, 203, 431, 555, 601.
- Castleknock, 8.
- Castlemain, 480.
- Castles.—See accounts of the various towns and cities.
- Cathach of Columkille, 334, 346, 470, 636
- Cauci, 219, 313.
- Cauldron, 208, 220.
- Cavan, town, abbey of, &c., 117, 258, 282, 301, 325, 332, 348, 359, 360, 418, 492, 591.
- Ceann Clair, castle of, 37.
- Ceann Maghair, 274.
- Celtiberians, 365, 393.
- Celts, 123, 272, 363, 368, 369, 580.
- Cemeteries, ancient, 122, 252, 273, 296.
- Chariots, ancient, 220, 266.
- Chiefs, titles, and rank of, 579, 580.—See Peerages.
- Churches.—See abbeys, cities, towns, &c.
- Ciarraidhe Luachra, 477.
- Cimbri and Britons, 366.
- Claengalaia, 152.
- Clan Breasail, 3, 22, 131.
- Clan Cahil, 16, 53, 128, 177.
- Clan Colla, 2, 417, 602, 603.
- Clan Colman, 6, 284, 292, 314, 442.
- Clan Conary, 178.
- Clan Conchubhair or Conor, 24, 28, 128.
- Clan Conway, 128.
- Clan Cuan, 18, 19, 127.
- Clan Cuilein, 151.
- Clan Diarmada, 11, 12, 26, 29.
- Clan Donal, 38.
- Clane, abbey of, &c. 74.
- Clan Fergus, 416.
- Clan Fermaighe, 38.
- Clan Kian, 147, 149, 195.
- Clan Maoilroona, 63.
- Clan Maoilughra, 24.
- Clan Murchada, 24, 46.
- Clanna Baoisgne, 221, 366.
- Clanna Breogain, 61, 124, 218, 362—See Brigantes.
- Clannaboy, North and South, 21—See O'Neills of Clannaboy.
- Clanna Dalaigh, 441.
- Clanna Deagha, 146—See Degadians.
- Clanna Lugaid, 172.
- Clanna Moirne, 221, 267, 345.
- Clanna Rory, 2, 3, 124, 150—See Irians.
- Clanrickard, 132.
- Clan Snedgile, 26.
- Clare, de, 90, 108.
- Clui Mail, 477.
- Cloch Angeoire (anchorite cell), 304.
- Clogher, bishops of, &c., 3, 15, 18, 38, 79, 86, 94, 132, 135, 138, 140, 148, 157, 159, 183, 185, 186, 213, 230, 235, 236, 244, 256, 257, 264, 279, 286, 300, 303, 307, 309, 347, 350, 355, 356, 357, 373, 375.
- Cloiteachs, 1, 60, 432.
- Clonard, bishops, abbots of, &c., 1, 7, 29.
- Clones, abbey, &c., 3, 35, 64, 72, 140, 185, 240, 307, 348, 350, 354.
- Clonfert, bishops of, &c., 1, 14, 17, 18, 24, 30, 64, 78, 83, 85, 103, 112, 133, 140, 163, 356, 503.
- Clonmacnois, city, bishops and abbots, 5, 7, 9, 13, 14, 15, 18, 23, 27, 28, 31, 36, 38, 49, 70, 90, 120, 126, 227, 252, 356, 398, 410, 428, 432, 556.
- Clontarf, battle of, 510 to 516.
- Cloyne, bishops, &c., 13, 113, 180, 347.
- Cnoc Cairbre, 15.
- Cnoc Nascaín, 26.
- Cnoc-na-Seangan, 15.
- Cnoc Raffan, 24.
- Cnodhba, 7.
- Cnucha, battle of, 221.
- Coarbs, 1, 13—See Abbeys.
- Coinage, ancient, 70, 76, 318, 402, 425, 426, 427, 544, 683.
- Coirsliaibh, 19.
- Coleraine, 2, 36.
- Colgan's Lives of Saints, 583.
- Colleges and schools, 582, 640—See an account of the various abbeys, bishops' sees, cities, &c.
- Colonies, ancient, 609, 610.
- Comar, 7.
- Combats, single, 522, 595.
- Comet, 496.
- Conall Cearnach, 284, 413.
- Concani, 173.
- Concovar Mac Neasa, 412 to 416.
- Confiscations, 531, 718—See county histories.
- Cong abbey, 27, 39, 46, 47, 63, 65, 101.
- Conmaicne, 5, 9, 18, 56.
- Conmaicne Mara or Connemara, 66, 129.
- Conmaicne of Moyrein, 62, 227.
- Connallians—See Tir Connallians.
- Connaught, North, or counties of Sligo and Mayo, 97 to 100.
- South, or counties of Galway and Roscommon, 121 to 133.
- Connell abbey, 31.
- Connello, 152.
- Conry Mac Daire, 147.
- Contae Riavach, 225.
- Contention of the Bards, 51, 578.
- Conventions or national assemblies of Dromceat, 51, 439—246, 550; of Tara, 297; of Tailtean, 298; of Uisneach, 298; at Athboy, 298; at Dundalk, 602 to 609.
- Corca Adhairn, 7.
- Corcabaicín, 153.
- Corca Duibhne, 178.
- Corcaduín, 7.
- Corca Luighe, 172.

Corca Muiceadha, 152.
 Corcaraidhe, 7.
 Corcomroe, 4, 103.
 Coritani, 173.
 Coriundi, 173, 194, 393.
 Cork city, bishops of, &c., 5, 6, 9, 48, 104, 180, 233, 449, 468, 492, 500, 543.
 Cormac, king of Ireland, 292 to 296.
 Cormac Mac Cullenan, 196.
 Corran, 66, 67.
 Councils—See Synods.
 Counties, history and topography of—
 Antrim, 20, 21, 412 to 417, 436 to 441, 557, 558, 601 to 610.
 Armagh, 2, 412 to 417, 441, 601 to 610, 686.
 Carlow, 217 to 226.
 Cavan, 75 to 78, 337, 442, 601 to 610, 686.
 Clare, 90, 146 to 156, 552.
 Cork, 170 to 182, 529 to 531.
 Derry, 49 to 51, 436 to 441, 601 to 610.
 Donegal, 51 to 53, 437 to 442, 601 to 610.
 Down, 20, 21, 412 to 417, 436 to 441, 534, 557, 558, 601 to 610.
 Dublin, 266 to 273, 292 to 299, 313 to 321, 481 to 487, 508 to 516, 532 to 544.
 Fermanagh, 29, 78, 79, 601 to 610, 633 to 640.
 Galway, 121 to 132.
 Kerry, 170 to 182, 529 to 531.
 Kildare, 245 to 252, 266 to 273, 292 to 299, 313 to 321.
 Kilkenny, 245 to 252.
 King's, 7, 245 to 252.
 Leitrim, 75 to 78.
 Limerick, 146 to 156, 529 to 531.
 Longford, 9, 607, 608.
 Louth, 2, 412 to 417, 558, 601 to 610.
 Mayo, 97 to 101.
 Meath, 6, 8, 206 to 273, 292 to 299, 313 to 321, 345, 442, 481 to 487, 508 to 516, 532 to 544.
 Monaghan, 3, 412 to 417, 557, 558, 601 to 610.
 Queen's, 245 to 252.
 Roscommon, 121 to 132.
 Sligo, 97 to 101, 608.
 Tipperary, 194 to 205.
 Tyrone, 49 to 51, 436 to 441, 601 to 610.
 Waterford, 194 to 205.
 Westmeath, 7, 8, 314 to 315, 442.
 Wexford, 217 to 226.
 Wicklow, 217 to 226, 510, 532.
 Courcy de John, &c., 3, 11, 12, 19, 21, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 61, 557, 558.
 Cranoges, 65, 241, 263, 297, 346, 370, 382, 418, 451, 684.
 Craoibh (Creve), 23.
 Cricb-na-gCeadach, 7.
 Crom Cruach, 75.
 Cromleacs, 75, 172, 271.
 Crosses, ancient, 252, 340, 419.
 Crowns, 122—See Ornaments.
 Croziers, 40, 54, 195, 407.
 Cruachan, 122, 186.
 Cruachan O'Cuiprain, 7, 284.
 Cruach Patrick, 345.
 Chailgne, 2, 412.
 Cualann, 217, 317—See Ily Kinsellagh.

Cuan O'Lochain, 295, 554.
 Cuchulain, 297, 413.
 Cuirene, 3, 7.
 Cuireach Liffey, 55.
 Cul-an-Tuaiscirt, 2.
 Culdees, 28, 300, 407, 688.
 Cups, goblets, &c., ancient, 22, 26, 220, 638.
 Curlew mountains, 19, 57, 59, 61, 188, 334, 346, 370, 380, 651, 653.
 Curragh of Kildare, 266, 317.
 Cusacks, 92, 93, 433, 478, 621, 642, 643.
 Cyclopean fortresses, 49, 123, 147, 172, 341, 345, 368, 392, 438.

D.

 Dalaradia, Ulidia and Dalrieda, or the counties of Down and Antrim, with their chiefs and clans, 2, 19 to 22, 416, 417, 604, 605.
 Dalaradians, 416.
 Dal Buine, 10.
 Dalcassians, 147, 149, 150, 172, 173, 195, 268.
 Dal Fiatachs, 2, 20, 417.
 Dal Mesincorb, 220.
 Dalrieda, 15, 21.
 Dalriedians, 146, 150, 152, 415.
 D'Altons, 8, 116, 161, 164, 170, 190, 209, 214, 261, to 280, to 423.
 Damnonians, 97, 343.
 Danes, invasions, battles, &c. of, 4, 147, 148, 172, 173, 174, 195, 196, 219, 222, 266, 270, 313, 315, 457, to 469, 481 to 488, 508 to 516, 532 to 544, 609.
 Conversion of, 487, 532.
 Danish kings of Dublin, 541 to 544.
 Danish families, 180, 543.
 Danish bishops, 543.
 Dartry in Monaghan, 3, 237.
 Dartry in Leitrim, 48, 60.
 Dathi king of Ireland, 122, 608.
 Dealbhna Beag, 7.
 Dealbhna Eathra, 7, 10, 13, 28.
 Dealbhna Iarthar, 7.
 Dealbhna Mor, 7.
 Dearg Bruach, 26.
 Dearvorgail, wife of O'Rourke, 1, 24, 75.
 Degadians, 146, 150, 152, 172, 195, 268, 415.
 Deisgeart Breagh, 1, 7.
 Depredations and Famine, 713.—See Famines.
 Derry, city, abbey, bishops, &c. 6, 9, 14, 16, 21, 23, 26, 27, 30, 31, 32, 39, 49, 51, 54, 68, 90, 91, 92, 96, 112, 288, 304, 346, 376, 403, 431, 622, 685, 709, 716, 718.
 Desies, 194.—See Ormond.
 Desmond, or the counties of Cork and Kerry, their chiefs and clans, 170, 182, 446, 610.
 Earls of, 3, 6, 9, 18, 72, 80, 190, 235, 285, 309, 347, 446, 452, 490, 503, 528 to 531.—See Fitzgeralds.
 Devenish abbey, &c. 78, 79, 80, 120, 164, 183, 258, 275, 313, 353, 354, 377, 404.
 Dictionaries, Irish, 155, 584.
 Dillons, 8, 101 to 324, 360.
 Dingle, 499, 505.
 Dinnrigh, 217, 223.
 Donegal, town, abbey, &c. 288, 302 to 353, 366 to 376 to 388, 392 to 455 to 521, 577 to 622 to 679 to 688.
 Downpatrick, 96, 385, 417, 558, 605.
 Down and Connor, bishops of, &c. 8, 9, 21, 22, 103, 720.

Drogheda, 191, 608, and other places.
 Dromahaire abbey, &c. 356, 357, 360, 400, 715.
 Dromceat, 51.—See Conventions.
 Drom Mochuda, 53.
 Droughts, remarkable, 69, 260, 491.
 Druidism and mythology, 75, 271, 272, 292, 293, 361, 392, 417, 458, 582, 585.
 Druim Tuama, 26.
 Drumcliff, abbey, &c. 18, 69, 70, 102, 117, 144, 215, 230, 349.
 Drum Holm, 63.
 Drumlane, abbey, &c. 64, 72, 82, 109, 118, 131, 137, 158, 159, 160, 208, 217, 304, 323, 362.
 Dublin, city, castle, archbishops, &c. 1 to 4 to 11, 14, 29 to 93, 191, 212, 223, 231, 236, 261, 267, 313, 321, 327, 384, 392, 422, 424, 429, 431, 432, 455, 462, 467, to 469, 481 to 488, 493, 509 to 516, 532 to 544, 547, 562, 563, 572, 575, 591, 614, 680, 696, 712.
 Duhallow, 74, 308, 348.
 Duleek, 4.
 Dun Aongus, 123, 345.
 Dunbo, 15.
 Duncarberry, 409.
 Dun-da-leathglass, 11.
 Dundalk, 191, 234, 254, 303.
 Dun Forgais, 296, 468.
 Dungannon, 235, 336, 352, 354, 355, 375, 397, 576.
 Dun Laoghaire or Dunleary, 267.
 Dunleoda, 22.
 Dunlo castle, 478.
 Dunluce, 372.
 Dunnalong, 475, 673, 675.
 Dun-na-Sciath, 296, 314.
 Dunsobairce or Dunseverick, 22, 412.
 Durrow abbey, &c. 17, 18, 23.
 Dysart Kelly, 14.

E.

Earls, Irish, created, 421.—Of Kildare and Desmond, 528 to 531.
 Eanach Duin, or Enaghduine, bishops, abbots, &c., 13, 29, 60, 61, 68, 71, 115, 133.
 Earthquake, 559.
 Eas Craoibhe, 26.
 Eas Dara, 19.
 Easroe abbey, &c., 16, 51, 64, 103, 112, 189, 229, 230, 257, 340, 348, 376, 412, 431, 546, 617, 622.
 Eblanians, 313.
 Eisgir Riada, 267.
 Elk, the Irish, 338.
 Elphin, bishops, &c., 8, 24, 37, 49, 52, 57, 64, 66, 70, 71, 73, 80, 82, 84, 93, 94, 102, 104, 106, 108, 114, 132, 136, 140, 144, 204, 206, 253, 276, 280, 308, 310, 356, 391.
 Ely O'Carroll, 1, 111, 198, 396.
 Ely O'Fogarty, 200.
 Emania, 412 to 415.
 Emly, bishops, abbots, &c., 68, 196, 203.
 English families, nobility, &c., in Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh, 3, 603; Meath and Westmeath, 8, 314 to 320; Longford, 9; Down and Antrim, 21, 22, 605; Tyrone, 50, 51; Derry, 51; Donegal, 53; Cavan and Leitrim, 78; Fermanagh, 79; Mayo and Sligo, 101; Galway and Roscommon, 132; Clare and Limerick, 154, 155; Cork and Kerry, 179 to 180; Tipperary and Waterford, 202; Wexford,

- 219; Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow, 225, 226, Kilkenny, King's, and Queen's counties, and Kildare, 250 to 252; Dublin and Kildare, 314 to 320.
 Ennis abbey, &c., 66, 410, 475, 496, 498, 551, 691.
 Enniscorthy, abbey, &c., 266, 474.
 Enniskillen, 248, 349, 356, 418, 590, 707.
 Entertainments, public, 140, 238, 258, 413.
 Erenachs, 13—See Abbays, &c.
 Erics and ransoms, 63, 87, 91, 149, 193, 211, 212, 213, 233, 235, 259, 310, 315, 343, 348, 421, 435, 532, 555, 568, 580, 581, 684 to 640.
 Erneans and Ernans, 75, 146, 343, 393, 415.
 Errew abbey, 206.
 Essex, earl of, his expedition to Munster, 648, 649; his conference with O'Neill, 655.
 Eugenians of Munster, 147, 149, 172, 173, 195.
 Eugenians of Ulster, 292, 437 to 441, 601.
 Evil eye, 459.
 Exeter de, or Mac Jordan, 93, 101, 108, 109, 110, 165 to 185 to 234.
 Expenditure and number slain in the war of Elizabeth, 661, 662.
- F.
- Fagan or O'Fagan, 8, 316.
 Fairyism, 262, 379, 459.
 Fanines, 48, 112, 238, 335, 425, 525, 710, 713, 714.
 Fanat, 17, 18.
 Farney or Fearnmuighe, 608.
 Fearbile, 7.
 Feara-muighe-feine or Fermoy, 172.
 Feara Rois, 3.
 Fearsads, 401, 489.
 Fearta, 13.
 Fenagh, abbey, &c., 63, 75, 118, 163, 233, 256, 264, 290, 307, 335, 490.
 Fenians, 221, 267 to 270, 290, 413.
 Fercall, 1.
 Ferdroma, 11, 19.
 Fermaagh, chiefs and clans of, 29, 78, 79, 601 to 610, 633 to 640.
 Ferns, city, bishops, &c., 1, 16, 39, 218, 223, 226.
 Fertullagh, 7.
 Finne, 117.
 Fingall and Fingallians, 217, 266, 277, 313, 464.
 Fionn Fochla, 7.
 Fionn Mac Cumhaill, 267.
 Firbolg or Belgians, 75, 78, 97, 121, 124, 145, 171, 194, 217, 219, 292, 343 to 345, 367.
 Fir Dominians, 97, 121, 217, 343.
 Fire-arms and cannon, 309, 374, 396, 405, 409, 427, 440, 617.
 Fir Gallians or Gallenians, 217, 220.
 Firlee, 10, 11, 15.
 Fitzgibbons, 180.
 Fitz-Eustaces, 307, 320, 498, 505, and other places.
 Fitzgeralds or Geraldines of Kildare and Desmond, 42 to 57 to 82 to 94, 96 to 101 to 154 to 179 to 190 to 213 to 225 to 252 to 275 to 280 to 320 to 330 to 350 to 359 to 374 to 399 to 405 to 435 to 456 to 499 to 503 to 524 to 528 to 530 to 616 to 640 to 668.
 Fitzmaurices of Kerry, 75, 180 to 360 to 473 to 525, 536 to 571 to 668.
- Fitzsimons, 78, 353.
 Flennings, 3, 10.
 Foghard, 111, 320, 593, 602.
 Fomorians, 22, 51, 97, 121, 146, 171, 341, 342, 402, 439.
 Fore abbey, bishops, &c., 9, 10, 117, 353.
 Fox, family of, 8, 55, 110, 192, 240, 255 to 287, 347.
 Frost, 239.
- G.
- Gael or Gadelians—See Milesians.
 Galbally abbey 285.
 Galinga 7.
 Gallenians 343.
 Galloglasses 95—See Kerns.
 Galtrinn 8.
 Galway, city, abbey, bishops, &c., 13, 66, 132, 133, 479, 553, 613.
 Gaoth-an-chairgin 28.
 Garbh Thrian 227.
 Garden 381.
 Garrisons, English, 657.
 Gavelkind 580.
 Gauls and Galatians 123, 217, 219, 363, 364, 368.
 Giant's Causeway 22, 341.
 Glaisfenc 29.
 Glencar 310.
 Glen Concadhan 386, 545, 709.
 Glendalough, city, bishops, &c., 7, 190, 226, 321.
 Glen Fearnna 56.
 Glennalure 505, 575.
 Glionn Righe 12, 13.
 Gno Beag and Gno Mor 72, 129.
 Goblets 12—See Cups.
 Gort 475, 486.
 Gassipred 382.
 Graces, family of, 251.
 Granu Weal or Grace O'Malley 546.
 Gunpowder, great explosion of, in Dublin, 614.
- H.
- Heberians 124, 149, 171, 172, 195, 292.
 Helmet 274.
 Heremonians 124, 150, 171, 219, 292.
 Hole Stone 221.
 Hospitality, houses of—See Biatachs.
 Hostages 2, 34, 599, and various other places.
 Hostings 656.
 Hly Branain 17.
 Hly Briuin Brefney 10, 29, 74.
 Hly Briuin Cualan 224.
 Hly Briuin of the Shannon 18, 26.
 Hly Briunians 125, 442.
 Hly Caisin 151.
 Hly Conaill Gaura 152.
 Hly Diarmada 129, 130.
 Hly Earca Chein 28.
 Hly Failge 24.
 Hly Faolain 4.
 Hly Feilmy 224.
 Hly Fiachra 125.
 Hly Fiachra Aidhne 14, 129.
 Hly Fiachra of Ardsratha 24, 29.
 Hly Fiachra of the Moy 37, 98, 608.
 Hly Garchon 220.
 Hly Kinsellagh and Cualan, or counties of Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow, with their chiefs and clans, 24, 25, 217 to 226.
 Hly Laoghaire 7.
 Hly Mac Uais 7.
 Hly Maine and Hlymanians 4, 127, 602.
- Hly Meith Macha 12.
 Hly Meith Tire 3.
 Hly Murray 223.
 Hly Niall, North and South, 6, 125, 436 to 442.
 Hly Niallain 27.
 Hly Regan 248.
 Hly Tuirtre 10, 11, 15.
- I.
- Iar Connaught or West Connaught 4, 27, 129.
 Iberians 173.
 Iccian Sea, 407.
 Idols and Pagan deities, 75, 271, 361, 458.
 Images, 188, 254, 302, 407, 408.
 Imaile, 223.
 Imleach Iubhair, 25.
 Inauguration of princes and chiefs, &c. 17, 50, 52, 76, 79, 99, 106, 149, 174, 198, 209, 223, 236, 263, 274, 284, 312, 328, 354, 578, 580, 582.
 Inlher Sceinc, 171.
 Inis Cathy, bishops and abbey of, &c. 19, 520.
 Inis Clothran, 22, 24.
 Inis Endaimh, 15.
 Inisfallen, 181.
 Inismacsaint, 395.
 Inis O'Fionntain, 24.
 Inis Roba, 25.
 Inis Samer, 51, 340, 617, 707.
 Insi Modh, 66.
 Invasion of Strongbow, and Henry II., 1 to 5, 196, 197, 536 to 540,—of king John, 17, 34, 197,—of Richard II., 191 to 193.
 Inver Colpa, 412.
 Inver Mor, 217.
 Inver Slaine, 194, 217, 343.
 Inver Slange, 20.
 Iomdha, 186.
 Iona, monastery of, 31, 553.
 Ireland, ancient names of, 122, 124,—divisions of.—See Kingdoms.—361, 388, to 391,—history of, 555, 560.
 Irians or Rudricians, 124, 150, 173, 221, 292, 412 to 417.—See Clanna Rory.
 Ithians or Lugadians, 124, 146, 150, 172, 218, 292, 366.—See Clanna Breogian.
 Iveagh, 14.
- J.
- Johannes Duns Scotus, 583.
 Johannes Scotus Erigena, 583.
 Joyce's country, 132, 560, 568, 569.
- K.
- Kanturk, 359.
 Kells abbey, town, &c. 90, 350, 372, 556.
 Kerns and Galloglasses, 95 to 120, 136, 156, 189, 191, 240, 265, 280, 312, 313, 349, 352, 353, 380 to 418, 445, 476, 512, 547, 571, 651 to 653, 661.
 Kerry 416, 477, 499.
 Kerry Currilhy 176.
 Kil Achaid 185.
 Kil Air 16.
 Kilbarron 183.
 Kilbisge 23.
 Kilbrittan castle 235.
 Kil Conain 15.
 Kilcrea abbey 278, 400.
 Kilcullen abbey 307.
 Kildare abbey, bishops, city, &c. 9, 39, 71, 317, 320, 321, 381, 682.

Kilfenora or Corcomroe, bishops of, &c. 4, 103, 155, 239, 359, 373, 479.
 Kil Fiacaill 24.
 Kilkenny 208.—See Ossory bishops, 208.
 Killala, bishops of, &c. 37, 40, 55, 70, 72, 90, 91, 101, 105, 136, 139, 245, 400.
 Killaloe, bishops of, &c. 17, 24, 37, 38, 155, 166, 265, 303, 354, 384, 447, 474.
 Killarney, 191, 375.
 Kilmacduagh, abbey, bishops of, &c. 28, 40, 53, 64, 95, 106, 133.
 Kilmacrennan 578.
 Kilmainham, prior of, &c. 241.
 Kilmallock 212, 472, 478.
 Kil Meadhain (Kilmaine), 14.
 Kilmore in Cavan, bishops of, &c. 27, 47, 52, 68, 78, 93, 102, 108, 114, 115, 140, 158, 159, 160, 185, 228, 276, 360.
 Kilnamullagh or Buttevant 69.
 Kilronan abbey 122, 131.
 Kil Sanctan 26.
 Kincora 148, 296.
 Kinel Aodba-na-Hechtge 14, 23.
 Kinel Aongusa 7, 28.
 Kinel Binnigh 15.
 Kinel Connell 19, 27, 28.
 Kinel Dongaile 151.
 Kinel Enda 9, 12, 28.
 Kinel Eogain 2, 27.
 Kinel Fereadaidh, 16, 17, 69.
 Kinel Fiachy 7.
 Kinel Moen 12.
 Kingdoms or provinces of the Pentarchy, history of——Connaught, 9, 97, 121 to 131, 146, 442, 552, 610, 659.
 —Leinster, 146, 217 to 226, 245 to 252, 266 to 273, 292 to 299, 313 to 321, 610, 658.
 —Meath, 5, 8, 146, 266 to 273, 292 to 299, 313 to 321, 344, 609.
 —Munster, 146 to 156, 170 to 180, 194 to 202, 610, 660.
 —Ulster 146, 337 to 345, 361 to 367, 388, 394, 412 to 417, 436 to 442, 553 to 559, 601 to 610, 657 to 659, 718.
 Kings of Ireland, ancient, 98, 122, 125, 126, 145 to 149, 172 to 174, 195, 219 to 223, 267 to 269, 292 to 297, 314, 340 to 345, 412 to 417, 436 to 442, 465, 466, 532 to 544, 553 to 556.
 Kings and Queens of England. See the different reigns throughout the Annals.
 Kinsale, 7, 233, 696, 702. See battles.
 Knight of Glin, 350, 383.
 Knight of Kerry, 322.
 Knights of St. George, 318.
 Knights of St. John and Knights Templars, 407.
 Knockmoy, 38, 85.
 Knock Raffan, 195, 200.

L.

Lacys, de, lords of Meath, 8 to 17, 18, 21, 25, 28, 31 to 55 to 316, 558.
 Lakes, eruption of, 20, 49, 78, 97, 121, 325, 338, 559.
 Lambert Simnel, and Perkin Warbeck, 306, 307.
 Lathairne or Larne 27.
 Laws, ancient Irish, see Brehons, Tanistry, Conventions and Parliaments.
 Leac O'Maoldorrey 29.
 Leath Cuinn and Leath Mogha 146, 267.

Leath Rath or Abbey Lara 189.
 Legates, Vivian 11, 96—John de Monte Celion 29—Jacobus 39, 680.
 Leighlin, bishops, &c., 15, 226, 235, 256, 384.
 Leim Cuchullain 146.
 Leim Mic Neill 19.
 Lia Fail, or Stone of Destiny 122, 297.
 Lieny 29.
 Leitrim 411.
 Leix or Queen's county, with its chiefs and clans 25, 245 to 252.
 Letters or Alphabet, ancient Irish, 145, 388.
 Lieny 94.
 Lifford 387, 455, 587, 676.
 Limerick, city, bishops of, &c. 25, 29, 32, 104, 155, 431, 483, 508, 543, 569.
 Lisgoole abbey, &c. 117, 137, 165, 219, 234, 235, 239, 253, 254, 278, 293.
 Lislachtin abbey 285.
 Lismore, bishops of, &c. 70, 202, 203.
 Literature, ancient of the provinces—of Connaught 100, 101, 133, 134; of Munster 155, 156, 181, 182, 203 to 205; of Ulster and Meath, 76, 559, 581 to 585; of Leinster 585, 586.—See Books.
 Loch-da-Chaach 196.
 Longford 9.—See Annals and county histories.
 Lords Lieutenant and Deputies, 10 to 193, 213, 214, 230, 231, 242, 257, 262, 273, 274, 278, 280, 284, 304, 306, 358, 399, 427, 433, 449, 450, 711.
 Lothra 14.
 Lough Ainninn 255.
 Lough Derg or Termon Dabog, abbey, &c. 25, 66, 137, 186, 275, 282, 286, 326, 333, 350, 374, 378, 633, 640.
 Lough Erne or Samer, 78, 240, 338, 340, 373, 418, 617.
 Lough Foyle or Feabhal 49, 338, 673.
 Lough Gorman or Wexford 167, 219, 225.
 Lough Guir 374.
 Lough Kea, or Trinity Island, abbey, &c. 18, 57, 62, 63, 93, 95, 112, 165, 196, 279, 350.
 Lough Mac Fereadaidh 16.
 Lough Mac Nean 345.
 Lough Melvin 228, 263, 592.
 Lough Neagh 20, 137, 338.
 Lough O'Gara 93.
 Lough Oirbsen or Corrib 72, 121.
 Lough Oughter 53, 59, 88, 115, 159, 638, 639.
 Lough Ree 23.
 Lough Strangford 20, 194.
 Louth abbey, bishops, &c. 2, 61.
 Lucenians 173.
 Luigne 7.
 Lugh Magh 15.

M.

Mac Ardells 3, 306.
 Mac Arthurs 154.
 Mac Auleys 7, 13, 19, 249, 386.
 Mac Auliffes 176, 400, 537.
 Mac Bradys, 69, 77, 138, 164, 212, 228, 361, 607.—See O'Carrolls of Calry.
 Mac Breen 249.—See O'Brien.
 Mac Brennans, 68, 72, 102 to 116 to 120, 128 to 203 to 256 to 283 to 323.
 Mac Brodins or Brodys 154, 455, 706.
 Mac Cabes, 3, 77, 142, 170, 205, 213, 215,

231, 234, 238, 263, 265, 307 to 347 to 353 to 372 to 609 to 707.
 Mac Caffreys, 282, 353, 375, 398 to 588.
 Mac Caghewells, 16 to 50, 60, 69 to 157 to 207 to 236, 239 to 274 to 301 to 326 to 375, 602.
 Mac Campbells 3.
 Mac Canns 3, 21, 35, 417, 699.
 Mac Cartans, 3, 20, 86, 138, 261, 328, 605.
 Mac Carthys, kings of Desmond, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 17, 25 to 104 to 142 to 174 to 190 to 197 to 234 to 283 to 293 to 323 to 330 to 348 to 354 to 374 to 492 to 549 to 589 to 600 to 664 to 691.
 Mac Cassarlys 68.
 Mac Cassidy 3.—See O'Cassidys.
 Mac Claneys of Clare, 154, 155, 303, 327, 492, 498, 527, 548, 623.
 Mac Claneys of Leitrim, 39, 61, 77, 89, 91, 104 to 133 to 217 to 228 to 263 to 345 to 400, 409 to 527, 546, 607.
 Mac Closkeys 50.
 Mac Coggans 77, 607.
 Mac Coghilans 10, 19, 28 to 96 to 248 to 377 to 415 to 549 to 570 to 632.
 Mac Colmans 3.
 Mac Colreavys 60.
 Mac Connees or Mac Conways, 7, 228, 239, 329, 355, 419.
 Mac Connavas or Ford, 69, 77, 100 to 119, 145 to 278 to 404, 607.
 Mac Conrys 129.
 Mac Corcorans 201.
 Mac Cormacs 9, 161, 236.
 Mac Coscrys 250.
 Mac Costelloes or Nangles 24 to 35, 65, 93, 95 to 130 to 150 to 212 to 234 to 280 to 310 to 403, 596.
 Mac Craths or Magraths 137, 155, 198, 201 to 282 to 326, 355, 483 to 490, to 532.
 Mac Crehans 179.
 Mac Crossans 112.
 Mac Curtins 155, 163, 207, 239, 241.
 Mac Cuskers or Mac Oscars 3, 603.
 Mac Davetts 596, 718.
 Mac Dermotts 11, 18, 25, 26, 30 to 53 to 90 to 99, 103 to 109 to 128 to 135 to 207 to 264 to 278 to 312 to 334 to 398 to 548 to 574 to 611 to 688.
 Mac Donnells of Clare 153, 190.
 Mac Donnells of Ulster 3, 22, 35 to 74, 79 to 103 to 154 to 157 to 189 to 240 to 259 to 280 to 316, to 328 to 330 to 349 to 353 to 381 to 411 to 420 to 477 to 560 to 571 to 622 to 699.
 Mac Donoghs of Sligo 91, 99, 110 to 142 to 167 to 171 to 188 to 207 to 241 to 255 to 307 to 331 to 402 to 549 to 611 to 628.
 Mac Donoghs of Cork 175, 549.
 Mac Dorchys 77, 93, 132, 206, 607.
 Mac Dougalls or Mac Dowels 288, 476, and other places.
 Mac Dunlevy 1, 3.—See O'Donlevy.
 Mac Duvans 52.—See O'Duvan.
 Mac Egans 72, 107, 110, 111, 117, 130, 165, 177, 191, 201, 207, 210, 229, 235, 241, 242, 253, 256 to 289, 389.
 Mac Elligotts 65, 179.
 Mac Eneirys 152.
 Mac Etigans 37, 602.
 Mac Evoys 7, 249.
 Mac Fergus 78.
 Mac Finneen 179.

- Mac Finnevars 77, 83, 84, 90, 214.
 Mac Firbises 91, 100, 144, 163.
 Mac Gaffneys 7, 78.
 Mac Garraghans 235, 634.
 Mac Gaurans 39, 53, 76, 77, 90, 103 to 120 to 129 to 209 to 235 to 262 to 299 to 306 to 331 to 371 to 588, 607.
 Mac Gees 21.
 Mac Geoghegans 7, 94 to 116 to 136, 144 to 190 to 213 to 258 to 284 to 312 to 315 to 329 to 502 to 549 to 565 to 704.
 Mac Geraghtys 23, 43, 44, 46, 61, 72, 81, 89, 91, 94, 102, 103, 106, 127, 128, 137, 138, 144, 207, 323.
 Mac Gilcreests 137.
 Mac Gilduffs 77, 132.
 Mac Gilfennens 53, 55, 79, 108, 113 to 254 to 261 to 301 to 326, 604, 637.
 Mac Gilfoyles 201.
 Mac Gilkellys 129.
 Mac Gillieuddys 179, 210, 455.
 Mac Gilligans 78.
 Mac Gilmichaels 79, 108, 604.
 Mac Gilmores 21, 90, 209.
 Mac Gilmpatrick or Fitzpatricks of Ossory 2, 10, 11, 17, 65, 67, 68, 78 to 167 to 197 to 229 to 246 to 298 to 427 to 549.
 Mac Gilroys 59, 304, 331, 347, 355.
 Mac Giollaiochoholnoge 224, 316.
 Mac Gloins 78, 228.
 Mac Gowans or O'Gowans 77, 132, 146, 201, 230, 232, 326.
 Machaire Conaill 2, 12, 13, 413, 576.
 Machaire Connaeth 22, 209, 312.
 Machaire Cuirene 3.
 Mac Ilughis 7, 78, 129.
 Mac I-Briens 201.—See O'Briens.
 Mac Kennas 3, 241, 604.
 Mac Kennys 3, 78.
 Mac Keoghs 132, 139, 200, 223, 301, 398.
 Mac Keons 132.
 Mac Kiernans.—See Mac Tiernans.
 Mac Lysaghts 154.
 Mac Loughlins of Ulster 1, 15, 29, 292, 555, 556, 601.—See O'Loughlins.
 Mac Mahons of Clare 143, 153 to 167 to 232, 237, 565, 311, 312, 372 to 519, 568, 573, 589, 598, 623, 703.
 Mac Mahons of Monaghan 3, 89, 108, 109, 110 to 120 to 133 to 138 to 154 to 205 to 215 to 237 to 255 to 279 to 286 to 306 to 329, 347 to 451 to 548 to 567 to 603, 608, 633 to 654 to 698, 699 to 709 to 719.
 Mac Martins 95, 113, 121.
 Mac Manus 79, 132 to 136, 211, 338, 348, 633.
 Mac Murroghs, kings of Leinster, 1 to 92 to 144 to 159 to 185 to 191 to 207 to 213 to 216 to 223 to 233 to 237 to 302 to 360 to 376 to 435 to 443 to 536 to 544 to 549.—See O'Cavanaghs.
 Mac Namaras 16, 108 to 142 to 151 to 160 to 206 to 254 to 448 to 475 to 542 to 548 to 574 to 706.
 Mac Nencys 3, 630.
 Mac Nevins 132, 684.
 Mac Nultys 3, 92, 236.
 Mac Quillans 22, 107, 108, 142, 159 to 233, 236 to 238 to 253 to 284 to 286 to 326 to 372 to 420 to 571.
 Mac Raffertys 141, See O'Raffertys.
 Mac Rannalls or Reynolds 5, 19, 25, 26 to 59, 65, 77 to 109 to 129 to 162 to 210 to 235 to 276 to 281 to 288 to 307 to 345 to 570, 607, 608.
 Mac Rorys 21, 112, 601.
 Mac Scanlons 3.
 Mac Shanes 50.
 Mac Shanleys 71, 164, 207, 288.
 Mac Sheehys 154, 177, 189, 380, 400, 473, 478 to 489, 525 to 547 to 571, 612 to 622, 671.
 Mac Sweeneys 52, 85 to 142 to 157 to 177 to 188 to 231 to 240, 274 to 284 to 289 to 329 to 353 to 383 to 401 to 420 to 452 to 475 to 489 to 520 to 564 to 600, 636, 637 to 707.
 Mac Teige 7.
 Mac Tiernans or Mac Kiernans 75, 77 to 92 to 111 to 162 to 212 to 284 to 381, 604, 607.
 Mac Tullys 50, 71, 77, 79, 250, 603.
 Mac Wards 52, 298, 331, 356, 359, 419, 431, 492, 615, 716.
 Magh Adhair 149.
 Magh Feimin 194.
 Magherigallen 8.
 Magh Riada 245.
 Magenisies 3, 5, 7, 20, 143 to 165 to 193 to 216 to 328 to 377, 548 to 598, 604, 605.
 Magonity (Kerry) 332.
 Magraths 79, See Mac Craths.
 Maguines 3, 79, 104, 108, 112 to 120 to 142 to 159 to 233 to 256 to 278 to 284 to 286 to 301 to 304 to 347 to 349 to 377 to 463 to 548 to 567 to 576 to 590, to 603 to 633 to 665, (Hugh Maguire), to 698 to 719.
 Malachy, king of Ireland 468, 512 to 516, 554.
 Maonmoy 22, 130.
 Marianus Scotus 583.
 Martineans 176, 343.
 Mayo abbey, bishops of, &c. 34, 53, 101, 298.
 Meath, bishops of, &c. 9, 46, 49, 164, 277, 353, 354.
 Meelick abbey 300.
 Mellifont 2, 86, 556.
 Menapians 194, 217, 218, 345, 392.
 Milesians 123, 145, 171, 362, 367, 388.
 Military forces and commanders of the ancient Irish 267, 268, 581, 660, 661, See arnus, banners, kerns, and galloglasses.
 — of the English and Irish in the war of Elizabeth 656 to 662.
 Mines, gold, silver, &c. 225, 250, 317, 318, 339.
 Minstrels and music 86, 142, 143, 144, 160, 165, 192, 207, 234, 324, 365, 502, 579.
 Mitchells 3.—See O'Maoilmeihil.
 Modharu 3.
 Mohill abbey, &c. 235, 307, 308.
 Monaghan, abbey of, &c. 275, 410, 598.
 Monasteroris abbey, 360.
 Monks.—See articles on the various abbeys and monasteries.
 Moran's Collur 579.
 Mounds, sepulchral 123, 272, 273, 436.
 Mountjoy's expeditions to Ulster, Meath, Leinster, and Connaught 681 to 683, 689, 690, 709 to 712.
 Moy Ailbe 196.
 Moy Aoi 22.
 Moy Cedne 104, 107, 341 401.
 Moy Coha 19, 70.
 Moyeosquin abbey 352.
 Moy Eleog 15, 38, 87.
 Moy Inis 115.
 Moy Iomchlaire 28.
 Moy Ith 12, 15, 27, 66, 412.
 Moylena 147, 196.
 Moy Liffey and Bregia, or the counties of Dublin and Kildare, with their chiefs and clans 266 to 273, 292 to 299, 313 to 321.
 Moylinny, Rath of, 20, 27, 412.
 Moy Lugad 38.
 Moylurg 18, 90, 127.
 Moy Muirthemhne 2, 412, 413.
 Moyne abbey 265.
 Moy Nisse 62, 64, 87.
 Moy O'Toirdhealbhaid 24.
 Moyrath.—See battles.
 Moyrein 62.
 Moyry Pass and Mountnorris 681, 689, 709.
 Moy Sleacht 71, 75, 271.
 Moy Tuirc, North and South 97, 190, 361.
 Mucruss abbey, &c. 123, 134, 450, 451, 714.
 Muintir Carolan 164.
 Muintir Cionaeth 4.
 Muintir Eoluis 9, 25.
 Muintir Giolgain 7.
 Muintir Ladagain 7.
 Muintir Maoilsiona 7, 16.—See Osionach and Fox.
 Muintir Maolmora 72.
 Muintir Siortachain 7.
 Muintir Tadhgain 7.
 Muintir Tlmain 7.
 Murkertach Mac Neill 485.
 Muirthemhne 2, 413.
 Mullaghmast 221, 245; massacre of, 494, 496.
 Muserith Tire 195, 200.
 Music.—See Minstrels.
 Muskerry 152.
 Mythology 458 to 460.—See Druidism.
 N.
 Naas 223.
 Names, Irish, of men and women explained 41.
 — surnames, Irish, 149, 314, 318.
 — English surnames 314.
 Nangles or Mac Costelloes, 8 to 100, 317.
 See Mac Costelloes.
 Nemedians 51, 171, 340, 345.
 Nenagh 430.
 Newgrange 273.
 Newry 21, 385.
 Niall of the Nine Hostages 436.
 Normans 468 to 474.
 Nugents 8, 190, 261 to 288 to 435.
 O.
 O'Aherns 177.
 O'Areachtans or Harringtons 132.
 O'Baire 176.
 O'Bannans 8, 27, 100, 201.
 O'Behans 19, 163, 250.
 O'Beice 177.
 O'Beirnes of Roscommon 63, 108, 128 to 208, 233 to 264, 502, 548.
 O'Beolans 39.
 O'Berg 152.
 O'Bergins or Amergin, 248.
 O'Billys 152.
 O'Bolgers 225.
 O'Boylans 29, 603.

- O'Boyles 24, 50, 52, 65 to 92 to 110 to 244 to 305 to 348 to 375 to 401 to 411 to 455 to 548 to 574 to 577 to 601, 606, 636 to 715.
- O'Brackens 315.
- O'Brannagans 3.
- O'Breen 6, 7, 29, 277.
- O'Brennans 9, 27, 249.
- O'Breslins, 15, 17, 18, 52, 113, 200, 243, 256, 298, 331, 606.
- O'Brie 198.
- O'Briens, kings of Munster, Thomond, &c., 9, 10, 22, 24 to 77 to 109 to 145 to 148 to 160 to 197 to 264 to 283 to 339 to 349 to 431 to 448 to 452 to 455 to 496 to 549 to 555 to 573 to 589 to 610 to 621 to 703.
- O'Brodars 50, 250, 602.
- O'Brogans 100, 104, 248.
- O'Brolchans 8, 9 to 50.
- O'Broleys 19.
- O'Byrnes of Wicklow, 163 to 190, 224, 240 to 324 to 497, 498 to 549 to 575, 576 to 591 to 612, 615 to 621.
- O'Cahenys 15, 89, 99.
- O'C hills 39, 129, 131, 151, 201, 225.
- O'Callaghans 3, 7, 100, 174, 175, 202, 347, 474, 492, 494, 497, 581.
- O'Callanans 131, 200.
- O'Callans 129, 201.
- O'Canmanans 19 to 52, 66, 68, 131, 215, 442, 625.
- O'Careys 9, 29, 315.
- O'Carberrys 6.
- O'Carraghers 3.
- O'Carolans 11, 12, 14, 17 to 50.
- O'Carrolls of Orgiall 2, 4, 12, 16, 21, 24, 417, 602, 603, 608.
- O'Carrolls of Ely 8, 24, 31, to 165, 198, to 208 to 237 to 248 to 352 to 374 to 396 to 410 to 417 to 429 to 444 to 517 to 549 to 632.
- O'Carrolls of Calry, 69, 77, 607 to 670.—See Mac Bradys.
- O'Carrolls of Kerry 178.
- O'Carrolls of Ossory, 246.
- O'Caseys 1, 6, 14, 154, 177, 313.
- O'Cashins 131.
- O'Cassids 79 to 253, 263, 324, 351, 377, 634.
- O'Cavenaghs 10, 193, 214, 216, 223, 235, 278, 302, 376 to 443, 498, 505, 517, 572, 621, 672.—See Mac Murroghs.
- O'Cawleys 129.
- O'Clerkins 152.
- O'Clerys 52, 78, 129, 130, 326, 366, 386, 425, 462, 490, 546, 592.
- O'CoFFEys 6, 8, 24, 132, 255, 427, 436.
- O'Coigleys 634.
- O'Colgans 316, 604.
- O'Coltarans 20, 605.
- O'Colemans 32, 242.
- O'Conaghtans 8.
- O'Conaghtys 78, 100.
- O'Conaings or Gunnings 153.
- O'Concannons 40, 42, 100, 129, 298.
- O'Connells 130, 152, 178, 604.
- O'Connellans 7, 50, 73, 100, 102, 110, 131, 356.
- O'Connollys 7, 306, 315, 316, 373.
- O'Conors, kings of Connaught, &c., 4 to 30 to 53 to 62 to 68 to 89 to 94 to 107 to 109 to 126 to 135 to 208 to 243 to 254 to 299 to 312 to 329 to 400 to 521 to 548 to 555, 556 to 574 to 623 to 655 to 708.
- O'Conors of Clare 151, 235, 285, 303, 305.
- O'Conors of Kerry 156, 167, 177 to 187, 207, 254, 305, 383, 643, 669.
- O'Conors of Offaly 47, 105, 113 to 160 to 170 to 208 to 216 to 220 to 229 to 241, 247 to 255 to 258 to 278 to 303 to 329, 360 to 403 to 429 to 434 to 522 to 549 to 621 to 672.
- O'Conors of Derry 50, 601.
- O'Considines 154.
- O'Cooneys 50.
- O'Corcorans 634.
- O'Cormacs 604.
- O'Corrigans 634.
- O'Corrys 3.
- O'Cosgras or Cosgraves 3.
- O'Cosgrys 224.
- O'Cowhys 176.
- O'Creaghs 154, 177.
- O'Creans 100, 479.
- O'Creedans 603.
- O'Creehans 79.
- O'Criochans 29, 50.
- O'Crotty 198.
- O'Crowleys 177.
- O'Cuires 453.
- O'Cuirnins 78, 183, 210, 215, 234, 242, 265, 291, 376.
- O'Cullens 85, 152, 200, 315.
- O'Cullenans 176, 201.
- O'Currys 78, 176.
- O'Dalys 7, 17, 36 to 52 to 131, 174, 177 to 207, 209 to 242 to 257 to 373, 606.
- O'Danaghers 200.
- O'Davorens 154, 207.
- O'Deas 108, 149, 150, 177, 199, 555, 566, 569, 623.
- O'Delanys 249.
- O'Dempseys 24, 163, 167 to 185 to 247 to 260 to 314 to 398 to 492 549, 682.
- O'Devlins 50, 67, 99, 107, 110, 608.
- O'Devins 3, 91, 224, 233.
- Odhba 7.
- O'Dinans 210.
- O'Dinnaghans 154, 200.
- O'Dinnertys 201.
- O'Doghertys 14, 26, 28 to 52 to 95 to 135 to 212 to 243 to 332 to 360 to 411 to 422 to 527 to 548 to 566, 606 to 673 to 685 to 716 to 719.
- O'Dolans 78.
- O'Donaghys 608.
- O'Donnegans 3, 9, 176, 200, 601, 606, 634.
- O'Donnells 2, 6, 28, 29 to 50, 52 to 64 to 74 to 92 to 104 to 119 to 188 to 238 to 259 to 283 to 290 to 310 to 325, 332 to 353 to 378 to 401 to 424 to 442 to 521 to 548 to 563 (Red Hugh O'Donnell), to 572 to 577 to 606 to 675 to 701 to 715 to 720.
- O'Donoghoe of Leinster, 246, 316.
- O'Donoghoe of Munster, 6, 123, 131, 178, 191, 198, 664.
- O'Donnellans 20, 48, 131, 136, 162, 207, 395, 601, 603.
- O'Donnellys 3, 11, 50, 52, 200, 396, 604.
- O'Dooleys 7.
- O'Dorans 216, 223, 225, 256.
- O'Dorchys 100.
- O'Donovans 152, 177, 664.
- O'Dowds 16, 23 to 55, 62 to 66 to 91 to 98 109 to 166 to 216 to 237 to 333 to 401 to 589, 608.
- O'Dowlings 224, 250.
- O'Doyles, 225.
- O'Drinans 153.
- O'Driscolls 16, 175, 214, 216, 225, 250 to 287, 357, 549.
- O'Droms, 78, 258, 634.
- O'Duffs 249.
- O'Duffys 3, 6, 8, 28, 34, 131, 316.
- O'Dugans 134, 150, 161, 175, 314.
- O'Duibdiarmas 27, 601.
- O'Duibhghins 224.—See O'Devins.
- O'Duigans 151.
- O'Duigenans 122, 130, 138, 142, 162, 183, 190, 228 to 237, 243 to 278, 331, 361 to 497.
- O'Duinans 174.
- O'Dullaghans 372.
- O'Dunadys 179.
- O'Dunleveys 1, 3, 20, 25, 28, 187, 334, 386, 562, 604.
- O'Dunns 7, 163, 164, 233, 248.
- O'Durnins 189, 190.
- O'Duvans 6.—See Mac Duvans.
- O'Duvans 3, 6, 20, 602, 604, 720.
- O'Dwyers 199, 201, 288, 549, 589, 632.
- O'Early 100.
- O'Ereks 603.
- O'Fahys, or O'Fays 78, 132, 356, 372, 429.
- O'Fallons, 6, 70 to 128.
- O'Falveys 152, 174, 178.
- O'Farrells 72, 78, 159, 304.
- O'Feenaghtys, 24, 46, 128.
- O'Felans 197, 198, 236, 250, 259.
- O'Ferralls 5, 9, 16, 25 to 53 to 70 to 89 to 92, to 810 to 168 to 183 to 189 to 254 to 289, 335 to 548 to 593, 607, 608, 620, 624.
- Offaly, or King's County, with its chiefs and clans, 245 to 252.
- Officers, ancient Irish, 581.
- O'Fiachrys, 315.
- O'Fihellys, 176, 181.
- O'Finns 77, 607.
- O'Finnegans 130.
- O'Finnelans, 6, 7, 9.
- O'Firgils or O'Freels 50.
- O'Flahertys 13, 27 to 57 to 129 to 209 to 216 to 477 to 480 to 545 to 548 to 568, 569.
- O'Flanagans 3, 7, 16 to 53, 67, 79, 94, 97, 105, 108, 128 to 167 to 200 to 257 to 289 to 300 to 315 to 333 to 390, 604, 634 to 640.
- O'Flannellys 100, 186.
- O'Flannerys 152.
- O'Flatterys 151.
- O'Florrys 603.
- O'Flynn 10, 12, 20, 23, 24, 29, 94, 95 to 106, 129, 137 to 158, 176 to 213 to 283, 603.
- O'Fogartys 1, 12, 200.
- O'Forannans 52.
- O'Furreys 200.
- O'Gahans 224.
- O'Gallaghers 52 to 330 to 335 to 378 to 422 to 475 to 497 to 548 to 581 to 598, 636 to 685 to 707.
- Ogams 172, 342.
- O'Garas.—See Introduction. 47 to 59 to 72 to 93, 99, 240, 241 to 274 to 283 to 331 to 404, 608.
- O'Garveys 3, 19, 20, 224, 604, 605.
- O'Gavagans 100.
- O'Gevennys 132.
- O'Gibellans 55, 57.
- O'Glorans or O'Glohermys 250.

- O'Gneves 50.
 O'Gormans 8, 153, 249, 304, 478, 492.
 O'Gormleys 12, 14 to 50 to 92, 100, 106 to 133 to 304, 601.
 O'Gowans 77 —See Mac Gowans.
 O'Grady 16, 108, 149, 151 to 209, 305, 684.
 O'Griobtha or O'Griffin, 303.
 O'Hagans 50, 186, 352, 601, 602, 698.
 O'Hagartys 699.
 O'Hallinans 154.
 O'Hallorans 131, 154.
 O'Hamills 163, 602.
 O'Hanleys 11, 94, 103, 128, 142, 207 to 209 to 260 to 283 to 302 to 592.
 O'Hanlons 3, 64, 86, 103, 113 to 184 to 302 to 326, 328, 331 to 335, 603.
 O'Hanrahan 6, 201.
 O'Hanratty 3, 603.
 O'Hanveys 6, 20, 604.
 O'Haras 12, 22 to 55, 68 to 91, 99 to 109 to 215 to 240 to 404 to 451, 608, 611.
 O'Harney 179.
 O'Harts 6, 315 to 401 to 611.
 O'Hea or O'Ingh 6.
 O'Heas 153, 177.
 O'Healy 177.
 O'Heays 79, 604.
 O'Heerin 150, 228.
 O'Heffernans 150 201.
 O'Hehirs 151.
 O'Heignys 27, 29.
 O'Heirs 603.
 O'Henans 201.
 O'Henerys 23.
 O'Hennesys 6, 7, 214, 248.
 O'Heoghys or O'Hoey, 1, 20, 604.
 O'Heres 20.
 O'Herlihy 177.
 O'Heynes 14 to 56 to 70 to 129, 177 to 209 to 497, 565, 589.
 O'Higgins 8, to 121, 131, 214, 232 to 257, 258, 291, 312 to 348, 400.
 O'Hogans 149, 201.
 O'Hoolaghans 15, 130.
 O'Horans 132.
 O'Hoseys 50, 301, 375, 602.
 O'Hughs 20. —See Mac Hughs.
 O'Hurleys 177, 199.
 O'Kanes 2, 5, 15, 22, 23 to 50 to 163 to 212 to 230 to 252 to 286 to 326 to 420 to 548 to 601 to 709 to 716.
 O'Keans 200.
 O'Kearneys 7, 16, 27, 154, 177, 249.
 O'Keefes 175, 526, 537, 705.
 O'Keelmacht 97.
 O'Keelys 153, 200, 249, 250.
 O'Keenans 17, 137, 207, 351.
 O'Keevans, 20, 100.
 O'Kellys of Connaught, 3, 6, 14, 18 to 55, to 106 to 110, 127 to 166 to 218 to 282 to 346 to 351 to 548 to 599.
 O'Kellys of Meath and Leinster 6, 37, 96, 224, 249, 315, 532.
 O'Kellys of Ulster, 21.
 O'Keenals 152.
 O'Kennedys, 15, 24, 61 to 161 to 167 to 187, to 199 to 244, 567 to 655.
 O'Kennys 130, 601.
 O'Kernaghans 52, 608.
 O'Kerovans, or Kirwans, 132.
 O'Kevenys 250.
 O'Killeens 253.
 O'Kindellan 6.
 O'Kinsellaghs 225, 505, 517.
 O'Kirwicks 152.
 O'Lachtna 15.
 O'Lanes 132.
 O'Langigans 201.
 O'Larkins 3, 132, 224, 604.
 O'Laverty, 11, 17, 18, 26, 38.
 O'Lawlors 20, 249, 604.
 O'Leahys 131.
 O'Learys 177, 601.
 O'Lehans or Lyons, 176.
 O'Lenaghans 67.
 O'Lennans 131, 254, 278.
 O'Leynes 178.
 O'Liddys 4, 154.
 Ollam Fodhla 412.
 O'Loghlins of Ulster 11, 17, 19, 25, 28, 37 to 54. —See Mac Loghlins.
 O'Loghlins of Clare 103, 144, 149, 151, 187 to 232 to 350, 541, 549, 571, 641.
 O'Lonargans 37, 201.
 O'Longans, 604.
 O'Loughans 7.
 O'Loughlins 7, 20, 69, 100, 604.
 O'Lunnys 12, 50.
 O'Lynchies 8, 20, 200, 605.
 O'Mackens, 20, 603.
 O'Mackessys 152.
 O'Maddens 3, 30 to 55 to 110 to 120, 130 to 206 to 244 to 259 to 300 to 419, to 444 to 466, 548 to 599.
 Omagh 284, 286, 409.
 O'Mahony 61, 175, 233, 332, 372, 549, 664.
 O'Malleys 11, 29, to 56, 99, to 144, to 187, to 195 to 213, to 214, to 265 to 371 to 546.
 O'Mahons 604.
 O'Malones 5, 8.
 O'Mannings 131.
 O'Maolbrenans or Mulrenins 23, 24, 28, 100, 128.
 O'Maolclochy 99.
 O'Maolconrys or Conroys 85, 88, 133 to 169, 193, 223, 237, 244, 255 to 281, 303, 307, 309, 331, 354, 376, 422.
 O'Maoldorrys 5, 12, 15, 19, 23, 26 to 52, 442, 605.
 O'Maolfabhails 27.
 O'Maolmichils, or O'Mulvihils 22, 128.
 O'Markys 3.
 O'Martain 38.
 O'Meagher 199, 213, 275, 574, 683.
 O'Mearas 199.
 O'Meehans 7, 78, 243.
 O'Meenys 129.
 O'Melaghins, kings of Meath, &c. 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 11, 13, 16 to 60, 68 to 94 to 109 to 144 to 235 to 264 to 275, 278 to 281 to 290 to 303 to 309 to 314 to 316 to 347 to 376 to 404 to 410 to 419 to 423 to 429.
 O'Mellans 50, 141, 328, 602.
 O'Miaidh 18.
 O'Milford 100.
 O'Milikens 248.
 O'Molouns 154.
 O'Monaghans 26, 67, 93, 128.
 O'Mongans 100, 164.
 O'Mooneys 250, 381.
 O'Moores of Leix 1, 3, 25 to 140 to 190 to 206, 214 to 245 to 247 to 256 to 276 to 296 to 315 to 328 to 429 to 494 to 497 to 549 to 605 to 612, 625 to 670.
 O'Morans 20, 128, 131.
 O'Morny 154.
 O'Moriarty 179, 528.
 O'Morrisys 100, 425.
 O'Mulallys 130, 309.
 O'Mulbrides 131, 260.
 O'Mulcallen 152.
 O'Muldoons 79 to 92, 153, 159, 186, 340, 603, 634.
 O'Mulledys 6, 248, 249.
 O'Mulleenys 87, 100.
 O'Mullens 316.
 O'Mulligans 50, 52, 78, 235, 606.
 O'Mulloys 6, 10 to 110, 129 to 192 to 233 to 248 to 444 to 549 to 643.
 O'Mulmoghery or Early 363.
 O'Mulroonys 79, 131, 604.
 O'Mulveys 77, 129, 164, 307, 608.
 O'Murphys 8, 177, 191, 224, 311, 316.
 O'Murrays 16, 17, 64, 78, 86, 99, 315.
 O'Murricanes 7, 315.
 O'Murtaghs 316.
 O'Naghtains or Nortons 23, 28, 86, 90, 130.
 O'Neill of Tyrone, kings of Ulster, 2, 6, 11, 27, 28 to 50 to 74 to 92 to 141 to 188 to 230 to 253 to 263 to 289 to 303 to 325 to 334 to 404 to 419 to 435 to 438 to 471 to 490 to 520 to 540 to 548 to 565 to 576 to 598 to 601 to 606 to 631 to 666 to 711 to 715 to 720.
 O'Neill of Clannaboy 21, 80, 93 to 141 to 230 to 263 to 289 to 404 to 471 to 490 to 520 to 540 to 548 to 601.
 O'Neill or Nihells of Clare 154.
 O'Neneys 17, 50. —See Mac Neneys.
 O'Nolans 10, 225.
 O'Novans 177.
 O'Quinelevans or Quinlans 201.
 O'Quinns 4, 7, 9, 19 to 50, 55, 71, 134, 141, 150, 539, 601, 607.
 O'Rafferty 23, 298, 334, 384.
 Oran abbey, &c., 441, 442.
 O'Reillys 16, 39, 47 to 53 to 55 to 60 to 62 to 70 to 75 to 80 to 92 to 105 to 131 to 142 to 159 to 183 to 193 to 217 to 234 to 236 to 257 to 265 to 281 to 284 to 305 to 309 to 325 to 348 to 372 to 401 to 520 to 538 to 548 to 577 to 590 to 600 to 607 to 686.
 O'Regans 6, 315, 538.
 Orgiall, Oriol or the counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh, with their chiefs and clans, 1, 2, 3, 278, 417, 601 to 610.
 Orgiallians 417, 602.
 O'Riordans 177.
 Orior 3.
 Ormond and Desies, or counties of Tipperary and Waterford, with their chiefs and clans, 194 to 204, 610.
 Ornaments of gold and silver, torques, collars, crowns, &c., 122, 220, 293, 413, 424, 510, 579.
 O'Rodaghans 335.
 O'Rogans 604.
 O'Ronans 7.
 O'Ronaynes 177.
 O'Rooneys 163.
 O'Rorys or Rogers 6, 23, 315.
 O'Rothlans 129.
 O'Rourke 3, 4, 5, 8, 11, 16, 18, 19, 24, 29, 30 to 59 to 63 to 72 to 75 to 80 to 90 to 109 to 142 to 183 to 215 to 217 to 234 to 257 to 281 to 284 to 309, 310 to 401 to 454 to 506 to 548 to 569 to 573 to 607 to 714, 715.
 O'Ryan 197, 200, 225, 241, 250, 259, 549, 632.
 O'Scanlans 3, 154, 179.

O'Sculllys 7, 201.
 O'Scurrys 131.
 O'Sgingins 94.
 O'Sbannaghans 149, 199.
 O'Shaughnessys 14, 40, 129, 130, 474, 486, 498, 548, 683.
 O'Sheas 152, 178, 250.
 O'Sheehans 152.
 O'Sheridans 78.
 O'Shiels 22, 429.
 O'Sionaghs or Fox 8—See Fox Family.
 O'Spillans 100, 201.
 Ossianic poems 267 to 270, 299, 582.
 Ossory or county of Kilkenny, with its chiefs and clans, 1, 2, 245 to 251.
 Ossory, bishops, &c., 12, 208, 252.
 O'Sullivans 70, 112, 174 to 190, 200, 207 to 305 to 337 to 431, 445 to 519 to 549, 589, 664 to 705 to 710.
 O'Taircert 26.
 O'Teiges or Tigheas 224.
 O'Tierneys 89, 99, 601.
 O'Toirdhealbhaidh 24.
 O'Tolarg 3, 6.
 O'Toolas 14, 80 to 163, 174, 187 to 190 to 223 to 254, 381 to 517 to 549 to 572.
 O'Tumaltys 93.

P.

Palaces—See Tara, Emania, Aileach, &c.
 Pale, the English, 318, 475, 494, 550.
 Palladius 270.
 Palliums 67, 73, 78, 82.
 Parliaments, ancient, 318, 319, 384, 407, 422, 429, 431, 432, 434, 547 to 551, 562.
 Partholians 171, 266, 340.
 Peerage, Milesian, 551, 552—See Chiefs.
 Peerages—See English families and county histories.
 Pelasgians 361.
 Pentarchy, the Irish, 579, 580, 609, 610—See Kingdoms.
 Phenicians 171, 172, 341, 342, 363, 388.
 Physicians 113, 119, 187, 258, 298, 334, 351, 377, 386, 429, 562, 591.
 Picts or Cruthneans 20, 124, 218, 222, 344, 367, 416.
 Pilgrimages, to Jerusalem, 41; to Compostella, 233, 287, 301, 348, 356, 375; to Rome, 258, 360, 362, 367, 532, 555; to Lough Derg, 374, 640; to Iona, 542, 553.
 Plagues and Epidemics 40, 115, 116, 139, 144, 167, 168, 190, 231, 241, 243, 256, 276, 298, 299, 311, 312, 313, 327, 377, 400, 481, 491.
 Plantation of Ulster 3, 50, 52, 718.
 Plunketts 3, 8 to 280, 303, 322, 354, 498.
 Poer, le, 202.
 Poetry—See Bards.
 Port Ross 29.
 Ptolemy's Geography of Ireland, ancient cities, tribes, &c., 313, 391 to 394, 610.
 Punishments 26, 298, 384, 398, 574, 580.
 Pynnar's Survey 3, 50, 52, 718.

Q.

Quinn abbey 91, 206, 549.

R.

Ragnar Lodbrog 460 to 462.
 Ranelagh 224.

Raphoe, abbey, bishops of, &c., 6, 27, 31, 53, 81, 83, 85, 90, 103, 105, 112, 115, 120, 156, 188, 190, 241, 257, 258, 355, 373, 421, 452, 502, 521, 568, 622, 720.
 Rath, duns, &c., 75, 273, 293, 294, 339, 544.
 Rath, burials in, 299.
 Rath Aodba Mac Bric 64.
 Rath Celteair 413.
 Rathlurig, abbey and bishops of, 38.
 Rathmullen, abbey, &c., 594.
 Rebellion of Silken Thomas 404 to 406.
 Red Branch Knights 20, 267, 344, 413, 604.
 Reformation 406.
 Relics 61, 96, 208, 231, 334—See Bells.
 Rents, ancient, 219, 343, 522, 552, 587, 605, 633 to 640—See Tributes.
 Rinn Duin 28, 59, 72, 87, 161.
 Roches 175, 180, 523, 524, 531, 537, 670.
 Roscrea, 203.
 Ross, bishops of, &c., 181, 216, 256, 266.
 Ross, Old, 185.
 Rossinver 593.
 Roscommon, abbey and bishops of, &c., 28, 53, 55, 72, 84, 87, 106, 132.
 Round Towers 121, 182, 252, 273, 338, 340, 379, 544.
 Rudricians or Irians 124, 173.

S.

Saints.—Patrick 2, 75, 96, 98, 125, 195, 270, 407, 439, 605, 633, 640; St. Patrick's Crozier 407, 408; St. Patrick's Purgatory 640; Columkille 5, 96, 439, 605; Bridget 96, 320, 605; Brendan 1, 173; Finnan 1; Kiaran 5; Moeg 5, 226; Mochta 61; Caillin 63; Mel 9; Ernan 30; Fiachra 31; Fechin 67; Molaise 79; Ailbe, Declan and Ibar 195, 202, 203; Carthach 203; Cathaldus 203; Adamnan 440; Ruadhan 296.—See Abbays and Bishops' Sees.
 Saitne 1, 2, 7.
 Sarsfields 180.
 Savages, lords of Lecale 282 to 302 to 433, and other places.
 Scandinavians 457 to 462.
 Scedne 60.
 Scots and Scottish kings 35, 36, 109 to 112, 115, 124, 232, 234 to 330 to 350, 371, 372, 382, 388, 390, 411, 416, 420, 432, 433, 434, 437, 445, 466, 469 to 477 to 490, 514 to 516 to 522, 527, 545 to 558 to 560 to 571, 573 to 622 to 710 to 718.
 Scotland, invaded by the Anglo-Irish, 103, 104.
 Scythians 364.
 Sheriffs 568.
 Showers, remarkable, 40, 69, 142, 285, 491.
 See Storms.
 Siols O's and Muintir, &c., 10.
 Siol Anncha or Silanchia 3, 130.
 Siol Maoilruain 23, 29.
 Siol Murray 22, 23, 126, 135.
 Skalds 459 to 462.
 Slane 10.
 Slavonians 369.
 Sletty, bishops of, &c., 226.
 Sliabh-da-En, 25.
 Slieve Donard 340.
 Slieve Fuaidh or the Fews, 412, 576.
 Slieve Gamh 93.
 Slieve Lughra 310.
 Slieve Roe 572, 575.

Sligo, abbey, &c. 19, 64, 69, 70, 73, 84, 87, 98, 108, 215 to 284, 299, 330, 348 to 370, 374, 409, 521.
 Spaniards and Italians, landing and massacre of, 499 to 506.
 Spaniards, arrival of, 612, 680, 692 to 700, 704.
 Spanish Armada 565, 566.
 Spur 162.
 Statute of Kilkenny 143, 318, 550.
 Stauntons 104.
 Steeds 446.
 Stone cross 63.—See crosses.
 Storms, lightning, &c. 12, 42, 59, 115, 117, 145, 297, 300, 326, 354, 388, 417, 428, 491, 525, 547.—See showers.
 Strabane 598.
 Strongbow 4, 9, 10, 197, 223, 225, 248, 250, 319, 537 to 540.
 Strongbownians 11, 464.
 Stuarts of Scotland 231, 232, 234.
 Swords 266, 321.
 Synods and councils G, 11, 29, 37, 61, 197, 298, 307, 555, 556, 721.

T.

Tailtean 6, 171, 292, 296, 298.
 Tain-bo-Cuailgne 413, 636.
 Talbots 202, 214, 320.
 Tanists and taistry laws 4, 551, 552, 579, to 581.
 Tara 6, 292 to 298, 314, 409, 509.
 Teach Baoithin of Artagh 28.
 Teallach Duncbada, or Tullyonohoe 75.
 Teallach Eachdach 53, 76.
 Teallach Modharain 7.
 Tefia 6, 7.
 Tenures and charts, ancient, 403, 580, 581.
 Termon Dabeg 25.—See Lough Derg.
 Termon lands 407.
 Teutons 369, 388, 580.
 Thomond, or counties of Clare and Limerick, with their chiefs and clans 97, 146, 149 to 154, 610.
 Tigh Molaga or Timoleague 61.
 Tioprat Fachtna 17.
 Tir Briuin of the Shannon 13, 189.—See Hy Briuin.
 Tir Connell or Donegal, with its chiefs and clans 51, to 53, 601 to 610.
 Tirconnallians or Connallians 292, 437 to 442.
 Tir Enda 28.
 Tir Eogain or Tyrone and Derry, with their chiefs and clans, 2, 49 to 51, 601 to 610.
 Tir Fiachrach Aidhne, 23.—See Hy Fiachra.
 Tir Fiachrach Muaidhe, 23.—See Hy Fiachra.
 Tirkennedy 233.
 Tlachta 5, 292.
 Tobur Patrick 42, 43.
 Tomgraney abbey, &c. 305.
 Topography, ancient, of Ireland.—See Kingdoms and Counties.
 Toraidh or Tory Island 30.
 Tor Conaing or Conang's Tower, and Tory Island 341, 342, 432, 503, 594.
 Trian of Armagh 22.
 Trian Congail 167, 233, 258, 286, 289, 305, 328, 370, 404.
 Tributes 22, 148, 220, 467, 479.—See Rents.
 Trim abbey, town, &c. 167, 188, 231, 254, 256, 311, 354, 682.
 Triochad Cead 17.

- Truagh 3.
 Tuaim, Toome bridge 15, 28.
 Tuaim Achaidh 11.
 Tuaim Grene 16.
 Tuam, city, archbishops of, &c. 6, 14, 28,
 29, 59, 62, 67, 69, 71, 73, 78, 84, 91, 94,
 108, 133, 140, 160, 184, 186, 208, 241,
 244, 257, 258, 371, 479, 521, 701.
 Tuath of Roscommon 22.
 Tuath Binn 7.
 Tuath Dedanan 49, 97, 121, 122, 145, 171, 219, 293, 317, 361.
 Tuites 8, 94, 317.
 Tullaghard 1.
 Tullaghoge 17, 236, 263.
 Turgesius 467.
 Tyrrells 8, 16, 142, 157 to 304, 317, 621 to 625 to 682, 691 to 705.
- U.
- Ua Congbhala 26.
 Ua nEachach 14.
 Uisneach 6, 292, 298.
 Uladh or Ulidia 2, 3, 19, 337, 417.—See Dalaradia.
 Umalia 66, 99.
- V.
- Vesey, de, 96.
 Vivian, cardinal, 11.
- W.
- Wales invaded by the Irish 63.
 Walshes 251.
 War engine 597.
- Waterford, city and bishops of, &c. 33, 60,
 185, 196 to 198, 201, 202, 481, 483,
 543.
 Wexford 218, 225.
 White knight 225.
 Wine 107.
 Windele's Cork 171, 172, 176, 178, 180, 182.
 Witchcraft 450, 459.
 Wills, of kings Roderick and Torlogh O'Conor 27, 126.
 — of Corinac Mac Cullenan 196.
 — of Cabir Mor 220, 556.
 Wonders 6, 141, 312, 323, 469, 482.
 Wooden buildings 188, 212.
- ERRATUM.—At p. 730, read Normans, pages 463, 464.

EXPLANATION OF THE MAP.

The topographical and historical Map, which accompanies the Annals of the Four Masters, has been compiled chiefly for the purpose of illustrating the events recorded, and pointing out the territories possessed by the Princes, Lords, Chiefs, and Clans, mentioned in the course of the Annals, thus elucidating the History, Topography, and Antiquities of Ireland. The Map has been arranged by Philip Mac Dermott Esq., M D. and compiled partly from the ancient Topographies of O'Dugan and O'Heerin, which are given in the Annotations to the Annals, and explained in the Preface and Introduction, and partly from the Annals of the Four Masters themselves, one of the best and most accurate authorities, on the rank, titles, and territories, not only of the Irish Princes, Chiefs and Clans, but of the great Anglo-Norman or Anglo-Irish families. A great mass of materials has been also collected from various other sources. Abraham Ortelius, a celebrated geographer of Antwerp, who died in 1598, published a Map of Ireland, giving the names of the principal Irish and English possessors, in the reign of Elizabeth, and this Map was republished by the learned Charles O'Connor of Belenagare, about the year 1770, showing the principal Irish and English proprietors in the reign of James I., or beginning of the 17th century. An account of the Map of Ortelius is given in the Introduction to the second volume of Shaw Mason's Statistical Survey of Ireland.

The Map of Ortelius is, however, very defective, for it does not contain one seventh of the Irish Chiefs and Clans, besides, as there are no baronies marked, it is impossible accurately to ascertain the territories possessed by the various tribes. The Maps accompanying the State Papers of the reign of Henry the VIII. published in 1834, were compiled from about A. D. 1515, to 1567, and are very valuable, as containing the names of the principal Irish and English possessors at that period, but many of the names are misspelled, and difficult to be ascertained; on those Maps are given curious representations of the three Mac Sweeneys of Donegal, each accompanied with the figure of a battle-axe, as they were celebrated commanders of galloglasses. The Map of Ortelius and those of the State Papers, as far as they go, have been made available, but materials have been collected from numerous other sources, as the various ancient Histories, Topographies, and Genealogies found in Keating; in Cambrensis Eversus; O'Flaherty's Ogygia; the Dissertations of Charles O'Connor; O'Brien's Irish Dictionary; O'Halloran; Mac Geoghegan; the works of Ware, Usher, Valancey, Camden, Hammer and Campion; Cox's Hibernia Anglicana; Harris's Hibernica, Colgan, De Burgo, Archdall and Lanigan; the Public Records and Inquisitions published from 1825 to 1829, particularly the Books on Ultonia and Lagenia; all the topographical Dictionaries, County Histories, and Surveys hitherto published; ancient Peerages, by Lodge and others; Burke's Peerage and Landed Gentry; and personal information collected from various sources. The Census of 1821 has been consulted, which gives the names of the families in every parish in Ireland, and many Clans have been collected from it; for where an old tribe name is very numerous at the present day, it may be inferred that they have been located there for centuries.

As the Danes make a remarkable figure in Irish History, in the 9th, 10th and 11th centuries, they are marked on the territories where they were chiefly located along the sea coast, and the great lakes. The Anglo-Irish on the Map, are the great Anglo-Norman Barons, who came with Strongbow and his successors, and were commonly called Strongbowians, together with many English families of note, who came to Ireland before the reign of Elizabeth, or down to about A.D. 1560; and as this Map is chiefly intended to elucidate Irish History to that period, the great Anglo-Irish families are placed on it, most of them being historical, and often mentioned in the Annals of the Four Masters; but the names are necessarily limited to those who came to this country before the reign of Elizabeth, for to give all the families of note who were located in Ireland, since that period, through successive revolutions, would require a Map of three times the size; and it is to be observed, that this is intended, not as a Map of modern, but of ancient Ireland; but, at the same time it may be mentioned, that in the topographical Notes to the Annals, accounts have been given of the nobility and chief families of English descent, in the different counties, down to modern times. It has been mentioned in the Notes, that ancient Ireland was made into two great divisions, one denominated Leath Mogha, which constituted the southern half, and comprised the kingdoms or ancient provinces of Leinster and Munster, the other, forming the northern half, was called Leath Cuinn, and comprised the ancient provinces or kingdoms of Meath, Ulster, Connaught, Leinster, and Munster, which constituted the Irish Pentarchy, are marked on the Map, together with the chief ancient principalities, and large territorial divisions, but though it might be very desirable to give all the ancient territories, and remarkable places, with their names in Irish as well as in English, that object could not be accomplished, except on a Map at least twice the size, which could not be made available to accompany these Annals. Many ancient names of territories and remarkable places are given, as anglicised and latinized by various writers, to suit the general reader, for if in Irish these names would convey little information, except to Irish scholars. On reference to the names of the various territories in the Index to the Annals, full accounts will be found of the extent and boundaries of all the ancient kindoms or provinces, principalities, and minor districts, from which a coloured Map could be formed, shewing the exact extent of every territory. The counties, and all the baronies in Ireland, are laid down on this Map, for otherwise it would be impossible to ascertain accurately the modern localities, corresponding to the ancient possessions of the Chiefs and Clans, and the object was to make it of general utility. The names of many remarkable places are given, such as fortresses, and seats of kings, ancient cities, Bishop's sees, Colleges, celebrated battle-fields, &c.; but, as before stated, it would require a far larger Map to give all the interesting objects connected with Irish Antiquities.

On reference to the names of persons and places in the Index to the Annals, a full account will be found of the Irish princes, chiefs, and clans, and of the Anglo-Irish families of note, with their rank, titles, and territories. In the Topographical Notes, accounts are given of the territories possessed by each of the Irish princes and chiefs, from the 10th to the 17th century, comprising a period of seven hundred years of well authenticated history; but it may be observed, that before surnames were established, in the 10th and 11th centuries, and a regular succession of families ascertained, the ancestors of those princes and chiefs had possessed these territories for more than a thousand years. In the notes from p. 550 to 552, and at pp. 579, 580, an account is given of the rank, titles, and extent of territory held by each of the Irish princes lords, and chiefs; and as a guide to a general reference to the Map, it is to be observed, that in the topographical notes to the Annals, the ancient territories, and the corresponding counties and baronies, are described under the following heads, which can be easily found on reference to the Index; and a full account will be thus obtained of all the Irish princes, lords, chiefs, and clans, as well as of the old families of note of English descent in every county:

I. In the Notes on Meath, Teffia, Bregia, Moy Liffey, Annaly and Offaley, are described the counties of Meath, Westmeath, Longford, Dublin, and parts of Kildare and King's county, with their chiefs, clans, &c.

II. Orgiall, or the counties of Louth, Monaghan, and Armagh.

III. Dalaradia, Ulidia, and Dalrieda, or Down and Antrim.

IV. Tir-Eogain and Tir-Conal, or Tyrone, Derry, and Donegal.

V. Brefney and Fermanagh, or Cavan, Leitrim and Fermanagh.

VI. Connaught North, or Sligo and Mayo.

VII. Connaught South, or Galway and Roscommon.

VIII. Thomond, or Clare and Limerick.

IX. Desmond, or Cork and Kerry.

X. Ormond and Desies, or Tipperary and Waterford.

XI. Hy-Kinsellagh and Cualan, or Wexford, Wicklow, and Carlow.

XII. Ossory, Offaley, Leix and Moy Liffey, or Kilkenny, King's, and Queen's counties, and Kildare. A reference can also be made to the head, County Histories, in the Index.

To make this Map as correct as possible, great labour has been encountered in collecting the materials, which have been carefully and accurately arranged, the compiler and publisher being most anxious to render it a document that can be relied on as perfectly authentic. The Map has been engraved, with great accuracy, by W. H. Holbrooke, of Crow-street, Dublin, who also executed the ancient Irish Ornamental Letters in the Annals, and the Illuminated Title-page. The art of illuminating MSS. was practised from very remote ages, chiefly by the monks, who embellished their works on ecclesiastical history with paintings in beautiful and brilliant colours. These artists were called Illuminators, and decorated their books with elegant ornamental letters, emblematic figures, portraits of Saints, Angels, &c., exquisitely coloured, and gilt or burnished with gold. Many magnificent specimens of this ancient art are to be found in various Libraries throughout Europe, particularly in ecclesiastical works, Lives of Saints, Books of the Gospels, Missals, &c. The Irish ecclesiastics extensively practised this art, and many of their Books, of great antiquity, still remain, such as the Book of Armagh, or of St. Patrick, the Book of Kells, or of St. Columbkille, which is preserved in Trinity College Dublin, and many more in various Libraries, all exquisitely illuminated. After the invention of printing, the practice of illuminating books fell into disuse, but has been again partially introduced in modern times, particularly in England, by the celebrated Pugin, who is the great reviver of this art, and has published a book of splendid specimens. The illuminated Title-Page to the Annals of the Four Masters does great credit to the taste and talents of Mr. Holbrooke, who has executed, in a very elegant style, that and other specimens of this costly and difficult embellishment, and has the merit of being the first who has attempted to revive this beautiful and ancient art in Ireland.

Ancient Colonies.—On a Map of ancient Ireland, the Colonies that peopled the country from the earliest ages should be placed; but as its size was not suitable for that purpose, the following account of them is here subjoined. The Celts were descended from Gomer, and the Scythians from Magog, two sons of Japhet, son of Noah, and both these people originally dwelt in the countries near the Euxine and Caspian seas, on the borders of Europe and Asia. (See Notes in Annals, p. 363 to 365).

1. The Partholomians came from Scythia near the Euxine sea, and were located chiefly in Ulster, at Inis-Samer in Donegal, and also at Binn-Edair now the Hill of Howth, where they were all, in number nine thousand, cut off by a plague, after they had been in Ireland thirty years.

2. The Nemedians, who were Celto-Scythians, came from the country near the Euxine, and were located chiefly in Ulster at Ardmacha, or Armagh; in Derry, and Donegal; and at the hill of Usneach in Meath.

3. The Fomorians, who were African pirates, of the race of Ham, and considered to be Canaanites or Phenicians, who were expelled from their country by Joshua, were located along the coasts of Ulster and Connaught, mostly in Antrim, Derry, Donegal, Leitrim, Sligo and Mayo, and had their chief fortress, called Tor-Conaing, or Conang's Tower, on Tor Inis, or the island of the Tower, now Tory Island, off the coast of Donegal; and another at the Giant's Causeway, which was called Clochan-na-Fomoraigh, according to O'Brien, in his Dictionary, signifying the Causeway of the Fomorians, as it was supposed to have been constructed by this people, who are represented as a race of giants. These three colonies came to Ireland at different times, about 1600, to 1500 years before the birth of Christ, and had many fierce contests with each other.

4. The Fir-Bolg or Belgians, according to some accounts, were Scythians, and came from Greece, but are more correctly considered a Celtic race from Belgic Gaul, and came to Ireland about 1300 years before the Christian era; they were located in Meath and Leinster, but chiefly in Connaught, where the Fir-bolg kings ruled for more than a thousand years.

5. The Tuath-de-Danan, considered by some to be Celto-Scythians, by others Chaldeans, Persians, Phenicians or Pelasgians, arrived about 1200 years before the birth of Christ, and conquered the Fir-bolg. The Danans came from the East, some say from Greece, to Scandinavia or Denmark, and thence to North-Britain and Ireland. They were located chiefly at Teamur or Tara, and Tailtean in Meath, at Cruachan in Connaught, and at Aileach in Donegal. Their kings ruled over Ireland 197 years, and this people being represented as highly skilled in the arts, they are by some Antiquaries supposed to have built the Round Towers.

6. The Milesians or Gael, originally Celto-Scythians, near the Euxine Sea, on the borders of Europe and Asia, settled in Spain in very remote ages, and were mixed with the Celtiberians and Phenicians. They came to Ireland from Galicia, in North Spain, about 1000 years before the Christian era, and conquered the Danans. The Milesians were divided into three great tribes, the Heremonians, Heberians, and Irians, so called as descendants of three brothers, Heremon, Heber, and Ir, the sons of Milesius king of Spain. The Irians had Ulster; the Heremonians possessed Meath, and Leinster, and afterwards, also, Connaught and Ulster; the Heberians had Munster. The Clanna-Breogain, or Brigantes, were a branch of the Milesians, and so called from their ancestor Breogain, king of Spain, who was grandfather of Milesius; they were also called Ithians, from Ith, the son of Breogain, and sometimes Lugadians, from Lughaidh, the son of Ith. The Brigantes were located in South Leinster, and under the name of Ithians and Lugadians, in Cork and Kerry, or ancient Desmond.

7. The Cruthacans or Picts were Celto-Scythians, and, according to our ancient historians, came from Thraee, soon after the arrival of the Milesians, or about 1000 years B. C., but not being permitted by the Milesians to remain in Ireland, they sailed to Albain, or Scotland, and became possessors of that country; in the course of many centuries, colonies of them came over and settled in Ulster, about the beginning of the Christian era, and at subsequent times; they were located chiefly in the territories which now form the counties of Down, Antrim, and Derry. An account of all these colonies, and of the tribes in Ireland, mentioned by the Greek geographer Ptolemy, in the 2nd century, is given at p. 340 to 345; 361 to 369, and 391 to 394, in the Notes to the Annals.

8. The Danes and Norwegians, or Scandinavians, a Teutonic race, of Scythian origin, came to Ireland in great numbers, in the 9th and 10th centuries, and were located chiefly in Leinster and Munster, in many places along the sea-coast, their strongholds being the towns of Dublin, Wexford, Waterford, Cork, and Limerick.

9. The Anglo-Normans, a Teutonic race, descended from the Normans of France, who were a mixture of Norwegians, Danes, and French, and conquered England in the 11th century, came to Ireland in the 12th century, and got possession of a great part of the country, under their chief leader, Richard de Clare, earl of Pembroke, who was named Strongbow, hence his followers have been called Strongbowians.

10. The Anglo-Saxons, or English, a Teutonic race, came from the 12th to the 18th century. The Britons or Welsh, a mixture of Celts and Saxons, came in the 12th and 13th centuries. These English colonies were located chiefly in Leinster, but also in great numbers in Munster and Connaught, and partly in Ulster.

11. The Scots, who were chiefly Celts of Irish descent, came in great numbers from the 10th to the 16th century, and settled in Ulster, mostly in Antrim, Down, and Derry; but on the Plantation of Ulster with British colonies, in the 17th century, the new settlers in that province were chiefly Scotch, who were a mixture of Celts and Saxons. Thus the seven first colonies were a mixture of Celts, Scythians, and Phenicians; but the four last were mostly Teutons, though mixed with Celts; and a compound of all these races in which the Celtic blood is predominant, forms the present population of Ireland.

Ancient Names of Ireland.—1. Inis Ealga, or the Noble Isle. 2. Fiodh-Inis, or the Woody Island. 3. Crioch Fuinidh, the Final, or most remote Country. 4. Inis-Fail, or the Island of Destiny. 5. Fodhla. 6. Buiba. 7. Eire, Eri, Eirin, and Erin, supposed to signify the Western Isle. These were the Irish names of Ireland. 8. Ierne, Ierna, Iernis, Iris, and Irin. 9. Ivernia, Ibernica, Hibernia, Juvernia, Ionernia, Hiberia, Hiberione, and Verna. 10. Insula Sacra, or the Sacred Isle. 11. Ogygia, or the most ancient Land. These were all names given by the Greeks and Romans. 12. Scotia, or the land of the Scots. 13. Insula Sanctorum, or the Island of Saints, were names applied by various Latin writers and ecclesiastical historians. 14. Eire-land, or Ireland, by the Anglo-Saxons. 15. By the Danes, Irlandi and Irar. 16. By the Anglo-Normans, Irelande.—See Annals, p. 388.

THE ANNALS of the
FOUR MASTERS

TOPOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL

Ancient Ireland

Showing the Five Kingdoms of the Pictarchy
MEATH, ULSTER, CONNAUGHT, LEINSTER & MUNSTER

as they existed under the Milesian Kings with the old Principalties & other Chief Divisions the Palaces of the Kings, ancient Cities, Bishops Secs. & remarkable Places, and the Territories possessed by each of the Irish Princes, Lords & Chiefs from the 11th to the 17th Century, also the Possessions of the Danes in the 10th 11th & 12th centuries, and of the great Anglo-Norman and old English Families from the Reign of HENRY THE II to that of EDWARD THE FIRST and the Period from the latter end of the 12th to about the middle of the 16th century.

On the Printed Sheet accompanying the Map an Account is given of the extent of all the ancient Territories, and of the Possessions, Rank, Titles & Descent of all the Irish Princes, Lords & Chiefs, and also the Titles & Territories of the Anglo-Norman Lords & great English Families. The Milesian Chiefs are all distinguished by U and Mac, the Head which are placed about the Middle of each Barony & the others of their Localities. The Anglo-Irish are placed on some part of their Possessions & the word REX is marked on the Territories which they possessed.

The Abbreviations are: P. Prince, L. Lord, C. Chief, C. Chief, B. Baron, V. Viscount, and E. Earl

EIRE ARD INIS NA-RIGH

NOBLE ERIN ISLAND OF KINGS.

Compiled by Philip Mac Dermott M.A.

BOSTON COLLEGE

DOES NOT CIRCULATE

257

BOSTON COLLEGE LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY HEIGHTS
CHESTNUT HILL, MASS.

Books may be kept for two weeks and may be renewed for the same period, unless reserved.

Two cents a day is charged for each book kept overtime.

If you cannot find what you want, ask the Librarian who will be glad to help you.

The borrower is responsible for books drawn on his card and for all fines accruing on the same.

